At thirty Baxter had completed his invention of a new and difficult process of art reproduction. Fifteen years later he had improved and brought it to its perfection. This was seen in the exhibition in Hyde Park of 1851, where were shown, in different styles, specimens of his oil-colour printing. Those who remember that period can call to mind his large prints of the "Interior" and "Exterior," and smaller ones of the "Gems" of the Exhibition. These were issued at a low price, had a large sale, and are as fresh and rich in colour now as when they were printed. The details, too, are well brought out, and the work is thoroughly finished. Among the subjects which he copied are some from the Old Masters, as the set of Raphael Cartoons, in a beautiful brown tint, and vigorous in outline. One of his most successful ventures was "A Letter from Home," a settler's log-hut in Australia at the breaking out of the gold fever in 1851. This had an enormous sale, as it appealed to the feeling of the day. Then there is a miniature pictorial history of the Royal Family at the same period: portraits—very good—of the Queen in her royal robes, and various others; the Prince Consort, in his uniform of Field Marshal, standing in a balcony; the Princess Royal; the Prince of Wales as a young Jack Tar; the Palaces of Windsor and Osborne; the visit to Ireland and other scenes in their lives at that epoch. Besides, there are approximately truthful renderings of some of Turner's works, as "The Wreck"; Abbeys, Castles, Lakes, and other lists of English and foreign scenery.

Here is indeed a legitimate satisfaction in collecting. There is no fear of depreciation in value—the matrices no longer exist—there is every reason to believe that from their scarcity these "things of beauty" in permanent colours will increase in estimation now that the attention of the collector has been called to them, however little such ignoble considerations should actuate him.

D. B.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

In reply to a question in the House of Commons on Tuesday last, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said:

"Over 600 drawings by Turner, in water-colours or pencil, are on daily view at the National Gallery. No water-colour drawings remain unexhibited, but only some rough sketch-notes, chiefly in pencil, on leaves of small pocket-books.

In 1891 the whole of the then unexhibited portion of Turner's drawings was carefully sifted, and everything at all fitted for exhibition selected. Out of these it was found possible to form a loan collection, which is at present in the Ruskin Museum at Sheffield. There are now four circulating collections, each of which contains 50 or more water-colour drawings or sketches."

MESSRS. G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS announce an illustrated book on the Pottery and Porcelain of the United States, by Mr. Edwin A. Barber, of the Pennsylvania Museum.

MR. EDWARD ARNOLD announces a new edition of Tales from Hans Andersen, with nearly forty original illustrations by E. A. L.

THE September number of the Studio (being published while painters, like other people, are away in the country) is mainly devoted to applied art. The most important article is that on "Artistic Houses," by Mr. J. S. Gibson, himself an architect, which is abundantly illustrated. Other subjects dealt with are wall-papers, glass-painting, and gas-fittings.

WE have received No. XII. of the Transactions of the Cambridge University Association of Brass Collectors, which can be warmly commended to all interested in this minor department of antiquarianism. Some objection, perhaps, might be urged against the title of the society. For, in the first place, its membership is by no means confined to members of the University, nor even to local residents at Cambridge; and, in the second place, the "collection" of brasses—which can hardly be accomplished except by illegitimate means—naturally does not figure among its five expressed objects. One of these objects is to compile an accurate list of all English brasses, with a view to publication; and we are glad to find that a good deal of work has already been done in this direction. It is further proposed to publish a periodical portfolio of monumental brasses, including copies of those no longer in existence. Intending subscribers should address to Mr. R. A. S. Macalister, Torrissdale, Cambridge. The present number contains papers on the Brasses of Bedfordshire, of Old St. Paul's, at Charlwood, Surrey, of those formerly in two churches at King's Lynn, and of one to Radulf Babynton (ob. 1521), at Hickling, Notts. Two of these papers are illustrated. Among the notes is a record of the fact that a brass at Swaffham Prior, Cambridgeshire, has been stolen within the last six months, and that another in the same church has been badly damaged, probably by an attempt to force it up. We notice also that the Association bought two brasses, for £7, at Dr. Lawson Tait's sale; so that, in its collective capacity, it does collect brasses.

MUSIC.

KISTLER'S "KUNIHILD."

THE composer, Herr Cyrill Kistler, is mentioned in Dr. Riemann's Musik-Lexicon. The story of his life up to the present is soon told. He was born in Bavaria in 1848, became teacher of theory at Sondershausen, and there produced an opera, "Kunihild" by name, in 1884. Nearly ten years passed before the work was again heard, at Würzburg (Feb. 24, 1893). A musical comedy, "Eulenspiegel," will, it is said, soon be given at Munich. A few facts of minor interest might perhaps be collected, and a list of small compositions given; but, practically, there is, as yet, nothing more to say about Cyrill Kistler himself.

Of his opera "Kunihild," a Guide has been written by Hermann Ritter, similar to the Keys to Wagner's music-dramas by Wolzogen. A translation has also been made by Mr. W. A. Ellis, the well-known editor of the Meister. The translator's object was not to produce a finished literary poem, but to reproduce the original in "almost verbally faithful English." This by no means easy task he has successfully accomplished; it is of immense service to anyone who would trace the intimate connexion between tone and word in this work.

Kistler is a thorough-paced disciple of Wagner. For his subject he has turned to legend—the story of the proud mistress of Castle Kunihild, who "by pity enlightened" was redeemed from the fatal curse resting upon her. This old Riesenberge story is powerfully worked up; the supernatural element is wisely reduced to a minimum, and the emotional element brought strongly to the fore. Kunihild herself is the most striking personage of the drama; and though she may at times recall Brünnhilde, she can well stand on her own merits.

We shall venture a few remarks on the music, though as they are based entirely on the pianoforte score, they can only be of a tentative nature. But we feel it a duty to call attention, in however imperfect a manner, to a work which seems really born of Wagner—a work not merely mimicking the master's mannerisms, but imbued with his very spirit. The composer starts heavily handicapped. By those who object to the system of representative themes, he, of course, stands already condemned; but even with those to whom this is a merit rather than a crime, the "Wagner great-coat"—to use Dr. Mackenzie's pithy phrase—may conceal the individuality which lies beneath. We have read and re-read the pages of this opera, trying to accept the Wagner influence and the strong reminiscences as inevitable; and it seems to us that the composer has something to say on his own account, something that will increase in proportion as external influences decrease. There is at times a tenderness of expression, as in the love duet of the second act; a nobility of character in many of the utterances of Kunihild; and throughout a dramatic strength, which is of good augury for the future. But while speaking of the work as one of great promise, it has sterling merit of its own, and, according to the statements of those who have witnessed a performance, powerful effect. Kistler, it should be remarked, has avoided that intricate weaving together of themes so characteristic of Wagner's later music-dramas, and the temptation must have been great to one who has so frankly accepted the principle of Leitmotive. Instead of complexity, the composer seems to aim at simplicity: the hands are often those of Wagner, but the real voice seems rather that of Gluck. Whatever the merits of Kistler, we plead for a fair hearing for him. According to the degree of his powers will be the degree of opposition. This is the inevitable fate of all who aspire to great things. Beethoven fanatics persecuted all who ventured to differ from that master, and in their turn Wagner fanatics will oppose anyone who ventures to look forward, and thus threatens to turn their idol into one of the "old" masters. Up to a certain point opposition does good: it matures genius and teaches the public. But opposition born of prejudice disheartens composers and confuses the public. Let us, if possible, learn wisdom from the past, and help on the cause of art. Kistler, it seems to us, is earnest and honest, and deserves every encouragement. As the maiden Kunihild gave the signal for Kumbert to essay the terrible bride-ride, so may managers help Kistler to essay the trying hill of fame; and, like Kumbert, may he prove victorious.

J. S. SHEDLOCK.

FOREIGN BOOKS AT FOREIGN PRICES.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,

Importers of Foreign Books,

14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN;

AND

20, SOUTH FREDERICK STREET, EDINBURGH.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

THIS DAY.

AT ALL LIBRARIES.

AN EXCELLENT KNAVE. In 3 vols.

By FITZGERALD MOLLOY.

THIRD AND CHEAP EDITION.

UNDER THE GREAT SEAL. By Joseph

HATTON. In crown 8vo, price 3s. 6d. [This day.]

London: HUTCHINSON & Co., Paternoster Row.

THEATRES.

ADELPHI THEATRE.

THIS EVENING, at 8, A WOMAN'S REVENGE. Messrs. Chas. Warner, Chas. Cartwright, H. Flemming, J. Carter, R. Harding, H. Russell, and E. W. Gardiner; Mesdames Elizabeth Robins, Mary Baby, F. L. Forster, and Fanny Brough.

COURT THEATRE.

THIS EVENING, at 8.45, THE OTHER FELLOW. Messrs. Charles Groves, C. H. Brookfield, Weedon Grossmith, W. Draycott, H. De Lange, W. Wyes, C. Coutts, R. Nainby, C. Burley, S. Hicks, Warden, Bertram, &c.; Misses E. Brown, E. Terriss, McIntosh, Aida Jenoure. At 8, HIS LAST CHANCE. Mr. Hicks and Miss Terriss.

CRITERION THEATRE.

THIS EVENING, at 8.50, LA FILLE DE MADAME ANGOT. Mesdames Amy Augarde, Haidée Crofton, M. A. Victor, F. Frances, B. Vere, D. Ford, M. Gort; Messrs. Courtice Pounds, W. Blakeley, S. Valentine, W. Dale, C. Davenport, S. Hemaley, G. Humphrey. At 8.15, POOR MIGNONETTE.

GAIETY THEATRE.

THIS EVENING, at 8, LA MASQUETTE. Messrs. Wallace Brownlow, Chas. Conyers, George Mudie, Stanley Rosse, and Robert Pateman; Misses Phyllis Broughton, Kate Seymour, Violet Monckton, Harold, Earle, Mills, Clarke, and Florence St. John.

GLOBE THEATRE.

THIS EVENING, at 9, CHARLEY'S AUNT. Mr. W. S. Penley, Messrs. Walter Everard, Ernest Hendrie, H. Farmer, Cecil Thornbury, and H. Reeves Smith; Misses Ada Branson, Audrey Ford, Cudmore, Nina Bouicault. At 8, JOHN THURGOOD, FARMER.

SHAFTESBURY THEATRE.

THIS EVENING, at 8.15, MOROCCO BOUND. Messrs. J. L. Shine, Templar Saxe, A. Seymour, H. Sparling, G. Grossmith, jun., C. Coop, D. Munro, and Charles Danby; Misses Violet Cameron, A. Hewitt, M. Studholme, V. Monckton, Temple, and Minnie Palmer. At 7.45, Rex Harley, Mimic.

VAUDEVILLE THEATRE.

THIS EVENING, at 9, A TRIP TO CHICAGO. Messrs. Charles Groves, L. Cautley, S. Brough, L. D'Orray, B. Williams, W. Carr, and John F. Sheridan; Mesdames H. Dacre, E. Baker, M. Dagmar, A. Thornton, and Gracie Whiteford. At 8.15, SIXES.

ROBINSON & CLEAVER, BELFAST,

Were awarded the Grand Diploma of Honour—Highest Award for Irish Damask Table Linen, Edinburgh, 1890.
Two Prize Medals, Paris, 1889.

IRISH DAMASK TABLE AND HOUSE LINEN.

Fish Napkins, 2s. 11d. per doz. Dinner Napkins, 5s. 6d. per doz. Table Cloths, 2 yds. square, 2s. 11d. 2½ yds. by 3 yds., 5s. 11d. each. Kitchen Table Cloths, 11d. each. Strong Huckaback Towels, 4s. 6d. per doz. Frilled Linen Pillow Cases, from 1s. 2½d. each.

IRISH CAMBRIC

Embroidered Handkerchiefs, in all the latest styles, from 1s. to 20s. each.

IRISH LINEN

Illustrated Price-Lists and Samples Post Free to any part of the World.

ROBINSON & CLEAVER, BELFAST.

Messrs. Macmillan & Co.'s New Books.

THE UNITED STATES: an Outline of Political History, 1492-1871. By GOLDWIN SMITH, D.C.L. Crown 8vo, 8s. 6d.

THE ATTIC ORATORS from ANTI-PHON to ISAEOS. By R. C. JAMES, Litt.D., M.P., Regius Professor of Greek in the University of Cambridge. New Edition. 2 vols. 8vo, 25s. [Shortly.]

A COMPANION to DANTE. From the German of G. A. SCARTAZZINI. By A. J. BUTLER. Crown 8vo, 10s. 6d. [Immediately.]

MACMILLAN'S SERIES OF "ENGLISH CLASSICS." NEW VOLUMES.

SHAKESPEARE.—ROMEO and JULIET. With Introduction and Notes by K. DEIGHTON. Globe 8vo, 2s. 6d.; sewed, 2s.

KING HENRY the FOURTH. First Part. With Introduction and Notes by K. DEIGHTON. Globe 8vo, 2s. 6d.; sewed, 2s.

KING HENRY the FOURTH. Second Part. With Introduction and Notes by K. DEIGHTON. Globe 8vo, 2s. 6d.; sewed, 2s.

MACMILLAN & CO., LONDON.

ASSISTANCE WANTED.

The undermentioned Cases, for which it has not been found possible to raise the necessary help from other sources, are RECOMMENDED by the CHARITY ORGANISATION SOCIETY. Contributions towards their assistance will be gladly received by C. S. LOCH, Secretary, 15, Buckingham Street, Adelphi, W.C.:

15,405.—A Northern Committee ask for £6 10s., to meet contributions from the clergy and a former employer to an allowance of 5s. weekly to a widow of 71, who has worked for one employer thirty years, and, owing to failing eyesight, can now earn barely anything.

17,287.—£7 3s. is needed to complete an allowance of 7s. 6d. a week to a widow of 74, who has supported herself for more than thirty years by nursing, but has for the last three years been entirely dependent on her children. Several of these have been most unfortunate, and are unable to do much; but one son allows 1s. a week, and another is for insurance. A second son gives 6d., and a daughter helps as she can.

17,396.—The Poplar Committee ask for £3 5s., to enable them to make up the income of an old couple to 10s. a week for six months. The man has an allowance of 7s. a week from the Engineers' Society, and the clergy are giving 6d. a week.

16,725.—The Bethnal Green Committee ask for £4 11s., for a weekly allowance for six months, for a very respectable widow of 71. She adopted and brought up a nephew, who supported her after her husband's death for eight years. This nephew, however, and some time ago. A clergyman is co-operating with the Committee in assisting the woman, and she still is able to do a little work.

16,263.—The Stepney Committee ask for £2 12s., to supplement for six months an allowance made to a very respectable widow, aged 67, who has a great dread of the workhouse.

16,890.—The St. Olave's Committee appeal for £2 10s., to enable them to complete a pension of 7s. 6d. per week to an old lady of 74. Her late husband's employers give 2s. 6d. a week, and the clergy help substantially.

16,846.—The Shoreditch Committee ask for £4 15s. 4d., to complete weekly allowance for a widow, aged 69, who is partially paralysed. She has lived in the same house for 40 years, and her late husband was for 35 years a member of two clubs.

17,174.—The Holford Committee ask for £3 18s., for an allowance of 3s. a week for a woman of 51, who is a great sufferer from chronic rheumatism. Friends give another 2s. a week, and relatives give some food and attendance.

IRISH CAMBRIC

Embroidered Handkerchiefs, in all the latest styles, from 1s. to 20s. each.

IRISH LINEN

Illustrated Price-Lists and Samples Post Free to any part of the World.

ROBINSON & CLEAVER, BELFAST.

POCKET HANDKERCHIEFS.

COLLARS: Ladies' and Children's 8-fold, 3s. 6d. per doz. Gents' 4-fold, 4s. 11d. per doz. CUFFS for Ladies, Gentlemen, and Children, from 6s. 11d. per doz.

Best quality long-cloth Shirts, 4-fold Linen Fronts, 35s. 6d. half-dozen. (To measure 2s. extra.)

BY SPECIAL APPOINTMENTS TO THE QUEEN AND EMPRESS FREDERICK OF GERMANY.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1893.

No. 1116, New Series.

THE EDITOR cannot undertake to return, or to correspond with the writers of, rejected manuscript.

It is particularly requested that all business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., may be addressed to the PUBLISHER, and not to the EDITOR.

LITERATURE.

Abraham Lincoln. By John T. Morse, Jun. In 2 vols. (Osgood, McIlvaine & Co.)

As a specimen of what critical biography should be, this book is to be commended. It is an effort, honestly executed, to discover the truth about Abraham Lincoln and to reveal the man as he actually was. Mr. Morse has collected the facts diligently, arranged them skilfully, and tried to give them their true significance, so that readers can test his deductions for themselves, and, if they do not choose to adopt them, are in a fair position to form estimates of their own. As a rule, however, Mr. Morse's deductions seem to be just. His story of the career of Lincoln, and his description of his character, are true in the main; and the interest he has given to his narrative is such that it is difficult to lay the book aside until it is finished.

Incidentally, but inevitably, Mr. Morse tells also the story of the Civil War: not in all its phases and detail of course, but in something more than outline; for everything of first rate importance in the career of Lincoln is associated with this event. He had reached the age of fifty-one when he was elected to the Presidency; but, in the light of following events, all that preceding time stands as a period of preparation for the brief but crowded life which was then about to begin. The real life of Lincoln is compressed into its last four years. To cancel them would cancel everything, leaving little to record in the way of achievement and almost nothing to suggest the existence of those powers, latent until then, which were to have such a swift and striking development as soon as the occasion should call them forth. He was then—as Mr. Henry L. Dawes says in the Atlantic Monthly for August—"only an untried and untutored Western politician," reputed to be fairly astute and honest. In fact, if he had not been comparatively obscure, he could hardly have received the nomination. Mr. Seward was the rightful claimant, because of his recognised ability and the services he had already rendered to the Republican cause. But there were various small cliques to be conciliated, and Mr. Seward's defect in the eyes of the wire-pullers was that he was too well known. Some of the cliques were already offended with him. Accordingly, Lincoln was available, not because he was known to have any merit, but just because he was practically unknown; "the mass of the people could place no intelligent estimate upon him at all, either for good or for ill." Mr. Morse has, properly, given his chief attention to those closing years. He has surveyed the preceding half-century briefly—perhaps too briefly; for, with all the career under review, he might, with advantage, have traced in the occurrences of that time of preparation the signs and tokens of the coming man.

The full difficulty of Lincoln's position cannot be understood unless we remember how badly his efforts were supported by the portion of the nation generally regarded as loyal. It was patriotic enough to give lives and even money to crush the rebellion, but it was not patriotic enough to be silent when silence was urgently needed. There was nothing like united and loyal support given to the man in charge, upon whose success everything depended. The loyalty which was displayed was more to principles or fads (whichever we prefer to call them) than to the cause of the Union. It must also be borne in mind that there was almost a fundamental difference of opinion as to the uses of the war. Apart from persons who objected altogether to its continuance, there was the powerful Abolition section, which concentrated its attention on emancipation, and there was the section to which Lincoln himself belonged, which made everything subservient to the salvation of the Union. In his message to Congress in December, 1861, Lincoln declared that his purpose had been "to keep the integrity of the Union prominent as the primary object of the contest on our part" (ii. 10). The Union, he insisted, "must be preserved, and hence all indispensable means must be employed." Lincoln's notion of emancipation was that it should be gradual and subject to compensation; and from time to time he endeavoured to make this possible by voluntary action on the part of the different States. In July 1862, he made an appeal, especially to the Border States—which maintained slavery, but had not seceded from the Union—to support his project. He urged them to do voluntarily and with pecuniary advantage to themselves what must come to pass by no choice of theirs if the war continued long. That he desired to befriend the negro is undeniable, but he made no secret that his motive in this instance was to strike a blow at the rebellion by severing more than ever the Border States from the Confederacy. What he urged was that his plan was "one of the most potent and swift means" of ending the war, for

"Let the States which are in rebellion see definitely and certainly that in no event will the States you represent ever join their proposed Confederacy, and they cannot much longer maintain the contest. But you cannot divest them of their hope to ultimately have you with them as long as you show a determination to perpetuate the institution within your own States" (ii. 24-25).

There was practically no response to this appeal, and the first emancipation proclamation was the consequence. It came on September 22, 1862; but only in the preceding August, Lincoln, in a letter to Greeley, had declared emphatically that "My paramount object is to save the Union, and not either to save or destroy slavery. If I could save the Union without freeing any slaves, I would do it. And if I could save it by freeing all the slaves, I would do it. And if I could save it by freeing some, and leaving others alone, I would do that" (ii. 107-8).

When he wrote these words, he had already drafted his proclamation, which itself indicated the nature of his policy. It declared that "All persons held as slaves, within any state or designated part of a state, the people whereof shall [on January 1, 1863] be in rebellion against the United States, shall be then, thenceforward and for ever, free"; but it rested entirely with the States themselves whether or not they should lose their slaves. Let them cease to rebel before the appointed day of doom, and they might keep their cherished institutions.

Mr. Morse thinks "it would seem right and natural" that the emancipationists should at this stage have rallied with generous ardour to sustain Lincoln, and he complains that they did not. Some certainly did, as Emerson's address on the subject plainly shows; but, considering what Lincoln's avowed object was, and how entirely conditional he made emancipation, it would surely have been premature for the Abolitionists to grow enthusiastic. Lincoln did not pretend to be a convert to their views, or that he was proposing to put them into practice excepting for another end, which might, as he then still hoped, be achieved without the final blow.

In all this Lincoln was perfectly consistent. His opinions and those of the Abolitionists had always been at variance. Before he became President he had said:

"I have no purpose to produce political and social equality between the white and the black races. There is a physical difference between the two which in my judgment, will probably forever forbid their living together upon the footing of perfect equality. . . . But I hold that . . . there is no reason in the world why the negro is not entitled to all the natural rights enumerated in the Declaration of Independence, the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. . . . He is not my equal in many respects, certainly not in colour, perhaps not in the moral or intellectual endowment. But in the right to eat the bread, without the leave of anybody else, which his own hand earns, he is my equal . . . and the equal of every living man."

About the same time he declared he would to the very last stand by the law of his State, which prohibited intermarriage of whites and negroes; and he professed himself "not in favour of making voters or jurors of negroes, nor of qualifying them to hold office." From these views he, probably, never departed very far; certainly he had not departed from them very far in September, 1862. For holding them honestly and consistently no wise man will blame him; but there is not much room for wonder that the Abolitionists did not recognise him as the champion of their cause when he threatened, merely as a part of his war policy, to deprive the rebels of their slaves.

In justice it must be admitted that, while Lincoln was honest in taking his course, so also, in many instances, were his censors in raising objections. The attacks were unwise only in so far as they were untimely but it may well be doubted if emancipatio would have formed so prominent a feature in Lincoln's war policy, if it had not been so strenuously thrust forward by a section of these censors. Mr. Morse is especially severe on Horace Greeley, and no doubt Greeley did not always fully realise that there is a time for silence as well as a time to speak. But Greeley was honesty itself, and was not even the "feather headed" person Mr. Morse suggests. If he had been, it is certain he could not so long have maintained his immense influence over vast numbers of his countrymen, the reality of which Mr. Morse does not question for a moment.

That the people failed to realise the gravity of the situation, and the consequent necessity for sinking all minor differences among themselves, is not strange when we remember how utterly the position was without precedent in their experience. They had been accustomed always, over petty political questions, to exercise that undoubted right, so dear to free and independent citizens, to shout as much as they liked; and they could not realise all at once that a question of life and death had arisen, over which discordant shouting was, to say the least, inexpedient. In the President himself they saw only one of their own number, appointed, not to govern them, but to execute their commands. He was hedged by none of that "divinity" which makes many a commonplace king seem like a hero. So they regarded it as their business, if not their positive duty, to give him advice. Mr. Morse alludes in this connexion to that "peculiar national trait, whereby every American knows at least as much on every subject whatsoever as is known to any other living man," and he invites us to remember that Lincoln "was the most advised man, often the worst advised man, in the annals of mankind." Happily, Lincoln knew how not to take advice; but of course the amateur advisers sulked or denounced, and, when any failure followed, cried out, "I told you so."

No doubt those in authority were not much better prepared than the general public for the emergency in which they found themselves. The early history of the war is a catalogue of distressing blunders, due to this incapacity on the part of everybody, excepting, perhaps, Governor Andrew, of Massachusetts, to realise the gravity of the position. Governor Andrew—"enthusiastic, energetic, and of great executive ability"—had been for many months preparing the militia for the crisis he could foresee, "weeding out the holiday soldiers and thoroughly equipping his regiments for service in the field. For this he had been merrily ridiculed by the aristocracy of Boston during the winter." He applied to the Government for a supply of rifled muskets, but was refused; but he managed to furnish his men with arms from other sources. The day after the call for troops reached him (April 15, 1861), his regiment of trained soldiers was ready for action. The remainder of the volunteer army raised to support the Union consisted of raw recruits, willing and enthusiastic enough, but wholly undisciplined.

If either North or South had been moderately prepared, there must have been peace on some terms in a very few months or even weeks. At first victory seemed to favour the South; but it is now evident that this was due less to any excellence in their forces than to the total inefficiency of their foes, an inefficiency made worse by an over-estimate of the Southern strength. That the South, so ill-equipped as it was, should commence the hostilities, is surprising, unless it is explained by presuming that the act was one of "bluff." Perhaps no one was more astonished than Jefferson Davis that the North did not succumb at the sound of the first gun. Certainly the arrangements he had made did not indicate that he expected it would be needful to fire many more.

If Lincoln suffered from that "peculiar national trait" mentioned by Mr. Morse, which gave him no distinction from other and irresponsible citizens, he was himself not wholly free from a similar weakness. He revealed a decided propensity for stepping in with opinions and instructions where more experienced men would have feared to tread. He marred McLellan's plans for the conduct of the war—plans which, if they could have been executed with the same free hand that Grant afterwards enjoyed, would have made the war shorter and infinitely less bloody. Unhappily for his success, McLellan's careful arrangements were not dramatic in their character. His purpose was: first to train an army and make it irresistible, and then to take the field and crush the foe. It would probably have proved sure, but it was slow; and it did not suit the excited citizens who had yet to learn that they were not invincible. Lincoln, partly goaded by them and partly himself impatient, meddled with his general just as the people were meddling with him. The policy of the far-seeing commander was spoiled: he was driven to tactics he did not approve; failure was the consequence; and finally he had to go. Happily Lincoln was a man who could learn by experience; and, before the days of Grant, he had learned much. Otherwise, even Grant, with a disciplined army, his daring, and his lavish expenditure of life, could hardly have succeeded.

The same self-confidence which, when applied to military matters that Lincoln did not understand, had such baneful consequences, when applied to his own subject of politics, proved effectual. Lincoln, says Mr. Morse, "was a masterful man, not all the time, and in small matters, and not often in an opinionated way; but from beginning to end, whenever he saw fit to be master, master he was." When Mr. Seward, his Secretary of State, with the best intentions in the world, offered to give the advantage of his own experience by assuming the President's responsibilities, Lincoln gave him to understand he was to be his secretary and nothing more. To other members of his Cabinet who needed it, a similar lesson was administered, civilly but firmly. A President even of the "Western" kind thought he could fittingly decline to delegate his duties to his secretaries, however polished they might be.

If Lincoln cannot fairly be described as a brilliant statesman, he was emphatically a strong man. When experience had taught him his limitations, he was contented to leave matters outside his own sphere to persons better qualified to deal with them. At the same time, within his sphere he was increasingly despotic. He found that even men with a superior reputation for sagacity did not on the whole prove to be so much wiser than he was himself as to make it desirable for him to prefer their judgment to his own. Moreover, there were such diverse opinions among his advisers that if he had heeded them he must soon have been in the unenviable predicament of the man with the ass, who, trying to please all, pleased nobody and lost his ass for his pains. Lincoln, said Emerson, "grew according to the need. His mind mastered the problem of the day, and as the problem grew so did his comprehension of it." With a mind open, but not unstable, he was ready to consider all aspects of his problem, but to act only on his own judgment and responsibility. The first mark of his strength is that he was self-centred.

Lincoln's policy may or may not have been the best possible; but, assuming it was not, he made it serve by his persistence. Nothing could have been so fatal as vacillation, and of vacillation he was never guilty. He was a man of thought rather than of intuition. He could not see on the instant what ought to be done. His prompt decisions were liable to be wrong. He reached conclusions slowly; but give him time, and they were sure to be wise. As Mr. Morse says: "Mr. Lincoln was a sure and safe, almost an infallible thinker, when he had time given him; but he was not always a quick thinker" (ii. 57). A noteworthy feature in Lincoln's character is that he understood himself. Accordingly he seldom did arrive at conclusions hastily, and, when urged, knew how to postpone an answer without giving offence. He had tact, and with it Abbot Samson's "great, invaluable talent of silence"; for the light talk and frequent anecdote for which he was noted were merely chaff to cover what he thought fit to conceal. Lonely and self-reliant

"he sought neither counsel, nor strength, nor sympathy from anyone; neither leaned on any friend, nor gave his confidence to any adviser: the problems where wholly his, and the duty was his, and he accepted both wholly. 'I need success more than I need sympathy,' he said" (ii. 135).

So great was his tact that, apart from political bitterness, directed against his cause rather than against himself, he had scarcely an enemy. Assuredly he was no man's enemy, for he was a lover of peace and incapable of malice. In some cases it would seem as if the surest way to gain his support was to do him some wrong; and friendship never won anything from him at the public cost. A public man more disinterested it would be difficult to name. When engaged in any public duty, he absolutely had no private interests, and, as Mr. Morse says, "was always willing to run the chance of any consequences which might follow the performance of a clear duty" (i. 232). Eagerly as he desired a second term of office, he nearly destroyed his chance by refusing to postpone a public act likely to prove unpopular. This was the drafting of men for the army; and his supporters implored him to delay it, if only for a few weeks. But his largest private interest could not be allowed to infringe, however slightly, his public duty. This instance is characteristic of his whole career.

Clearly this steadfast man deserved a better fate at the hands of his countrymen than to be made the victim of indiscriminate eulogy. Such solid qualities as his need only the justice of plain facts and searching criticism to secure due honour. We cannot say with Mr. Lowell that "he was the wisest and most bravely human" person of modern times, for to be justified in affirming such a thing involves an impossible amount of knowledge. It is sufficient for us that he was wise and bravely human. It is to Mr. Morse's credit that his enthusiasm, though unconcealed, is well tempered; only in the concluding flourish is there any doubt of this. So judicious is he, that he does not even go so far as to adopt that secular mode of canonising great men—the omission of a handle to their names. To us "Mr. Lincoln" sounds a little incongruous.

WALTER LEWIN.

The Poetical Works of William Basse. Edited by R. Warwick Bond. (Ellis & Elvey.)

MANY greater men than William Basse must have sighed in vain for so sumptuous a dress as that in which Mr. Warwick Bond has invested this half-forgotten Elizabethan. Paper of the finest print of the Chiswick Press, meadows of margin, illustrations carefully reproduced from the original manuscript: these things must go far to gladden the heart of any poet's shade. Nor could he feel otherwise than grateful for the loving industry with which Mr. Bond has performed the duties of a literary executor. In many respects, this book is a model of what such editions should be. Not only has every poem and fragment which can fairly be ascribed to Basse been disinterred; not only has every scrap of information about the writer been carefully garnered, but—which is rarer—the results have been presented to the reader in a convenient and accessible form.

Mr. Bond's introduction of thirty pages contains a sketch of the little that is known or conjectured of Basse's life, and a moderate, if somewhat partial, criticism of him as a poet. This is followed by a series of notes on five poems mistakenly attributed to him by various writers, and this by a list of editions, and another of authorities. Then come the poems, each with a brief and lucidly written prefatory note of its own. The result is that the student knows exactly where to turn for the precise data that he wants. And Mr. Bond has further consulted his interests by not being too much afraid of repeating information. It is always better to read a thing twice than to run the chance of missing it altogether. The fault of the edition is a tendency to over-annotation. This one is inclined to explain by the fact, which Mr. Bond flaunts on his title-page, that he is an Extension lecturer. But Extension students are not likely to read Basse—it would not profit them much, if they did—and people who are not Extension students do not particularly want an outline of the history of Mary, Countess of Pembroke, à propos of an allusion to her; nor do they particularly care for philological explanations of more or less common Elizabethan words. Think how it would be if the editor of every poet who dedicated a copy of verses to "Sidney's sister, Pembroke's mother" thought it necessary to put a biography of her in the notes. Apart from this natural desire to extend, Mr. Bond's comment is generally clear, sensible, and useful. Much of the material brought together in this volume will be unfamiliar even to scholars. Everyone of course knows the famous elegy on Shakspeare—famous chiefly for Jonson's sarcasm—which was once believed to be Donne's, and printed as his in 1633. And most people know the angler's song, ascribed to Basse in Walton's popular book. But with the exception of these, most of Basse's works have long been hidden away in unique copies or in manuscript. And even now one series of his poems, that known as "Polyhymnia," of which a copy once existed in the Ricot library, and another in the possession of M. Corser, has disappeared, probably, as Mr. Bond suggests, "swallowed up by some voracious collection."

Let us briefly take the items of Basse's poetic achievement, in the order they are here printed. First come the few works published in his lifetime. There is "Sword and Buckler," a rhymed defence of serving-men, professedly written by one of themselves; there are three Pastoral Elegies, in the Spenserian vein, of Anander, Anetor, and Muridella; there is "Great Britain's Sunset," one of many monodies on Prince Henry. All these are exceedingly rare; and, though the first and last have been previously reprinted, the Pastoral Elegies have been unearthed by Mr. Bond in a unique copy from the library of Winchester College. Then follow a few commendatory verses, a poem in honour of Capt. Dover's "Cotsall" races, and three songs. It is uncertain, by the way, whether Basse was not a writer of music, as well as of words for songs. "Polyhymnia," as has been said, has vanished; but Mr. Bond has printed some extracts made at various times by Collier and Corser. These fragments do not lead one to think that the loss was very serious. The volume appears to have been chiefly composed of occasional verses in honour of Basse's noble patrons. Finally, we have an important group of poems, here printed from a MS. in the hands of Messrs. Ellis and Elvey, which was probably corrected for the press by the author himself before his death. It includes nine Eclogues, after the model of the "Shepherd's Calendar," and two more or less allegorical poems, entitled respectively, "Urania; the Woman in the Moon," and "The Metamorphosis of the Walnut-tree of Borestall." The Eclogues seem to have been originally seven in number, Basse here anticipating Gay's "Shepherd's Week." Each was moreover connected with a virtue. In the dedication Basse declares that Colin or Spenser has made the months of the year his own:

"Yet of the week has left me every day Verses to sing, though of a low degree."

At a later period, however, they were increased to nine, and prefaced by an "Apology" to the nine muses.

Scholars must needs be grateful to Mr. Bond for the singularly complete way in which he has put the remains of William Basse before us. But when it comes to estimating the literary value of what is thus preserved, it is less easy to be enthusiastic. For, after all, the chief function of Basse appears to be to show that even an Elizabethan can be a tedious versifier. For most of his work is quite uninspired; and even where he rises to a higher level, it is the inspiration of Spenser, not his own. Like a much greater man, his friend William Browne, he is absorbed in the sphere of an over-mastering genius: his faculties are deadened by the influence; he is fascinated into imitation. And the result is that he serves as a reductio ad absurdum of the Spenserian method when handled by any other than Spenser himself. Spenser is a courtier; Basse is fulsome. Spenser gives you "linked sweetness long drawn out"; Basse the "long drawn out" without the sweetness. I agree with Mr. Bond that the Eclogues show him at his high-water mark. In this eminently artificial atmosphere, he occasionally touches a happy note. And, as Mr. Bond says, he displays some real knowledge of country life, which does something to redeem his efforts from the insipidity that besets a pastoral. But in this quality he is inferior, I think, to Gay, and immeasurably so to such real idyllists as William Barnes and the author of "Dorothy."

EDMUND K. CHAMBERS.

The Baronage and the Senate. By W. Charteris Macpherson. (John Murray.)

THE composition and functions of the House of Lords will, perhaps, very soon become a burning political question. That House, as it is, satisfies neither political party altogether. For one party it is too strong; for the other it is not strong enough. Some reformers, open-mouthed, are for mending or ending, particularly ending; others, who think that the House of Commons is becoming parochial if not contemptible, are anxious to set this, their own peculiar "House"—the House of Lords—in order, and to make of it the ruling, dominant assembly. It is a rather fortunate circumstance that just at this moment a new book, at once practical and theoretical, historical and, one may almost say, prophetic, should appear, dealing with the peerage question. As usual of recent years, this addition to the more philosophical body of political writings comes from the Tory side. The other side now seldom cares to formulate itself in anything less ephemeral than an election address or a monthly review; but in this case the personality of the writer also adds a distinct note to the work. From his preface, he appears to be an Australian; from his name, and, to some extent, from his fervid mode of writing, one gathers that he is a Scot; and his historical views seem to have been derived from the teachings of Roman Catholics. From this combination one expects something uncommon, and one certainly gets it.

His preface—the work of a friendly but indiscreet hand—presents Mr. Macpherson somewhat at a disadvantage. For some years, it says, the Radicals have been attacking the House of Lords. “Although these attacks have been usually passed over in dignified silence, the time seems to have come when something in the way of a detailed reply and defence is both natural and justifiable.” Mr. Macpherson would not, perhaps, have implied so pointedly a close connexion between himself and the august body, hitherto so dignifiedly silent, and now so “naturally and justifiably” resentful. “All existing materials,” the preface proceeds, “and authorities have been freely made use of in these pages.” A book so introduced certainly seems to aim high; as certainly, if that be its aim, it manages pretty often to fall tolerably low. What is to be thought of a writer who speaks thus of the laws against the Nonconformists?

“At the Restoration the Church had its own again; and the Nonconformists, as a necessary precaution, were placed under vigorous restraint. If the Great Rebellion was, in the rebel peers, an attempt to revive feudalism in a new disguise, it was, in their Puritan allies, the attempted resuscitation of Judaism misunderstood. An active and unscrupulous minority, full of the desperate zeal of religious fanatics, had subjected the whole nation to an iron rule of dervishes, and the nation was determined to preclude the possibility of its recurrence. Never again would the nation descend into such an abyss of degradation, and to secure this end it was unavoidable to adopt timely precautions. Not for the protection of the Church only, but for that of the nation’s freedom, it was necessary to have recourse to safeguards against those who had so unmistakably established the nature of their aims and the absolute lack of conscience with which they sought to attain them. The strange but undoubted connexion between religious insanity and homicidal mania, since seen in the Taepings of China, and the Hau-Hau fanaticism of Maoris in New Zealand, had been brought home to the public mind on a colossal scale, rarely to be witnessed in the history of nations. The men of the Restoration had to deal with remorseless and unscrupulous fanatics; nor is it wonderful that the nation had resort to such natural measures of self defence from sudden and pitiless assault as we now adopt against the lunatic and criminal.”

There are other passages not less surprising:—

“It was this disloyal, unpatriotic, and anti-national attitude of the French Puritans, strongly contrasting in these respects with the English Roman Catholics, that roused the fierce hatred of the French people, shown in the Massacre of St. Bartholomew, and occasioned the lasting resentment which brought about the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes. The French people, never inspired with the Gothic or Semitic intolerance of Spain, persecuted the Huguenots, not as heretics, but as traitors, and it is undeniable that no body of religionists ever did more to deserve the name.”

Or take this:—

“To the expulsion of the Stuarts we owe the Irish difficulty existing at the present day, and as a point of law the loss of the American colonies.”

Or this:—

“By the expulsion of the last Stuart king de facto, and the ruin of his hopes in Ireland, the cause of liberty and toleration was for the time being lost.”

Passages like these serve to show that Mr. Macpherson’s opinions are neither commonplace nor timorously advanced. Upon what profound research he bases his conclusions we are not told. Certainly those whom he acknowledges as his authorities in his footnotes—Sir Charles Dilke, Mr. Inderwick, Mr. E. A. Freeman, Prof. Bluntschli, the Bishop of Oxford, Burke’s Peerage, and the Statesman’s Year Book—are scarcely authorities for these positions; but neither do these names alone suffice to exhaust the “all existing materials” which, we are assured, have been “fully made use of.” What the others were is Mr. Macpherson’s own secret; but one cannot help suspecting that other freedoms have been taken with them than that of merely making use of them.

Mr. Macpherson is, above all things, a vigorous, not to say bitter, hater. He hates a Puritan; he hates a Radical; he hates a Whig; he hates 1688; he despises Dissenters, if he does not hate them: he despises the House of Commons; he despises public opinion and popular taste. The English Whig peers, in 1688, were “full of unbridled insolence”; they introduced into England “dummy sovereigns,” and made Britain “a disguised Republic, whose scanty and suggestive veil served but to emphasise its true indecency and shamelessness.” “The traditional Whig hatred of every form of historic Christianity” helped to prevent the “laudable and desirable result” of the quasi-establishment of the Roman Church in Ireland:—

“It is not wealth that vulgarises, but Puritanism, with its deep-rooted hostility to all forms of art and all true civilisation.” “Puritanism poisoned the springs of the national life.” “In the House of Commons every member goes in dread of the countless societies of fanatics and sects of faddists, who hover round the field of politics, and attempt to blackmail every candidate for Parliament into a promise to support their absurd and mischievous proposals. Few members of the House of Commons can afford to speak the whole truth, and it is fewer still who have the courage to do so.”

These quotations show the vigour of his scorn. Yet his admirations are scarcely less eccentric than his hatreds. “Primogeniture” is “perhaps the greatest cause of national prosperity,” “a healthy and beneficent system.” King George the Third was “a great monarch and admirable man.”

“The abolition of the House of Lords would bring in its train the abolition of the House of Commons or the abolition of the Crown, the abolition of the British Empire, or the abolition of our constitutional freedom, or the abolition of both. . . . The abolition of the House of Lords, unless as a detail of revolution, is a mere brutum fulmen, an insolent but an empty and an idle menace. The abolition of the House of Lords save by a triple consent, which in two cases at least never would be given, can only be effected by a revolution. And as for that, as for a revolution, there is an army and there is also the hangman.”

It is after reading passages such as these—passages which are not casual eccentricities, but are characteristic of considerable portions of the book—that one wonders rather blankly what possible good the author expected to do his case by sallies of such a sort, and how the serious argument of the book can be seriously judged, when introduced in a strain such as this. At times we hear blasts of Roman Catholic controversy; at times the swelling note of Colonial self-importance; at times the arid counterpoint of an antiquarian lawyer; at times the shrill obligato of anti-democratic dogmatism. In despair the reader is tempted to guess that perhaps the whole book is a huge Scotch joke, until he is compelled to abandon that excuse for not attempting to understand it, in despair of ever perceiving where the joke can come in. Perhaps if the friend, to whom the author committed the revision of the sheets in England, had been bold, masterful, and judicious, the argument might have appeared shorn of these singularities, brief, telling, and direct; but then we should not have known Mr. Macpherson, should not have respected his sincerity, admired his ingenuity, pitied his want of insight, smiled at—and sometimes with—his random onslaught. The man is better than his book, and in losing the former we might have come to overlook the latter.

But, after all, the book itself, and especially its second half, is full of interest and suggestion. Mr. Macpherson has a definite ideal of what the House of Lords should be; and his projects for its reform are so far elaborated, that a draft Bill might well have appeared in the appendix. He is an Imperialist, and feels that the House of Commons tends rapidly to lose what hold it ever had over imperial policy. It is in a senate, containing, as of course the most experienced public servants, the men who are in the forefront of the professions, leading Colonists, leading traders, some bishops, Anglo and Roman Catholic, and the best of the “Pan-Britannic” hereditary peerage, selected by a representative system similar to that now applied to the peerages of Ireland and Scotland, that Mr. Macpherson hopes to find a body fit to command the respect of the Empire, possessed at once of its knowledge and its wants, whose authority would dominate the public will, whose appointment, otherwise than by any manner of public election, would preserve it calm and indifferent in the face of the most clamant public opinion: in short, which would know how regere imperio populos. Such an idea will not commend itself to everybody, but it has a kind of grandeur and inspiration about it. At least it is an honest attempt to meet difficulties which increase year by year, as the House of Commons becomes increasingly mechanical in its obedience to outside influences, decreasingly independent in its discussion of external problems, more provincial and less imperial in the midst of an empire, to which cohesion is a necessity of life, and an august and accepted central government a condition precedent to any such cohesion.

When he comes to practice, there is an abundant good sense in Mr. Macpherson's way of approaching the question of reform. He perceives clearly that reform must come by way of development of the existing House, and therefore probably from friendly hands within, not by way of abolition and re-construction at the hands of a dominant democracy without. A baronage is not a senate; an hereditary peer need not be a legislator; there are plenty of legislators in the House of Lords who did not inherit and will not transmit, and some who cannot transmit, their right of legislation to any successor. Five separate peerages now exist by the accidents of history, where one imperial peerage is a logical and a practical necessity. The powers of the Crown in this matter are such that little legislation is needed. These are the points Mr. Macpherson makes and remakes, and upon these he founds his plan. Let the House of Lords dish the Radicals, propose its own reform, and so secure to itself that heritage of power which is slipping from the Commons' grasp. Let there be one imperial peerage, whose members will elect from its own ranks a number of members of the House of Lords. Let certain public employments or positions qualify, but not entitle, the holder to be created a peer by the Crown, either for life or with remainder, and thereby a member of the House of Lords. Throw open the House of Commons to peers not members of the House of Lords. Thus Mr. Macpherson hopes to get the better of all his foes—Radicals, Puritans, Whigs, Democrats, and Protestant Dissenters; and the Empire will be governed by a senate, beside which the senates of Rome and Washington will pale, and not by a kind of disorderly London vestry, whose acts are alike beyond the control, the comprehension, and the respect of colonial constitutionalists in Victoria.

J. A. HAMILTON.

Carmina Mariana: an English Anthology in Verse in Honour of or in Relation to the Blessed Virgin Mary. Collected and Arranged by Orby Shipley. (Printed for the Editor by Spottiswoode & Co.)

MR. SHIPLEY'S rule in making this collection was to include everything at once edifying and poetical which he could find, except—it is a large exception—"devotional poetry which has become familiar in our hymn-books and books of prayer." That may perhaps be the reason why there are only three of Faber's poems, and these hardly the best. The arrangement is meant to be alphabetical, but subjects and the names of poets are intercalated in a perplexing way. For instance, Liguori does not appear as Liguori, but as St. Alphonsus, while some more of his poems appear under the "Lament of Mary" and the "Lullaby of Mary." There are Poems on Pictures under P; but Poems on the Madonna of San Sisto come under R. A few lines which Mrs. Browning translated from an eleventh-century Greek bishop are inserted under N as part of a nineteenth-century tribute. Middle Age verse begins with a poem on the Assumption by Sir John Beaumont.

There are Ballads and Legends under B, and Legends and Ballads under L.

The contents are very unequal. Probably the gem of the book is Crashaw's pathetic descant upon the devout plain song of "Stabat Mater Dolorosa." Like most variations by virtuosos on classical themes, it is no doubt overdone; and the ingenuity of Crashaw's generation was singularly unchastened. But with all his extravagance he is sincere and passionate and moving. Here is a stanza nearer to the Latin than most:

"Sancta Mater istud agas
Crucifixi figi plagas
Cordi meo valide
Tui Nati vulnerati
Tam dignati pro me pati.
Poenas mecum divide."

"Oh, teach those wounds to bleed in me: me so to read

This book of loves thus writ
In lines of death, my life may copy it
With loyal care.

Oh, let me here claim share.

Yield something in thy sad prerogative (Great Queen of Griefs) and give Me, too, my tears; who, though all stone,

Think much that thou shouldst mourn alone."

Another English hymn of the seventeenth century, by Richard Verstegan, a Catholic printer, is full of loving naïveté: it is not unlike "Jerusalem my happy home." Of the nineteenth-century poems none deserve popularity better than the "Shrines of Mary," by Miss Procter. Here is a fragment from the Envoy:

"Past griefs are perished and over,
Past joys have vanished and died,
Past loves are fled and forgotten,
Past hopes have been laid aside,
Past fears have faded in daylight,
Past sins have melted in tears—
One love and remembrance only Seems alive in those dead old years;
So, whenever I look in the distance,
And whenever I turn to the past,
There is always a shrine of Mary,
Each brighter still than the last."

That is still prettier in its context. Father Bridgett's expansions of St. Bernardin's paradox: "All things obey the commands of God, even the Virgin; and all things obey the commands of the Virgin, even God," is very subtle and strong. It is an argument well worked out in eights and sixes. The excerpts from Father Caswell's Drama Angelicum and his Tale of Tintern are not without attractions for the sympathetic; and the "irony" of Mary's Song from the former is both elegant and edifying. Many readers will prefer the verses by Father Prout and an old Provençal poet, founded on the fancy that the Holy Family had their fortune told by gipsies in the course of the flight into Egypt. Of course the older poet is naiver and more serious. A sonnet on Father Passaglia makes the obvious points both neatly and kindly; a conceit on a dead astronomer, which begins

"Starry Amorist, starward gone, Thou art—what thou didst gaze upon,"

is better meant than executed.

Many readers will be rather surprised to see how uninspired and uninspiring a great deal of pious mediæval verse was. Chaucer and Petrarch versified what they believed laboriously, and Pulci versified what perhaps he still half-believed lightly; and, without caring for either, we like Pulci best. It is a question for living authors whether it is worth while to turn half a dozen stanzas about a little girl who was drowned trying to pick waterlilies on the hypothesis that the little girl when she went to heaven took her waterlilies with her, or to ring changes on the title of Our Lady of the Snows, and to manufacture sonnets out of the pentameters which the present Pope thought it worth while to string together in the fashion of Boethius, or to make a marvel of the very sensible arrangement for providing the antipodes with a month of May of their own in October. Of course there is an immense mass of second-hand sentimentality, of which a little goes a long way. "The Daughter of the Puritans," who tended Our Lady's Lamp in Transformation was interesting for once, and hearty worshippers at all shrines are interesting always; but believers and half-believers and unbelievers, who like to look at other people worshipping, and call us to look on too, are apt to be wearisome. More of us than like to own to it are sometimes hard up for emotions; but it does not help us to be reminded of holy wells that have lost their canopies and nuns' wells by decayed parsonages, or even that the signal "To Rosary" is well known on sealing fleets, and that the Angelus bell is more important to monks, for whom it ends the hour of meditation, than to fanciful and sympathetic tourists.

G. A. SIMCOX.

NEW NOVELS.

Robert Carroll. By M. E. LeClerc. In 2 vols. (Hurst & Blackett.)

The Two Lancrofts. By C. F. Keary. In 3 vols. (Osgood, McIlvaine & Co.)

Homespun. By Annie S. Swan. (Hutchinson.)

The Hermit of Muckcross. By Denys Wray. (Sonnenschein.)

Dust and Laurels. By Mary L. Pendered. (Griffith, Farran & Co.)

West Cliff: a Romance. By Easton King. (Digby, Long & Co.)

Claud Brennan. By John Ferrars. (Bristol: Arrowsmith.)

A Conquered Self. By S. Moore-Carew. (Frederick Warne.)

Sons of the Croft. By P. Hay Hunter. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.)

The Kidnappers. By George G. Green. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.)

In the plethora of sensational literature, it is refreshing to meet with a really beautiful and elevating story like Miss LeClerc's Robert Carroll. It is a tale of the Jacobite rising which followed upon the death of Queen Anne, and the main portion of the action takes place in the North of England. The hero is the son of Sir Arthur Carroll, who has made many sacrifices for the Stuarts, and who, at great peril to himself, shelters the Pretender in 1715. The heroine, Mistress Verena Lyle, is, on the contrary, the daughter of a staunch supporter of the House of Hanover. The reader will understand the perils and vicissitudes which attend the lot of lovers so situated. It is long since we read of so true and tender a passion as that which animated these two. The pure, frail girl had a heart of oak for enduring trial where her lover was concerned; and it is with a pang of regret that we come upon his premature death in prison, while traitors in every way beneath him are spared. The high-souled Verena remained true to his memory, when "the romance of Robert Carroll, and the love of Verena Lyle, passed away from amid the things of Time into the dim regions of Eternity." The style in which this work is written is charming and graceful, so that the reader finds a double pleasure therein. As a specimen of the historical novel, we have had none better for some years past.

Of a wholly different type is The Two Lancrofts. It is of a realistic or impressionist order; but, despite its cleverness, the whole tone of it is to our mind unpleasant. To photographing social incidents and individual sensations there is a limit—even when done in the interests of art—and that limit Mr. Keary has overstepped. In the first volume we have the realism of intoxication, of profanity, and of blasphemy; and we firmly believe that the British public has a religious conscience which will rise in revolt against these things. It is neither particularly clever nor witty to refer to Almighty God as "A. G.," and to observe that "it's just as if he had played back on us, and gone out on purpose." Rollicking artists who toss the Voltairian ball about may be entertaining enough on other matters, but they become simply offensive when they discuss deep problems in the manner represented in Mr. Keary's pages. The two Lancrofts are cousins. The career of both is traced with some minuteness, and certainly no deformity of moral action is hid. Willie, the hero, is a bit of a poet, though the specimens furnished of his muse are mere reminiscences of greater writers. He has a kind of all-round cleverness, and lectures at the Royal Institution on "Realistic Fiction." After leading a hot and feverish existence, he dies with his promise unfulfilled. At one point in his history, he believed he had found the philosopher's stone in art, when he grasped Ruskin's idea that creation was the one idea—"to carve a cherry stone with an original pattern." And in order that the unsophisticated may understand what is "impressionism" in novel writing, we may add that this is how the author makes him express his exultation: "By God, I may be rather screwed . . . but I'm damned if I don't see the gist of the matter." Hope Lancroft, the artist, being of a rather stronger constitution than his cousin, survives all his "wild oats" and other experiences. Realism enters into the relations of the Lancrofts with the other sex, and there is at least one daring scene in which Thyrza Lemoine, the frail actress, captures the hero when he has been disappointed in love. We are pained by this book. It shows a capacity for reading human nature; but if it be a fair specimen of what the new English realistic school aims to become, then we can only exclaim, "Reform it altogether!" By the way, in the first volume a couplet from the Marquis of Montrose's admirable poem is quoted on no fewer than three separate occasions as follows:

"I'll make thee glorious by my pen,
And famous by my sword."

We also see no necessity for disguising such names as Zola, De Maupassant, and Lord Lyons, as Yeyla, De Malmaussant, and Lord Lyson respectively.

Miss Swan is favourably known for her studies of Scottish life and character, and Homespun is neither better nor worse than its predecessors. It deals with simple folk, simply but effectively portrayed; and the fact that we are interested in tracing their fortunes is perhaps the best tribute we can pay to the author. The Beild Worthies who foregrounded in Bawbie Windrum's public are real Scots, and among the women folk Marget Broon and Euphame Dempster are equally realisable in the flesh.

A somewhat wild and incoherent sketch is The Hermit of Muckcross; and there is at least one realistic scene, a ghastly description of a cremation, which the reader might have been spared. The author probably knows what he is driving at, but it is more than we do. Mr. Denys Wray's style, too, leaves a great deal to be desired.

Miss Pendered's Dust and Laurels is, we regret to say, a good deal more conspicuous for the dust than the laurels. The writer calls her story "a study in nineteenth century womanhood"; but Vera Grace, notwithstanding her superficial cleverness, is an inferior type of English womanhood. Hysterical, wilful, and a victim to her own passions, this heroine is continually apologising for false steps which it was perfectly easy for her to avoid, but into which she rushed headlong. She has an honest and manly young fellow for a lover, but she flirts and compromises herself with others outrageously. She finally goes out to Madeira to nurse her first lover, who is dying. Inheriting his wealth, she employs it in founding a Free College for Women. Then she makes a great literary success as the author of Fractions, and has the world at her feet. There is undoubted talent in this book, but it is ill-regulated; and we hazard the prediction that in ten years' time—when Miss Pendered is doing better work—she will desire the kindly dust of oblivion to envelop whatever laurels she hoped to obtain by her present venture.

We are glad to give a word of cordial praise to West Cliff, which is a slight sketch of Portland Isle, with a glance at the manners and customs of its inhabitants in 1817-19. Without exhibiting striking talent or originality, it is written in a natural and easy vein. Bessie Stone—the beautiful wild flower of Portland—is an attractive figure; and we watch with interest the struggle between her two lovers, the aristocratic Vavasour and the peasant Ned Hinde. The scene in which the latter pleads with her is very pathetic; but she is lured to her ruin by Vavasour, and comes home to die. John Thornhill is an admirable character. We cannot quite accept the author's statement that customs' duties were "imposed by unjust and avaricious ministers for their own selfish ends" early in the present century.

Novels which discuss politics, philosophy, and theology are generally heavy reading, and we are afraid that this will be the verdict passed on Mr. Ferrars's Claud Brennan. Yet the book is by no means devoid of interest. The hero is a man of brilliant parts, who gains a conspicuous position in literature. He has strong views on county councils, vestries, and municipalities, and asserts that "one man of energy will accomplish a piece of work while a committee is moving the first resolution." Most readers will perhaps prefer Claud Brennan the lover to Claud Brennan the theorist. But here again he is unfortunate. He wins the love of Edith Vaughan, a girl of high principle and deep religious feeling; but little by little Brennan himself becomes a confirmed Agnostic, and at length publishes a book which scandalises all devout persons. Feeling the impassable gulf which divides them, Edith Vaughan breaks her heart over the man whom she loves, and dies. Finally, there is a sad scene depicting Brennan's own death. The story is not of a popular type, but it manifests ability.

The characters in A Conquered Self are well drawn. Bernice Yorke sacrifices her own happiness to that of her sister, when she finds that the latter has set her affections upon her own lover. But Harold Warren was a miserable, selfish creature, in spite of his personal beauty, and Bernice is rewarded at last by the love of a much better man.

The little sketch, Sons of the Croft, is a vignette of real life, well and deftly executed. The two brothers, Alastair and Angus Macdiarmid, are clearly defined. The former is clever and brilliant, but erratic; and after nearly wrecking his life, he happily recovers his better manhood and wins the Victoria Cross for bravery on the battlefield. Angus is one of those plodding, faithful fellows whose mission seems to be to save others without greatly distinguishing themselves.

Another excellent sketch in the same series of cheap novels is The Kidnappers. Again the character-drawing is good, especially as regards the hard, selfish, and hypocritical money-grabber Bailie Robb. It seems scarcely possible that the traffic in human flesh should have been carried on not so very long ago in the northern portion of the British Islands. We have here a vivid picture of the evils attending this inhuman trade.

G. BARNETT SMITH.

SCOTTISH LITERATURE AND LIFE. History and Poetry of the Scottish Border. In 2 vols. By Prof. Veitch. (Blackwoods.)

Old-World Scotland. By T. F. Henderson. (Fisher Unwin.)

Pleasant Memories of a Busy Life. By David Pryde, LL.D. (Blackwoods.)

The Stickit Minister, and some Common Men. By S. K. Crockett. (Fisher Unwin.)

THESE four works deserve to be classed together, for two reasons. They present aspects of the life of Scotland at different periods of its history; and they stand quite apart from and above the "minor books," which constitute nine-tenths of Scottish literature at the present time.

The first is the largest and most important. Prof. Veitch has almost entirely rewritten and has very greatly enlarged the work which he published some fifteen years ago on the history and poetry of the Scottish Border. As it now stands, I should say it is a final work—final as regards alike the literature, the history, and the topography of the Border. It is quite possible, to say the least, that all antiquaries may not take the same view of the Catrail or Picts' Dyke as Prof. Veitch, and that in some quarters his specially Scottish Arthurian legend may provoke a smile. But, as a representation of what may be accounted the orthodox view of the Border—its literature, its ethnology, its history, its legends, its fairyland—there is in existence no book to be placed on the same shelf with it. Whoever wishes, for example, to see fair Melrose aright in the future must not only visit it by the pale moonlight, but look at it in the lumen siccum of Prof. Veitch's carefully verified facts. And what is true of Melrose is true of every corner of the Border that is worth visiting. Nowhere is the fact of this new edition being really though not nominally a new book more remarkably illustrated than in the chapters which deal with the literary history of the Border. Thus, in one we have the original version of one of the two poems which bear the title of "The Flowers of the Forest," taken from Mrs. Cockburn's own MS., and in another we have the rationale—and something more—of the rather perplexing "Dowie Dens of Yarrow" and "Willie's Drowned in Yarrow." But in its new two-volume shape, Prof. Veitch's work deserves special notice and the heartiest commendation, because it is emphatically the manual or text-book of the Border, and breathes its spirit.

In Old-World Scotland Mr. Henderson has accomplished a difficult task with great skill and success. The task—to give glimpses of the modes and manners of that Scotland of the past to the skirts of which the Scotland of the present still clings—is difficult, not because it has not been done before, but because it has been overdone. Old-World Scotland suggests somehow the eternal Dean Ramsay, and haggis, and orgies at funerals, and ministers' "men." Fortunately, Mr. Henderson is a great deal of an artist, and nothing whatever of an imitator, as you discover before you have read half a dozen of his delightful pages. It may be doubted, indeed, if he has acted wisely in including in a volume of this kind—which certainly needs no padding—a purely historical paper like "New Light on the Darnley Murder." But the great majority of the articles, such as "The Staff of Life," "Scots Vivers," "Squalor," and "Kirk Discipline," are as pertinent to the subject as they are admirable in style. Readers of Mr. Henderson's book will no doubt recognise in it many old friends in the shape both of historical statements and of more or less mythical anecdotes. That was inevitable. But they will also admit that he is no mere disciple of Dean Ramsay. Mr. Henderson, like every Scotsman who is worth his salt, has his own opinions upon most things. Thus he declares fully and frankly that "Since the Union [between England and Scotland] the richer and stronger nation has gained in many ways by its partnership with its neighbour's enterprise and skill; but yet in the latter accompaniment between the two, the gods have so willed that the balance of benefit is immensely in Scotland's favour."

As a rule, however—as becomes a literary artist—he prefers to quietly insinuate his views, as when he says:

"The western capital [Glasgow] began to flourish to far better purpose by her West Indian connexion than she had ever done through the preaching of the Word, during the years when visionary covenanters 'bore the gree' as the ecclesiastical successors of St. Mungo."

From the literary, as distinguished from the purely personal points of view, Pleasant Memories of a Busy Life, by Dr. David Pryde, a once prominent and now retired Scottish educationist—surely his personal appearance is libelled by a gruesome portrait representing him very much in the character of a heavy tragedian—is of considerable interest and value. It tells a good deal about the Scotland, and more particularly about the St. Andrews and Edinburgh, of yesterday, and contains many racial sketches and personal anecdotes of the kind with which various collections have rendered Englishmen familiar. Some of the stories, although enjoyable, have a manufactured look. Here is an example:

"One poor Highlander, on his deathbed, is even said to have contemplated the possibility of finding whisky in the next world. To the minister who had been trying to give him some idea of heaven he said; 'But, sir, will there be any whiskey in heaven?' 'Oh no, Donald, there will be no occasion for that.' 'Casion or no 'casion,' said Donald, 'it wad be but dacent to have it on the table.'"

One can believe, however, the story of the eccentric lady of limited means who, by way of appearing to be profusely hospitable to visitors, "took hold of the bell-pull and cried out, with an earnestness apparently reckless, 'Now, just say what you want, my hand's on the bell—my hand's on the bell.'"

On the whole we like Dr. Pryde best, not when he is discoursing deliberately on such subjects as Scotch pawkiness, and even illustrating them with "good stories," as when he is telling his own experiences as a student and as a professional man naturally and easily. One of his best and most life-like sketches is that of a young literary friend of the name of Downes, whom he describes, not inaccurately, as "genius prematurely extinguished." Here is Dr. Pryde's style at his best:

"In fancy's eye I can see him, tall, thin, and placid, strolling leisurely along the road to Cramond, admiring the glimpses of the coast of Fife on the one hand, and the view of Corstorphine Hill and the Pentlands on the other, noticing with kindly eye the wayside characters, especially tramps and rustic children, and quoting at intervals from his favourite authors, Thackeray and Carlyle. I can see him, too, in the Royal Oak at Cramond, after we had dined on cold beef-steak pie, seated with his pipe in his mouth and his 'stoup o' liquor,' as he loved to call it in Shaksperian phrase, by his side, looking out upon the Firth, and placidly admiring the water, which trembled and gleamed like a living thing."

Dr. Pryde has produced a very interesting book, full both of anecdote and of character.

"Barrie or the Devil," will be the criticism passed upon The Stickit Minister by many a hasty reader. Such a criticism would be very unjust. It is quite possible that Mr. Crockett would not have written and published had not Mr. Barrie written and published before him. It is even possible that there would not have been so much about ministers but for the successes scored by the author of Auld Licht Idylls. Mr. Crockett is in no sense, however, an imitator of Mr. Barrie or of anyone else. He has a genuine turn for simple but graphic description, and a not inconsiderable fund of pathos; and both are seen to advantage in the sketches he here gives of country ministers, probationers, and street arabs. Although, to judge from internal evidence, both Mr. Crockett's heart and person are in the country, some of his best stories deal with the town. There is nothing in his book that in humour at all events approaches his account of the spiritual and other progress of that mischievous Edinburgh Gavroche, Cleg Kelly. Sometimes Mr. Crockett obviously strains after effect, as in "Accepted of the beasts," in which a young minister, suspended because of a fama against him, takes to singing ecstatically to cattle. But, as a rule, Mr. Crockett confines himself to the realising (and the idealising) of quite conceivable Scottish character; and when he does this he is invariably successful. He may be expected to do something far more ambitious than The Stickit Minister; as things are, he is an important accession to the ranks of Scottish artists in fiction.

WILLIAM WALLACE.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MESSRS. RIVINGTON, PERCIVAL & Co. are about to publish a History of Europe from 1789 to 1815, by Mr. H. Morse Stephens. Its main features are the absence of any disquisition on the causes of the French Revolution, the representation of Napoleon as the propagator of the ideas of the Revolution through Europe, and the omission of all military details, in order to give space for civil reforms and progress. Mr. Morse Stephens holds the period to be one of transition, and marks as its greatest results the recognition of the principle of nationality, the principle of the sovereignty of the people, and the principle of personal freedom, which involved the abolition of serfdom. The volume is illustrated with four maps of Europe—in 1789, in 1803, in 1810, and in 1815.

MESSRS. A. D. INNES & Co. have made arrangements for an English translation of England unter den Tudors, by Dr. Wilhelm Busch, of Dresden, the first volume of which they hope to publish early next year. The translator is the Rev. A. H. Johnson, of All Souls College, Oxford; and Mr. James Gairdner, of the Public Record Office, will probably contribute an introduction.

MESSRS. WILLIAMS & NORGATE intend to resume in November the issue of their "Theological Translation Library." The new series will be edited by Prof. Cheyne, of Oxford, and Prof. Bruce, of Glasgow, and will start with a translation of Weizsäcker's Apostolische Zeitalter—a book described in the language of a memorial signed by many distinguished English scholars as "thoroughly historical in spirit and critical in method, which will put students in a position to realise the best results of criticism of the New Testament in an historical form."

MESSRS. WARD & DOWNEY will publish shortly a Life of Count von Moltke, by Judge O'Connor Morris, with maps and plans illustrating the campaigns of 1866 and 1870.

MR. EDWARD ARNOLD is about to issue a volume by Mr. W. R. Le Fanu, late Commissioner of Public Works in Ireland, under the title of Irish Life and Character. Mr. Le Fanu is a famous raconteur, and all who have experienced the rare pleasure of listening to his Irish stories will look forward eagerly to his book. Mr. Le Fanu is a great nephew of Richard Brinsley Sheridan, and a brother of the late J. Sheridan Le Fanu, the novelist. Mr. Sheridan Le Fanu's best known poem, "Shamus O'Brien," which has been often attributed to Samuel Lover, was written for his brother, Mr. W. R. Le Fanu, to recite.

PROF. R. K. DOUGLAS, of the British Museum, is writing a book on the state of modern society in China, which Messrs. A. D. Innes & Co. hope to publish early next year.

MESSRS. BELL will publish immediately an enlarged edition of Mr. Egerton Castle's English Bookplates. There are to be about 70 new illustrations, including 13 copper plates, none of which appeared in the first edition. The Nicholas Bacon plate, in three colours, will form the frontispiece. In the same series will also be published very shortly a handbook of Printers' Marks, by Mr. W. Roberts, editor of the "Bookworm," &c. This volume, which will contain about 250 illustrations, has been written with a view to supplying a readable and accurate account of a neglected chapter in the history of bibliography and art.

MESSRS. METHUEN announce a companion volume to Lyra Heroica, consisting of pieces of English prose, containing a character-sketch or an incident, selected by Mr. W. E. Henley and Mr. Charles Whibley. The book will be finely printed and bound.

THE first monthly part of a new work, entitled Cassell's Gazetteer of Great Britain and Ireland, being a complete Topographical Dictionary of the United Kingdom, will be published next week. It will contain numerous illustrations and sixty maps in colours.

MR. GEORGE ALLEN announces, for publication in November, an edition of Hans Andersen's Stories and Fairy Tales, in two volumes, consisting of an entirely new translation by Dr. H. Oskar Sommer, the editor of the "Mort Darthur," with more than 100 illustrations by Mr. Arthur J. Gaskin.

THE next volume of the "Chiswick Press Editions," to be published on October 1, will be Sir Thomas Browne's Hydriotaphia, with introduction and notes by Sir John Evans.

MESSRS. REMINGTON & Co. have in the press Memoirs of the Mutiny, by Francis Cornwallis Maude, V.C., C.B., who commanded the artillery of Havelock's column, with which is incorporated the personal narrative of John Walter Sherer, C.S.I., formerly Magistrate of Futtehpore, and afterwards of Cawnpore.

THE same publishers also announce an Australian romance, entitled Out Back, by Captain Kenneth Mackay.

MR. ELLIOT STOCK announces for immediate publication Reminiscences of Seventy Years' Travel and Adventure: Military and Civil, Scientific and Literary, by an Officer of the Civil Service.

MESSRS. GAY AND BIRD will publish in a few days Paving the Way: A Romance of the Australian Bush, by Mr. Simpson Newland, an ex-treasurer of South Australia. The story is founded on events during the pioneer days which actually occurred within the knowledge of the writer.

MR. MACKENZIE BELL will publish immediately, through Messrs. Ward, Lock & Bowden, his new volume, entitled Spring's Immortality and Other Poems.

A MODERN story of evolution, by J. Compton Rickett, entitled, The Quickening of Caliban, will be published by Messrs. Cassell & Co. on September 28, and will be issued simultaneously in America. Mr. Max Pemberton's new story, The Iron Pirate, will also be published in a few days by the same publishers.

A NEW volume by Agnes Repplier, entitled Essays in Idleness, will shortly be published by Messrs. Gay and Bird. The same firm have nearly ready A Japanese Interior, by Miss Alice Bacon, author of "Japanese Girls and Women."

OWING to the preparation of a photogravure portrait, the publication of the Life of the Rev. R. Suffield has been delayed, but Messrs. Williams & Norgate hope to have it ready some time next week. The book will contain some interesting letters from Dr. Martineau.

THE Midland Educational Company have in the press, for immediate publication, "A Handbook for the Clergy," compiled by the editor of the "Worcester Diocesan Calendar."

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN will in future be the sole publisher of the works of Miss Frances Power Cobbe, and will issue a uniform edition of them in a new binding.

MESSRS. MATTHEW & BROOKE, of Bradford, have acquired the library of the late Arthur Briggs, of Rawdon Hall, near Leeds. The collection—which is a growth of two generations—is especially rich in illustrated and fine art books, galleries of engravings from the great masters, and standard historical works, while it also comprises Gould's Birds. The bindings include fine specimens of Bedford, Zachnsdorf, Riviere, &c.

THE FORTHCOMING MAGAZINES.

THE Asiatic Quarterly for October will have a second article by Lord Chelmsford, reasserting his view that India can best be defended on the line of the Indus; the Marquis of Lorne argues the case of the Imperial British East Africa Company; Sir Roper Lethbridge protests against the proposed cadastral survey of Behar; Mr. A. Michie advocates an alliance between India and China, as the natural counterpoise to the Asiatic projects of Russia and France; Dr. Leitner prints anthropological observations on twelve Dards and Kafirs once in his service; Mr. C. Johnston describes "The Red Rajputs"; and General J. G. K. Forlong writes upon "Pehlevi Texts and the Chronology of the Zend Avesta."

THE National Review for October will contain articles on "The House of Lords and The Home Rule Bill," by Lord Ashbourne; "Some Personal Aspects of the Session," by an M.P.; "Biography," by Mr. Leslie Stephen; and "The New French Chamber," by Mrs. Crawford. Mr. Alfred Austin will contribute the first of a series of papers, entitled "The Garden that I Love."

IN Harper's Magazine for October will be begun a series of illustrated papers, entitled "From the Black Sea to the Persian Gulf by Caravan." There will also be an account of "Undergraduate Life at Oxford," by Mr. Richard Harding Davis; and an article on "Witchcraft Superstition in Norfolk."

MR. KARL BLIND will have an article in the forthcoming number of the Scottish Review, on "The Meaning of the Russian Name," in which the researches and opinions of Dr. Vilhelm Thomsen, of Copenhagen, of Mr. Hyde Clarke, and of the late Dr. Paulus Cassel, of Berlin, are discussed. The Germanic origin of the word "Russian," as connected with the Scandinavian and Teutonic founders of the Russian empire, is upheld.

THE October number of Atalanta, which begins a new volume, will have for frontispiece a reproduction of Mr. Alma Tadema's celebrated picture, "The Frigidarium." There will also be an original drawing by Sir Noel Paton, of "Elaine"; and a series of illustrations by Messrs. C. S. Ricketts and Reginald Savage, accompanying an article on "The Houses of Tudor and Stuart in Prose and Verse." Among the other contents will be, "Sir Robert's Fortune," by Mrs. Oliphant; "A Costly Freak," by Maxwell Grey; a song, by Dr. C. Hubert H. Parry; and "The Realistic Novel," by Sarah Tytler.

THE first monthly part of the new volume of Chums, to be issued on September 28, will contain instalments of two serial stories, entitled "Twixt Earth and Ocean," by Mr. Standish O'Grady, and "Under the Shadow of Night," by Mr. D. H. Parry. There will also be interviews with Lord Charles Beresford, Capt. Boyton, Mr. George Manville Fenn, Mr. Herbert Ward, and Mr. W. H. Grenfell.

IN the next number of the Ludgate Monthly a new series of illustrated articles will begin, whose scope is described in their title, "The Man and the Town." "Lord Armstrong and Newcastle-upon-Tyne," by Mr. Frederick Dolman, is the subject of the first article.

MR. FRANK BARRETT's new serial story, "The Justification of Andrew Lebrun," will commence in this week's number of Cassell's Saturday Journal.

IN the issue of the Amateur Photographer for October 6 will appear the first instalment of a translation of Dr. J. M. Eder's "Handbuch der Photographie," dealing particularly with the theory and practice of gelatine emulsions.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

FOR A PICTURE OF WALTER SICKERT.
(Hôtel Royal, Dieppe.)

THE grey-green stretch of sandy grass,
Indefinitely desolate;
A sea of lead, a sky of slate;
Already Autumn in the air, alas!
One stark monotony of stone,
The long hotel, acutely white,
Against the after-sunset light
Withers grey-green, and takes the grass's tone.
Listless and endless it outlies,
And means to you and me no more Than any pebble on the shore:
But, ah! to see it as with Sickert's eyes!

ARTHUR SYMONS.

Dieppe: Sept. 16, 1893.

THE COMING PUBLISHING SEASON.

THE CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS
ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Theology.—"The Old Testament in Greek, according to the Septuagint," edited by Prof. H. B. Swete, Vol. III., completing the edition; "The Philocalia of Origen," the Greek text edited from the Manuscripts, with Critical Apparatus and Indexes, and an Introduction on the sources of the text, by J. Armitage Robinson; "Origen's Commentaries on St. John," freshly edited by A. E. Brooke; "The New Testament in the Original Greek," according to the text followed in the Authorized Version, together with the variations adopted in the Revised Version, edited by the late F. H. A. Scrivener, new and cheaper edition; "Adversaria Critica Sacra," by the late F. H. A. Scrivener, edited by J. Rendel Harris; "The Church Catechism Explained," by the Rev. Arthur W. Robinson. "Contributions to Biblical and Patristic Literature," edited by Prof. J. Armitage Robinson: Vol. II., No. 3, "Apocrypha Anecdota," containing the Latin version of the Apocalypse of Paul, the Apocalypses of the Virgin, of Sedrach, of Zosimas, &c., by M. R. James; Vol. III., No. 1, "The Rules of Tyconius," freshly edited from the MSS., with an examination of his witness to the old Latin version, by F. C. Burkitt; No. 2, "The Homeric Centones," by J. Rendel Harris. "The Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges": "The Epistles to the Colossians and Philemon," by the Rev. H. C. G. Moule; "The Epistles to Timothy and Titus," by the Rev. A. E. Humphreys; "The Cambridge Greek Testament for Schools and Colleges," "The Book of Revelation," by the late W. H. Simcox.

Law, Historical, and Miscellaneous.—"The History of English Law," by Sir Frederick Pollock and Frederick William Maitland, in 2 vols.; "Digest XLVII. 2., De Furtis," translated with notes, by C. H. Monro; "The Growth of British Policy," by Prof. J. R. Seeley; "A Discourse of the Common Weal of this Realm of England," first printed in 1581, and commonly attributed to W. S., edited from the MSS. by the late Elizabeth Lamond; "Statutes of Lincoln Cathedral," arranged by the late Henry Bradshaw, with illustrative documents, edited by Chr. Wordsworth, Part II. containing statutes earlier and later than those in the "Black Book" with the "Novum Registrum" and documents from other churches of the Old Foundation; "The Elements of English Grammar," by A. S. West; "The Old English Lay of Beowulf," edited with Critical and Philological Notes and Alphabetical Glossary by A. J. Wyatt; "Milton's Paradise Lost," Books III. and IV., edited, with Introduction, Notes, Indexes, by A. W. Verity; "Ancient Ships," by Cecil Torr, with numerous illustrations; "The Mummy: Chapters on Egyptian Funeral Archaeology," by E. A. Wallis Budge; "A Catalogue of the Egyptian Antiquities in the Fitzwilliam Museum," by E. A. Wallis Budge; "A Descriptive Catalogue of the Manuscripts in the Fitzwilliam Museum," illustrated with twenty plates of photographic reproductions, by Montague Rhodes James.

Oriental.—"Grammar of the Modern Egyptian Arabic," by Vollers, translated by F. C. Burkitt; "The New History (Tarikh-i-Jadid)," a circumstantial account of the Babi movement in Persia from its first beginnings till the death of the founder (A.D. 1844-1850), chiefly based on the contemporary history of Hiji Mirza Jani of Kāshān, and supplemented by original historical documents, plans, and facsimiles, by Edward G. Browne; "The Jitaka," translated from the Pali under the superintendence of Prof. E. B. Cowell, by Robert Chalmers, H. T. Francis, R. A. Neil, and W. H. D. Rouse, in six or seven volumes.

Classical.—"Sophocles," the plays and fragments, with Critical Notes, Commentary, and Translation in English prose, by Prof. R. C. Jebb, Part I., "Oedipus Tyrannus, third edition, Part VI., "Electra"; "Aristophanes—Equites," with Introduction and Notes by R. A. Neil; "Aristophanes—Vespæ," with Introduction and Notes by C. E. Graves; "The Cambridge Homer—Homer's Iliad," the text edited in accordance with modern criticism by Arthur Platt; "The Mimes of Herondas," the text edited with a Commentary by Walter Headlam; "Pindar—Olympian and Pythian Odes," with Notes Explanatory and Critical, Introductions and Introductory Essays, by C. A. M. Fennell, new edition; "Plato—Protagoras," with Introduction and Notes by J. Adam and A. M. Adam; "T. Macci Plauti Stichus," with Introduction and Notes by C. A. M. Fennell; "T. Macci Plauti Epidicus," from the text of G. Goetz, with an Introduction and Notes by J. H. Gray; "Cicero—Pro Milone," by J. S. Reid; "Tacitus—Agricola and Germania," by the Rev. H. M. Stephenson; "Euripides—Hecuba," by W. S. Hadley; "Latin and Greek Verse Composition," by the late Prof. T. S. Evans, with a memoir by Canon Waite; "Demosthenes against Androtion and against Timocrates," with Introductions and English Commentary by Prof. William Wayte.

Mathematical and Scientific.—"The Collected Mathematical Papers of Prof. Arthur Cayley," Vol. VI., with portrait, to be completed in 10 vols.; "The Scientific Papers of the late John Couch Adams," Vol. I., edited by Prof. William Grylls Adams, with a Memoir by J. W. L. Glaisher; "A Treatise on Spherical Astronomy," by Sir Robert S. Ball; "A History of the Theory of Elasticity and of the Strength of Materials," by the late I. Todhunter, edited and completed by Prof. Karl Pearson, Vol. II. Saint Venant to Lord Kelvin; "A Treatise on the Mathematical Theory of Elasticity," by A. E. H. Love, Vol. II. completing the work; "A Treatise on the Theory of Functions of a Complex Variable," by A. R. Forsyth; "Plane Trigonometry," by S. L. Loney; "Solutions of the Examples in a Treatise on the Elements Statics and Dynamics," by S. L. Loney; "Elementary Hydrostatics," by John Greaves; "The Steam Engine and other Heat Engines," by Prof. J. A. Ewing; "Elementary Palaeontology for Geological Students," by Henry Woods; "Practical Physiology of Plants," by F. Darwin and E. H. Acton; "Euclid's Elements of Geometry," Books V. and VI., by H. M. Taylor; "Solutions to the Exercises in Euclid," Books I. to IV., by W. W. Taylor.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Series.—"In the 'New Irish Library': 'The Bog of Stars,' and other stories of Elizabethan Ireland, by Mr. Standish O'Grady; in a newly-designed edition of the 'Adventure Series,' 'The Life and Adventures of James P. Beckwourth,' edited by Mr. Charles P. Leland, and 'The Memoirs and Travels of Mauritius Augustus Count de Benzowsky,' from the translation of his original MS. (1741-1771), by William Nicholson, edited by Captain Pasfield Oliver; in 'The Story of the Nations': 'The Australian Commonwealth,' by Mr. Greville Tregarthen; 'Spain (711-1492): from the Moorish Conquest to the Fall of Granada,' by Mr. H. E. Watts; 'South Africa,' by Mr. George M. Theal; and 'The Crusades: the Story of the Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem,' by Messrs. T. A. Archer and C. Kingsford; in the 'Pseudonym Library': 'God's Will, and other Stories,' by Ilse Frapan, translated by Mrs. Macdonnell; 'The Home of the Dragon,' a Tonguese idyll, by Anna Catharina; 'Mimi's Marriage,' a sketch, by V. Mikoulitch; and 'The Raising of Mrs. Potter, and other Stories,' by Jane Nelson; in the 'Independent Novel Series': 'Stories from Garshin,' translated by Mrs. Alice Voynich, with an introduction by Mr. Sergius Stepniak; 'Tiari,' a Tahitian romance, by Mrs. Dora Hort; 'Hugh Darville,' by Mrs. E. L. St. Germaine; in the 'Children's Library': 'The Pope's Mule, and other Stories,' by Alphonse Daudet, translated by Mrs. A. D. Beavington-Atkinson and Miss D. Havers, and illustrated by Miss Ethel K. Martyn; 'The Little Glass Man, and other Stories,' translated from Hauff by Miss Lina Eckenstein, illustrated by Mr. James Pryde.

Miscellaneous.—"Lord Tennyson and his Friends," a series of twenty-five portraits, with an essay by Mrs. Thackeray Ritchie, and an introduction by Mr. H. H. Hay Cameron; "Greek Vase Paintings," select examples, containing over forty full-page illustrations, with an introduction and notes by Miss Jane E. Harrison and Mr. D. S. MacColl; "American Illustrators," by Mr. F. Hopkinson Smith, illustrated with fifteen plates and a hundred sketches, and a cover designed by Mr. W. L. Metcalf; "A Book of Thoughts linked with Memories of John Bright," selected and edited by his daughter, Mrs. Mary B. Curry; "The Wit and Wisdom of the late James Runciman," with a memoir by Mr. Grant Allen, and an introduction by Mr. W. T. Stead; "The Rescue, and other Poems," by Mr. H. Bellyse Baildon; "The Autobiography of Theobald Wolfe Tone, a Chapter from Irish History, 1790-1798," edited by Mr. R. Barry O'Brien, with a preface by Mr. Augustine Birrell, with steel plates, &c.; "Annie Besant: an Autobiography," with twelve illustrations; "The Autobiography of Thomas Salvini," illustrated; "Recollections of the Countess Thérèse of Brunswick," by Fraulein Mariam Tenger, translated by the Hon. Mrs. Rollo Russell, with two portraits; "Bamford's Passages in the Life of a Radical," edited by Mr. Henry Duncley; "The Marquis d'Argenson," a study in criticism, being the Stanhope prize essay for 1893, by Mr. Arthur Ogle; "The Meeting House and the Manse: or the Story of the Independents of Sudbury," by Mr. William Walter Hodson; "Days Spent on a Doge's Farm," written and illustrated by Miss Margaret Symonds; "Handbook of English Cathedrals," by Mrs. Van Rensselaer, illustrated; "To Gypsyland," by Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Pennell, illustrated by the former; "The Heart and Songs of the Spanish Sierras," by the Rev. George Whit White; "The New Egypt," by the late Francis Adams; "An Embassy to Provence," by Mr. Thomas A. Janvier, illustrated; "Thumb-nail Sketches in Holland," by Mr. George Wharton Edwards; "The Queen at Balmoral," by Mr. Frank Pope Humphrey; "The Sunny Days of Youth," by the Rev. E. J. Hardy; "More about Names," by Mr. Leopold Wagner; "The Boy and the Angel: Discourses for Children," by the Rev. John Byles; "What One Woman Thinks," essays by Haryot Holt Cahon, edited by Miss Cynthia M. Westover.

Fiction.—"Milliara, an Australian Romance," by Mr. Noel Hope; "In a Cornish Township with Old Vogue Folk," by Mrs. Dolly Pentreath, illustrated by Mr. Percy B. Craft; "The Brownies at Home," written and illustrated by Mr. Palmer Cox; "The Bunny Stories for Young People," by Mr. John Howard Jewett, with seventy-eight illustrations; "Jeanie o' Biggersdale, and other Yorkshire Stories," by Mrs. Katharine Simpson, with a preface by Canon J. C. Atkinson; "The Tragedy of the Norse God," by Mrs. Ruth Pitt, illustrated by Messrs. G. P. Jacob Hood and J. A. J. Brindley; "The White Islander," by Mrs. Mary Hartwell Catherwood, illustrated by Mr. Francis Day; "Bright Celestials: The Chinaman at Home and Abroad," by John Coming Chinaman; "Sweet Bells out of Tune," by Mrs. Burton Harrison, illustrated by Mr. Gibson; "The Boy God," an ethical romance, by Mrs. E. Lynch, illustrated; "Topsys and Turveys," with coloured illustrations; "Out of It," by Miss A. F. Radcliffe; "My Poor Niece, and other Stories," by Miss Rosaline Masson; "The Last Day of the Carnival," a life sketch by Kostromitin, translated by Mr. J. Sosnin; "Amabel": a military romance, by Mrs. Cathal Macguire; "Markham Howard," by Mr. J. Heale; "Bianca," by Mrs. Bagot Harte; "The Romance of a Country," a masque, by Miss M. A. Curtois.

Theology.—"Perfect Freedom," by the late Bishop Phillips Brooks; and "The Hebrew Twins," by the late Dr. Samuel Cox, with a memorial introduction; also new editions of "The Two Spheres of Truth," "The Temple," with a preface by Mr. J. Henry Shorthouse, and "The Stickit Minister."

MESSRS. SWAN SONNENSCHNEIN & Co.'s ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Theology and Philosophy.—"History of the Christian Church in the Middle Ages," by the late Dr. Wilhelm Moeller, translated by Andrew Rutherford, being the second and concluding volume of Moeller's "Church History"; "Before the Throne": a Manual of Devotion, by the Rev. William Bellars, with a preface by Canon A. J. Mason, new edition; "In the King's Presence," being the Daily Prayers and Devotions for Holy Communion from "Before the Throne," by the Rev. William Bellars; "The Contemporary Pulpit," second series, Vols. IX. and X.; "The Skeptics of the French Renaissance," by John Owen, uniform with "The Skeptics of the Italian Renaissance," of which a second edition, revised, will also be published; in the "Library of Philosophy": "Riddles of the Sphinx," a Study in the Philosophy of Evolution, by F. C. S. Schiller, second edition; "Appearance and Reality," by F. H. Bradley; "The Principles of Psychology," by G. F. Stout; in the "Philosophy at Home" series: "Religion," by G. de Molinari, translated by Walter K. Firminger, with a preface by Canon Scott Holland; in the "Ethical Library": "The Civilisation of Christendom and other Studies," by Bernard Bosanquet; other volumes to follow by Prof. A. Sidgwick, Mr. Leslie Stephen, J. H. Muirhead, Mr. David G. Ritchie, Sophie Bryant, &c.

Science.—"A Student's Textbook on Botany," by Prof. Sidney H. Vines, illustrated; "Textbook of Embryology: Invertebrates," by Drs. Korschelt and Heider, of Berlin, translated and edited by Prof. E. L. Mark, and Dr. W. M. Woodworth, Part I., illustrated; "The Cell: its Anatomy and Physiology," by Dr. Oscar Hertwig, of Berlin, translated and edited by Dr. H. J. Campbell, illustrated; "Textbook of Palaeontology for Zoological Students," by Theodore T. Groom, of the Yorkshire College, Leeds, illustrated, forming a supplement to Claus and Sedgwick's "Textbook of Zoology"; "Lectures on Human and Animal Psychology," by Prof. Wilhelm Wundt, of Leipzig, translated and edited by James Edward Creighton and Edward Bradford Titchener; "Handbook of Systematic Botany," by Prof. E. Warming, of Stockholm, translated and edited by M. C. Potter, illustrated; "Town Flowers," by J. W. N., with a preface by Canon Benham and Prebendary Webb-Peploe; "Reveries of World History, from Earth's Nebulous Origin to its Final Ruin: or, The Romance of a Star," by T. Mullett Ellis. "Introductory Science Text-books": "Zoology," by B. Lindsay, illustrated; "The Amphioxus," by Dr. B. Hatschek, of Vienna, and James Tuckey, of the University of Durham, illustrated; "Geology," by Dr. Edward B. Aveling, illustrated. "Young Collector Series": "Fishes," by the Rev. H. A. Macpherson; "Flowering Plants," by James Britten; "Grasses," by W. Hutchinson; "Mammalia," by the Rev. H. A. Macpherson.

History, Geography, Travel, &c.—"History of South Africa: 1834-1848," by George McCall Theal, forming Vol. IV. of the Consolidated History, with seven maps; "Esquemeling's Buccaneers of America," a reprint of the edition of 1684, including the very scarce Fourth Part, with facsimile reproductions of all the portraits, plates, and maps, edited by Henry Powell; "Greek Constitutional Antiquities," by Dr. Gilbert, translated by E. Nicklin; "The Story of Louis XVII. of France," by E. E. Evans, with portraits; "The South Sea Islanders and the Queensland Labour Trade: a Record of Voyages and Experiences in the Western Pacific from 1875 to 1891," by William T. Wawn, Master Mariner, with illustrations and maps; "Adventures in Australia Fifty Years Ago, being a Record of an Emigrant's Wanderings through the Colonies of New South Wales, Victoria, and Queensland during the years 1839-1844," by James Demarr, illustrated.

Belles Lettres and Art.—"A History of English Caricaturists and Graphic Humorists of the Nineteenth Century," by Graham Everett, with illustrations by the Cruikshanks, Rowlandson, Gilray, Banbury, Lane, Crowquill, Bennett, Sandby, Thackeray, Doré, Seymour, Phiz, Leech, &c., new edition; "Prose Treatises of Richard Rolle of Hampole," edited by Dr. Carl Horstmann, forming the first volume of the "Old English Library"; "A Concordance to the Poetical Works of Milton," by John Bradshaw; "The Coinage of the European Continent," with an Introduction and Catalogues of Mints, Denominations and Rulers, by W. Carew Hazlitt, with 250 illustrations; "Dante's Divine Comedy" (The Inferno, Purgatorio, and Paradiso), a version in the nine-line metre of Spenser, by George Musgrave, Part I. The Inferno or Hell, also a large-paper edition; "The Best Books: a Classified Bibliography," first supplement, bringing the work down to the autumn of 1893, by William Swan Sonnenschein—future supplements will appear at intervals of about five years; "Randolph Lord de Vere and other Poems," by the Rev. James Brownes; "Dilettante Library": "William Blake, his Life, Character, and Genius," by Alfred T. Story, with a portrait, also a large-paper edition, containing four reproductions of Blake's drawings; "Richard Jefferies, a Study," by H. S. Salt, with a portrait, also a large-paper edition, containing four original drawings by Bertha Newcombe; "Leigh Hunt," by R. Brimley Johnson; "Oliver Wendell Holmes," by Walter Jerrold; "Selected Letters of Mendelssohn," edited by W. F. Alexander.

Social Economics and Politics.—"History of the English Landed Interest: its Customs, Laws, and Agriculture: Modern Period," by R. M. Garnier; "Socialism: its Growth and its Outcome," by William Morris and E. Belfort Bax; "Suicide and Insanity," by Dr. S. A. K. Strahan; "The Social Side of the Reformation," by E. Belfort Bax, Part I. German Society at the close of the Middle Ages. Part II. The Peasants' War. Part III. The Rise and Fall of the Anabaptists; "Justice for England" by a Plain Tory; "Pictures of the Socialistic Future," by Eugene Richter, translated by Henry Wright; "Social Science Series": "The Rights of Women," by M. Ostragorski, translated under the author's supervision; "The Hours and Wages of Labour in relation to Production," by L. von Brentano, translated by W. J. Arnold; "The Theory and Policy of Labour Protection," by Dr. A. Schäffle, translated by A. C. Morant; "Social Peace," by Prof. Schulze-Gaevernitz, translated by C. M. Wicksteed, and edited by Graham Wallas; "A History of the Rochdale Pioneers," by G. J. Holyoake, new edition; "England's Foreign Trade in the Nineteenth Century," by A. L. Bowley; "Catholic Socialism," by Dr. Nitti, translated by M. Killea, with a Preface by D. G. Ritchie; "The Dwellings of the Poor," by Locke Worthington, with plates and diagrams; "The Progress and Prospects of Political Economy," by Prof. J. K. Ingram; "The Elements of Socialism," by Prof. R. T. Ely, of Harvard; "University Extension," by Dr. M. E. Sadler; "Land Systems of Australasia," by William Epps; "Social Studies," by Prof. Mavor.

Educational.—"The Comedies of Plautus" (Amphitryon, Asinaria, Aulularia, Bacchides, Captivi), translated in the original metres by Edward H. Sugden, of Queen's College, Melbourne; "The Works of Q. Horatius Flaccus," translated by the Rev. J. C. Elgood, with glossary and explanations; "How Gertrude Teaches her Children," by J. H. Pestalozzi, edited by E. Cooke; "The Albany Phonetic Readers," by Laura Soames, Parts I., II., and III.; "The First Book of Fractions," by E. Aldred Williams; "A German Exercise Book," by A. Sonnenschein; "A Cyclopaedia of Military Science," by Captain C. N. Watts; "Parallel Grammar Series": "Third French Reader and Writer," by L. Barbé; "Third German Reader and Writer," by Dr. Georg Fiedler; "Greek Syntax," by Prof. E. A. Sonnenschein; "School Authors," a new series of Modern Texts, edited for school use: "Die Vierzehn Nothelfer," by Wilhelm Heinrich Riehl, edited by Russell E. Macnaghten; "Short Stories," by Robert Reinich, edited by James Colville; "Select Readings in French Prose and Verse," by V. Oger; "German Chronicles of War," by F. Lange; "The Public Schools Year Book (1893-94), edited by Three Public School Men (Eton, Harrow, Winchester), a record of all matters of interest to parents, teachers and boys, fifth year of issue.

Fiction.—"Twixt Shadow and Shine," by Marcus Clarke; "Worthington, Junior," by Edith Sichel, in 3 vols.; "The Hermit of Muckross," by Denys Wray; "The Heir of Inglesby," by Violetta; new editions: "The Wages of Sin," by Lucas Malet; "Jem Peterkin's Daughter," by W. B. Churchward; "Lady Hazelton's Confession," by Mrs. Kent Spender; "Young Mr. Ainalie's Courtship," by F. C. Phillips; "My First Grouse and other Memories," by T. E. Kebbel, author of "Rough Shooting."

Gift Books.—"The Natural History and Antiquities of Selborne," by Gilbert White, Bennett's edition with notes by J. E. Harting, illustrations by Bewick, Harvey, &c., new edition; "Women Travellers of the Nineteenth Century," by W. H. Davenport Adams, new edition, illustrated; "The New Arabian Nights," translated by W. F. Kirby, illustrated; "Fairy Tales," by W. Hauff, translated by Percy Pinkerton, illustrated; "Brave Boys who have become Illustrious Men," by J. M. Darton, illustrated.

MESSRS. HODDER AND STOUGHTON'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

"The Historical Geography of the Holy Land," by the Rev. Dr. G. Adam Smith; "Literary Recollections," by F. Espinasse; "Some Salient Points in the Science of the Earth," by Sir J. William Dawson; "The Brontës in Ireland, or Facts Stranger than Fiction," by Dr. William Wright; "Graeme and Cyril," a story by Barry Pain; "A Mackay Ruthquist, or Singing the Gospel among Hindus and Gonds," by the author of "A. M. Mackay, Pioneer Missionary"; "Diary and Letters of Andrew A. Bonar, D.D.," by his daughter, Marjory Bonar; "The Epistle of St. Peter," by Prof. J. Rawson Lumby; "Outlines of the History of Dogma," by Prof. Adolph Harnack; "The Seventh Series of the Expositor's Bible," edited by the Rev. Dr. W. Robertson Nicoll, consisting of the "Second Book of Kings," by Archdeacon Farrar; "The Epistle to the Romans," by Principal Handley Moule; "The First Book of Chronicles," by Prof. W. H. Bennett; "The Second Epistle to the Corinthians," by the Rev. James Denney; "The Book of Numbers," by Rev. R. A. Watson, and the "Psalms," Volume III., by the Rev. Dr. Alexander Maclaren; "The Ascent of Faith, or the Grounds of Certainty in Science and Religion," by the Rev. A. J. Harrison; "The Holy Spirit in Missions," by the Rev. Dr. A. J. Gordon; "The Key of the Grave," by the Rev. Dr. W. Robertson Nicoll; "Sir Robert N. Fowler, Bart., M.P.," a memoir by John Stephen Flynn; "Scotland Yesterday," by William Wallace; "Michael Lamont, Schoolmaster," by Mrs. Patrick Findlay; "Saintly Lives, from St. Augustine to Yesterday," by the Rev. Dr. J. Elder Cumming; a new edition, enlarged, of Miss Jane Barlow's "Bogland Studies," uniform with "Irish Idylls"; "Hints and Helps for Young Men," and "Hints and Helps for Young Women," by Mr. M. Thayer; "Famous Voyagers and Explorers," by Sarah K. Bolton;

"In the Fifteen: a Tale of the First Jacobite Rebellion," by the Rev. H. C. Adams, with illustrations by Finnemore; "Just like Jack: a Story of the Brine and Breeze," by Dr. Gordon Stables, with illustrations by Finnemore; "Lux Diurna: a Book of Texts, Readings, &c.," printed in red and black; the Rev. Dr. Pentecost's "Bible Studies on the International Sunday School Lessons for 1894;" "The People's Dictionary of the Bible," edited by the Rev. Dr. M. Rice; the eighth volume of the Expositor, fourth series, edited by the Rev. Dr. W. Robertson Nicoll; "The Theology of the Old Testament," by Prof. W. H. Bennett; "The Theology of the New Testament," by Prof. Adeney; "Christianity and Evolution," by Prof. Iverach; a pocket edition of the "Newberry Bible," in various bindings; "Luther's Early Works and Catechism," edited by Principal Wace and Prof. C. A. Buchheim; "Religion in History and in the Life of to-day," by Principal Fairbairn, new and enlarged edition; "Christianity in the Home," by the Rev. Dr. Theodore Cuyler; "The Ordeal of Philip and Gerald: or Left to Themselves," by Edward Ireneus Stevenson, being a new volume of the Boys' Select Library; "The Gospel of St. Mark," by the Rev. Dr. Alexander MacLaren.

MESSRS. ELKIN MATHEWS AND JOHN LANE'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Mr. Grant Allen's volume of verse, "The Lower Slope"; Mr. Norman Gale's "Orchard Songs"; Mr. John Davidson's "Random Itinerary," and a new collected edition of his "Plays"; Mr. Le Gallienne's "Religion of a Literary Man"; Mrs. Hinkson's (Katherine Tynan) "Cuckoo Songs"; a volume of "Poems" by Dr. Garnett; Mr. Oscar Wilde's new poem "The Sphinx," with illustrations by Mr. Charles Ricketts, and the same author's Plays in four volumes: "Lady Windermere's Fan," "A Woman of no Importance," "The Duchess of Padua," and "Salomé" (done into English) the last being illustrated by Mr. Aubrey Beardsley, and in addition Mr. Wilde's "Incomparable and Ingenious History of Mr. W. H., being the true Secret of Shakespear's Sonnets"; a volume of Selections from the Works of Dr. Gordon Hake, edited by Mrs. Meynell; Mr. Arthur Christopher Benson's "Poems"; Mr. Frederick Wedmore's "Pastorals of France—Renunciations"; Mr. George Egerton's "Keynotes" (short stories); the "Poems" of Mr. Francis Thompson, a new writer; Mr. G. A. Greene's "Italian Lyrista of To-day"; "The letters of Thomas Lovell Beddoes," edited by Mr. Edmund Gosse; Mrs. Graham R. Tomson's "After Sunset," a volume of verse; "Romantic Professions," collected papers, by Mr. W. P. James; Mr. Kenneth Grahame's "Pagan Papers"; a second series of "The Book of the Rhymers' Club; Mr. Selwyn Image's "Carols and Poems"; Mr. Arthur Galton's "Essays on Matthew Arnold"; Mr. Lionel Johnson's "Art of Thomas Hardy," with a bibliography by Mr. John Lane; the late Mrs. Frances Wynne's verses "Whisper," with a memoir by Katherine Tynan, and a portrait; a cheap edition of Mr. J. T. Nettlehip's "Robert Browning, Essays and Thoughts"; and the serial issue of the "Hobby Horse," and of "Oxford Characters," a series of lithographed portraits of Oxford notabilities by Mr. Will Rothenstein, with text by Mr. York Powell and others.

MESSRS. HUTCHINSON & CO.'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

A new novel by the author of "I Forbid the Banns, entitled, "A Gray Eye or So," in 3 vols., and a new edition of the same author's "Daureen"; A tale of the Black Country, by Annie S. Swan (Mrs. Burnett Smith) entitled, "A Bitter Debt," with illustrations by D. Murray Smith; "Pictures from Greek Life and Story" by Prof. A. J. Church, illustrated; an improved edition of Olive Schreiner's "Story of an African Farm"; a new book of adventure by Hume Nisbet, entitled "Valdmer the Viking," with illustrations by the author and M. Nisbet; a new novel by Mrs. J. Kent Spender, "A Strange Temptation," in 3 vols.; "Seven Christmas Eves: Being the Romance of a Social Evolution," by Clo. Graves, B. L. Farjeon, Florence Marryat, G. Manville Fenn, Mrs. Campbell Praed, Justin Huntly McCarthy and Clement Scott, with illustrations by Dudley Hardy; a new story of Cornish life by Amelia E. Barr, entitled "A Singer from the Sea"; "A Romance of Lincoln's Inn," by Sarah Doudney, in 2 vols.; "Women of the Valois Court," by Imbert de Saint-Amand, translated by Elizabeth Gilbert Martin, with portraits, being a new volume of "The Famous Women of the French Court"; a story of adventure by sea and land, by J. Bloundelle Burton, entitled, "The Desert Ship," with illustrations by Hume Nisbet and Walter Buckley; "A Bubble Fortune," by Sarah Tytler; "Courtship and Marriage," by Annie S. Swan; "Namesakes," and "Golden Gwendolyn," by Evelyn Everett Green, both with illustrations; "The Boy Patriot: or From Poverty to the Presidency," being the story of the life of General Andrew Jackson, by Oliver Dyer, with illustrations by H. M. Eaton; "Through Pain to Peace," by Sarah Doudney, and "The Impress of a Gentlewoman," by Fanny E. Newberry, both with illustrations; three new illustrated volumes of the "Fifty-two Library": "Fifty-two Stories for Boyhood and Youth," by G. A. Henty and others, "Fifty-two Stories for Girlhood and Youth," by Mrs. G. Linnaeus Banks and others, and "Fifty-two Stories for Children"; the following volumes in the "Boys' Golden Library": "The Cruise of the Crystal Boat," by Dr. Gordon Stables; "Pictures from Roman Life and Story," by Prof. A. J. Church; "Our Clerk from Barkton," "Making the Best of It," "Fighting the Sea," and "Up North in a Whaler," all by Edward A. Rand; "The Warriors of the Crescent," by the late W. H. Davenport Adams; and "The Little Marine," by Florence Marryat; the following volumes in "The Girls' Golden Library": "Where Two Ways Meet," by Sarah Doudney; "No Humdrum Life for Me," by Mrs. J. Kent Spender; "The Family Difficulty," by Sarah Doudney; "Winnie Travers," and "Self and Self Sacrifice," both by Anna E. Lisle; "The Maid of Orleans," by the late W. H. Davenport Adams; "Among the Welsh Hills," by M. C. Halifax; "A Child of the Precinct," by Sarah Doudney; "The Clever Miss Janey," by Margaret Haycraft; and "Miss Pringle's Pearls," by Mrs. G. Linnaeus Banks.

MESSRS. WILLIAMS & NORGATE'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

General.—A Memoir of the late Prof. Croom Robertson, by his Brother; also, "Man an Organic Community": being an Exposition of the Law that the Human Personality in all its phases in Evolution, both Co-ordinate and Discordant, is the Multiple of many Sub-personalities, in 2 vols., by John H. King.

Theological.—Library of Translations of Foreign Theological Works: "The History of Dogma," by Prof. Adolf Harnack, of Berlin, with a preface by the author specially written for this edition; "The Time of the Apostles," by Prof. Hausath, of Heidelberg, being a continuation of his "Times of Jesus," with a preface by Mrs. Humphry Ward; "A History of the Hebrews to the Time of Jeremiah," by Prof. R. Kittel, of Breslau.

Classical.—A companion volume to Mahaffy's "Flinders Petrie Papyri," containing further facsimiles and transcriptions; "The Hippolytus of Euripides," now first translated into English, in its original and identical metre, with stage directions suggesting how it may have been performed, with preface and notes by H. B. L.

Oriental.—"Oriental Grammar Series": "A Grammar of the Ancient Egyptian or Hieroglyphic Language," by Prof. Adolf Ermann, of Berlin, translated by Prof. J. H. Breasted, of Chicago; a new edition (the fourth) of Williams's "Dictionary of the New Zealand Language," with additions, corrections, and English-Maori vocabulary, by Arohdeacon Williams; "A Moslem Present," an Anthology of Arabic Poems about the Prophet and the Faith of Islam, Part I, containing the famous poem of Al-Busari, known as "The Poem of the Scarf," with an English version and notes by Shaikh Farzullah-Bhai, of Bombay.

Science.—A translation of Goldschneider's "Diagnostik der Nervenkrankheiten," by Dr. E. Birt; "Proceedings of the Edinburgh Mathematical Society," Vol. XI.; "A Pocket Flora of the Edinburgh District," by C. O. Sonntag, with an analytical key to orders and genera.

Educational.—"A Manual of German Literature and History," by Prof. O. Schapp, of Edinburgh, uniform with Roget's "Manual of French Literature"; "Army Series of French and German Novels": "Erzählungen," by E. Hofer, with introduction and notes by J. T. W. Perowne; a re-issue of French Classics in paper covers; a German Prose Book on a new system by Anton J. Ulrich, and J. Gibson; "The Elements of German," by T. H. Weisse, and a Manual of Modern German Correspondence.

MESSRS. A. D. INNES & CO.'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

"Half a Hero," by Anthony Hope, in 2 vols.; "Such a Lord is Love," by Mrs. Stephen Batson, in 2 vols.; "Seers and Singers: a Study of Five English Poets," by Arthur D. Innes; "Ladies at Work: being Articles by Experienced Workers upon the Employment of Educated Women," with an Introduction by Lady Jeune; "Songs of a Strolling Player," by Robert G. Legge; "The Gentle Heritage," by Frances E. Crompton, with illustrations by T. Pym; in the "Tipcat" Series: "Dear," and "Lil," by the author of "Tipcat"; "A Ring of Rubies," by L. T. Meade; "Three Little Maids," by Mary Bathurst Deane; "Dominie Freylinghausen," by Florence Wilford; "Madge Allerton," by Annie Cazenove; "The Face of Carlyon," by C. R. Coleridge; "Aids to Devotion," a Series of Devotional Books by the Rev. E. B. Pusey, Canons Jelf and Ashwell, and other well-known writers; a series of works of the same class but smaller in size.

New Volumes of the Dainty Books.—"Lily and Waterlily," by Mrs. Comyns Carr, with illustrations by Winifred Smith; "A Mannerless Monkey," by Mabel Wotton, with illustrations by Edith Ellison; "A Hit and a Miss," by the Hon. Eva Knatchbull-Hugessen, with illustrations by L. Leslie Brooke.

New Editions.—"The Voice of a Flower," by E. Gerard; "Beside the River," "A Faithful Lover," and "Too Soon," by Katherine S. Macquoid; "Punchinello's Romance," by Roma White; "Virginia's Husband," by Esmé Stuart; Miss Charlotte M. Yonge's "Biographies of Good Women," First and Second Series, and "Beginnings of Church History."

MESSRS. W. & R. CHAMBERS'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

"Blanche," a story for girls, by Mrs. Molesworth; "Real Gold," a story of adventure, by G. Marville Fenn; "Pomona," by the author of "Laddie"; "Prisoner among Pirates," by David Ker; "In the Land of the Golden Plum," by D. Lawson Johnstone; "The Last Trader," by Henry Frith; "Black, White, and Gray," by Amy Walton; "Out of Reach," by Esme Stuart; "The Remarkable Adventures of Walter Trelawney," by J. S. Fletcher; and a new edition of "Begumbagh," by G. Manville Fenn.

Biographies.—"Story of the Life of Sir Walter Scott," by Robert Chambers, revised, with additions, including the "Autobiography"; "The Story of Napoleon Bonaparte"; and "The Story of Howard and Oberlin."

Educational.—"Electricity and Magnetism," by Prof. Cargill G. Knott; "Organic Chemistry," by Prof. Perkin; "Elementary Science," by S. R. Todd; "Domestic Economy," by Mrs. Rigg; "Navigation," by J. Don; "Elocution," a book of readings and recitations, edited by R. C. H. Morison; and a new series of Copy Books, Government Hand.

MESSRS. GRIFFITH, FARRAN & Co.'s ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Books for the Young.—"Ten Tales without a Title," by Edith Carrington, illustrated with ten coloured and 100 black-and-white pictures by W. Weekes; "Some Sweet Stories of Old Boys of Bible Story," third series, by the Rev. C. J. Ridgeway, with eight coloured illustrations by Henry Rylands and black-and-white pictures by John Lawson; "Over the Sea Series," attractive story books for children, containing original stories by various authors, each illustrated with three coloured pictures and several black-and-white; "The Old Corner Annual," pictures, stories, and poems for the year, edited by Uncle Charlie; "Uncle Charlie's Nursery Song Book," profusely illustrated; "The Newbery Toy Books," a new series of crown quarto toy books, each containing 32 pages of reading and pictures, every page illustrated, with frontispiece and coloured cover printed in twelve colours; "A Little Loyal Red Coat," a story of child life in New York a hundred years ago, by Ruth Ogden, with over sixty illustrations by H. A. Ogden; "Esther's Shrine," by Helen Milman, illustrated; "Dorothy Darling," by Mrs. George Paull, illustrated; "Bluejackets: or the Log of the Clipper Teaser as kept by a Boy," by George Manville Fenn; "The Flying Horse," by Henry Frith, illustrated; "Workers without Wage," by Edith Carrington; "True Stories from Australasian History," by A. Patchett Martin.

SELECTED FOREIGN BOOKS.

GENERAL LITERATURE.

COLLEZIONE DI OPUSCOLI danteschi inediti o rari, diretta da G. L. Passerini. Nr. 1. Milan: Hoepli. 80 c.
DANIEL, Capitaine. La Guerre en Ballon. Paris: Flammarion. 7 fr.
GYP. Madame la Duchesse. Paris: Calmann Lévy. 3 fr. 50 c.
MIDDELDOERF, E. W. Paris: Oppenheim. 16 M.
MÜNCHEN, R. Geschichte der Malerei im 19. Jahrh. 2. Bd. München: Hirsh. 14 M.
TOLEST, Comte Léon. Le Salut est en vous. Paris: Didier. 8 fr. 60 c.

THEOLOGY, ETC.

ANALECTA hymnica mediæ ævi. Hrsg. v. G. M. Dreves. XV. Leipzig: Reissland. 8 M.
BRODIE, A. Zoroaster. Ein Beitrag zur vergleich. Geschichte der Religionen u. philosoph. Systeme des Morgen- u. Abendlandes. Leipzig: Friedrich. 8 M.
ROCHELLE, S. Les Cochins. Paris: Lib. de l'Art. 7 fr.

HISTORY, ETC.

CORTI, Cosimo. La prima reggia di Cosimo I. de Medici nel palazzo già della Signoria di Firenze, descritta ed illustrata. Milan: Hoepli. 12 fr.

CORPUS inscriptionum latinarum. Vol. I. pars 1. Ed. II. 52 M. Vol. III. Supplementum. Fasc. III. 32 M. Berlin: Reimer.
KAINDL, R. F. Beiträge zur älteren ungarischen Geschichte. Wien: Perles. 2 M. 40 Pf.
KIRCHHOFF, R. Zur Entstehung des Kurecollegiums. Halle: Kammmerer. 8 M. 60 Pf.
LAWINSKI, L. Die brandenburgische Kanzlei u. das Urkundenwesen während der Regierung der beiden ersten hochzeigerischen Markgrafen. (1411-1470.) Straßburg: Heitz. 4 M.
MAYER, E. Untersuchungen über die Schlacht im Teutoburger Walde. Berlin: Gaertner. 6 M.

PHYSICAL SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

ERGEBNISSE der Plankton-Expedition. G. b. 2. Bd. Decapoden u. Schizopoden. Von A. Ortmann. Kiel: Lipsius. 14 M.
HOFFMANN, P. Bewulf. Ältestes deutsches Heldenlied. Aus dem Angelsächsischen übertr. Züllichau: Liebisch. 8 M.
KNUTH, P. Blumen u. Insekten auf den nordfriesischen Inseln. Kiel: Lipsius. 4 M.
WESTPHAL, M. Lotze's Gottesbegriff u. dessen metaphysische Begründung. Halle: Kammmerer. 1 M. 50 Pf.

PHILOLOGY.

HULTSCH, F. Die erzählenden Zeitformen bei Polybios. 3. Abhandl. Leipzig: Hirzel. 8 M. 60 Pf.
MARQUET, H. Lexikon zu den Schriften Cicero's. 2. Th. Lexikon zu den philosoph. Schriften. 14. Hft. Jena: Fischer. 8 M.
WINCKLER, H. Sammlung v. Keilschriftentexten. II. Texte verschiedener Inhalts. Leipzig: Pfeiffer. 6 M.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE QUARTERLY REVIEWER'S KNOWLEDGE OF OLD FRENCH.

Oxford: Sept. 17, 1893.

I think I have said enough about the first and second sections of my previous letter and I will leave your readers to draw their own conclusions. I must, however, add a few words with reference to section three, and my translation of the word pel in l. 8499 of the Roman de Rose: "Il ne doterent pel ne fosse."

I only quote this line twice in my whole paper. I will copy out both passages. Your readers may form their own conclusion as to whether I regard the word as referring to a "stake" in the sense of a palisade, or to a "stake" in the sense of a pointed stick used as a weapon. First, on pp. 342-3 I wrote:

(a) "Wace does indeed use the word paliz [for a palisade] occasionally, but after a careful examination of the whole Roman de Rose, I have only found the word twice.* . . . His more favourite word is pel, a word cognate, it is true, but perfectly distinct from paliz."

To this paragraph I append in a footnote four instances of this use of pel for "palisade," in each case italicising the word so that there shall be no mistake as to my point. Of these four examples the very first is the line in question: "Il ne doterent pel ne fosse." Here then I clearly mark out that pel is equivalent to paliz or "palisade."

(b) On pp. 345-6 I set myself to give examples (with exact references) to prove my contention that in his account of Hastings—apart from the crucial passage—Wace does distinctly allude to a palisade. Here are my words:

"Wace does mention a palisade in three or four distinct places under the name of lices, on one occasion practically using the very word paliz [a word which, according to the Quarterly Reviewer, is Wace's specific word for palisade]."

I then proceed to give three instances of Wace's use of lices for palisade, and one instance where Wace "practically uses the very word paliz." This last instance is, I need hardly say, the line in question: "Il ne doterent pel ne fosse." Thus I once more mark that pel

* I have mislaid my original notes on Wace's use of paliz in the Roman de Rose; probably, if I could lay hands on them, I should find that I ought to have written "three times" instead of "twice."

in this line is the equivalent of paliz—i.e., of "palisade."

I hope that this is evidence sufficient to show that I have never wavered in my translation of this line. Neither when I wrote my paper, nor from the day I printed it till now, have I ever thought that pel in this context meant anything else than a palisade. I have never intended even to imply that it meant a pointed stick used as a weapon.

2. Now comes the question as to whether the Quarterly Reviewer supported my rendering of pel in the sense of a palisade, or advocated rendering it by "stake" in the sense of a pointed stick used as a weapon. After dealing with my instances of lices and trying to explain them away, he naturally proceeded to take up my instance of pel in the line, "Il ne doterent pel ne fosse." And this is what he says with reference to this very line:

"As to the solitary allusion to pel that Mr. Archer quotes from Wace's account of the battle (l. 8499), he himself renders the word not 'palisade' but 'stake' (p. 345), which, we may add, is by far its most usual meaning in the Roman. Indeed, the 'granz pels' (l. 7,727) which the rustics fought with in the battle are rightly rendered by Mr. Freeman 'sharp stakes'."

I ask if these words have any meaning at all, unless they are intended to suggest that in line 8499 the word pel means, not "stake" in the sense of a palisadestake (pel = paliz) as I rendered it, but "stake" in the sense of a pointed stick used as a weapon.

I think it will be perfectly clear to everyone that I advocated the rendering of "Il ne doterent pel ne fosse" by "They dreaded neither stake [i.e., palisade] nor fosse." I think it will be equally clear that the Quarterly Reviewer sets up against this another rendering of "They dreaded neither stake [i.e., pointed stick used as a weapon] nor fosse." And this is the rendering I attributed to him in my letter of August 16.

T. A. ARCHER.

In the letter of the "Quarterly Reviewer," printed in the ACADEMY of last week, for "encombres" read "encombros"; for "econtrastar" read "e contrastar."

PATRICK AND PALLADIUS.

London: Sept. 16, 1894.

Prof. Zimmer's explanation of Nennius' Patrick date may be found on pp. 206-7 of his his work; his views concerning Patrick generally on pp. 148-9.

It is a little unfortunate that the "his" in the third line of Mr. Olden's letter applies grammatically to myself, instead of, as Mr. Olden intended, to Prof. Zimmer. The Patrick problem is one to which I have not given personal study, and I am not qualified to hold any view about it.

ALFRED NUTT.

APPOINTMENTS FOR NEXT WEEK.

WEDNESDAY, Sept. 27, 8.30 p.m. Japan Society: "Volcanic and Earthquake Phenomena of Japan," by Prof. Jola Milne; Exhibition of Photographic Slides.

* It was on this occasion that I translated the line by "They dreaded neither stake nor ditch." When using the word "stake" here, I need hardly say that I had not the faintest idea of a pointed stick used as a weapon. My interpretation of the word is made perfectly clear from my express reference to this line on pp. 342-3, and from the context on p. 345. It was of the essence of my argument in both cases that pel stood for paliz—i.e., for "palisade." My only object in using the word "stake" was to show how pel, which, of course, originally meant a "stake," gets its secondary meaning of "palisade"; and to justify my previous statement that it was "practically the very same word as paliz." "Palisade," paliz, pal, and pel are of course all derived, directly or indirectly, from the Latin palus, a stake.

SCIENCE.

SOME BOOKS ON GEOMETRY.

Introductory Modern Geometry of Point, Ray, and Circle. By W. B. Smith. (Macmillans.) It is somewhat difficult to believe that Dr. Smith intends his book for absolute beginners in geometry, but such a conclusion would seem to be warranted by his preface. If such be the case, there need be no hesitation in saying that this manual is eminently unsuitable for its purpose. It begins, for example, with a discussion of space; and the learner is informed that space is (1) fixed, permanent, unchangeable, (2) homoeoidal, (3) boundless, (4) continuous, (5) triply extended. These statements, it is true, are explained, but it is difficult to see how a mere tyro without any geometrical experience whatever can understand the explanation. Probably the best thing the tyro can do is to omit the greater part of the Introduction (pp. 1-22) and begin at once with the theorems. Dr. Smith divides his book into two main sections, the first dealing with lineal, and the second with areal relations. The first section, which contains 79 theorems and 18 problems, covers part of the ground of Euclid's first, third, and fourth books, with sundry useful additions, notably a chapter on symmetry. The second section, which contains between 80 and 90 theorems, and rather more than 30 problems, covers part of Euclid's first and third books, and his second and sixth. It discusses also the leading properties connected with radical axis, harmonic division, transversals, centres of similitude, inversion, and closes with a solution of the last of Apollonius's taction problems. Then follow chapters on metric geometry, measurement of the circle and of angles, the Euclidian doctrine of proportion, maxima and minima. A concluding note of six pages is devoted to an account of the speculations on non-Euclidian space. While Dr. Smith thus gives all the principal theorems and problems which should be found in an elementary geometry, and arranges them satisfactorily, he has taken so many liberties with the terminology of the subject that a vigorous protest must be raised. Why should any indefinite straight line be called a ray, and a part of it a tract or sect? Not much objection can be taken to naming angles as supplemental or complementary instead of the usual supplementary and complementary; but what good purpose is served by calling a certain line a medial when everybody else calls it a median, and talking of median section when the more common phrase is medial section? What necessity is there for changing the point of contact into the point of tangence or point of touch, for calling a particular circle the referee, or for suggesting alticentre instead of orthocentre? Some of the non-geometrical information which Dr. Smith inserts is, if not inaccurate, at least questionable. I do not know of any ancient authority for the statement of how Pythagoras discovered his famous theorem, and Euclid's formula at the end of a problem was not $\delta\epsilon\iota\kappa\epsilon\iota\ \epsilon\pi\alpha\lambda\lambda\alpha\ \delta\epsilon\iota\ \kappa\alpha\iota\ \eta\mu\iota\varsigma\ \alpha\iota\tau\eta\mu\epsilon\iota$. It is hardly fair to call the nine-point circle the circle of Feuerbach, seeing that the characteristic property of it was explicitly stated by Poncelet a year before Feuerbach's booklet appeared, and implicitly fifteen years previously by John Whitley. The remark that the problem to describe a circle to touch three other circles was proposed and solved by Apollonius of Pergæ, A.D. 200, contains two slips, and the enunciation of Hippocrates's theorem regarding the lunules is incorrect.

An Elementary Treatise on Modern Pure Geometry. By R. Lachlan. (Macmillans.) Mr. Lachlan states that the study of pure geometry has hitherto been neglected in Cambridge, chiefly because questions bearing on the subject have very rarely been set in examination papers. This practice, however, is to be altered by new regulations for the Tripos examination, and hence the present treatise. After a brief introduction, where attention is drawn to the principles of duality and continuity, the second and third chapters show how geometrical magnitudes are to be measured, and give various fundamental metrical properties. The fourth and fifth chapters treat of harmonic ranges and pencils, and the theory of involution. The sixth chapter, which is one of the longest in the book, is on the properties of triangles, and contains a good deal of information regarding the recent discoveries which have been made in connexion with this simple figure. The seventh chapter deals with rectilinear figures, principally the tetrastigm and the tetragram, terms which Mr. Lachlan employs, as Townsend does, instead of 4-point and 4-side. The eighth and ninth chapters give the theory of perspective and of similar figures; and the next five are devoted to theories and properties connected with circles, such as reciprocation, radical axis, and inversion. The fifteenth chapter, on systems of circles, is extremely interesting (as indeed the whole book is) and contains much that is new, or at any rate that has never hitherto made its appearance in a text-book. The sixteenth and last chapter gives an account of cross or anharmonic ratio. There are a good many text-books on modern pure geometry in English, French, German, and Italian; and while Mr. Lachlan's treatise has necessarily much in common with them, there is a distinct individuality about it. The arrangement of the contents is excellent, the proofs are simple, clear and concise, and (a merit which is unfortunately rare) the figures are beautiful. The collection of exercises appended to all the principal theorems is fairly extensive and exceedingly well selected. The greater number, we are told, have been taken from examination papers set at Cambridge and Dublin, or from the Educational Times; and Mr. Lachlan gives a number of references to the sources whence he has borrowed them. But when these sources are not the original ones, it does not seem worth while to give them. Thus, at p. 71, we learn that a particular theorem in connexion with the Simson (or, as it ought to be called, the Wallace) line was proposed for proof at Trinity College in 1889. It is of more interest to know that the theorem is due to Mr. Tucker, and dates back to 1865. On p. 78 it is stated that Taylor's circle was first mentioned in a paper by Mr. H. M. Taylor in the Proceedings of the London Mathematical Society. It is a fact not very well known that the characteristic property of this circle was stated and proved in Vuibert's Journal de Mathématiques élémentaires in November, 1877. The signature under which it appears is Eutaris, a name (as my friend M. D'Ocagne informs me) assumed anagrammatically by M. Restiau, at that time a répétiteur in the Collège Chaptal, Paris. It is convenient to be able to refer to an important theorem or property in a word or two, and hence the name of the author of it is frequently made use of. It might be suggested that Mr. Lachlan in his next edition should attach the names of Menelaus, Ceva, and Desargues to their respective theorems, and in connexion with the Lemoine circle should give some reference to M. Lemoine's valuable contributions to the geometry of the triangle.

An Elementary Treatise on Pure Geometry. By J. W. Russell. (Oxford: Clarendon Press.) While Mr. Lachlan has confined himself to the properties of the straight line and the circle, Mr. Russell's treatise is more general and deals with conics. It would occupy too much space to state the contents of the thirty-one chapters into which the book is divided, but the following summary may be quoted from the preface: "The author has attempted to bring together all the well-known theorems and examples connected with harmonics, anharmonics, involution, projection (including homology), and reciprocation. In order to avoid the difficulty of framing a general geometrical theory of imaginary points and lines, the principle of continuity is appealed to. The properties of circular points and circular lines are then discussed, and applied to the theory of the foci of conics." The order in which the various subjects are taken up seems at first sight somewhat arbitrary. Perhaps Mr. Russell tacitly acknowledges this when he gives in a demonstration, as he does now and then, a reference forward instead of backward. Still, it ought to be remembered that, without detriment to the clearness of the exposition, considerable variety of arrangement is possible in a work on pure geometry. Anyone who wishes to verify this statement, needs only to compare the writings of Poncelet, Steiner, Chasles, Townsend, Reye, Cremona. Mr. Russell's exposition is concise without being obscure, and at the end of most of the articles he inserts sets of examples for solution. This collection of examples is one of the largest and most valuable that has ever appeared. As regards the notation and the terminology, few novelties or changes are introduced. One innovation deserves to be signalled: it is the substitution of the single word "for" instead of the phrases "with respect to" and "with regard to" which occur so frequently in certain parts of modern geometry. Another novelty is the word "mate," which is used to denote "the point (or line) corresponding." The word "conjugate," which has been worked to death in geometry, is restricted to the theory of pole and polar. Mr. Russell frequently characterises a theorem by its author's name, but in no instance does he furnish a reference to where or when the author published it. A few notes, for which there is ample room at the end of each chapter, would remedy this deficiency.

J. S. MACKAY.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE TELL LOH TEXTS.

Southampton: Sept. 13, 1891.

As Mr. St. Chad Boscawen has seen fit to notice my translations of the Tell Loh Texts, I suppose I should send some reply to his letter; though I have little to say, except that I do not agree with his views, and have no desire to enter into controversy on points of detail.

I have studied Akkadian for some twelve years, and am fully aware of the difficulties of the language, which do not permit of such dogmatical assertions as those made by Mr. Boscawen. His translation of the passage he criticises seems to me hardly to make sense, or to agree with what follows.

The name of the mountain is quite clearly Ma-ad-ga on the text, and not Magdu as he states. Sinim is connected with Persia by the LXX. translators. Melukha is a disputed region, and I have followed Dr. Brugsch in preference to M. Delattre. If Gubin were Coptos, it would make very little difference in my geography.

Mr. Boscawen's rendering of Nin Girsu appears to be contrary to the well-known rules of Akkadian syntax, and is not particularly intelligible. The ruined palace contains a pyramid sacred to the deity of the shrine. I cannot see why a firestick should be called a "piercer of the flesh." Girsu (ki) is not in the locative case, as Mr. Boscawen assumes.

I confess that the renderings which I have elsewhere seen of these Texts appear to me to make great nonsense of the more difficult passages. I have not come across any by Mr. Boscawen, but have seen one by M. Amiaud, and a valuable paper on the subject—with partial renderings—by Mr. T. G. Pinches, who, however, seems to me to find difficulty in one or two passages. I see no reason to doubt that the name of Tell Loh on the Texts should be read Zirgul, as Lenormant and others have read it, and as it still survives at the village of Zirghul close by.

Mr. Boscawen's contemptuous general remarks do not interest me at all. C. R. CONDER.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

No. 135 of Mr. Bernard Quaritch's Rough Lists is a catalogue of Greek and Latin classics, to which are appended mediæval and modern books on classical philology, archaeology, &c. The prices affixed show plainly that the demand for an editio princeps is not what it once was; but none the less this class of literature must always possess a special interest for the genuine bibliophile. Here may be found two copies of the Homer printed at Florence in 1488, the Officia of Cicero, printed on vellum at Mentz in 1466, five fourteenth century Horaces, besides the attractive Aldine of 1501 and the original edition of Pine. There are also a few MSS.—such as two fine ones of Virgil written in Italy about the middle of the fifteenth century, an illuminated one of Martial of about the same date, and a magnificent one of Cassiodorus, which was written and illuminated for Pope Leo X.

DR. R. N. CUST has prepared for the World's Congress of Ethnologists at Chicago a report on the progress of African philology, in continuation of his Sketch of the Modern Languages of Africa (1883). It consists of a popular sketch of the subject, together with a series of appendices, in which the bibliography, the translations of the Bible, and the list of scholars in the former work are carried down to the present time. The Greek quotations are rather carelessly printed; and Dr. Cust should not have written: "The forlorn hope, that died at Thermopylæ, so that Athens might not be plundered."

THE index number of the Indian Antiquary for 1892, which has just been published, contains an illustrated article by Taw Sein-Ko, giving an account of an archaeological tour through the Talaing country of Burma. His main object was to report upon the sculptured caves, the pagodas, the inscriptions, and other antiquities of this region; but he also gives some interesting information about the people and their language. Mun or Talaing is still a spoken language, though rapidly disappearing before Burmese. It is taught in the monastic schools, but not in those which receive aid from government. Not only are there many inscriptions in Talaing, but also a large mass of literature in MS., which has never been studied by scholars. There is said to be a fine collection in the royal library at Bangkok, for the country was under Siamese rule in the fourteenth century. The language of the Taungthus, or highlanders, though it has borrowed largely from the Shans, seems to have natural affinity with Burmese. It also possesses a literature of its own, written in a character resembling that of Talaing. The general result of Taw Sein-Ko's researches is to suggest a closer connexion between Burma and India than has hitherto been admitted. Some of the smaller objects of antiquity discovered by him are now in the British Museum. Among them is a terracotta tablet bearing a Sanskrit inscription, exactly similar to other tablets which have come from Buddha Gaya.

FINE ART.

INDIAN NUMISMATICS.

The Currencies of the Hindu States of Rajputana. By William Wilfrid Webb. (Arohibald Constable.) So far as we know, this is the first book that has been published about the coins of the Native States in India. The whole subject, indeed, is involved in the utmost obscurity. No official information seems to be available as to how many chiefs possess this attribute of sovereignty, and how many actually exercise the right. Mr. C. L. Tupper, in his recent work on Our Indian Protectorate, states that, in 1875, twenty-six states coined silver, and two or three also gold. But here we learn that in Rajputana alone sixteen states now coin silver and five of them also gold. Dr. Webb estimates that the total issue of native rupees throughout all Rajputana amounts to considerably over two millions a year. The gold coinage is, of course, comparatively insignificant, being mainly for ceremonial purposes. It will readily be believed that the rupees coined vary in an extraordinary fashion, though there is little evidence of any debasement of the currency. One reason may be that Rajputana is the home of the shrewdest traders in all India, who would never permit themselves to be thus imposed upon. But it is curious to find that inferior rupees are intentionally produced for distribution at wedding festivities. In a few cases, the native rupee actually contains more silver than that of the British Government, so that it commands (or used to command) a premium in exchange. Only one State, that of Alwar, has consented to allow its rupees to be made of the British standard, and at the Calcutta mint. These bear—on the obverse, the head of the Queen, with the words "Victoria Empress" in English; and on the reverse the name of the reigning chief, with the date anno domini, in Persian characters, and round the border, "One Rupee, Alwar State," also in English, with the national emblem of a jhar or branch twice repeated. Elsewhere, the coins are all struck, or rather hammered, by hand, according to the method that prevailed in England down to the reign of Elizabeth; and, as the die is much larger than the coin, only part of the inscription is usually to be read on each piece. Despite traditional claims to greater antiquity, it seems to be historically ascertained that no Rajput coinage goes back beyond the decadence of the Mughal Empire; in fact, to the very period when the East India Company first acquired the right to set up a mint at Calcutta. Were other evidence for this wanting, it might be inferred from the fact that the early inscriptions are always in the name of the Mughal emperors, as were those on the English sikka rupees. It is interesting to know that Persian has so long survived on the coins of Northern India, just as Greek did on the coins of the Indo-Scythic kings, and as Latin does in this country to the present day. Coins are the most conservative things in existence: hence their interest from the historical point of view, as has been so ably pointed out by Mr. C. F. Keary. Most of the chiefs of Rajputana now place the Queen's name on their money, though still in Persian characters; but we are at a loss to understand what a former Raja of Partabgarh can have meant by styling himself "Sultan of London." It may also be mentioned that a Rana of Udaipur, before the Mutiny, used the title "Friend of London," which is more intelligible. From an archaeological point of view, most interest attaches to the old currency of Udaipur or Mewar. One tradition would assign to its chiefs a Persian origin; and this would seem to be supported by the large number of coins of the Indo-Sassanian type still to be found in the country. Indeed, copper pieces of this archaic type, in a very debased form, are still current in the bazars; and Dr. Webb gives reasons for believing that one of the copper coins issued to this day at the Udaipur mint is descended from the same stock. There is another interesting series of silver coins in Udaipur, bearing no inscription whatever. The pattern on them is said to have been designed by the chief at a Darbar, and has no recognised meaning. The same die is used for all pieces, from the rupee to the one anna. As regards Jodhpur or Marwar, the second State in Rajputana, the historical connexion of the ruling family with the valley of the Ganges is attested by the number of coins of the Kanauj type which are still in circulation. It remains to say that Dr. Webb's Catalogue is written not only with abundant learning, but also with commendable lucidity. It is illustrated with twelve lithographed plates, showing both the designs and the size of the coins; and it further contains a coloured map of the country, with the mint towns printed in red. The only thing open to criticism is the suggestion, in the Preface, that the English Government should withdraw the right of coining from the native states generally, or at least compel them to issue money of the English standard and from the English mints.

MR. EDGAR THURSTON, the compiler of the admirable Catalogue of Coins in the Madras Museum, having recently been transferred to Calcutta, has taken the opportunity to examine the historical records of the Calcutta mint. The results of his researches are printed in the Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal; and some extra copies have been placed at the disposal of Mr. Bernard Quaritch in this country. It was in 1759 that the East India Company first received authority to "coin gold and silver of equal fineness with the ashrafees and rupees of Murshidabad in the name of Calcutta"; but the records of the Calcutta mint do not begin until 1792, when Lord Cornwallis was Governor-General. This was the date when the sikka rupee was made sole legal tender throughout Bengal, though the province of Benares continued to have a mint and a rupee of its own for several years later. The existing rupee, formerly known as the Company's rupee, was made universal legal tender throughout India in 1835. It seems to have been derived from the Farrukhabad rupee, first struck by the English Government in 1803, for use in the ceded and conquered provinces, after the weight of the Lucknow rupee; and it owed its general adoption to its close correspondence with the rupees current in Bombay and Madras. Mr. Thurston has here collected a quantity of curious information about various schemes for reforming the Indian currency during the first thirty years of the present century, especially with regard to the devices which it was proposed to put on the coins. It appears that, in 1825, Flaxman designed a lion under a palm tree for the reverse of the rupee. This was actually adopted for the gold mohur, but discontinued when Victoria came to the throne.

THE following are the most interesting finds of treasure trove coins recently reported upon by Dr. A. F. R. Hoernle in the Proceedings of the Asiatic Society of Bengal. A collection of 183 copper coins, found in Chanda District of the Central Provinces, of the early kings of the Andhra dynasty (78-170 A.D.). They bear, on the obverse, an elephant with a rider, and the name of the king in ancient Nagari characters; and on the reverse, four balls joined by lines cross-wise, the well-known symbol of Ujjain. A collection of 52 coins—one gold, the others of mixed metal—found in Sarangarh State of the Central Provinces, of the Kalachuri dynasty of Chedi (1090-1170, A.D.). They bear on the obverse a standing figure of Hanuman, and on the reverse the name of the king in large Nagari characters—in both cases enclosed within a marginal circle of dots. Coins of this dynasty are exceedingly rare, and all those known hitherto bear the four-armed goddess Durga. The present find not only includes coins of two kings before unrepresented, but also shows that the figure of Hanuman was imitated by the Chandel kings from the Kalachuri dynasty. Dr. Hoernle further comments upon two rare gold Gupta coins, added by Mr. Rivett-Carnac to his collection recently purchased by the Indian Government: one a specimen of the "swordman" type of Kumara Gupta I., of which only two more are known to exist—in the British Museum and the Bodleian; the other a specimen of the "umbrella" type of Chandra Gupta II., of which seven more are known. Both of these have a gold loop soldered to the rim, showing that they were once worn as amulets or ornaments. J. S. C.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY ASSOCIATION OF BRASS COLLECTORS.

Cambridge: Sept. 10, 1893.

Permit me to state that the brasses purchased by the above association at Dr. Lawson Tait's sale were bought not to augment a "collection of brasses," but solely to prevent their falling into private hands and ultimately being lost. The association has deposited them in the meanwhile in the Cambridge University Museum of Archaeology, and intends to replace them in their original home as soon as satisfactory evidence of its locality is forthcoming. I have written this letter, as otherwise the concluding sentence of the kindly notice of our Transactions in the ACADEMY of September 16 might cause some misapprehension as to the objects of the society.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

SOME changes have occurred in the mode of publication, by Mr. J. M. Gray, of the Scottish National Portrait Gallery, of his articles on "The Authentic Portraits of Robert Burns," which have been announced as to appear in an early number of the Magazine of Art. As their writer aimed at a final treatment of his subject, the length of the articles has assumed proportions so formidable as to be beyond the limits of a monthly magazine. They are, accordingly, now appearing in the columns of the Scottsman, where they will obtain the widest circulation among those Northern readers who may be supposed to be most interested in their subject; and Mr. Gray is preparing a more concise sketch of "Burns's Portraits" for the Magazine of Art, to accompany an unusually comprehensive series of reproductions, including several portraits never before published. We understand that Mr. Gray contemplates the still further extension of his articles—after he has completed the work on James and William Tassie, and their portrait medallions, upon which he is at present engaged—and their issue in the form of a richly illustrated volume, which will appeal to all admirers of the greatest of Scottish poets.

UNDER the title of Life in Ancient Egypt, Messrs. Macmillan & Co. announce an English translation, by Mrs. Tirard (Helen Beloe), of Prof. Erman's well-known work. It will be illustrated with maps and numerous engravings.

At a special meeting of the Japan Society, to be held on Wednesday next, at 30, Hanover-square, Prof. Milne will exhibit a large series of photographic slides, illustrating the life, customs, and scenery of Japan. They are examples of the best work of the Photographic Society of Japan, of which Prof. Milne is a vice-president.

THE STAGE.

THE production of Michael Field's play of "William Rufus," which was announced to open the next season of the Independent Theatre Society, has, for the present, been abandoned; and, in its stead, a new, modern, prose play in four acts, by the same writer, has been substituted. It is entitled, "A Question of Memory," and the date fixed for its production is October 27.

MUSIC.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

The Place of Music in Public Worship. By H. C. Shuttleworth. (Elliot Stock.) This little book contains some excellent remarks by one who has had "many years' varied experience of cathedral, town, and country choirs." The author discusses artistic as opposed to congregational singing; but as he seems such a keen lover of the beautiful, he might, one would think, have inclined more towards the heart-melody theory advocated by the Apostle. Canon Shuttleworth, in speaking of organ recitals of sacred music, wisely considers that music "should be admitted on account of its intrinsic fitness rather than its source or title." And his desire that the orchestra should be brought back to the church is also praiseworthy. "All great art has been inspired by, and has expressed, religious feeling," says our author. It would have been safer to say "much great art," or he might, perhaps, have ventured to say, "the greatest art." In these cynical days Canon Shuttleworth's admiration for Mendelssohn's music, though somewhat extravagant, is refreshing.

Musical History. By Robert A. Marr. (William Reeves.) This little volume tells of the treasures in connexion with music and the drama that were exhibited in the Vienna Exhibition of 1892. Mr. Marr mentions "a fragment of papyrus-roll which contained a score of the 'Orestes,' by Euripides, written about the times of the birth of Christ." A word or two of comment respecting such an interesting relic would have been decidedly welcome. The collection of Wagner MSS. was of special importance; besides the known operas and music dramas it included "Die Hochzeit" (fragment), "Die Feen," and "Das Liebesverbot." Among old instruments, a clavichord used by Mozart when he travelled, and a harpsichord which belonged to Haydn, were conspicuous objects. The author dwells with pride on the English exhibits; he believes that in composition "England can now hold her own against the continental nations." For Mr. Marr this is all very well; but let composers entertain humbler opinions, for "pride goeth before a fall."

MUSIC NOTES.

THE eighth series of London Symphony Concerts will commence at St. James's Hall, on Wednesday, November 8. Three concerts will be given before and three after Christmas. The dates are as follows:—Nov. 8, 22, and Dec. 6, and Feb. 22, March 8, and April 5. M. Paderewski—who, by the way, gives a pianoforte recital at St. James's Hall, on Oct. 31—will appear at the second concert.

MUDIE'S

SELECT

LIBRARY.

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, and SPANISH BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from One Guinea per annum

LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for Weekly Exchange of Books at the Houses of Subscribers) from Two Guineas per annum.

COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from Two Guineas per annum.

N.B.—Two or three friends may unite in One Subscription, and thus lessen the cost of carriage.

LIBRARY BOXES GRATIS.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and post free.

SALE DEPARTMENT.

All the leading Books of the Past Seasons are on Sale, second-hand at greatly Reduced Prices.

LISTS GRATIS AND POST FREE.

MUDIE'S MANCHESTER LIBRARY

10 to 12, BARTON ARCADE, MANCHESTER

Is in daily communication with this Library.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, Limited,

30 to 34, NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON;

241, Brompton Road, S.W.; and 48 Queen Victoria St., E.C

ANNIE S. SWAN'S MAGAZINE.

Ready this day, No. 1, for OCTOBER, Price 6d.

THE WOMAN AT HOME.

An Illustrated Magazine for Women.

CONTENTS.

THE PRINCESS OF WALES: a Biographical Sketch. With many Portraits.

ELIZABETH GLEN, M.B.: the Experiences of a Lady Doctor. By ANNIE S. SWAN. I. A Boarding House Romance. Illustrated.

HESTER SINCLAIR. By NORMAN GALE. Illustrated.

AH MAN. By SARAH GRAND. Illustrated.

BRIDES and BRIDEGRROOMS. With Portraits.

A CHILD'S EXPERIENCES in M. PASTEUR'S INSTITUTE. With Portraits and Facsimiles. By OLGA BEATTY-KINGSTON.

ILLUSTRATED INTERVIEW with MADAME PATTI. By Baroness von ZEDLITZ.

A TRAY OF DIAMONDS.

THE CHILDREN'S MYSTERY.—I. The Mystery of the Five White Rats. With Prize Offer. By HEADON HILL.

A PAGE OF CONFESSIONS. By ADELINA PATTI.

THE BARGAIN. By MAARTEN MAERTENS. Illustrated.

SUNDAY READINGS for OCTOBER. By the DEAN of ARMAGH.

LIFE AND WORK AT HOME.

OVER the TEACUPS. By ANNIE S. SWAN.—DRESS and FASHION.

COOKERY.—HOUSE-FURNISHING.—HEALTH and PERSONAL APPEARANCE.—MOTHERS and CHILDREN.—

WOMEN'S EMPLOYMENTS.—SMILES.

* Full Prospectus will be sent on application.

HODDER & STOUGHTON, 27, Paternoster Row.

PRINTING AND PUBLISHING.

NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS,

Ac.—KING, BELL & RAILTON, Limited, high-class Printers and Publishers, 12, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet Street, E.C., are prepared to undertake the Printing and Publishing of first-class Newspapers, Magazines, Books, Catalogues, Pamphlets, Prospectuses, Articles of Association, Minutes of Evidence, &c., in the best style: Their offices are fitted with the latest improvements in Rotary and other machinery, the most modern English and Foreign Type, and they employ none but first-class workmen. Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices, free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted. Telephone 2789. Telegraph, "Africanism, London."

NATIONAL

All the Profits are divided among the Assured

FOR MUTUAL LIFE ASSURANCE.

PROVIDENT

PROFITS ALREADY DECLARED
£4,600,000.

INVESTED FUNDS, £4,700,000.

PAID IN CLAIMS, £8,800,000.

INSTITUTION.

Endowment-Assurance Policies are issued combining Life Assurance at Minimum Cost with provision for Old Age.

48, GRACECHURCH STREET, LONDON, E.C

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & CO.'S AT ALL LIBRARIES. NEW BOOKS.

THE UNITED STATES.

An Outline of Political History, 1492-1871.

By GOLDWIN SMITH, D.C.L.

Crown 8vo, 8s. 6d.

TIMES.—"His survey of events is luminous, his estimate of character is singularly keen and just, and his style is at once incisive, dignified, and scholarly. No one who takes up Mr. Goldwin Smith's volume will readily lay it down before he has finished it; no one will lay it down without acknowledging the rare gifts of the writer."

DAILY CHRONICLE.—"For the average well-educated inquiring Briton, who is not an historical specialist, the 'Outline' here presented will be a treasure. It is exactly what he wants, and what he might, if left to his own devices, ineffectually wade through many authorities to obtain."

A COMPANION TO DANTE.

From the German of G. A. SCARTAZZINI.

By A. J. BUTLER.

Crown 8vo, 10s. 6d.

[Immediately.]

THE LIBRARY EDITION OF LORD TENNYSON'S WORKS.

Vol. IX. "Demeter and Other Poems."

Globe 8vo, 5s.

[In October.]

* * This, with the eight volumes already published, will complete the Library Edition of Lord Tennyson's Works.

THE CAMBRIDGE SHAKESPEARE.

Edited by WILLIAM ALDIS WRIGHT.

Edition de Luxe, 40 vols., 6s. per vol. net.

* * The Edition de Luxe of the Cambridge Shakespeare will be comprised in 40 volumes super royal 8vo, each volume containing a single Play. It will be printed on a fine cream-white hand-made paper. The impression will be limited to 500 copies, a considerable number of which have been ordered for America. It will be issued at the rate of two volumes per month from October, when "The Tempest" and "The Two Gentlemen of Verona" will be published. Orders will only be received for complete sets.

MACMILLAN & CO., LONDON.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE'S NEW BOOKS.

THEOLOGICAL TRANSLATION LIBRARY. NEW SERIES.

Edited by the Rev. T. K. CHEYNE, M.A., D.D., Oriol Professor of Interpretation, Oxford, and the Rev. A. B. BRUCE, D.D., Professor of Apologetics and New Testament Exegesis, Free Church College, Glasgow.

The New Series will start in November with the issue of the first volume of the Translation of THE APOSTOLIC AGE. By Carl Weizsacker.

Translations of the following Books are also in preparation:—

THE HISTORY of DOGMA. By Adolf Harnack.

THE HISTORY of the HEBREWS. By Rudolf Kittel.

THE TIME of the APOSTLES. By A. Hausrath, with an Introduction by Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD.

It is proposed to bring out at least three volumes per annum. The price for three volumes to Subscribers being One Guinea, payable on the issue of the first. Intending Subscribers are invited to apply to the Publishers for Prospectuses and Subscription forms.

MAN an ORGANIC COMMUNITY: being an Exposition of the Law that the human personality in all its phases in Evolution, both co-ordinate and discordant, is the multiple of many sub-personalities. By JOHN H. KING, Author of "The Supernatural: its Origin, Nature, and Evolution." 2 vols., demy 8vo, cloth, 15s.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

THE SUPERNATURAL: its Origin, Nature, and Evolution. 2 vols., demy 8vo, cloth, 15s.

"Mr. J. H. King's clever volumes."—St. James's Gazette.

"A solid and scholarly work of which it would be next to impossible to speak in too high terms of praise."—Agnostic Journal.

THE LIFE of the REV. RODOLPH SUFFIELD, Author of "The Crown of Jesus," with an account of his abandonment of the Roman Catholic Faith, and Extracts from his Correspondence chiefly with Dr. Martineau. Crown 8vo, cloth, 4s. 6d.

Just published, medium 8vo, cloth, each 3s. 6d.

THE KING and the KINGDOM: a Study of the Four Gospels. Three Series. Each complete in itself, with copious indices.

"Delivering himself from prejudice and preconception as entirely as it is in the power of an ordinary man to do, the author works over the four Gospels to find what they say about Jesus. His discoveries are thoroughly healthy and simple, and it is exceedingly likely that an intelligent reader will find the books profitable, and even surprisingly stimulating."

Expository Times.

"The honesty and spiritual insight displayed will commend the work to the respect of students, the author gives instruction which will be found especially valuable to the ordinary English reader."—Inquirer.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

AMABEL: a Military Romance. By CATHAL

MACGUIRE. 3 vols., 31s. 6d.

BIANCA: a Novel. By Mrs. BAGOT HART.

2 vols., 21s.

THE PASSING OF A MOOD,

and Other Stories. By V., O., C.S.—"The

New Pseudonym." Paper, 1s. 6d.

THE AUSTRALIAN COMMON-

WEALTH. By GREVILLE TREGARTEH.

The New Volume of the "Nation Series."

Maps and Illustrations, cloth, 5s.

THE LIFE AND ADVENTURES

OF JAMES P. BECKWOURTH.

Mountaineer, Scout, and Indian Chief. Edited by CHAS. G. LELAND ("Hans Breitmann")

The New "Adventure" Volume. Illustrated. Cloth, 7s. 6d.

THE STICKIT MINISTER,

and some Common Men. By S. R. CROCKETT.

Third Edition. Cloth extra, 5s.

"Striking sketches of Scotch life and character."—Truth

LONDON: T. FISHER UNWIN, PATERNOSTER SQUARE, E.C.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 30, 1893.

No. 1117, New Series.

THE EDITOR cannot undertake to return, or to correspond with the writers of, rejected manuscript.

It is particularly requested that all business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., may be addressed to the PUBLISHER, and not to the EDITOR.

LITERATURE.

The Memoirs of James, Marquis of Montrose, 1639-1650. By the Rev. George Wishart, D.D., Bishop of Edinburgh. Translated, with Introduction, Notes, Appendices, and the Original Latin (Part II. now first published), by the Rev. Alexander D. Murdoch and H. F. Morland Simpson. (Longmans.)

THE appearance of a new translation of Wishart, in the complete form recently brought out by Messrs. Murdoch and Simpson, in one substantial volume, has doubtless been hailed with delight by the increasing number of Montrose's admirers. He was a man who called forth, in an unusual degree, feelings of passionate attachment and of almost equally passionate hatred from his contemporaries. The men who loved him were those who had come closely under his personal influence, or who had read the story of his desperate venture in defence of the falling monarchy. The men who hated him were those upon whose schemes he had brought disastrous defeat; and they hated him the more because, for a short time—while he believed their aims to be just, and their actions loyal to the constitution—he had been their warm and vigorous ally.

These enemies of his and those deceived by them have, almost down to the present day, held up to the contemplation of succeeding generations of readers a false and distorted picture of Montrose. But now that his deeds "have gone to work in the world," and all that he did and was still lives to be loved or hated, as the case may be—now that no personal hatred, inspired by fear, can have survived—there seems no reason why the influence so long exercised by a calculated system of misrepresentation and abuse should not die out altogether, as it is its nature to do, and leave the truth living and undisguised.

An example of how the system of misrepresentation was carried out may be seen in a curious document drawn up by Archibald Johnston, of Warristoun, which was printed in the old edition of Wishart, issued by Constable in 1819 at the suggestion of Sir Walter Scott. It is entitled

"A Declaration of the Committee of Estates of the Parliament of Scotland, in vindication of their proceedings from the aspersions of a scandalous Pamphlet, published by that excommunicate Traitor, James Graham, under the title of a Declaration of James Marquis of Montrose."

This document, which is a clever statement, from the extreme Covenanting point of view, of all the chief events that had happened from the beginning of the "Troubles" in 1637 to the death of the King in 1649, calls Montrose "That viperous brood of Satan whom the Church hath delivered into the hands of the devil, and the nation doth generally detest and abhor." Among other epithets applied, in this partisan manifesto, to the great Royalist leader who had inflicted six overwhelming defeats on the Covenanting armies, are "impudent braggard," "perfidious traitor," "child of the devil," "dissembling hypocrite," "impudent liar." This string of abuse, unsupported by a single fact, is accompanied by a studied misrepresentation of Montrose's motives from the very beginning of his career. The personal animus and virulence of the attack ought, one would think, to have defeated its object; but when party spirit runs high, vituperation, even of the most scurrilous kind, is often a more effective weapon than any appeal to reason or to facts.

The vague slanders against Montrose, circulated by, or originating with, men like Argyle, Archibald Johnston, and Lauderdale, not only injured him in popular estimation at the time, but were revived and made the most of nearly two hundred years later by the Whig historians of the earlier part of this century. Nevertheless, truth must finally prevail, and no mists raised by prejudice or hatred will permanently dim the lustre of a noble life.

Sir Walter Scott, with his keen instinct for all that was good and great, prepared the way for a truer appreciation of the great Royalist by his graceful and sympathetic sketch in The Legend of Montrose. But it was reserved for Mark Napier's untiring zeal and industry to disinter, from old family charter chests and from national archives, the abundant evidence which has given us a fairly complete record of Montrose's early years, a full explanation of his political convictions, and a triumphant refutation of the charges of treachery and cruelty brought against him by men who were themselves treacherous and cruel, and who hated him not only because he had beaten them in the field, but because his very virtues were a reproach to them. Napier's voluminous records were too long and too discursive for ordinary readers, but the truths they contained have gradually become known and have caused a strong reaction in public opinion.

Within the last few years Dr. Gardiner, the latest and fullest historian of the period, has awakened fresh interest in the Scottish hero by the careful though unsympathetic account he gives of Montrose's character, and of his splendid military achievements, in vol. ii. of The Great Civil War. Still, the renown of "Jamie Graeme," as Elizabeth of Bohemia, his ardent friend and admirer, was wont playfully to call him, must rest in the first place upon Wishart's History written in Latin—the first part during the life and probably with the help of the Marquis; the second, soon after his death. The book was an immense success at the time. It passed through three editions in the course of twelve months. And small wonder; for it told, in a language understood by the educated class throughout Europe, a story of daring adventure, of devoted self-sacrifice, and of brilliant victory. The writer—himself an eye-witness of some of the scenes—depicted in colours glowing with strong love and admiration the singularly attractive character of the chief actor in the stirring events recorded; and the portrait, thus presented, made a deep impression on the minds of the most eminent personages in Europe.

It has been a common mistake, even of Montrose's admirers, to regard him merely as a dashing soldier, loyal and generous indeed, but rash, if not foolhardy. True it is that, as Dr. Gardiner writes, "He dashed at his high aims like a Paladin of romance"; true that "Venture faire," the name assumed by him in his cypher key, exactly suited the man who wrote the well-known quatrain that has so strangely hit the fancy of this unheroic nineteenth century:

"He either fears his fate too much
Or his deserts are small
Who puts it not unto the touch
To win or lose it all."

But joined with this absolute fearlessness, this disdain for mere personal consequences, was a cool, calm judgment, which never (at least after early youth) allowed his feelings to run away with him; and no feature in his character is more strongly marked than the singular moderation which showed itself in his religious and political opinions, and in his patience under every kind of disappointment. His dealings with Huntley, the impracticable and perverse, though loyal, Chief of the Gordons, are a striking instance of generous and persevering forbearance under most exasperating provocation; and his patient dignity under the insults heaped upon him by the temporary rulers of Scotland, during the last few weeks of his life, has won the admiration of all succeeding ages.

The story of his brilliant career, cut short at the early age of thirty-seven by a tragedy that can never fail to stir deeply all hearts capable of generous indignation, is told in this new and beautiful edition of Wishart in clear, flowing English, which contrasts favourably with the antiquated style of the old translation, dating from 1746. This part of the volume will be the most popular; but scholars will be interested in seeing the original Latin, given in full at the end of the book, the second part being now printed for the first time. The notes, explanatory of the text, give a clear account of nearly every person mentioned by Wishart, as well as numerous references to the best contemporary and modern authorities, references which, in the great majority of instances, attest the truthfulness of the biographer, and justify his strong admiration for his hero. The editors, who have spared no pains to make their work as full and perfect as possible, have been so fortunate as to bring to light letters hitherto undiscovered, bearing closely upon their subject. Among them are a highly characteristic letter from Montrose to Frederic of Denmark, written in French, and one from a Colonel Gordon—a Scottish soldier in the Swedish service—which illustrates well the enthusiastic admiration felt for the great Marquis by many who had never seen him.

For some unexplained reason, there is a great gap in Wishart's narrative between the beginning of Montrose's preparations for his last fatal enterprise, and his entry into Edinburgh as a prisoner. This is filled up by the editors with three chapters of their own, put together from contemporary records, and giving a clear and consecutive account of the last year of Montrose's life, a period in regard to which even Napier is somewhat confused and uncertain. By the aid of the new material at their disposal, and a careful examination of dates, the writers have clearly brought out the fact that Montrose, far from hurrying headlong on a hopeless enterprise, waited patiently at Gottenberg for months, to his great inconvenience, till he should receive the King's final commands. Early in January his ships were ready, his men on board; expresses from Scotland were pressing him to come over even if he came alone. His own presence would—they wrote—bring together 20,000 armed Highlanders, "all men being weary and impatient to live any longer under that bondage, pressing down their estates, their persons, and their consciences." "Yet, urged as he was to depart, and with a fair wind to waft his little frigate westward, Montrose once more turned back." He did not actually set sail till the middle of March; and the delay, which "must be attributed solely to the cruel vacillation of the King," was probably fatal to the success of the enterprise.

Wishart was not an eye-witness of the last tragic scene at the "Mercat Cross" of Edinburgh, in which Montrose's enemies, all unwitting of what they were doing, crowned the high purpose of his life with a glorious death. They had done their best to make it appear an ignominious doom. The Governor-General of Scotland, holding the commission of their acknowledged king, and lately decorated with the blue riband of the Garter, stood at their command pinioned on the scaffold, to suffer a felon's fate. But the gallows tree itself was transfigured by the greatness of soul which shone out in every word, look, and action of the undaunted sufferer. "It is absolutely believed that he hath overcome more men by his death, in Scotland, than he would have done if he had lived," wrote an English spectator, in a letter (dated the day of the execution) still preserved in the British Museum. The writer, who was evidently deeply impressed by the calm courage and noble bearing of Montrose, adds quaintly, "I never saw a more sweeter carriage in a man in all my life."

JENNET PRYCE.

Liber Amoris: or the New Pygmalion. By William Hazlitt. With an Introduction by Richard le Gallienne. (Elkin Mathews & John Lane.)

APART from the rarity of copies of the original edition of the Liber Amoris, and of its one previous reprint, there is ample justification for the appearance of this later re-issue, which comes to us with the external attractiveness belonging to every volume sent out from the Bodley Head. If there be any defect in the format, it is an excess of the dainty external immaculacy which seems to say, "Noli me tangere," surely the very thing which ought not to be said by a book like the Liber Amoris, which is, from first to last, an expansive confidence and an appeal to the world for sympathy. The true book-lover hates to see his books disguised in loose covers, even though they be the comely dominoes of Messrs. Marlborough & Gould; and yet only by such unwelcome protection can the virginal white of the ribbed boards be preserved from unsightly soiling. This, however, is simply an obiter dictum, a hint by the way.

The justification referred to in the opening sentence is to be found: first, in the authorship of the volume, and secondly, in the nature of its contents. Hazlitt was a great writer, and everything that he wrote has a certain interest simply because it is his. Greatness is, however, entitled to the privacies which can be rightly claimed by the least of us; and every right-feeling person will sympathise with Mr. William Watson's protest against the indecency of exposing the confidential or immature product which a distinguished man has deliberately withheld from public gaze. Such a protest has, however, no force against such a publication as the present. If the Liber Amoris should lower Hazlitt in the estimation of his readers—and that it should not have some such effect is hardly credible—the responsibility for the regrettable result lies on Hazlitt's own shoulders. Its publication was as deliberate an act as was that of The Round Table or of the Lectures on the Dramatists; and there is no doubt whatever that its author would have included the Liber Amoris among the books upon which he desired the world to base its final estimate of his personality and character.

Its intrinsic interest is of a very obvious kind. It may not be a healthy interest, but few of us have the absolutely perfect healthfulness of nature which deprives the morbid and the abnormal of all attractive appeal; and there are cases—I am inclined to think that this is one of them—in which a study of an abnormal condition really aids our understanding of the normal. "In vino veritas"; and any excitement which throws a character off its balance may reveal a constant condition of unstable equilibrium which otherwise would have remained unsuspected. In one portion of his interesting and discriminating introduction Mr. le Gallienne seems to dwell at undue length upon a matter which is not of any vital importance. He endeavours to prove, not as it seems to me with any great success, that Hazlitt was exceptionally susceptible to the fascinations of simple femininity, apart from any observable charms of person, mind, or manner; and that, therefore, his mad passion for the plain and ordinary daughter of the Bloomsbury tailor was probably less discordant with the rest of his life than we might at first suppose. Whether this were so or not we have no means of knowing; it is quite possible that it was so, but the point is of no real moment. Many men of all kinds—men of genius among the rest—have been the victims of a passion which seemed to outsiders little less than insane. What makes the Liber Amoris remarkable is not the infatuation which it commemorates; it is the nature of the commemoration. Had Sarah Walker, instead of being an uncomely, uninteresting, and half-educated girl, been a creature with the beauty of Helen, the charm of Cleopatra, and the culture of Aspasia, the record would still remain one of the most extraordinary examples of self-denudation to be found in literature. It is from this point of view that Hazlitt and Rousseau are seen in company. Mr. le Gallienne makes the very just remark—apropos of a suggested comparison in the Examiner—that Hazlitt, as represented by the Liber Amoris, is not "worthy to be mentioned in the same day as Rousseau." Certainly not, if Hazlitt's book is to be "mentioned" in connexion with such a work as The New Héloïse; but with the most curious portions of the Confessions it has so much in common that a comparison is not only legitimate and reasonable, but almost inevitable. The two books, in fact, constitute a class, and I know of no third which has a colourable claim to admission. Autobiographical records, which are, either in name or in substance, confessions, are not rare; some of them considerably overstep the conventional boundaries of self-revelation: St. Augustine unveils some strange arcana of spiritual pathology, and Cellini records his crimes and his amours with an amazing frankness; but there is a point at which all of them stop short, not deliberately and of set purpose, but from the promptings of an instinctive pudency which, in some form or other, is universal among both savage and civilised mankind. In this pudency the Rousseau of the Confessions and the Hazlitt of the Liber Amoris show themselves equally deficient; and though the revelations of the latter work comprise none of the overt offences against decency which are found in the former, their absence is simply due to the accidental lack of this kind of narrative material, the book being clearly the utterance of a man in whom—at any rate, for the time being—the instincts of decorous reticence which make for decency are asleep or dead. For it must be noted—and it would be well if it were noted more distinctly by some contributors to the discussion concerning the scope and limitations of legitimate art—that these instincts are entirely independent of what is ordinarily called morality or immorality. In the Confessions immorality is plentiful; in the Liber Amoris it is non-existent; for there seems no doubt that Hazlitt made love to Sarah Walker with "honourable intentions," and that at the completion of the divorce proceedings, which were at the time being hurried on, she might, had she pleased, have become the second Mrs. Hazlitt. But there is no immorality in the amorous demonstrations of a brute; yet many of the higher animals shrink from the intrusive gaze of their special world. Not so Hazlitt. Here are some sentences from the conversation entitled "The Quarrel," in the course of which, while violently accusing his charmer of having treated him as laughing-stock in her family circle, and made his attentions the theme of contemptuous jest, he treats the world at large to a recital of the details of his billing and cooing.

"When your servant Maria looked in, and found you sitting in my lap one day, and I was afraid she might tell your mother, you said, 'You did not care, for you had no secrets from your mother.' This seemed to me odd at the time, but I thought no more of it till other things brought it to my mind. Am I to suppose that you are acting a part, a vile part, all this time, and that you come up here, and staying as long as I like, that you sit on my knee, and put your arms round my neck, and feed me with kisses, and let me take other liberties with you, and that for a year together; and that you do all this not out of love, or liking, or regard, but go through your regular task like some young witch, without one natural feeling, to show your cleverness, and get a few presents out of me, and go down into the kitchen and make a fine laugh of it. . . . You once let some words drop, as if I were out of the question in such matters, and you could trifle with me with impunity. Yet you complain at other times that no one ever took such liberties with you as I have done. I remember once in particular your saying, as you went out of the door in anger—'I had an attachment before, but that person never attempted anything of the kind.' Good God! how did I dwell on that word before, thinking it implied an attachment to me also; but you have since declared that you had no such meaning."

What a sickening revelation of the fatuous familiarities, not of love, or even of passion, in any dignified sense of the word, but of the usual philandering of the London lodging-house. "Who would not laugh if such a man there be; who would not weep" if the friend of Lamb and Coleridge, the writer of The Pleasures of Painting and My First Acquaintance with Poets, were he? That a middle-aged man of literary distinction should deliberately place himself in the power of a Bloomsbury maid-of-all-work is incredible enough, but that he should write down the confession of his humiliation and his fright would be past all possibilities of belief were it not that it is here in black and white.

Mr. le Gallienne, in the very happily felt and expressed passage at the close of his introduction, says that "the only sin we find in his book to-day is the sin against humour"; but this is surely too faint condemnation unless humour be regarded not merely as the quick perception of one special set of incongruities, but as the sum total of the sensibilities discerning between all forms of the congruous and of the incongruous. In this sense of the word, bombast, conceit, affectation, and shamelessness are all offences against humour because they are gratuitous and unremunerative violations of those congruities, perception of and obedience to which can alone make life a sweet cosmos instead of an ill-savoured chaos. Of course it is quite true that the Liber Amoris indicates a lack of humour on the part of its writer. But we cover the ground more completely when we say that it indicates a lack of sanity; and thus regarded it is a remarkable illustration of the theory, always favoured by the experts and always discredited by the public, that there is a madness which affects the emotional nature alone and leaves the machinery of intellectual perception and ratiocination altogether unimpaired. Thus, the Liber Amoris neither explains nor is explained by anything else in the work of Hazlitt; but upon much in his wayward, perplexing life that seems at first sight inexplicable it throws a flood of light. He was a mad man of genius, and this is the one book of his that shows nothing of the genius and everything of the madness.

To Mr. le Gallienne's introductory paper I have already made one or two references. In spite of some trifling slips of no great consequence, it is a good, workmanlike performance, full of shrewd common sense. Like the parson in the Northern Farmer's parish, he has said what he ought to have said; and he has said it at once plainly and vivaciously. This is as much as we have a right to expect.

JAMES ASHCROFT NOBLE.

"THE STORY OF THE NATIONS."—Poland.
By W. R. Morfill. (Fisher Unwin.)

Poland is not altogether a satisfactory book: at any rate we have the right to expect a very much better book from a Slavonic scholar of Mr. Morfill's high reputation. That it is interesting and entertaining, that it abounds with curious and often recondite information, that it aims—not unsuccessfully—in popularising a somewhat difficult subject, may be readily conceded. Still, as a history, the book must be pronounced disappointing. The earlier portion of it, in which Mr. Morfill mainly follows (and rightly so) Schieman's excellent Russland, Poland, und Livland bis ins 17. Jahrhundert, is distinctly good; but the remainder of the work bears all the marks of over-hasty compilation, and suffers especially from that want of proportion which was the cardinal defect of the author's Russia, contributed to the same series and reviewed some time ago in the ACADEMY.

Mr. Morfill, in fact, has been too indulgent towards his readers. Moved, no doubt, by an amiable desire to entertain them as much as possible, he has been so very liberal in his citations from curious original documents as to leave himself far too little space for the consideration of many historical events (especially military events) of decisive importance, and is therefore frequently obliged to slur them over instead of describing them. Of course, we do not mean to deny that the testimony of such observant travellers as Coxe, or Connor, or Harvey, as to the actual condition of the Polish people, as they saw it, is most valuable; and we are quite sure that Mr. Morfill's readers will be grateful to him for his racy extracts from those worthies. But such complaisancy may be carried too far; and, considering the very limited space at his disposal, it is nothing short of perverse to devote eight pages in one place and ten pages in another to the description of pageants and ceremonies, while the Great Northern War which shook all Europe for eighteen years is disposed of in five pages, and the famous rebellion of 1830 is dismissed in less than two. The latter event, in particular, is epitomised out of all recognition, and is a typical specimen of the author's obliterative method when dealing with wars. Thus, the two days' battle of Grochow, one of the most heroic struggles of modern times, is just alluded to as a check. The scarcely less sanguinary battles of Dober and Stoczek are ignored; while, stranger still, Skrzynecki, the Polish commander-in-chief during the crisis of the struggle (March-May), is not so much as mentioned. The aristocratic intrigues at Warsaw, too, which paralysed the valour of the army and ultimately ruined an originally promising cause, are not even hinted at.

No wonder that this perfunctory treatment of great historical events frequently leads the author into downright inaccuracies. Thus, in his account of the celebrated interregnum of 1575, he ignores the fact that the choice of Stephen Bathory was a mere afterthought of Zamoyski's to circumvent the emperor, and that up to the last moment the Transylvanian had not been regarded by anyone as a serious candidate. It is also incorrect to insinuate that Stephen was at one time a Protestant, for apparently no other reason than that some of the Transylvanian princes were not Catholics. Mr. Morfill is also mistaken in representing the tardiness of the Polish deputies in sanctioning the famous Constitution of 1791 as "the fruits of the baneful Confederation of Targowicz." As a matter of fact, the Constitution was finally adopted on May 3, 1791, whereas the Confederation was not formed till May 24, 1792. While we are on this subject, we may also say that we do not think that Mr. Morfill lays sufficient stress on the infamous treachery of Prussia in 1792, nor does his very perfunctory account of the rising under Kosciuszko so much as mention the hero's earlier victories or the first abortive siege of Warsaw by the Prussians, which, for an instant, left the issue of the struggle uncertain. We also think that the author has yielded too readily to the temptation of consulting easily accessible German monographs; but, considering the popular character of his work and his very limited space, this was perhaps, on the whole, the wisest course to pursue.

We have touched, somewhat roughly, on what we deem the weak points of Mr. Morfill's history, simply because we feel that in these instances he is really not doing full justice to himself. His knowledge of his subject is so intimate that, had he only taken the trouble to marshal his facts better, he would, we think, have produced a work not a whit inferior to the best monographs of this well-known series. Chap. xiii., "Polish Literature," is an excellent piece of work, though the author might well have found room for the names of Eliza Orzeszkowa and Jan Lam, the George Eliot and the Thackeray of Polish literature. And surely Sienkiewicz wrote something besides his noble historical romances? The chapter on the social condition of Poland is also good; and, generally speaking, Mr. Morfill is a sure and safe guide everywhere except on the battlefield.

Finally, a few words as to the cause of the disappearance of Poland from among the nations. We have never yet met with a satisfactory explanation of that catastrophe, nor does Mr. Morfill now supply one. He suggests, indeed, five reasons for it: (1) the unruliness of the nobles; (2) the intolerance of the clergy; (3) the absence of any middle class; (4) the slavery of the peasants; and (5) the lack of great men. The last reason is Prof. Bobrzynski's, and may be dismissed at once as contrary to the facts. Poland had never any reason to envy her neighbours the possession of great rulers. The four other reasons might, with a little ingenuity, be made to apply to every other continental nation in its mediæval stage, and the social conditions implied thereby were by no means peculiar to Poland. If we might hazard a conjecture, we should say that Poland, like every other Slavonic nation, does not seem to take as naturally to free institutions as her Germanic neighbours, and certainly her history shows that she always thrived best beneath the sceptre of a masterful king. Yet, after all, it is perhaps as difficult to account for the fall of Poland as for the rise of Prussia. At one time the chances were equally against both events. We, who can only see events in their consequences, may invent theories to explain and simplify the Past, and pronounce judiciously that things could only have happened one way; yet our experience of the Present might teach us that, up to the decisive moment of every crisis, it is impossible to predict the precise turn that things will take. The ultimately losing cause is often within an ace of winning. Other nations besides Poland have been cursed with aristocratic misrule, clerical intolerance, invidious class distinctions, and incompetent rulers, yet they have survived while she has perished—perished, too, at the hands of those who have done far less for Europe than she did.

R. NISBET BAIN.

Othello: a Critical Study. By William Robertson Turnbull. (Blackwoods.)

THE first impression to assail the reader, as he handles Mr. Turnbull's massive volume before opening it, will probably be a sense of discouraging surprise. It seems impossible that a study of "Othello," covering some four hundred well-filled pages, should avoid much unnecessary matter, much repetition, many unprofitable excursions upon alien ground. But a closer examination proves the scope of the work to be wider than its title. Mr. Turnbull's study of "Othello" is, in fact, a study of Shaksperian tragedy, made, he assures us, with special reference to the single drama in question. The special reference, however, is at times difficult to trace. The author, in his earlier chapters, wanders far afield, and is much more intimately occupied upon "Macbeth" and "King Lear" than upon "Othello." But this is a fault which his readers will easily forgive him—a fault principally due to an aim miscalculated at the outset. For it was practically impossible to review Shaksperian tragedy from the outlook of an isolated drama: a freer survey was inevitable to success. And success, let us add at once, has not deserted Mr. Turnbull. A very careful consideration of his subject has resulted in a strong, scholarly, sympathetic piece of criticism—a work of actual importance, which demands attention even where it repels assent. Such a work could only be the outcome of a long and loving study, not of the dramatist's work alone, but of the general field of Shaksperian comment and criticism. Every page bears evidence to a faithful desire to understand his author, to a continuous comparison of passages, and, finally, to a catholic spirit in the tone with which diverse and often unsympathetic criticism is encountered. Mr. Turnbull's theories are, it is evident, invariably based upon thoughtful reflection: never formed rashly, as the momentary sequel of a happy inspiration. But we must confess to finding ourselves in frequent variance with his views, which are often, we believe, twisted out of shape by an ill-formed conception of dramatic art itself.

Mr. Turnbull commences his study of Shaksperian tragedy with an attempt to trace upon the features of the work the overshadowing of the author's own personality. Wherein he claims to find these traces is not altogether clear. He himself repudiates the suggestion that Shakspeare speaks more clearly through the mouth-piece of any one of his characters than of any other: he only feels that here and there, upon the surface of the work, are scattered pearls that have fallen, like those in the fairy legend, from the lips of the poet himself, as an earnest of his own strength and purity of disposition. It may be so: indeed, it must be so. No work, least of all the highest, can be barren of personality. But the search for these gems of individuality, the attempt to identify passages and to say: "Here Shakspeare is speaking with his own voice," is not only, in our opinion, unprofitable, but—in the study of drama—a course of criticism radically false and dangerous. Whether he speaks with the tongue of his own or another's angel, Shakspeare remains everywhere dramatic. The words which he puts into the mouth of his character are set there as suitable and fit: no purpose is served by separating them from their own context, and referring them to another. To do so is to lose touch with the drama, to forget that the author is living in the character he portrays—to do him, in short, an artistic injustice.

Proceeding from this standpoint to trace Shakspeare's personality as reflected in his work, Mr. Turnbull finds his chief interest in what he terms a kind of "universal curiosity." Here, again, we think that he has been unfortunate in his view; or perhaps it is here a matter of term rather than of judgment in which he is astray. Surely the characteristic attitude of Shakspeare is that of consummate knowledge; of extensive insight into character; of calm, contented wisdom without effort. But, when we follow up Mr. Turnbull's argument, we find that it is sympathy rather than curiosity that he means—a sympathy which surveys all mankind with an impartial eye, and builds out of itself types with which to people its world of fancy. For to Mr. Turnbull Shakspeare's characters are types rather than individuals: they embody the differentia of classes, they do not stand alone. And here again we cannot but differ from him. If Othello be not an actual, living, suffering individuality, if Cassio be not a man moving in a real life, then is all literature nothing but a care for the type, a study of abstraction, in which actuality is impossible. Every man must be one of a class, bearing about his personality some traits common to his fellows: not even the greatest is absolutely original. Nor, for that reason, is the least a type. There is, indeed, too much talk of types nowadays, too much tracing of resemblance, too close an adherence to abstraction. It is a fashion of criticism which will pass; but it is a pity that it should have infected so thoughtful and unimpassioned a study as Mr. Turnbull's. For, of a certainty, Shakspeare's wide-souled sympathy spent itself not upon the type, but upon the individual; to the making of his men there went all the keen emotion and breathless energy that live in the creature they frame. To Shakspeare, we cannot doubt, Othello was a man and not an exemplar.

When he passes to speak of the tragedy itself, apart from the general consideration of his subject, Mr. Turnbull grows stronger in grasp, and, to our mind, sounder in opinion. There is, perhaps, a tendency to accumulate epithets and enumerate attributes without sufficient support by illustration—an enthusiasm, in other words, which, if generally justified, lacks the logical establishment of its justification.

"Othello," he says, "from its unity of design and action, its breadth and variety of characterisation, its ethic sovereignty, stands an unparagoned masterpiece of poetic art, the most sublime and finished conception of Shakspeare's muse."

And again:

"It obeys all the essential laws and principles of true art . . . it fully meets and satisfies all the varied demands of tragedy . . . as an exquisite harmony of vision and expression, it is shaped with due persistence and perfection from the beginning of its story to the end."

All this is very good and very true: we must confess to a peculiar sympathy with Mr. Turnbull's enthusiasm. "Othello" has always appeared to us, not only the finest of Shakspeare's plays from the point of view of stage representation, but also the strongest, most human, most intense of his studies in character and action. But Mr. Turnbull exhibits, we think, a rather too persistent energy in point-making, and a love for reiteration which would have taxed the patience even of Matthew Arnold. He forces his view home by a freedom of protestation which, in his more eulogistic moments, is apt to prove tedious.

In his analysis of the characters of the tragedy he is more successful, and this is one of the most interesting portions of his work. His studies of Iago, Othello, and Desdemona, are wrought out with a delicacy of sympathy, and a freedom from over-exuberant fancy, which render them really valuable additions to a field of literature which is already widely occupied. Even in this there is a tendency to turn into side-issues, to introduce Kant and Hegel, Sir William Hamilton and Prof. Bain into pastures where we would fain be left alone with Shakspeare and Mr. Turnbull himself. But after a little parade of philosophy, the author always returns to a sound and unaffected sketch of his character; and his discussion of Iago's motive in crime is at once acute and suggestive.

Acuteness and suggestiveness, indeed, are the principal excellences of the volume. Mr. Turnbull's view is always that of an intelligent, scholarly enthusiast; and thus, even when his conclusions appear paradoxical, his argument stimulates thought and provokes discussion. It is only the colourless work of the second-hand critic which passes unchallenged; and Mr. Turnbull will agree with us when we say that the qualities which stimulate thought and provoke discussion are of more value than the universal assent of reviewers. And these qualities will never be lacking to his work.

ARTHUR WAUGH.

Darwin and Hegel. By D. G. Ritchie. (Sonnenschein.)

THE several papers in this volume, though collected from various periodicals, have yet a substantive unity, and the standpoint of the writer is indicated by himself with perfect clearness in the label of Idealist-Evolutionism. The book, indeed, is an epitome addressed to the Darwinians and Hegelians—an attempt at their reconciliation through the combination of an Idealist position in philosophy with a frank recognition of the changes wrought by the historical method in the study of ideas and institutions, and, in particular, by the biological theory of Natural Selection.

Having heard from the greatest of English Aristotelians that Hegel was no less weak in science than Darwin was in philosophy, we were anxious to see how far the ideas of these two great pioneers in such divergent spheres of thought were capable of mutual relation and interdependence. We can at least say that the mere natural-scientist who so airily condemns the methods of the metaphysician, with the same cheerful indifference as is shown by the latter-day classical realists to the "pure scholar," will find in the book much that should give him pause before renewing the depreciatory attack on the philosophers after the manner of Prof. Karl Pearson and Mr. Huxley. Indeed, it were hard to decide how often and how far an "anticipation" in philosophy has not been subsequently "verified" by natural science; and how far Goethe's philosophical conception of the creation of things in Nature in enduring types preceded his scientific demonstration of the organs of flowers as forms of the leaf, or the bones of the skull as transformed vertebrae. Fichte may have gone too far in his declaration that by his philosophic method he had arrived in advance at the Wolfian theory of the Homeric problem; but Mr. Ritchie is, we think, rightly convinced that, over and above the mere natural history of ideas and institutions, there is the everlasting distinction of genesis and ousia, and that this is the task of philosophy, or of metaphysics, or call it what we will, with which the mind never did, and never can, dispense.

Respicere finem was a favourite Hegelian doctrine, and Mr. Ritchie excellently refutes the ready-reckoner method of popular science which protests against the infusion of a mystical metaphysic into what was already as clear as day. The clearness in question is generally present only to ignorance, and the theory can only be fully expressed in virtue of terms that have not been sufficiently explained. Lewes is appreciatively quoted as maintaining—that we think Bacon too often forgot—that the facts of nature do not tell their own story, or suggest the questions we do, or should, put to them, but that "our closest observation is interpretation." The central position for which the author contends is that no mere anthropological account of the evolution of morality ever is, or can profess to be, complete as a basis for Ethics that denies or ignores the constant recognition of the Ideal in human effort, involved in the presence of the eternal-self, which all knowledge and all conduct must presuppose. The content of the idea may vary—"this or that side of the Pyrenees," as Pascal put it—but the Decalogue is not repealed by the morality of the Andaman Islander, nor the immutability of the moral law impugned by divergent practices among the races of mankind. The ideal, indeed, must of necessity vary, else would advance be impossible. But without an ideal some categorical imperative morality would be alike inconceivable and impossible. To trace in various ages and among various peoples the growth and the development of that ideal is for the historian or the psychologist; but why there is this ideal at all will recur only to the thinker in the light of philosophical analysis, looking at things as a whole.

The possibility of knowledge Mr. Ritchie regards as dependent on the comparing and distinguishing Self—in time, yet not of time. Here he follows his old master Prof. T. H. Green, and regards the Ego as eternal, or rather time-less self-consciousness. But the old intuitionist ethics assumed certain absolute principles of right and wrong like a question of pure mathematics, and thus, he thinks, came into conflict with the modern ideas of evolution and development. On the cardinal point, indeed, of Entwicklung Hegel split from the evolutionists. While they followed the process from the less to the more perfect, Hegel prefers the Neo-Platonic conception of emanation as explaining the lower in the light of the higher, and regards the time-difference as without interest in thought—a thought-process alone. "Hegel," as Prof. Seth says, quoted by Mr. Ritchie, "presents everything synthetically, though it must first have been got analytically by the ordinary powers of reflection." Beyond the fact of consciousness, however, he thinks we cannot go, though in the analysis of mind we may use the conception of the atom like the naturalist to resume or rethink the world of sense. Thus, too, Plato (p. 150) conceived the soul not as a self-existent monad or independent atom, but as dependent ultimately on the eternal ideas and finally on the Idea of the Good.

Perhaps to the general reader the most interesting portion of the book is the collection of the political papers on Economic Laws, Locke's Theory of Property, the Social Contract Theory, Sovereignty and the Rights of Minorities. Indeed, we think Mr. Ritchie is seen at his best in this part, and in his explanation how the political theories of Grotius, Puffendorf, and Locke leavened the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and how the doctrine of passive obedience and the divine right of kings through the not altogether disinterested misinterpretation of the New Testament by the school of Laud and Mainwaring led their successors of 1688 to bethink themselves in the Old Testament of the dagger of Ehud and the hammer of Jael. Nor does he fail to bring out with admirable force the fundamental unity in the thinking of such apparently divergent writers as Hooker, Milton, Locke, and Rousseau, and their debt, consciously or otherwise, to the old mediaeval theory of a contract ex consensu in Roman law, perhaps through Buchanan; and the influence of that theory on the contractual nature of the old Scottish monarchy and the Cortes of Aragon in its struggle against the despotism of Charles the Fifth. What to the theological critics is known as the "covenant" school of divines and old German systematic-theology writers is excellently brought out by Mr. Ritchie in the following passage (p. 209):

"In feudal Europe every man found himself somewhere in a scale of subordination: he was someone's 'man.' The scale mounted up through nobles and kings to emperor and pope; and emperor and pope were thought of holding directly of God—or else the emperor of the pope, and the pope alone directly of God. But allegiance rested everywhere, as we have seen, on mutual obligation. Even the relation of God to man was thought of in terms of contract. God had bound Himself to man, and man to Himself, by covenants and by solemn promises. The Hebrew idea of covenant was supplemented by the Roman legal idea of contract, and the destructive theology of the Western Church was the consequence."

The book is a book neither for the general reader nor for the evolutionist at large. There is in it much excellent thought; and the author's fear in the Preface that he has offended by the publication of detached essays, instead of waiting to inflict a big treatise on the public, is happily without real ground.

W. KEITH LEASK.

NEW NOVELS.

The Countess Radna. By W. E. Norris. In 3 vols. (Heinemann.)

Joseph Zalmonah. By Edward King. (Gay & Bird.)

The Last Tenant. By B. L. Farjeon. (Hutchinson.)

To Let. By B. M. Croker. (Chatto & Windus.)

From Morn to Eve. By Emilie Durnford. (Digby, Long & Co.)

What the Glass Told. By Helen Mathers. (White.)

Cavalleria Rusticana. By Giovanni Verga. Translated by Alma Strettell. (Fisher Unwin.)

THE Countess Radna is an Austrian heiress. She has immense wealth and extraordinary beauty. She is superficially clever, but profoundly shallow. She is not vicious, though she lacks any redeeming virtue. Entirely her own mistress, without occupation of any kind, it is not surprising that her estimate of everybody and everything is determined by their power to amuse her. As for herself, with her cheap philosophy and belated cynicism, she is little short of a bore. But Douglas Colborne, a typical English country gentleman, with just enough brains to make an excellent cricketer and a successful politician, does not find her so. Moreover, he is fortunate in his endeavours to amuse her; though it is evident that, had it not been for the accidental aid to his love-making, vouchsafed by the dramatic setting of a thunderstorm at the top of a mountain, he might have wooed in vain. The Countess believes her hour has come, and decides that she may as well capitulate to Eros, since his victory will only be a nominal one. Her love does not stand the test of calm reflection following upon assured safety; it is as evanescent as was the piety of the sailors in "Don Juan." But the Englishman is resolute; he keeps her to her bond. He speedily has cause to deplore his tenacity; but the fates are kind to him, and, after a somewhat rough passage, he is given the woman obviously designed for him. In real life it is almost certain that a man of this type, a level-headed fellow of the first water, would have seen his fate at once in his clever and sympathetic neighbour, and, without putting himself to the pain of dallying with an impossibility, would have married her. Still, the most phlegmatic of men are liable to kick over the traces once in a way, and Mr. Norris is not without justification: he probably does not wish us to regard his hero with especial favour; he is true to his type and that is enough. In fact, all the characters, especially Peggy Rowley, are excellent "flesh and blood," save perhaps the Countess herself, who is scarcely a workable abstraction. Her somewhat melodramatic lover, the Marchese di Leonforte, is not exactly untrue to life, but he is drawn with a sufficiently hard pencil. It is refreshing to read a novel which demonstrates that a close friendship between men and women, separated from their spouses and persons of the other sex, need not necessarily imply that the seventh commandment is being broken. Why Mr. Norris should assert that a man would find the possession of "curly hair" a passport to general favour, it is difficult to divine, and so admirable a writer should be above the use of the expressions "lethal weapon," "opined," and "later on"; nor should he help to perpetuate the common misuse of the word "restive," which clearly means obstinate, not impatient. If a casual reader were to open volume ii. of this novel at pp. 194-5 he would take from them a very unfair impression of Mr. Norris's style. The author was evidently tired when he penned those pages. As a whole, the book is decidedly well written, while it is undeniably interesting. It is bright and wholesome: the work in fact of a gentleman and a man who knows the world about which he writes, though the types portrayed are too commonplace and devoid of psychological subtlety to excite enthusiasm or to keep alive speculation.

Mr. Edward King's story throws a lurid light upon the ways and the manners of the "sweater" and the "sweated" of New York. We know, unfortunately, from collateral sources that his picture of the misery of the poor creatures upon whose labour contractors batten is not in any essential overcoloured. It is a pitiable tale of greed and oppression, and turns to foolishness the proud boast of the American that his land is the home of freedom. But we cannot cast our eyes to heaven or smite our breasts. We have only to look at home here in London to find the same heartrending conditions. The tale, which is really excellent journalistic work of the descriptive order rather than fiction, has power, and it has interest; though about half way through the book the author, as if to make amends for not giving us an original creation resulting from observation and inquiry, drops his more legitimate methods of keeping alive our interest, and drifts into melodrama. The critical reader will experience a diminution of interest at those very points where the most exciting incidents are introduced. Nevertheless, Joseph Zalmonah is a book to read. It has freshness, it has sincerity. Although lacking in high artistic excellence, the author has studied his types and his subject with a single-mindedness worthy of M. Zola.

It would be unjust to approach Mr. B. L. Farjeon's absorbingly interesting tale as one would approach an effort in fiction which aspired to be a serious study of life. To do this would be to reject it offhand. Still, I think we may at least ask from the writer of an impossible story, when he is dealing with the commonplace, the obvious, and the ordinary, that he should be careful not to offend the unities. We concede to him his apparitions: they belong to the powder and sawdust of his craft; therefore, when he is on terra firma he should be the more careful not to wound our self-love as reasoning beings. Mr. Farjeon does not sin overmuch in this way, but he too often tries our patience. Fantastic as the tale is, it reminds us that vice and crime do leave their impress, and serve as danger signals to the pure in heart, though, of course, these are not signs and portents of so obvious a nature as those which lead Dick Emery to the discovery of a villainous crime. Mr. Farjeon's ingenuity shows some signs of flagging toward the conclusion of the book; but this is a common, not to say inevitable, infirmity with writers of this description. It must not blind us to the fact that we have here a decidedly clever and entertaining bogie story.

The vogue which in recent years Mr. Rudyard Kipling's tales of Indian life have enjoyed has somewhat thrown into the shade the conspicuous merits of an earlier worker in the same fields. The volume entitled To Let contains eight tales. Each is well worth reading. Six of them are flavoured with a touch of supernaturalism; but they all throw light, in an agreeable way, upon Indian life. Mrs. Croker's style is easy and pleasing, and she writes out of the fulness of her knowledge. It is somewhat remarkable that the leading motive of To Let is similar to that of The Last Tenant. In both cases a house is let remarkably cheaply, and both houses prove to be uncanny places to live in; while in the next tale, "Mrs. Raymond," the interest turns on the subjugation of a woman's will and spirit by means of a subtle drug, which is the second important feature of Mr. Farjeon's novel. A strange coincidence, nothing more.

The first impulse to dismiss From Morn to Eve curtly as "food for babes" must be suppressed, for the critic should be just, above all things; and despite his strong abhorrence of the practice, he must remember that a good many excellent persons like fiction which is merely a thinly disguised evangelical treatise. And if Mrs. Humphry Ward, Count Tolstoi, and the rest can run opposition views, why should not Miss Darnford be permitted a similar licence? We must remember, too, in making comparisons that this well-intentioned writer labours under the disadvantage of dealing with a threadbare theme. Fred. Morgan is simply a cowardly cur, but the "common or garden" seducer can scarcely, one would think, find his way so alluringly simple. It must be confessed that, apart from good intention, there is scant performance. The "business" is as hackneyed as could be. The book might have been picked out of a heap of novels stowed away in some garret, the neglected legacy of a pious grandmother. Young women are not accustomed, in our experience, to soothe the feelings of the men they have rejected in matrimony by kissing their hands. Men do not wear gloves when they are in flannels, and it is not proper to write or speak of "the Rev. Howard," or "the Rev. Hughes"; moreover, the use of the words "opined" and "predicament" is not to be encouraged.

Miss Helen Mathers has given us another of her bright, entertaining tales, and one which, although it is not above criticism as to its details, succeeds as a whole in being convincing. It is refreshing to find in fiction a French gentleman who can love a married woman without attempting to seduce her from her duty. This is all the more to be welcomed in that the conduct of the husband makes it extremely difficult for his sometime rival to persevere in the path of chivalry and honour. Terence Fitzgerald does not behave exactly as a gentleman should; but all his doings are of a somewhat dubious and unexplained character. The tale is weak at this juncture. Miss Mathers need not print "wilted," an excellent English word, in inverted commas; but if she chooses to use the phrase "a large order" on her own responsibility, it would be as well to give it in that manner: it would be better still not to use it at all.

Warm acknowledgments are due to the publisher and translator of this collection of Giovanni Verga's tales of Sicilian peasant life. It is unfortunate that the story which gives its title to the volume, "Cavalleria Rusticana," should have been placed at the beginning of the book, though of course the popularity of the opera founded upon it is sufficient reason. Nevertheless, this is a poor tale; in its translated form it has little or no point. "Red-Headed Malpelo," the story following, is quite another affair. This is a powerfully written description of life in the sand mines of Montserrat and Carvana. Malpelo (ill-conditioned) worked there. Buffeted and treated as a beast of burthen by his fellow-workers, his callous, phlegmatic temperament becomes hardened into a well-nigh fiendish cynicism. There is in him, nevertheless, a weak spot of amiability. This is an uncompromisingly truthful story of life and character. So indeed is "Gramigna's Mistress," which is even more artistic. "The Mystery" recalls Boccaccio, but the motive is slightly involved. In "Nedda," Verga reaches high water mark. The tale is conceived in the spirit of that understanding love of humanity with which Thomas Hardy has familiarised English readers. Nedda's miseries in the olive orchards are an echo of Tess Durbeyfield's sufferings in the turnip fields, though as a matter of chronology the statement should be reversed. We are reminded of Bastien Le Page, of Jean François, and of Verga's own countryman Segantini in that painter's earlier method. Vivid, vital: strong in its reticence, intense in its compression, it is pathetic in its reality and real in its pathos. In short, "Nedda" is a great work of art.

JAS. STANLEY LITTLE.

SOME BOOKS ON THE COLONIES.

The Australians. A Social Sketch. By Francis Adams. (Fisher Unwin.) The larger part of this book consists of reprints of several articles originally contributed to the Fortnightly Review. These articles as they first appeared with the interval of a month between each doubtless seemed smart, piquant, and amusing; but when read together they will be found to run down the Australians, their country, and their institutions to an extent obviously unfair and one-sided. The writer's first object is to be brilliant, and truth is sacrificed to epigrammatic effect.

"The native Australians have in their underside the taint of cruelty. The vigorous Anglo-Saxon, with his profuse exclamations of wrath, is giving way to the new exemplar of a suppressed viciousness twice as dangerous. . . . Educated in a secular manner, even in the denominational grammar schools, our new world youth is a pure positivist and materialist. Religion seems to him, at best, a social affair, to whose inner appeal he is profoundly indifferent. . . . Jobbery—political or social, public and private—never had a dearer haunt than New South Wales. . . . To treat of 'culture' and 'society' in Australia, in the sense that one does of the greater European capitals, would be like treating of snakes in Iceland. Disinterested study is unknown. . . . The grammar schools and denominational colleges take boys no further than the lower fifth of the best English public schools. The universities are quite as much examining bodies as a national educator. History is identified with religion, and as such excluded from the 'curriculum,' so that the sense of the poetry of the past and the solidarity of the race is rapidly being lost to the young Australian. . . . Intellectual life, any more than spiritual life, then, there is little or none, and the social life suffers accordingly."

Thus Mr. Adams writes of the Australians. Their public men fare no better at his hands; he has bitter things to say against them, possibly deserved. Almost the only one for whom he has a good word is Sir Thomas McIlwraith, whose principal merit consists in that he deliberately commits himself to the anti-Chinese policy. The squatters, the selectors, and all concerned in the ownership or occupation of land come under Mr. Adams's lash. The land-grabber in Queensland and in South Australia, as in New Zealand, is, we are told, strangling the country. The suburban building societies are becoming big landlords.

"One needs to have seen the inner working of one of these societies to realise their extent; and the power they can put into the hands of their controllers in local and general politics places whole suburban quarters at the mercy of unscrupulous jobbers."

The climate, with its extreme character and savage alternations of droughts and deluges, is, he tells us, all in favour of big men and all against the small ones.

"Every depression enslaves multitudes and reserves only the few to profit by the ensuing boom. The winnings of the survivors are enormous, and the knowledge of this nerves people to endure anything if they can only manage to 'hang on.'"

If all this be so, surely it is for the public benefit that there should be large owners and men of capital who can stand bad seasons? The author's political opinions seem to verge on socialism, to judge from his attacks on capital and property. He can, however, now and then, see things in the same light as ordinary people do; for instance, when he blames the girls of Sydney and Brisbane for slaving in the shops for 10s. a week and finding themselves, rather than going into service at 14s. or 15s. a week with board and lodging. He can also be amusing, as when he says that, in the case of convicts making fortunes or rising to high positions, it was invariably discovered that they had been transported for snaring a hare or stealing a loaf of bread!

Letters from Queensland. By the "Times" Special Correspondent. (Macmillans.) We are glad to see again these excellent letters, which appeared in the Times in December, 1892, and in January and February of the present year. They make a small volume replete with information, valuable in itself and agreeably given. Many who read the letters as they first appeared will like to refresh their memories by a second perusal, and to those who have not yet seen them we gladly recommend them. The Special Correspondent brings out the size and, if we may use the expression, unwieldiness of Queensland in the paragraph which we quote:

"The portion of the continent which has fallen to Young Australia to develop within the present limits of Queensland is about three times the size of France, and is so distributed in shape that the distance from the capital to the farthest point is not far short of the distance between London and Gibraltar. With existing means of communication, the time which it takes to go from one to the other is only one day less than the time required for the journey from London to South Africa. There is a northern and a central as well as a southern line of rail; but the railways all run parallel to each other and at right angles to the coast, carrying each the traffic of the interior to its own port, with distances of several hundred miles between the lines. There is no overland connection; and in order to reach the northern part of the colony, it is necessary to take ship at Brisbane and go up the coast by sea."

This statement will go a long way to explain the Queensland separation question. The Special Correspondent divides his inquiries into three principal heads—the sugar industry, the mineral wealth, and pastoral Queensland, all well and thoroughly discussed. The first of these includes the vexed question of Kanaka and Chinese labour. Industrious as the Chinese are, it is found that, when they hire themselves out to work, they are not a very great deal cheaper than white men. With respect to emigration, the result of the correspondent's inquiries into the sugar industry is that it demands no exceptional ability. He recommends any healthy, industrious, and fairly intelligent man, whether the son of a gentleman or not, on coming out from England, to serve his apprenticeship by working, in the first instance, for wages until he has gained practical experience. Supposing he works as a labourer for £1 a week and his rations from the age of twenty up to the age of twenty-three, and then enters on a sugar farm on his own account, at the end of seven years more he ought to find himself in possession of a farm the crop on which is worth not much less than £1000 a year, with a good house, and £2000 at the bank.

Reminiscences of Australian Early Life. By A Pioneer. (Marsden.) The Pioneer was induced to try his fortune in Australia by reading a book published in 1838, entitled The Discovery of Port Philip, by Major Mitchell, Surveyor-General of New South Wales. He arrived at what is now the city of Melbourne in October 1840. It then consisted of hastily run-up modern shanties and slab buildings scattered about, with only two or three small brick buildings and one weather boarded hotel. The streets were marked out in blocks, but were covered with stumps of trees and grass; and where the Government Buildings, Gaol, and Houses of Parliament now stand was then all forest and scrubland, on which were encamped a large tribe of blacks, who presently made an attack on the embryo town. A chance of making a large fortune came to our author, only to be lost almost immediately after landing. Land marked off in blocks for building was put up to auction. He bid £10 for a block of half an acre, then covered with stumps of trees, scrub, and rubbish, which was knocked down to him. Twelve months afterwards he resold it, at the same price, to a purchaser who held it for twelve years and then parted with it for £20,000. It is now worth £700 a foot. Even then it was not so easy to find employment. Most of the work was done by "lags," as the convicts were termed; and if they misbehaved or neglected their work, they were marched off to the nearest police station and flogged. When the Pioneer did get work, it was without wages on a station where the overseer was himself a "lag," and a very brutal one, tyrannising over the wretched men of his own class who were placed under him. We cannot follow the author through all his adventures, whether working as a servant to others or as owner of a run, or at the gold fields. The narrative extends from 1840 to 1853, when he returned home, apparently no richer than when he left. But he had gathered a good store of experience, and the materials for a book which, though written forty years later, will be found interesting, and which gives an excellent description of a state of things long passed away.

NOTES AND NEWS.

CAPTAIN LUGARD'S book, to be published immediately by Messrs. Blackwood, will be entitled The Rise of our East African Empire: an account of the beginnings of British influence in Uganda and Nyassaland, with suggestions for future administration and an examination of some African problems. There will be special chapters on the agricultural and commercial possibilities of the country, and also a personal narrative of sport and travel. The book will be in two large volumes, with seven maps and about 140 illustrations.

MESSRS. BLACKWOOD will likewise publish, in the course of October, The Life and Times of the Right Hon. William Henry Smith, M.P., written by Sir Herbert Maxwell. This also will be in two volumes, with photogravure portraits, and illustrations by Mr. Herbert Railton, Mr. G. L. Seymour, and others.

MR. WILLIAM HEINEMANN has in preparation a collection of letters by Samuel Taylor Coleridge, edited by Ernest Hartley Coleridge. Some of these have already been published in works which are now out of print, but by far the larger proportion have never appeared before, and are addressed, among others, to the following: Mrs. Coleridge, Southey, Wordsworth, the Rev. George Coleridge, John Thelwall, Thomas Poole, John Murray, and Charles Lamb. They are dated from 1785 to 1833, and throw much new light on the extraordinary character and life of the poet.

PROF. J. R. SEELEY has written a little book called Goethe reviewed after Sixty Years, which will be published by Messrs. Seeley & Co. There is also to be an edition on hand-made paper, limited to one hundred copies.

MR. JOHN MURRAY announces a new book by Dr. George Smith, the biographer of so many Indian missionaries. It will be called The Conversion of India, from Pantænus to the present day, 193-1893.

MESSRS. CHAPMAN & HALL have in the press a translation of Tonkin and Siam, by Prince Henri d'Orleans, with twenty-eight illustrations.

MR. W. A. CLOUSTON, whom we have known hitherto chiefly as an expert in tracking oriental folklore through its European disguises, has lately been engaged upon a no less recondite branch of bibliographical research. Attracted by the so-called "Hieroglyphic Bibles," which were so popular in this country less than a hundred years ago, he has set himself the task of following back this curious form of literature to its earliest sources. While the first English hieroglyphic Bible was published about 1780—with cuts possibly by Bewick—there is a German example that was printed at Augsburg in 1687; and Mr. Clouston has been fortunate enough to discover, in a private library in England, a Latin MS. of the fifteenth century, which may be regarded as a mediæval type of the same thing. In his book, which will be abundantly illustrated with facsimiles and woodcuts from original blocks, he traces the historical descent of Hieroglyphic Bibles from the Rebus and Emblemata, and gives an exhaustive bibliography of the subject. It will be published, in handsome quarto form, by Messrs. David Bryce & Son, of Glasgow, in an edition limited to five hundred copies.

MESSRS. BELL will publish next week two new volumes of poetry. The first is by the veteran writer, Mr. C. J. Reithmüller, and is entitled Early and Late Poems, being a selection from poems written at various periods of a long life. The other volume, entitled Footsteps of the Gods, and other Poems, is by Miss Elinor Sweetman, and the cover will have a design by Mr. Gleeson White.

MR. W. P. JAMES, who has contributed a number of papers on certain aspects of fiction to Macmillan's and Blackwood's, has collected some of them into a volume, which Messrs. Elkin Mathews & John Lane will shortly issue under the title of Romantic Professions. The volume will include, besides the title essay, papers headed "The Nemesis of Sentimentalism," "The Historical Novel," "Romance and Youth," "On the Naming of Novels," "The Poet as Historian," "Names in Novels," and "The Great Work."

MR. KENNETH GRAHAM's contributions to the National Observer and other papers are also about to be issued by the same publishers, under the title of Pagan Papers, with a title-page designed by Mr. Aubrey Beardsley.

MESSRS. HODDER & STOUGHTON will publish immediately, under the title of Scotland Yesterday, a volume of sketches of character in a Scottish village and country town, by Mr. William Wallace.

MR. ELLIOT STOCK announces for immediate publication a translation of The Book-hunter in Paris, by M. Octave Uzanne. It will contain 144 characteristic sketches, interspersed in the text, and a preface by the author of "Obiter Dicta."

MR. WILLIAM HEINEMANN will publish in October an English translation of a new work by Count Lyof Tolstoy, entitled The Kingdom of God. He will also issue a small Russian edition, in order to secure copyright.

BESIDES revising his work on the Government of India for a new edition, General Sir George Chesney has found time to write a three-volume novel, which will be published next month by Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co. under the title of The Lesters: a Capitalist's Labour.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. will publish next week, in three volumes, the novel by Mrs. F. A. Steel, entitled "Miss Stuart's Legacy," which has been running through the pages of their magazine.

MESSRS. W. H. ALLEN & Co. will publish in October a novel, in three volumes, entitled Alice of the Inn, by Mr. J. W. Sherer, who attempts a solution of the following social problem: "What should a girl—brought up in one station of life, who finds she was born in a higher—do with a lover of her first condition?"

MESSRS. SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & Co. will publish immediately, as the first volume in their cheap edition of Mr. W. Clark Russell's novels, The Wreck of the "Grosvenor", with a photogravure portrait of the author for frontispiece, showing him at the age of seventeen, when in the merchant service.

THIS autumn will bring an abridgment of Mr. J. A. Symonds's great work on the Renaissance in Italy, made by Lieut. Col. Alfred Pearson; and a new edition of his Essays, Speculative and Suggestive. We hear that a selection from his letters may also be expected later on.

MESSRS. FREDERICK WARNE & Co. will shortly issue a popular history of England and the British Empire, by the Rev. Edgar Sanderson. It will be a record of events, political, constitutional, naval, military, and literary, from B.C. 55 to A.D. 1890. It will also include sixteen maps printed in colours, showing the empire in its various stages.

MESSRS. BELL will add to "Bohn's Classical Library" a new prose translation of Sophocles by Mr. E. P. Coleridge, who is already responsible for the new version of Euripides and for Apollonius Rhodius in the same series.

A NEW edition of Miss Swanwick's translation of Goethe's Faust, Part I., will be published next week by Messrs. Bell. The translation has been revised throughout, and the lyrical passages especially have been improved. The book will be illustrated with twenty-nine drawings by Retzsch, the steel plates of which are in the possession of the publisher.

IN order to preserve so far as possible the national character of "The New Irish Library," the volumes are printed in Dublin and the paper used is of Irish manufacture.

IT seems worthy of note that Mr. R. L. Stevenson's Catriona is published in America, by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, as "David Balfour," the title which it bore on its first appearance in a magazine.

THE Elizabethan Society will resume its monthly meetings on Wednesday next, October 4, when Mr. Frederick Rogers will read a paper on "John Stow and Elizabethan London." The following are among the papers to be read during the forthcoming session: "Shakspeare's Measure for Measure," by Mr. William Peol; "Sir Philip Sidney's Defence of Poetry, and Elizabethan Conceptions of Art in general," by Mr. Lionel Johnson; "William Browne, of Tavistock," by Mr. A. H. Bullen; "John Donne," by Mr. Edmund Gosse; "John Cleveland," by Mr. Richard Le Gallienne; "New Facts about Marlowe," by Mr. Sidney Lee; and "The Elizabethan Sonneteers," by Mr. James Ernest Baker.

MR. FREDERIC HARRISON will deliver a course of twelve lectures on "The Positivist Creed: Religious, Scientific, Social," at Newton Hall, Fetter-lane, on Sundays during October and November, at 7 p.m.

THE FORTHCOMING MAGAZINES.

THE October number of the North American Review, the English edition of which is to be published in future by Mr. William Heinemann, will contain the following articles, among others: "Can Europe afford her Armies?" by Sir Charles Dilke; "The Battle Ship of the Future," by Admiral Colomb; "British Women and Local Government," by the Earl of Meath; "Fashionable Life and Physical Deterioration," by Dr. Cyrus Edson; "Two Dramatic Revolutions," by Mr. Clement Scott; and "The Latest Aspects of Imperial Federation," by the Marquis of Lorne.

Wide Awake was formerly a household word among children. This magazine, however, has now been absorbed in St. Nicholas, which henceforth will cater for the readers of both magazines, as well as of four others that have been merged in the past. In 1894 St. Nicholas will celebrate its coming of age, and, among other attractions, has secured the services of Mark Twain and Mr. Rudyard Kipling. The former will continue his diverting book "Tom Sawyer," by narrating the continental adventures of that hero. "Tom Sawyer Abroad," as the new story is called, will have numerous illustrations, drawn "on the spot." Mr. Rudyard Kipling's contribution will be several short stories of "India and the Jungle." The first, entitled "Rikki-Tikki-Tavi," will appear in November, while the Christmas number will contain one of Mr. Kipling's very best elephant stories. The usual favourite writers of St. Nicholas will also be in the field; and among those who will contribute in 1894 are Mr. Frank R. Stockton, Mr. George W. Cable, the author of "Hans Brinker," Mrs. Kate Douglas Wiggin, and Mrs. Coolidge.

"AN Early Aspirant to the German Imperial Crown" is the title of an article by Dr. Karl Blind, which will appear in the October number of the Contemporary Review. It gives a sketch (with some personal reminiscences) of the German Revolution of 1848-49, and of the later popular movement in the sixties, when the late Duke Ernst of Saxe-Coburg came prominently to the front.

THE Reliquary for October will contain the first of a series of articles on "The Cathedral Churches of Sweden" (I., Linköping), by T. M. Fallow; also, "The Brass of John Moore, 1532, at Sibstone, Leicestershire," by Bishop Mitchinson; "Talismans," II., by Mr. J. Lewis André; "Old English Pewter," IV.

A SERIAL story, entitled "The Monk of Mar-Saba," by Mr. Joseph Hooking, will commence next week in the new volume of the Christian Commonwealth.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

THIS SUMMER NIGHT.

This summer night the skies are clear
And voiceless is the atmosphere,
The leaves hang motionless as lead,
The flowers are rigid as the dead,
There broods o'er earth an unnamed fear.

Like fallen planets now appear
The distant lights, that seem so near,
Through far-off streets of Plymouth spread,
This summer night.

No human sounds there are to cheer,
The only stir that greets the ear
Is a faint murmur overhead,
As if God moved with stealthy tread
Because the hour of doom is near,

This summer night.

PERCY ADDLESHAW.

Antony, Cornwall.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE September number of the Economic Journal (Macmillan) is full of "actuality," though we do not think that any one of the articles is by itself very important. First, we have a report of the annual meeting of the British Economic Association, including Mr. Goetchen's address on "Ethics and Economics" and the discussion that followed. Mr. W. E. Bear begins an examination of the agricultural problem, but adds nothing new, except a protest against speculation, which can no more depress the price of wheat than it can that of Consols. Mr. Clem. Edwards has a second paper on "Labour Federation," giving an historical sketch of previous attempts to combine trades unions on a large scale. Mr. Dana Horton's article, entitled "The Suspended Rupee and the Policy of Contraction," is to us unintelligible. But there are some valuable notes and memoranda on the Indian currency question. Here again, however, we feel a difficulty. Mr. F. C. Harrison, whose study of the rupee has been more than once commended in the ACADEMY, writes (over his own initials) that "there is little uncoined silver in India" (p. 515). Elsewhere (p. 554), the result of his evidence before Lord Herschell's Committee is thus summarised:

"Utilising such statistics as can be found for imports (less by exports) of silver into India since the discovery of America, making a conjecture for the stock existing in America [India] before 1493, and an allowance for yearly waste, he [Mr. F. C. Harrison] estimates that the silver now in India amounts to the equivalent of 510 crores. Of this quantity, he finds, by the calculation given in former numbers of the Economic Journal, that about 155 crores may be said to be in circulation."

Finally, we may mention two notable contributions by foreign correspondents. Prof. H. B. Greven, of Leyden, explains the scheme of a graduated property tax which is under consideration in Holland; and M. E. Castelot, of Paris, describes the consequences of the tariff-war between France and Switzerland.

THE COMING PUBLISHING SEASON.

MESSRS. W. H. ALLEN & Co.'s ANNOUNCEMENTS.

"The Book of Good Counsels," from the Sanscrit of the Hitopadesa, by Sir Edwin Arnold, with illustrations by Gordon Browne, an edition limited to 100 copies will be printed on large paper; "India's Princes," Short Life Sketches of the Native Rulers of India, by Mrs. Griffith, with 22 portraits and other illustrations; "Portuguese Discoveries, Annexations, and Missions in Asia and Africa," by the Rev. A. J. D. D'Orsey, with maps; "History of India, from the Earliest Times to the Present Day," for the use of students and colleges, in 2 vols., by H. G. Keene, with maps; "Alice of the Inn," a novel, in 3 vols., by J. W. Sherer; "The French in India," by Col. G. B. Malletson, new and revised edition; "Our Reptiles and Batrachians," a plain and easy account of the lizards, snakes, newts, toads, frogs, and tortoises indigenous to Great Britain, by Dr. M. C. Cooke, with coloured pictures of every species, and numerous woodcuts, new and revised edition; "An Oriental Biographical Dictionary," founded on materials collected by the late Thomas William Beale, by Henry George Keene, new edition, revised and enlarged; "Here and There in Italy and over the Border," by Signora Linda Villari; "Maid in a Market Garden," by Clo. Graves; "In the Shadow of the Pagoda," by E. D. Cuming, illustrated; "Through Turkish Arabia," by H. Swainson Cowper, illustrated; "The Best of Her Sex," a novel, in 2 vols., by Fergus Hume; "Modern Tactics," by Capt. H. R. Gall, new edition, revised to date; "The Naturalist's Library," each section rewritten by well-known naturalists, in 20 vols., with coloured plates, edited by R. Bowdler Sharpe; "Famous Women of the Nineteenth Century," by G. Barnett Smith; "Heroes of Industry," by G. Barnett Smith; "The Harlequin Opal," a romance, by Fergus Hume, new edition; "The Syntax and Exercises of Hindustani," or progressive exercises in translations, with notes, directions, and vocabulary, by M. Kempson, new edition, revised; "Short Readings from Great Writers," by J. C. Wright; "Dunstan's Manual of Music," revised and corrected in accordance with the latest requirements of the Education Department, eleventh edition; "Where Glory Calls," with coloured illustrations by R. Simpkin; "An American Monte Cristo," a romance, by Julian Hawthorne, new edition; "The Private Life of an Eminent Politician," translated from the French of Edouard Rod, new edition; "Handbook of British Hepaticæ," containing descriptions and figures of the indigenous species of Marchantia, Jungermannia, Riccia, and Anthoceros, by Dr. M. C. Cooke; "The Flowering Plants of Western India," by the Rev. Alexander Kyd Nairne, late Bombay Civil Service; "The Shadrach and Other Stories," by Frank R. Stockton; "A Volume of Short Stories," by Mrs. Clifford, Gilbert Parker, Frank R. Stockton, H. D. Traill, D. S. Meldrum, and others; "The India List, Civil and Military," issued by permission of the Secretary of State for India in Council, January, 1894; "Calendar of the Royal Indian Engineering College, Cooper's Hill, 1893-4," published by authority.

MESSRS. METHUEN'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

"The Speeches and Public Addresses of the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, M.P.," with notes, edited by A. W. Hutton and H. J. Cohen, with portraits, Vol. IX.; "A Book of English Prose," collected by W. E. Henley and Charles Whibley, also limited editions on Dutch and Japanese paper; "English Lyrics," edited by W. E. Henley, also a limited issue on hand-made paper, and a small issue on finest large Japanese paper; "English Poetry from Blake to Browning," by W. M. Dixon; "Cambridge Sermons," edited by C. H. Prior, a volume of sermons preached before the University of Cambridge by various preachers, including the Archbishop of Canterbury and Bishop Westcott; "Guelphs and Ghibellines," a short history of Mediaeval Italy, A.D. 1250-1409, by Oscar Browning; "The Story of Ireland," by Standish O'Grady; "The Magic Horse and other Verses," by Duncan C. Scott; "Lucian," six dialogues (Nigrinus, Icaro-Menippus, Cock, Ship, Parasite, Law of Falsehood), translated into English by S. T. Irwin; "Sophocles," Electra and Ajax, translated into English by E. D. A. Morshead.

Fiction.—"Barabbas: A Dream of the World's Tragedy," by Marie Corelli, in 3 vols.; "Cheap Jack Zita, a Romance of the Fen District in 1815," by S. Baring Gould, in 3 vols.; "The Star Gazers," by G. Manville Fenn, in 3 vols.; "A Woman of Forty," by Esmé Stuart, in 3 vols.; "The Translation of a Savage," by Gilbert Parker; "The Stone Dragon," by Murray Gilchrist; New editions: "Mrs. Curgenven of Curgenven," by S. Baring Gould; "Mrs. Falchion," by Gilbert Parker; "His Grace," by W. E. Norris; "Jaco Treloar," by J. H. Pearce; "Time and the Woman," by Richard Pryce; "A Vicar's Wife," by Evelyn Dickenson; "The Poison of Asps," by R. Orton Prowse; "The Icelandic's Sword," by S. Baring Gould, with twenty-nine illustrations by J. Moyr Smith; "Two Little Children and Ching," by Edith E. Cuthell; "Toddleben's Hero," by M. M. Blake, with thirty-six illustrations.

University Extension Series.—"Electrical Science," by George J. Burch, with illustrations; "The Chemistry of Fire," by M. M. Pattison Muir; "Agricultural Botany," by M. C. Potter; "The Vault of Heaven," a popular introduction to astronomy, by R. A. Gregory; "Meteorology: The Elements of Weather and Climate," by H. N. Dickinson.

Social Questions of to-day.—"Women's Work," by Lady Dilke, Miss Bulley, and Miss Abraham; "Trusts, Pools, and Corners, as affecting Commerce and Industry," by J. Stephen Jeans.

Educational.—"Taciti Germania," edited with Notes and Introduction, by R. F. Davis; "Greek Testament Selections," "A Shorter Greek Primer of Accidence and Syntax," "Steps to French," and "The Helvetian War," all edited by A. M. M. Stedman.

Commercial Series.—"British Commerce and Colonies from Elizabeth to Victoria," by H. De B. Gibbins; "A Manual of French Commercial Correspondence," by S. E. Bally; "Commercial Geography," with special reference to Trade Routes, New Markets, and Manufacturing Districts," by L. D. Lyde.

Simplified Classics.—"Herodotus: The Persian Wars," edited by A. G. Liddell; "Plautus: The Menæchmi," edited by J. H. Freese; "Livy: The Kings of Rome," edited by A. M. M. Stedman.

MESSRS. FREDERICK WARNE & Co.'s ANNOUNCEMENTS.

"The Royal Natural History," edited by Richard Lydekker, with preface by P. L. Slater, illustrated with seventy-two coloured plates, and upwards of sixteen hundred wood engravings by W. Kuhnert, J. Wolf, T. Specht, Gambier Bolton, P. J. Smit, &c., to be issued in monthly parts, beginning in October; Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett's new volume, "The One I knew Best of All: A Memory of the Mind of a Child," illustrated with fifty sketches by Reginald B. Birch; an illustrated edition of "That Lass o' Lowrie's," by the same author, from designs by F. Brangwyn; a new volume in the "Standard Pictorial Library," entitled "Palestine: Past and Present, Pictorial and Descriptive," by Mrs. L. Valentine, with 140 engravings and coloured plates; a choice edition of "The Adventures of Don Quixote," with 100 engravings from designs by Houghton; a new pocket edition of Shakspeare's Works in 6 vols., printed on the finest india paper; "Ivanda: a Tale of Thibet," by Capt. Claude Bray, illustrated; a new edition, in 2 vols., of John Kitto's "Illustrated Family Bible," with notes by J. Kitto, and introductions to the various Books by Canon Birks, illustrated with wood-engravings and steel plates after the old masters; "Picturesque England: Its Landmarks and Historic Haunts, as described in Lay, Legend, Song, and Story," edited by Mrs. L. Valentine, with upwards of 140 woodcuts and ten photogravure plates; "One in Charity," by Mr. Joseph Hooking, illustrated; in the "Tavistock Library," a new novel by Mrs. Martyn entitled "A Liberal Education," and "The Opinions of a Philosopher," by Robert Grant; and in the One-volume Copyright Novel series, Mrs. J. H. Needell's "Julian Karslake's Secret"; additions to the "Crown Library": "Rienzi" and "Rob Roy"; Prof. Hoffmann's companion volume to "Tricks with Cards," entitled "Puzzles Old and New," with upwards of 250 diagrams showing and explaining puzzles of all descriptions; "The Century Reciter," humorous, serious, and dramatic selections, edited by Mr. H. Savile Clarke; popular editions of Mr. Panmure Gordon's "The Land of the Almighty Dollar," with sixty illustrations, by Irving Montagu; and "The Coming of Father Christmas," by E. F. Manning, with coloured illustrations; in the "Star Series," "At the Mercy of Tiberius" and "Beulah," by Augusta Evans Wilson; and "The Gayworthys," by Mrs. Whitney.

Juvenile.—"A Day with the Sea Urchins," by Helen M. Burnside, with illustrations by Alfred W. Cooper, and songs set to music by Myles Birket Foster; "Bible Stories in Simple Language for Little Children," by Mrs. L. Valentine, with numerous wood engravings; "Godfrey Malden: or the Squire's Grandsons," by Mr. J. F. B. Firth, in the "Favourite Library"; and "Harry Raymond," by Commander L. Cameron; "Ronald Halifax," by Arthur Lee Knight; "We Three Boys," by Mrs. L. Valentine, and "Burnham Breaker," by Homer Greene, in the "Adventure Library"; "Deb," by Miss M. Keary, in the "Welcome Library": "Happy Families," with humorous coloured illustrations after designs by Alfred J. Johnson; "Father Christmas A.B.C." by the same artist; "Our Animal Picture Book," with large coloured pictures; "Dicky Birds A.B.C.," "Animals, Tame and Wild," "Tom, Tom was a Piper's Son," all illustrated, the last-named from designs by William Foster. Two new volumes will be added to their "Playtime Toys"; and to their series of "Painting Books," "Golden Days," "Peter Piper's Painting Book," and "Little Folks Painting Book."

MESSRS. DIGBY, LONG & Co.'s ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Fiction.—"Upper Bohemians," by Frederick G. Walpole; "Maria, Countess of Saletto," from the Italian of E. Arbib, by Enrica Rankin; "Marianela," from the Spanish of B. Perez Galdos, by Mary Wharton; "The Bridal March," from the Norwegian of Björnson, and "The Watch," an Old Man's Story, from the Russian of Ivan Turgeneff, by J. Evan Williams; "Zorg," a Story of New Guinea, by Vernon Kirk; "What Happened at Morwyn," by Maria A. Hoyer; "Irish Rebels," by Alexander McArthur; "The Old House of Rayner," and "How to Read in the Long," by Grimley Hill; "Our Ghosts," twenty-one short stories, by Edmund Leigh; "Dr. Weedon's Waif," by Kate Somers, with illustrations by Matthew Stretch; "A Stock Exchange Romance," by Bracebridge Hemming; "A Dream and a Forgetting," by Mrs. Kaye; "Come Back from the Dead," by Christopher Howard; "Short Stories for Long Journeys," by Bridget Sunwell; "Why I Killed Him," by W. H. Smith-Byron, with illustrations by Matthew Stretch.

Biography.—"Three Emperors—Josephine, Marie-Louise, Eugénie," by Caroline Gearey, with portraits; "Sixty Years' Experience as an Irish Landlord," memoirs of John Hamilton, of St. Ernan's, Donegal, with introduction by the Rev. H. C. White, and portrait.

Theological.—"Creation—its Law and Religion," by Henry Felton; "Stepping Stones to Life," by the Rev. J. George Gibson.

Poetry.—"Some Translations from Charles Baudelaire, Poet and Symbolist," by H. C., with portrait; "An Illusive Quest, and Other Poems," by Hollis Freeman; "Gleanings from Thoughtland," by S. Hannan; "The Feast of Cotyto, and Other Poems," by Charles T. Lusted.

MESSRS. HENRY & Co.'s ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Fiction.—"A Bundle of Life," by John Oliver Hobbes; "The Kindness of the Celestial," by Barry Pain; "The Mahatma's Pupil," by Richard Marsh; "Declined with Thanks," by Ernest Mulliner; "Phil Hathaway's Failures," by George Halse, in 3 vols.; "Illusion," by Louis Couperus; "In the Green Park," by F. Norreys Connell, illustrated by F. H. Townsend.

Miscellaneous.—"The Pentamerone, or the Tale of Tales," a translation from the Neapolitan by the late Sir Richard Burton; "The History of the Violin," by Horace Petherick, president of the Cremona Society, with plates of the most famous instruments; "The Functions of Government," by G. P. Macdonell; "Allan's Wife," a dramatic study in three scenes, with an introduction by William Archer; "The Gentlewoman's Book of Dress," by Mrs. Douglas.

MESSRS. BLISS, SANDS & FOSTER'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

"A Life Awry," a novel in 3 volumes by Percival Pickering; "Dr. Grey's Patient," a novel in 3 volumes, by Mrs. G. S. Reaney; in the "Modern Library": "A Latter Day Romance," by Mrs. Murray Hickson; "The World's Pleasures," by Clara Savile Clarke; a new edition of "The Art of Pluck," by Scriblerus Redivivus (Edward Caswall); the following children's books, in the Story Book Series: "Stella," by Mrs. G. S. Reaney, illustrated by W. F. Whitehead; "My Aunt Constantia Jane," by Mary E. Hullah, illustrated by W. F. Whitehead; new editions of "Little Glory's Mission," and "Not Alone in the World," by Mrs. G. S. Reaney, illustrated by L. Caldecott; "Hans and His Friend, and other Stories," by Mary E. Hullah, illustrated by W. F. Whitehead; also "Nursery Lyrics," by Mrs. Richard Strachey, illustrated by G. P. Jacob Hood; and a new edition of "The Adventures of Prince Almers," by Wilhelmina Pickering, illustrated by Margaret Hooper; and "Somersetshire: Highways, Byways, and Waterways," written and illustrated, with over one hundred and twenty pen and ink sketches, and four copperplates, by C. R. B. Barrett; and also a large-paper edition, with six copperplates and India-proofs of the illustrations.

MESSRS. GAY & BIRD'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

"Polly Oliver's Problem," a book for girls, by Mrs. Wiggins, and new editions of "The Birds' Christmas Carol," "The Story of Paty," "Summer in a Canon," "The Story Hour," by the same author; "Essays in Idleness," and "Books and Men," by Agnes Repplier; "A Japanese Interior," by Alice Bacon; "The Queen of the Adriatic: Venice, Past and Present," illustrated, by Clara Erskine Clement; "Paving the Way: a Romance of the Australian Bush," by S. Newland; "For Good or Evil," by Gilberta M. F. Lyon, in 2 vols.; "The Last American," and "Life's Fairy Tales," by Mitchell; "Jerusalem," by G. Robinson Lees, with introduction by Bishop Blyth, of Jerusalem; "The Builders of American Literature," being biographical sketches of American authors born previous to 1826, by F. H. Underwood, first series; "Dramatic Notes, 1892," by Cecil Howard; "A Christmas Story," by Mother Goose, with coloured illustrations; "Twelve Packs of Hounds," by John Charlton, cheap edition, with coloured illustrations; "Caprices," by Theodore Wrattialla, edition limited to 100 copies and 25 on Japanese vellum.

SELECTED FOREIGN BOOKS.

GENERAL LITERATURE.

- DUBOC, J. Hundert Jahre Zeitgeist in Deutschland. 2 Thl. Leipzig: Wigand. 4 M.
FRANKENSTEIN, K. Die Arbeiterfrage in der deutschen Landwirtschaft. Berlin: Oppenheim. 6 M.
KIESERWETTER, G. Faust in der Geschichte u. Tradition. Leipzig: Spohr. 10 M.
LE FEYRE-DEUMIER, Jules. Célébrités allemandes: Essai bibliographique et littéraire. Paris: Firmin-Didot. 5 fr.
MARCKLE, E. Beiträge zu Umland (Jugendbildung). Tübingen: Fues. 2 M.
SKENE, A. v. Entstehung u. Entwicklung der slavisch-nationalen Bewegung in Böhmen u. Mähren im 19. Jahrh. Wien: Koenig. 8 M.
STAMMAMMER, J. Bibliographie des Socialismus u. Communismus. Jena: Fischer. 10 M.
STOURM, René. Systèmes généraux d'impôts. Paris: Guillaumin. 7 fr.

THEOLOGY, ETC.

- ROHRICH, A. Die Seelenlehre des Arnobius, nach ihren Quellen u. ihrer Entstehg. untersucht. Hamburg. 1 M. 60 Pf.

HISTORY.

- ARAGON, le Marquis d'. Le Prince Charles de Nassau-Siegen, d'après sa correspondance inédite (de 1784 à 1793). Paris: Plon. 7 fr. 50 c.
BRUCH, J. Griechische Geschichte. 1. Bd. Bis auf die sophistische Bewegung u. den peloponnesischen Krieg. Straßburg: Trübner. 7 M. 50 Pf.
DECKERT, J. Vier Tiroler Kinder, Opfer des chandischen Fanatismus. Urkundlich dargestellt. Wien: Lesk. 2 M. 40 Pf.
JOURNÉ, Moreau de. Aventures de guerre au temps de la République et du Consulat. Paris: Guillaumin. 7 fr. 50 c.
JOBS, P. Die Reichspolitik Kaiser Justiniana. Gießen: C. Münchow. 1 M.
KOSER, R. König Friedrich der Grosse. 1. Bd. Stuttgart: Cotta. 8 M.
PIPER, F. Die Reformierten u. die Mennoniten Altona. Altona: Harder. 2 M.
SCHMIDT, A. B. Die geschichtlichen Grundlagen des bürgerlichen Rechts im Grossherzogth. Hessen. 4 M. 60 Pf.

PHYSICAL SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

- ALBERTUS MAGNUS. Orationes super IV. libros sententiarum, ed. N. Thomeas. Berlin: Homborg. 1 M.
BARTELS, M. Die Medizin der Naturvölker. Ethnologische Beiträge zur Urgeschichte der Medicin. Leipzig: Grieben. 9 M.
DELLIN, C. Ueb. zwei ebene Punktsysteme, die algebraisch auf einander bezogen sind. Lund: Möller. 1 M. 60 Pf.
FLEISCHMANN, A. Embryologische Untersuchungen. 3 Hft. Wiesbaden: Kreidel. 21 M.
KEYSERLING, Graf E. Die Spinnen Amerikas. Epeiridae. Bresl. v. G. Marx. 4. Bd. 2. Hälfte. Nürnberg: Bauer. 85 M.
LEPSIUS, E. Geologie v. Attika. Berlin: Reimer. 54 M.
STUBHLMANN, F. Zoologische Ergebnisse e. in den J. 1896-1897 in die Küstengebiet v. Ost-Afrika unternommener Reise. 1. Bd. Berlin: Reimer. 21 M.

PHILOLOGY.

- ACKERMANN, A. Das hermeneutische Element der biblischen Accentuation. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der hebr. Sprache. Berlin: Calvary. 2 M. 50 Pf.
AESCHYLUS fabulae, ed. N. Wecklein. Vol. I. et II. aeternum. Berlin: Calvary. 8 M. 40 Pf.
DELBROCK, B. Vergleichende Syntax der indogermanischen Sprachen. 1. Thl. Straßburg: Trübner. 30 M.
HERNÉS, S. Syntax der Zahlwörter im Alten Testament. Lund: Möller. 4 M. 50 Pf.
SAUER, W. Mahābhārata u. Wate. Eine indogerman. Studie. Stuttgart: Wildt. 2 M.

CORRESPONDENCE.

CHILD-MARRIAGES IN ENGLAND IN THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY.

London: Sept. 16, 1893.

Few folk have any idea that in Elizabethan times the custom of child-marrriages prevailed in England, yet the dilapidated volume of Depositions in the Ecclesiastical Court of Chester, A.D. 1561-6, proves that these marriages must have been frequent in Cheshire and Lancashire; and no doubt other like records in the rest of our dioceses will, when looked up, establish the fact that such marriages were common all over England. The birth of a child in the Berkeley family, when the father and mother were each thirteen and a half years old, shows what was going on elsewhere a century earlier.

I spend my holidays in fresh work; and having completed the old-spelling text of Shakspeare's Comedies for Mr. William Morris's grand folio edition of the poet's works, I went to the Diocesan Registry at Chester, by the kind leave of Mr. John Gamon, the registrar, and asked for their earliest English documents. A big folio of Wills was handed me, and a tattered volume of Depositions. As the Cheshire antiquaries have printed many of their county wills, I turned to the Depositions, and, opening the volume at the back of leaf 12, found, to my great surprise, the answer of Elizabeth Hulse in a suit which she had brought against George Hulse for divorce, in which she said—

"that George Hulse and she were married together in the chappell of Knottisford . . . when she was but three or four yeres old; and "she was married to hym because her frendes thought she shuld have a lyvinge bie hym; but after the mariage, the said George was bounden prentise [to a shoemaker] in Congleton for the space of ten yeres; and after 10 yeres, the said George came to her mothers house; but . . . she could never fansie or cast favour to hym, nor never will do; and she saies they never dwelled together . . . and never had any carnall act together."

I at once set to work and copied from the volume for six or seven hours a day during the rest of my stay in the fine old city on the banks of the beautiful Dee—a river without a single lock in it, from source to sea; and only one weir, at Chester, to keep a good head of fresh-water always above the town! There are plenty of Depositions in this (1561-6) volume and elsewhere, in the Registry, in suits for divorces from these child-marrriages—one of a Bishop marrying his daughter of four to a boy rather older, in his own palace; but I take the youngest of them, in which a baby-girl of two was married to a baby-boy of three, each being carried in a friend's arms. The suit for divorce was brought in 1564 by John Somerford, gentleman, when between 15 and 16, against Jane Somerford, alias Brerton, between 14 and 15 years old. The first deponent is the husband's uncle, John Somerforth, of Asbury, aged 28; he says that—"he was present bie, when John Somerforth and Jane Brerton were married together in the parish church of Brerton about twelve yeres ago. . . . He saies that he carried the said John in his armes, beinge at tyme of the said Mariage about three yeres of age, and [the uncle] spake somme of the wordes of Matrimonye, that the said John, bierason of his yonge age, could not speke hym self, hldinge him in his armes all the while the wordes of Matrimonie were in speakinge. And one James Holford caried the said Jane in his armes, [she] beinge at the said tyme about ij. yeres of age, and spake all, or the most parte, of the wordes of matrimony for her; and so held her still in his armes."

The second deponent is John Holford, gentleman, of Davenham, and he says that the children were—

"then both Infants; the said John was holden in th' armes of one then present; and this Deponentes brother held the said Jane in his armes, scarce able to speake. And this Deponent thinkes the said Jane was spoken for. And further, he saies, 'it was the youngest Mariage that ever he was at.'"

In an amusing case of John against Anne Ballard, in 1569, the girl's age is not stated, but must have been about ten. She evidently liked the boy of twelve, and being of a "coming-on" disposition, gave him two apples to marry her; and married they were, about ten at night, in the parish church of Colne (Whalley, Lancashire) on Twelfth Night, 1560, by the then curate, Sir Richard Blakey, who was punished for the act by the Archbishop of York. James Hartley, of Clitheroe, deposes—

"that the same night he was in the house of Christopher Hartley, uncle to the said James [Ballard], and sawe when the said James was brought into the said house about Midnight by two fellowes, which (as this Deponent supposethe) had bene at the said Mariage. And in the morowe after, the said James [Ballard, the boy-husband] declarid unto his said Uncle, that the said Anne had intised hym with two apples to go with her to Colne, and to marry her; which wordes, or the like in effect, the said James spake then in the presence and hering of this Deponent. And further, he saies, that immediately after the said Mariage, videlicet, the Mornings after, he repentid the said Mariage, when he perceyvid what he had done; and ever sithence hath dissented from the same, and never remained in her [Anne's] company for any space."

These child-marrriages were valid till dissolved by regular suits for divorce, with depositions proving that the children had never consented to them, after their ages of consent,—boys 14; girls 12—had never kissed or loved one another, sent tokens, &c., or been to bed together. The bedding of the infants on the night of the wedding was of no account. John Andrewe, of twenty-three, in 1561, says that

"Ellin Dampart and he were married together under age, this deponent then bying about ten yeres old, and the said Ellin somewhat under eight. . . . beyng asked whether he ever lay with her, he answeris, that 'the first night they were married, they lay both in one bed; but two of her sisters lay betwene hym and her; and sins that tyme, he never lay with her.'"

Another child, Elizabeth Ramsbotham, married to an unwilling young boy, John Bridge, to carry out some property transaction, deposes that on the wedding night—

"the said John wold eate no meate at supper; and when it was bed tyme, the said John did wepe to go home. . . . yet nevertheless, bie his fathers intreating, and bie the persuasion of the priest, the said John did comme to bed to this Respondent far in the night; and then lay still till in the morning, in suche sort as this Deponent might take unkindnes with him; for he lay with his backe toward her all night."

Granting the non-consummation of the marriage, divorce, of course, followed. But no doubt most of the child-marrriages became real ones; the children were brought up together, and soon lived as husband and wife.

The depositions in the cases of trothplights, affliations, adulteries, libels, &c., give many interesting details of the life of the time; and if like documents exist in every bishop's registry throughout England, a mass of valuable material lies at hand for the social historian. The suits for tithes and about other Church matters will be useful too; and I trust that the local antiquaries in every cathedral town and county will soon put all these depositions into print.

About child-marrriages, Mr. J. P. Earwaker, of Pensarn, near Abergale, read a paper some eight or ten years ago, which was reported at the time in the Manchester Guardian, but did not reach most of us Londoners. He has since got more material together, and means, when he can find time, to print a subscription half-guinea volume on the subject. My own copies of the 1561-6 Depositions have already gone to press for the Early English Text Society, and will, I hope, be out by Christmas. They go right into the life of their time, and have greatly interested me.

F. J. FURNIVALL.

P.S.—An earlier volume of Depositions, 1544-8, has since been found at Chester; and Mr. Ferguson Irvine is copying from it the best bits, which he will edit for the Early English Text Society too.

THE GOSPEL OF PETER AND DIONYSIUS OF ALEXANDRIA.

Trinity College, Dublin: Sept. 25, 1893.

I find in a fragment of Dionysius of Alexandria printed in Migne's Pat. Graec. x. col. 1599 (from Mai's "Nova Bibliotheca," vi. i. 165), a passage which is not without interest in connexion with the Gospel of Peter, and which, so far as I know, has not been noticed hitherto.

Commenting on Luke xxii. 42 ff., Dionysius thus speaks of the Passion: *ραίσματα, ἐμπύσματα, μαστίγες, θάνατος, καὶ τοῦ θανάτου τὸ ὕψωμα: καὶ τούτων πάντων ἐπιτελουμένων, ἐσιώπα καὶ διακαρτεῖ, ὥστε οὐδὲν πάσχωεν ἢ ὡς ἡδὴ τεθνεώς: μνημονεύον δὲ τοῦ θανάτου, καὶ ὑπὲρ δυνάμιν αὐτὸν ἡδὴ δαμάζοντος, ἀνέκραγεν πρὸς τὴν Πατέρα: τί με ἐγκατέλιπες. This recalls the statement of Pseudo-Peter: αὐτὸς δὲ ἐσιώπα, ὡς μηδὲν πόνον ἔχων; but it is to be observed that the language of Dionysius is free from the Docetism that seems to underlie the words of the Apocryphal Gospel. And, again, the last two lines suggest that the writer is trying to give an orthodox turn to the perversion of the Fourth Word: *ἡ δύναμις μου, ἡ δύναμις, κατέλειψάς με.

It is in no way improbable, a priori, that Dionysius should have been acquainted with the Gospel of Peter, for the "great bishop of Alexandria" was a pupil of Origen, who certainly knew of the book. And Dionysius tells us himself that he was an omnivorous reader, reading heretical no less than orthodox works, in obedience to a Divine vision (Eus. H. E. vii. 7).

J. H. BERNARD.

"THE LORD" IN THE GOSPEL OF PETER.

London: Sept. 18, 1893.

In my letter to the ACADEMY of July 29, I expressed the opinion that, however much the Docetae may have used the Gospel of Peter, the evidence which the fragment presents, especially the great earthquake ensuing when the body of Christ was laid on the ground (v. 21), contradicts the allegation that the Gospel had a strictly Docetic origin. The opinion I advanced is, that the author treated the evangelical history from a quasi-Sabellian point of view, this conclusion agreeing with his designation of Christ as "the Lord," a designation which is especially Pauline, however true it may be that St. Paul's doctrine was not Sabellian. I said, moreover, that the Petrine author, regarding Christ as "the Lord of glory" (cf. 1 Cor. ii. 8), may have thought it not unreasonable to modify human characteristics, so that the representation might accord with the exalted dignity of the person spoken of. Thus may be explained what is said of the Lord's tranquillity when nailed to the cross, "as though suffering nothing" (v. 10). There is a curious parallel in Foxe's Acts and Monuments, which it may be worth while to quote. Foxe says of the martyr, John Rogers: "The fire was put unto him, and when it had taken hold both upon his legs and shoulders, he, as one feeling no smart, washed his hands in the flame, as though it had been in cold water." If it be said that the martyrologist magnified the martyr's endurance, this need not at present concern us; it is sufficient that there was no Docetic influence.

I may add that, with regard to the words quoted above from the Gospel of Peter, Harnack seems to doubt whether they have really a Docetic character, though others have strongly asserted it. It may be mentioned, also, that this eminent scholar, while not denying the presence of germs of heresy, altogether rejects the notion that this document was the Gospel of the Docetæ. Dr. Swete, too, says very cautiously: "The teaching of the fragment with regard to the Lord's Death and Resurrection, while open to suspicion, is not absolutely inconsistent with Catholic language."

THOMAS TYLER.

THE ETYMOLOGY OF "DEMIJOHN."

Oxford.

The word "demijohn" is defined in Annandale's Concise Dictionary (1892) to be "a glass vessel or bottle with a large body and small neck, inclosed in wicker-work." In Falconer's Universal Dictionary of the Marine, first published 1769, an edition of which, published in 1776, is in the Bodleian, we find the following entry: "Dame-jeanne, a 'demijan' or large bottle . . . containing about four or five gallons, covered with basket-work, and much used in merchant ships." The new French Dictionary by Hatzfeld and Darmesteter, which is being printed in fascicules, contains the following definition of the word "dame-jeanne": "tres grosse bouteille de verre, de grès, de terre, à large ventre, et à col court, le plus souvent clissée et munie d'anses, pour le transport des liquides."

In Hatzfeld and Darmesteter the earliest quotation for the word (spelt dame-jane) is dated 1694. I have before me the quotations for "demijohn" sent in by the readers for the New English Dictionary, and I find that the earliest quotation for the word (spelt demijan) is the above extract from Falconer. This seems to show that the word came to us as a term used by sailors. The next quotation also smells of the sea; it is dated 1803, and is taken from the Naval Chronicle, x., p. 183: "I perceived one of the seamen emptying a demijean containing five gallons." No quotation has been sent in for the word in its present English form, "demijohn," earlier than 1842; this being an extract from American Notes by Charles Dickens, p. 122, col. 2 (ed. 1850).

Besides the forms of the word already given, I have collected the following, which occur in various languages: Provençal damojano, dama-jano, dabajano, debajano (see Mistral's Dict. Prov., Honnorat, Favre, Boucoiran); Catalan damaiana (see Körting's Lat. Rom. Wbch., §2386); Spanish damajuana (see Roque Barcia); Italian damigiana; Arabic dāmġāna-t (see Steingass, p. 351).

Two guesses have been hazarded as to the etymology of the word under discussion, one of which is favoured by English etymologists, the other by Romanic scholars. In Taylor's Words and Places, A. S. Palmer's Folk Etymology, Webster's International Dictionary, Annandale's Concise Dictionary, and the Stanford Dictionary, we are told that "demijohn" and "dame-jeanne" are derived from the Arabic dāmġāna, and that the Arabic word is derived from the name of a Persian town Damagġān once famous for its glass works. This derivation is not smiled upon by Orientalists. To begin with, there does not appear to be any evidence for the use of the word dāmġāna in Arabic before the appearance of the Western forms already cited. The word only occurs in modern Arabic lexicons, and was probably introduced by sailors from the Western Mediterranean shores (see Yule and Burnell, s.v., where it is stated that the Arabic derivation is doubted by the great scholar Dozy). Secondly, the connexion between an Arabic dāmġāna and the Persian place-name Damagġān rests on no historical evidence whatever: it is, so far as I can make out, a guess pure and simple.

Most Romanic scholars on the continent are in favour of a Latin derivation. It is thought that the forms damaiano (in Provençal) and damigiana (in Italian) point to a Latin type dimidiāna, a half measure, see Alart in Revue des langues romanes, 2nd ser. vol. v., no. 1, Romania VII., p. 342, and Körting, l.c.; see also Hatzfeld and Darmesteter, s.v. This etymology would do very well, so far as phonetics go, and is not improbable from the point of view of sense-development; but at present it sadly stands in need of historical evidence.

I am writing in the hope that Dr. Chance or Mr. Toynbee or some other scholar who has made the history of French words a special study may be able to supply the missing information. We want a link between the ampolas de mieja migeira of Narbonne (thirteenth century), cited in Hatzfeld and the modern Provençal damaiano.

A. L. MAYHEW.

ORIGIN OF BURIAL.

In the Fortnightly Review, Mr. Grant Allen insists very strongly on the view that the practice of burying the dead arose from the fear of the survivors that, unless the body were well imprisoned in the earth, the spirit or ghost would be free to roam about and vex them. He holds that even in neolithic man this superstitious dread prevailed. Surely, this is going too far. We know next to nothing about neolithic man—certainly not enough to credit him with powers of imagination. But we may safely assume that he possessed the organs of sight and smell. And as both of these organs would quickly be offended by the results of death, what could be more natural than that he should resort to the simplest possible mode of getting rid of the offensive object? Animals lower in the order of creation than neolithic man are acquainted with the purifying properties of earth and use their knowledge: man has the knowledge, but has often allowed superstition and sentiment to interfere with its practice.

C. J. R.

APPOINTMENTS FOR NEXT WEEK.

SUNDAY, Oct. 1, 4 p.m. South Place Institute: "The Need and Value of Technical Education," by Mr. C. T. Millis.
TUESDAY, Oct. 3, 6 p.m. London Institution: "The Principles of Commercial Geography applied to the British Empire," I., by Dr. H. B. Mill.
WEDNESDAY, Oct. 4, 8 p.m. Elizabethan: "John Stow and Elizabethan London," by Mr. F. Rogers.

SCIENCE.

CURRENT SCIENTIFIC LITERATURE.

Flora of South-West Surrey. By S. T. Dunn. (West, Newman & Co.) It is always dangerous to say that we know all the flowers or all the insects of even a small piece of ground; but, if there be any county whose flora is approximately known, it must surely be one of those which, lying close to London, are easy to visit at all seasons. The recent discovery of Illecebrum verticillatum in Berkshire is a warning against over-confidence; but certainly Surrey ought not to contain much in the way of wild flowers which has not already been recorded. Of course its list may be increased by an accident any day. Kew Gardens may contribute another escape like Galinsaga parviflora. The railway-traffic, which makes it always worth a botanist's while to look about a station, may bring in packing or otherwise some obscure and hardy little weed like Erigeron Canadense. But the real natives, and even the real denizens, must be pretty well known by this time. To such of them as grow in South-Western Surrey (about Leatherhead, Dorking, Guildford, Godalming, Farnham, and Haslemere) Mr. Dunn furnishes an excellent and portable guide. His book will do no harm, for it betrays no dangerous secrets; but it is to be welcomed as registering important facts, and as facilitating a healthy amusement. The last Surrey Flora was that published by Brewer in 1863, and several of the plants which he recorded (as Damasium and Limosella) are now gone or hard to find. Until Mr. Beeby's long promised Flora of the whole county appears, Mr. Dunn's list is therefore our newest and safest source of information. We notice that he does not confirm a story which was set about last year of the existence of blue primroses in Surrey. On the other hand, we think he might have mentioned the curious blue form of Anemone nemorosa. No one of the ordinary handbooks of the British Flora, except Mr. Grindon's, has yet noticed this variety, but there is plenty of it to be found near Dorking. We do not always quite understand from Mr. Dunn's way of stating his facts whether a plant has been found in South-West Surrey or only in adjacent districts. For instance, Pulicaria vulgaris:—"Moist situations, M.-H. and W.-Sx., rare." Does this mean that the Small Fleabane is found in moist situations in Surrey or only in Mid-Hants and West Sussex? We have seen it (on clay?) near Dorking. A like doubt occurs to us about Centaurea solstitialis, which appeared as a casual on the slope of the Denbies Hill in 1889. We should like to mention as extra localities for the following plants, coming within our own observation: Acorus calamus and Tragopogon pratensis, Bury Hill pond; Ajuga chamaepitys and Nepeta cataria, Box Hill.

Parts V. and VI. of the revised edition of Johnson's Gardener's Dictionary (Bell), running from Inga to Pleopeltis, contain, as it so falls out, an unusual amount of useful information upon vegetables and fruit. The Kitchen Garden has an article to itself; and then follow in their due turns stores of knowledge about Kidney Beans and Manurees, Melons and Mice, Mulberries and Mushrooms (this last a specially good and practical guide), Netting and Orchards. The letter P starts appetizingly with Pea, and Peach, and Pear, and Pineapple. In short, a study of the Dictionary makes one long to be a gardener, and feel able to be a successful gardener. The more flowery side of the work comes out in the directions given under Iris, Lily, Orchid, Pelargonium, &c.: and the scientific principles on which all gardening must rest, if it is to be more than rule of thumb, have their turn in the articles on Leaves, and Mixture of Soils. Is it true, by the way, that the ordinary Lilium pyrenaicum has dark orange flowers? Surely it has them pale yellow with black dots. Under the head Labels, it would have been well to give an idea of the comparative cost of the different systems of ticketing plants. Labels have been stolen by birds before now, and one would rather not contribute too largely to the household stores of a magpie. Even if we are allowed to keep our own labels, we should like to know beforehand what it will cost to introduce them. But, on the whole, there is no doubt that this Dictionary will be indispensable alike to the amateur and to the professional gardener.

Modern Microscopy. By M. J. Cross and M. J. Cole. (Baillière, Tindall & Cox.) This little treatise is described on the title-page as a "handbook for beginners"; and it well deserves its title. It is divided into two parts, one of which has been written by each of the authors: (1) The Microscope, and Instructions for its use; and (2) Microscope Objects, how prepared and mounted. The descriptions are clear and succinct, and the work is well illustrated. The beginner in microscopic work could not have a more useful guide.

CORRESPONDENCE.

LYGDAMIS THE KIMMERIAN.

Oxford: Sept. 23, 1893.

In the last volume of the Journal Asiatique Mr. Strong has published an historically important text of the Assyrian king, Assur-bani-pal. In it Assur-bani-pal tells us that Merodach had assisted him in overthrowing "Tuktamme, king of the people of the Manda," whom he further calls "the offspring of Tiamat," an expression equivalent to our "limb of Satan." We may form from it some idea of the damage which the Manda chieftain had inflicted on Assyria. Assur-bani-pal adds that he had also overthrown Sanda-ksatru, the son of Tuktamme.

Tuktamme is, I believe, the Lygdamis of Strabo (i. 3, 16), who, according to the Greek geographer, was the leader of the Kimmerian hordes who sacked Sardes, though Lygdamis himself died in Kilikia on the Assyrian frontier. Tuktamme, or Dugtamme, as it may also be transcribed, would very naturally be transformed into the Greek name of Lygdamis. The connexion of Tuktamme with Kilikia, moreover, is indicated by the name of his son Sanda-ksatru, as Ed. Meyer has shown that Sanda or Sandon was a Kilikian god.

The formation of the name of Sanda-ksatru is interesting, since, like Arta-ksatru or Artaxerxes, it must be of Persian origin. The Kimmerian chieftain Teuspa, who is called a Manda by Esar-haddon, also bears a name which seems to be the Persian Teispes. Teuspa was defeated by Esar-haddon, and it is probable that he was the immediate predecessor of Tuktamme.

However that may be, light is at last thrown on the nationality of Astyages, who is called a king of the Manda or "nomads" in the Babylonian texts; and it would therefore appear that Herodotus in his account of Media has confused the Kimmerians with the Skyths. If the evidence of the proper names can be trusted, the Kimmerian Manda will have been of Iranian descent.

Some years ago I published in the Proceedings of the Society of Biblical Archaeology an inscription on the handle of a sceptre or some similar object which was found in Kappadokia. The inscription is written in the characters of the Amardian syllabary, which was used in the country immediately adjoining Media, and reads "Kuaruvan the Mandhuvian King." Though Mandhu was the name of an Armenian city, it is possible that in Mandhuvas or "Mandhuvian" we have a form of Manda.

A. H. SAYCE.

SCIENCE NOTES.

IPSWICH has been chosen as the place of meeting of the British Association in 1895. As already announced, next year's meeting will be held at Oxford, with the Marquis of Salisbury as president; and the date has been fixed for the second week in August, more than a month earlier than this year. It has also been decided to form a new section of physiology, under the letter I; while the name of biology will still be retained, at least for the present, for section D. The total number of members, associates, &c., attending the recent meeting at Nottingham was 1661, as compared with 2070 at Edinburgh last year.

THE following is the list of grants, made by the general committee of the British Association, the total amount being £705:—Mathematics and Physics.—Prof. Carey Foster, electrical standards, £25; Mr. G. J. Symons, photographs of meteorological phenomena (renewed), £10; Lord Rayleigh, tables of mathematical functions, £15; Sir G. G. Stokes, recording the direct intensity of solar radiation, £15; Prof. O. J. Lodge, national physical laboratory, £5. Chemistry and Mineralogy.—Sir H. Roscoe, wave-length tables of the spectra of the elements (renewed), £10; Prof. Roberts-Austen, analysis of iron and steel (renewed) £15; Prof. T. E. Thorpe, action of light upon dyed colours, £5. Geology.—Prof. E. Hull, erratic blocks, £15; the Rev. T. Wiltshire, fossil Phyllopoda, £5; Prof. J. Geikie, photographs of geological interest (renewed), £10; Mr. J. Horne, shell-bearing deposits at Clava, Chapel-hall, &c., £20; Dr. R. H. Traquair, eurypterids of the Pentland Hills, £5; Mr. H. B. Woodward, new sections of Stonesfield slate, £25; Mr. G. J. Symons, observations on earth tremors, £50; Mr. R. H. Tiddeman, exploration of Calf Hole Cave, £5. Biology.—Dr. P. L. Sclater, table at the Naples Zoological Station, £100; Prof. E. R. Lankester, table at the Plymouth Biological Laboratory (renewed), £15; Prof. A. Newton, zoology of Sandwich Islands, £100; Prof. W. A. Herdman, zoology of the Irish Sea, £40; Prof. A. Schäfer, structure and function of the mammalian heart, £10. Geography.—Mr. E. G. Ravenstein, climatology and hydrography of Tropical Africa, £10; Mr. C. R. Markham, observations in South Georgia, £50; Mr. H. Seeböhm, exploration in Arabia, £30. Economic Science and Statistics.—Prof. W. Cunningham, methods of economic training, £10. Anthropology.—Sir W. H. Flower, anthropometric laboratory statistics, £5; Mr. E. W. Brabrook, ethnographical survey of United Kingdom, £10; Dr. R. Munro, the lake village at Glastonbury, £40; Prof. J. Cleland, anthropometrical measurements in schools, £5; Sir D. Galton, mental and physical condition of children, £20; Dr. J. G. Garson, corresponding societies, £25.

THE Royal Geographical Society has made arrangements for a course of twelve lectures on "The Principles of Commercial Geography applied to the British Empire," at the London Institution, by Dr. H. R. Mill, librarian to the society. The lectures will be delivered on Tuesdays at 6 p.m., beginning on October 3; and they will be illustrated throughout with the oxy-hydrogen lantern. Admission to the opening lecture will be free. A second series of lectures, on "The Relations between History and Geography," will be given early next year by Mr. H. J. Mackinder.

MESSRS. METHUEN & Co. will shortly add to their University Extension Series an elementary text-book of Modern Physical Astronomy, by Mr. R. A. Gregory. It will deal chiefly with the results that have been obtained by means of the telescope, and its two most indispensable adjuncts—the spectroscope and the photographic camera.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

WE understand that Mr. C. H. Tawney has been appointed to the post of librarian at the India Office, vacant by the retirement of Dr. R. Rost. Mr. Tawney was in his day senior classic at Cambridge, and has served for nearly thirty years in India in the education department. For a long time he was principal of the Presidency College at Calcutta, and also registrar of the Calcutta University. As an orientalist he is known for his translations of the Katha Sarit Sagara, which was published in the "Bibliotheca Indica" series of the Asiatic Society of Bengal; and of a Sanskrit drama, entitled "Uttara Rama Charita." Dr. Rost's retirement is caused by the regulation which deprives this country of the services of its public officials at a certain arbitrary age. He will carry with him into private life the cordial good wishes of the entire body of oriental scholars—in England, in Germany, in France, and in India; for there is none who has not at some time received from him the most valued assistance and the greatest courtesy. This constant readiness to help others is indeed the chief reason why his own name appears on the title-page of so few books, except as editor. He has preferred to be known as an "honest broker" between the orientalists of all countries, who have never questioned either his competence to appraise their special labours or his conscientious impartiality. He has been librarian at the India Office since 1869, and was nominated C.I.E. on New Year's Day, 1888.

THE first number of the Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal for 1893 contains an interesting article by Mr. G. A. Grierson on "The Early Study of Indian Vernaculars in Europe," which is mainly based upon researches in the Vatican Library. From the correspondence of La Croze, librarian at Berlin in the early part of the eighteenth century, he shows how the first attempt to decipher the Devanagari character was made through Tibetan, by means of a printed book brought from China in 1727; while a knowledge of the languages themselves were derived from the missionaries, Ziegenbalg and Schultze, in Southern India. An account is given of Fritz's "Orientalisch Sprachmeister" (Leipzig, 1748), which contains translations of the Lord's Prayer into about two hundred languages; and of an "Alphabetum Brammhanicum" (Rome, 1771), which is the first book printed in Europe from Devanagari types.

FINE ART.

The Great Palace of Constantinople. By the late Dr. A. G. Paspates. Translated from the Greek by William Metcalfe. (Alexander Gardner.)

IT appears strange that, though the Great Palace at Constantinople was the central point of the Byzantine Empire, and the focus of the diplomacy of Eastern Europe and Western Asia during the Middle Ages, and at times the scene of highly dramatic occurrences, yet for several centuries all knowledge of its site should have been lost. The explanation of this remarkable oblivion is to be found in the neglect with which it was treated during the two centuries preceding the Turkish conquest. After the recapture of the city from the Latins, for various reasons the emperors of the family of the Palaeologi transferred their court to the palace of Blachernae, in the angle formed by the land-wall of Constantinople and the Golden Horn; and, owing to the constantly increasing poverty of the empire, the older and more famous residence came to be deserted. Buondelmonti, who visited Constantinople in 1422, speaks of the buildings in the neighbourhood of the Church of St. Sophia as being in a state of shocking desolation; and Gyllius, who resided there for a long time in the following century, says that nothing was left of the ancient palace. After the fall of the city, the Ottoman conquerors destroyed what remained of the old buildings in order to make room for their Mahometan subjects, and used the materials for the construction of mosques and other edifices. Meanwhile, the Greek inhabitants had lost whatever traditions existed respecting the abode of their former rulers. When interest in these sites awakened afresh in Western Europe, the only evidence available was such as could be drawn from Byzantine writers; and if authors of such eminence as Du Cange and Banduri missed the mark in attempting to describe them, we should remember that the works of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, which throw far more light on the subject than any others, were not yet published in their time. The view which gradually prevailed was, that the palace and its precincts corresponded to the modern Seraglio and its gardens, occupying the whole area between St. Sophia and the entrance of the Bosphorus, and being enclosed on the land side by the existing wall, which runs across from sea to sea. The tradition thus formed was at last broken by M. Labarte, who in his very acute book, Le Palais Imperial de Constantinople (Paris, 1864), pointed out the strong objections to this opinion, and argued that the palace must have stood between the church of St. Sophia and the Hippodrome on the one side, and the Sea of Marmora on the other. He also maintained that the walls of the Serai were of comparatively late erection. This view was based on a careful study of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, and at the time when he wrote there did not seem to be any probability that its truth or falsehood would be tested by excavation. But the opportunity was not long in coming. In 1870 the railway which now connects Constantinople with Belgrade was commenced; and since it started from the shore at the entrance of the Golden Horn and, passing the Seraglio Point, followed the inner side of the city walls along the Sea of Marmora, numerous buildings were demolished, and sites were revealed which had not been accessible before.

It is the merit of the present work that it is based, not only on a careful examination of the authorities on the subject, but also on the evidence that has been brought to light in this manner. By the study of this the author believes that he can determine the limits of the palace area. Near the sea on the eastern side of the city, at no great distance from the Seraglio Point, an ancient wall of massive masonry was found, and, following up the hill for a long distance from this in the direction of St. Sophia, were the foundations of another wall, which supported constructions of later date. Again, in the same line with this wall, but to the south of St. Sophia, and between the site of the ancient Hippodrome (now the Atmeidan) and the sea, there are fragments of similar walls; and close to the sea below these was found a double wall with an arched passage, corresponding to the "Covered Way" or "Gallery of Marcian," and in its neighbourhood a Byzantine gateway, which should be that called Karea, or the "Gate of the Emperors." If we suppose the wall, the existing portions of which have now been described, to have been continuous, it would represent, according to Dr. Paspates, "the true boundaries of the ancient Byzantine Akropolis, within which were reared the palaces of our emperors, and the many churches made famous by them." The line of this wall would cut through the wall of the Serai at right angles; and, consequently, he is brought to the conclusion, at which, as we have said, M. Labarte had arrived from studying the authorities, that the latter of these two walls could not have been in existence at the time when the Great Palace formed the imperial residence, and that the Seraglio Point, and the ground between it and St. Sophia, were not included within its precincts. He would refer the erection of this wall to the time of the recapture of Constantinople by the Palaeologi, and he adduces various arguments to show that it could not have been of earlier date. The most cogent of these turns on the position of the Hospital of St. Sampson, which is said by the historians to have been between the churches of St. Irene and St. Sophia, whereas at the present day the Serai wall interposes between those two edifices, and in such a way that there would be no space for an additional building. From the description of other occurrences, he also proves that in the time of the Comneni there were streets leading from the eastern part of the peninsula to St. Sophia, and that these could not have been included within the palace area; and also that the neighbouring shore towards the entrance of the Golden Horn was occupied by the Genoese colony, until they were removed by Michael Palaeologus to Galata, on the opposite coast.

After thus investigating the position of the Great Palace, Dr. Paspates proceeds to determine the situation of the edifices that were comprised within its circuit. In this investigation the most important information is to be obtained from Constantine Porphyrogenitus, because of the minute instructions which he gives in his De Caeremoniis as to the places that were to be traversed, and the buildings that were to be visited, by the state functionaries on various occasions; and this can be largely supplemented by the accounts of events enacted within the palace, which are described by the historians. Great care, however, is required in distinguishing from one another places which were called by the same name, and have, consequently, been a source of confusion. The author's treatment of this part of his subject is an excellent specimen of argument, at once elaborate and judicious, from the comparison of facts drawn from a great variety of sources; and it is certainly in favour of his conclusions, that his views of the position of the various buildings, though independently arrived at, hang so well together. One modern name, that of the Arista-street (Arista Sokaghi), which has no significance in Turkish, may, perhaps, as he thinks, mark the site of the chamber called the Aristerion, and, in a few instances, some partial help towards identification is lent by ruins still remaining; but all inquiry on the spot is difficult owing to this quarter being occupied by a poor Turkish population. If ever the time comes when extensive excavations can be undertaken there, the data which are brought together in this volume will be very serviceable; but, until then, an element of conjecture must remain. One interesting place, however, which was discovered during the construction of the railway, remains to be mentioned—the palace and harbour of Bucoleon, the latter of which served for a place of embarkation for the emperors, and of escape in case of need, because the imperial barges were stationed there. The position of this palace was just within the sea-wall to the north-east of St. Sophia; and the excavations which took place there—for the line of railway ran directly through it—revealed the massive vaults on which it was built. "Within these lay in shapeless heaps, as if cast down by an earthquake, fragments of marble columns, bases, capitals, and lovely cornices with sculptured heads of oxen and lions." Before these vaults were removed, Dr. Paspates succeeded in obtaining the dimensions of the building, which were 219 ft. in length by 55 ft. in breadth—a proof of the smallness of these Byzantine palaces. The harbour was a small artificial inlet, and its site is now covered with gardens, trees, and a pond. "After the capture, the Turks blocked up the entrance, and now every vestige of the stone wharves and imperial jetties has perished."

In conclusion, our best thanks are due to the translator, Mr. Metcalfe, for rendering easily accessible to English readers a work which is of the highest value to students of Byzantine history.

H. F. TOZER.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

The exhibition of the Arts and Crafts Society will open next week, in the New Gallery.

THE latest gift of Mr. Augustus W. Franks to the British Museum is a choice series of oriental wall-tiles, the result of many years' collection. It will shortly be on view in the Ceramic Gallery.

THE "Art Annual," or Christmas number of the Art Journal for 1893, to be published with the November magazines, will be the Life and Work of W. Holman Hunt. The text is written by Archdeacon Farrar and Mrs. Meynell. Among the illustrations will be a line engraving of "Christ in the Temple," and photogravures of "The Light of the World" and "The Shadow of Death."

MESSRS. SEELEY & Co. announce a volume entitled Some Minor English Arts: Pottery, Book-binding, Wooden Effigies, Enamel, and Pressed Horn. It is written by Prof. A. H. Church, Mr. W. Y. Fletcher, Mr. Albert Hartshorne, Mr. J. Starkie Gardner, and Mr. J. R. Read; and it will be illustrated with coloured plates and many engravings.

THE British Institution scholarship in sculpture for this year has been awarded to Mr. Sidney Physick, who is already a silver medallist and Landseer scholar of the Royal Academy.

WE regret to record the death of Mr. Albert Moore, the younger brother of Mr. Henry Moore, who, within his own limited range, was a draughtsman and colourist of the very first order. Critics and the general public have long agreed to admire his exquisite pictures of Greek girls, in light-hued draperies, posed in front of harmonious backgrounds; and we understand that examples of his work are in special demand in America. But, though he had reached the age of fifty-two, the Royal Academy never thought fit to admit Albert Moore even to its outer circle.

MUSIC.

SAINT-SAËNS' "SAMSON ET DALILA."

SOME years ago Sir J. Barnby gave two performances of Wagner's "Parsifal" at the Albert Hall as an oratorio; and though, no doubt, those of the audience who had heard the work at Baireuth could enjoy a retrospective pleasure, the music produced but little effect on the general public, and no attempt was made to repeat the experiment. A composer is merely a music-maker, it matters, perhaps, little under what form his music is presented; but no work seriously signed as opera can be successful as oratorio. Saint-Saëns, the eminent French composer, his Biblical opera "Samson et Dalila," kept the stage well in view; and though, perhaps, the chorus "Dieu d'Israel" of the first act, and the chorus of Hebrew Captives in the third act, may suffer but little apart from their surroundings, the same cannot be said of the rest of the music. No doubt the intention in giving the work on Monday at the Promenade Concerts, Covent Garden, was a good one. An opera based on a Biblical subject is not allowed to be produced on the stage in England, and Mr. Farley Sinkins probably thought it a pity that a clever and characteristic work should remain in oblivion. With this feeling we heartily concur. Among modern French composers, M. Saint-Saëns holds a distinguished place; and his opera "Samson et Dalila," which has been heard in France, Germany, and Italy, enjoys considerable and well deserved reputation. Popular opinion in this country is against operas based on Biblical subjects. There are certain operas, such as Goldmark's "Reine de Saba" or the one under notice, to which, perhaps, no exception would be taken, but on principle all are condemned; for the line once broken through, it would seem impossible to say to composers: "Thus far shalt thou go, and no farther." And yet, surely it would be well in this matter to grant a little more liberty. Public opinion would soon make itself felt, if care were not taken to keep within wise limits. On the continent, the liberty granted does not lead to abuse. If some of the old Bible stories could be vivified by stage action and scenery, and intensified by fine music, a more serious — one might even say more religious — impression would be made than is the case when Bible words are used by composers merely as a peg on which to hang their thoughts — as is sometimes done for a degree exercise, or a new work for a choral society. Handel was in earnest when he wrote his "Messiah," but one cannot say that of all his oratorios. There may be certain practical difficulties in the way of Biblical operas, and these should be frankly acknowledged. But the artificial distinction between secular and sacred musical art in this country should be considered, criticised, and condemned. Mr. Sinkins must be praised for his enterprise in undertaking to produce M. Saint-Saëns' work, but we think that he showed zeal rather than discretion. Owing to some misunderstanding, the vocalists announced to sing the roles of Sampson and Dalila were not forthcoming, and, at the "eleventh hour" the services of two others, Miss Edith Miller and Mr. Bernard Lane, were secured. They struggled bravely through their parts, but more cannot be said. M. Eugene Oudin was effective as the High Priest, and Mr. Magrath deserves favourable mention. The chorus was not efficient. Mr. F. H. Cowen, as conductor, made the best of bad circumstances. Mr. Sinkins did not wish to "break faith with the public," but how about the composer?

J. S. SHEDLOCK.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE THEORY OF MUSICAL EXPRESSION.
Melton, Woodbridge: Sept. 16, 1893.

In glancing through the first number of the English edition of Dr. Hugo Riemann's Dictionary of Music, just published by Augener, I notice that the whole credit of first formulating a theory of musical expression is apparently given to the editor. The following occurs under "Agogics":—"This term relates to the small modifications of tempo (also called tempo rubato) which are necessary to genuine expression. The editor of this dictionary made a first attempt in his Musikalische Dynamik und Agogik (1884) to establish a systematic theory of expressive performance, &c." Surely a prior (if not the first) attempt at a theory of expression (and on precisely the lines laid down in this article) was made by Mathis Lussy in his Traité de l'expression Musicale (Heugel & Cie), the fourth edition of which bears the date 1882. It is curious how such a statement can have crept into this dictionary, seeing that Lussy's book has been translated into English, and forms one of a well-known series of manuals, and also that Dr. Hugo Riemann himself wrote of it as follows:—" . . . Sans doute il faut chercher et formuler des règles de l'expression, surtout de l'accentuation musicale. Je n'hésite point à vous accorder le prix d'une très ingénieuse et scientifique solution du problème en question. C'est donc de nouveau aux Français que nous devons l'impulsion à cultiver une nouvelle branche de la science musicale." ALBERT E. TEBB.

MESSRS. HUTCHINSON'S LIST.

NEW NOVELS AT THE LIBRARIES.

New Novel by the Author of "I Forbid the Banns," entitled "A GRAY EYE OR SO," in 3 vols., will be ready at all the Libraries next week.

MRS. J. KENT SPENDER'S NEW NOVEL.
STRANGE TEMPTATION. In 3 vols.

FITZGERALD MOLLOY'S NEW NOVEL.
AN EXCELLENT KNAVE. In 3 vols.
"Capital reading.....keeps the reader's interest until the end."
Glasgow Herald.

THE POETS and the POETRY of the CENTURY.
Edited by ALFRED H. MILES.
In 10 volumes, fcap. 8vo.

1st Edition on special paper, bound in vellum, gilt top, limited to 100 copies, each book numbered (in sets only), £3 15s. An Edition limited to 300 copies, on blue paper, bound in brown gilt, gilt top, 6s. per vol. A Popular Edition, on antique paper, bound in cloth gilt, top, 4s. per vol.

NEW VOLUME THIS DAY (VOL. VIII.).
ROBERT BRIDGES and CONTEMPORARY POETS.
Containing Poems by Rudyard Kipling, Andrew Lang, Robert Louis Stevenson, Edmund Gosse, Alice Meynell, Eric Mackay, Oscar Wilde, John Davidson, Norman Gale, Richard Le Gallienne, Robert Bridges, Edward Dowden, Michael Field, Mary F. Robinson, Mrs. Graham B. Tomson, &c.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "BY ORDER OF THE CZAR."
THIRD AND CHEAP EDITION.
UNDER the GREAT SEAL. By Joseph Hatton.
In cr. 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.
"Mr. Hatton's keen eye for the picturesque and facile perception of character are convincingly shown in this capital story."—Saturday Review.

SARAH TYTLER'S NEW BOOK.
A BUBBLE FORTUNE. In cr. 8vo, cloth gilt, 5s.
(This day.)

A SIXTH EDITION IN THE PRESS.
I FORBID the BANNS. The Story of a Comedy which was played seriously. By FRANKFORT MOORE. Cheap Edition. In cloth, gilt, 6s.
The Athenæum says: "So racy and brilliant a novel."

BY SARAH DOUDNEY.
THROUGH PAIN to PEACE. In cr. 8vo, cloth gilt, 5s.
(This day.)

B. L. FARJEON'S NEW NOVEL.
THE LAST TENANT. In cr. 8vo, cloth gilt, 5s.
The Speaker says: "A narrative which is startling and never dull."

DICK DONOVAN'S NEW BOOK.
FROM CLUE to CAPTURE. A Series of Thrilling Detective Stories. With numerous Illustrations by Paul Hardy. In cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

W. CLARK RUSSELL'S NEW NOVEL.
THE TRAGEDY of IDA NOBLE. With over 40 Illustrations by Everard Hopkins. In cr. 8vo, buckram gilt, 6s.
The Times says: "Mr. W. Clark Russell has never written a better novel than 'The Tragedy of Ida Noble.'"

THIRTY-SECOND THOUSAND.
HOMESPUN. A Story of a Simple Folk. By ANNIE S. SWAN. In cloth gilt, with Illustrations, 1s. 6d.; paper, 1s.
The Athenæum says: "The language is perfect; the highest strings of humanity are touched."

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW AND FORTHCOMING BOOKS.

THE CAMBRIDGE SHAKESPEARE. Edited by WILLIAM ALDIS WRIGHT. Edition de Luxe. 40 vols. 6s. per vol. net.

THE TEMPEST. [In October.]

THE TWO GENTLEMEN of VERONA. [In October.]

* The Edition de Luxe of the Cambridge Shakespeare will be comprised in 40 volumes super-royal 8vo, each volume containing a single play. It will be printed on a fine cream-white hand-made paper. The impression will be limited to 500 copies, a considerable number of which have been ordered for America. It will be issued at the rate of two volumes per month from October, when "The Tempest" and "The Two Gentlemen of Verona" will be published. Orders will only be received for complete sets.

THE LIBRARY EDITION of LORD TENNYSON'S WORKS. Vol. IX., "Demeter and Other Poems." Globe 8vo, 5s. [In October.]

* This, with the eight volumes already published, completes the Library Edition of Lord Tennyson's Works.

THE ATTIC ORATORS from ANTIPHON to ISABUS. By R. C. JEBB, Litt.D., M.P., Regius Professor of Greek in the University of Cambridge. New Edition. 2 vols., 8vo, 36s. [Ready.]

A COMPANION to DANTE. From the German of G. A. SCARFAZZINI. By A. J. BUTLER. Crown 8vo, 10s. [Ready.]

NEW NOVELS.

MISS STUART'S LEGACY. By Mrs. F. A. Steel. 8 vols., crown 8vo, 31s. 6d. [Ready.]

MARION DANCHE. A Story without Comment. By F. MARION CRAWFORD. 2 vols., globe 8vo, 12s. [In October.]

MACMILLAN'S SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.—New Volumes.

CHILDREN of the KING. By F. Marion Crawford. New Edition. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Ready.]

DON ORSINO. By F. Marion Crawford. New Edition. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Ready.]

MACMILLAN'S THREE-AND-SIXPENNY SERIES.—New Volumes. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. each volume.

HENRY TREVERYAN. By John Roy. [In October.]

UNDER PRESSURE. By the Marchesa Theodoli. [In October.]

THE MARPLOT. By S. R. Lysaght. [Ready.]

JOHN TREVENNICK. By W. C. Rhoades. [In October.]

A MERE CYPHER. By Mary A. Dickens. [Ready.]

ROUND LONDON—DOWN EAST and UP WEST. By Montagu WILLIAMS, Q.C. [In October.]

THE EVERSLEY SERIES.—New Volumes.

Globe 8vo, 5s. each volume.

THE COLLECTED WORKS of THOMAS HENRY HUXLEY, F.R.S. In Monthly Volumes, from October 1. [Ready.]

Vol. 1. METHOD and RESULTS.

Vol. 2. DARWINIANA.

Vol. 3. SCIENCE and EDUCATION.

Vol. 4. SCIENCE and HEBREW TRADITION.

Vol. 5. SCIENCE and CHRISTIAN TRADITION.

Vol. 6. HUME.

Vol. 7. ETHICAL and PHILOSOPHICAL ESSAYS.

Vol. 8. MAN'S PLACE in NATURE.

Vol. 9. ESSAYS in SCIENCE.

HISTORY.

WESTERN EUROPE in the FIFTH CENTURY. Lectures delivered at Oxford. By E. A. FREEMAN, D.C.L., late Regius Professor of Modern History in the University of Oxford. 8vo. [In the press.]

WESTERN EUROPE in the EIGHTH CENTURY. Lectures delivered at Oxford. By E. A. FREEMAN, D.C.L. 8vo. [In the press.]

THE ENGLISH TOWN in the FIFTEENTH CENTURY. By ALICE STOPFORD GREEN. 2 vols., 8vo. [In the press.]

THE UNITED STATES. An Outline of Political History, 1492-1871. By GOLDWIN SMITH, D.C.L. Crown 8vo, 8s. 6d.

TIMES.—"His survey of events is luminous, his estimate of character is singularly keen and just, and his style is at once incisive, dignified, and scholarly.... No one who takes up Mr. Goldwin Smith's volume will readily lay it down before he has finished it; no one will lay it down without acknowledging the rare gifts of the writer."

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.—"It has the same breadth of view and power of seizing salient points which were the notes of his work thirty years ago, and were especially conspicuous in his admirable 'Irish History and Irish Character,' by far the best thing of its kind ever written about Ireland."

THEOLOGY.

BIBLICAL MISCELLANIES. By J. B. Lightfoot D.D., late Bishop of Durham. 8vo. [In the press.]

SELECTIONS from EARLY CHRISTIAN WRITERS. Text and Translations Edited by Rev. H. M. GWATEKIN, M.A., Dr. Professor of Ecclesiastical History in the University of Cambridge. Crown 8vo. [In the press.]

THE CHURCH of ENGLAND and RECENT RELIGIOUS THOUGHT. By CHARLES A. WHITTUCK, M.A., Rector of St. Sheffield, Berks. Crown 8vo. [In the press.]

NEW VOLUME of SERMONS. By Phillips Brooks, late Bishop of Massachusetts. Crown 8vo. [In the press.]

ASPECTS of THEISM. By William A. Knight, LL.D., Professor of Moral Philosophy at St. Andrews. 8vo. [In the press.]

NEW VOLUME OF THE CLASSICAL SERIES.

TERENCE.—THE ADELPHOE. With Introduction and Notes, by SIDNEY G. ASHMORE, M.A., Professor of Latin in Union College, Schenectady, N.Y. Peap. 8vo, 2s. 6d. [In the press.]

ENGLISH CLASSICS.—New Volumes.

Globe 8vo.

SHAKESPEARE.—ROMEO and JULIET. With Introduction and Notes by K. DEIGHTON. 2s. 6d.; sewed, 2s. [Ready.]

KING HENRY the FOURTH. First Part. With Introduction and Notes by K. DEIGHTON. 2s. 6d.; sewed, 2s. [Ready.]

KING HENRY the FOURTH. Second Part. With Introduction and Notes by K. DEIGHTON. 2s. 6d.; sewed, 2s. [Ready.]

PRIMARY SERIES OF GERMAN READING BOOKS.—New Volumes.

HAUFF.—DAS WIRTSCHAUS im SPESSART. Edited, with Notes, Vocabularies, and Exercises, by G. E. FARNACET. 8vo, 3s. [Ready.]

SCIENCE.

AN ESSAY on NEWTON'S PRINCIPIA. By WALTER W. ROUSE BALL, Fellow and Assistant Tutor of Trinity College, Cambridge. Crown 8vo, 6s. net. [Ready.]

UTILITY of QUATERNIONS in PHYSICS. By ALEXANDER MACAULAY, M.A., Lecturer in Mathematics and Physics in the University of Tasmania. 8vo, 6s. net. [Ready.]

INORGANIC CHEMISTRY for BEGINNERS. By Sir HENRY ROSCOE, F.R.S. Assisted by JOSEPH LUNT, B.Sc. (Victoria). 8vo, 2s. 6d. [Ready.]

TEXT-BOOK of GEOLOGY. By Sir Archibald GEIKIE, F.R.S. Third Edition. Medium 8vo, 28s. [In the press.]

TABLES for the DETERMINATION of the ROCK-FORMING MINERALS. Compiled by F. LOEWINSON-LESSING, Professor of Geology at the University of Dorpat. Translated from the Russian by J. GREGORY, B.Sc., F.G.S., of the British Museum (Natural History). With a Chapter on the Petrological Microscope by Professor G. A. J. COLE, M.B.A., F.G.S. Super-royal 8vo, 4s. 6d. net. [Ready.]

HANDBOOK of PUBLIC HEALTH and DEMOGRAPHY. By EDWARD F. WILLOUGHBY, M.B., Diploma in State Medicine of the London University, and in Public Health of Cambridge University. Peap. 8vo, 4s. 6d. [In the press.]

INTRODUCTION to the STUDY of POLITICAL ECONOMY. Being an entirely Rewritten Third Edition of the Guide to the Study of Political Economy by LUIGI COSSA, Professor in the Royal University of Turin. Translated by LOUIS DYER. Crown 8vo, 8s. 6d. net. [Ready.]

BOOKS FOR ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS.

ELEMENTARY COURSE of PRACTICAL SCIENCE. By HUGH GORDON. Pott 8vo, 1s. [In the press.]

LIFE and DUTY of the CITIZEN. A Text-Book for Evening Continuation Schools, and the Higher Standards in Elementary School. By CHARLES HENRY WYATT, Clerk of the Manchester School Board. With 100 Illustrations. Globe 8vo, 2s. [In the press.]

* Both these Books are drawn up in accordance with the directions given in the New Evening Continuation Schools.

MACMILLAN'S HISTORY READERS.—New Volumes. Globe 8vo.

STANDARD VII.—THE HOUSE of HANOVER. With Biographies of Leading Statesmen and Men of Letters, Notices of the Chief Legislative Acts, and Chapters upon the Growth of the Colonial Empire. 1s. 6d. [Ready.]

STANDARD II.—SIMPLE STORIES from ENGLISH HISTORY. 10d. [Ready.]

READING BOOKS.

HEREWARD the WAKE. Abridged and Re-arranged as a Reading Book for Schools, with Illustrations by H. C. Selous. Globe 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. [Ready.]

WESTWARD HO! Abridged and Rearranged as a Reading Book for Schools, with Illustrations by W. D. Almond. Globe 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. [Ready.]

MACMILLAN & CO., LONDON.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 7, 1893.

No. 1118, New Series.

THE EDITOR cannot undertake to return, or to correspond with the writers of, rejected manuscript.

It is particularly requested that all business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., may be addressed to the PUBLISHER, and not to the EDITOR.

LITERATURE.

"THE GIFFORD LECTURES, 1892."—Philosophy or Psychological Religion. By F. Max Müller. (Longmans.)

THOSE of our readers who have followed Prof. Max Müller's series of Gifford Lectures from the beginning will probably agree that this volume, containing their final instalment, exceeds in real interest and information those that went before. And there is a sufficing reason for this discrimination. We arrive here at the solution of the problem, as the learned author has chosen to state it. We have the dénouement of his historico-religious plot. More than once during the delivery of the preceding instalments the question was seriously mooted as to the real object of Prof. Max Müller's partly philological, partly metaphysical, dissertations, or as to the bearing they could possibly have on Natural Religion as that department of theological research is commonly understood, at least among English scholars and divines. It is, indeed, quite in harmony with the scientific application of the terms—which, as Hegel long ago pointed out, assigns the title of "philosophical" to a mere box of mathematical instruments—that English scholars have always connected Natural Religion with Natural—i.e., Physical—Science, and as implying a direction of speculative and experimental inquiry altogether opposed to metaphysics. Probably the average English cleric still derives his idea of Natural Religion from such works as Paley's Natural Theology, Lord Brougham's well-known Discourse, and other accredited text-books similar in calibre and with a genuinely orthodox contempt for experimental science, of which the best example is the series of the Bridge-water Treatises. Nothing could well exceed in naive simplicity the theory of Natural Religion thus uniformly expounded. Its teleology was at once so easy, so simple and direct, so homely and unsophisticated, as to seem unnatural. If it condescended to details so minute as to appear trivial, it had, as a compensating advantage, applications and adjustments of varying obliqueness and indirectness, whose importance no candid mind, even when biassed by scientific prepossession, would dream of denying. That thinkers must in time have become dissatisfied with such a scheme of the providential government of the universe is self-evident. Its very simplicity and childlike directness seemed to suggest a prejudice against it. It beset with intellectual embarrassment thinkers of the first order, such as Voltaire and Goethe, whose ironical aptitudes on all subjects relating to popular theology found a field of congenial exploitation in juxta-positing harmonies and mutual adjustments in Nature and Creation, as e.g., the proximity of cork trees to mineral waters; while with others, as Bengel and the German Pietists, it made great and occasionally distressing havoc of the Evangelical orthodoxy which accepted the teleological method as one of its foundation stones. The immense part which the subject occupied in English thought during the Deist-controversy of the eighteenth century is well known. Those who would ascertain the scope of Natural Religion in the English Church during this period may be referred to Lechler's well known work on the Deists, or, in a still more compendious form, to the Index to Waterland's collected works. Waterland is the typical exponent of Anglican orthodoxy, representing the virtues as well as the many vices of that school of thought, and historically important as indicating the low-water mark of sacerdotal and traditional learning before the rapid flow then in initial progress, induced by Science, Free Thought, and Rationalism, had asserted its timely and wholesome sway. Meanwhile, ingenuous and keen-sighted divines—virtual leaders of the liberalising reaction—men like Bishop Butler and Archbishop Whateley, were shrewd enough to discern, and sufficiently candid to admit, some of the insoluble points with which the question of Natural Religion bristled. Partly following their track, but with a natural apprehension of the logical cul de sac wherein so many of the ratiocinations of Anglican apologists for orthodoxy found their fictitious issues and exits, thoughtful laymen with an independent, and what Norris of Bemerton quaintly termed an "unaddicted" genius, penetrated the question from different standpoints, and with weapons forged outside the discursive methods and antiquated resources of an out-worn Bibliolatry and a superficial sacerdotalism. And thus, the late Lord Gifford, having during his life expended on the question a considerable portion of the metaphysical proclivities of an unusually subtle and profound intellect, bequeathed it, as a miser his hoard, to his intellectual friends, as a subject worthy of their attention and deserving a prize for any solution which might prove approximately successful.

The proposal possessed, at all events, the attributes of novelty, while it was not wholly destitute of precedent in another department of human action. When hospitals for physical incurables are deemed worthy the attention of humane persons—the founders often being, in the case of some specific disease, those who have suffered from the ailment for which they have instituted a permanent shelter—some provision for intellectual insolubilities, or what might claim to be so, cannot be said to be wholly removed from the region of natural curiosity, of human knowledge, and of remedial enterprise. Instances, no doubt, are on record wherein the prognosis which seemed to establish a claim for admission to a Home for Incurables has proved erroneous; and cases are known in which problems once thought unanswerable have proved themselves more or less open to solution; but, judging from the instance under present consideration, questions which the thought of man has long regarded as inscrutable are not found to surrender easily their impenetrability. At all events, Lord Gifford's attempt to rescue the theological crux of his life from the limbo of insoluble enigmas has not met with entire success. Himself dissatisfied with the theological method, he indicated as a better the converse procedure which might be distinguished as the metaphysical. It followed—we may say briefly—the line laid down by the Eleatics and the Socratic school of ancient Greece, and consisted largely in inferring the divinity without from that of the divinity within the man and the race.

This, one of the earliest methods of Natural Religion, is also one of the most recent. It is the solution of the question advocated by Prof. Max Müller which is now before us in the several instalments of his Gifford Lectures. His own exposition of it is as follows (Pref. p. vii):—

"It has been my object, in these three consecutive courses of lectures on Physical, Anthropological, and Psychological Religion, to prove that what in my first volume I put forward as a preliminary definition of Religion in its widest sense—namely, the perception of the Infinite—can be shown by historical evidence to have been the one element shared in common by all religions. Only we must not forget that, like every other concept, that of the Infinite also had to pass through many phases in its historical evolution, beginning with the simple negation of what is finite and the assertion of an invisible Beyond, and leading up to a perceptive belief in that most real Infinite in which we live and move and have our being."

This evolution of the idea of the Infinite has been so long insisted on by Prof. Max Müller, and has been criticised from so many points of view, that it seems idle to offer further proofs of its inadequacy. The difficulty, rather waived than met in the first division of his tripartite discussion, lies in connecting the elementary stages of the evolution as thus stated with the rudimentary ideas of savages or men in an extremely low stage of mental culture. Putting the difficulty in other words, What are the connecting links by which fetishism, totemism, and similar forms of materialistic beliefs pass over into intellectual abstractions or metaphysical phases of thought? Prof. Max Müller acknowledges that the great truths of religion are, in ultimate analysis, inevitable and universal: that, to use his own words, "Given the human mind such as it is, and its environment such as it is, the concept of God and a belief in God would be inevitable." This is, no doubt, true on every ground, psychological as well as philosophical. It is one of the most elementary axioms of universal religion, though I must be permitted to add that not only Prof. Max Müller but other thinkers, who have penetrated so far into the origins of religion, are sometimes inclined to leave it out of sight. At least one of its effects should be, to beget a philosophical caution and diffidence as to theories of our religion having borrowed—in the case of some widely accepted and natural truth—from another. This may or may not have been the case, but there is no adequate room or cause for dogmatizing on the subject. Thus, to take instances adduced in the work before us and apparently credited by its learned author: the borrowing of the ethics of the Talmud by Christianity, or its appropriation of the doctrine of immortality from Zoroastrianism, or of the dogma of the incarnation from Buddhism. The truths thus alleged to be conveyed are of such a universalising character that they may easily have taken birth and form in divers religions without any direct communication from one to the other. The point here at issue is one of proof and demonstration, and these I contend are unattainable. Happily, however, they are needless. Prof. Max Müller stands upon the surest of foundations when he asks, Why should Christianity not have borrowed? for the best answer to the question is tantamount to the universalisation of the sole faith whose principles and hopes are all so essentially human.

"That Religion, I say once more, should challenge rather than deprecate comparison. If we find certain doctrines which we thought the exclusive property of Christianity in other religions also, does Christianity lose thereby, or is the truth of these doctrines impaired by being recognized by other teachers also?"

... And why should not certain truths be world-wide and universal? To me these truths seem to gain rather than to lose in power, if we accept them as springing up spontaneously in different minds, than if we maintain that they were conceived once only and then borrowed by others."

This thesis Prof. Max Müller expands with an affection and a zeal for which all genuine students of comparative religion will render him their heartiest acknowledgments. Not improbably we may regard it as the feature of his Gifford Lectures which will avail most to ensure their permanent popularity. That the position is, however, not free from danger is self-evident. A superiority which is shared in its most essential features by every individual member of a class whose relation each to the other is one of comparison and rivalry cannot claim especial pre-eminence. The moral of the comparative religionist had already been pre-adumbrated by the well-known story of Boccaccio's Rings. The inference is not greatly modified by the fact that Prof. Max Müller is able to add to the Italian storyist's trinity of religions, Buddhism, Zoroastrianism, and the religion of the Veda, with one or two less important outcomes of Aryan religious thought. That the number of Rings may have been six instead of three does not affect the conclusion, except by enlarging the Great Father's family and the embrace of his loving care for all his children. Nor is this the only difficulty which Prof. Max Müller has to encounter. When he deals, e.g., with the alleged borrowing of Christian ethics from the Jewish teaching which preceded it (p. 9)—

"All I can say is, that I have never met in the extracts from the Talmud with the most characteristic, nay, the fundamental doctrine of Christianity—the recognition of the Divine element in man or the Divine Sonship of man."

—he has forgotten how easily, nay, how inevitably, the afflatus of the Divine inspiration, whether for the Rabbi of the schools or the older Jewish Prophet, passed over into the doctrine of the Logos.

But in his treatment of the evolutionary stages of this doctrine the learned author is guilty of an inconsistency which is, in my opinion, not only pardonable but commendable. Assuming, as he has a right to do, that the Logos is the central doctrine of Christianity, he discusses the point whether Aryan or Semitic thought contributed the greater metaphysical confluent to this broader stream of spiritual apperception. In his conclusion he acknowledges himself in a minority and opposed to such eminent scholars as Harnack, Drummond, and Westcott; for, with a preference both natural and characteristic, he decides for the Aryan tributary. In my humble opinion, his decision is correct. Whoever considers the incidence and tendencies of the profoundest Greek thought, beginning with the Eleatics and ending with the Neo-Platonists, can have no doubt not only as to its capacity but its readiness to evolve such an abstraction as the Logos. At the same time, the issue is not a matter for dogmatizing. The human reason, whenever and wherever it is exercised, if the wings of its concomitant imagination are but partly fledged, is capable of much more than a helpless flutter. Like Keats's soaring imagination, the winged fancy must needs wander

"To the thought still spread beyond her."

It is just this beyondness which is given to us in our most elementary conceptions, and is demanded by the expansive aloofness that makes every individual consciousness a centre of the universe, which makes all such abstractions as the Logos a veritable necessity of thought. The concept is as much at home in Athens and Alexandria as in Antioch and Jerusalem. We may say of it, as Voltaire said of Deity, that if men had never devised an abstract Reason, if it had not formed part of every religious thought that ever existed, men would have found its invention, its scope and exercise, a primary need of their thought.

It would seem that Prof. Max Müller considers this derivation of the notion of the Logos with its correlated Infinite from Aryan rather than from Semitic thought. It is a subject that will certainly present itself for discussion in the future, without, as I have said, yielding conclusions which must be regarded as final.

This, however, forms only a part of his theme. How it is worked out in detail, especially how the sense of the Infinite is found to pervade more or less distinctly all the great World or Text-Book religions, for this and much more we must refer the reader to the pages of the book itself. Christian students interested in the question of the Logos and the evolution of that doctrine in Christianity, regarded both as an historical religion and a dogmatic creed, will probably turn to the last four lectures, wherein Prof. Max Müller has treated that theme with equal insight and learning. But the subject, as pertaining to the general history of philosophy, has been so often treated, and from so many diverse standpoints, that it cannot be truthfully alleged, even of so practised a reconstructor of philosophical systems, that he has imparted to his latest attempts in this direction anything like freshness or novelty. This, however, must not prevent the thoughtful student from perusing and benefiting by a book which is in many respects sui generis; and this chiefly from the numerous points of contact and unsuspected links, knots, and ties by which Christianity is shown to have affinity with all the great religious systems of human history.

As the final instalment of a project the execution of which has taken several years, criticism has proceeded pari passu with the undertaking. As a result, the conclusions of the critics have been arrived at, and formulated with a considerable amount of unanimity. All are agreed as to the merits of the work, its enormous research, its erudition, the charm and picturesqueness of its style, its noble catholicity of spirit; on the other hand, the defects and demerits of the book have similarly secured the consentient judgment of competent critics. There has been no conflict of judgment as to its want of originality, its discursiveness and lack of systematic plan, its repetition and occasional verbosity. Those who choose may weigh one against the other, though there cannot be in my opinion any doubt as to the conclusion on the part of those qualified to decide.

A further and final point, as to which I should have been glad to have submitted my contributory mite, is the degree in which Prof. Max Müller's work may be accepted as a fair treatment of the Religion of Nature. On this point I confess that most of the definitions and starting points on which the subject is fitly based appear to me unsatisfactory, and this remark applies to Prof. Max Müller's fellow lecturers as well as to himself. Certainly there is still a door left open, whether for future Gifford Lecturers or for religious philosophers unattached, to treat the question of Natural Religion in a free, scientific, and religious spirit, taking as their text some such question as this: What opinions and suggestions does Nature herself offer for the religious and ethical guidance of mankind, apart, i.e., from any directions or suggestions that might seem to claim directly or indirectly the starting-point or functions of what is commonly held to be Revelation?

JOHN OWEN.

With Thackeray in America. By Eyre Crowe, A.R.A. (Cassells.)

So early as August 25, 1851, and within two months of the delivery of the last of the lectures on the Humourists at Willis's Rooms, Thackeray must have been projecting a tour in the United States, for on that date Carlyle wrote to Emerson: "I hear Thackeray is coming over to lecture to you: a mad world, my masters." But the project did not take definite shape for some little time afterwards, and it was only on October 30, 1852, that he finally sailed from Liverpool.

Meanwhile he had engaged the services of Mr. Eyre Crowe as amanuensis, secretary, business-manager during the tour. Mr. Crowe, then, it is to be gathered, a young art student, had no experience of these functions, and naturally hesitated to accept them. But Thackeray, with characteristic kindness, would take no denial.

"When he noticed my hesitation as to acceptance of the post, arising, in a great measure, from my doubts as to my having the proper capacity—or 'spryness,' as he expressed it—for organising and arranging the business part of the lecturing, he pointed out that another half year would elapse before his departure, and that I could try my prentice hand during these months."

'Six months' tumbling about the world will do you no harm," clinched the business. Nor, except for one act of imprudence—sketching at a slave auction—does Thackeray appear to have had any reason to be dissatisfied with his manager. "Crowe is my immensest comfort," he writes, in one of his charming letters to Mrs. Brookfield; "I could not live without some one to take care of me, and he is the kindest and most affectionate henchman ever man had." It is to the credit of Mr. Crowe's modesty that he forbears to quote this genial testimony to his virtues.

Six months did the two spend together in the United States, seeing many men and cities, journeying from Boston to New York, and thence to Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Richmond, Charleston, Albany, and foregathering everywhere with men of light and leading. Assuredly such 'tumbling about' can have done Mr. Crowe "no harm." He himself laments that he does not possess "the stenographic power which enables many chroniclers to give the charm of the random talk of gifted men"; and we, too, may share in that regret, for here a Boswell might have done good service. Thackeray, as we know from a letter of farewell to Fitzgerald, had looked forward to this journey with some little repudiation; but once on the other side of the Atlantic, he seems, though with characteristic intervals of depression, to have enjoyed himself well, and been in his happiest temper. He liked the people, he enjoyed their humours, he pleased and was pleased. Even slavery drew from him no note of sorrow or indignation. Like Carlyle, who 'always rather liked the nigger, evidently a poor blockhead with good dispositions, with affections, attachments—with a turn for nigger melodies and the like,' so Thackeray declares, "the negroes don't shock me, or excite my compassionate feelings at all; they are so grotesque and happy that I can't cry over them."

With Thackeray in genial mood, as indeed with Thackeray in any mood, one would willingly come into closer contact. But Mr. Crowe—I have already registered his modest confession—is no Boswell. He tells us, certainly, how Thackeray declined to read Uncle Tom's Cabin, on the ground "that stories founded upon such painful themes are scarcely within the purview of story-telling." He tells us too—but that we might have guessed—how Thackeray wished to tip a group of children in the "cars" with a dollar apiece; how he met "young Meagher of the sword," and chatted with that patriot, as though no "Battle of Limerick" had ever been written; how he was inclined to wince at being bracketed, among the fashionable arrivals at Richmond, with "Mr. Anderson, wizard of the north"; how he lectured to well-nigh empty benches at Petersburg; how he was always happy "whenever he took up his gold nib for illustration of whatever struck his fancy at the time"; how cross he was when Doyle, in one of the illustrations to The New-comers, represented the boys at Charterhouse as playing at marbles. But all this is scarcely very important or very new. Perhaps the most graphic touch in the book—I am speaking of the letterpress—is that which shows us the great man writing his lecture on "Humour and Charity." He took a whole day for "the task, lying down in his favourite position in bed, smoking, while dictating fluently the phrases as they came. I took them down with little or no intermission from breakfast time till late in the dusk of the evening. The dinner gong sounded, and the manuscript was then completed. I remember his pleased exclamation at this tour de force—not usual with him—'I don't know where it's all coming from!'"

Of the illustrations to the volume it is fortunately possible to speak with more enthusiasm. They are from sketches taken by Mr. Crowe at the time, and have all the value of contemporary records, topographical and physiognomical. Here is Thackeray lecturing at New York; here is Thackeray lecturing at Boston; here are thumb-nail portraits of many notabilities; here are views of places doubtless since then much changed, and groups and single figures—the drawing of the latter showing perhaps most of the stiffness of the 'prentice craftsman. It is in these sketches, as one is tempted to say, that the value of the book resides. And yet, after all, not its whole value. Mr. Crowe's written record may be wanting in the graphic touch; but it leaves a general impression that is altogether pleasant and friendly, and therefore grateful to those—and they are innumerable—who love their Thackeray.

FRANK T. MARZIALS.

Admiral Farragut. By Capt. A. T. Mahan, U. S. Navy. (Sampson Low.)

THIS volume is the first of a series of "Great Commanders," of which General Grant Wilson is the editor; and it records the career of Admiral Farragut, one of the heroes of the mighty war of Secession, and perhaps the most distinguished seaman of his time. The work, compressed into 326 pages, is necessarily only a short sketch. But it has been compiled, with assiduous care, from original sources of information; and when we state that the author is Capt. Mahan, this sufficiently proves it is a good book. It shows the peculiar merits of the eminent author—clear insight, research, a keen perception of the nature of the operations of war at sea, an admirable appreciation of real warriors, and a power of description, not brilliant, but well calculated to place before us the character of naval manoeuvres and battles.

Farragut has been fortunate in his biographer; Capt. Mahan has brought out distinctly the fine parts of this great captain; and he has done justice to his strategic skill, to his conspicuous boldness and firmness of purpose, and, above all, to his genius for command—his capacity as a born leader of men. We should not place Farragut, as the author does, on the same level with Nelson: he had not equal opportunities or so grand a career; but unquestionably the American chief displayed many of Nelson's special merits, and stands in the foremost rank of worthies at sea. It is deplorable to compare this abridgment with the English biographies of our great naval hero. The slight sketch of Southey is still the best of these; but the pages of Southey, if clear and vivid, are those of a student, and smell of the lamp. The pages of Capt. Mahan smell of the sea, like one of Smollett's or Marryatt's novels, and bring events before us in a living drama.

David Glasgow Farragut was born in 1801—a scion of an ancient and noble Spanish family, which had emigrated from Minorca to North America about the time of the War of Independence, and had finally settled near New Orleans, the first scene of the future commander's exploits. In the case of Farragut, as in that of Moltke, old age came before renown was won; but, unlike Moltke, Farragut had experience of war before his teens. Through the kindness of Porter, one of the best officers of the war of 1812-13—the father of the chief of 1862-5—the boy was entered a midshipman on board the Essex, a small but fine frigate of the United States navy; and he won his first spurs by his coolness and courage in the duel between the Essex and the English frigate Phoebe, described very graphically by Capt. Mahan. Farragut also gave proof of real promise in other passages of the cruise of the Essex; and on one or two occasions afterwards, while the war continued, he displayed the readiness, the promptness, and the faculty of command which were among his distinctive qualities. During the long peace, which in both hemispheres—save for intervals of no great importance—followed the close of the Napoleonic era, Farragut, as was inevitable, rose very slowly, was almost laid on the shelf for years, was consigned to the routine of a naval yard official, and had scarcely an opportunity to show his powers. Having entered the navy in 1812, he was still only a captain in 1860; he had repeatedly applied for employment in vain; and he seems not to have been a favourite with the men on the Navy Board at Washington. He was, nevertheless, known as an excellent officer among his professional comrades; and he had turned to the best advantage the opportunities of study and observation afforded to him. During this long period he had been more than once in the Mediterranean and other seas of Europe; he had been a spectator of Baudin's attack on St. Juan de Ulloa in 1838, which made a lasting impression on him; and from these experiences his active mind, comprehensive at once and attentive to details and penetrating in a high degree, had drawn fruitful lessons as to the new conditions of naval warfare being evolved, and as to the strategy and tactics to be adapted to them. The time, however, was one of naval stagnation and decline in the service of the United States; and when the Crimean War broke out, a request made by Farragut to be allowed to inspect the operations of the Allies on the spot, and to report on the work done by their fleets, was disregarded by the Navy Department.

To Farragut, as to other eminent men, the great Civil War of 1861-5 proved the flood-tide that led on to fortune. His conduct, when the rebellion broke out, showed his firmness of purpose and decision of will. His associations had always been with the South, his home had been for some years in Virginia; but he instantly pronounced for the cause of the North, and set off for New York with his family. This resolve probably was the cause that raised him at once to high command. When the war had taken a decisive turn, and the importance was fully perceived of cutting in two the Confederate States in the Far West, Farragut was appointed to the blockade of the Gulf; and he was consulted as to the possibility of mastering the course of the Mississippi, where it approaches the sea, and taking possession of New Orleans. His subsequent operations give ample proof of moral courage of the highest order, of strategic capacity, and of skill in tactics. The entrance to the Mississippi was closed by two forts; and nearly all the naval and military chiefs, and even, it would seem, the men in power at Washington, were of opinion that these should be reduced before an attempt was made to ascend the river and take New Orleans. But Farragut insisted that the forts could be passed under the fire of the fleet placed under his orders, and that if this were done they would ere long succumb, cut off from the city and their communications with it; and he was allowed to carry out his project, though the permission was ambiguous to say the least. The fine and decisive passage of arms that followed is admirably described by Capt. Mahan, but we can do little more than refer to it. After taking precautions to remove obstacles, and pouring in a protracted fire of mortars, the attack was boldly begun at night; and notwithstanding the batteries of the forts and the efforts of a hostile flotilla, Farragut forced his way up the river with success. His previsions were then completely realised: New Orleans surrendered amid scenes of anarchy; and the forts, isolated from their supports, proved to be no longer tenable. It was a brilliant and well-conceived stroke; and the entrance to the Mississippi having been won, an avenue into the heart of the South was opened. Farragut next took part in the first advance up the great river upon Vicksburg. The enterprise, as is well known, failed; but we incline to think that it may have suggested the successful operations that soon followed. In 1863, Farragut—he had been made an admiral—performed a service of immense importance, of which there is an excellent account in this book. By this time Grant and Porter had begun the enterprise that ended in the fall of Vicksburg and ruined the Confederacy in the West; but their first operations had been difficult in the extreme, and had been attended with little success. Farragut, whose fleet was lower down the river, had been blockading Fort Hudson and the adjoining region; but he now resolved to join hands with his colleagues, and to assist them in their arduous efforts. He forced the passage of the Mississippi at Fort Hudson; and, though two only of his ships got through, and the attack was attended with loss, the success he gained was of the greatest value. Co-operating with Porter, he patrolled the course of the stream, sent off supplies from Vicksburg, and from the Confederate armies at hand. He, in fact, attained the decisive object of separating the forces of the South from their base; and the occupation of the Mississippi along this line contributed powerfully, not only to the fall of Vicksburg, but to the ultimate result of the war.

In these operations Farragut had displayed conspicuous tactical and strategic power, and above all the decision of character which accepts responsibility, whatever the burden. In his next passage of arms he gave proof of the inspiration that belongs to great chiefs only—the daring that plucks a triumph from danger—the inspiration of Nelson at Copenhagen, when he set at naught the signal of Parker and went on with the stubborn and still doubtful fight. Captain Mahan's description of this fine episode is certainly the most striking part of his book: it is an admirable sketch of a naval contest. After the fall of Vicksburg and the occupation of the Mississippi by the forces of the North, the Confederate States were half subdued, and it was proposed to complete the ruin at hand by an advance into their exhausted central provinces. The famous march of Sherman was planned; but the original intention of Grant was that Sherman should descend on Mobile, and not on Savannah, while he was to move in person on Richmond, and Sherman was to join hands with Farragut in chief command of the squadron in the Gulf. This design, however, was not carried out; but it led to the celebrated fight in the Bay of Mobile, the most brilliant of Farragut's exploits. The entrance to Mobile, as at New Orleans, was closed by two forts, one of much power; and the defences were strengthened by a chain of torpedoes thrown across the only available channel, and by the Tennessee, a heavily armed ram. Farragut advanced boldly against the forts; but the Tecumseh, a monitor, his leadingship, was sunk by the bursting of a torpedo; the Brooklyn was stopped, backed, and went out of her course, and the Admiral's line fell into confusion. One chance, and perhaps one chance only, of avoiding disastrous failure remained: Farragut, who had placed himself in the tops of his flagship, steered the Hartford directly upon the torpedoes, exclaiming, "Damn them," in true sailor's phrase; and fortunately not one of these mines exploded. The squadron followed the audacious chief; the channel being opened, the line was restored; and the Tennessee, which attacked recklessly, was literally pounded to pieces by her surrounding enemies. In a short time the forts were surrendered, and Farragut mastered Mobile and the region around, having done one of the boldest deeds that was ever done by an heroic seaman. This was the last exploit of his brilliant career. The Civil War soon came to an end; and Farragut was honoured by his grateful countrymen as the worthy compeer of Grant and Sherman, the great leaders of the armies of the North. Five years of renown remained to the famous seaman, whose name was now known in all lands, and Farragut was received with the highest distinction in Europe. He passed quietly away in 1870; and he stands eminent among the naval men of his time for skill, heroism, and grand force of character. We have nothing but praise for this sketch of his life; it is creditable to England that we have no biography of Blake, Hawke, St. Vincent, and, above all, Nelson, that deserves to be compared to it.

WILLIAM O'CONNOR MORRIS.

Seen in Three Days. Written, Drawn, and Tinted, by Edwin J. Ellis. (Bernard Quaritch.)

MRS. MEYNELL, writing upon the Odes of Mr. Patmore, has remarked: "What some of the Odes have to sing of, their author does not insist upon our knowing. He leaves more liberty for a well-intentioned reader's error than makes for peace and recollection of mind in reading." I take the courteous and happy phrase, and apply it in some measure to this notable work by Mr. Ellis. It is probable enough, it seems apparent from the style and manner of the work, that to its author it is of a childlike and persuasive simplicity: it has no oracular pomp and pride, no airs of conscious and delighted mystery: there is an unassuming sincerity about it, it seems not to doubt its own innocent clearness of intention. It is a record of dreams, told, as it were, in a dream: the reader can hardly follow the narrative plan, he too wanders along in a dream. A comparison may serve to indicate the kind of strange and impressive thing it is. Emerson's best piece of blank verse is his Days:

"Damsels of Time, the hypocritic Days,
Muffled and dumb like barefoot Dervishes,
And marching single in an endless file,
Bring diadems and fagots in their hands.
To each they offer gifts after his will,
Bread, kingdoms, stars, and sky that holds them all.

I, in my pleached garden, watched the pomp.
Forgot my morning wishes, hastily
Took a few herbs and apples, and the Day Turned and departed scornful. I, too late,
Under her solemn fillet saw the scorn."

Is that vision or allegory, or something fantastic between the two? In any case, imagine a whole connected procession of such scenes, a pageant of them emerging out of mist and into mist: a visionary landscape, a visionary spectator, a visionary sense of consecutive action. Seen in Three Days is somewhat of this sort. One reads and looks, with the dreamer's serene conviction, that his dreams are as logical as they are beautiful: but one reflects and remembers, with the pleasing confusion of the awakened man. The effect of the work is extrainary; De Quincey's opiate dreams are more artfully true. Add to the lulling enoe of the verse the designs which company it, its large clear writing, the plete impression of a single artistic power work upon the whole, and you will feel itself in the presence of a piece of art ater than you can express or explain. was seen in his poems, Fate in Arcadia, . Ellis is very much at home with dream- d, and with the universe of mythology, l with the eternal powers. Ever curious ut the origins of things, their universal ditions, their cosmology, he can speak of ne and Fate and Love, and all that npany, as other poets speak of Helen d Juliet, Hector and Hamlet. Reading n we are carried away in thought to imitive contemplation and philosophers : Rerum Natura. Positively, the writings t Mr. Ellis throw light upon such problems e the origin of religion, the sources of myth, e rise of metaphysics. Most of us know t Time, that it flies; of Fate, that it is exorable; of Death, that it is inevitable. r. Ellis will tell you all the ancestral nd personal history of them; their aims, ows, relations, conflicts, as though it ere "the tale of Troy divine," or the wanderings of Ulysses. I doubt whether e could write a narrative poem about men and women with half the ease and success which he would show in a poem about the grayest of the Eternities. Kant was not more at ease among his Anschauungsformen, and the rest of it, nor Wagner among the intricacies of his orchestration, than is Mr. Ellis with the vivid personalities of his dreams, myths, visions. Shelley in his way, and Hugo in his, were not more familiar with the creatures of their personifying imaginations. Sometimes Mr. Ellis does but give us a pretty fancy: he is capable of writing triolets on freewill and ballades on necessity, or of singing the flirtations of time and space. But he would do it daintily and with charm, not in the famous manner of the "Loves of the Triangles" and Dr. Erasmus Darwin. Had Hegel been a poet of quick fancy and fine imagination, he would have written like Mr. Ellis. The great myths, again, of Plato, the mystical interpretation of the Neo-Platonists, belong to this ancient borderland of poetry and philosophy. But whereas many poets, who attempt this difficult style, are grievously ill at ease in it, as may be thought of Goethe in the second part of Faust, Mr. Ellis has an airiness and humour, a perfect freedom from the solemn pomp common to sibylline writers: we recognise that to him his work is natural, a necessity of himself. Even when he seems, now and again, to indulge his fancy for very wantonness of power, very excess of facility, he would still say, in that favourite phrase of Plato, that "something of the kind" is true, if not this very thing.

The poems of the "Three Nights," with their illustrations, remind me rather of the old "Emblem" writers and designers, in the spirit of them, not in the letter, than of the positive mystics; there are poems in Fate in Arcadia admirably mystical, but not here. These are rather visions of the night: the pictures are imageries of sleep, arrested by the poet and artist, and treated less as symbols than as allegories. The chariot of Dante's Purgatory, the procession of Shelley's Triumph of Life, might have so been witnessed in a dream, though they have not that elusive and shifting precision of those dreams. For these scenes are precise, yet hazy: one gives way to another without irrationality, yet always with something of strangeness and surprise. The book defies quotation, except for isolated beauties of phrase; I will but give a few descriptive lines from one of the most memorable pictures:

"I looked and saw a ladder of gold wings Reared through the night, while two swift men came down.
One bore the name of Dumb-show on a veil Bound round his lips. His arms moved free and high.
His eyes threw out such flying lights, it seemed As though white birds flew round him. But his friend,
With open mouth singing the way along,
Was bound on hands and eyes, and for his name
'Blind-words' was written gold upon his veil."

Mr. Ellis has proved in other work, as in his discreet chapter upon Blake's art, that he is a craftsman of imaginative strength, with a certain "right divine," akin to that of Blake and of Rossetti, now and then to go wrong in technical matters. It is never quite pardonable, it is always to be regretted; yet something of the beauty in the best of these designs is due to the designer's evident delight in his vision; they are fresh and living. And they are finely congruous with their text: the virtues and the vices are the same, alike in poems and in designs. It may be well to correct two misapprehensions about the book: the whole of it and every copy of it comes straight from the author's hands, with no intervention of any mechanical process; and it is in no sense due to the study or imitation of Blake, being mainly the work of days before Mr. Ellis was drawn to the service of that master with whom his name is so honourably associated. Apart from the minute merits of the work, it is pleasant to come across so exhilarated and ardent an artist: one who is so clearly enamoured of his work, so happily laborious, so careless of a conventional welcome and success. Faults there are, imperfections and flaws, excess and deficiency; but for all that, it is a brave work. As the author has sung elsewhere:

"No waking hours, no sleep shall find
The world's continual dream revealed.
The Living Word is silent mind,
And every book is closed and sealed."

LIONEL JOHNSON.

History of Sligo, County and Town, from the Close of the Revolution of 1688 to the Present Time. By W. G. Wood-Martin. (Dublin: Hodges, Figgis & Co.)

THE concluding volume of Col. Wood-Martin's history displays all the merits and all the faults of its predecessors. There is much in it to interest the historian, the naturalist, and the lover of folk-lore, but withal so badly arranged and so carelessly written as to deprive it of half its value.

Sentences like the following, chosen at random, occur again and again:

"The peasantry of the County of Sligo—at least those of the Roman Catholic religion—although secretly organised and sworn to assist the French on their landing, yet had not that event taken place, it was generally thought they would not have risen in rebellion."

Defects of style and composition generally revenge themselves on the author; but there are other and more serious reasons that make us wish that Col. Wood-Martin had spent a little more care both in writing and in revising his book. For example, it is not true, baldly stated, that politics was the rock on which the Volunteer movement made shipwreck, unless indeed we are to assume that the acquisition of free trade and parliamentary independence was not directly due to the influence of the Volunteers. Then again the sarcastic reference to Curran as "a great stickler for purity," besides being in the worst possible taste, is altogether without point when the conditions of Irish parliamentary life are taken into account.

These, however, are matters of general history, only distantly connected with Sligo; and Col. Wood-Martin may be pardoned if, in the heat of party strife, he cannot always refrain from an oblique attack on his opponents. The chapter on "Pestilence, Famine, Emigration, and Population," though slighter than the subject seems to require, contains some interesting statistics relative to the decrease of population in the county since the forties. And it is certainly curious to find that, while the native population has steadily declined, the number of English, Scotch and foreign immigrants has every year been growing larger. Col. Wood-Martin offers no explanation of this phenomenon, which is still further complicated by the fact that, since 1857, land has been gradually going out of tillage. Take, too, the trade of the county. At the beginning of the century, when the population was certainly not less than it is now, Sligo did an excellent export trade in corn and butter. At the present time, though the butter-market returns a slight profit, the corn-market is worked at a loss. The linen manufacture also, which at one time gave employment to hundreds, is now practically extinct. What relation, if any, we would like to know, have these facts to the question of diminished population? Emigration is, no doubt, an effectual method of relieving a country of its superfluous population; but the question arises whether the population, in the case of Sligo, is really superfluous or not, and whether continued emigration may not be a remedy worse than the disease it is intended to cure. Col. Wood-Martin touches lightly on the subject of rent; but it is a significant fact, surely, that rents have on the average been reduced by the Land Commissioners twenty per cent. Col. Wood-Martin, indeed, claims that "in the Land Commission Court a too willing ear is given to the extravagant claims made by the tenants for alleged improvements," that "no regard is given to the continually recurring fact that tenants have often wilfully and repeatedly run out their lands," that "in the constitution of the courts the legal element is too weak, the popular element too strong." But of the truth of these allegations we have unfortunately no means of judging. It appears that the average annual value per statute acre was, in 1873, 9s. 4d. per acre; but seeing that this included pasture and bog (comprising some 350,000 acres), as well as arable land (amounting to 90,000 acres), we are left in the dark as to the value of the latter per acre—a point of considerable importance. Of the 17,994 holdings in the county in 1881, more than one-third were under £4 valuation, and considerably more than two-thirds at or under £10. But here again it would be interesting to know what proportion these 13,515 holdings bear to the total amount of land under cultivation in the county. Finally, Col. Wood-Martin's opinion that emigration and the diminution of population has considerably improved the material and moral condition of the Sligo peasantry seems hardly to be confirmed by his quotation from Inglis (p. 342) as to the state of affairs in 1833.

On the whole, Col. Wood-Martin is to be congratulated on the completion of his task. As a county history it leaves much to be desired. It is not always reliable or impartial; but it is a useful work, and as such it will not fail to receive the attention it deserves.

R. DUNLOP.

NEW NOVELS.

Innes of Blairavon. By Colin Middleton. In 3 vols. (Hurst & Blackett.)

The Nameless City. By Stephen Grail. (Osgood, McIlvaine & Co.)

A Woman and Pitiful. By M. M. Black. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.)

When a Woman's Single. By M. Eastwood. (Ward & Downey.)

The Girl Musician. By M. Young. (Digby, Long & Co.)

The Broadmoor Patient and the Poor Clerk. By Frederick Wicks. (Remington.)

Seven Stories. By Hélène G. A. Gingold. (Remington.)

MR. COLIN MIDDLETON has, in Innes of Blairavon, given a good, substantial, if in parts unequal, story of an old-fashioned but enjoyable kind. Perhaps he would have acted more wisely, had he refrained from combining two such diametrically opposed things as smooth country-house life in Ayrshire and equally typical "roughing it" in Australia. Both are presented with considerable skill and obvious fidelity to truth. But Mr. Middleton should have kept the two veins for different novels. As things are, the elder Innes and his fortune-seeking adventures at the Antipodes will generally be preferred to the younger Innes and his rather ill-compacted and occasionally too sensational narrative. Poor Reid, an expatriated George Warrington, whose life a woman's infidelity has totally wrecked, and whose very loyalty to his friend is dashed with tragedy, is a remarkably well-drawn and well-developed character. He is ruined, and drags down his old friend into poverty with him. But there is nothing savouring of weakness or unscrupulousness about him, though Mrs. Innes not unnaturally suspects him of treachery; and the description of his death-bed scene as witnessed by young Allan Innes is admirable in its way. The romance of Allan, although it occupies a far larger number of these pages than his father's, is not nearly so well—perhaps because it is more ambitiously—told. The incident of poor, plain (although she improves with time) Miss Ventry, who, in Tenerife makes passionate love to Allan, and who proclaims "I will do anything for you, I will be anything to you, yes, your mistress if you do not care to marry me," looks like an attempt to intrude a Parisian liaison into a Scotch village. The school-mastering episode in Allan's life is suggestive of caricature too; and as a type of constancy disguised in inconstancy, Muriel is too obviously a copy of some girl or other that has done duty in fiction before. But the Scotch characters are all good and consistent from first to last, even although it may be allowed that the peppery old general's gout and swearing are as much in evidence as Mr. Carker's teeth. Mr. Middleton might do worse than concentrate his energies, at least for a year or two, on the writing of short stories of country—and especially country-house—life.

This, at least, may be said of The Nameless City, that it is a book for readers in need of a new sensation. Mr. Stephen Grail—is this a pseudonym?—has chosen to disport himself in the fantastical, rather than in the melodramatic, field, and, to judge by results, has acted wisely. He has gone into Rommany Land, and there "wonders from the familiar" start at his bidding. A Mrs. Ingraham, whom Mr. Lancelot Challice has met and flirted with in quite the modern style at Damascus—she is "swathed in Eastern silks, a modern Cleopatra in appearance, leaning against the low parapet"—turns out to be a gipsy of the gipsies, and so in the long run does he. But both have to reckon with Pepa, who is more decidedly Rommany than either, and who, conceiving a passion for Challice, resolves to destroy everything and everybody that stand in the way of that passion. So Mrs. Ingraham and Challice, notwithstanding a certain jade eye, and in spite of a faithful gipsy attendant, find it no easy task to escape from the clutches of a very Superior Fiend, who is a combination of Cleopatra, Mr. Rider Haggard's She, and Semiramis, with a Napoleonic conscience thrown in. There is a fantastic sequence of hairbreadth escapes, which occasionally makes the book border on the burlesque, and the final chapter suggests nothing so much as the awakening from a bad dream. But taken as a whole, the story is powerful and well put together; the majority of the characters have all the appearance of reality; and as the author has learned the art of writing sentences of fashionable length, his book reads well.

The note of A Woman and Pitiful is simplicity—of plot and of style alike—and after reading it, that much-pitied, yet more-to-be-envied, person, the ordinary reader, will not greatly regret that such is the case. The writer, it is true, aims at a certain up-to-dateness. This, although her chief scenes are laid amidst the sheltered quietudes of Deeside, her leading female personage has a past almost as mysterious and chequered as Mr. Oscar Wilde's "Woman of no Importance," and her male villains speak as cynically and behave as badly as do blackguards and women worthy of them in Society. But they are not quite up to the mark. There is a suspicion of dowdiness about Effie Reid's summer costume in the frontispiece; and although the scoundrelly young Duff's moustache is curled in the regulation fashion, his trousers seem to be "built" with something approaching to rustic inelegance. There is a corresponding clumsiness in the author's provincial imitation of metropolitan vice and unscrupulousness. Yet, when all this is allowed, the fundamental naturalness of A Woman and Pitiful should be cordially recognised. Effie Reid, too, is a careful study of a Scotch girl who, although easily impressed, is, from her being carefully nurtured and well watched, incapable of "going astray" to any serious extent, or even in any real sense. Tom Leighton, too, is a young Scotchman of a kind that is certain to be found in certain Northern circles. Yet it is to be wished that he had been endowed with a little more paganism or hot Celtic passion, and had in consequence inflicted a severe chastisement not only on the young cad Jack Duff, but on that infinitely more detestable scoundrel, Major Ross.

There is certainly no reason why the experiences of a female teacher should not be dealt with in fiction: the author of Jay Eyre has shown how much genius can make of them. At the same time, they should be treated naturally, and not in the spirit of violence, caprice, or contrast. It is doubtful, however, if the author of When a Woman's Single has borne this rule in mind. It is not absolutely impossible, of course, that a governess should in the course even of a very brief period experience such remarkable "humours of a sedate profession," as Miss Eastwood styles vaulting from the Scotch Highlands into the heart of Yorkshire, and from the heart of Yorkshire into Russia. But it will be allowed that such a variety is so improbable as to tread, especially for purposes of fiction, on the incredible. If, however, each of the governess's experiments or experiences be taken by itself, it will be found to be artistic and so far satisfactory. There is humour—although a trifle subacid—in Miss Seton's narrative of her unpleasant visit to Skye. Mrs. Fraser, the mistress of the Scotch establishment in which Miss Seton finds herself, looks rather a caricature of an ultra-austere Scotswoman, even in the Highlands. No doubt a girl fresh from bright English surroundings would find life with such folk as the Frasers appalling in its dreariness, and the behaviour of the minister an unpardonable atrocity; but picturing them in cold blood, she would hardly have misrepresented them. Fraser himself, however, with his not quite real joviality, is an excellent sketch. But of course Miss Seton is most at home among her own people, and therefore the second or English sketch is the best of the three in this volume. There is a typical parson in it, who is quite fit to figure on a larger stage than that which Miss Eastwood provides in When a Woman is Single.

There is no fin de siècle or other affectation about The Girl Musician; and that is the best thing that can be said about it. Given a bright and essentially genuine little girl, with a turn for music and a capacity for bending both old and young men to her will, given also, on the part of an author, simple, old-fashioned views of life, and the production of such a story as The Girl Musician ought to be a tolerably easy task. There is nothing magnetically attractive, it is true, in Queenie, as there perhaps ought to be about any girl who is destined to do wonders as a musician.

"Her face was refined, and pale-bleached by the London atmosphere. Her eyes, large, blue, and lustrous, at once arrested attention, for they gave to her face an almost heavenly expression."

Queenie is not, however, the strongest—although she is ostensibly the leading—character in this story. The best sketches are those of the old bear, Colonel Dysart, whom Queenie civilises, the boy lover, Ronald, and the good apprentice, Norman. The tragic element contributed by the bad apprentice, Seaton, and his repudiated wife, Rose, might have been dispensed with, as being, at the best, artificial.

Of the two studies in impossible, or barely possible, humanity which Mr. Wicks offers in his new volume, the first, which shows diabolism of the Cream, Deeming, or Whitechapel Fiend sort pushed over the cliff into insanity, is by far the stronger. There is something more than a suspicion of playing to the Dickensian gallery in "The Poor Clerk." John Browser, so long as he is sternly honest, is almost an heroic figure, battling with misfortune, an unscrupulous employer, and the east wind, even although his overcoat is in the pawnshop and he has to "make shift with two waistcoats and his frock-coat buttoned over them." There is a Christmas Carol appearance, too, about the picture that is given of poverty borne with more than cheerfulness by the Browser household. But, in the end, John's heroism breaks down. He declines to outrage his conscience and victimise his employer's partner, Moors, by palming off a fictitious stock-book for a real one. But "who can conceive of his horror at the discovery that the fictitious stock-book was the stock-book on the basis of which the business had been taken over by the surviving partner?" John's "horror" may be conceived readily enough, but not his failure to be true to his best self by resigning his post as head book-keeper to the firm of Moors & Co., when he discovered that he had simply escaped from the clutches of one swindler to fall into the power of another. "The Broadmoor Patient" is a much more successful performance than "The Poor Clerk." It is a study in what is nowadays styled "moral insanity," unhealthy, perhaps, or morbid, but decisively powerful. Felix Carlston is drawn on by an all-dominating egotism to commit first one murder, then a second, then a third. Mr. Wicks scores a distinct success in allowing his readers to find out for themselves when exactly it is that Felix becomes mad. He is not mad—in the Broadmoor sense, at all events—when he murders Ben Landrell and Miriam; for he is animated to those crimes by motives of the ordinary sane kind. But he is quite mad when he murders James Crowley. When does his mind actually get unhinged? "The Broadmoor Patient" is fascinating in spite of its horrors, and Ben Landrell is a good sketch of a rather rare kind. But Mr. Wicks is obviously more at ease—indeed, he manifestly requires considerable elbow-room—in a long than in a short story.

It is greatly to be regretted that the really clever and promising author of Seven Stories should have prefixed to them a self-conscious preface, in which she says, among many unnecessary things, "I claim no especial distinction or inspiration for my book, only that I wrote more with Nature than with Art." Such a preface is calculated to prevent many readers from testing the contents of the book itself, for they naturally resent instructions which come in effect to "when taken to be well shaken." As a matter of fact, all of these stories are well written, and only one, which is altogether allegorical, can be said to be tedious. Then Miss Gingold has her cynicism and her pathos, and her "interpretation of life," and all the rest of it. Of her Seven against Mrs. Grundy (more or less), one can hardly help preferring those which are not painfully tragic, but only daintily wicked. Nothing could be finer in its way than that "sketch from real life" (save the mark!) to which is given the title, "Whose was the Guilt?" Mrs. Farquhar, "handsome, with that peculiar beauty belonging to Cleopatra"—in other words, "long, lithe, and fairly well covered"—bribes her husband's mistress to give him an overdose of chloral that she may marry Lord Fethered's coronet. She achieves her object—and that is all. "How Tom Bellamy won My Lord Hertford's Wager" is also a clever story of old-fashioned conspiracy and wickedness. But why should it end well? No fault, however, can be found with "The Two Brothers"; it is unmitigated fatalism and tragedy.

WILLIAM WALLACE.

SOME COUNTRY BOOKS.

Stray Sport. By J. Moray Brown. In 2 vols. (Blackwoods.) Indian sports are here treated, especially spearing the wild boar in Bengal, and that miscellaneous shooting which is generally to be found on the edge of an encampment. English sport is chiefly confined to wild and covert shooting and fly-fishing. It cannot be conscientiously affirmed that there is any novelty in these chapters. Hundreds of writers have told how wild boars run "jink," charge, and the like, while every sportsman has enjoyed ordinary English shooting. Nor does Mr. Brown make any fresh observations on the creatures shot or caught by hook and line. But he is very enthusiastic, and this quality will commend his cheery narratives to many. It is a pity that he strains at comic effects, after the fashion of sporting writers in the "thirties." His right eye thus becomes the right "optic"; so simple a creature as a rabbit is dubbed "Master Bunny" or "cuniculus parvus." When a snipe is not "Jack Snipe, Esq.," it becomes "Scolopax," or, to give him his full and proper title, "gallinago." What Mr. Brown's old school-master would have said to "facile descensus Avernii" can easily be surmised. Too many stories similar to these have been published of late, and when these are not recommended by either fresh studies of nature or grace of style, there seems no sufficient reason for their publication. Many men, however, read with avidity sporting narratives of slight pretension to excellence, and they may be pleased with Mr. Brown's experiences. For the rest, his chapter on types of sportsmen seems the best in the book; and it must not be forgotten that these two volumes are well and plentifully illustrated.

Some Country Sights and Sounds. By Phil Robinson. (Fisher Unwin.) To a deep love of animals and a keen appreciation of the oddities of their habits, Mr. Robinson here superadds a strong liking for amusing paradoxes respecting them. Choosing, for instance, a sparrow, a rabbit, or a mongoose, he draws upon a wide knowledge of nature and much reading to weave fantastic speculations respecting them, heaps up ludicrous suggestions, views the subject from different points, and treats it generally in a humorous fashion. For boys, children, and wild beasts he has much sympathy; and when the former get lost or sleep in out-of-the-way nooks and corners, he writes of them in a comical vein. On the other hand, this book is disfigured by an undue straining after effect, as might almost be guessed from its aim. There is much affectation throughout, and (at least, in one place, treating of the Scapegoat) considerable flippancy. Every here and there, too, Mr. Robinson's style smacks too much of the commonplace book, as, when writing of the eagle, he continues:—

"So great is its fame that Nature borrows its title for a supreme epithet, as in the phrases—'eagle skies,' 'eagle tempests,' and likens the cloud to its wing, the sun to its eyes. It towers overhead, 'the feathered king,' 'the bird of Jove,' 'royal,' 'wide ruling,' 'imperial,' 'thunder-grasping,' 'Olympian,' 'lord of light,' 'lord of land and sea.'"

A little mild fun is made out of a missionary attacking a wolf with an umbrella, and out of the town boys, who appear in such numbers at twilight: "A number of such boys together looks like a rag-shop stampeded—as if the wares in some old clothes' store had revolted and were in full flight." Mr. Robinson's essays much resemble a kitten playing with a ball. It rolls it over and over, paws it sideways, springs over it and the like; and so the author looks at an anecdote, now on this side, now on that, reverses, restores, and puts it now in this ludicrous position, now in another, but always with an eye to the fun he can extract from it, and always in a tender-hearted, sympathetic mood. Sometimes that fun is merely verbal, as when a lad in the twilight becomes "a crepuscular boy," or a hungry wolf is "rewarded by the accident of foregathering with a discursive kidding;" and this is scarcely the highest style of humour. Sometimes the author allows himself to use strange phrases—"leisured hours," "reliable authority," and the like. "Grey-billed rooks" are not seen in nature—their bills are black; it is the skin at the base which is grey. Mr. Robinson's is a pleasant book with which to sit for half-an-hour in the autumnal sunshine. Probably he would himself assign it no higher purpose.

Our Household Insects: An Account of the Insect-pests found in Dwelling-houses. By E. A. Butler. (Longmans.) A book of this kind has long been wanted—not too technical for the ordinary reader, yet sufficiently scientific to please the entomologist. Mr. Butler has, with this in view, reprinted a series of articles from Knowledge. Their thoroughness, and the many interesting details he appends after carefully describing the anatomy of each insect, will delight practical students of Nature. The economy of all these creatures is more or less obnoxious to house wives. Here they will find full particulars of their foes, cellar beetles and clothes' moths, gnats, blue-bottles, and much more unsavoury insects. The pest of all book lovers, the "silver-fish" or "silver coloured book-worm" is fully described. Hooke, in 1665, was the first to draw it, and Mr. Blades reproduced it in his Enemies of Books. Together with Anobium paniceum, the one drilling holes in old books, the other biting portions off the pages, they make up the creature, execrated by all librarians, the book-worm. The "silver fish's" scientific name describes both his likings and his nature, Lepisma saccharina. Mr. Butler writes in a pleasant, direct manner; and his book forms as useful an introduction to entomology as the Kirby and Spence of our childhood, inasmuch as good representatives of insect life in general are found among the plagues which visit dwelling-houses. Mr. Butler's pages are fully and excellently illustrated with figures, and several photographic enlargements of insects and their anatomy. Even the miscellaneous reader will find these chapters interesting. Mr. Butler may be congratulated on having done an excellent spell of work in identifying, classifying, and describing insects known to most men by sight, but only fully understood by entomologists.

Hours in My Garden and other Nature-Sketches. By A. H. Japp. (Hogg.) The first part of this book consists of musings on English birds and beasts, and the best page in it speculates on the manner in which insect or seed-eating birds (as the starling) have gradually changed into fruit-eaters. The later chapters treat of the Tweed, Durham, and Border scenery. All are well-meaning, but commonplace. Dr. Japp allows himself at times queer phraseology. To "delectate himself," "a low surruration," "the aromas of song and ballad," and a "hidling-place" (which but for the other examples might be charitably ascribed to a misprint for "hiding-place") do not much commend themselves to a lover of English. Many of the engravings of Hours in My Garden are old friends, and did duty fourteen years ago in very different pages. Dr. Japp's efforts to "write up" to them are at times sufficiently amusing. A cut of a boy with a stake from the hedge, beating off a bull which disturbed an angler in the original, now figures as illustrating the attack of a bull upon the author in a morning walk. The latter "clutches one of the gate-posts, luckily not so firmly fixed in the earth as it might have been," and waits for the attack. "On he came, his mouth foaming, his eyes aflame; but before he could make the leap, down came the heavy post on his head and he turned as though stunned." A matador might envy this feat. We are tolerably acquainted with rustic life, but a gate-post is the last weapon we should choose wherewith to encounter a raging bull. Dr. Japp even finds a moral in the story: "In this case it only imparted the element of adventure and danger needed to make my morning walk more and more a true image of human life." The cuts as well as the letter-press connected with Loch Housa and Sunderland Bridge in Dr. Japp's book have also experienced wondrous transformations.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MESSRS. GEORGE BELL & SONS will publish shortly a handsome library edition, in three volumes, of Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy, edited by the Rev. A. R. Shilleto, who has taken the utmost pains to ensure a correct text and to verify the numerous quotations. Mr. A. H. Bullen has written an introduction; while the illustrations include a portrait of Burton, after the picture in Brasenose College, and a reproduction of the original symbolic title-page.

WE understand that the first volume of Social England, edited by Mr. H. D. Traill, will be published by Messrs. Cassell & Co. in about a fortnight's time.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & Co. will publish next week The Diary of Colonel Peter Hawker, author of the classical "Instructions to Young Sportsmen." It will form two volumes, with portraits and other illustrations; and will have an introduction by Sir Ralph Payne-Gallwey.

MESSRS. EYRE AND SPOTTISWOODE announce the early publication of The Army Book for the British Empire, by Lieut.-Gen. W. H. Goodenough and Lieut.-Col. J. C. Dalton. The work will be arranged in four parts, of which the first will be devoted to tracing out the gradual development of the British army system. Part II. will deal with the components of the army, with some references to history. Part III. will treat (1) of that important branch of the army, imperial and native, which is stationed in our Indian empire, and (2) of the forces raised in the colonies for their own defence. Part IV. will deal with the army in war time, setting forth the situation which would obtain both at home and at the seat of war in the event of our having to mobilise for home defence, or of having to despatch an expeditionary force abroad. The book contains portraits of the Queen and the Duke of Cambridge, and two maps.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN will publish next week a new book by the author of "How to be Happy though Married." It will treat of The Sunny Days of Youth, and is dedicated to the author's dead child.

THE books of travel to be published by Messrs. Sampson Low & Co. during the autumn season include the following: Chinese Central Asia, by Dr. Henry Lansdell, in two volumes, with a list of fauna and a bibliography, illustrated with maps and nearly one hundred engravings after photographs, &c.: Among the Moors, by Mr. G. Montbard, with many illustrations reproduced from the author's own sketches; How I Shot My Bears: or Two Years' Tent Life in Kullu and Lahul, by Mrs. R. H. Tyacke; The Land of "Poco Tiempo": The Great American Mystery—in plain words, New Mexico—by Mr. Charles F. Lummis, with illustrations from photographs and sketches; Camp Fires of a Naturalist: the story of fourteen expeditions after North American mammals, from the field notes of Prof. L. L. Dyche, of Kansas; Two Roving Englishwomen in Greece, by Isabel J. Armstrong; In Search of a Climate, by Mr. Charles G. Nottage, treating chiefly of the Sandwich Islands and Southern California; and Afloat and Ashore on the Mediterranean, by Mr. Lee Meriwether, with twenty-four full-page illustrations.

MRS. OLIPHANT has written for The National Observer a tale of life at Oxford, entitled "The Whirl of Life," which will run through the numbers for the present month.

MAJOR ARTHUR GRIFFITHS's new work, A Prison Princess, being a romance of Millbank Penitentiary, will be published in a few days by Messrs. Cassell & Co.

ANOTHER Russian writer will be introduced to English readers next week by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin, in M. Kostromitin, whose novel, The Last Day of the Carnival, has been translated by Mr. J. Sosnin.

MESSRS. OSGOOD, McILVAINE & Co. are about to publish a series of "Short Stories by British Authors." The first, entitled In a North Country Village, by M. E. Francis, will appear next week, to be followed shortly by Six Common Things, by W. E. F. Benson.

MISS ANNIE S. SWAN's new story, A Bitter Debt, dealing with life and character in the Black Country, will be issued in about a week by Messrs. Hutchinson & Co., who a few weeks later will also have ready a little volume by the same author, entitled Courtship and Marriage, and the Gentle Art of Home-Making, which will have for frontispiece a new portrait of Miss Swan (Mrs. Burnett-Smith).

JOHN OLIVER HOBBS's new novel, A Bundle of Life, will be published, like her other works have been, in the Pseudonym Library of Mr. T. Fisher Unwin.

MR. ELLIOT STOCK announces a work entitled Weather Lore, a garner of knowledge, tradition, proverbs, and folk sayings concerning the weather, by Mr. Richard Inwards.

THE first edition (consisting of 10,000 copies) of Mr. R. L. Stevenson's Catriona has already been exhausted. A second edition is now in the press, and will be ready for issue in a few days.

MESSRS. BICKERS & SON will shortly publish a little volume entitled Selections from the Philosophical and Poetical Works of Constance C. W. Naden, compiled by the Misses Emily and Edith Hughes, of Handsworth, near Birmingham. The volume will be illustrated with a portrait of Miss Naden, and dedicated to Dr. Lewins, her friend and mentor. It will also have an introduction by Mr. George M. McCrie, editor of "Further Reliques of Constance Naden."

THE Rev. D. A. Mackinnon has written a little book entitled Some Chapters in Scottish Church History, a souvenir of the jubilee of the Free Church, which will be published immediately by Mr. B. W. Hunter, of Edinburgh.

MESSRS. BEMROSE & SONS have in preparation The Church and Civil Power; or, the Relations of Church and State Historically Considered, with special reference to the constitutions and canon law of the American and Colonial Churches, by the Rev. D. A. Theodore Wirgman; The Spirit of Liberty, and div Sermons and Addresses, by the same author; The Lessons of Holy Scripture Illustrated from Poets, compiled and arranged by the Rev. J. H. Wanklyn, in eight volumes.

THE Catholic Truth Society announces, for early publication, A Catholic Poetry Book, with Preface and Notes by Mr. C. Kegan Paul; A Legal Handbook for Catholics; A Handbook of Catholic Charities; The House of Shadows and other Tales, by the Rev. Dr. William Barry; Historical Papers, third series, edited by the Rev. J. Morris, S.J.

THE American publishing firm of Brentano's, who have themselves been agents for many English publishers in the United States, have decided to close their London agency. Henceforth they will be represented in this country by Messrs. B. F. Stevens.

MR. WILLIAM N. PITCHER, for many years manager of Messrs. H. Sotheran & Co.'s Manchester branch, has purchased the greater portion of the stock and arranged for a transfer of the lease of the premises, where he will continue to carry on the business on his own account.

THE first meeting of the Library Association for the new season will be held at 20, Hanover-square, on Monday next, October 3, when Mr. E. A. Axon will read a paper on "The place of Libraries in relation to Elementary, Secondary, and Higher Education." It is proposed that the members of the association resident in London and the neighbourhood could dine together once a year, in October.

On Sunday next, October 8, the London Ethical Society will hold its first meeting of the inter season at Essex Hall, Strand, when Mr. Bosanquet will deliver a lecture entitled "Holiday Notes on the Ethical Movement." Among the future arrangements are: "The advantages of Competition," by M. Leslie Stephen; "Hillel and Jesus," by the Rev. H. Wicksteed; "War: is its gradual limitation desirable and practicable," by Mr. Hodgson Pratt; "The Problem of the Unemployed," by Mr. J. A. Murray Macdonald; and "Abstract and Practical Ethics," by Mr. J. H. Muirhead, the hon. secretary, whose address is 30, Aynhoe-road, West Kensington.

We congratulate Mr. David J. O'Donoghue on having completed his "Biographical Dictionary of the Poets of Ireland." It would not be difficult, even for a dull Saxon, to raise a laugh at some of those who are included, and at the descriptions given of them. Who but an Irishman could write: "He became a teacher, but gave up the occupation, and took to Bohemianism"? But it is pleasanter to dwell upon the marvellous industry, and ingenuity too, which has been spent in identifying the authorship of so much fugitive verse, and in discovering the details of obscure lives. It is not every one who knows that the author of "The Burial of Sir John Moore" was an Irishman, and apparently a connexion of Wolfe Tone. The original scheme was in three parts; but during the progress of the work so much additional material has been received that it is now proposed to issue a Supplement, which will also include a list of pseudonyms. The author's address is 1, Eleanor-grove, Barnes.

We have received the twelfth Annual Report of the American Dante Society. The address of the president, Prof. C. E. Norton, includes a notice of the late Dr. T. W. Parsons, of Boston, who published, from time to time during the last fifty years, specimen translations of portions of the Divina Commedia, in verse of five feet with alternate rhymes. "So far as his work has gone," says Prof. Norton, "I believe that it is safe to assert that, as a rhymed version in English, it has no superior." The Report gives the usual list of additions to the Dante collection in the Harvard College library, which is the best substitute we have in English for a Dante bibliography. It also reprints, from the ACADEMY of June 4, 1892, an article by the Rev. Dr. E. Moore, which is now entitled, "Dante's Obligations to the De Officiis in regard to the Division and Order of Sins in the Inferno."

A VALUABLE addition to the collection of folk songs which cluster round the Kalevala has just been published in Finland. Herr Neovius, a Lutheran pastor, came across, in an obscure corner of Southern Karelia, a peasant woman of marvellous memory. He has committed to paper, at her dictation, nearly 1152 runes, of which apparently all are new except one imbedded in an ancient law book of 1687, which is word for word like the one in her collection. She can neither read nor write, and is only just sixty, so that the "spell" in question must have been handed down verbally for over two hundred years. The collection contains dance songs, wedding and betrothal songs, and songs for Sunday afternoons. "Swing" songs are an especial feature, and even now in Finland

"swings" are a necessary part of Easter rejoicings. The songs sung while sledging are intimately connected with wedding and dance songs. One may be sung after another, as the last notes of each suggest its successor. Like the nightingales of our own woods, the great singers had competitions, which, however, often led to bitter words. The dance songs were never sung in a round dance, and musical instruments were never used for them. The women always went to the back of the room. The men stood in the doorway and sung while a young couple danced in the middle of the floor. The singers joined in refrains at the end of each verse, and these refrains seemed to have suggested the melody of the succeeding songs. To the ethnographer and philologist the new runes thus described in a local magazine are of great interest, and deserve much attention.

THERE will be issued from the Westminster Gazette office, almost immediately, an account of the life-work of the late Master of Balliol, written by some of his friends and pupils. It will form No. 5 of the "Westminster Gazette Extras," and the first of a series of "Great Lives." The record will extend to thirty-two pages, and will be accompanied by numerous illustrations.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

A CITIZEN OF NO MEAN CITY.

DAY follows day; yea, nothing is unchanging,
Only in vanity may all compare;
O for a vision from the Land Arcadia!
For I, too, have been there!

Yet of no country are we made the freemen
Till to that country we allegiance swear;
Lovers of earth, I and my kin before me,
In ways well-trodden ever did we fare;
But still my heart turns to the Land Arcadia,
And I, too, have been there!

This morning in the wood I told of fairies,
The wonder and belief had equal share
In a child's eyes, as, dropping wealth of bluebells,
She fell to kissing me with sudden care,
Stirring dream-memories of the Land Arcadia,
For I, too, have been there!

Vague discontent, with cries of heavenly yearning,
And love of all things that the wide earth bare,
Have swelled my heart, and for the moments flooded

A narrow rapture, till I could all things dare, Filled with rapture from the Land Arcadia,
For that I, too, was there!

And by the layered shades of the old cedar Heavy from roses hung the breathless air;
When my love gave the answer all awaited,
With a slow smile, to the broad moonlight rare.
Give me your hands, ye of the Land Arcadia,
For I, too, have been there!

I watched her pass into the far-off country,
Hand in my hand, she had gone forth to where Message, voice, touch of mine, could never reach her—

Tumultuous rose, dethroning numb despair,
A mighty longing for the Land Arcadia,
Surely the loved are there!

Lost in the days wherein there is no vision,
But striving only striving to forbear,
Dully I crave a draught of death and slumber,
Deeper than dreams that would my rest impair.
What wouldst thou have of me, O Land Arcadia?
Ah! that I once was there!

Sudden, the open secret of our birthright,
Thrills through the commonplace at unaware;
Soaring anew at joy, I win, not gladness,
But "ampler ether, a diviner air,"
Where shine the stars guiding to lost Arcadia,
Surely I, too, go there!

Lo! I am here a stranger and a pilgrim,
A sojourner, as all my fathers were;
Nor knew they rest far from the Land Arcadia,
If they had once been there!

K. B.

OBITUARY.

PROFESSOR JOWETT.

JUST two years ago, at the beginning of the October term, all Oxford was saddened by the serious illness of the Master of Balliol. Though he then recovered, contrary to expectation, and again took his usual active part in the life of the college, his former malady returned this autumn, and he had no strength to rally. He died last Sunday, at the country-house of his old pupil and friend, Mr. Justice Wright, in Hampshire. He had attained the ripe age of 76 years, of which no less than 58 were passed in residence at Balliol.

Benjamin Jowett was born in 1817, his father being a clergyman at Camberwell, himself of some reputation as a divine. He was educated at St. Paul's School, which has gone into mourning for its most distinguished alumnus. Before he was eighteen—and he is traditionally said to have looked still younger—he won a Balliol scholarship, even then reckoned the blue ribbon of public school competition. Among his contemporaries there, were Stanley and Temple and Lake, Clough and Matthew Arnold, Northcote and Coleridge; among the tutors were Tait and W. G. Ward. He gained the Hertford Scholarship for Latin and a first in classics, and in due course was elected to a fellowship at his own college. He took orders, and became tutor, being chiefly known in those days—the days following the Oxford Movement—as a rationalising student of the New Testament. In 1855 he published an edition, with essays and notes, of the Epistles to the Thessalonians, Romans, and Galatians, in which the orthodox sniffed heresy; and a little later (1859) he contributed a paper on "The Interpretation of Scripture" to the famous volume called Essays and Reviews. Meanwhile, he had been appointed by Lord Palmerston to the regius professorship of Greek, vacant by the death of Gaisford. This appointment gave the desired opportunity to his theological enemies to subject him to a long course of petty persecution. They compelled him to sign afresh the Thirty-Nine Articles; and for several years they contrived to withhold from him the endowment of his chair, until at last Christ Church, at the instigation of Dean Liddell, provided the stipend out of its corporate funds. If this unworthy controversy conferred on Jowett some of the distinction of martyrdom, it had also the more important result of changing the current of his studies. He abandoned the New Testament for Plato, and was content to be regarded as tutor of his college rather than as university professor.

The next event in Jowett's life was his election to the mastership of Balliol in 1870, when Scott was translated to the deanery of Rochester. Henceforth, for more than twenty years, he had a free hand in developing the life of the college according to the principles which he had long cherished; and when the time came for him to hold the office of Vice-Chancellor, he did his best to impress the same principles upon the university. In the wider field he met with some opposition; for Oxford is a jealous place, which has never readily submitted to the domination of any one mind or of any one type of thought. Nevertheless, its present character, whether for good or evil, is largely modelled upon the views of Jowett and the pattern of Balliol. Other academical reformers—notably Mark Pattison—entertained a very different theory about the functions of a university; but they lacked the practical ability, the knowledge of mankind, the persistence, the tact, of Jowett. While they dreamed dreams and wrote essays in the hope that their Utopia might realise itself in the future, Jowett (the Platonist!) was content to live in and for the immediate present. He saw clearly what could be accomplished in a country that has always refused to take long views, and in a university that still retains so many of its eighteenth century traditions. He accepted the college, and not the university, as his unit; and he steadily strove to make the college more efficient for its limited purpose. The result is—Balliol as we know it: the most successful seminary that the world has seen for the production of legislators and lawyers, public servants, heads of houses, and men of varied accomplishments. The pick of the English public schools, the hardest-working students of Glasgow, some of the more serious scions of the aristocracy, a few lads born in the lowliest class, selected candidates for the Indian Civil Service, and one or two genuine Orientals, have been brought together at the most impressionable period of life, and subjected to an influence which few could resist, especially when it coincided with the natural dictates of youthful ambition. It is true that Jowett ever preached "plain living and high thinking"; but he presented them not so much as their own reward, or as the necessary conditions of learning, but as the means to worldly success. Balliol men have been better than their instruction; but who shall estimate how much the university has lost in exact scholarship and in original research?

The same practical and commonsense side of Jowett's nature was shown in his contributions to literature. Though professor of Greek for nearly forty years, he did not conceive it his duty to represent the highest standard of Hellenic philology. The science of palaeography, the fine art of emendation, the discoveries of modern archaeology, were to him alike unknown and indifferent. Practically he gave no public lectures (though he did not exclude members of other colleges from his private teaching), nor did he ever edit an ancient text. But what was within his power and suited his tastes, that he did to a marvel. His translation of the whole of Plato, with introductions to the several dialogues, has already become a sort of English classic. Continuous labour for many years, and the ungrudging help of more than one pupil, were required before it took its final shape, in the third edition which appeared last spring. The elaborate essays may seem to be addressed only to scholars; but they are essential to the design, which was to interpret the flower of Greek philosophy to modern Englishmen. They have a further interest, as such life-work always must have, in revealing the mind of the author, which had become saturated with the metaphysics and the diction of Plato. The translation itself is a tour de force. All the artifices of rhetoric—the breaking up of sentences, the changing of the order of words, the use of conjunctions—are intentionally employed, in order to imitate faithfully not only the thought but also the style of the original, and yet read as idiomatic English. It may be that the study of Greek will ere long become rare in England, even at the universities. If that time should arrive, Jowett's Plato will at any rate permit our grandchildren to appreciate the supremest effort of imaginative prose, without the drudgery of learning the Greek grammar. Of the versions of Thucydides and of the Politics of Aristotle, it is not possible to speak in such high terms. Thucydides was always a favourite author with Jowett, by reason of its political lessons; but the peculiar style does not so easily adapt itself to his method of translation.

It remains to say something about the man, apart from his work. For, as must always be the case with one who achieved so much in the world, the influence of personal character needs to be taken into consideration. It was impossible to be in Jowett's company—even if, as sometimes happened, he did not open his mouth—without recognising that he was a remarkable man. That noble forehead with its nimbus of silver hair, that mild eye and cherubic countenance, that beautiful softness of hand, that small rotund figure clad in old-fashioned garb, that venerable bearing—all combined to make up a picture which no painter has adequately reproduced. Add the thin, small voice, the deliberate intonations that could be either bitter or sweet, the abrupt questionings that sometimes quivered like a dart, the intervals of silence that were yet more formidable, the wise maxims that come only from age and experience; and some part of the secret of Jowett's charm will be understood. No Oxford don had a wider circle of acquaintance in the outer world; none knew intimately so many generations of undergraduates. He possessed, in supreme measure, that power, invaluable to statesmen and generals, of penetrating the character of others at a glance. Of his exceeding kindness to individuals, and of his munificence when such was needed, it is not necessary to speak. His college stood to him in the place of a wife, and he took a paternal interest in the careers of its sons. Of the affection with which they regarded him, some instances have been seen this very week. But there is no Oxford man, however much opposed he may have occasionally felt to Jowett's teaching, who will not recognise, at the moment of his death, that the university has lost its grandest figure. J. S. C.

THE MASTER OF BALLIOL: A MEMORY.

O aged head! O never-aging face!
O cheery hand-shake, wise and twinkling eye!
Ours until memory of all good shall die,
Master, gone on before a moment's space!
Our hearts are all at Oxford, see thee pace
The green quadrangle, watch thee standing by
That oriel window, whence philosophy
Would pause to wonder at the chestnut's grace,
Or smile on young men's frolic. Thou art dead!
But never dead thy daring still to prove
The Truths men live by; one against the world!
Nor dead thy calm that met the tempest hurled,
The quiet following of the Christ thy head,
In deeds of pure self-sacrifice and love.

H. D. KAWNSLEY.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE great change that has come over the spirit and substance of the English Illustrated Magazine, under its new proprietors, is worth chronicling. It has been acquired by the owners of The Illustrated London News, and is edited, from this present October number, by Sir William Ingram and Mr. Clement Shorter. Instead of being in a measure devoted to the somewhat prosaic chronicle of railway systems and the like, and to the inclusion of essays by people of title with little knowledge of how to write, it is, under the new editorship, suddenly alive with various interest. Some of the newer writers of individual mark are pressed into the service—Mr. Gilbert Parker, for instance, and Mr. Barry Pain. Even "the new humour" is represented by Mr. Robert Barr; while veteran hands, or hands familiarly known, like those of Mrs. Lynn Linton and Mr. Austin Dobson, are also rightly in evidence.

In the Antiquary for October, Mr. H. C. Moore draws attention to the remains of a very interesting well recently found at Kenchester. We call it a well, for such we think it to be; but the writer, with praiseworthy archaeological caution, does not express himself positively on the question. If it be really a well, it is, so far as we know, a unique example. The bottom is formed of a single stone, pierced with a small round hole; and round it are a series of steps only partially preserved, which, when perfect, must have had an octagonal form. Under this structure flows a stream of water. It is now dry; but, as it is on a slope, it is evident that if the little runnel were drained, the well would fill with water. There are Roman remains in the immediate neighbourhood, but Mr. Moore is of opinion—and we quite agree with him—that the well is of a more modern date. Mr. John Ward contributes an admirable paper on the Blackmore Museum at Salisbury, which is by no means so well known as it deserves to be. If it existed in a provincial town of France or Italy, it would be far more frequently visited by English folk. The collection is wonderfully rich in early American antiquities; and there is a most valuable series of palaeolithic implements, gathered for the most part in those early days when it was still the fashion to shake the head and quote texts when anyone suggested that there were men in the land contemporary with the cave bear and the mammoth. Mr. Robert Blair figures and describes a Roman altar recently found at Lanchester, which gives us the name of a goddess of the Suevians not hitherto met with. There can be little doubt as to the reading Garmangahis. We trust someone will endeavour to interpret this strange name. Mr. James Hilton continues his gossiping papers on chronograms. The present one contains some curious English examples.

THE COMING PUBLISHING SEASON.

MESSRS. CHAPMAN & HALL'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

"Old Court Life in Spain," by Frances Minto Elliot, in 2 vols.; "Secrets of the Prison-house: or, Gaol Studies and Sketches," by Major Arthur Griffiths, with illustrations by George D. Rowlandson, in 2 vols.; "About Orchids," a chat, by Frederick Boyle, with coloured illustrations; "Tonkin and Siam," by Prince Henri D'Orleans, with 28 illustrations; "Creatures of other Days," by the Rev. H. N. Hutchinson, with illustrations by J. Smit; "Germany and the Germans: Social Life, Culture, Religious Life, &c., &c.," by William Harbutt Dawson, in 2 vols.; "In a Land of the Mosques and the Marabouts," by the Hon. Mrs. Greville-Nugent, illustrated; "China and her Neighbours: France in Indo-China, Russia and China, India and Tibet, &c.," by R. S. Gundry, with maps; "Big Game Shooting: Travel and Adventures in the Congo Free State," with illustrations; "Dangers and Incidents of Foreign Field Sports," by Colonel Pollok and Parker Gilmore, with illustrations; "Round about the Crooked Spire," by Albert J. Foster, with illustrations; "Jottings about Birds," by Charles Dixon, with coloured frontispiece by J. Smit; "A Tour in Palestine and Syria," by J. Brinton, with illustrations and map; "Aphorisms from the Synthetic Philosophy of Herbert Spencer"; "Wood-working Positions," by W. Nelson, with twelve illustrations by Herbert Cole; "Convivial Caledonia": inns and taverns of Scotland, and some famous people who have frequented them, by Robert Kempt; "A Text-Book of Mechanical Engineering," by Wilfrid J. Lineham, illustrated; "Elementary Design": being a Theoretical and Practical Introduction in the Art of Decoration, by Richard G. Hatton, with 110 illustrations; "Egyptian Art," by Charles Ryan, with 56 illustrations; "The Street of Human Habitations," by Mrs. Ray S. Lineham, illustrated; "Our Ocean Railways: or, the Rise, Progress, and Development of Ocean Steam Navigation," by A. Fraser Macdonald, with maps and illustrations; "The Waif from the Waves": a story of three lives, touching this world and another, by Canon Knox Little; "Supplejack: a Romance of Maoriland," by R. Ward, with eight illustrations; "The New Academe: an Educational Romance," by Edward Hartington; "The Prophet John: a Romance," by Frederick Boyle; "Eight Stories in One Volume," by W. Clark Russell and others, with sixteen illustrations.

New Editions.—"Life Aboard a British Privateer in the Time of Queen Anne: being the Journal of Captain Woodes Rogers," with notes and illustrations by Robert C. Leslie; "Essays: Speculative and Suggestive," by John Addington Symonds; "Food: some Account of its Sources, Constituents, and Uses," by Prof. A. H. Church; "Illustrations of the Principal Natural Orders of the Vegetable Kingdom, prepared for the Science and Art Department of Council of Education," by Dr. D. Oliver, with 109 plates, by W. H. Fitch.

SELECTED FOREIGN BOOKS.

GENERAL LITERATURE.

- BALAKTSCHIEFF, I. Die rechtliche Stellung d. Fürstent. Bulgarien. Würzburg: Gnad. 2 M.
 LEHR- u. HANDBUCH der politischen Oekonomie. III. 2. H. Praktische Volkswirtschaftslehre. 2. Thl. Agrarwesen u. Agrarpolitik v. A. Buchenberger. 2. Bd. Leipzig: Winter. 16 M.
 RABUSON, H. Sans entraves. Paris: Calmann Lévy. 3 fr. 50 c.
 STRACK, A. Goethe's Leipziger Liederbuch. Gießen: Becker. 3 M. 60 Pf.

THEOLOGY, ETC.

- ELSER, K. Die Lehre d. Aristoteles üb. das Wirken Gottes. Münster: Aschendorff. 6 M.

HISTORY, ETC.

- ARAÚJO, Oscar d'. L'Idée républicaine au Brésil. Paris: Didier. 2 fr. 50 c.
 BEER, A. Die handelspolitischen Beziehungen Oesterreichs zu den deutschen Staaten unter Maria Theresia. Leipzig: Freytag. 5 M.
 GROS, J. Le Comité de salut public de la Convention Nationale. Paris: Pion. 3 fr. 50 c.
 REYNIER, R. Symbolae ad Asiae Minoris reges, sacerdotes Ptolemaemque I. Ponti regem. Leipzig: Gräff. 1 M. 20 Pf.
 LALLIE, A. Le Diocèse de Nantes pendant la Révolution. Nantes: Cier. 16 fr.
 LUZACHE, V. Le Carnet de Mazarin. Tours: Péricat. 5 fr.
 THIÉBAULT, Mémoires du Général Baron, p.p. F. Calmettes. I. 1769—1795. Paris: Pion. 7 fr. 50 c.

PHYSICAL SCIENCE.

- ETHELIN, H. J. Zur Kenntniss der postembryonalen Schädelsmetamorphosen bei Wiederkäuern. Basel: Schwabe. 6 M. 40 Pf.

PHILOLOGY, ETC.

- ARISTOTELES, die Politik. Eine Neuauflage der Uebersetzung. Garves. Hrsg. u. versehen v. M. Braach. Leipzig: Pfeiffer. 3 M.
 CALAND, W. Altindischer Ahnencult. Das Çraddha, nach den verschiedenen Schulen m. Benutzg. handschriftl. Quellen dargestellt. Leiden: Brill. 7 M. 50 Pf.
 LANUSSE, M. De l'influence du dialecte gascon sur la langue française de la fin du XVe siècle à la seconde moitié du XVIIe. Paris: Maisonneuve. 7 fr. 50 c.
 SAILLES, I. Gascounhe le Brabe yeut de notre Nabets Debia. Paris: Maisonneuve. 6 fr.
 SCHULTZ, W. Werkmaas u. Zahlenverhältnisse griechischer Tempel. Hannover: Schmorl. 3 M.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE SEPTUAGINT VERSUS THE HEBREW TEXT OF THE BIBLE.

II.

The Athenaeum Club: Sept. 23, 1893.

I propose to strengthen the contention for which I argued in my previous letter (ACADEMY, September 16) by an appeal to other evidence. I claim to have shown that the Septuagint version of Ezra and Nehemiah, and probably of Chronicles, and the same version of Daniel are superior in arrangement and authority to the Masoretic text of those books, which was tampered with, altered, and sophisticated by the Jewish Rabbis, and in all probability by the Rabbis of the school of Jamnia. In strengthening this position, it is very natural to turn to the Book of Job. I do not profess to have anything new to say in regard to that book, but merely to bring together, by way of illustration of my position, the important discoveries made in regard to it in recent years.

Origen, in his Epistle addressed to Africanus, tells us how in his day the old Greek text of the Book of Job differed materially from the Hebrew version: that often the omissions consisted of three or four, and sometimes of fourteen, sixteen, and nineteen verses; and Jerome, in his preface to the Book of Job, tells us they amounted in all to 700 or 800 verses. The passages which were found in the Hebrew but not in the Septuagint were supplied by Origen from the translation of Theodotion, and were marked by him in the Hexapla with an asterisk. Unfortunately, as in other cases, and as I mentioned in my previous letter, these asterisks dropped out in the great majority of MSS.; and the text as arranged by Origen, without his notes of warning, was accepted as the true and original one. Fortunately, however, the asterisks, in the case of the Book of Job, were preserved in more than one MS., notably in a Latin MS. now preserved at Tournay and in another in the Bodleian. The asterisks are also preserved in two Greek MSS., one in the Bibl. Nat. Colbert, 1952, and the other the Vatican MS. 346, and in the Ambrosian copy of the Syriac Hexapla published in facsimile by Ceriani.

It is a curious proof, however, of the length of time it sometimes takes before the importance of certain discoveries is realised that, so far back as 1693, Martiany refers to the first of the Latin MSS. just mentioned, which was originally at Marmontiers, as having been consulted by him for his edition of Jerome; and he tells us how it preserved the asterisks and oboli of Origen. The Bodleian MS. is referred to, and its peculiarities are pointed out, by Grabe in his edition of the Septuagint, published in 1710. Lagarde, in mentioning these facts, remarks how curious it is that their meaning should not have been better appreciated; but the fashion then was, especially among Protestant theologians, to treat the Septuagint as a corrupt text, and the Hebrew as alone of value. Hence the lack of insight into the conditions of the problem to be solved. Meanwhile, the critics had been at work upon the Hebrew text of Job, and had divined that it was interpolated, and that portions of it, notably the discourses of Elihu, were by another hand, and formed no part of the original work. It was not, however, till 1863, in his well-known dissertation, entitled "De Indole ac ratione versionis Alexandrinae in interpretando libro Jobi," that Bickell first clearly showed that the variations of the Hebrew text of Job, which include most of the passages to which modern criticism has taken exception, were the passages obelized by Origen, and that the original and pure text of the book must be sought in those parts of it which are not marked by asterisks in the five MSS. already cited. A similar conclusion was apparently arrived at independently by Mr. Hatch from an examination of the extracts from Job contained in the works of Clemens Alexandrinus, who wrote before Origen published his Hexapla.

The case was made absolutely certain by another discovery. In the Moniteur de Rome for October 26, 1883, Monsignor Agapio Bsoiai wrote to say he had discovered in the Library of the Propaganda at Rome a copy of the Sahidic or Thebaic version of Job, of which some leaves were afterwards found at Rome, and which was at once seen by Lagarde to be of the highest value, since it represents the Septuagint text before it was tampered with by Origen. Bickell had meanwhile subjected the text of Job to a close criticism, and had, in addition, shown from its poetical structure that the parts lacking in the true Septuagint version are later interpretations.

This is, assuredly, very interesting in many ways. It confirms the view that, if we are to find a text of this Book free from sophistication, we must turn to the Septuagint, and not to the Hebrew version. It confirms the view that that version has been tampered with and altered by the Jewish Rabbis. It confirms, pro tanto, the date when this sophistication took place; namely, after the Septuagint version was made, and before the time when Aquila and Theodotion made their translations. And it seems to me that, in connexion with the several arguments which I have used in these letters, it brings the work home very nearly to the Jamnia school of Akiba. These alterations, as Mr. Dillon has urged, were due partly to attempts "to blunt the sharp edge of the author's criticism, and render the poem palatable to Jewish orthodoxy by means of considerable excisions, and still more considerable interpolations, and the removal of glosses from the margins of the MSS. to the text."

If we turn from Job to the Book of Esther, we shall be constrained to the same conclusion. The Septuagint version of Esther contained several paragraphs and narratives not present in the Masoretic text. It has been the fashion, notably among Protestant divines, to attribute these differences to the corruption of the Septuagint text; and in Protestant Bibles they are remitted to the Apocrypha. They seem to me to be precisely on the same lines as the so-called interpolations in Daniel, with this further important element, that they were accepted by so orthodox and learned a Jew as Josephus as perfectly reliable, and used by him in his History. We must remember, as I have said before, that Josephus, a Palestinian Jew attached to the Temple and belonging to the aristocracy among the priesthood, who was also a persona ingratisima among his own people in consequence of the attitude he had adopted towards the Romans, would not have dared to palm off some Alexandrian forgeries or interpolations, and insert them in a work whose serious and critical character is more and more accepted. Nor was there any motive for his doing so. It seems to me plain that, when he wrote, the Book of Esther as contained in the Septuagint recension was everywhere received in Palestine as the true text, and that, like the other Books to which I have referred in this correspondence, it was afterwards mutilated for polemical or other purposes by the Jews. Among these alterations, it is not improbable that we must put the substitution of Ahasuerus for Artaxerxes as the king whom Esther is said to have married. The matter is one of serious moment. At the Reformation the Protestants, in their anxious zeal to find a sheet-anchor for their Rule of Faith outside the authority which had previously prevailed, took upon themselves to decide, ex cathedra, which parts of the Bible were canonical and which were not: that is to say, claimed a kind of inspiration and infallibility for themselves. The rule they followed was to discard the Catholic Bible in favour of the Bible of the Jews. If it can be shown that the Jewish Bible was deliberately altered and sophisticated by the Jews, ought Christians not to go back to older theories and to safer methods, and to accept both the canon and the contents of the Greek Bible as immeasurably superior to those of the Hebrew. I have not yet exhausted my subject, and you will have to tolerate me again.

HENRY H. HOWORTH.

A POLISH BOOK OF PRAYERS.

Oxford: Sept 19, 1893.

My attention has been called by Mr. Madan, of the Bodleian, to a beautiful volume on parchment in that library (Rawlinson MS., N. C., 15857), which appears to have been the book of private prayers of Wladyslaw, the king of Poland who was killed at the battle of Varna in 1444, hence sometimes called Warnencyzk.

The prayers are chiefly addressed to Christ and the Virgin Mary, and abound with references to a magic crystal (cristallus) which had the property of exhibiting omnia que in mundo in terra uel sub terra sunt sub quatuor elementis contenta, and which is represented in trefoil shape on fol. 15-72. The young king, who speaks of himself as peccator, Christi famulus, &c., prays that by means of this magic crystal he may ascertain all that he wants to know sine omni fallacia et lesione corporis et animae.

The book contains many miniatures beautifully executed. The king appears several times with the arms of Poland, the white eagle on a shield, and a sceptre. He is always represented as a very young man—almost a boy—with a profusion of brown hair. The style of the manuscript and the portrait of the king seem to point to young Wladyslaw, who came to the throne when ten years of age, and was in his twenty-first year when he perished.

At the end of the volume is a Latin epistle from a certain Johannes Ferrandus, a Jesuit, to a Dr. Guerinetus, dated Besançon, 1654, in which the writer attempts to identify the king with Wladyslaw Jagiello of Lithuania, who ascended the throne of Poland in 1386, when an adult and in consequence of his marriage with the heiress, Jadwiga. With this opinion I find it impossible to agree.

At the end of the book is the following inscription by a former owner: Sum Jacobi Priue Bisuntini, J. V. Doctoris, 1630. Besides the miniatures there are beautifully illuminated borders and capitals in the manuscript. It has been summarily but accurately described by Mr. Madan in the Catalogue of Rawlinson MSS.

W. R. MORFILL.

ABRAHAM COWLEY AT THE RESTORATION.

Oxford: Sept. 6, 1893.

The following correspondence illustrates the position of Abraham Cowley at the Restoration. The offence for which he had to apologise was his disposition to acquiesce in and accept Cromwell's government, shown by his preface to the collection of his poems published in 1656. Sprat laboriously apologises for Cowley's conduct in this respect (see page 4 of the account of the life and writings of Cowley, in the folio of his works published in 1700). The poet's own apology is of more interest; and the fact of Ormonde's intercession on his behalf is, to the best of my knowledge, unknown to his biographers. The letters are derived from the Carte MSS. in the Bodleian Library.

C. H. FIRTH.

I.

[Mr. Cowley to the Marquis of Ormonde.]

"My Lord

"Having bin told by Mr. Clifford of the favourable expression your Excellency was pleased to make concerning mee, I think it very unfit either to omit or deferre my most humble thanks for them. It was a Consolation that came most seasonably to relieve in some measure that great affliction which his Majesties displeasure had brought upon mee. And as your Excellencies former goodnes might greatly give mee hopes of it now upon this occasion, soe that of his Majestie gave mee soe little fear of this misfortune, as made it fall more heavily upon mee. For I did not beleive it had bin possible for mee ever to doe any thing even by mistake (soe farre was I from evill intentions) that might give offence to his Majesty, whose service I always accounted the Cheife Duty, and favour the cheife Happines of my Life. But though I am fully satisfied in conscience of the uprightness of my own sence in those [two] or three Lines which have bin received in one so contrary to it, and though I am sure all my actions and conversation in England have commented upon them according to that sence of mine, and not according to the interpretations of others, yet because it seems they are capable of being understood otherwise then I meant them, I am willing to acknowledge and repent them as an Error, Hoping that his Majesty to whom God has given soe great and necessary occasions of Clemency, and a bounty of Nature fitted and proportionable to them and who appears soe ready to forgive his most outrageous Enemies, will pardon the slip of that man's pen in one expression, who calls Almighty God to witnes that hee never Did, Spoke, or Thought, any thing to the prejudice either of his Majesties person, or interests, and who on the contrary has made it the whole busines of his life according to the utmost of his capacity to serve both. And I doe soe farre, My Lord, comfort myselfe with the opinion of your beleife in this point, that I hope you will please to represent it to his Majesty, and doe therein not onely a great justice in respect of my Innocency, but in respect too of my present trouble of mind, the greatest Charity to,

"My Lord,

"Your Excellencies most humble and

"and most obedient servant,

"Paris, Decemb. 20,

"A. COWLEY.

"1659."

II.

[The Marquis of Ormonde to Mr. Cowley].

"Bruxells, the 17th of Jan., 1660.

"Sir

"I give soe much beleefe to what you say to mee in yours of the 26 of the last, of the affliction the King's displeasure towards you, gives you, that if I had not been indisposed in my health, you had by one of the two last posts received this confirmation of what Mr. Clifford told you, of the part I take in your trouble, and of my desire to have it removed; that you receiveing the consolation you professe soe much to neede, his Majestie might againe have the advantage of your service and I the greates pleasure of your correspondence, and conversation, freed from any apprehension of undecency towards him; and the discourse I held with Mr. Clifford was not without a designe to draw something from you, that might give me opportunity and meanes to serve you to those ends; And though I cannot say your letter comes fully home to my hopes in that particular, yet it manifests such a disposition towards it, that it encourages me freely to tell you what in my sence, and what only, can redeeme you from the prejudice, the ambiguity, at least, of those lines have brought upon you; and that is, that if they have another then a very pernicious sence to the King and all his hopes, even to the end of his life, you would finde meanes by some addresse to the Kinge to make it as publique as those lines have bene, but if they be not capable of such an interpretation as hath been industriously and yet hitherto unsuccessfully sought for by your reall friends, then certainly an ingenuous and frank recantation, and such an addresse as may expresse your repentance for them, will not misbecome you, nor I hope miss the effect you wish they should have upon his Majestie, since he wants not that propention to clemency that is soe necessary for him. When either of these shall come to my hands, I will present them with all the advantage my witt can suggest to me, being very realy

"Your very affectionate servant,

"ORMONDE."

III.

[An extract of the letter of the 21st of Feb. [P] to the Ld. Jermyn concerning Mr. Cowley.]

"At the end of this cypher it will be proper to assure you that I have not been wanting in what you recommended to me, concerning Mr. Cowley, from whom having received an addresse soone after the Kings coming hither, I made all the use I could of it for his advantage and from what the King said to me, I framed the best advice I could give him to redeeme himselfe from the generall scandall taken at those unlucky lines; but having not since heard from him, I conclude that either he is contriving something answerable to what I proposed, or that he thinks not fitt to take that way. The matter standing thus I have not spoken to the King since your last, nor will do till I heere againe from you upon the knowledge I give you of what is past. God keepe you."

IV.

[Lord Jermyn to the Marquis of Ormonde.]

"Paris, Feb. 19.

"I adde this to my former ones onely to thank you abundantly for your favor to me in the behalf of Cowly and your great goodnes to him if I am not too partiall he is a very proper subject for the King's forgiveness and by this second letter he sends you will discearn he is farre from justifying the error of his words of his preface he onely justifies himselfe from the malice of them and he cannot doe otherwise without offending God and his conscience for without doubt he had no mallice I hope this letter will furnish you the means of finishing that whiche you have begun that I might have the liberty to employ him and the help of his service for I really want it for the good of the Kings if I be good for any thing in it. I pray God of heaven keepe you."

V.

[Mr. Cowley to the Marquis of Ormonde.]

"My Lord,

"I did not with more earnestness beseech your lordship that you would interpose in my behalf for the removeall of his Majesties displeasure, then I doe now that you would please to believe that I am as sensible of the obligations which my Lord tells me I have to your Lordship in this particular as any man can bee for anything that can be donne for him. The truth is, my Lord, that, being with all the reason and all the affection of my soule zealously carried to his Majesties service, as the misfortune to have offended him took away (as soon as I knew it) all y^e comfort of my life, soe I believe if it had continued, my Life it selfe would not have bin proof against it. It is with great reluctancy that I dare not venture to write to his Majesty, but the hope I have that your Lordship will say something better for me then I could doe myselfe makes mee beleive it happy for mee that I dare not doe soe. I hope to kisse his Majesties hands about a month hence at London, and to give your Lordship my humble thanks for haveing obtained mee the liberty to doe it. I remit to that time (because truly I imagine it very near) those expressions which I owe to you, how much I am,

"My Lord,

"Your Lordship's most humble and "most obedient Servant,

"Paris, March 2,

"A. COWLEY.

"1660.

"[Addressed] For His Excellency the Marquis of Ormond.

"[Endorsed] Mr. Cowley's. Dat. 2 March 1660.
"Rec. 6 Apr.]

THE ETYMOLOGY OF "VERDIGRIS."

Stanhoe Grange, Norfolk: Sept. 18, 1893.

The word "verdigris" is commonly explained in English dictionaries as meaning (literally) either "green of gray" (Fr. vert de gris—"so called from its colour between green and gray," Richardson) or "green of brass" (Low Lat. viride aeris). The latter term Skeat (Concise Etymological Dictionary, 1882) states to have been "the usual name in alchemy" for verdigris. Both he and Richardson mention a Fr. verdis, apparently on the authority of Cotgrave. No such word, however, is given either in Littré or in Godefroy. The term "viride aeris" is used by Albertus Magnus. He wrote a chapter on it, which is quoted from in the Theatrum

Themicum (1660), as Prof. Skeat points out in his notes on the "Chanoun Yemanne's Tale."

Littre, who quotes (s.v. vert-de-gris) the ancient forms verte grez (thirteenth century) and vert de grice (fourteenth century), says: "La forme la plus ancienne est verte grez, qui peut-être doit se décomposer en vert aigret, le vert produit par l'aigre, l'acide." Skeat says (loc. cit.): "Verte grez is lit. 'green grit,' a substitution (as I think) for O.F. verderis, 'verdigrise' Cot. the correct form."

M. Paul Meyer, however, pointed out as long ago as 1877 (in his notes to M. Léopold Pannier's edition of Le Débat des Hérauts d'Armes de France et d'Angleterre, published by the Société des Anciens Textes Français), that originally the word was in all probability vert de Grèce ("green of Greece"), a form which occurs in the Livre des Mestiers (a book of Franco-Flemish dialogues composed in the fourteenth century), as well as in the Anglo-Norman Vie de Saint Gilles (written about 1170):

"Sinopre, azur et vert de Grece, Zucre, canel, et liorece" (vv. 853-4).

"Grecian blue and green" appear to have been among the stock oriental wares in the middle ages. They figure together again in a list of commodities sold by Syrian merchants in the street of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem, which M. Paul Meyer has printed quite recently ("Notice sur un MS. d'Orléans" in Notices et Extraits des MSS. de la Bibliothèque nationale, &c.; Paris, 1893) from the fragment of a MS. (twelfth century) discovered by M. Loiseleur in the binding of an old book in the Bibliothèque d'Orléans:

"Endreit la rue est del Sepulchre
U Surian vendent lu zucre. . .
Azzor grezzeis et orpiment,
Vert, vermeillon, entosement. . ."
(II. vv. 17-18, 27-28.)

M. Paul Meyer (to whom I am indebted for a copy of the above) has now no doubt about the identity of "vert-de-gris" with "vert de Grèce." In a note on the foregoing passage he speaks of the vert there mentioned as being "sans doute le vert-de-gris ou verdet, substance colorante que l'on faisait originairement venir de Grèce. . . Vert-de-gris signifie proprement 'vert de Grèce.'"

By this etymology the otherwise somewhat puzzling g in "verdigris" is satisfactorily accounted for. The earlier English form of the word was "verdigrise" (Cotgrave), or "verdegrees" (Holland, in his Plinie, where he also speaks of "Cyprian verdegres"). Chaucer employs the forms "vertgrees" and "verdegres."

PAGET TOYNBEE.

"YORK AND LANCASTER."

Banff, Aylth, N.B.: Sept. 25, 1898.

The late number of the English Historical Review contains a notice of my "Lancaster and York," for which I feel much obliged. It awards a considerable measure of praise, which is always grateful, and offers a certain number of criticisms and suggestions, by some of which, at any rate, I hope to profit.

Thus, I admit that in January 1450, Queen Isabella was not at Reading, but at Sonning; and I agree that the sitting of Parliament in which Marks or Merkes, Bishop of Carlisle, appeared, was not held on October 27 as stated in my book. But on reconsidering the evidence, I come to the conclusion that the sitting should be referred, not to October 28, as suggested by the reviewer, but to October 30, when the Parliament Rolls record a sitting, no sitting being noticed either on the 27th or the 28th. In all other respects I adhere to my account of the sitting. It is clear, both from the Bishop's speech and from other evidence, that he had been set at liberty before that day. Again, I readily accept Llanbadarn as the place indicated by the "Lampador" of the records; and likewise Coyty for "Coify." But I refuse to believe that the bodies of the dead at the battle of Shrewsbury "covered a space of three miles"; or that the field of that or any other action is to be extended to the farthest point at which any fallen straggler may be proved to have been buried. I admit that I have not made out satisfactorily the changes of government at Mauléon de Soule between the years 1446 and 1449. I can only say that French scholars writing specifically about the reconquest of Guienne have not made out as much as I have.

It is possible that both Vallet de Viriville and de Beaucourt may be wrong in giving 1429 as the year of Queen Margaret's birth, and that it really was 1430. As she was born on or before March 25, the mistake might easily be made. But I have not access to the original authority to see if he begins his year at Easter, or on the 25th March, or on the 1st January. On the other hand, I think it probable that I am quite right in placing Margaret's adventure with the robber in 1460, and not in 1462 or 1463. The incident appears to me to be clearly connected with the robbery of her goods narrated by the English writers under the year 1460, and in connexion with her flight into Wales. She was never near that part of the country in 1462 or 1463. Chastellain only brings the incident in under the year 1463, because it was in that year that Margaret told the story to the Duchess of Bourbon; and he doubtless, having heard it then or soon afterwards, entered it at once in his MS., which was always written up close to date. Again, with respect to Margaret's doings, I ought, no doubt, to have said that more than a fortnight, not "more than three weeks," elapsed between her reaching Rouen and her reaching England—a palpable oversight, as the exact dates are given by me.

I need not trouble the world with more of such petty slips; but I must say a word on the numbers of English armies, a point on which I feel strongly. I may be disposed to minimise, but I must call attention to the fact that my conclusions are based, not on a few isolated extracts, but on a long series of most authoritative documents, all telling the same tale, all hanging together. An English army for foreign service in the fifteenth century consists of 1000, 1200, 1500, 2000, 2500 men; an army with a royal leader gets up to 5000 men. In two or three instances, after extraordinary efforts, we find some 10,000 men got together. These are the figures given by Record evidence. The reviewer charges me with ignoring the important fact that each lance or man-at-arms was attended by a little train of armed followers; he then refers to "varlets and pages," and ends by boldly asserting that the number of lances in the Agincourt campaign "should be multiplied by something between four and six if we would get the real number of the heavy armed (!) troops who fought." I trust, if only for the sake of the pupils who sit under the reviewer's chair, that all this does not mean that he still entertains the old notion of the lance fournie attended by five or six varlets, pages, or what not, as the military unit. The notion, though still entertained by Sir Harris Nicolas in his Agincourt, is absolutely without foundation with reference to the composition of English armies of the fifteenth century. The only military attendants on the English lance were the archers who enlisted under him; and the normal ratio in the time of Henry V. was three archers or "bows" to one spear or lance, with a tendency towards increase in the number of the archers. Of course,

I need not inform the reviewer that the archers were not heavy armed troops. After the siege of Honfleur, the gentlemen rather fell back, and so there appear to have been only 900 lances to some 3000 archers at Agincourt. These are the numbers of the extant muster rolls. The large numbers of the horses are also established by Record evidence; the numbers of their attendants are not recorded, because they were not in the king's pay, and were not combatants. If the reviewer is not content with the evidence I have collected, I can refer him to the recent work of two French scholars, who have gone over part of the ground traversed by me with fuller research than I could give to any one portion of the Hundred Years' War. In L'Armée Anglaise vaincue par Jeanne D'Arc, Messrs. de Molandon and de Beaucours come on both the above points to exactly the same conclusion that I do. They scout the old notion of the lance fournie, and they declare that they can find no reason to believe that any but the regulation lances and archers ever took part in the English engagements. As a parallel case I would point to our Indian armies, where I have always understood that the number of camp-followers is excessive. Were any of these men allowed to fall into line at Mudki or Sobraon, or anywhere else?

J. H. RAMSAY.

MONTROSE'S LINES TO HIS WIFE.

London: Sept. 29, 1893.

I observe that in a notice of my story, The Two Lancrofts, your reviewer accuses me of misquoting from Montrose's lines. The error is his; for the form of the couplet which I have given—

"I'll make thee glorious by my pen,
And famous by my sword"— is supported by the oldest broadsheets, notably by that in the Roxburghe Collection. If less logical, it is more euphonious than the alternative reading:

"I'll make thee famous by my pen,
And glorious by my sword."

C. F. KEARY.

APPOINTMENTS FOR NEXT WEEK.

SUNDAY, Oct. 8, 4 p.m. South Place Institute: "The Boot Industry," by Mr. James Branch.
7.30 p.m. Ethical: "Holiday Notes on the Ethical Movement," by Mr. B. Bosanquet.
MONDAY, Oct. 9, 8 p.m. Library Association: "The Place of Libraries in relation to Elementary, Secondary, and Higher Education," by Mr. W. E. A. Axon.
8 p.m. Royal Academy: "Anatomy—Introduction," by Prof. W. Anderson.
TUESDAY, Oct. 10, 6 p.m. London Institution: "The Principles of Commercial Geography applied to the British Empire," II., by Dr. H. B. Mill.
THURSDAY, Oct. 12, 8 p.m. Royal Academy: "Anatomy, the Upper Extremity," I., by Prof. W. Anderson.
FRIDAY, Oct. 13, 7 p.m. London Amateur Scientific Society: "Conversations; "Parasitism, Commensalism, &c.," by Mr. S. Pace.

SCIENCE.

THE HISTORY OF THE VULGATE IN FRANCE.

Histoire de la Vulgate pendant les premiers Siècles du Moyen Âge. Par Samuel Berger. Mémoire couronné par l'Institut. (Paris: Hachette.)

M. SAMUEL BERGER, in the volume before us, gives us the results of earnest and well-directed research, extending over many years, covering many countries, and carried on by a scholar peculiarly fitted for the task. The history of the Vulgate in the first half of the Middle Ages is difficult to trace, because we have no materials for it beyond those contained in the Biblical MSS. themselves. Why and how it was that the text had become corrupt by the beginning of the ninth century, what influences had caused the degeneration—this we can only ascertain by collating the MSS. before that time, arranging them in groups, and assigning, where possible, a local origin to each type of text; and, for a large number of Vulgate MSS., M. Berger has done this with a completeness and exactness which leave nothing to be desired.

Unfortunately his area of study, as indicated by the title of his book, Histoire de la Vulgate en France, excludes a critical examination of those early MSS. which do not seem to have influenced the French text; and, consequently, some MSS. whose texts present the most difficult critical problems are passed over—the Codices Fuldensis, Forojuliensis, and Perusinus, the Gospels at Milan (Amb. C. 39 inf.), all probably of the sixth century, and the Harley Gospels (Harl. 1775) of the sixth or seventh, are the earliest in date and among the most valuable in text that we have, and yet they are not discussed in M. Berger's book; and the student who reads it must bear in mind that he is studying the history of the Vulgate in one particular country, not its history as a whole.

The limitations of the work were perhaps inevitable; but, within these limits, M. Berger's work is of the very highest order. He published in 1887 a short but valuable essay on this subject, entitled De l'Histoire de la Vulgate en France, describing that history during the Carolingian period as a long struggle between a pure type of text entering France from the British Isles, and a corrupt type entering from Spain. The present work of over 400 pages is a amplification and a detailed proof of the theory maintained in the former. The streams of text and the courses by which they entered France from the north and the south, their conjunction in the centre, and the type of text which resulted from them, are all clearly traced out. On the one hand, the Irish, those "missionaries by birth and by vocation," exercised a deep influence on the French text; on the other, the Visigothic Empire, in occupying a part of France, left traces of its rich civilisation behind it, in religion and literature as well as in other points.

From the very first, Jerome's Vulgate in the New Testament must have stood a slight chance of being correctly transmitted. M. Berger well points out in his earlier chapters the different fates which the Old and New Testaments encountered in Gaul. Jerome's Old Testament quickly popularised itself; before his time the acquaintance of the Latin nations with it was slight. But the New Testament was familiar to them of old in numerous and varied old Latin recensions—"tot exemplaria pene quot codices"—and to these they naturally clung with affection; and thus, in such Latin Fathers as Avitus of Vienne and Gregory of Tours, we find a comparatively pure Vulgate Old Testament side by side with a New Testament strongly mingled with pre-Hieronymian elements.

Two great recensions of the text were made at the end of the eighth and beginning of the ninth centuries, those of Theodulf and Alcuin. These are treated at length and in detail by M. Berger; that of Theodulf, we believe, for the first time, though M. Delisle had previously called attention to it in his excellent essay, Les Bibles de Théodulfe (Paris, 1879), and had indicated the MSS. in which the revision was contained; and the Alcuinian recension has been examined by Dr. Corssen in his careful monograph on the Trierer Adahandschrift (Leip., 1889), to which M. Berger acknowledges his indebtedness. Theodulf, though Bishop of Orleans, was a Visigoth by birth, and his recension was a return to the old Spanish traditions and learning. It is preserved in two Bibles, written in an exquisite and minute ninth century hand, now respectively at Paris (B.N. Lat. 9,380) and at Puy; so exact is the resemblance between them that, as M. Delisle observes, many pages look almost like proof-sheets struck off from the same type. In these MSS. there are strong Spanish characteristics: such forms as quum, quur, sequutus occur constantly; the arrangement of the books in the Bible, and the prefaces to many of them, are such as are found in the Spanish MSS.; while the type of text is also mainly Spanish, though mixed at times with that current in the South of France. A British Museum MS. (Addit. 24,142), from the monastery of St. Hubert in the Ardennes, strongly resembles the Theodulfian Bibles in handwriting, and has been corrected throughout in accordance with their text. We hoped that M. Berger would have given us a somewhat longer discussion on this MS., and especially on the type of text presented by the first hand.

Alcuin's revision was undertaken at the desire of Charles the Great. Its main objects were no doubt grammatical purity, and an assimilation of the Biblical text to that in use in the Church services. But whereas Theodulf called to his aid the Spanish traditions, Alcuin relied on the North British MSS., with which he was familiar from his early life and education in York, and his recension is thus marked by strong British elements. We venture to think, also, though M. Berger does not mention this, that he must have occasionally emended from the Greek; we have met with more than one obvious Alcuinian correction in the Gospels, which seems capable of explanation only on this supposition.

The grand "Bibles de luxe" of the Alcuinian schools at Tours receive ample treatment at M. Berger's hands. Externally, they form a magnificent group of MSS., all closely resembling each other; in text, they vary indefinitely. They were produced in vast number and with great rapidity, and many of them were apparently, in the exigencies of haste, copied from the first exemplar at hand, so that they by no means all present an Alcuinian text. The more important MSS. of the Vulgate anterior to these recensions are described at length, under headings which speak for themselves: "Les textes primitifs," "Les anciens textes Français," "Saint-Gall et l'Italie du Nord," &c. Their characteristics, both textual and palaeographical, are examined, and the groups into which they form themselves indicated, while an appendix at the end of the book gives us a second technical description of every MS. discussed. We venture to think that this is a defect in the arrangement of the volume. It has entailed upon the author the labour of describing all his MSS. twice, and the lines of his arguments as to the character of their texts are a little confused and hidden by the amount of space spent on their appearance and history. Had these descriptions been kept quite separate, we think his reasoning would have gained in continuity and clearness, and a certain amount of space would have been saved. This is, however, a mere criticism on the form, not on the matter, of the book. The student who examines the list may rest assured that now for the first time he is presented with an adequate catalogue of all the more important Vulgate MSS. Of previous lists, De Long, in the first edition (1723) of his Bibliotheca Sacra, enumerated 178 MSS.; in the later edition, by Masch, this list was, unfortunately, omitted, for it is by far the fullest catalogue we have hitherto possessed, though many of the MSS. are late and comparatively unimportant, nor are they always easy to identify. Of other lists, Vercellone's and our own Bishop Westcott's, though excellent in their way, were confessedly temporary and partial attempts. Scrivener's third edition enumerated barely eighty MSS., many of which were disposed of in half a line. M. Berger's list comprises over 250 MSS., described with accuracy and conciseness; and the student who wishes to examine any MS. for himself in this or that library will know beforehand its size, date, what previous writers have studied it, and what its present name and library number is—no small advantage, as our own experience can testify.

But on almost all matters connected with the Vulgate the book is a perfect storehouse. Few books, we fancy, have ever contained, for their size, so much first-hand information. Nearly every page has a note collecting and digesting the study of years. We may especially refer to the footnote with regard to the text in 2 Macc. xii. 46 (m. p. 23), which seems to us a model of patient research and able arrangement; while the short statement on p. 38, that "the only MSS. which omit this verse [John v. 4] are, in addition to the 'Italian' texts anterior to Jerome, sang. harl. arm. durm., CCCC. 197.* and Würzburg 67," deserves to be ranked with Bentley's famous verdict on Astypalæe of Crete. It is, indeed, the diligence and accuracy which we are accustomed to associate with Germany; but handled with an ease and presented with a grace of style that are peculiarly French.

H. J. WHITE.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE IRISH MSS. AT BRUSSELS.

University College, Liverpool.

The collection of Irish MSS. in the Bibliothèque Royale at Brussels, the largest on the continent, has never yet been described in an adequate manner. The account of it given by Bindon in the Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy (vol. iii., pp. 477—502), as long ago as 1847, is meagre and inaccurate. During a short stay at Brussels the other day I carefully went through two of the most important MSS. of the collection, and now submit the results to the readers of the ACADEMY, the only medium of communication in this country for those interested in Celtic studies.

Vol. iv. (2324—40) is a quarto paper MS. consisting of two parts, written throughout by Michael O'Clery.

Part i., fo. 1a—7a. Ag so síos na bliadhna inroinneagnadh mainstreacha uird S. Froinsels i Erin doréir an chruinnigthe 7 an teglamtha corinne an tathair Froinsias ua Mathgamhna an ráth doibhí na phrovinnsial, &c.

Fo. 10b—11b. Drong dona daoinibh as oirdercu obí isin senchus i nErinn et bliadhna a mbaisi doréir na leabar annaladh. This list of famous persons begins A.D. 677 with Ceannfaoladh mac Ailella, and ends 1168 with Flannacán ua Dubthaig.

Fo. 13a. Betha Phadraig.

Fo. 24a. Betha Bhride.

Fo. 35a—43b. Betha Fionncon naoinh annso .i. Fionnchu Bhri Gobhann (17 chapters).

Fo. 44a—46b. Cuimmin Connere's poem on the saints of Ireland, printed by Kelly, Calendar of Irish Saints, p. 160.

Fo. 48a—54b. Betha Coimin Foda (19 chapters).

Fo. 56a—58b. As Fleidh Dhúin na nGédh lobenadh an bégán so ar espoc Earc Slaine.

Fo. 59a—62a. De S. Ronano mac Beruigh as Eachtra Suibhne. This includes the story of Suibne's death.

Fo. 62b. Ar Moling as seinleabhruibh Gaoidelge. A disgusting story about Moling and a leper.

Fo. 67a. De verbis Colmain mac Obona.

1b. Caillech dorad a mac do Moling. Finn at a chainm, &c. The same story is found LL. p. 284b. Fo. 67b:

Lorica Choluim Cille incipit.
Sciath Dé do nim umam ar bith cé, &c.

The same poem in L. Br., p. 262b.

Fo. 68a. Celtair di Ohil[?] Diarmata Inni Clotrann incipit.

Beitt gom snadhadh
ar gach ngabad, &c.

The same poem in L. Br., p. 262a.

Fo. 69a. De confesione Sancte Ciarane. Peccaui et multiplicata sunt peccata mea super numerum harene maris, &c.

Fo. 74a. Firt amhra ó Chiaran et o Finden et geineumhain Aoda Slaine sunn beos. This is followed on fo. 75a by the poem beginning Cachtaus rosalt in righain, which has been edited from LU. and LL. by Windisch in the Berichte der Königl. Sachs. gesellschaft der wissenschaften, 1884, p. 196.

Fo. 77a. Tri briathra doratt Corp mac Cuilennai .i. nach biad enadhagh rea lind gan tri neithe do denum .i. cen ni do tiadhacul 7 cen ilceola anaitena d'eistecht 7 gan iarneirge duthachtach do denum, &c.

Fo. 78a—85b. Incipit Cain Adamnain ar slicht senlibuir Ratha Bothe. Another copy of this is in Rawl. B. 512, fo. 48a, 1. (See Stokes, Tripartite Life, p. xxi.)

Fo. 86a. Ciaran cecinit:

An rim, a ri an richid ráin, corbam etal isin dáil, &c.

Fo. 89a—100a. Betha Meic Creiche.

Fo. 101a—104b. Beatha Eimhin, containing among other poems the Láid cluice Eimine, beginning:

An cloccán sa na riogh rúadh targaidh duthaine díombuan, ní gébha talmáin ná nemh nach anmain formbenfaidher.

Another copy of this poem is in R. I. A. 23, P. 3, fo. 17a.

Part ii. fo. 1a—6a. Betha Mochua Balla (24 chapters).

Fo. 6a. Bladh do bheathaidh Baoithin. Another copy is in Rawl. B. 512, fo. 142a, 2.

Fo. 6b—7a. The Life of Dunchad ua Brain.

Fo. 7b—16a. Beatha Fionnchua Brigobhann (20 chapters). See Stokes, Lives, p. 347.

Fo. 16b—22a. Betha Bharra ó Chorcaigh (27 chapters).

Fo. 22b—23b. Betha Crannatan.

Fo. 24a—28a. Betha Molacca meic Duibhdhligidh (20 chapters).

Fo. 29a—32a. Betha Finain confessor (21 chapters).

Fo. 33a—40a. Betha Ailbhe (42 chapters).

Fo. 40b—44b. Betha Abain (24 chapters).

Fo. 45a—49b. Betha Mochua (29 chapters).

Fo. 50a—52b. Betha Fursa (3 chapters).

Fo. 52b. Fechtus dia ndeachaid anti naomh-Ruadan for cuairt cleircechta go righ Eoganachta Caisil .i. Eochaid mac Máilugra, &c. Ends fo. 53a.

Fo. 53b—59a. Betha Ceallaigh epscoip et a mhartra sonda. This is an extract made from L. Br., p. 272b, and very valuable as supplying the numerous lacunae in that MS.

Fo. 60a—110b. Betha Mádhóc Ferna (78 chapters).

Fo. 111a—118a. Betha Cholmain Eala (7 chapters).

Fo. 118b—133b. Betha Senain Insi Cathaig.

Fo. 133b—149a. Another version of the life of Senán.

Fo. 149a—155b. Beccán do Oháin Eide Áran annso.

Comharba Eide go cclú dlighidh Eire acht madh énnún, as leis gan bréicc oisín soir gonuicce an nGréicc oirtheraigh, &c.

Fo. 156a—165b. Incipit Betha Chaimin Insi Cealtra i ndán.

Caimin dodhechaid dar muir iar sioladh creidme is crabuidh, do dheoin an richid rindaigh dar in bfairrge nglaislindaigh, &c.

Fo. 166a—169b. Betha Caoimhghin.

Fo. 170a—178b. Betha Caoimhghin annso doréir mar doecribh manach fá deiscipal do féin hi dár bainm Solamh.

Fo. 179a—194b. Betha Mochamocco.

Fo. 195a—246b. Betha Chaillin, containing the Fis Caillin (fo. 240b).

The second MS. which I examined is numbered vol. xi. (4190—4200), likewise a paper quarto written by Michael O'Clery.

Fo. 1a—25b. Bladh bhecc do bheathaid et d' fer-toibh nem Brighde sunn. Identical with the Life in the Book of Lismore, edited by Stokes, Lives, p. 34.

Fo. 26a—26b. Don scrin Adhamhnán cecinit. See Reeves's Columba, p. lxiii.

Fo. 27a—28b. Some extracts from the Annals relating to Adamnán.

Fo. 29a—33b. Betha Adamnán (24 chapters).

Fo. 34a—41a. Fis Adamnán.

Fo. 43a—53b. Geinemain Mollince et a bheathae.

Fo. 54a—63a. Incipit quaedam miracula de mirabilibus Sancti Molling episcopi. All in Latin.

Fo. 66a—82b. Betha Beraigh.

Fo. 83a—86a. Betha Ghreallain.

Fo. 86b—89b. Betha Farannain.

Fo. 91a—111a. Betha Molaisi.

Fo. 112a—123a. Betha Laisre.

Fo. 124a—137a. Betha Naille.

Fo. 139a—148b. Betha Ciarain Saighre.

Fo. 149a—165b. Betha Chiarain Cluana (49 chapters).

Fo. 166a—186a. Betha Deccain (46 chapters).

Fo. 186a—195a. Betha Ruadhain (22 chapters).

Fo. 196a—203b. Betha Findein Cluana hÍraird (22 chapters).

Fo. 203b—212a. Betha Beineoin deiscipuil Patraic (21 chapters).

Fo. 212b—216a. Aireran cecinit. Ateoch frítt, a Issu noebh, do celtire suiscealghindiu roscríobhsat do soscela, Matha, Marc, Lucas, Iohannes, &c. Copied from a MS. written in 1471. Partly identical with the prayers in L. Br., p. 74.

Fo. 217a—256b. Betha Brénainn Chluana Ferta. Copied from a MS. written in 1536.

Fo. 259a—264b. Life of Mochutta mac Finail do Chiarraigib Léachra.

Fo. 265a—267b. Do mhacuibh úa Suanach.

Fo. 268a. Bladh bhecc as leabhar comarba Senain. Tangatar a muintir isin madain isin inis ar cenn cuirp Senain .i. Odhran et Mac Innill et epscoip Erc, &c.

Fo. 269a. The Amra Senáin, glossed. Begins: Dallan doróine an amhra so do Shenán iar ndenumh in amhra ele do Cholum Cille, &c.

Another copy of this Amra is in L. Br., p. 241a. Further extracts relating to Senán follow. The MS. ends on fo. 272b.

KUNO MEYER.

SCIENCE NOTES.

THE Harveian oration for this year at the Royal College of Physicians will be delivered by Dr. P. H. Pye-Smith, on Wednesday, October 18, at 4 p.m.

THE London Amateur Scientific Society will hold a conversazione at the Memorial Hall, Farringdon-street, on Friday next, October 13, at 7 p.m., when several objects of interest will be exhibited. Later in the evening, Mr. S. Pace will read a paper on "Parasitism, Commensalism, &c."

THE current number of the Geographical Journal (Edward Stanford) contains a further report of Dr. H. R. Mill's bathymetrical survey of the English Lakes. In company with Mr. E. Heawood, he spent five days, in the beginning of September, in completing the sounding of Windermere, which is, of course, the largest of the English lakes, being more than ten miles in length and in some parts more than one mile broad. Eighty sections were made, in order to determine the contour lines of each 50 feet of depth; and the total number of soundings taken amounted to 860. Superficially, Windermere is divided into three clearly distinguished parts. The northern division is four miles long, and on the average about three-quarters of a mile wide, with only a few small islands near the shore. This stretch is the deepest, the greatest sounding obtained being 219 feet, though possibly the real maximum depth may be 20 or 30 feet more. The entire area deeper than 200 feet measures one mile by a quarter of a mile; and the area below sea-level (the surface of the lake standing at 129 feet) is a long strip of three and a quarter miles by one-third of a mile. The central division is one mile long and half a mile wide. It is divided by Belle Isle into two narrow channels, each of which is less than 25 feet deep for the distance of half a mile. The southern division is long, narrow, and tapering. The average width is half a mile, and the length about five and a half miles; the greatest depth found here was 144 feet. A large proportion of the bed of Windermere is covered with stiff, plastic clay, white, pink, or brown in colour; and all the rocky promontories and islands show unmistakable marks of ice-action. Temperature observations of great interest were made in the lake.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

MR. CHARLES HUNTER ROSS has reprinted from the Publications of the Modern Language Association of America the dissertation which he presented for the degree of Ph.D. at Johns Hopkins University. His subject is, "The Absolute Participle in Middle and Modern English," a subject to which he seems to have been attracted by the fact that his friend, Mr. Morgan Callaway, submitted a dissertation upon "The Absolute Participle in Anglo-Saxon" in 1889; while Dr. J. W. Bright, of Johns Hopkins, has also written on "The Objective Absolute in English" (Modern Language Notes, March, 1890). The following is his own summary of his conclusions:—

"In the development of the absolute participle in Middle English, two periods must be distinguished. In the first, which extends from 1150 to 1350, the construction is practically non-existent, and, where it does appear, it must be looked on as a survival of the Anglo-Saxon absolute participle, or as a direct imitation of the Latin ablative absolute. In the second, which extends from 1350 to 1500, French influence causes an increase in occurrence, but the construction is still a stranger. In only two monuments, Chaucer's Poems and Paston Letters, is it at all common; and this frequency is due to an excess of foreign influence—of Italian in Chaucer, of classical in the Paston Letters.

"The presence of the absolute participle in Middle English is due almost entirely to Old French influence, though this influence was not great. In the first period of Middle English it was not appreciable, but in the second period it made itself felt by the increased occurrence of the construction, and by the importation of prepositions that were formerly absolute participles. Through analogy to these, English has been enriched by many new prepositions and quasi-prepositions, derived from participles. Old French influence, however, was not able to hold the English absolute case to an oblique form like itself. The Italian absolute construction exercised an appreciable influence on Chaucer, but there is no evidence to show that it influenced any other Middle English writer.

"As regards the development of the absolute participle in Modern English, we must also distinguish two periods. In the first, which extends, roughly, from 1500 to 1660, the construction occurs but sparingly in writers whose style is simple and English, but is very abundant in writers specially dominated by classical influence. This increase in occurrence is due to the Revival of Learning. In the second period, extending from 1660 to the present time, the construction becomes naturalised under the influence of the Restoration, and takes its place as an inherent part of the syntax. It is given to poetry, and its sphere is largely narrowed to that of narration and description.

"The case of the absolute participle changed its form in Middle English from dative to nominative. This change began to take place before the close of the thirteenth century, and was finally effected during the second quarter of the fifteenth. The reason of this change of form is to be found in the heterogeneous condition of the language in late Anglo-Saxon and early Middle English, by which inflexions were levelled and old syntactical distinctions were forgotten. The change was a gradual process, and is not due directly to any foreign influence. The so-called nominative absolute in Modern English is really a dative absolute in disguise. Both by history and logic it is an oblique case, and cannot be expressed by a true nominative.

"The stylistic effect of the absolute participle in Middle English is about the same as in Anglo-Saxon; where it occurred, it gave freedom and movement to the sentence, but its artificial character almost kept it from being felt. In Modern English there is a different condition of things. Here it is an important adjunct to the style, to which it imparts variety and compactness. It gives life and movement to the sentence, and is the ready resource of all writers of narration and description for the purpose of expressing subordinate conceptions."

We may add that the author appends a convenient outline of his academical career.

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

ANGLO-RUSSIAN LITERARY SOCIETY, IMPERIAL INSTITUTE.—(Tuesday, Oct. 3.)

E. A. CAZAKET, Esq., president, stated that, besides many other new members, the mess of the 117th Yaroslav Infantry regiment, quartered at Slonim, in the government of Grodno, had expressed their desire to join the Anglo-Russian Society, as a proof of their sympathy with the efforts made to promote friendly relations between Great Britain and Russia. A letter was read, announcing that new official publications, both in English and Russian, would be forwarded from St. Petersburg, as a present from the Department of Commerce and Manufactures, for the society's library. The works contained the latest statistical and other information in reference to Russian trade, manufactures, mining, agriculture, schools, including specially a description of Siberia and the Siberian railway which is now in process of construction.

These new and authentic data will facilitate business for Englishmen wishing to promote commercial and industrial relations with Russia.—Mr. H. G. Keene then read a paper, entitled "Russia and Great Britain in the East." He explained that each of these Powers had an extensive sphere of action in civilising the Asiatic countries which were under their influence. He showed the immense development which India had attained under British sway, and said: "if the two nations—Russia in the North, Great Britain from the side of the Indian Ocean—are to advance as friendly rivals, and, so to say, hand-in-hand, confidence must be firmly established. Russia must have credit for the good intentions which, doubtless, actuate her astonishing efforts and exertions; while the able and energetic officers by whom she is represented in Central Asia must be careful to look upon their neighbours with a friendly eye, as not only to be let alone, but also sympathised with, so long as they exercise reciprocal good faith and feeling. Above all, each must acknowledge the importance of avoiding a too close contact with the other. . . ." As to the expansion of Russia towards the sea, the lecturer saw nothing in such a process to cause the slightest umbrage to Great Britain; the danger was for Russia, by throwing her more in contact with maritime nations.—Mr. Kinloch read a paper, in Russian, on "Shakspere in Russia," the composition of Mr. Kremlöv. After dwelling on Shakspere's universal knowledge of the human heart, the author deprecated the introduction of the low-toned French operettes which had debased the tone of society and diverted attention from the substantial, robust, and moral drama of the great master. Mr. Kremlöv admitted that, although of Shakspere's thirty-seven plays only one-third had, as yet, been acted in Russia, of late a thirst for the serious study of his works had begun to spread throughout the country. When Salvini acted in St. Petersburg and Moscow, not a single unsold volume of Shakspere's works could be found in the libraries of both those capitals. In conclusion, Mr. Kremlöv expressed the ardent wish that a Shaksperean Society should be established in Russia, and hoped that the Anglo-Russian Literary Society would be able to render assistance in this organisation. In his opinion, Shakspere has been, is, and always will be, the chief link in the chain of literary communion which joins England with Russia, because Shakspere, by the might of his genius, has given to both countries the same artistic ideas.—M. Borzenko gave an account, in Russian, of his travels in the United States of America. He explained the practical and convenient administration of the Patent Office in that country; but he dwelt with special detail on the Reformatory system, which had impressed him by its comprehensive and benevolent organisation. The moral and intellectual improvement of prisoners, and the absence of punishment and unnecessary restraint, were most remarkable. As a philanthropist and a sincere patriot, M. Borzenko has studied these questions for the good of Russia, and it is to be hoped that his experience and suggestions will meet with the attention of the authorities in his own country.—The President announced that the next meeting would be on Tuesday, November 7, when he would read a paper, entitled "An Impostor Czar," dealing with some historical and literary questions which are not generally known to the British public.—Mr. Howard Swan would also give a lecture explaining "The New Series Method of Teaching Languages and its Basis in Psychology."

FINE ART.

SOME BOOKS ON EGYPTOLOGY.

THE Egypt Exploration Fund has recently published (Kegan Paul & Co.) its second Archaeological Report, covering the period 1892-3. Its value is greatly enhanced by the fact that it is not confined to recording the work of the society, but that it also includes a summary of the general progress of Egyptology, with special chapters on Greek papyri and Coptic studies. Besides numerous illustrations, there is further an archaeological map of Egypt, from the sea to Khartum, in five parts. First, M. Naville gives a report of his excavations during the early months of 1892, when he discovered the Greek library of Mendes. Unfortunately, among the mass of papyri that he found, not one is in a condition that admits of decipherment. Perhaps his most interesting discovery was that of the cartouches of a king of the XIIth or XIIIth Dynasty, which he reads as Nehasi, "the negro," which indicates the presence of foreign conquerors in Egypt before the time of the Hyksos. Next, Mr. Percy E. Newberry describes the work of the Archaeological Survey during the winter of 1892-93. The principal result was to obtain accurate drawings of the bas-reliefs and copies of the inscriptions in sets of tombs in Middle Egypt at Sheikh Sa'id and Dêr el Gebrawi. These will be published in a second volume of the Survey, and they will throw much light upon the hitherto obscure period of the Vth and VIth Dynasties, besides illustrating ancient arts and crafts. Then, Mr. F. L. Griffith, the general editor of the volume, contributes an invaluable report (though confined to twelve pages) on the progress of Egyptological studies during the past twelve months. While the actual work of discovery in Egypt itself receives its share of notice, we have here, for the first time in English, some account of the activity displayed by German Egyptologists, especially in the department of philology, under the stimulus of Prof. Erman's teaching. So far as England itself is concerned, the lectures in London of Prof. Flinders Petrie, Prof. R. Stuart Poole, and Mr. Le Page Renouf are duly mentioned; but the names of Oxford and Cambridge are conspicuous by their absence. Finally, Mr. F. G. Kenyon, of the British Museum, gives a brief but interesting summary of the recent finds of Greek papyri, in the publication of which he has himself borne so prominent a part, and Mr. W. E. Crum writes about the less popular subject of Coptic studies. It is, perhaps, worthy of notice that the last three names we have mentioned are those of Oxford men, though not of Oxford residents.

Oriental Diplomacy. By Charles Bezold. (Luzac.) By "Oriental Diplomacy" Dr. Bezold explains that he means "the transliterated text of the cuneiform despatches between the kings of Egypt and Western Asia in the fifteenth century before Christ, discovered at Tell-el-Amarna, and now preserved in the British Museum." But it is something more than this. Dr. Bezold has prefixed to it an account of the phraseology and grammatical peculiarities of the texts, and has added a very useful vocabulary of the various words which occur in them. For the Assyriologist, the book is a serviceable and handy supplement to the British Museum volume on the Tell-el-Amarna tablets. The author is specially skilled in the art of cataloguing and dictionary-making, and it is needless to say that he has done his work well. It is a pity, however, that his book was finished, as we may gather from the date of the Preface, too soon to allow him to profit by some of the criticisms which have been passed on the British Museum volume, and so avoid the errors committed in that work. Thus the letters from Akizzi (Nos. 36, 37) are still stated to be addressed to Amenophis III., instead of Amenophis IV.; Ubi, the Egyptian Aup, is identified with the Biblical Hobab, which was in a different part of the oriental world; and the name of the city of Qatna is wrongly transliterated. Assyriologists seem to have been strangely forgetful that the position of Qatna is closely indicated for us by Assur-nasir-pal (W. A. I., i. 23; Col. iii. 3-8). So, again, in the letter referring to Edom (No. 64), the name of the city of Bitlim or Bethel is read Bikhishi. Dr. Bezold gives a summary of the contents of each letter, instead of a translation, on the ground that in the present state of cuneiform research it would "be impossible to give a translation of the Tell-el-Amarna texts which would entirely satisfy the expert or general reader." But precisely the same argument would hold against our attempting to translate the prophetic books of the Old Testament. The chief duty of the Assyriologist is to endeavour to translate his texts, and the "general reader" is inclined to suppose with some show of reason that the Assyriologist who cannot do this has still much to learn. Had the older Assyrian scholars acted on such a principle, Assyriology would not be as advanced as it is to-day. It is certainly much more profitable to try to get at the meaning of a passage than to discuss Assyrian phonology, as Dr. Bezold threatens to do. If it is impossible to determine the pronunciation of Hebrew or classical Greek when they were spoken languages, much more impossible is it to do so in the case of Assyrian. The attempt is simply a waste of time. The grammatical peculiarities of the Tel el-Amarna letters have been registered with painstaking care, and will materially further our knowledge of Assyrian grammar. The vocabulary at the end of the book is excellent, and makes us wish that Dr. Bezold would do for the collections of tablets at Gizeh and Berlin what he has done for the collection in the British Museum. It is doubtful, however, whether addu is to be identified with attu; and the reading pi-da-tum cannot be right, since the first character has the value of yi or ma rather than of pi in the Tel el-Amarna tablets. There is one matter, finally, which we cannot pass over in silence. Dr. Bezold has disfigured his book by references to a reviewer in the Athenæum which violate all rules of scholarly propriety. They may be permissible in Germany, but they are not the language of an English gentleman. And Dr. Bezold's title-page shows that he wishes to be regarded as an Englishman.

Étude sur le Nord-Etbaï entre le Nil et la Mer Rouge. By E. A. Floyer. (Cairo: National Press.) In 1891 a scientific expedition under the command of Mr. Floyer was sent by the late Khedive to explore and survey the desert between the Red Sea and that part of the Nile which flows between Esneh and Assuan. The result is a report which takes the form of an elaborate work on the region that was surveyed. Mr. Floyer begins with the geography of the district and an account of the course taken by the expedition. Then come chapters on the antiquities of the country, on the Phœnicians whom Mr. Floyer believes to have once settled there, on its botany, mineralogy, and geology, on the ancient commerce of the Red Sea, on the astronomical determination of certain points in the valley of the Nile, and on the working of the Nubian gold-mines in the ninth century. The whole district is, indeed, full of the remains of the mines of gold and other metals worked by the Pharaohs, the Ptolemies, and their successors, as well as of the settlements in which the miners and their overseers lived. Mr. Floyer explored some of the ancient mines, and his description of them is not the least interesting part of his book. He finds a support for his theory that the Phœnicians were acquainted with them in a passage of the Odyssey (iv. 83), though it is doubtful whether he will get philologists to assent to his identification of the Homeric Erembi with the Blemmyes of classical geography. Mr. Floyer is a strong advocate of the effects of drifting sand in producing the present configuration of the desert, and he is inclined to regard the introduction of the camel into it by the Arabs as a leading cause of its existing treeless and waterless condition. The camel is the enemy of woods and forests which are ruthlessly destroyed for its sake, and the disappearance of trees brought with it the disappearance of water also. In two or three places, however, Mr. Floyer still found basins of pure water. The book is enriched with excellent maps and photographs. It seems very strange, however, that the work of an Englishman, who is constantly referring to English authorities and even quoting English verses, should be published in French. The anomaly is made all the more glaring by the fact that the most serviceable of the maps, that drawn up for the Royal Geographical Society, is printed in English. If the rules of the Egyptian Ministry of the Interior have necessitated such a piece of red-tapism, it is time that they should be altered. Under the circumstances, the misspelling of English names is inevitable, and the French itself is naturally that of Cairo rather than of Paris. For an English author to be obliged to translate Pope's lines into French, as is the case on page 71, is simply grotesque.

Géographie ancienne de la Basse-Egypte. Par le Vte. Jacques de Rougé. (Paris: Rothschild.) This is a valuable account of what is known up to the present moment of the ancient geography of Lower Egypt. It has all the lucidity and orderly arrangement that we are accustomed to meet with in French scientific works. The author, a son of the famous French Egyptologue, has made full use of the discoveries of Prof. Flinders Petrie and the Egypt Exploration Fund, and he has published for the first time the geographical names of the Delta given in a Coptic ecclesiastical MS. now preserved in Oxford. Where his materials are wanting he maintains a prudent silence; Avaris, for instance, the Hyksos capital, is not even mentioned in his pages. The book is indispensable to all who are interested in ancient Egyptian geography, and we hope that the author will follow it up with a similar work on the geography of Upper Egypt.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

THE first exhibition of the Photographic Salon—an international society which has been founded to promote the practice of artistic photography—will open next week in the Dudley Gallery, Piccadilly. The photographs exhibited have been selected solely for their pictorial qualities.

THE publishers of the Magazine of Art have resolved to make a fresh departure in the new volume, which commences with the November number. Henceforth, beside other novel features, they will issue a separate plate with each monthly number, being a reproduction of some picture of current interest. The magazine will thus, in the future, contain three plates: a photographure or etching as frontispiece, and two more executed by some other process, sometimes printed in colour. For example, the November number will contain a photographure of Rossetti's "Veronica Veronese"; an etching of the Alhambra, by Mr. Macbeth Raeburn; and a wood-engraving of Fred. Walker's picture, "The Harbour of Refuge," recently presented by Mr. Agnew to the National Gallery. At the same time, the price of the Magazine of Art will be raised to 1s. 4d. monthly.

MESSRS. SEELEY & Co., announce for the autumn season: The Riviera, consisting of twenty etchings and forty vignettes, by Mr. Alexander Ansted, with notes by the artist; and Round about Snowdon, consisting of thirty plates in etching and aquatint, by Mr. Thomas Huson, with notes by Mr. J. J. Hissey. Of both of these works there will be a limited issue on large paper.

MESSRS. OSGOOD, McILVAINE & Co. will shortly issue another set of book illustrations, by Mr. Walter Crane, the subject-matter on this occasion being a volume of Mrs. Margaret Deland's poetry.

MR. A. W. FRANKS requests us to state that the paragraph respecting his collection of Oriental Tiles, which appeared in the last number of the ACADEMY, is not quite correct. The tiles can scarcely be called a collection, and the best were presented by him to the British Museum in 1887. The remainder has not been given, and will not be for some time to come. They cannot be exhibited in the Ceramic Gallery, as there is no room for them.

THE STAGE.

STAGE NOTES.

MR. HENRY ARTHUR JONES has done a remarkable and peculiar thing in "The Tempter" at the Haymarket, though we cannot anticipate for the piece precisely the "run" that is dear to the heart of the theatrical manager. The theatrical audience does not as a rule care about poetry, or for the poetic piece alas! unless it is backed up with overpowering scenic effect, such as was lavished by Mr. Tree on "Hypatia"—a pretty piece enough, though it departed widely and deeply from Kingsley's romance. "The Tempter"—with Mr. Jones's new Mephistopheles, the very devil, indeed!—is, among recent stage work, marked by originality, albeit the originality comes clothed to some extent in the vesture of that Elizabethan drama which Mr. Jones has well studied. That Mr. Jones is capable of poetry we have never for a moment doubted. Neither has he ever lacked courage—the courage to present the situation of the scene exactly as it has appeared to his own mind. Let his next effort be devoted to finding all his poetry within the limits of such experiences as may occur to every soul of to-day. Meanwhile, in the ingenious and interesting "Tempter"—the inevitable cynicism of whose principal character suits Mr. Tree well—Mr. Jones makes sure of what is on the whole a good interpretation of his dramatis personae. Miss Julia Neilson, Mrs. Tree, and Mr. Fred. Terry take their part to the satisfaction of the audience.

ON Saturday night Mr. Comyns Carr, venturing for the first time upon all the responsibilities of theatrical management, opened the Comedy Theatre with a new play by Mr. Sydney Grundy, of which we shall very shortly speak in detail. Meantime, it will suffice to say that the new piece—written with point and containing a brilliant and almost Dumas-like discussion of an important point in ethics—was received, on Saturday, with extreme cordiality; that it is mounted with taste; and that it is played with extreme care. Whenever it may cease to draw—at a period yet, we trust, remote—it will be succeeded by a new work of Mr. Robert Buchanan's.

A STAGE note is certainly the place in which to recognise, though tardily, the extremely substantial and elaborate and impartial character of that study of the new literary movement in Belgium—chiefly, after all, a dramatic one—which Mr. William Sharp (who knows this school as it is known probably by no one else) makes in the September number of The Nineteenth Century. One after the other the writers (many of them singular and unsavoury) are passed under review, that which is according to them being no hysterical eulogy, but the compliment of true criticism. Such a verdict, the verdict of a qualified judge, cannot profess to be in the main favourable. But in Maeterlinck—in whom nothing whatever is gross—in Masterlinck and his chief literary brothers, Mr. Sharp rightly, as an artist, delights, even though we think he a little undervalues the capacity of that wonderful thing, "Les Aveugles," to be effective in actual representation.

MUSIC.

MUSICAL BOOKS.

Water Lilies. By E. Sachs. (Novello.) This fairy song by Felicia Hemans, with German version by L. Klein, has been set to pleasing music. The composition is a short one, and entirely choral. There is nothing specially original in the musical thoughts—one phrase of Schumannish origin sounds, indeed, familiar—or in their mode of treatment; and yet the general effect is good. The harmonies, for the most part, are tasteful, and the independent character of the accompaniment is promising; it is evidently an orchestral score reduced. Mr. Sachs deserves encouragement.

101 Original Rounds: music composed and collected by Arthur Page. (Forsyth Bros.) These are written for treble voices, and range from very easy to difficult. A capital collection: there is great variety in it. Some of the rounds are humorous, others tender and expressive, while here and there are some which point a useful moral. The more difficult are skilfully constructed.

Pianoforte Playing. Part I. By W. H. Webbe. (Auckland, N.Z.) This is a curious little book of jottings. It contains much useful information within small space. We can only notice one or two points. Some excellent rules are given for playing at sight; one is—"Do not stop to correct any mistakes made." This fault is most common; practising and sight-reading are quite different. There are some good hints on playing from memory, a habit not sufficiently encouraged by teachers. There is a list of composers of piano music, giving dates of birth and death and principal works; but as there are several mistakes or misprints, it ought to be carefully revised. The amount of space allotted to the various composers is not always according to merit—Chopin has six lines, Sydney Smith fifteen.

Seven Songs to Sing. Edited by Harold Boulton. (The Leadenhall Press.) The editor, in his brief preface, rightly says that "little need be said by way of introduction to seven songs by seven composers whose popularity with the public is well established." Mr. Boulton, who provided the composers with graceful poems, speaks of himself as "the Ganymede to this symposium of sweet singers." The composers are—Cotsford Dick, Theo. Marzials, Malcolm Lawson, L. Denza, Alfred J. Caldicott, Joseph L. Roeckel, and Lord Henry Somerset. The songs most to our liking are Mr. Dick's "Alas and Alack," which, if simple, is quaint, and Mr. Marzial's light Barcarolle (in canon), although the accompaniment does not always chime in well with the voices. The opening page of Mr. Lawson's "Last Words" is effective; but the rest scarcely realise the hopes excited.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTIONS TO THE ACADEMY. (PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.)

	YEARLY.	HALF-YEARLY.	QUARTERLY.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
If obtained of a Newsvendor or at a Railway Station . . .	0 13 0	0 6 6	0 3 3
Including Postage to any part of the United Kingdom . .	0 15 2	0 7 7	0 3 10
Including Postage to any part of France, Germany, India, China &c.	0 17 4	0 8 8	0 4 4

THIS DAY, AT ALL LIBRARIES. ESSAYS, SPEECHES, AND MEMOIRS OF FIELD-MARSHAL COUNT HELMUTH VON MOLTKE.

With Portraits. In 2 vols. Demy 8vo, cloth extra, 21s.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.

ELIZABETHAN SONGS: "In Honour of Love and Beauty." Collected and Illustrated by EDMUND H. GARRETT. With an Introduction by ANDREW LANG. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt top, 10s. 6d. Limited Edition de Luxe, on imperial Japan paper, £5 5s.

"A wonderful renaissance as regards the perfection of the book is in course of development, and some of the books of to-day are not to be surpassed since the beginning of printing. We have here, for instance, a book at a not excessive price, the type and paper of which are worthy of the fifteenth century, while the illustrations do not come far short of those of the eighteenth."—Notes and Queries.

Post 8vo, cloth extra, 6s.

THE PHILOSOPHY of SINGING. By Clara Kathleen ROGERS.

"It is not often that one finds a special musical subject treated in a special and also in a broader general way by one who is at once a trained specialist and a musician of wide general culture."—Boston Transcript.
"Admirable, and deserves general attention."—Critic (New York).

[Next week.]

Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

The SON of a PROPHET. By George Anson Jackson.

Mr. Jackson has produced an historical novel of great interest. The scene is laid in Palestine and Egypt, during the reign of King Solomon and his immediate successors. The hero of the story is the grandson of two of King David's "mighty men"; and the story deals with the long and strenuous conflict between the faithful adherents of Jewish worship and the priests of Astarte and Baal.

[Next week.]

NEXT WEEK.

IN a NORTH-COUNTRY VILLAGE. By M. E.

FRANCIS, Author of "Whither?" Cloth, 3s. 6d.

NOTE.—New List of Books free on application.

LONDON: OSGOOD, McILVAINE & CO., 45, ALBEMARLE STREET.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

THE CAMBRIDGE SHAKESPEARE. Edited by William Aldis

WRIGHT. Edition de Luxe. 40 vols., super-royal 8vo, 6s. per vol. net.

THE TEMPEST.

THE TWO GENTLEMEN of VERONA.

* * The Edition de Luxe of the Cambridge Shakespeare will be comprised in 40 volumes, super-royal 8vo, each volume containing a single play. The impression will be limited to 500 copies, a considerable number of which have been ordered in America. It will be issued at the rate of two volumes per month. Orders will only be received for Complete Sets.

A COMPANION to DANTE. From the German of G. A.

SCABIAZZINI. By A. J. BUTLER. Crown 8vo, 10s. 6d.

TIMES.—"His work is practically indispensable to all serious students of the poet, and none the less valuable because it often goes straight to the root of the matter, where other commentators have merely employed themselves in beating about the bush."

A POPULAR HANDBOOK to the NATIONAL GALLERY.

Including, by Special Permission, Notes collected from the Works of Mr. Ruskin. Compiled by EDWARD T. COOK. With Preface by JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D., D.C.L. Fourth Edition, Revised, Re-arranged, and Enlarged. Crown 8vo, half-morocco, 14s.

ELEMENTS of HANDICRAFT and DESIGN. By W. A. S.

BENSON, M.A. Oxon. With Illustrations. Extra crown 8vo, 5s. net.

MISS STUART'S LEGACY. By Mrs. F. A. Steel. 3 vols.,

crown 8vo, 31s. 6d.

MACMILLAN'S SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.—New Volumes.

CHILDREN of the KING. By F. Marion Crawford. New Edition.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

DON ORSINO. By F. Marion Crawford. New Edition. Crown

8vo, 6s.

MACMILLAN'S THREE-AND-SIXPENNY SERIES.—New Volumes.

THE MARPLOT. By S. R. Lysaght. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

A MERE CYPHER. By Mary A. Dickens. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

JOHN TREVENNICK. By W. C. Rhoades. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

MACMILLAN & CO., LONDON.

THREE CENTURIES OF NONCONFORMITY.

Just Out. Large crown 8vo, nearly 800 pages, price 6s. post free.

HISTORY OF THE FREE CHURCHES OF ENGLAND.
FROM THE REFORMATION TO 1851.

By HERBERT S. SKEATS.

With a Continuation to 1891, by CHAS. S. MIALL.

LONDON: ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, FURNIVAL STREET, E.C.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 14, 1893.

No. 1119, New Series.

THE EDITOR cannot undertake to return, or to correspond with the writers of, rejected manuscript.

It is particularly requested that all business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., may be addressed to the PUBLISHER, and not to the EDITOR.

LITERATURE.

The United States: an Outline of Political History (1492-1871). By Goldwin Smith. (Macmillans.)

THERE is no country, after their own, with whose history Englishmen ought to be better acquainted than with that of the greatest settlement of the race to which they belong; and yet it is to be feared that large portions of the subject are less known among us than they should be. Most have some idea of the American War of Independence, and are familiar with the names of its chief worthies; but of the subsequent history down to the Civil War their notions are decidedly vague. Even the second war with England seems to be half forgotten on this side; and the internal political struggles of the United States during the period, full of interest and instruction as they are, remain to the majority an unexplored field. The history of European nations, far more alien in race and speech, is more familiar to many than the annals of their own kinsfolk. To imitate a well-known passage of Macaulay, we may say that every fairly well-informed Englishman knows who was the "Citizen King," who perpetrated the coup d'état, and who was the German organiser of victory; but comparatively few could tell who won the battle of Plattsburg, what President attacked the national bank, whether Van Buren was a Whig or a Democrat, or what these names meant on the other side of the Atlantic.

There have been very few English works of value treating of modern American history. The admirable and exhaustive treatise of Mr. Bryce on The Commonwealth of the United States is only incidentally historical in its nature. Very few in this country know anything of the immense literature, which has grown up of recent years in America, dealing with the history of the present century both as a whole, and in portions, and treating of the lives of nearly every prominent public man. Many of the most important and valuable of these works are not to be found in any ordinary library; there are some of which even the British Museum does not contain a copy. It is therefore a cause for congratulation that one so eminently well qualified for the task as Mr. Goldwin Smith has in this little volume essayed to give to English readers some of the fruits of his vast knowledge. We should, indeed, have welcomed a much more detailed history from his pen. Though comprising a great number of facts in a brief space, these pages are as far as possible from constituting a mere dry skeleton. On the contrary, they are always interesting, and often lively and graphic in the extreme.

Mr. Goldwin Smith begins with a sketch of the colonial periods, and passes on in his second chapter to the War of Independence. As all who have any acquaintance with the author's often-expressed views on the relation of colonies to the parent state will expect, it is not his belief that the separation could have been avoided, or that its avoidance would have been desirable, even if possible. Still, he thinks that the parting might have taken place peaceably, and without any loss of friendship on either side; and he fills more than a page of eloquent rhetoric with maledictions on all whom he considers responsible for the unhappy issue of affairs. There is only space to quote the opening sentence:

"Woe, we must say, to them by whom the offence came and through whose immediate agency, culpable in itself, the two great families of our race were made, and to a deplorable extent have continued, enemies instead of being friends, brethren, and fellow-workers in the advancement of their common civilisation."

Our author's opinions on the men of the Revolution and their exploits will not on all points be pleasing to Americans, since he follows Mr. Lecky in adopting a somewhat depreciating tone. "The action and, with one grand exception, the actors were less than heroic." This verdict, though it may offend some natural feelings, is probably just in the main; but Mr. Goldwin Smith is certainly too hard on some of the English friends of the Americans, especially on Fox, whom he calls "a debauchee in politics as in private life," and charges with "reckless violence and revolting displays of sympathy with the Americans, even when they had France for an ally," and "unpatriotic behaviour." This language appears to imply that, however much a statesman may disapprove of a war in which his country is engaged, patriotism requires him to express no condemnation—a doctrine which agrees neither with other parts of Mr. Goldwin Smith's book (as, e.g., where he is treating of the Mexican War), nor with his own practice on more than one occasion in our recent history.

Mr. Goldwin Smith gives an excellent sketch of the formation of the federal constitution, and of the gradual rise of distinct parties on the question of strict or loose construction. There is little to criticise in his narrative till we come to the unhappy war of 1812, where he seems disposed to throw the greater part of the blame on the American side. This hardly seems a fair judgment. Certainly, the intolerable outrages on the commerce of the United States, which England had systematically inflicted for years before the outbreak of hostilities, would have led to war much sooner with any civilised nation nowadays. It is true that France was, to the extent of her power, as guilty as England in this respect; but this does not make the conduct of the latter any better. The Americans had further a special cause of complaint against Great Britain in the abominable practice of impressment. Mr. Goldwin Smith decidedly underrated the extent of this grievance, in describing it as being merely "the impressment of British seamen found on board American vessels." This in itself was a sufficiently outrageous pretension, which no maritime country would now tolerate for a moment; but it was so interpreted by many British naval commanders that they pressed American seamen wholesale, whenever they could not prove to demonstration their birth in the United States, and sometimes when there could be no reasonable doubt of this. It is true that the English claims were not formally surrendered by the Treaty of Ghent. But American writers are justified in calling attention to the fact that no attempt was made to enforce them afterwards; and it is not without reason that they point to the exploits of their navy during the war as helping to explain this tacit surrender.

Mr. Goldwin Smith gives a graphic sketch of the great leaders in the Senate during the second quarter of the present century, certainly the most brilliant period of American parliamentary eloquence. These orators, though they spoke our own tongue, are probably less known to most Englishmen than are many contemporary continental politicians of no higher powers. A few may attach some vague idea to the names of Clay and Webster; but how many have as much as heard the name of one who, evil as his cause was, presents far finer and more striking features in his character than either of these, and who, taking him in all, has few equals among the statesmen of any country for high ability, combined with single-mindedness and steadfastness of purpose—John C. Calhoun, the dauntless and devoted champion of the slave barons of South Carolina? His portrait is well painted by Mr. Goldwin Smith: "Calhoun was a man of Scotch-Irish origin, with the fervent but sombre energy characteristic of that race. By temper he was a political Calvinist, while South Carolina gave him for a creed slavery, of which she was the centre and the soul. As a speaker he impressed, not by anything that appealed to the imagination, but by intense earnestness and logical force. On his face and character there was a shade of sadness, which deepened as his career took a more tragic turn. . . . He was the first statesman who, discarding not only the philosophic condemnation of slavery fashionable among the old republicans of the South, but the apologies of its moderate upholders, proclaimed that slavery was a positive good, that it was the only relation possible between the white and black races, and even that the system of society based on it was the best and alone stable, while the system based on freedom and equality was unstable and anarchic."

In fact, he was a genuine aristocratic republican of the old Roman type; and we may compare him with the younger Cato, the headstrong leader of the doomed oligarchy in its last days. Or, coming nearer home, a striking parallel may be drawn between Calhoun and Fletcher of Saltoun, the fervent Scottish patriot and opponent of the Union of 1707. The latter was, like the former, a man of pure and noble character, strangely attached to a bad and corrupt system of government. A devoted lover of his country, he believed, like his American antitype, that what he called liberty could only rest on a foundation of bondage, and that a necessary step for the regeneration of Scotland was the enslavement of the greater number of her labouring classes.

If the name of Calhoun is but little known, that of Thomas Hart Benton may be said to be quite unknown in this country to all except the few who have studied American history in detail; and yet he was a party leader of great ability, whose career ought not to be without instruction for any practical politician. Mr. Goldwin Smith thus depicts him, in a passage evidently suggested by the perusal of the excellent Life by Mr. Roosevelt in the "American Statesmen" series:

"Benton was for twenty [this should be thirty] years a senator. He was of coarse mould compared with the other three, but of great power, gigantic industry, and possessed of an extensive knowledge of politics, which he sometimes grotesquely displayed; perhaps the first thorough specimen of a politician, with a virtue genuine, but not adamant, and a patriotism which yielded only to the strong exigencies of party, it might be in the sincere belief that the party was the country."

The last part of this criticism may appear not altogether just in its application to Benton's later career. He certainly made a manful stand against the policy of the Democratic party, after it had become completely dominated by the slave-owning interest. He opposed the war with Mexico, the Fugitive Slave Law of 1850, and the attempt to extend slavery over the Territories. His independent conduct lost him his seat in the Senate; but though so largely out of sympathy with the majority of his old party, he did not secede from it with most of the Free Soilers, but continued to the last to support its candidates at presidential elections. This seems rather perplexing conduct; but no one can impute to Benton any want of honesty of purpose. He stands pre-eminent among his contemporaries by his strict code of public morality. Almost alone among them he is entirely free from the suspicion of intriguing to obtain office, a charge from which even the austere Calhoun is not wholly clear. On the contrary, he several times refused high official positions which were offered him; and, while one of the most trusted leaders of his party, he was studious to avoid using his influence either for his own personal profit or for that of any of his connexions. His career certainly shows that every leading American politician must not necessarily be a rogue, as some English writers appear to suppose. All historical students owe a debt of gratitude to Benton for his work, Thirty Years in the United States Senate. This is a minute record of the parliamentary and political history of an important epoch by one who was himself a principal actor on the stage; and it is to be wished that we possessed a similar account of service in the English Parliament by any equally prominent party chief.

Mr. Goldwin Smith passes a severe and just condemnation on the Mexican War, which he truly describes as being "as striking an illustration as history can furnish of the quarrel between the wolf and the lamb, and which no American historian of character mentions without pain." There is no doubt that, as between the United States and Mexico, the war was a shameful aggression on the part of the Slave power which then dominated the government. In the original quarrel, however, between Mexico and Texas, it is not so clear that the Mexicans were entirely in the right. It is hardly an adequate account of the matter to say that

"Houston, an American filibuster, with a body of intrusive Americans, had planted himself in Texas, which belonged to the Republic of Mexico, and when the Mexicans took up arms to put him down and recover their province, had defeated them at the battle of San Jacinto."

As a matter of fact, the American settlers had come into Texas, in the first place, on the invitation of the Mexican Government. No doubt there was much that was reprehensible in their conduct—especially the attempt to introduce slavery, which had been abolished in Mexico; but, on the other hand, it cannot be denied that they had some just causes of complaint against the rulers of the country. Having settled on the understanding that they were to form a self-governing state in a federal commonwealth, they found themselves suddenly subjected to a centralised military despotism, alien in race and speech, and wielded by Santa Anna, an adventurer whose career showed him capable of the most atrocious crimes. It is not surprising that they refused to surrender their arms at the bidding of such a dictator; and their insurrection, whatever may have been its ulterior objects, cannot be pronounced entirely wanton and unprovoked. It must be said, too, that the infamous butcheries perpetrated by Santa Anna at the Alamo and Goliad can hardly fail to turn our feelings against him; and the remembrance of them does something even to lessen our sympathy for the gallant struggle which the Mexicans made against American aggression later on. Those, too, who may be disposed to make the war a subject of reproach to the American people as a whole may be reminded of the strong and high-principled opposition which it encountered throughout the Northern States. Certainly, England has been engaged in many wars equally unjustifiable which have aroused no such resistance.

In his last chapter Mr. Goldwin Smith gives an admirably clear summary of the history of the slavery question, down to its culmination in the Civil War; and sketches rapidly the chief points of interest in that gigantic conflict. He several times notices the analogy, which cannot fail to suggest itself, between the American struggle and the English Civil War of the seventeenth century. Many of the combatants, indeed, were actually the descendants of Cavaliers and Puritans respectively; and between the two periods of strife there is a great resemblance, both in the general principles involved and in many of the particular incidents. The parallel might be drawn in more cases than is done by our author. For instance, among the immediate antecedents of the war in America the decision of the Supreme Court in the Dred-Scott case played a very similar part to the declaration of the English judges in favour of ship-money in the case of Hampden. The indignation which filled the free North when it was judicially announced that the constitution of the United States, rightly interpreted, carried slavery with it everywhere, and that under it a negro had no rights which a white man was bound to respect, affords no bad idea of the feelings with which all patriotic Englishmen listened to the servile strains in which Charles I.'s tools on the bench magnified the royal prerogative. Mr. Goldwin Smith himself points out the comparison which is obvious between the early stages of the American and English conflicts. "The South had over the North at first the advantage which the Cavaliers had over the Roundheads: the gentry were accustomed to command, and the common people to obey." There was a considerable similarity between the first battle in each war. Bull Run is rightly styled "a confused engagement, the counterpart of Edgehill"; though the former, unlike the latter, did result in a decisive victory. The controversy between President Lincoln and General McClellan suggests another feature of resemblance to an English episode two centuries before. Regarding the purely military aspects of the question, it would be rash for anyone destitute of technical knowledge to pronounce an opinion; as Mr. Goldwin Smith says, "the presumption is against a civilian who meddles with war." When, however, we consider the political differences which embittered the dispute, it seems very natural to compare the position of McClellan and the pro-slavery Northern Democrats with that of Essex, Manchester, and the other Presbyterian generals, whose constant ill-luck led to their removal by the Self-Denying Ordinance. The latter, as Mr. Gardiner says, seemed to be afraid of beating the King too much, and would have preferred, if possible, to come to an arrangement with him, by which the Independents and other fanatics might be put down. If for "the King" we substitute "the South," and for "Independents," "Abolitionists," we have an explanation which at least seems plausible for much that is mysterious in McClellan's conduct. His failure to follow up the victory of Malvern Hill certainly appears to resemble the neglect of Manchester to pursue Charles after the second battle of Newbury, for which he was so vigorously assailed by Cromwell.

Mr. Goldwin Smith thoroughly appreciates the character of the great leader of men who guided the destinies of the Republic throughout the struggle. His estimate is too long to cite in full; but a few extracts may be given:

"Abraham Lincoln is assuredly one of the marvels of history. No land but America has produced his like. This destined chief of a nation in its most perilous hour was the son of a thriftless and wandering settler, bred in the most sordid poverty. He had received only the rudiments of education; and though he afterwards read eagerly such works as were within his reach, it is wonderful that he should have attained as a speaker and writer such a mastery of language, and a pure as well as effective style. . . . At the same time, he was melancholy, touched with the pathos of human life, fond of mournful poetry, religious though not orthodox, with a strong sense of an over-uling Providence, which, when he was out of spirits, sometimes took the shape of fatalism. . . . Lincoln's goodness of heart, his sense of duty, his unselfishness, his freedom from vanity, his long suffering, his simplicity, were never disturbed either by power or by opposition. . . . He spoke always from his own heart to the heart of the people. His brief funeral oration over the graves of those who had fallen in the war is one of the gems of the language."

This address has with good reason been compared to the funeral oration of Pericles, recorded in the second book of Thucydides. It is about as certain as anything can be that Lincoln had never read Thucydides, even in a translation; and it is very improbable that he could have come across even the barest outline of the speech of Pericles in any book to which he had access. And yet the similarity of situation so worked upon the minds of the leaders of the American and the Athenian democracies, that not only their general line of thought, but many of their particular expressions are almost identical.

It is to be hoped that Mr. Goldwin Smith will carry out the suggestion in his preface, of following up the present work by "a companion volume on the same scale, and treating, necessarily with the same succinctness, the recent history of parties and the questions of the present day."

R. SEYMOUR LONG.

The Works of Heinrich Heine. Translated by C. G. Leland. Vol. IV., "The Salon." (Heinemann.)

THE change of plan which substitutes "The Salon" for "The Book of Songs" as vol. iv. of Mr. Leland's Heine is not in itself of great importance; for that his works should be read in chronological or any definite sequence is less necessary in Heine's case than it is in many others, owing to the fact that in him there is little or no development from first to last. But it seems to me that to include "The Return" (called by Mr. Leland "The Homeward Journey"), "The New Spring," and the two sets of "North Sea Poems" among the "Prose Works," and then to issue "Poetic Works" minus so much of the author's most characteristic and best known verse is to make a muddle of the whole. I also think that Mr. Leland would have done well to let it be understood from the beginning that his purpose was to publish, not the "Complete Works of Heine," but a tolerably large "Selection." As the bookseller's announcement now stands—"Prose Works," eight volumes, to be followed by "Poetic Works," four volumes—the mere English reader will be apt to fancy that in the twelve he has all of any importance that Heine ever wrote. This is unfortunate, for—leaving out of sight the "Memoiren," and whatever of more recent publication might raise copyright-law difficulties—in addition to the volume on Büchner and a number of smaller compositions of various degrees of interest, there are four stout volumes of "Letters," most of which are as good literature and as good Heine as anything that proceeded from his pen.

The first section of the present volume deals primarily with the Parisian picture exhibitions of 1831, 1833, and 1843, and furnishes the title of the book. As pegs whereon to hang his very discursive, always interesting, and often capricious and paradoxical remarks, Heine makes use of the names of Amy Scheffer, Horace Vernet, Delacroix, Decamps, Delaroche, and others. Then follow ten letters written in 1837 (for a German newspaper, although Mr. Leland calls them "confidential") on the "French Stage," and an Appendix and Postscript on George Sand. This part of the book should be read in conjunction with Thackeray's Paris Sketch-book, which traverses much the same ground. German humourist and English disagree as to the merits of a very popular play of that time—Dumas the elder's "Edmund Kean"—but are much of one mind in abusing Mme. Dudevant. The last third of the book deals with Parisian musical phenomena of the years 1840 to 1844—Spontini and Meyerbeer, Rossini and Mendelssohn, Liszt and—very much at large—Jenny Lind. It will thus be seen that there is much in the book to interest English readers of artistic proclivities. More than this need not be said here; it is no part of the duty of Mr. Leland's reviewer to discuss Heine's rightness or wrongness.

As to Mr. Leland, his presentment of Heine in English, in this his eighth published volume, is very much what it was in his first. If an average of the quality of his workmanship could be taken, he might be reported as a "fair" craftsman, but hardly above that. For beside passages of really great and undeniable excellence, he has others of which a very raw student of German might well be ashamed. Here is a sentence not exactly easy either to render or to read, it must be admitted, but not by any means so dark as Mr. Leland makes it:—

"Die Idee des Kunstwerks steigt aus dem Gemüthe, und dieses verlangt bei der Phantasie die verwirklichende Hilfe. Die Phantasie wirft ihm dann alle ihre Blumen entgegen, verschüttet fast die Idee, und würde sie eher tödten als beleben, wenn nicht der Verstand heranhinkte, und die überflüssigen Blumen bei Seite schob, oder mit seiner blanken Gartenschere abmähete."

Mr. Leland turns it thus (p. 35):

"The idea of a work of art is born of the emotions or feeling (Gemüth), and this demands of free, wild fancy the aid of realisation. Fancy then throws him all her flowers—indeed, almost smother the idea, and would more probably kill it than give it life, if understanding did not come limping up to put aside or clip away the superabundant blossoms."

In this not-extravagantly-long sentence there are several distinct awkwardnesses and blunders—some of them quite typical of Mr. Leland's ways—and the net result is complete unclarity. In the first place, neither "emotions" nor "feeling" expresses the meaning of Gemüth—indeed, I do not think that we have in English any good single-word equivalent for it, and the Germans are said to deny us also the thing signified by it. "And this demands of free, wild fancy the aid of realisation." To what does "this" refer? To the fact, apparently, that "the idea of a work of art is born, &c."; it seems impossible to connect it with "the emotions or feeling," although in the original dieses plainly refers to das Gemüth. The "him" of the next phrase is in precisely the same predicament: no person is named to whom the word can apply. Down to this point, although the separate phrases seem grammatical, their incoherence is so great that they convey no meaning, and make the remainder of the quotation unintelligible. There really are, however, two considerable difficulties in the way of a translator here, and to one of them—our want of Gemüth, word and word's worth—I have referred above. The other is the circumstance that the word "idea" has to be used here—as it is much more frequently in German than in English—in a sense approaching that in which it is used by Plato. Mr. Leland's failure notwithstanding, here is an attempt to conquer the difficulties and make the whole thing clear. If it is a success, I have shown that Heine, even when difficult, is translatable; if I fail—well, I have at least companions in misfortune.

"The specific idea to be embodied in a work of art, has its origin in the emotional side of the soul, which, having conceived, calls upon Fancy for aid in the realisation of the concept. Fancy, in haste, places all her flowers at the soul's disposal, well-nigh burying the new-born idea beneath them—in fact, she would be much more likely to smother than to breathe the breath of life into it, did not Intellect come hobbling up and shove aside the superfluity of flowers, or else mow them down with his polished garden-shears."

Another passage of real difficulty is the one on Delaroche's picture of Cromwell and the dead king:

"Da steht sie, die gefestete, erdsichere Gestalt, 'brutal wie eine Thatsache,' gewaltig ohne Pathos, dämonisch natürlich, wunderbar ordinär, verfehmt und zugleich gefeiert, und da betrachtet sie. . . . (Heine, xi. 80)."

Mr. Leland translates thus:—

"There he stands, a form as firm as earth, 'brutal as a fact,' powerful without pathos, naturally supernatural, marvellously commonplace, outlawed and yet famous, beholding his work, &c." (iv. 81).

Pathos here—as frequently in German—means "strain," "emphasis," "exaggerated action," "rant"; "naturally supernatural" requires to be turned round "supernaturally natural" to come near to Heine's meaning; "outlawed" perhaps expresses verfehmt, though it seems to me not just the right word, but "famous" is no translation of gefeyt. I fancy Mr. Leland has read or understood "gefeyert." Feyern (from Lat. feria) is to "celebrate an event or a day," and could scarcely be applied to a person at all, certainly not here. Gefeyt (ppl. of feien, translated "to bewitch" by Whitney) is from the same root as our English "fey" and the French fier (ppl. féé), and means "fated," "driven by fate." The word is about as rare in German as "fey" in English.

I should translate the sentence somehow thus:

"There it stands, the square set, earth-firm figure, 'brutal as a fact,' forceful without rant, daimonically natural, wondrously commonplace, condemned to infamy, and therewithal fate-driven—stands and"—

It would then harmonise with the passage, some ten pages back, in which the author surmises that King Charles and Cromwell both were possibly only players cast for their respective parts by the acting manager of the universe, impersonators of two eternally opposed principles, not personal adversaries.

Passages as unsatisfactory as the two here commented on are sadly too frequent in Mr. Leland's work, and slips of less intrinsic consequence are beyond counting. Nevertheless, even as the submarine torpedo boat is said to be, by reason of the waves that roughen the surface of the sea, invisible from the height of a ship's deck, while plainly visible from a balloon sufficiently high in air to reduce the depth of the waves to insignificance, so—as from my present position I cast a mental glance adown the long series of these volumes which has passed through my hands—I fancy I can see beneath the surface the real Heine not greatly distorted by the intervening medium, albeit there have been times when he has seemed quite lost to sight. Any one who, with an eye not all-too-microscopic, will read, say, one-half of the contents of these eight volumes, will in the end have a tolerable notion of Heine's prose style and capacity. As to details, he will, here and there, get a wrong impression, and sometimes, doubtless, be conscious of the presence of a refracting medium.

R. M'LINTOCK.

LOVE SONGS OF CONNAUGHT.

Abhráin Gradh Chuige Connacht; or, Love Songs of Connacht (being the fourth chapter of the "Songs of Connacht"), now for the first time collected, edited, and translated by Douglas Hyde, LL.D. (An Chraobín Aoibinn.) (Fisher Unwin.)

"Not careless and light-hearted alone," says Dr. Hyde, whose words may best introduce his own book, "is the Gaelic nature; there is also beneath the loudest mirth a melancholy spirit, and if they let on (pretend) to be without heed for anything but sport and revelry, there is nothing in it but letting on (pretence). The same man who will to-day be dancing, sporting, drinking, and shouting, will be soliloquising by himself to-morrow, heavy and sick and sad in his poor, lonely little hut, making a croon over departed hopes, lost life, the vanity of this world, and the coming of death. There is for you the Gaelic nature; and that person who would think that they are not the same sort of people who made those loud-tongued, sporting, devil-may-care songs that we have been reading, and who made the truly gentle, smooth, fair, loving poems which he will see in this part, is very much astray."

We have not, unluckily, the "wild, careless, sporting, airy drinking songs" of Connaught, which Dr. Hyde collected in a preceding chapter, not yet reprinted, to compare with the present series. But the humours of the Gael have so often been rendered in English, to the neglect of his sentiment, that it is well we should first have these tender love songs, rather than any mere holiday expression of the country muse of Connaught, since Dr. Hyde's whole work might not yet be given us. The English audience is still, in the main, so delightfully unconscious of Celtic literature that it may be accounted adventure enough to have gone even so far as this. The reception of this little book may serve in some sort as a test. Other Irish books that we have had lately in translation have appealed to scholars and doctors; here it is to the "general" that Dr. Hyde frankly turns, and we need not, I hope, have to strain our faith to believe that his appeal will succeed.

If Dr. Hyde does at length prove to have succeeded, it will not at any rate be because he has conceded too much to popular English literary superstitions or conventional love-lyrical forms. He is determinedly Celtic throughout. His theory of translation, as we have seen elsewhere, is one of as absolute a fidelity to his originals as the genius of another tongue will allow. This being so, it is inevitable that he should get his effects better in a lyrical prose than in verse measures. Some of his translations in the original metres are admirable; but, generally speaking, the literal translations that he gives in his footnotes are more satisfying: more imbued with the feeling, and more reproductive, I think, of the colour, grace, and charm of the Gaelic. Take, for instance, in the exquisite song of "The Breedyeen," the third and fourth verses, which serve as a very fair test, since Dr. Hyde has succeeded particularly well in this case in catching the original metrical effect:

"To the hills let us go,
Where the raven and crow
In the dark dismal valleys
Croak death-like and low;
By this volume I swear,
O bright cool of fair hair,
That though solitude shrieked
I should seek for thee there.

"To the hills let us go,
Where the raven and crow
In the dark dismal valleys
Wing silent and slow.
There's no joy in men's fate,
But grief grins in the gate;
There's no fair without foul,
Without crooked no straight."

And now for the literal prose version:

"Let us go to the mountain, Listening to the raven, In the black sorrowful valleys, Where the deer speaks; By this book in my hand, O lovely cool of the fair tresses, I would remain with you in solitude, Until the day would waken.

"Let us go to the mountain, Listening to the raven, In the glens making melancholy, Where I lost my sense; There existeth no joy Without sorrow at its back; There is no beauty without its reproach, And no straight without its crooked."

It is a great advantage to have both these versions set over against the original, as in Dr. Hyde's pages; for the first gives the English reader the metrical form of the Irish words, though it is perhaps a little inadequate otherwise. One cannot, however, doubt which of the two to prefer. There is the same superiority of the second over the first that one finds in Mr. Lang's prose translations of Theocritus over the best verse translations of the Idylls that we have. A comparison of the two would open up the whole question of the art of translation, and the possibility of giving, as an ingenious translator has maintained, a perfect quantitative equivalent in English verse of the poems of other tongues. So far as Dr. Hyde's present contribution goes, it points again to the extreme difficulty in rendering Celtic forms of verse into English. The spirit may be caught, if you are willing to let the "quantitative equivalent" go; otherwise you are apt to lose the spirit in preserving the form of your original. In Celtic poetry the form is so much: it is so closely fitted to the idea that it is hard to have to discount it in accommodating the one tongue to another. But better lose the form than the spirit.

In these Connaught love songs Dr. Hyde has made, whether in verse or prose, the best transcript of Celtic poetry into English that we have yet had. So much of the magic, so much of the local colour, the native grace, the idiom of the Irish as he has given, one had thought it impossible to give. Here is his "Pretty Pearl of the White Mountain" (Peurla Deas an Talaí bái) in its English setting:

"Fourteen days, without lie,
I spent on the mountain's side,
Ever crying my cry
In the ear of my maiden's pride;
Pleading bitterly,
My side set by her side,
On her mouth my mouth,
Till the sun set southward and died.

"I hear it spoken
By many a friendly mouth
How my heart is broken
By her of the White Hill south.
All my affection true
And my hope and my longing at flood
Are centred on you,
Maid of O'Hanly's blood."

Take again the song beginning,

"If I were to go west, it is from the west I would not come,"

or that ending,

"On a green bed of rushes
All last night I lay,
And I flung it abroad
With the heat of the day.

"And my love came behind me—
He came from the South;
His breast to my bosom,
His mouth to my mouth."

But stray passages give no idea of the full richness and pleasure of the book. Dr. Hyde's commentary upon the love songs needs to be read along with them; for it thrice enhances their effect, so full is it of the Celtic sentiment, and so redolent of the old Irish associations which they recall. Perhaps one ought to add, as accounting for the native lore displayed in it so freely, that many of the songs were, as Dr. Hyde tells us, taken down by him from the lips of the Irish-speaking peasantry in Connaught—a class, he adds, "which is disappearing with most alarming rapidity." His book is thus a brand snatched from the burning, which may serve as a sign of much yet to be discovered in what he calls the "Gaeldom of Erin."

ERNEST RHYS.

History of Early Scottish Education. By John Edgar. (Edinburgh: James Thin.)

M. FOUILLEE has written his book on "Education from a National Point of View." Its principles have received practical emphasis from their adoption by the Italian Government. The book has been translated into English. These principles might be shown to be deducible, in part, from Herbartian theory. It may thus be said that educational thinkers in France, in Italy, in Germany, and in England, are beginning to be aware that not only has each nation a different type of education, but that, in as far as its conditions are different, it ought to have a different mode, and possibly, as Fouillée would claim, to some extent, a different method. A warmly emotional race of children may need different subjects of study and different modes of treatment from those which are suited to a phlegmatic and coldly intellectual race. Power of attention, and of retention, differ with climate, tradition, and antecedents. There is a difference of mental, as well as of physical, soils. Physically, this difference may not be quite decided by the boundaries of nations; but, mentally, there can be no doubt that, as the national genius varies, so must the education be varied to bring out the national type of character.

There may, I admit, be differences of national character traceable to the physical features of a country. It may be that the Swiss mountains and valleys produce a national character which requires mental preparation for efficient living different than a monotonous level country like Holland. Ideal education in each would, to the extent of the difference, suggest difference of both content and aim. But, on the whole, national differences of aim in education must be said to chiefly consist in difference of antecedents. Who will not recognise, for instance, that appropriate education in England and in China must be as different as are a typical English magistrate and a typical Chinese mandarin? To come nearer home, a French boy with his long ancestry behind him, in a line of continuity with the Latin language and the Roman traditions, demands, so to say, from his teachers a close knowledge of Latin in its descent from classical to provincial and again to mediæval and modern French, so as to understand himself at all; as the English boy would demand, if we knew how to do it effectively, a knowledge of the line of continuity traced to mediæval English, and back to Anglo-Saxon and Gothic. No one would suggest that the knowledge of the French boy or the English boy should end with a knowledge of his own national antecedents. But that this should be certainly secured, and therefore first secured, is apparent from the recognition of the principle that, in journeying to the unknown, the child most effectively travels by the way which joins itself markedly to that which is already well known.

The theory of education is, no doubt, universal in its bearings. So, too, is the abstract theory of economics. But it was long since discovered that national economics might be, and often have been, as it is paradoxically said, un-economic. So it is with the abstract theory of religion, of jurisprudence, and of all lines of human energies. They must be "corrected" by a study of concrete conditions before they can be applied. In other words, the social organism moves as a whole, and our present view of what ought to be the aim of some particular part, or an aspect of it, may only too easily be disproportionate.

If, then, education at the present day must be considered from a national point of view, as accommodating itself to differences of conditions, not only between nation and nation, but also within the nation itself to different classes of the community, and at different times of the community's progress, there is a very pressing need that the historian should have regard to the history of a nation as a whole, in all its intellectual activities, when he is recounting the history of its education. The history of a country's education must be told in connexion with the history of its total intellectual activity. Without the knowledge of both the historian is inadequately provided for this work, and the educationist is as unable to understand the position of learners at any age of the world's history as is the economist to recognise the business ways of savages.

I have dwelt at length on this national aspect of education because it is the cardinal point of Mr. Edgar's book, and the assertion of it and the practical illustration of it in his method of treatment are in themselves sufficient to entitle the book to hearty recognition.

Mr. Edgar takes the reader through the history of Celtic Scotland and the introduction of Christianity; mediæval education as influenced by chivalry and romance, Scholasticism and its influence, the monastic system, the parochial and diocesan system. Much of this matter is specially Scotch. He then deals with the Renaissance and Latin literature, and the influence of educational reformers in other countries. The relation of the state and education is discussed. The Reformation is treated with special attention to Knox and his influence. The educational policy of the Old Church is elaborated, and alongside is given the scheme of the First Book of Discipline. Finally, an account is presented of the subjects and methods of instruction, and reference is made to artistic, industrial, and technical education.

Such a syllabus involves a large and liberal view of educational history. To accomplish his course, Mr. Edgar no doubt found he had a restive team to manage, if he was to drive with spirit and artistic finish. It would be too much to say, nor do I imagine Mr. Edgar would claim, that he has produced a work showing great original research. Rather, he has filled in his outline of national tendencies in education, with such facts as he could readily lay hold of. His authorities are such as are known to all. Grant and Cunningham, the Diary of Melville, Ferrarius, and quotations from Statutes advance the book greatly; and there are frequent appeals on individual points to a large number of authorities, whose help to the writer are fully acknowledged.

There are, of course, many interesting details given of old education. The story is told of the church-school at Norham, and how one of the pupils, to escape punishment for idleness, threw the key of the church into the river, hoping thereby to be no more "distressed with the slaving of learning." Mr. Edgar states the fact that children in the fourteenth century, in England, were taught "either within the church itself, or in the porch, as at St. Martin's, Norwich." We might go further and quote Richard Mulcaster (1561), "If the church have a minister, the belfry hath a master." In 1624, it may be mentioned that John Evelyn, before he went to the Shotover free school, was taught elementary subjects—he tells us himself—"at the church-porch of Wotton."

Such a book as this presents scope for the drawing of pictures which must interest both the general reader and the specialist. Many will turn to Mr. Edgar's account of George Buchanan, and some, probably, will be disappointed at finding comparatively so little about the great Scotch scholar. But such readers must console themselves by dwelling, with Mr. Edgar, the longer on that charming figure of Scotch educational history, Ninian Winzet. A staunch upholder of the old Catholic faith, it was his unhappiness to live in the days of Knox, and to have to spend his time in entering the lists against him. He would not sign the Confession of Faith, and, in 1561, he was "expelled and schott out of that my kindly town" (Linlithgow). His delight in teaching is given by Mr. Edgar in Winzet's own words, and it is a quaint touch when he tells us:—

"I used to propone almaist daily some theme, argument, or sentence of the quhilk I wald haif them intending to mak orisone or epistle in Latin tong, and I thoct this matter of seditioun a convenient theme."

After his expulsion, Mr. Edgar tells us "being dreary and dolorous for the division in God's kirk," the good man got some consolation by calling to mind "that he had been privileged to teach human childer of happy ingynis." And again, "we hear of him," says Mr. Edgar, "reading Ascham's Schoolmaster along with the good Bishop Leslie." This was in 1567, I suppose, at Louvain.

The treatment of the subject of the educational reformers in other countries appears to me to be weak. It is surely a mistake to give so much space to Martin Luther as an educationist. At any rate, it should be pointed out that Luther plays fast and loose with education. Mr. William Dell, in a well-known sermon on "The Trial of Spirits" (1653), quotes most effectively from Luther against "human learning or philosophy." If it be said that Luther's attack was rather on the mediæval universities, and that his remarks, as Mr. Edgar clearly shows, were excellent on the teaching of children, even some of them could be spared, I think, to find room, as Charles Hoole would have done, for an account of Oorderius, Calvin's teacher, "who taught six hundred boys with far more order and silence than many other schoolmasters could keep with thirty or forty only." The section on Loyola is vague, speaking simply of "earnestness and determination," and "shrewdness and wisdom"; whereas in an educational history we should have expected some summary of the Jesuit methods. Of English educationists, Mr. Edgar treats of Colet and Cardinal Wolsey, but says nothing of Ascham and Mulcaster.

Mr. Edgar forgets, at times, the task on which he is engaged. He has undertaken to relate the history of early Scottish education. Unfortunately, some fact calls to mind a present day problem, and Mr. Edgar at once favours us with his strong view on the matter, to the interruption of his reader who wishes to pursue the history of education. This tendency, together with Mr. Edgar's evident reliance upon other writers for his facts, make it highly probable that, had he begun with what is to be his second volume, an even more valuable work would have been forthcoming, and the experience thus gained would have proved of service for the earlier, and in some ways, more laborious work. In spite of any discounting of the value of the book which may seem to be implied by these remarks, the one clear fact remains that Mr. Edgar has written an interesting history of Scotch education up to the Reformation, from a national point of view, and in connexion with the other intellectual forces at work within the Scottish nation. That was a work which wanted doing, and which remains to be done for nearly all the nations.

FOSTER WATSON.

A POLISH ADMIRAL.

Dzieje Krzysztofa z Arciszewa Arciszewskiego.
Przez Alexandra Kraushar. (St. Petersburg: Br. Rymowicz.)

THIS life of a Polish admiral shows us a phase in the history of the former kingdom, for which few readers are prepared. People do not think of Poland as a naval power; and yet we hear of her fleet during the Thirty Years' War, in which she was so foolish as to become involved at the instigation of the Austrian wife of Sigismund III. M. Kraushar, of Warsaw, in the work which we propose to notice, has sketched the history of a famous Polish naval officer, whose career will, we think, prove interesting to our readers. He belongs to the seventeenth century—that century which saw Poland the scene of so many battles, and produced so many of her most renowned commanders.

Christopher Arciszewski was born in the village of Rogalin, in Great Poland, in 1592. He came of a family of Unitarians, and so attached was his father Elias to these doctrines that we even find him editing a work of Faustin Socinus. But whether Dissidents or Roman Catholics, these Polish noblemen were too often men of violence. From some unexplained cause, the family had to part with a portion of their estates to a certain Caspar Brzezniaki, who, according to some accounts, was of plebeian origin, but had been elevated to the nobility. This loss of his ancestral property rankled in the breast of young Arciszewski; and with the help of confederates he murdered Brzezniaki, in 1621, on the high road as he was going from the diet at Szrodz to Koscian. Hearing a noise, the victim got out of his carriage and was at once set upon. He was dragged to a public gallows that was near—for such erections were at the time permanent ornaments of the roads—and despatched with shots and stabs. There his corpse was abandoned, after having been mutilated; his tongue was cut out and affixed to one of the posts of the gibbet. The miserable man was offered his life if he would give up the estate, but persisted in his refusal. There was, no doubt, a good deal of lawlessness going on in Poland at this time, but such atrocity as this could not be pardoned even in a noble; and accordingly Christopher and his brother Elias, his confederate, instead of being summarily hanged, as they richly deserved, were banished the country. At a subsequent period of his life, Arciszewski seems to have felt remorse for his crime, and M. Kraushar gives some verses which the penitent composed in Polish.

We soon find the exile offering his services to the Dutch, and sent by them to Brazil, where they were carrying on a war with the Portuguese. Here an active career was opened to him, and he distinguished himself by his bravery in many engagements. In consequence of his naval services, a medal was struck in his honour in Holland in 1637. In 1639 he returned to Amsterdam; and, after some little time, succeeded in getting back to Poland, as the king, Ladislaus IV., was anxious to avail himself of his services in the disturbed state of the country. He was accordingly put in command of the fleet; he is also called supremus rei tormentariae prefectus, seu artilleriae magister. One of his chief public services was raising the siege of Lwow, which was closely blockaded by the Cossacks under the redoubted Bogdan Khmelnitki. But now the Poles had not only to contend with their revolted subjects, but with an invasion of the Swedes under Charles Gustavus, because the king persevered in his foolish claim to the Swedish throne. Ladislaus had died, and had been succeeded by his brother John Casimir. Christopher Arciszewski expired at Danzig in 1656, after a long illness, and his body was taken to Leszno to be buried there. But before it could be committed to the earth, the church in which it was temporarily placed was burnt to the ground in a conflagration caused by the enemy, and with it the corpse of the redoubtable Polish admiral was reduced to ashes.

M. Kraushar has succeeded in giving us a finished picture of a remarkable man at a remarkable period of history. Arrogant and unscrupulous, Arciszewski was the very type of the soldier of fortune, as he was also in many respects of the Polish noble. Our author has spared no pains in his monograph, having searched not only the archives of his native country, but also those of Holland. The appendices of the two volumes contain many interesting documents; not the least curious being the Polish papers in the so-called macaronic style, which at that time was popular throughout the country. An excellent portrait is given of Arciszewski, and a very truculent looking person he must have been.

W. R. MORFILL.

NEW NOVELS.

Mr. Tommy Dove, and Other Stories. By Margaret Deland. (Longmans.)

Who Wins, Loses. By Sophia Mary Locks. In 3 vols. (Bentley.)

The Emu's Head. By W. Carlton Daws. In 2 vols. (Ward & Downey.)

Like a Sister. By Madeline Orichton. In 3 vols. (Digby, Long & Co.)

The Princess's Private Secretary. Translated from the Italian of A. G. Barril, by His Honour Judge Stephen. (Digby, Long & Co.)

Emmett Bonlore. By Opie Read. (Sampson Low.)

"THE TAVISTOCK LIBRARY."—The Doctor's Idol. By Christian Lys. (Frederick Warne.)

Mr. Tommy Dove is worthy—it is high praise—of Mrs. Deland's reputation. One is apt to fight a little shy of writers who take the local colouring and the spiritual colouring of New England, as their theme. At first they had the charm of freshness; but the emotions dealt with, like the flora of the district, long since became familiar: the horizon is, after all, monotonous and limited. But Mrs. Deland fills it with colour and variety; though she writes of a province, there is nothing provincial in her writing. She never loses sight of the wider ranges of thought and feeling; she gives you the infinitely small illumined by the infinitely great. These stories are not ambitious: they do not approach such difficult emotions as those of John Ward, Preacher; but they have something of the same inimitable touch, the exquisite delicacy of background, the clearly defined outlines of the principal situation. Mr. Tommy Dove is a masterpiece, an idyl in half-shades and neutral tints. It is a belated romance of autumnal love, springing up slowly in two lives long starved of love, and withering before fruition. Of course, it reminds you of Mr. Denner, though, indeed, it is less pathetic, because the end comes not through death, but simply through want of emotional vitality. For successful love means self-assertion, and is hardly possible to a soul habituated to renounce. This is the gem of the volume; and, though there is life and truth throughout, the remaining stories are not of quite such high interest. "At Whose Door?" and "A Fourth Class Appointment" are the best. The remaining two are studies of city life, and the distinction of Mrs. Deland's pen is not quite so great when she deals with the city. But the central idea of "Elizabeth," the love that disguises itself from itself as sympathy, is strikingly brought out.

Who Wins, Loses is a story of good society, and, consequently, is mostly concerned with ill-assorted marriages. It is impossible to feel much interest in the shallow, selfish people who play the principal parts: they are unattractive, mediocre alike in their sins and their virtues; it does not seem to matter much whether their lives turn out tragedy after all, or merely comedy. Nor is the book a particular success as what it is.

evidently meant to be: a somewhat cynical sketch of English society, viewed from the inside. The writer's vision is not sufficiently acute, nor her pen sufficiently biting for this. But there is a redeeming feature in the portrait of the supposed narrator of the story. Caroline Fletcher—Tantine her friends call her—is of the world worldly: a middle-aged lady with nothing particular to do, and with no higher ambition than to count for something, to influence in one way or another the lives of those with whom she is brought in contact. Her attempts to achieve this, their utter failure, the incalculable harm she does, and her final remorse, are at once diverting and edifying. The character is well conceived, and sustained with considerable skill. By virtue of it a book, otherwise naught, becomes just readable.

Australia is still the unexplored field for the writers of fiction. They flock to it, as adventurers to the gold diggings. On a dark night in Melbourne George Vincent, a bank clerk, rescues a man from two villains who have well-nigh murdered him. In his gratitude, before he dies, the victim presents his preserver with a mysterious cipher, which unfortunately he has not time to interpret. Presently Vincent drifts to Dead Man's Flat, and discovers that the cipher is the key to the hidden treasure of a gang of bushrangers. The two volumes of The Emu's Head are occupied, partly with his efforts to unravel the secret, partly with the attempts of the two remaining bushrangers, who are also the Melbourne murderers, to recover the paper, partly with his love affairs. There is a fair girl, whom he loves, and a dark woman, with whom he has flirted. This woman's passionate nature and unscrupulous acts complicate Vincent's fortunes, and almost determine them to tragedy. The story is not particularly meritorious, but it will bear reading when there is nothing else to read.

The sisters of Like a Sister are half-sisters, Kathleen and Amy Tredennick. Their characters and their careers are a contrast. Amy, wilful, heedless, passionate of pleasure, is lured into a secret marriage by a theatrically bad man, and suffers accordingly, until, still theatrically, he is precipitated over a cliff. Kathleen, staid, reserved, high-principled, capable of deep feeling, drifts into a misunderstanding, quite improbable, with her lover, and suffers also. She, however, is reserved for ultimate happiness. The tale does not compel conviction; but it is brightly told, and some of the minor characters, notably Mrs. Tredennick and Mr. Venn, are well drawn. The Irish handmaid, Norah Maloney, is also amusing. The scene is laid partly in Scotland, partly in Hong-Kong; and the latter part, probably from the author's own experience, is freshly described.

The Princess's Private Secretary is a disappointing book. You read it with a sense of expectation, but nothing comes of it. The mystery turns out to be merely mist. Indeed, the plot is of the frailest, and one cannot help thinking that the writer was more concerned to produce a picture of Italian society than to tell a story. It is not a very edifying picture when you get it—princesses, counts, cardinals, all with nothing to do, and spending their time in aimless intrigue, more for the sake of intriguing than for any end to be gained. The centre of all this, the hero, is Dr. Lucio Gualandi, who does nothing, but is finally pitchforked into marrying a girl with whom he has fallen somewhat feebly into love. She is a daughter of the Prince of Valgrama; consequently, it is necessary that Gualandi should be made a banker and a count. That is all the story. The local colouring, though the author is an Italian, is very ineffective in comparison, say, with Marion Crawford's Saracinesca or Sant' Ilario. This, however, may be partly the effect of a dull and commonplace translation. When will publishers learn that there are very few books capable of being turned from one tongue into another, and very few people competent to turn them?

Emmett Bonlore is proprietor and editor of the Arkansas Weekly Back Log. The story is largely occupied with the struggles and ultimate success of that enterprising periodical. In his spare moments Bonlore aspires to, and is finally rewarded with, the hand of Miss Reland Zelwick. The plot is somewhat thin, and also confused; but it is enlivened by side-lights on society and character in the uncivilised, as distinguished from the "decivilised" parts of America. The humours of Colonel Silvan and of Blahead the printer are sufficiently entertaining. Mr. Read is not content, however, without an attempt to touch on the serious sides of life; and this is the part one skips in Emmett Bonlore.

The Doctor's Idol is rather a well told tale. It presents itself in the modest gray covers of the Tavistock Library, but there is more stuff in it than in many an ambitious three-decker. The serious interest concerns the love affairs of Maurice Kingsford, a Whitechapel doctor, and Ruth Forsyth, the statuesque daughter of an authority on Hindu mythology. Kingsford has an Hindu servant, Ram Khan, who is in secret an emissary from India in pursuit of a god with eyes of diamonds and a ruby heart, which has come into the doctor's possession. He causes the idol, by means of hidden machinery, to do creepy things at uncanny hours. In his final attempt to secure the prize he nearly murders Ruth Forsyth. The author moralises somewhat, but he writes gracefully and without pretension. An attractive figure in the book is the small street arab Polony, a premature philosopher and the only support of two drunken parents.

E. K. CHAMBERS.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

"UNIVERSITY EXTENSION MANUALS."—Outlines of English Literature. By William Renton. (John Murray.) Mr. Renton has written a handbook marked by plentiful evidence of first-hand knowledge of his subject, and by considerable freshness of treatment. Unfortunately, it is marred by certain eccentricities which are at once irritating to the well-informed and seriously misleading to the student. The author has a laudable desire to employ graphic methods in teaching; but his zeal is not exactly according to knowledge, and he has produced as singular a set of diagrams as ever fell in our way. What is more serious, the necessary symmetry and completeness of the diagrams is obtained by adopting the most fanciful and arbitrary systems of classification, constructed a priori with the quaintest indifference to actual fact. Mr. Renton reminds us of a mediaeval schoolman in his reliance on deduction where deduction is most unreliable, in his antiquated psychology, and in his entire devotion to system. All these features, as it seems to us, are exhibited in the diagram on p. 190, which is somewhat simpler than many of the others, and which we should like to transfer to the pages of the ACADEMY if the editor had permitted it. The diagram (which can hardly be an elaborate joke, notwithstanding the insertion of Mr. Roden Noel's name), we do not profess to understand sufficiently to criticise. We cannot even hazard a guess why it is (apparently) placed on one side instead of in an upright position. The faults of the book are not, however, confined to the diagrams and the classifications they illustrate. Here is a specimen of Mr. Renton's exposition. A diagram on p. 201 is explained in this way:

"This divides the artists into two groups, an inner and more powerful, consisting of Dickens and Thackeray, and an outer, consisting of Scott and George Eliot, both the two former and the latter being inversely symmetrical to each other, or tending to excel in divers departments. Hence, as Dickens bears the relation to Thackeray that Scott does to Eliot, he bears the relation to Scott that Thackeray does to Eliot; and this divides the novelists into a lower group and an upper, which happens to coincide not only with the distinction between an earlier group and a later, but with a difference in treatment, that may be symbolised by calling the first the Romantic school, the second the Critical."

Nearly every fault which could be committed by a critic and a teacher is committed here; and the worst of it is that the young University Extensionists are not unlikely to take this pseudo-mathematical language to mean something intelligible, to waste their time and begot their faculties in trying to understand it. The words we have printed in italics are an extraordinary example of courage in applying methods of inference, valid only in the case of quantitative relations, to cases in which there is absolutely no quantitative relation. Here is another combination of doubtful criticism and quasi-mathematical exposition. The author is talking of Shakspeare's general power as an artist, and he says:

"We do not say so much that Shakspeare has this or the other quality as that this or the other quality is 'Shaksperian.' . . . This constitutional quality consists in the spontaneity and pregnancy of Suggestion, combined with variety and harmony of Treatment, or

(s + p) S + (v + h) T.

It is not meant of course, that every part of Shakspeare's work has all these qualities in perfection. His characteristic is that he fulfils conditions, so hard to fulfil individually, so much harder to fulfil simultaneously, more frequently than any other author. Qualities like spontaneity and pregnancy, which the majority of writers have no more chance of reconciling than water has of combining mobility with density, are found combined in Shakspeare, as these physical properties are combined in the rarer element of mercury."

It is a pity that Mr. Renton, who possesses several qualifications for the task he has set himself, has been led into these absurdities by misplaced ingenuity and extravagant love of system.

THE Rev. James Wood's Dictionary of Quotations (Frederick Warne) does not profess to be, as Bartlett does, a mere key to familiar or presumed familiar snatches of verse and prose. It is very fairly styled a book of "phrases, mottoes, maxims, proverbs, definitions, aphorisms, and sayings of wise men, in their bearing on life, literature, speculation, science, art, religion, and morals—especially in the modern aspects of them." The editor is certainly modern in his likings; for, though there is much of Shakspeare and a little of the elder classics, there is also much of Goethe, Carlyle, and Emerson, and a bountiful sprinkling of the happier phrases of living writers. There is this novelty, too, that most, almost all, of the many quotations from foreign authors are given in the original as well as in good idiomatic English. Mr. Wood was perhaps wise in adopting the strict alphabetical order, even though it gives an irritating prominence to a and the, der and die, je and le. The book is, however, not primarily for those who have a keen nose for lines of disputed paternity or misquoted notoriety; nay, very slightly so, for the editor, perhaps rather cruelly, has (except in the case of Shakspeare) refused them even the sop of chapter and verse. The indispensable topical index deserves the highest praise for fulness and accuracy. The whole book, indeed, is so carefully compiled, and contains so much that is not to be had in similar works, that the editorial defence in the preface is superfluous. It is a far cry from Callimachus to Mr. Barrie, and a futile hope that none will be so unmannered as to carp even a little at the labour they themselves could not have faced; yet even these critics will recognise the thoroughness of Mr. Wood's volume, and, with their thumbs, at least, confess its worth.

A Bower of Delights: being interwoven verse and prose from the works of Nicholas Breton. The weaver Alexander B. Grosart. (Elliot Stock.) Dr. Grosart is a hard nut for the student of English literature to crack. One cannot but wish to be grateful to one whose untiring efforts have rescued from oblivion so much that is valuable and interesting in the work of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Nor, on the other hand, can one help feeling that the debt is largely discounted by masses of the most hopeless critical and literary shortcomings. The present writer never opens one of Dr. Grosart's editions without a sense of irritation and revolt at the inaccuracies, at the provincialism, at the impertinences and irrelevancies, which distinguish nearly every page. The present volume is inexcusable; it shows the editor at his worst. The get-up, with its account-book-like page, is unpleasant; the arrangement of the selections is fantastic; and the title is misleading, because Breton did write a "Bower of Delights," which is still unpublished, and which certainly has nothing to do with Dr. Grosart's compilation. Nor indeed does one quite see what purpose a volume of selections from Breton is intended to fulfil. He can never become popular, nor would it be desirable, in the interests of public taste, that he should become popular. He wrote a few pretty verses, and a few shrewd bits of prose; but these would find their proper place in more general anthologies. And for the rest, it is only Elizabethan hack-work, of no more interest, except to the professed student, than the hack-work of our own day.

NOTES AND NEWS.

WE understand that the late Master of Balliol has bequeathed the copyright of all his writings to the College. We have reason also for hoping that Lord Bowen may be induced to undertake the task of writing his life, from materials in the possession of his executors, Sir William Markby and Sir W. J. Farrar.

THOUGH Sir Hope Grant died eighteen years ago, no authoritative life of him has yet appeared. This is the more surprising as he left very full journals of the military operations in which he took part. These have been placed in the hands of his former aide-de-camp, Lieut.-Col. Henry Knollys, R.A., who has the advantage of being a practised writer. From these journals and from his correspondence he has compiled two volumes, which will be published shortly by Messrs. Blackwood & Sons, with a portrait, map, and plans.

THE second volume of Mr. J. H. Wylie's elaborate History of the Reign of Henry IV. will be published in the course of next month by Messrs. Longmans. The third volume, completing the work, will probably be ready next year.

THE ninth and concluding volume in the series of "The Queen's Prime Ministers," published by Messrs. Sampson Low & Co., will be Earl Russell. The author is Mr. Stuart J. Reid, who has attempted to describe, not only his long political career, but also his home life and literary friendships.

MR. HENRY VIZETELLY has put together his autobiographical reminiscences, which will be published by Messrs. Kegan Paul, Trench & Co., in two volumes, under the title of Glances Back through Seventy Years.

JUDGE O'CONNOR MORRIS's book on Moltke, already announced in the ACADEMY, will contain a critical examination of the strategy of the campaigns of 1866 and 1870.

MESSRS. CASSELL & Co. will publish next month A King's Hussar, by Mr. Herbert Compton, being the military memoirs for twenty-five years of a Troop Sergeant-Major of the Fourteenth Hussars.

MISS MARIE CORELLI's new romance will be published by Messrs. Methuen on Monday next. It is entitled Barabbas: a Dream of the World's Tragedy; and the scene is laid in Jerusalem, at the time of the Crucifixion.

MESSRS. GRIFFITH, FARRAN & Co. will publish this month a volume of stories by Mrs. L. B. Walford, entitled A Question of Penmanship.

MR. ELLIOT STOCK announces a new novel by Mr. John White and Mr. W. Graham Moffat, entitled What the World is coming to. The story, we understand, is somewhat on the lines of "Looking Forward."

THE Arundel Printing and Publishing Company are about to publish a novel by Mr. L. C. Skeay, entitled That Mrs. Grundy.

MESSRS. REMINGTON & Co. will issue next week Among Boers and Basutos, by Mrs. Barkly; and a new edition of M. Maxime Du Camp's Literary Recollections.

MR. ROBERT RICHARDSON is writing for Chums, Messrs. Cassell and Co.'s boys' magazine, a series of Australian adventure stories, of which the heroes are for the most part boys.

CASSELL'S Illustrated Almanac and Companion for 1894, to be published on October 25, will contain a complete story, by Mr. Thomas Keyworth, entitled "The Heir of Hampton Wold."

MESSRS. W. H. ALLEN & Co. will publish next week a revised edition of The Life and Duties of a Citizen, by Mr. J. E. Parrott.

THE demand for Dr. Janet of Harley Street, by Miss Arabella Kenealy, still continues. Messrs. Digby, Long & Co. have just issued a fifth edition.

At the last meeting of the Sette of Odd Volumes, Mr. Richard Le Gallienne was elected a member of that society, over which Mr. Alexander T. Hollingsworth presides. Mr. Le Gallienne is, we believe, the first man of literary reputation who has joined the Sette. This seems strange in a club of which the name suggests the library, rather than the studio or the laboratory; and yet art and science (in the persons of Henry Moore, Onslow Ford, Wilfrid Ball, Silvanus Thompson, and Francis Elgar) have been hitherto predominant. Mr. Alderman Tyler, the Lord Mayor-elect, joined the club soon after its foundation by Mr. Quaritch, Mr. W. M. Thompson, Mr. Wyman, and Mr. Roberts Brown.

MESSRS. REEVES & TURNER—the publishers of Mr. William Morris, of James Thomson (B.V.), and of the Positivist body—have removed from their well-known house next door to the Illustrated London News to the first floor of 5 Wellington-street, Strand, not far from the Spectator office.

NEXT Wednesday, at 8 p.m., Mr. Edward Whymper will deliver a lecture at the Birkbeck Institution, entitled "Twenty Thousand Feet above the Sea." The lecture will be illustrated with photographs and sketches, shown by the oxy-hydrogen light.

M. LEO S. OLSCHKI, of Venice, has issued a very interesting sale-catalogue of Incunabula, or early printed books. Venice itself is, of course, most numerous represented; but there are also examples of the presses of many other Italian towns, and some fine specimens of works illustrated with miniatures and engravings. A copy of Simoneta's De Persecutionibus (Milan, 1492), printed on vellum, is said to be unique. The catalogue is well printed, with careful bibliographical details in French, and has a good index.

THREE noteworthy articles on book-printing and engraving in the Philippine Islands (Noticias sobre la Imprenta y el Grabado en Filipinas) by Pardo de Tavera are to be found in the Revista Contemporanea for August 30, September 13 and 30. The works catalogued date from 1610 to the present time. We may also draw attention to the valuable series of papers, "Las Producciones naturales de España," by Señor de Segovia y Corrales in the same review.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

FULL term began at Cambridge with the beginning of the present week. At Oxford, men do not "go up" until the end of the week.

AT Oxford, the important chairs of Latin and Greek are both vacant. It is not supposed that the electoral board will find much difficulty in agreeing upon a successor to Prof. Henry Nettleship. The regius professorship of Greek is, of course, in the gift of Mr. Gladstone.

AT Cambridge, the chief loss sustained during the vacation has been the death of Mr. H. D. Darbishire, from whom great things had been hoped for in the most advanced department of comparative philology. We understand that it is proposed to print a small volume of his published and unpublished papers, under the editorship of Prof. R. S. Conway, of Cardiff.

AT Aberdeen, the Chalmers chair of English literature—formed out of the dual professorship held by the late William Minto—still remains vacant. Owing to some objections that have been made to the draft ordinance, and their consequent consideration by the Scottish University Commissioners, it is probable that no appointment can be made before next March.

AT Cambridge, Mr. Austen Leigh, provost of King's, has succeeded Dr. Peile as Vice-Chancellor. Dr. Peile's address (in English), on laying down his office, is printed at length in the Cambridge University Reporter for October 3.

THE Bishop of Ripon (Dr. Boyd Carpenter) has been appointed lecturer in pastoral theology at Cambridge for the current academical year. His lectures will be given during next Easter term.

PROF. SAYCE will deliver a public lecture at Oxford, on Wednesday, October 18, upon "The History of Cuneiform Decipherment." Early in the following week, he will leave to spend the winter in Egypt.

Two courses of lectures on numismatics are announced for this term at Cambridge. Prof. Hiddleton, who has not yet vacated the Slade Chair of fine art, is lecturing on "Roman Numismatics"; and Prof. Ridgeway—the new Disney professor of archaeology, who has just been re-elected to a fellowship at Gonville and Caius—is lecturing on "Greek Numismatics."

IN connexion with the Teachers' Training Syndicate at Cambridge, Mr. W. E. Johnson will deliver a course of ten lectures this term on "The Theory of Education."

THE new buildings of Manchester College, Oxford—for thus the old Unitarian Institution, originally founded at Manchester, in 1786, is henceforth to be styled—will be formally inaugurated next week. The opening ceremony will be performed on Wednesday afternoon, by the president, Mr. Henry R. Greg; and, later in the day, a special dedication service will be held in the chapel, when the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, one of the secretaries, will preach. On Thursday, at noon, the Rev. Dr. James Drummond, the principal, will deliver an address; and in the evening there is to be a conversazione, at which deputations from Harvard University, from the Unitarians of Pennsylvania, from the Hibbert Trust, and from the Presbyterian Board, will be present. We understand that Prof. Jowett had signified his intention of taking part in the proceedings.

PROF. JEBB has been very active during the vacation. Not only did he deliver the inaugural lecture at the Cambridge summer meeting, upon "The Work of the Universities for the Nation, Past and Present," which has been published as a pamphlet by the University Press; but he has also opened this week the session at Mason College, Birmingham, with a discourse on "Classical Studies."

LAST September the University of Leipzig conferred a new diploma on Prof. Max Müller, on the occasion of the fifty years' jubilee of his doctorate. The subject of his original dissertation was an examination of Spinoza's chapter De Passioibus. In his new diploma Prof. Max Müller was addressed as:

Philologiae Indicae decus, qui sacros Rigvedae libros amplo Sayanae commentario instructos rimis integros in lucem edere aggressus, interpretationis quoque luculentae praeclearis exhibitis exemplis; item origines formas incrementa Sanscritarum et usioris praesertim aetatis litterarum ingeniosa ratione persecutus, Buddhismi etiam notitia aucta tunc promota, Indicae disciplinae et fundamenta ecit solida et copias amplificavit; nec tamen idem iter grammaticorum coetus se constringens sed pertiorem in campum proventus, de universa linguae scientia deque religionum historia tanta elegantia c solertia deseruit ut cultorum rectorumque omnium plurimorum studia rarum in modum owerit atque adlucuerit, Germanici ingenii inter britannos Indosque fidelis interpres."

Two courses of lectures in archaeology have been arranged for at University College, London, during the present term, by Prof. Reginald Stuart Poole. Prof. Percy Gardner, of Oxford, will deliver eight lectures on "Greek sculpture," on Thursdays, at 5 p.m., beginning on October 19; and Mr. W. St. Chad Bosawen will deliver six lectures on "Chaldean and Assyrian Archaeology," on Mondays, at the same hour, beginning on October 23, to be followed by visits to the British Museum. In addition,

Prof. Poole will himself conduct students over the Greek galleries of the British Museum on Saturdays, at 11.30 a.m., beginning on October 21.

THE following are some of the courses of lectures to be delivered this term at University Hall, Gordon-square—in continuation of the design of the founders of that institution, to make it a school of Biblical criticism, of sociology, and of those branches of literature which are most closely connected with religion and ethics:—Ten lectures on "The Laws of Distribution," by Mr. Philip H. Wicksteed; ten lectures on "Plato and the Republic," by Mr. Bernard Bosanquet; and ten lectures on "The Christology of the New Testament," by Mr. W. E. Addis. We may add that Mr. John Russell is now the warden of University Hall; while Mr. Wicksteed has been given the title of president.

MR. WILFRID A. GILL, of Magdalene College, Cambridge, will deliver a course of lectures at the King's College Department for Ladies (Kensington-square), on "Ethics, Classical and Christian," beginning on Tuesday next, October 17.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

BURNHAM BEECHES.

After a Storm.

THE storm is over, and a thousand gems
Are sparkling 'neath the new-awakened sun
On every spray; the tremulous birch has won
Rare jewels from the rain, her silver stems
Dance sylph-like, decked with fairy diadems,
Before the breeze: the beeches, one by one,
Shake off their tears, as the light whispers run
From tree to tree, rustling the sedge that hems
The glassy pool: the wary moorhen steals
Into the open with her tiny brood
To greet the sun: the blackbird from the wood
Whistles defiance to the sullen peals
Of the retreating thunder—overhead
The great clouds sailing to their western bed.

PAGET TOYNBEE.

OBITUARY.

SIR WILLIAM SMITH, LL.D.

SIR WILLIAM SMITH—for such, it appears, was the title that latterly disguised the man known to all the world as Dr. William Smith—died on October 7, in the eighty-first year of his age.

Probably no author has ever lived a more laborious life, nor one more retired from the world; and few can have received a richer reward—both in money and in the consciousness of having given instruction to successive generations of schoolboys and students. His works, including those to which he only lent his name as editor, form a library of themselves, comprising every branch of classical and Christian history; while he is also understood to have been the inspirer of the series that takes its name from "The Students' Hume." How much he actually wrote himself will, perhaps, never be known—it is certain that the Latin-English and English-Latin Dictionaries were mainly his own handiwork; but as an editor, he stands almost unrivalled in the annals of literature. Beginning with the Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities (1842)—of which a thoroughly revised edition, in two volumes, appeared only a couple of years ago, under other editorship—he also brought out, in a short space of time, the Dictionaries of Greek and Roman Biography and Mythology, and of Greek and Roman Geography. Even those who have never consulted these storehouses of ancient learning must, at least, be familiar with the smaller dictionaries condensed from them. Then, his was undoubtedly the mind that formed the original plan of the Dictionary of the Bible—the revised edition of which he has not lived to see completed—of the Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, and of the Dictionary of Christian Biography, Literature, Sects, and Doctrines. Compared with such mighty works, it appears almost ludicrous to mention his Principia Latina, and the numerous little volumes that make up his Latin, Greek, English, French, German, and Italian Courses. In addition to all this, he has been editor of the Quarterly Review since 1867.

The only biographical facts worth recording are: that he was born of Nonconformist parentage, and educated at University College, Gower-street, in its early and palmy days; that Lord Salisbury selected him for the honorary degree of D.C.L. at Oxford, on the occasion of his inauguration as Chancellor in 1870, and further recommended him to the Crown for knighthood when he retired from office last year.

DR. ROBERT PERCEVAL GRAVES.

THE death of Dr. Robert Perceval Graves severs one of the last links between two literary generations. He was born in 1810 in Fitzwilliam-square, Dublin, being the second son of John Crosbie Graves, Chief Magistrate and Chief Commissioner of Police for that city, and Helena Graves (née Perceval). His brothers were John Graves, professor of jurisprudence at King's College, London; James Graves, Crown Solicitor for Ireland; and Dr. Charles Graves, Bishop of Limerick. His sister Clarissa became the wife of Leopold von Ranke, the German historian. From a private school, near Bristol, he proceeded to Trinity College, Dublin, where he obtained a classical scholarship, and, after a distinguished career, won the first gold medal in classics. After graduating, he took orders and became curate-in-charge at Bowness, Windermere, where he married Helen, daughter of George Hutchins Bellasis, of Holly Hill. He afterwards took duty at Ambleside, where he lived at Dove's Nest (the house in which his friend, Mrs. Hemans, had previously resided), and became the friend of Wordsworth, Southey, Hartley Coleridge, and the Arnolds, his intimacy with Wordsworth providing materials for an important discourse in the Dublin "Afternoon Lecture" series. Here, too, he entertained Tennyson, having at an earlier period been himself the guest of Sir Walter Scott at Abbotsford. His modesty was no doubt the cause which prevented a man of his great abilities from obtaining the preferment which was justly his due; but as a devoted pastor he won the warm affection of his flock, and the quality of his few printed sermons makes it a matter for regret that a greater number of them were not given to the world. He lived at Windermere until 1864, when his brother Charles, then Dean of the Chapel Royal, induced him to settle in Dublin, where he soon found congenial occupation and not less congenial friends in such men as Sir William Ferguson and Profs. Stokes, Salmon, Ingram, Dowden, and Mahaffy.

On his brother's promotion to the see of Limerick, Mr. Robert Graves was appointed Sub-Dean of the Chapel Royal. But it is by his devoted labours in connexion with the Alexandra College and School that he will be longest remembered in his native city. His portrait, which hangs in the Jellicoe Hall, was presented by the students in 1886; and in an address given by Mr. Graves on that occasion, he said that the welfare of Alexandra College had been the main object of his public life. His first official connexion was his appointment to the Latin chair, which he filled for many years; and the instruction then given by him is gratefully remembered and frequently alluded to by his old pupils, some of whom are now distinguished scholars. Conjointly with his professorship, he held also the office of secretary, both which posts he resigned on being appointed vice-warden and a member of the council. In these capacities he remained connected with the college till his death.

Alexandra School, too, which was established in 1873 by the council of Alexandra College on the representation of Mrs. Jellicoe, owes much of its success to the wisdom and ever-willing counsel and guidance of Dr. Graves. From its foundation he has continuously held the post of chairman of the committee of education and vice-warden. His capacity for administration, his impartial and clear judgment, and his sympathy with the staff and the pupils, actively shown in many ways, will make his loss deeply felt. The growth of the school to its present large dimensions was a constant satisfaction to him; and in 1889, on the completion of the handsome buildings it now occupies, he made a valuable donation to it of many works of art, busts, statues, and pictures, chosen by him with peculiar appropriateness for the several classrooms.

If, however, the work accomplished for these two institutions may be regarded as a remarkable achievement for a man of Mr. Graves's years, his monumental Life of Sir William Rowan Hamilton is a still more noteworthy instance of prolonged mental activity. This has been universally accepted as a masterpiece of biographical research; and the bestowal by his University of an honorary degree of LL.D. was a fit acknowledgment of this work, not less than of his educational services. Few who were present will forget the applause when the Public Orator closed his felicitous panegyric with the words, "Huic puellas quoque plaudere jubeas."

Dr. Graves, the friend of so many poets, might himself have won poetical fame; but his humble estimate of his own powers made him shrink from publication, though he was induced to print privately a few charming sonnets and finely modelled memorial verses. His last literary effort—a collection of the literary remains of William Archer Butler—is still unfinished, but we trust that it may be completed by other hands. To the last Dr. Graves's energy and intellectual vision remained unimpaired, and his nature retained all its freshness and sympathy. Few men could number so many friends of all ages, creeds, and classes; and his loss will be universally deplored in his native city, in which he has for the last thirty years laboured with such devoted zeal and sympathetic wisdom.

MRS. ALEXANDER IRELAND.

The death of Mrs. Alexander Ireland, which took place on October 4, at her residence, Fallowfield, Manchester, will have come not merely as a grief but as a shock to a large circle of friends. For some years her health had been frail, and of late her literary labours had been much interrupted by painful and dangerous illness; but the buoyant resisting power of her courageous and highly vitalised nature had so often victoriously asserted itself, that there seemed reason to hope for a still further prolongation of the triumph of life. It was, however, not to be; and the same week has witnessed the death of Mrs. Ireland and of her old and valued friend, Mr. Ford Madox Brown.

Annie Elizabeth Ireland was a member of a richly endowed family. Her father, Dr. John Nicholson of Penrith, in many ways a remarkable man, was principally known as a distinguished Arabic and Persian scholar; and her brother, Dr. H. A. Nicholson, holds the chair of natural history at the University of Aberdeen. Mrs. Ireland was, of course, known to the general public only by her writings, and to a smaller circle in London and the North of England by her lectures on the poetry of Browning and other literary subjects; but neither sufficed to do full justice to the brilliance and fascination of her intellectual personality. The lectures probably did more than the books; for Mrs. Ireland possessed in a very remarkable degree the indefinable gift which is called personal magnetism. But only those who had the privilege to be numbered among her friends, and to share the intimacy of familiar converse, could form anything like an adequate conception of a nature so rich in varied charm. Like her father, though of course within a narrower range, Mrs. Ireland was a singularly accomplished linguist; as a painter, she had acquired some measure of technical accomplishment; and she was a genuine musician, adding to interpretative skill the fine technical knowledge displayed in her lectures upon those poems in which Browning treated of his best-loved art.

It was, however, in conversation that Mrs. Ireland's powers were displayed to the fullest extent. She was certainly the most brilliant conversationalist that the present writer has ever known; yet she was singularly free from the weaknesses of ordinary good talkers, for she put as much of herself into her sympathetic listening as into her bright speech. And though she had a marvellous gift of rendering idiosyncrasies or oddities of character, her friends will bear unanimous witness that they never heard from her a single unkind word. Mrs. Ireland did not deal largely with "topics;" her talk was mainly vivid presentment and characterisation of persons or places or incidents, all sharply realised, with just that hint of good-natured caricature which is the best aid to pictorial effectiveness. The dramatic gift was equally manifest in her readings; and to those who can look back to pleasant evenings in the old Ingleswood days, Mrs. Ireland's pathetic rendering of Mr. Austin Dobson's "Good-night, Babette," is among the things not to be forgotten. The sympathies of many will go out to the well-beloved veteran author, Mr. Alexander Ireland, in his great bereavement. J. A. N.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE Expositor for October contains a valuable contribution to Gospel criticism by Mr. F. C. Conybeare, who in 1891 collated an Armenian codex of the Gospels, here described. In this MS. the last twelve verses of Mark are given in the same uncial hand as the rest, but separated by the heading, "Ariston Eritzon"—i.e., "Of the presbyter Ariston." Mr. Conybeare ably defends the view that this is the Ariston spoken of by Papias as a disciple of the Lord, and as having either written or delivered orally narratives of the Words of the Lord; and that this ascription is correct. Archdeacon Farrar adopts with modifications Klostermann's not sufficiently known correction of 1 Kings xii. 29, 30 (on the supposed "golden calf" at Dan). Dr. Bruce expounds St. Paul's view of "adoption." Prof. Ramsay treats as learnedly, acutely, and incisively as usual of the First Epistle of Peter. Prof. Roberts discusses the rendering of ἐκδόσεων in John xix. 13, and Dean Chadwick, apologetically, the narrative in Matthew ix. 18, &c.

A NEW FINNISH PUBLICATION.

UNDER the title of Parasken Runot, Pastor A. Neovius, well known in Finland as a diligent scholar, has recently begun the publication, in parts, of a series of folk-songs collected by him from Mikiitina Paraskie, a woman who is now about sixty years of age. As an instance of her phenomenal memory, it is enough to say that the Pastor has taken down from her dictation no less than 1152 songs, 1750 proverbs, and 336 riddles, making a total of 32,676 lines of verse, exclusive of variants. Most of these she learnt in her youth at her natal village, in the Petersburg government, about three miles from the Finnish frontier. She therefore belongs to Ingermanland, and uses its dialect.

The songs in Part I. are such as are used at swinging parties, dances, weddings, and when driving in a sleigh. The first are sung when the young people amuse themselves on large swings holding about a dozen persons. The regulation time for this entertainment is Easter, Whit-Sunday, and every Sunday in summer, but never in winter. The peculiarity of these songs is that they are sung to a slow time, exactly the same as is used for epic songs. The dancing songs, on the other hand, are in quick time, and are followed after each line by an unmeaning refrain which is termed "the spur." One swing-song relates the story of a swallow laying a golden egg on the deck of a warship. The egg rolls into the sea. A smith is commissioned to make a rake to fish it up with. By means of the rake, half the white is brought up and sent to the sky to shine as the moon; half the yolk is similarly sent up to shine as the stars. It is a variant of the creation myth in the first canto of the Kalevala. Another swing-song is a variant of "the gigantic oak" episode in the second canto. A third is a variant of the encounter between Väinämöinen and Joukahainen, here called Joukamoinen, in the third canto. A magic song to relieve the pains of childbirth gives the editor an opportunity of comparing it with one taken down in the seventeenth century, and showing how little some of the stock phrases have changed in a space of 225 years.

The editorial notes are often very interesting and instructive. For instance, we now learn that the Haltia, genius or guardian spirit can be of either sex, and this on the authority of Paraskie, at whose old home there used to be two Haltias. I may here remark that Lencqvist, in his De superstiti. veter. Fennorum (1782), equates Haltia with the Swedish Rä. Dialectally the word is Råd, meaning a goblin, the place ruled over by a spirit. It is interesting in this connexion to know that the gård-råd or house-goblin, like the Haltia, may also be of either sex. But the Swedes know rather more than the Finns; for, according to the former, the gård-råd acquires a sex to correspond with that of the first person to light a fire in the house.

I may add that the Parasken Runot is extremely well printed, on good paper, and is in every way a credit to the editor and his publisher in Borgå. J. A.

SELECTED FOREIGN BOOKS.

GENERAL LITERATURE.

- BERNARD, M. Au pays des dollars. Paris: Calmann Lévy. 3 fr. 50 c.
 FRICK, O. Pädagogische u. didaktische Abhandlungen. 2. Bd. Halle: Waisenhauss. 12 M.
 HERTZ, W. Die Sage vom Giftnäthen. München: Franz. 2 M. 40 Pf.
 NEUMANN, Th. Das moderne Aegypten. Mit besonderer Rücksicht auf Handel u. Volkswirtschaft. Leipzig: Duncker & Humblot. 8 M.
 SCHACK, A. F. Graf v. Die englischen Dramatiker vor, neben u. nach Shakespears. Stuttgart: Cotta. 7 M.
 SOUBIAC, Maurice. L'Évolution du vers français au dix-septième siècle. Paris: Hachette. 10 fr.
 STERNBAUGH, L. Gnomologium Parisinum ineditum. Appendix Vaticana. Krakau. 8 M.
 WOLFSKEHL, K. Germanische Werbungssagen. I. Högström. Jari Apollonius. Darmstadt: Bergsträsser. 1 M.

THEOLOGY.

- KNIE, F. Die russisch-schismatische Kirche, ihre Lehre u. ihr Cult. Graz: "Styria." 2 M. 50 Pf.
 VOELTER, D. Das Problem der Apokalypse. Freiburg: Mohr. 10 M.

HISTORY, LAW, ETC.

- HERZOG, A. Siècles: l'homme—le constituant. Paris: Bécus.
6 fr.
- KLIMTSERU, K. Der russische Feldzug 1812. Leipzig:
Friedrich. 3 M.
- HEINACH, Fürst. Politische Reden. 7. Bd. 1877—1879.
Stuttgart: Cotta. 8 M.
- KURCKHARDT-BREIDENMANN, Th. Bonifacius Amerbach u. die
Reformation. Basel: Reich. 6 M. 40 Pf.
- LEMOUET et BAZERRES. Le Masque de fer: révélation de la correspondance chiffrée de Louis XIV. Paris: Firmin-Didot. 3 fr. 20 c.
- MÜLLER, R. Geschichte des Feldzuges v. 1800 in Ober-Deutschland, der Schweiz u. Ober-Italien. Frauenfeld:
Huber. 3 M. 60 Pf.
- LAUSCHKE, A. Peter Abälard. Ein Lebensbild. Leipzig:
Breitkopf & Härtel. 6 M.
- LEBER, H. B. v. Unser Reich vor 2000 Jahren. Wien: Hölder. 2 M. 50 Pf.
- LOISEL, Marcenau de. Aventures de guerre au temps de la République et du Consulat. Paris: Guillaumin. 7 fr.
50 c.
- SEIBERICH-HEIMFELDEN, J. Andreas Hofer. Leipzig:
Schulze. 2 M.
- CHINO, B. des Papethums Entastehung u. Fall. 1548.
Ueberr. u. versehen v. K. Benrath. Halle: Strien.
1 M. 20 Pf.
- OSTER, J. v. der. Luise Dorothee, Herzogin v. Sachsen-Gotha. 1732—1767. Leipzig: Breitkopf & Härtel.
7 M. 50 Pf.
- POST, A. H. Grundriss der ethnologischen Jurisprudenz.
1. Bd. Oldenburg: Schulze. 6 M.
- KREWEIER, P. Geschichte der schweizerischen Neutralität.
2. Th. Frauenfeld: Huber. 4 M.
- WENZEL, K. Frhr. v. Wörterbuch des deutschen Verwaltungsrechts. 2. Ergänzungsband. Freiburg: Mohr.
10 M.
- MEYER, F. Wittelsbacher Briefe aus den J. 1590 bis 1610.
7. Abthg. München: Franz. 4 M. 20 Pf.

PHYSICAL SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

- FISCHER, E. Neue Untersuchungen zur vergleichenden Entwicklungsgeschichte u. Systematik der Phalloiden.
 Basel: Georg. 4 M.
 KLETT, Th. Sokrates nach den Xenophontischen Memorabilia.
 Leipzig: Pock. 1 M. 20 Pf.
 KODIS, J. Zur Analyse des Apperceptionsbegriffes. Berlin:
 Calvary. 8 M. 50 Pf.
 KUTZE, O. Revisio generum plantarum secundum leges nomenclaturae internationales. Pars III. 1. Leipzig:
 Felix. 10 M.
 ROHN, K. u. E. PAPPERITZ. Lehrbuch der darstellenden
 Geometrie. 1. Bd. Leipzig: Veit. 11 M.
 REPP, F. Pyrrhonische Studien. Freiburg: Fellerer. 5 M.

PHILOLOGY, ETC.

- JÜLLING, K. D. Wege u. Ziele der englischen Philologie.
 Groningen: Wolters. 1 M.
HOLTZMANN, A. Das Mahābhārata u. seine Theile. 3. Bd.
 Kiel: Haeseler. 5 M. 60 Pf.
MUTZBAUER, C. Die Grundlagen der griechischen Tempuslehre u. der homerische Textgebrauch. Strassburg:
 Trübner. 15 M.
SITZGUTH, A. Gesammelte Aufsätze. Freiburg: Mohr. 6 M.
SCHNEDT, R. Die Çukasaṣṭi. Aus d. Sanskrit übers.
 Kiel: Haeseler. 4 M. 60 Pf.
URKUNDEN, ägyptische, aus den k. Museen zu Berlin.
 Griechische Urkunden. 7. Hft. Berlin: Weidmann.
 3 M. 40 Pf.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE LATE MASTER OF BALLIOL.

Lyme: Oct. 10, 1893.

Allow me to supplement the necessarily brief notice of the late Master of Balliol, which appeared in the last number of the ACADEMY, with a few words upon one of the most noteworthy and noble features in his character. None of those who in ancient or modern days, like Boethius, have strictly limited their horizon of thought and action to human life, could have more strenuously and constantly than Jowett urged upon his friends, young and old, the paramount duty of work, setting the example himself to the very end. Year after year, laying aside his own peculiar tasks, would he devote many weeks of vacation—after what "unresting, unobtrusive," college labours!—to the daily drudgery of teaching some pupil in whom he saw the capacity for success in his university career and future life, but who was, perhaps, too engrossed during term by the pleasures of the day to do justice to his own ability. Many readers, I think, will remember such instances of encouragement and aid—lessons, like those of Socrates, unpaid for; and some will acknowledge the results with gratitude. Nor were these counsels of advance (always offered with singular affectionate grace), wanting to others, whether pupils or friends, as their lives went by, if he thought they could do some useful thing more. Even upon Lord Tennyson, to whom for forty years he looked up with admiration and love undeviating, he would press, after the Idylls were completed, some further attempt of equal compass.

That solemn warning, Νὺτ γὰρ ἔρχεται, inscribed by Dr. Johnson (whom Jowett loved so justly and so well) upon his watch, when age was approaching, seemed to be ever before the Master. No one, we might perhaps say, can have better earned his Requiescat in pace.

F. T. PALGRAVE.

A COMPULSORY MARRIAGE IN CHESHIRE
IN 1544.

Chester: Oct. 4, 1898.

The lately found volume of Depositions in the Bishops' Court at Chester, from July 1548 to March 1550-1, shows several instances of child-marriages and divorces—as of Harie Accaus, of about eight, with Jane his wife, between four and five (No. 67); of Alexander Woodward (under eight) with Cecilie his wife, between ten and eleven (No. 37); of John and Ellen Aynsere, both under twelve. And it also has—besides many other interesting trials—one curious case of a grown-up girl, induced to marry by the threats of her father and mother (the father thrashing her with his walking-staff) and her feeling of politeness to some neighbours, who came three miles to see her married. She evidently felt that she must not disappoint them: so she was accordingly married, and went to her husband's house, but would not let him touch her. He set a watch on her, but she one day took her clothes and ran away, and stopped away more than three years. He then took proceedings to annul the marriage.

In February 1548-9, William Wittoun, of Frodsham, says that he married his wife Alice five years before, in his parish church, and "that he thinkes verelie that the said Alice his wiff was compellid bie hyr father and mother to marie with hym"; and "that after he hade married the said Alis, as long as she taried with hym, he cold neuer obteyne hyr luff or fauowr; nor yett, be anye feare meanes or foule, the said Alis wold not suffer hym to have carnall knolege with hyr; and often tymes the said Alis has declared to this deponent, that she neuer agreed nor consentid in hyr harte to marie with hym, but bie the manesynge, beytinges, and compulsion off hyr father / and father, this deponent sais, that for a certen space he desired his frendis to wache the said Alis, that she saw not awaie. And as some as the said Alis perceyved that ther was no such street wache laid for hyr, she toke hyr clothis and ran awaie, and has bene from this deponent iij' yeris and more."

Richard Massie, of Budworth, deposes, among other things,

"that the daie befor the said William and Alis were married together, the said Alis told this deponent that she hade rather the devil had hym, than she wold contract to marie hym; but she most nedis do itt, bie the compulsion off hyr father."

Then comes the most important witness, "Margareta Walchwoman, of Budworth," and she

"sais that the daye wich Allis was assured to William Wittoun, she bie no meanes wold haue gone to haue bene assured to the same partie, although the said Alis father and hyr mother did intise and allure hyr bie meanye feare mesurs and promesses, vntill the tyme that the said Alis father did beate hyr with a walkyng staff, and threten othwise to handill hyr, iff she wold not go with hym to the Northwich, to be contracted with the said William Wittoun, and for all that, the said Alis wold not goe with hyr father vntill the tyme that hyr mother did compelle hyr with manesynge wordis and threateningis to go to the Northwich after hyr said father. And father now this deponent sais, that the said Alis told this deponent, after she was assured to the said William, that she wold rume owt off the cuntrey. rather then she wold marie with the said William ; in so moch, that this deponent has seen the said Alis wepe dyuerse tymes, bie cause hyr father wold compelle hyr to marie hym that she cold neuer luff / And the daye off the mariage off the said parties, the said Alis wepped bitterlie, as this deponent sais ; and wold not have goen to the church to have bene maried, but lie so longe in hyr bed, vntill ney-bours, that dwellid iij' mylis off, came to the mariage to the howse ; and then the said Alis was compellid to rise, and goe to the church to be maried / ”

The wife Alice herself briefly confirms these statements.

F. J. FURNIVALL.

THE WHITEFIELD, BALLYHANK (NO I.) AND MONATAGGART (NO. II.) OGHAMS, NOW IN THE NATIONAL MUSEUM OF IRELAND.

Cambridge : Oct. 5, 1893.

Whitefield (I.). The reading of this inscription which is published in Brash (p. 191) and elsewhere, is as follows:—

Nocati maqi Maqiret

Maqi mucoi Uddami.

I examined this stone in 1886, and again at the end of last month, and each time satisfied myself that this copy is inaccurate in one respect: the last letter of the first angle contains four scores, not three. This turns the patronymic into Magirec. But the inscription ends close to the top of the stone, which has obviously been broken; it is practically certain that a genitive -i termination has been carried off by the fracture (like that of the associated names Nocati and Uddami); and it is more than probable that a fifth score of the penultimate letter has also gone. This is a conjecture founded on the fact that genitive endings in -ci are rare in Oghams. We thus obtain a name Magireqi, which resembles the Mageragi of the Pant y Polion inscription, and which is also yielded by one of the Ballintaggart stones in the singular form Maqqiirigi. The superfluity of vowels in the latter is not unparalleled; compare Coribiri with Corrbri. In transliterating the Ballintaggart and similar inscriptions, I give to the consonantal X what I believe to have been its true value—that of g. There is no ground for assuming p as its value.

Mr. Brash remarks on the uniqueness of the name Uddami; Uchadan, Uidren, and Oddach are the nearest equivalents which he can quote. If, however, we read the third Ardmore Ogham in a direction contrary to that hitherto taken, we obtain the identical name in the form Udama, which I venture to submit as a possible reading of this inscription.

Whitefield (II.). The engraver, I have no doubt, intended to cut Alattocelibattigni; the inscription, however, shifts to the opposite angle at the n, which has confused him. In consequence, he has made his inscription end with an unpronounceable and impossible ggi. We seem here to have an instance of the patronymic force of -gni, to which Mr. Haigh first drew attention (quoting the Todi bilingual inscription, which gives Trutiknos = Drutifilius, and the Ogham Dalagni maqi Dali). This assumed, the inscription naturally divides into Alatto Celibattigni—"A son of C." Alatto is of frequent occurrence; and, if we admit Uvanos = Ivrene at Killeen Cormac, surely we cannot regard Celibatt = Colabot as too violent an identification. The Castletimon inscription, Netacari Netacayni, is in the same form. Of course, -gni, in the majority of cases, has no special value, but is simply an intrinsic part of the name in the genitive case; it is obvious, for instance, that it cannot be patronymic in such an inscription as Moddagni maqi Gattigni mucoi Lugoni.

Ballyhank. For two reasons the received reading of this inscription, annoqi Vorttigurn, seems to me open to objection. In the first place, I cannot believe that the surviving friends of the person commemorated would perpetuate, on his tombstone, the stigma involved in annoqi, supposing it to bear the meaning it is alleged to bear. In the second place, the name of the deceased is not given on the stone. This fact seems so much opposed to common sense that in itself I would regard it as vitiating this reading, as well as several readings of other texts. Take, for example, the Ballycrovane inscription. We are asked to believe that the friends of a certain "son of Deccedd" took the trouble to drag an obelisk, twenty-five feet in length, up a hill, and to set it up to his memory on the top; and carefully inscribed upon it, not his own name, but that of his father and grandfather! It seems clear that in this and similar inscriptions we must regard the initial magi as part of the name; and read the Ballycrovane inscription Magidecceddus avi Toranias. At Ballyhank we have not an initial magi, but we have another formula, which would probably have been recognised long ago were it not for the tempting Vorttigurn. Putting Vorttigurn aside, and remembering the Kilcolaght inscription annm Virvanni tigirn, we may obtain from the Ballyhank stone annm Oqivorr tigirn, which is free from the above objections, and yields connected sense (or, rather, will yield connected sense when we have discovered the true meaning of annm). I must confess that I have been unable to find an exact parallel to the name Oqivorr; Oqoli is the least dissimilar name which suggests itself. It is possible, however, that in the Ducovaros of one of the Ballintaggart Oghams we have the same name with the common prefix Du- (cf. Dunocat) and the genitive -os termination.

Monataggart. Unless my eyes greatly deceive me, this monument presents a very singular feature. On that part of the inscribed angle on which the name Dalagni appears, the same name, in very minute scores, is repeated. The d and g are conspicuous, but the l and some of the scores of the n are faint: none of the vowel-points are visible, which is scarcely astonishing. Both the d and the g can be easily seen in the facsimile in Sir Samuel Ferguson's "Fasciculus of Prints" (Trans. R.I.A., June 1881); the two scores of the d being just above the second score of the l in the main inscription, and the g immediately preceding the first score of the letter to which it corresponds. I offer no theory as to the meaning or origin of these "minuscules," which I first noticed when examining the stone in 1886; whatever they may be, they seem worth attention. If they be merely accidental scratches in the stone, the coincidence is very extraordinary.

R. A. S. MACALISTER.

THE ETHICS AND ETIQUETTE OF REVIEWING.

London: Oct. 12, 1893.

Last Saturday there appeared in the Daily News a leader-review of my recent book, More English Fairy Tales, obviously written by a well-known Scots littérateur, who is himself the editor of another series of fairy-tale books.

That, under these circumstances, the review should be consistently belittling; that it should recommend, by implication, the other series as containing more romantic tales—all this was, perhaps, only to be expected by the student of human nature. When, however, the reviewer goes on to couple my name with "Australian thieves" in the same sentence—I trust in ignorance of my Australian birth, though I have mentioned the fact in the very book under review—and when, in protesting against my use of Lowland Scotch as a dialect of English, he continues the imputation by suggesting that I had "faked" the tales derived from the Scotch (which can only mean that the alterations I have made in them were done in order to disguise their origin), I felt that this was carrying the plan of "depreciation" a little beyond the bounds of decency.

I accordingly wrote to the editor of the Daily News a protest, which I attempted to make as temperate as possible, and delivered the same at the office of that newspaper early on Sunday evening, asking the editor, in a private note, to do me the justice to allow my repudiation of the serious allegations made by his critic against my literary methods to appear in his columns. No notice has been taken of that appeal: so I venture to trouble you with this statement of facts, which, if not exceptional, reveal a curious code of reviewing in this country, and form a powerful plea in favour of M. Zola's contention for signed criticism in art and literature.

JOSEPH JACOBS.

"VERDIGRIS."

Kew: Oct. 7, 1893.

So long ago as 1847, Sir C. L. Eastlake, in his Materials for a History of Oil-Painting, gave Vert de Grèce as the origin of the word "verdigris" (loc. cit. i. 118). This derivation was indexed by Lady Eastlake in vol. ii. of the same work (p. 432), which was published in 1869; and it has been generally adopted by English writers on pigments (see my Chemistry of Paints and Painting, 1 ed. 1890, p. 178).

A. H. CHURCH.

"DEMIJOHN."

Cambridge: Oct. 5, 1893.

I can add another to the various forms of the name for the large glass bottle, holding several gallons, and covered with wicker, mentioned by Mr. Mayhew. The modern Greek for a demi-john is dhinitšana; and there is a town of the same name in Arcadia, though I do not know whether the place is named after the thing, or the thing after the place. In any case, this new form may throw some light on the origin of the word.

ERNEST GARDNER.

APPOINTMENTS FOR NEXT WEEK.

SUNDAY, Oct. 15, 4 p.m. South Place Institute: "Corn Milling, Ancient and Modern," by Mr. W. J. Salmon. 7.30 p.m. Ethical: "Hillel and Jesus," by Mr. P. H. Wicksteed.
MONDAY, Oct. 16, 5 p.m. Hellenic: "Some Archaic Vases found on the Acropolis," by Mr. A. G. Bather; "Some Points in the Cult of Asclepius," by Mr. E. F. Benson. 8 p.m. Royal Academy: "Anatomy, the Upper Extremity," II., by Prof. W. Anderson.
TUESDAY, Oct. 17, 6 p.m. London Institution: "The Principles of Commercial Geography applied to the British Empire," III., by Dr. H. E. Mill.
WEDNESDAY, Oct. 18, 8 p.m. Microscopical: "Some Progressive Phases of Scirillum volutans," by Dr. E. L. Maddox; "Foraminifera of the Folkestone Gault," by Mr. F. Chapman. 8 p.m. Birkbeck Institution: "Twenty Thousand Feet above the Sea," by Mr. Edward Whymper.
THURSDAY, Oct. 19, 8 p.m. Royal Academy: "Anatomy, the Trunk," by Prof. W. Anderson.

SCIENCE.

THE GERMAN DISCOVERIES AT SINJIRLI.

"MITTHEILUNGEN AUS DEN ORIENTALISCHEN SAMMLUNGEN."—(Heft XI.)—Ausgrabungen in Sandschirli. I. (Berlin: Spemann.)

For the last three years scholars have been anxiously awaiting the publication of the official account of the excavations carried on in Northern Syria for the Oriental Museum at Berlin, and of the important Semitic monuments discovered there. The first part of the publication has now appeared.

Dr. von Luschan, the director of the three expeditions which have been sent out describes the scene of his discoveries as well as the chief monuments that have been disinterred. One of these is a monolith of Esar-haddon, erected soon after his conquest of Egypt; and a special chapter is devoted to it by Prof. Schrader. Among the other monuments are three of the highest possible interest, as they contain inscriptions in relief of a very early date in the Aramaic branch of the Phœnician alphabet. An elaborate chapter upon them is contributed by Prof. Sachau. Besides these monuments, a number of others have been discovered in the well-known style of Hittite art.

The discoveries have been made on two ruined sites of Northern Syria, which are at a short distance from one another. Sinjirli, the more southern, lies at the eastern foot of Mount Amanus, about twenty-three miles north-east of the Gulf of Antioch; Gershin, the other site, being less than five miles to the north-east of it, and surrounded by a almost impassable marsh. The excavations were carried on at Sinjirli, though one of the most important of the monuments—the containing the inscription of Panammu I—was found at Gershin. Like other ancient sites, Sinjirli and Gershin, it is hardly necessary to add, have become huge mounds of rubbish, which cover the remains of temples and palaces of stone.

The ruins of Sinjirli are surrounded by a circular wall with semi-circular towers and three gates, within which is the high ground of the citadel, also surrounded by its own heart-shaped wall. It is within this inner wall that the principal discoveries have been made. They consist of a double gateway on the south side, the walls of which were lined with reliefs in the Hittite style, and where the monolith of Esar-haddon was found; of a sort of barracks of early date; of a "north-eastern palace," which was probably built in the Assyrian period; and of a "western palace" erected in the eighth century B.C. The rest of the tel still remains unexplored; and Dr. von Luschan is doubtless right in believing that in this portion of it we must expect to find the monuments which bridge over the chasm between the early Hittite sculptures of the gateway, and the Assyrianised and finished art of the palaces. It may be that a bilingual text, in Hittite hieroglyphs and Aramaic letters, is here awaiting its fortunate discoverer.

The monolith of Esar-haddon gives us new information in regard to the Assyrian conquest of Egypt. It tells us how the Assyrians followed Tirhakah, of Egypt and Ethiopia, from Ishkuri to Memphis, a march of fifteen days, smiting the flying Egyptians day after day, and how Tirhakah himself was five times struck with the point of the spear. It further tells us how Memphis was taken and destroyed after a siege of only half a day, and how Usanakhuru (User-n-Hor), the son of Tirhakah, whose name has not been previously known, was among the captives sent to Assyria.

Perhaps the most interesting point connected with the monolith is that Tirhakah is represented upon it as a negro. Along with another king, whose Syrian dress seems to show that he is Baal of Tyre, he is kneeling before the victorious Easar-haddon, who holds a cord, one end of which is fastened to a hook in the captive's lip.

The Aramaic monuments, if we may so describe them, have already been spoken of in the ACADEMY. Two of them are of great interest. One of these, which was discovered at Gershin, is a dedication to the god Hadad by Panammu I., the son of Qaral, "king of Ya'di." The other, which is of later date and was found in a deserted Turkish cemetery close to Sinjirli, was erected by Bar-Rekeb, the son of Panammu II., the son of Bar-Tsur, in memory of his father, the vassal and tributary of "Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria," and it was placed under the protection of Hadad, El, Rekeb-el, Shemeah, and all the other deities of Ya'di. Bar-Rekeb states that the Assyrian king had given his father certain cities in the neighbouring state of Gurgum, and that Panammu had been afterwards murdered; the assassins were however punished by Tiglath-pileser, who restored Bar-Rekeb to his father's throne. In a third inscription Bar-Rekeb entitles himself "King of Sama'l, servant of Tiglath-pileser, lord of the four zones."

The cuneiform texts of Tiglath-pileser himself had already made us acquainted with Panammu as well as with the country of Sama'l or Samahla, over which he ruled. The date of the inscription of Bar-Rekeb is thus fixed with precision. And since Panammu I. is referred to in it as a former king, while the forms of the letters which occur in the inscription of Panammu I. are more archaic than those in the inscription of Panammu II., it becomes clear that the first of these inscriptions must be one of the oldest examples of Semitic epigraphy which we possess.

The language of the inscriptions has been a subject of discussion. It seems to be a mixture of Aramaic and Hebrew, the like of which has never been met with before. Whether we are to regard it as Hebraising Aramaic or Aramaising Hebrew is still uncertain; like Sachau, Müller, and Nöldeke, I myself incline towards the former belief. But in any case it shows that in Northern Syria not only was Aramaic spoken in the eighth and ninth centuries B.C., but Hebrew as well. That is to say there must have been a Hebrew-speaking population there; and if I am right in identifying the country of Ya'di with the name of the Yaudá or Jews, who according to the Tel el-Amarna Tablets served in Northern Syria (see ACADEMY, July 1st, 1893, p. 16) this Hebrew-speaking population may have had affinities with the children of Israel. As will be seen from the sixth and last volume of the new series of the "Records of the Past," the cuneiform tablets of Kappadokia indicate that Hebrew as well as Aramaic was known at an early period in the neighbourhood of the Taurus. It is, therefore, significant that the phrase, "Tiglath-pileser, King of Assyria," is written in the inscriptions precisely as it is in the Old Testament, the name of the Assyrian king being similarly misspelt (Tiglath instead of Tukulti) and "Asshur," being written plene. This is strong evidence that the phrase in the Second Book of Kings has been faithfully copied from a contemporary document.

The names of the Sinjirli kings are interesting. While Bar-Tsur and Bar-Rekeb are Semitic, those of Qaral and Panammu cannot be reduced into Semitic forms with any show of philological probability; and Profs. Sachau and Nöldeke are, doubtless, right in comparing the second of them with the Karian name of Panamyés. The names, in fact, reflect the archaeological evidence which indicates that Sinjirli had been conquered or recovered by a Semitic people from earlier Hittite rulers. It is, therefore, significant that, in the inscriptions, the word "Hittite" does not occur; it had been replaced by the Semitic Ya'di and Sama'l.

The names of the divinities mentioned in the inscriptions, which include that of Resheph, are especially interesting. To enter fully into the questions they raise would, however, be out of place here. But I must not omit to notice the evidence afforded by the Hadad-text of a belief in the future existence of the soul. A prayer is offered that "the soul of Panammu may be with" the god, and be united with him (see the translation of Prof. D. H. Müller in his important article on the inscriptions in the Vienna Oriental Journal, VII. 1, 2). It is difficult to think that, while the natives of Sinjirli thus believed in a future life, their Jewish kinsfolk had to wait for the Babylonian Exile before they could learn the doctrine.

A. H. SAYCE.

THE INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF ANTHROPOLOGY AT CHICAGO.

WE quote the following from Science, of New York:—

"The International Congress of Anthropology met at Chicago on Monday, August 28, and held daily morning and evening sessions during the entire week, closing on Saturday, September 2. All the meetings were well attended; and there was more than a full supply of excellent papers on various branches of anthropological science, which frequently elicited animated discussion.

"The session on Monday was opened by the address of the president of the congress, Dr. Daniel G. Brinton, whose subject was 'The Nation as an Element in Anthropology.' It was intended to show the physical, mental, and social changes which take place when man passes from a consanguine or tribal condition of government to that which is national. This transition exerts a profound influence on the physical man, through new laws of marriage and relationship, and on religion, ethics, jurisprudence, and art, through the extension of the intellectual horizon. The goal of such changes, the speaker predicted, will not be reached in nationalism, but in internationalism, and in the supremacy of the individual, as the only proper aim of government. The remainder of the day was taken up with the exhibition of trepanned skulls from ancient Peru, by Señor M. A. Muniz, and explanations of the anthropological laboratories of the Department of Ethnology at the Columbian Exposition, by Drs. Franz Boas, Joseph Jastrow, H. H. Donaldson, and G. M. West. The latter offered a paper of great merit on the anthropometry of North American school children; and Dr. Boas one on the physical anthropology of North America, the result of very extended measurements.

"Tuesday was devoted to archaeology, principally American. Mr. H. C. Mercer, however, exhibited an artificially flaked stone from the San Isidro gravels, near Madrid, Spain, exhumed by himself, and explained its probable palaeolithic character. Prof. G. H. Perkins read a résumé of archaeological investigations in the Champlain Valley; and Prof. Otis T. Mason described in a most interesting manner the mechanical resources invented and developed by the aboriginal toilers of the American continent. The anthropological work at the University of Michigan was sketched by Mr. Harlan J. Smith; Señor Emilio Montes entered a plea for the great antiquity of the civilisation of Peru; and Dr. Carl Lumholtz, just back from his explorations among the cave-dwellers in the Sierra Madre of Chihuahua, described their condition, and exhibited specimens of their industries. The paper which attracted most attention, however, was that of Mrs. Zelia Nuttall on the Mexican calendar system, in which she presented a highly ingenious theory for the solution of this obscure and famous problem, supporting it with lengthy computations and the opinion of competent astronomers. The afternoon was spent in discussing the collection of games in the anthropological building by Dr. Stewart Culin, Capt. J. G. Bourke, and Mr. Frank Cushing.

"The session on Wednesday was devoted to ethnology. It was opened with a paper by the president, Dr. Daniel G. Brinton, on the alleged evidences of ancient contact between America and other continents, in which he categorically denied that any language, art, religion, myth, institution, symbol, or physical peculiarity of the American aborigines could be traced to a foreign source. Miss Alice C. Fletcher and Prof. J. C. Fillmore presented a joint study of native songs and music of great interest. Mr. Walter Hough exhibited and described bark-cloth from various primitive tribes; Mr. G. A. Dorsey related a peculiar observance among the Quichua Indians of Peru; Mrs. French-Sheldon spoke of some curious customs noticed by her among the natives of East Africa; and the Rev. S. D. Peet presented a memoir on secret societies among the wild tribes. The afternoon was spent in discussing the anthropological collections in the U. S. Government Building, Prof. O. T. Mason referring to an industrial exhibit based on linguistic stocks; Mr. W. H. Holmes offering a critical study of the development of flaked-stone implements; Mr. Frank Cushing giving the particulars of a curious Zuni dramatic ceremonial; and Dr. Cyrus Adler reviewing museum collections made to illustrate religious history and ceremonies.

"Thursday morning was assigned to folk-lore. Papers were presented by Mr. W. W. Newell on ritual regarded as a dramatisation of myth; by Dr. Franz Boas on the ritual of the Kwakiutl Indians; by Mr. J. Walter Fewkes on Tusayan ceremonial dramatisation; and by Mr. George Kunz on the folk-lore of precious stones. The afternoon was devoted to the collections of American archaeology in the anthropological building under the care of Prof. F. W. Putnam, who delivered the opening address on the subject. He was followed by Mr. Frank Cushing on the cliff-dwellers; by Mrs. Zelia Nuttall on Mexican archaeology; by Mr. G. A. Dorsey on South American archaeology; and by Mr. E. Volk on cache-finds from ancient village sites in New Jersey.

"Religions was the subject taken up on Friday morning. Dr. Morris Jastrow, jun., began with an explanation of the method and scope of their historical study; Mrs. Sarah Y. Stevenson gave an interesting sketch of an ancient Egyptian rite illustrating a phase of primitive thought; Mrs. Matilda C. Stevenson contributed a chapter in Zuni mythology obtained by personal study on the spot; and Mr. F. Parry read a theory relating to certain elements of religious symbolism. The afternoon was given to discussion of various points in North American ethnology by Prof. O. T. Mason, and to the ethnology of Paraguay by Dr. Emil Hassler.

"The last day, Saturday, was set apart for linguistics, and for reading papers which had been crowded out on previous days. Dr. Daniel

G. Brinton gave a brief review of the present state of our knowledge of American languages, with especial reference to the parts of the continent in which it is deficient. These he chiefly found in Mexico and Central South America. Dr. Boas stated his classification of the languages of the North Pacific coast; Dr. C. Abel illustrated his theory of the affinities of the Egyptian and European languages; Mr. Richardson spoke on the Cameroons of South Africa; Mr. Wildman on the ethnology of the Malay peninsula; and Dr. Jahn on the ethnological collection in the German village at the Fair. The session and the week closed with a dinner in the Midway Pleasure given by the American to the foreign delegates, presided over by Prof. F. W. Putnam and Dr. D. G. Brinton.

"All of the papers mentioned above were read before the congress and discussed as far as time permitted. Besides these, a number were read by title from writers who could not be present. Among them were Mr. Horatio Hale, A. L. Lewis, Dr. A. F. Chamberlain, Dr. F. S. Krauss, M. Raoul de la Grasserie, Dr. F. Jacobsen, Señor C. De la Torre, and others.

"The number of foreign delegates included a fair proportion of those present, and in this respect the congress merited its title as 'international.' Among them may be mentioned Dr. Carl Peters, the Imperial German Commissioner for East Africa; Señor Manuel M. de Peralta, Minister from Costa Rica; Dr. Carl Abel, the well-known Egyptologist; Mr. C. Staniland Wake, of London; Dr. A. Ernst, of Venezuela, &c.

"It was decided to print at an early date the transactions of the congress. They will form a volume of 500 pages, price five dollars, subscriptions for which may be sent to Dr. Franz Boas, secretary, Department of Ethnology, Columbian Exposition, Chicago."

CORRESPONDENCE.

NEW ASOKA INSCRIPTIONS.

Edinburgh: Oct. 10, 1893.

It will interest all Sanskrit scholars to learn that a new inscribed pillar or Lât has been discovered in the Nepal Tarai; which, besides the seven well-known Asoka Edicts found on the other Lâts, is said to bear two new ones. It was found by Major Jaskaran Singh, a relative of the late Mahârâja of Balrampur, who made an eye copy of the whole. Dr. Führer, the energetic superintendent of the Archaeological Survey in the North Western Provinces, will doubtless endeavour to secure impressions. He communicates a note on the discovery to the Pioneer of Sept. 15.

JAS. BURGESS.

THE MEANING OF "BUDECHAITI" IN "THE BATTLE OF ROSNAREE."

Dublin: Sept. 27, 1893.

The word is so written in LL., and, by printing it bude-chaiti, I made too free with an utter stranger which I was bound to treat diplomatically.

The passage is as follows:—

"The banquet was served to the nobles of Lochland until they were drunk and right-merry, . . . and they tarried there till the clear time of rising on the morrow. Now Conchobor rose early on the morrow and said (to Cú Chulaind), 'Give the rest of thy banquet to the nobles of Lochland, that they may be budechaiti.'"

This word I read: (1) bude-chaiti (thank-sent) "fully satisfied"; (2) in the Glossarial Index, "contented with eating"; (3) budech-aiti, "thankful-pleasant."

Mr. Stokes, in his very kind and learned review of my book in the ACADEMY of July 22, translates budech-aiti, "thankful (and) glad."

Mr. John MacNeill of Hazlebrook, Portmarnock, Co. Dublin (whom I believed to be a peerless Irish scribe, till I saw Father Strassmaier's MS. epitome of O'Donovan's Grammar), has, I think, seen the true nature and meaning of the word. He translates "that they may be the more contented." According to him budechaiti is the second comparative form of budech, buidech gl. contentus. He classes it with leriti and moti (C. R. na Rig, pp. 4 and 22), lugaide, mesaide, ussaite (Windisch's Dictionary), lugaiti, lugaide, erusaite, danaite, soccomlaite, calmaite, sonartite, duthrachtaigite, etc. (Atkinson's Glossary).

Mr. MacNeill sees two weak points in his view: first, that we have ch in budechaiti, instead of the regular g of toisigiu, Z², 275, and duthrachtaigite; secondly, that we have ai in place of i or iu as in leriti, toisigiu. But, firstly, the ch is found nine times in Z²: mindechu, tairismechu, toisechu, and toisigiu, etc., as well as toisechem, toisegem, dilgedchem; secondly, Z² has six comparatives in a, which he calls anomalous, and Ascoli regards letha, gl. latiore, as "una vera gemma per la serie degli antichissimi comparativi," (Note Irlandesi, p. 43.) Besides, the a for u is well established in Middle-Irish, córu, córa, etc., as is seen also in the words already quoted from Windisch's and Atkinson's Dictionaries.

E. HOGAN.

SCIENCE NOTES.

THE Cambridge University Press are about to publish a series of "Natural Science Manuals," which will cover a wide field, some of the books being adapted for beginners, whilst others deal with special topics and will be useful only to more advanced students. The series is to be divided into two sections, biological and physical. The former, under the general editorship of Mr. Arthur E. Shipley, will include Invertebrate Palaeontology, by Mr. H. Woods, demonstrator of palaeobotany at Cambridge; The Practical Physiology of Plants, by Mr. Francis Darwin and Mr. E. Hamilton Acton; Physical Anthropology, by Prof. Alexander Macalister; The Vertebrate Skeleton, by Mr. S. H. Reynolds; Fossil Plants, by Mr. A. C. Seward, lecturer in botany; and An Introduction to the Study of Botany, by Mr. Francis Darwin. The volumes of the physical series already arranged for include three by Mr. R. T. Glazebrook, assistant director of the Cavendish Laboratory, on Light and Heat, Electricity and Magnetism, and Mechanics and Hydrostatics.

A NEW and enlarged edition of The Family Physician, a manual of domestic medicine by physicians and surgeons of the principal London hospitals, will be issued immediately by Messrs. Cassell & Co. in serial form, part 1 being ready on October 25. The work has been reset in bold type, fresh illustrations have been added, many of the articles have been rewritten, and all brought down to the latest date.

MR. LEONARD J. SPENCER, of Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, has been appointed to a post in the mineralogical department of the Natural History Museum, Cromwell-road.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

WE quote the following from the Times:—

"A collection of Egyptian papyri, recently purchased by subscription for the Geneva Public Library, is being examined by M. Jules Nicole. He has discovered fragments of the Iliad and the Odyssey, the former comprising portions of Books XI. and XII. presenting great variations from the received text. There is also a passage of Euripides' 'Orestes,' a thousand years older than any MS. hitherto known. M. Nicole has likewise found a didactic elegy on the stars, an idyll on Jupiter and Leda, and historical and scientific compositions. In Christian literature there are liturgical passages, portions of the Bible with or without commentary, and later documents on Eastern Church History. There is also a letter from a bishop or superior of a monastery to the postal authorities, which asks for horses to be provided for three months for the use of the monks in travelling, 'for they are Orthodox.'"

THE latest (No. 49) of the "Bibliographical Contributions," published from the Library of Harvard University, is a bibliography of Persius, compiled by Mr. Morris H. Morgan, assistant professor of Greek and Latin. It consists of about thirty pages, divided into three parts. The first is a list of printed editions, in chronological order, beginning with half-a-dozen undated editions (all of which, we observe, are in the Spencer Library), and ending with Bücheler's edition of Jahn and the latest revision of Conington. The total number of titles recorded is 328, of which the compiler possesses 65 in his own collection. Then follows a list of translations, arranged alphabetically according to countries and writers. Of English translations (including reprints) there seem to be 30; of French, 45; of German, 36; while Russian, Polish, and Hungarian are also represented, but not Greek. Thirdly, there is a list of writings about Persius, arranged alphabetically by author. This is composed mainly of German programmes, and articles in German philological reviews. England is represented only by a few references to the Classical Review and the Journal of Philology. This last list is specially intended to assist the work of classical seminars, and most of the works mentioned are to be found in the Library of Harvard.

Corrigendum.—In Prof. Kuno Meyer's letter in the ACADEMY of October 7, p. 292, col. 1, for "Celtairdichil Diarmata," read "Celtair dichil Diarmata"—i.e., Dermot's Garment of Protection, the title of a hymn, in which the protection of a great number of saints is invoked. Cf. LBr. p. 262b, 5:

"Celtair Diarmata dom ditin (diten Jcs.)."

FINE ART.

THE SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM.

SOME few years ago, the Museum, not altogether spontaneously, but with manifest gain to students and the public, was induced to correct a number of glaring inaccuracies in the description and classification of examples of Italian sculpture, both originals and copies, forming part of its vast collections. Now, again, a good many errors have crept in, which it appears the more useful to point out, since the series of originals, casts, and painted reproductions grows from day to day, and the works brought together—as a rule with good taste and soundness of judgment—should, with proper care, afford the stay-at-home student and amateur unsurpassed opportunities of studying Italian art from its birth to its maturity.

Where so much has already been done, it seems a pity that there should apparently be such a disinclination on the part of the authorities to take note of the developments of modern criticism on the one hand, and of the actual whereabouts of the examples, reproductions of which are displayed in the great halls of the Museum, on the other.

It is not easy to understand on what grounds those responsible in the matter have persisted during the last three years in putting forward as "by Lorenzo di Mariano (Il Marrina), about 1500," the famous holy-water basin of the Siena Duomo, executed with its fellow in 1462-3, by a considerably earlier and much more characteristic Siennese sculptor, Antonio Federighi—the one of Quercia's successors who approached him most nearly. A genuine work of Il Marrina is the "Pieta" here shown, from the celebrated Tabernacle in the church of Fontegiusta at Siena, bearing date 1517. More than half a century separates the two works, which have nothing save the style of the earlier Renaissance in common.

The bronze "Crucifixion" in low relief, from the Museo Nazionale of Florence, has manifestly nothing to do with Antonio Pollajuolo, to whom it is here ascribed; but, both technically and by the dramatic passion with which the subject is presented, proves its affiliation to the school of Donatello. By some it is given to Agostino di Duccio, by others to Bertoldo; by none any longer, save by the Museo Nazionale itself, to Pollajuolo.

The "Madonna and Child" (1890-37), here ascribed to Donatello, is now very generally recognised as a typical work of Desiderio da Settignano: it is an often repeated relief, the best original of which—in marble, enriched with some slight gilding—is in the picture gallery of Turin. The South Kensington Museum possesses another cast of the same subject (866-1891), taken from a painted terra-cotta of less than first-rate execution. Again, the "Madonna and Child with Angels" (1869, No. 7), the original of which belongs to the Emperor of Russia, has no claim whatever to be considered as a work of Donatello, to whom here it is still unhesitatingly ascribed. It shows far more affinity to the style in similar works of Antonio Rossellino. And yet again, the very inferior "Madonna and Child," from the Via delle Donne in Florence (1890-40), has even less right to be put down as "attributed to Donatello": its affinities are with the school of Verrocchio.

Two busts, of which reproductions are here, represent beyond all question the same person, and are, as to the head at any rate, practically identical. These are the gesso from the Earl of Wemyss's collection, formerly known as "Lucrezia Borgia," and now called "A Florentine Girl"; and the stone bust in the Berlin Museum described as "A Young Princess of Urbino," and attributed, with something approaching certainty, to Desiderio da Settignano. To place these two portraits almost side by side, while retaining the divergent descriptions, is a manifest absurdity. Let the one or the other be chosen, and the relation of the two pieces to each other be pointed out.

The "Angel holding a Candlestick," from the Arca di San Domenico, in the church of that saint at Bologna, is no longer attributed, as is here still asserted, to the youth of Michelangelo, but to its rightful author, Niccolò dell'Arca—the sculptor of the greater portion of the shrine. It is the other angel, the one which balances it on the opposite side of the shrine, and is of more massive style and bolder execution, that has for a long time past—not, however, without some dissentient voices—been ascribed to Michelangelo.

The beautiful Tabernacle from the desecrated conventual church of Sta. Chiara is ascribed to Desiderio da Settignano—and no doubt correctly—on the strength of its striking resemblance to the more elaborate work in the right transept of S. Lorenzo at Florence. But why is the date given as "about 1480," when elsewhere in the galleries the date of this sculptor's death is correctly stated as 1464? The great "St. George," of Donatello, is no longer to be found "on the exterior of Or' Sanmichele, Florence"; it now occupies a post of honour in the Donatello gallery of the Bargello, where it has been joined by the master's Marzocco from the Palazzo Vecchio. Copies in bronze now fill up the places formerly occupied by these typical works of the mighty Florentine. The two beautiful singing-galleries, executed by Donatello and Luca della Robbia respectively for the Duomo of Florence, are now no longer shown in the Museo Nazionale, but in the new museum of Sta. Maria del Fiore, specially arranged to receive them, and containing also, among other treasures, the great silver altar-front from S. Giovanni, with repoussé reliefs by Pollajuolo and Verrocchio.

It is incorrect to state, as the authorities persist in doing, that the bronze, "St. John the Baptist" of Donatello was "formerly in the Duomo of Siena." Not only was it formerly there, but it still remains the crowning ornament of the chapel of the saint, for which it was executed in 1457.

Much might be said, too, on the subject of the attributions maintained with regard to various originals forming part of the Museum collection. But here the question of individual appreciation comes in; and it may fairly be argued that the authorities are entitled to their own opinion, in all cases where ascriptions have not absolutely been proved to be erroneous.

CLAUDE PHILLIPS.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

It is announced that Sir George Reid has resigned the presidency of the Royal Scottish Academy, to which he was elected, little more than two years ago, on the death of Sir W. Fettes Douglas.

THERE will be opened next week, at the Japanese Gallery in New Bond-street, a second series of drawings by the Japanese artist, Watanebe Seitei, consisting of landscapes, birds, fish, and flowers.

MESSRS. W. GRIGGS & SONS propose to issue a selection of views, reproduced in photocolotype, from the large collection of negatives in the India Office, illustrative of ancient buildings, sculptures, &c., from all parts of India. These photographs form the most valuable illustrations of the art history, architecture, and mythology of India, and will be of the highest importance for university and art libraries, oriental institutes, &c. The selection of the examples has been entrusted to Dr. James Burgess, formerly director-general of the Archaeological Survey of India. Three portfolios of 150 plates each will be issued at intervals of twelve months, if not less than 25 sets are subscribed for at once, at a cost of £10 for each portfolio.

THE first general meeting of the Hellenic Society for the session 1893-4, will be held at 22, Albemarle-street on Monday next, October 16, at 5 p.m. The papers to be read are: "Some Archaic Bronzes found on the Athenian Acropolis," by Mr. A. G. Bather; and "Some Points in the Cult of Asclepius," by Mr. E. F. Benson.

THE publication of the book on Greek Vase Paintings, by Miss Harrison and Mr. D. S. McCall, already announced, has been postponed till later in the season, owing to the great difficulty that has been experienced in collecting the materials for so exhaustive a work.

WE regret to have to record the death of Mr. Ford Madox Brown, which took place, rather suddenly, on October 6, in the seventy-third year of his age. Though practically unknown to the visitors of West-end exhibitions, the name of this veteran historical painter will find its due place in any future history of Victorian art. He was one of those whose genius was stimulated by the competition for the cartoons at Westminster Hall. Somewhat later, his enthusiasm for art, his technical experience, and the nobility of his character exercised a predominant influence upon those who formed the Pre-Raphaelite movement, though he was never one of the Brotherhood, nor was his practice akin to theirs. Great part of his later life was passed at Manchester, where he decorated the town hall with a series of twelve magnificent frescoes, of which the last was finished this very year. His finest canvas, entitled "Work," was also purchased for the public art gallery of that city; and it was at the Manchester Exhibition of 1887 that the most representative collection of his pictures was brought together. Though deeply affected by the loss of his only son—now several years ago—he has continued to the last to exhibit an heroic example of fidelity to the artistic and ethical ideals of his youth. Grand as his work was, to those who were privileged to know him, the man himself appeared yet grander, embodying the mediæval combination of craftsman, teacher, and citizen.

MUSIC.

TWO BOOKS ON WAGNER.

Wagner and his Works. By H. T. Finck. In 2 vols. (Grevel.)

L'Art de Richard Wagner. L'Œuvre Poétique. Par Alfred Ernst. (Paris: Plon.)

OF books about Wagner there is no end. But the art theories which he promulgated are of such immense importance, and his art work, in which—as in that of Beethoven—one can trace the steady growth of genius, are of such intense interest, that thought and the expression of thought is necessarily provoked.

Mr. Finck, referring to the many short Wagner biographies before the public, is of opinion that his life requires "a thousand pages for adequate treatment." The phrase is somewhat indefinite, but probably we may consider Mr. Finck's two volumes of over 1000 pages as representing his idea of adequate size. For our part we think his book somewhat long, not because of its thousand pages, but because all the matter might have been compressed within smaller space. Many adjectives—such as "thrilling," of which our author is particularly fond—might have been left out to advantage. Admirers of Wagner, as a rule, make lavish use of adjectives and adverbs; but readers who sympathise with the sentiments expressed do not need them, while to the scoffing enemy they form offensive padding. Mr. Finck also devotes too much space to Wagner's critics. "Have we not a right," he says in his preface, "to a little fun at their expense?" We would not rob Mr. Finck of any fun; but his quotations weary, because some are the words of men of little note, and because they teach nothing new. The opposition of critics to new manifestations of genius is an old complaint. The critical mind has to set up standards with which the new is compared; the creative mind has only to receive. Hence Liszt and Spohr felt the power of the new message, while it was still opposed by the chief professional critics of the day. "No man can serve two masters"; and the stronger the attachment of some of the most learned critics to those whom perhaps they have been taught to revere from childhood, the harder it is for them to understand the new comer; for them the matured genius of the old masters shines with greater splendour than that of the undeveloped, or only partially developed, master. Up to a certain point, indeed, opposition is a test of sincerity. If one might venture to compare small things with great, the opposition of critics to what is new, and the lack of sympathy and comprehension shown by men of genius towards their most illustrious contemporaries, proceeds from a very similar cause: the critics are prejudiced in favour of the old, the men of genius in favour of themselves. "Disdain and hate of genius," "ignorance," "vanity" are terms which should not be hurled at critics indiscriminately.

But Mr. Finck's book, though not perfect, contains an enormous quantity of interesting material—descriptions of Wagner's music-dramas and writings, comments, criticisms, quotations from letters, biography, &c. There is something of everything, and a careful reader of these volumes will learn much about Wagner, the man and the artist.

Wagner's opinions of other composers are given at some length, and they are certainly most instructive. His silence concerning Verdi is remarkable. His remark that Bach only works for himself, "only occasionally does it seem as if he were playing something for his wife," is as neat as it is true. The verbal comments on Schubert must not be taken too seriously; we doubt whether Wagner would have deliberately put them into print. Mr. Finck gives some of the plums from "Judaism in Music." Here is one: "Meyerbeer is a composer whose function was not so much to corrupt popular taste, as to take advantage of a taste already corrupted for his benefit."

M. Alfred Ernst has written a volume of over five hundred pages on the poetry of Wagner, and proposes to do as much for the music; but the two are so intimately connected in the works of the Baireuth master, that discussion on the one necessitates occasional mention of the other. Our author, however, has made as good a division as was possible. M. Ernst is a great admirer of Wagner, and has made a deep study of his works. With his admiration we are in full sympathy; but we cannot help feeling that here and there he has minimised defects and magnified excellences, and thus, to some extent, weakened his thoughtful utterances and critical comments.

For instance, he is right in declaring the soul to be the principle of dramatic action, but scarcely so in stating that exterior events—the outward manifestations of inward feeling—are only of indirect value. Again he says: "La réduction des moyens extérieurs à leur minimum est généralement une marque de supériorité dramatique." And thus the psychological action of "Tristan" is praised without stint. This music-drama is one of the wonders of art, but scarcely a model: it errs on the side of subjectivity. The very fault of the drama gives to it its earnestness, its intensity; but the inward conflict is out of proportion to the outward action. So, again, M. Ernst tries to protect with his shield a weak spot in the "Nibelungen," though not very successfully. The importance of Wotan in the scheme of the trilogy, on which M. Ernst lays great stress, may be fully conceded; but yet friends and foes of Wagner cannot help at times feeling in sympathy with Mime, who, when honoured with a visit from the loquacious god, exclaims (in an aside):

"How shall I be rid of this rogue."

Our author, referring to the scenes between Wotan and Fricka and Wotan and Brünnhilde in the second act of the "Walkyrie," declares that they are "belles, profondes, nécessaires à l'économie dramatique et à la signification du Ring." Even admitting their necessity—which in the case of the former seems open to question—surely an impartial critic would complain of their length. But M. Ernst is length-blind. Masterpieces, he tells us, "ne sont jamais longs, au moins pour les âmes capables de les comprendre." But an impartial critic should acknowledge "longeurs," even though he be disposed to qualify them as "heavenly." It is puerile, says M. Ernst, to reproach Wagner for what is admitted in the oratorios of Bach and the last works of Beethoven. To discuss Bach's oratorios here is impossible; but this much may be said, that the comparison between Bach's oratorios and Wagner's music-dramas is altogether unsuitable, while Beethoven's lengths, as compared with Wagner's, are insignificant.

We have laid emphasis on what we consider the weak points of the book, because M. Ernst has a powerful pen and a good cause, and a little healthy criticism can only add strength to both. As a rule, genius has faults as well as merits, and both are great; the former show off the latter, as sinners show off saints.

Our author remarks on the marked contrast between ordinary libretti and Wagner's opera poems. There were, it is true, honourable exceptions, but some sentimental love tale formed the basis of the Italian operas of that day; while Wagner, though by no means excluding the powerful element of love, attempted the solution of deep problems of life, of salvation for man—"salut réel pour le chrétien, symbolique pour l'homme qui ne croit pas," as M. Ernst forcibly puts it. He devotes a special chapter to the religious character of Wagner's art, and points out that the Christian solution of life is more or less ("Tristan" proves somewhat of a stumbling-block) clearly indicated in all his works—most clearly in "Parsifal." Indian philosophy attracted him, the pessimism of Schopenhauer fascinated him for a time, but Wagner was essentially, says M. Ernst, Christian at heart. And our author, who considers the Christian solution of life "la seule claire, la seule complète, logique jusque dans le mystère, merveilleusement adaptée à notre nature," quotes from a "Souvenir" by Villiers de l'Isle-d'Adam, published in the Revue Wagnérienne of 1887, words which seem to show that Wagner did not put on the Christian cloak merely for aesthetic purposes, but that he was a sincere follower of the Great Teacher.

M. Ernst, in his "Transformation et Création" chapters describes at some length the sources whence Wagner drew the subject-matter for his dramas, and in many instances, shows how he copied actual words and sentences. At first blush, it seems as if this indebtedness detracted from Wagner's originality; but careful examination will show that what he borrowed was returned with full interest: he gave back much more than he received. In his younger days Heine's "Der Salon" fell, by chance, into his hands; and in that volume there was, as it were, a panoramic view of his future artistic career. It contained the story of the Flying Dutchman, of Venus and Tannhäuser, and legends of Norns and Walkyries.

The second part of the volume is particularly interesting. M. Ernst here discusses the various personages of Wagner's music dramas, and groups them, at times, in a very striking manner. For instance, chapter v. is headed:—

"Erik.—Wolfram.—Marke.—Hans Sachs."

Erik, the faithful lover, was abandoned by Senta: this was the first and imperfect sketch "d'un grand type humain." Wolfram loved Elsa, and in vain; but his noble nature enabled him to sacrifice his own feelings on the altar of friendship. Sorrow and disappointment gave birth to generous instincts in King Marke; while noble-hearted Sachs renounces his dream of happiness with Eva, and opens to Walther "Parnass und Paradies." These thoughts M. Ernst expands in an eloquent manner.

Again, Parsifal is compared with other Wagnerian heroes. Tannhäuser, passing from one extreme to another, obtained supernatural pardon at the hour of death; Lohengrin discovered the union of celestial and human love to be impossible; and, after mention of Tristan, Siegfried, and Sachs, Parsifal is named as having found peace in this world by renunciation, simplicity, and purity of heart. "Great is the prestige of desire, but greater is the power of renunciation" were the words with which Wagner originally ended the poem of Parsifal.

J. S. SHEDLOCK.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE THEORY OF MUSICAL EXPRESSION.

Bezhill-on-Sea: Oct. 11, 1893.

In the ACADEMY of September 30, a correspondent charges Dr. Hugo Riemann with claiming the credit to himself for formulating, under the name of "Agogics," a theory of musical expression which had been already expounded by M. de Lussy.

A brief account, by Prof. Ordenstein, of Dr. Riemann's work, with a bibliography, will be found appended to his Katechismus der Phrasierung. From this it would appear that Dr. Riemann had begun to write as early as 1873; that M. de Lussy was much indebted to him for his Traité de la Notation Musicale (Prof. Ordenstein calls it a plagiarism simply), and in sending him his Traité de l'Expression, acknowledged his obligations to Dr. Riemann.

It is clear, therefore, that Dr. Riemann's Dynamik und Agogik must not be taken apart, but as a development of the general theory he had begun to expound in 1873. M. de Lussy's merits will presumably be discussed by him in a future Part of the Dictionary.

J. W. MUR.

ROBINSON & CLEAVER, BELFAST,

Were awarded the Grand Diploma of Honour—Highest Award for Irish Damask Table Linen, Edinburgh, 1890.
Two Prize Medals, Paris, 1889.

IRISH DAMASK TABLE AND HOUSE LINEN.

Fish Napkins, 2s. 11d. per doz. Dinner Napkins, 5s. 6d. per doz. Table Cloths, 3 yds. square, 2s. 11d. 2½ yds. by 3 yds., 5s. 11d. each. Kitchen
Table Cloths, 11½d. each. Strong Huckaback Towels, 4s. 6d. per doz.
Frisled Linen Pillow Cases, from 1s. 2½d. each.

IRISH CAMBRIC

Embroidered Handkerchiefs, in all the latest styles, from 1s. to 30s. each.

Children's Bordered, 1s. 3d. per doz.
Ladies' " 2s. 3d. "
Gentlemen's " 3s. 3d. "

Hemstitched:
Ladies', 2s. 9d. per doz.
Gents', 3s. 11d. "

IRISH LINEN

Illustrated Price-Lists and Samples Post Free to any part of the World.

COLLARS, CUFFS, SHIRTS.

COLLARS: Ladies' and Children's 8-fold, 3s. 6d. per doz. Gents' 4-fold, 4s. 11d. per doz.
CUFFS for Ladies, Gentlemen, and Children, from 5s. 11d. per doz.

Best quality long-cloth Shirts, 4-fold
Linen Fronts, 35s. 6d. half-dozen.
(To measure 2s. extra.)

BY SPECIAL
APPOINTMENTS TO
THE QUEEN AND EMPERESS FREDERICK OF GERMANY.

ROBINSON & CLEAVER, BELFAST.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 21, 1893.

No. 1120, New Series.

THE EDITOR cannot undertake to return, or to correspond with the writers of, rejected manuscript.

It is particularly requested that all business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., may be addressed to the PUBLISHER, and not to the EDITOR.

LITERATURE.

Life of Sir Richard Burton. By his Wife Isabel, Lady Burton. In 2 vols. (Chapman & Hall.)

THE question the reviewer asks himself concerning most biographies is, Was this man's life worth writing? And usually the answer is that it was not: that the preservation of his memory had been better attained by a magazine article or a few lines of truthful epitaph. Yet the mania for writing biographies—and publishing them, which is worse—is on the increase. Many a good man's memory is drowned in fathomless volumes, from which it will never be restored.

But Sir Richard Burton deserved a full record of his career, if ever man did. Concerning him the question is, Who was best fitted to compile the memorial? A biography is the most difficult of books to make; for it is easy enough to invent material, but not so easy to sift and choose from that which lies to hand. And half the value of a biography is gone—despite the evidence of Boswell—directly there is the slightest undue glorification of the hero, or faintest show of bias for or against him. Assuredly, Burton's enemies were bitter enough, and his friends enthusiastic enough, to make the choice of a biographer terribly difficult. Lady Burton has attempted to solve the problem in her own way, and not without success. The volumes are strange in arrangement, often confusing, unduly eulogistic—Burton was one of the few who needed no superlatives—and, in spite of their bulk, incomplete. But she, with special knowledge and untiring zeal, has made a brave effort to accomplish a task she held as sacred. With all shortcomings, the volumes are not unworthy of the man they are designed to honour. Another Life will probably be necessary some day—shorter, clearer, written in a more judicious and discriminating spirit; but the present work will always possess a peculiar and fascinating value.

No man of modern times lived a life so full of romance as Burton. To find his parallel we must turn to the careers of the Elizabethan heroes, notably Sir Walter Raleigh. For Burton was something more than a "gentleman adventurer." He was at once poet—as the Kasidah, wisely quoted by Lady Burton in full, shows beyond cavil—historian, traveller, profound oriental scholar, and soldier. Even his faults, often virtues in uncongenial surroundings, were those of the Elizabethan age; and his failures were due almost entirely to the fact that he had to live, not under the patronage of Gloriana, but in our nineteenth century.

The first volume, in every sense the more valuable, contains a hundred pages of autobiography, dictated by Burton to his wife during his last voyage to India. Nowhere in all the thousand pages devoted to his history is the man so clearly revealed as in this section. He gives us a charmingly spirited account of his boyhood, passed in continental towns; and many passages, like the following description of society at Tours, are not only interesting in themselves, but show that he began to observe men and places keenly at an early age:

"At that period a host of these little colonies were scattered over the continent nearest England; in fact, an oasis of Anglo-Saxondom in a desert of continentalism, somewhat like the society of English county towns as it was in 1800, not as it is now, where society is confined to the parson, dentist, surgeon, general practitioners, the barbers, and the lawyers. . . . The English of these little colonies were intensely patriotic, and cared comparatively little for party politics. They stuck to their own church because it was their own church, and they knew as much about the Catholics at their very doors as the average Englishman does of the Hindu. Moreover, they honestly called themselves Protestants in those days, and the French called themselves Catholics. There was no quibble about 'their being Anglo-Catholics and the others Roman Catholics.' They subscribed liberally to the church, and did not disdain to act as churchwardens. They kept a sharp look out upon the parson, and one of your modern High Church Protestants or Puseyites or Ritualists would have got the sack after his first sermon."

Burton's Oxford career was not really unsuccessful, though his early training ill fitted him to understand or submit to college discipline. After being present at "the disgraceful scene of a race-ordinary," he was "sent down"; and he left the university defiantly driving a tandem, and kissing his hand "to the pretty girls." It was only when he began his military duties in Sind that his work became thoroughly congenial to him. His early years in India laid the foundation very firmly of his astonishing career. He acquired at this time that vast store of Oriental learning which caused the Somalis to say of him, at a later period, "Here comes the Shaykh who knows knowledge." Disguised as Mirza Abdullah the Bushiri, he gained a greater insight into Eastern life and character than any European before or since.

"Sometimes the Mirza passed the evening in a mosque, listening to the ragged students who, stretched at full length with their stomachs on the dusty floor, and their arms supporting their head, mumbled out Arabic from the thumb, soiled, and tattered pages of theology upon which a dim oil lamp shed its scanty ray, or he sat debating the niceties of faith with the long-bearded, shaven-pated, bleary-eyed, and stolid-faced genus loci, the Mullah. At other times, when in merrier mood, he entered uninvited the first door whence issued the sound of music and dance—a clean turban and a polite bow are the best 'tickets for soup' the East knows; or he played chess with some native friend; or he consorted with the hemp drinkers and opium eaters in the estaminets; or he visited the Mrs. Gadabouts and Go-betweens, who made matches among the Faithful, and gathered from them a precious budget of private history and domestic scandal."

But Burton's life was an uninterrupted record of failure dogging the heels of success. The one man in India fully fitted, as he deserved to be by untiring and health-breaking study, to act as interpreter in the Multan campaign, he was passed over in favour of a man who "knows [only] Hindustani."

He left Sind and made his wonderful journey to Meccah, recorded in two brave volumes. Soon after his return from the birthplace of Mahomet followed the expedition to Harar, one of the most striking chapters of perilous travel in the book of African romance. Either of these exploits would have made the fortune of an ordinary man. But it was Burton's misfortune, partly through his own fault, to reap but seldom the full meed of success.

On his return, he volunteered for service in the Crimea, and joined Beaton's Horse; but here, as in India, he saw no fighting, though he gave plenty of proofs of his soldierly qualities. When peace was declared, he again started for Africa.

The melancholy quarrel that estranged him from Speke, his lieutenant, need not be referred to in detail. Lady Burton refers to it too often, and I think too bitterly. Burton's own elegy on Speke's firm supporter, Murchison—"I respect the silence of a newly-made grave"—and his reticence on the subject after Speke's death, show clearly how he would have liked his biographer to treat the matter. Moreover, Burton's services as an explorer are honestly enough recognised now. And as he was fighting with some one or other all his life, it is difficult to believe that the blame must always be visited entirely on his antagonist.

Burton's next mission was a dangerous one. He went, bearing presents and warnings, to Gaelele, King of Dahomey. He has written a full account of his visit to the country of the Amazons, giving us the history of the reigning dynasty, and a masterly exposition of the peculiar customs and religion of the people. He was, as usual, inadequately rewarded when his business was done, receiving a petty consulship in Brazil. He was completely lost at San Paulo. Though he did good work, it was work that could have been accomplished by any industrious man of average intelligence. His time of service in South America is the most barren and uninteresting part of his career.

Burton's great chance seemed to have come when he was given Damascus. Yet both he and his friends were doomed to disappointment. There is no doubt that his recall was the result of untoward circumstances combining against him. But Burton did not understand the Western mind as well as he did the Eastern. The extraordinary Shasli episode; his troubles with Rashid Pasha about the Druses; his severe and just, but somewhat tactlessly contrived, measures against the Jewish usurers—were sufficient to make his recall, at first sight, seem necessary to those who only knew the East through Blue-books. That he was vilely insulted in the manner of it is certain. Where it is easy to agree with Lady Burton is in condemning the authorities for not offering her husband Teheran or Tangier after the Damascus problem was fully unravelled, as it was with the disgrace and downfall, a month later, of Rashid. That such a man as Burton should have been reduced to his last £15 is a burning scandal to the country whose interests he strove so gallantly to serve. His entire fitness for an Eastern post is demonstrated by the respect the natives of all classes and divisions felt for him, and the fear and love he awakened in his subordinates. Mr. Palmer, the famous Orientalist, at this time wrote to the Civil Service Gazette a letter which effectually disposes of all objections to Burton's merits as an Eastern consul.

"The Mahomedans," he writes, "whose fanatical aversion to Capt. Burton is the ostensible pretext for his recall, have been holding mass meetings, and even praying publicly in the mosques that God will send him back to them. Letters are flowing in every day from village sheikhs and Bedouin chiefs asking that he may return to Damascus, as there is no one else to whom they can appeal for help or succour."

To place Burton, as he finally was placed, at Trieste, was to banish him. And the exile must have been doubly bitter because he was almost on the threshold of his beloved East, and every week saw the Austrian Lloyd steamers steering for Alexandria and the rising sun. How valuable his services would have been his marvellous letter to Lord Salisbury on the Egyptian question shows. With almost brutal directness he begins "Annex Egypt." It is calculated to horrify a good many people who only know the Khedive's dominions as the place of the Sphinx, the Pyramids, and Shepperd's Hotel. But by those who have lived in the country and realise its importance to us, and who know how the fellahin feel towards our rule, it will probably be considered very seriously indeed: more especially when the plan for annexation that Burton designed is carefully studied and its masterly details thoroughly understood.

But from Trieste we got Camoens and The Thousand Nights and a Night, so that the loss was balanced by two great gains.

The second volume, dealing with Burton's life at the Austrian port, is far too long, and too full of trivial incidents, cuttings from cheap journals, and opinions and speeches of people of little importance even in their own day. It may be true, as Lady Burton says, that "these scraps of information will interest many people"; but their inclusion is none the less a mistake. Still, there are plenty of good stories and characteristic touches, for which we are grateful. The letter, addressed "to the Council," Burton received from a drunken English sailor, who had been robbed and imprisoned, is only one of a dozen anecdotes equally good:

"Burtin

"i am hin trobel, kum & let me haout.

"TIM TROUNCER."

It is a pity that Lady Burton devotes so large a space to her husband's searches for gold. For though in many ways these expeditions, especially to Midian, were valuable, one cannot help feeling that the soldier, scholar, and poet suffered loss of dignity in working for company promoters who reaped all the benefits. Burton himself gained nothing from these trips except pecuniary losses he could ill afford.

But I have said enough to show how profoundly interesting the work is. No book that comes before the public can escape criticism; nor is it right that it should. Yet there are some books, and this is emphatically one, that cannot fairly be judged by the ordinary standards. To Lady Burton herself the task of writing her husband's life meant something more than the mere composing of a biography. It was a task very sacred in her eyes, and to appreciate her work fully the religious feeling that inspired its composition cannot be ignored. It is impossible not to feel irritated at times; it is equally impossible not to be awed into silence by the solemn and audacious manner of her style. These pages of hers open out to us a new side of Burton's character, a side which no stranger could ever understand, and which it were impertinence to attempt to criticise. The mystical leanings, the regular see-saw from Sufi-ism to Catholicism, the superstitions that made up an appreciable part of his character, only she could explain to us. Her work, despite portentous faults, is remarkable, and has a value beyond price. The critic, in despair, can only say to her, in the words of Burton's splendid Kasidah:

"From self-approval seek applause: what ken not men thou kenneest, thou!
Spurn every idol others raise: before thine own ideal bow."

And the most prosaic and least indulgent reader is forced to acknowledge that we have here revealed to us the man as he was. There can no longer be any doubt, if, indeed, there ever was any doubt, that England lost in him one of the bravest and noblest of her sons. And it will be remembered always with sorrow that he was treated with scant courtesy during his life and insulted with meagre honours. But

"In days to come, days slow to dawn, when wisdom deigns to dwell with men,
These echoes of a voice long stilled haply shall wake responsive strains;
Wend now thy way with brow serene, fear not thy humble tale to tell;
The whispers of the desert wind, the tinkling of the camel's bell."

PERCY ADDLESHAW.

Songs of the Common Day. By Chas. G. D. Roberts. (Longmans.)

Of the younger Canadian poets none has won so widespread and, it may be said at once, so deserved a repute as Prof. Charles Roberts. His name has of late been as familiar in the literary world of the United States as in Canada; while in this country, which is, after all, from the trans-Atlantic point of view, merely the metropolitan section of the English race, he is known as the author of In Divers Tones and other verse of high quality. Among his compatriots are some six or eight writers in prose and verse whose claims should not be overlooked. But while no Canadian can evoke the lyric note with such subtle and original music as Mr. Bliss Carman, so there is none who, as a sonnet-writer, can be compared with Mr. Roberts. In this poetic genre, indeed, he has few equals among living poets. It seems to me that here he has found himself, though he is not less the music-maker in slow lyrical measures, decasyllabic quatrains, and stanzas. This, too, in face of the fact that the most noteworthy poem in Songs of the Common Day is not a sonnet, but a lengthy elegiac ode. But, in the main, his poetic individuality stands most clearly revealed in his sonnets. He is a "pre-Raphaelite" in exactitude of observation; and it is this unflinching realism in the painting of details—a realism closely akin to that of Guy de Maupassant in its quality of directness—that is at once his strength and his weakness. As a rule, this quality gives verve and beauty to his sonnets; but it sometimes happens that a lyric of a shorter and swifter movement is handicapped by some touch of pictorial yet not poetic observation. As an observer of that "diurnal round of common things" which has been pronounced to be the worthiest realm for the poet, the writer of Songs of the Common Day stands almost alone. If we compare his work with that of some of our younger nature-poets, we find in it not only evidence of a keener pictorial sense, but also of that scientifically exact vision which, combined with poetic insight and emotion, we discern in the prose writings of nature-students such as Richard Jefferies, Mr. Grant Allen, and "A Son of the Marshes." How true to nature, how masterly in their austere simplicity, are sonnets such as (to name but a few) "The Sower," "The Cow Pasture," "When Milking Time is Done," "The Fir Woods," "The Pea Fields," "The Summer Pool."

"I see the harsh, wind-ridden, eastward hill,
By the red cattle pastured, blanched with dew:
The small, mossed hillocks where the clay gets through;
The grey webs woven on milk-weed tops at will,
The sparse, pale grasses flicker, and are still,
The empty flats yearn seaward. All the view
Is naked to the horizon's utmost blue;
And the bleak spaces stir me with strange thrill."
"With sky-bright clamour the live brooks sparkle and run.
Freed flocks confer about the farmstead ways.
The air's a wine of dreams and shining haze, Beaded with bird-notes thin — for Spring's begun!"

"The noons o'erbrim
The windless hollow of its iris'd strand
With mote-thick sun and water-breathing bland."

"This smell of home and honey on the breeze,
This shimmer of sunshine woven in white and pink . . .
Sweet, sweet and strange across the ancient trees."

The book abounds in lines like these, so that one has a sense at last of sun-swept uplands, fresh wind, and meadow fragrance, while also it is as though one smelt the "kye comin' hame" to old orcharded home-steads, or the bean-fields' odours in the twilight, or the evening breeze coming up from the salt marshes of Tantramar. Two of the finest of Mr. Roberts's descriptive sonnets, "The Sower" and "The Potato Harvest," are familiar to readers in this country in anthologies; so I select two others from those where the poet-observer rather than the painter-observer has re-created for us that which appealed so strongly to himself.

A VESPER SONNET.

"The violet eve is like a waveless stream
Celestial, from the rapt horizon's brink,
Assuaging day with the diviner drink
Of temperate ecstasy, and dews, and dream.
The wine-warm dusks, that brim the valley, gleam
With here and there a lonely casement. Cease
The impetuous purples from the sky of peace,
Like God's mood in tranquillity supreme.
"The encircling uplands east and west lie clear
In their aerial amber, threaded fine—
Where bush-fires gnaw the bramble-thickets sere—
With furtive scarlet. Through the hush benign
One white-throat voices, till the stars appear,
The benediction of the Thought Divine."

THE PEA-FIELDS.

"These are the fields of light, and laughing air,
And yellow butterflies and foraging bees,
And whitish, wayward, blossoms winged as these,
And pale green tangles like a seamaid's hair.
Pale, pale the blue, but pure beyond compare,
And pale the sparkle of the far-off seas,
A shimmer like these fluttering slopes of peas,
And pale the open landscape everywhere.
"From fence to fence a perfumed breath exhales
O'er the bright pallor of the well-loved fields—
My fields of Tantramar in summer-time;
And, scorning the poor feed their pasture yields,
Up from the bushy lots the cattle climb,
To gaze with longing through the grey, mossed rails."

How fine also "The Fir Woods":

"The wash of endless waves is in their tops . . .
These are my gates of wonder, surged about
By tumult of tossed bough and rocking crest . . .
This green and humming gloom that wraps my rest."

It is when his diction is most simple that Prof. Roberts is at his best. When, consciously or unconsciously, he is Rossetian, his style becomes laboured, and charged with inversions—to which, it may be added, he is addicted—as, for example, even in such fine lines as

"And no shade mitigates the day's white scorn.
These serious acres vast no groves adorn;
But giant trunks, bleak shapes that once were trees,
Tower naked, unassuaged of rain or breeze,
Their stern grey isolation grimly borne."

Rossetti, also, surely inspired the sonnet "Tides." At any rate one seems to hear an echo in

"Where shadowless to the sky the marsh expands,
And the noonheats must scar them, and the drought . . .
Yet soon for them the solacing tide returns
To quench their thirst of longing. Ah, not so . . .

And in parched channel still the shrunk stream mourns";

and the music of the sonnet, "On Giorgione's Venetian Pastoral," seems to linger in

"Through the still dusk how sighs the ebb-tide out
Reluctant for the reed-beds! Down the sands
It washes. Hark! beyond the wan grey strand's
Low limits how the winding channels grieve,
Aware the evasive waters soon will leave Them void and waste where . . ."

Perhaps even more attractive than the sonnets, and certainly not less beautiful, if on the whole less distinctive, are many of the lyrics of life and love, and nature and dream, and the lovely ballad-poem "Tantramar." It is, however, in "Ave!" the noble ode written last year for the centenary of Shelley's birth, that Mr. Roberts measures himself with the chiefs in lyrical mastery. This lofty strain to ". . . the avatar Of Song, Love, Dream, Desire, and Liberty" is conceived from first to last, and wrought throughout, with all the white-light fervour of creative emotion. The salt tides of the marshes of Tantramar blend their music with the noise of the sea over against Casa Magni—

"Mourn, Mediterranean waters, mourn
In a affluent purple down your golden shore!"
but the strain is all the sweeter and subtler and more strangely new and enthralling. These Songs of the Common Day,

"The common waters, the familiar woods,
And the great hills' inviolate solitudes," should certainly not be ignored. Let Mr. Roberts himself plead, in his own dainty prelude:

"Across the fog the moon lies fair,
Transfused with ghostly amethyst,
O white night, charm to wonderment,
The cattle in the mist!

"Thy touch, O grave Mysteriarch,
Makes dull, familiar things divine.
O grant of Thy revealing gift
Be some small portion mine!

"Make thou my vision sane and clear,
That I may see what beauty clings
In common forms, and find the soul
Of unregarded things!"

WILLIAM SHARP.

THE HUNDRED DAYS.

1815—La Première Restauration, Le Retour de l'île d'Elbe, Les Cent Jours. Par Henry Houssaye. (Paris: Perrin.)

It is no wonder that this volume should have had an immediate and universal success in France. The career of Napoleon, like the story of the French Revolution, is again exercising its old fascination, and in its new shape is arousing the interest of thousands, whose former attitude of weary toleration for oft-repeated falsehoods and tinsel rhetoric was only too well justified. The school of historical searchers, whose labours in the archives and careful examination of both printed and MS. documents have caused the story of the Revolution to be entirely re-written, are also doing good work for its sequel, the story of Napoleon. The nonsensical rigmaroles of irresponsible writers, who delighted in drawing on their imagination, and in expanding the anecdotes of untrustworthy compilers of personal memoirs and the tittle-tattle of French salons into what they were pleased to call histories, are being rapidly replaced by sober narratives, based on a careful weighing of evidence and comparison of documents. The elaborate volumes of rhetoricians, who sought to discover justification for their own a priori theories instead of the truth, are being consigned to the limbo of forgotten fiction, and the admired authors of the past generation are rightly neglected by the students of the present day. Unfortunately, Englishmen are only just beginning to perceive that the sober truth, soberly told, is more interesting and more instructive than the most highly coloured romance, which chances to be called a history, in the case of their own country; and years will probably elapse before they are ready to give up their belief in the legends which have long passed current with regard to the most striking period of modern French history.

M. Henry Houssaye's excellent volume on the campaign of 1814 in France and the fall of Napoleon's empire proved that he was well fitted to deal with the history of an exceptionally difficult period. He possesses the rare power of discrimination in sifting his material, as well as diligence in collecting information; he can discount the tendencies of official documents as well as of popular rumours, reported in contemporary pamphlets and journals; and he has the candour on every page to give references to his authorities, so that his power of weighing evidence can be freely tested. His opinions are stated as opinions only, so that they can be followed or not, according to the reader's taste; while his facts are not hacked into shape to fit his opinions, as is too often the case with earlier writers. This is high praise; but it is given after careful examination, and deliberately. The present writer has been recently engaged in going over, though not on such an extended scale as M. Henry Houssaye, the very same ground, and has, therefore, if he may be permitted to say so, some justification in forming and stating his judgment of M. Houssaye's book.

The interest of the events of the year 1815 in France, and, therefore, of M. Houssaye's volume, is to be found rather in the attitude of the French people than in the actual proceedings of Napoleon himself. There have been many histories of Napoleon, many biographies, elaborate eulogies in numerous volumes, analyses of his curious temperament, violent denunciations of his actions, careful descriptions of his military and civil achievements; but there has never been written a truthful history of France during the Consulate and Empire. It has been too readily assumed that France was entirely absorbed by the great Corsican, and the universal interest felt in the personality of the man has overridden the importance of studying the attitude of the nation. But the time has come when the historical interest of the period may be regarded as apart from, or side by side with, the biography of the individual; and it is daily becoming more apparent that Napoleon's marvellous career was the result of circumstances more than of his genius: his first military successes were won by the superb army, which the events of the French Revolution had bequeathed to him, and it was on the basis of his military successes that he erected his power in France and in Europe. When he had consumed the Grande Armée, that power crumbled away. In his previous volume, "1814," M. Houssaye showed that France declined to support Napoleon against Europe in arms, and that the revolutionary élan which had made her successful against all her foes in 1794 was not to be called into existence twenty years later, in spite of the invasion of the fatherland, for the maintenance of the authority of the Emperor. Since that was the case in 1814, how came it that in 1815 France welcomed Napoleon on his return from Elba? What were the causes which led to his being enabled to establish himself again at the Tuileries, and once more to find himself at the head of a French army?

This is the first problem which M. Houssaye endeavours to solve, and he does so by a sketch of the ill-advised measures of the Bourbons—both king and princes. His account contains nothing absolutely new; but it is singularly well arranged, and lays, from documentary authority, special weight on the manifestations in the provinces against the government of the Restoration. The second part of his volume is devoted to the story of Napoleon's triumphal march to Paris; but he carefully resists the temptation of occupying himself solely with the central figure of this romantic episode. He occupies his space instead with an examination of the attitude of the French people, and with a description of the failure of all efforts at opposition; and thus makes Napoleon's return to Paris an intelligible event instead of an incomprehensible romance. The third part is devoted to a study of the events of the Hundred Days in Paris, and particularly the curiously un-Napoleonic attempt to found a liberal empire. Such a conception was utterly opposed to the nature of Napoleon: years of arbitrary rule, even when tempered by a few months' exile, do not form a good training for a constitutional monarch. The Liberals of France must have felt this; and it is no wonder that the concessions of the Additional Act were received with but lukewarm enthusiasm, and failed to strengthen the position of the emperor. The state of feeling in France during the Hundred Days is admirably depicted by M. Houssaye. From the mass of documents he has examined and analysed, he has been able to draw up a view of the state of opinion in France in 1815—not only of the state of opinion in Paris, but throughout the provinces—which forms the most valuable portion of his original work. It is impossible to sum up his conclusions in a few lines; but all who take an interest in the history of the annus mirabilis, which closed the transition period between eighteenth century and modern Europe, should study it for themselves. M. Houssaye concludes by promising a second volume, consisting, like the first, of three parts, on Waterloo, the Second Restoration, and the White Terror.

Enough has been said to show that this is a very remarkable production of the great French historical school of the present day. It is not so much its intrinsic value as a history, as its scientific method, that leaves the reader of 1815 impressed with a sense of its author's high qualifications for the work he has undertaken. The first sentences of his preface eloquently establish his point of view; and they are well worthy of reproduction, though they must necessarily lose some of their picturesque directness in a translation.

"Monarchs, captains and ministers," he says,

"are not the only personages in history. The people and the army have also played their part. In this book, which is not so much a chapter in the life of the Emperor as a history of France during a tragic year, I have tried to paint the sentiments of the Frenchmen of 1815, and to mark their action on events. Napoleon, Louis XVIII., Talleyrand, Fouché, Ney, Davout, and Carnot remain in front of the stage; but not far from them can be seen the peasants, bourgeois, workmen, and soldiers, just as in the Greek drama the chorus of old men or of warriors can be seen near Ajax and Agamemnon. In order to free myself before commencing my work of all prejudices, I endeavoured to forget the little I already knew about the Restoration and the Hundred Days. I set myself to learn in the different archives this page of the history of France, as if it had been as entirely unknown to me as the chronicle of the Emperors of China. In the midst of the crumpled, yellow papers, of which some, written on the very field of battle, seemed yet to bear the smell of powder upon them, I have seen men and things being reborn before me. Under this direct impression, my opinions have been formed from day to day, have been repeatedly modified, and finally fixed and established, thanks to the multitude of my documents, and the concordance of the majority of my witnesses."

H. MORSE STEPHENS.

The Gospel of Paul. By Charles Carroll Everett, Professor of Theology in Harvard University and Dean of the Harvard Divinity School. (James Clarke.)

THE author of this work proposes what he believes to be a new interpretation of Paul's doctrine of the atonement. The popular, or substitutionary, view, he shows, is founded on a theory of sacrifice which, though universally received a quarter of a century ago, has since been completely exploded. The punitive theory of sacrifice, he contends, has no foundation whatever in the known facts of man's religious development. The first sacrifices of meat and wine were, in fact, neither more nor less than food and drink offered to the gods, with a view to their propitiation, and in no case was the victim regarded as taking the place of the worshipper and suffering in his stead. Had this been so, the greater the suffering and sorrow exhibited the more effectual would have been the atonement, whereas sacrifices, among the heathen, were usually accompanied by music and dancing and other signs of rejoicing; while, even when the victims were human beings, care was taken that no sounds of weeping should be heard. Among the Hebrews the permission, in the case of a poor man, to substitute an offering of flour for an animal sufficiently demonstrates the absence of the vicarious idea; and it is certainly a striking fact, and one which has given considerable trouble to evangelical writers, that in the only case in which there is express mention of anyone's sins being transferred to an animal—viz., the scapegoat—that animal is not slain, but sent alive into the wilderness. In short, whether among the Hebrews or the heathen, the sacrificial victim was not an accursed thing, but a holy thing; whereas, according to Paul, Christ, in being suspended on a cross, was made "a curse for us." And here precisely is the expression which Prof.

Everett seizes upon to explain Paul's theory: "Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law, having been made a curse for us; for it is written, Cursed is everyone that hangeth on a tree." (Gal. iii. 13). The great error of the commentators, he contends, lies in not taking Paul's words literally enough; and these words, as being the plainest statement we have on the subject, ought to be used to explain those which are more abstract. Christ, the perfectly righteous, having been accursed by the law, is henceforth under the law no more. The law having disowned Him and cast Him out, has for Him ceased to exist. It has no more power over Him, and neither has it over those who through faith are identified with Him, who, like Paul, have been "crucified with Christ." And as a consequence all sins against the law are remitted. The law itself, indeed, having been abolished, offences against it must of course pass away of themselves. Thus the law became the means of its own destruction, and the Christian could say, "I through the law am dead to the law." Such is the plain meaning of these words, in accordance with which all other expressions referring to the same subject, which are mostly of a symbolic or figurative kind, are to be explained; whereas in the traditional view there is nothing to explain why the law should be abolished.

I am by no means sure that there is anything in this view to explain it. Because the law, in pronouncing a curse upon a certain class of persons, inadvertently included in that curse one guilty of no offence, even though he were the Messiah Himself, was the law therefore to be rendered invalid in all its details? Even if such a conclusion was not impossible to Rabbinical casuistry, at least there seems to be no logical connexion between the two things; and the notion that the law, by condemning an innocent person, over-reached itself and so wrought its own destruction, bears altogether too close a resemblance to the old patristic and mediaeval superstition about the devil having lost his hold on the human race in consequence of his having mistaken the Son of God for a mortal and put him to death. Paul surely never ceased to believe that the law was in its origin and nature divine. What he believed about it was that it was for a temporary purpose, and that when the time was come for the fulfilment of the earlier promise, it would cease to be valid. At the same time, one might agree with Prof. Everett's interpretation of this particular passage—which I observe is entirely that of Dr. Drummond in his little book on the Galatians—without making it exhaustive of Paul's whole doctrine of atonement. Prof. Everett tries hard to reconcile his theory with other passages in Paul's Epistles, and in the writings of the Pauline school, such as the great passage in the Romans—"Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in His blood," &c.—but not, to my mind, quite successfully. And he does not notice at all, "Christ, our pass-over, is sacrificed for us," nor the post-Pauline, "Behold the Lamb of God, which take away the sin of the world." It is, indeed, a strong point in his favour, and one which he is quite justified in pressing, that what has been called the traditional view of the atonement is, in reality, comparatively modern. It was quite unknown to the Fathers, and did not assume any definite shape till after Anselm, whose doctrine was simply the Catholic doctrine of merit in its extreme form. At the same time, it may be suggested that a high doctrine of sacrifice may well have grown up in silence among the Jews during the four pre-Christian centuries. Whether there is positive evidence that this was so I must leave it to others more learned in Jewish antiquities to say; but the principle so broadly announced in the New Testament, that "without shedding of blood there is no remission of sins," can scarcely be a purely Christian one.

Prof. Everett's view of Paul's theory of the atonement involves a rather curious but very interesting view of the same Apostle's doctrine of election, which I may just notice. Paul did not, for a moment, believe that God had, from all eternity, elected certain persons to salvation, and passed the rest by, as the Westminster Catechism teaches. He taught that God had chosen certain persons, as "vessels of dishonour," to perform the dishonourable but necessary work of putting the Messiah to death, whereby the world might be saved. But this was not incompatible with the salvation of those persons. Paul, sometimes, seems to teach the doctrine of universal salvation, and his doctrine of election is not inconsistent with it.

On the whole, Prof. Everett's book possesses considerable interest, and his theory is an ingenious one, and very ably sustained. With these remarks, however, I must now leave it to the judgment of Pauline students. It will be interesting to notice how it is received by Pileiderer and others who take the purely objective view of Paul's theology, without any desire to force it into conformity with their personal creed. No doubt it will attract the attention of such critics.

ROBERT B. DRUMMOND.

NEW NOVELS.

Catrina: a Sequel to "Kidnapped"; being Memoirs of the Further Adventures of David Balfour at Home and Abroad. By Robert Louis Stevenson. (Cassells.)

The Transgression of Terence Clancy. By Harold Vallings. In 3 vols. (Bentley.)

For One Season Only. By Mrs. Robert Jocelyn. In 3 vols. (White.)

The Heirloom; or, the Descent of Vernwood Manor. By T. Duthie-Lisle. In 3 vols. (Gay & Bird.)

Can this be Love? By Mrs. Parr. (Longmans.)

December Roses. By Mrs. Campbell Praed. (Bristol: Arrowsmith.)

My Village. By R. Menzies Fergusson. (Digby, Long & Co.)

THAT Mr. Stevenson has named his recent novel after the name of a woman is in itself a sign of a new departure. Indeed, except in Prince Otto, he has not yet made so elaborate a study of a woman's character as this; for elaborate this study is, as elaborate as may be in the case of the autobiography of another person. Love of the spirited young maiden, Catriona, divides with his allegiance to Alan Breck and his sense of his own honour the heart of David Balfour of Shaws. David himself—not the daring, open-hearted boy we left in Kidnapped, but the older, self-conscious product of a five years' development in Mr. Stevenson's brain—tells the story, so that the woman is, after all, objective and not subjective. She first appears as the devoted daughter of James More, son to Rob Roy, then languishing in Edinburgh Castle; she ends by casting her father forth for ever. Seeing that the story is mainly one of adventure, and that the gradual change in Catriona's sentiments cannot be given in thoughts and feelings, but only in their half-complete outward and visible realisations, her portrait is admirable. Yet in fewer words, and in far less careful touches, we have a portrait quite as vivid and appealing of Barbara Grant, the brilliant, audacious, clever, kind-hearted, and beautiful daughter of Prestongrange, the Lord Advocate. Of the other characters, Prestongrange himself, as unscrupulous and scheming as his colleagues, but with a heart that may be reached now and then, is one of the most striking and original. Alan Breck, always inimitable, comes upon the scene as an old friend and an old favourite. His humour is as rich, his daring as great, his resourcefulness as boundless, as when we first knew him. David has made a distinct advance. As a boy he was somewhat precocious; as a young man he talks and acts with a wisdom that exceeds his years; but, to use a phrase of his own, he was "made so." The extreme carefulness of Mr. Stevenson's style gives its own charm to the book, and it is a charm which the quaint Scotticisms accentuate. The adventures move with accustomed fire and spirit, and are as much out of the common as ever; but perhaps the most fascinating chapters, for purely human and domestic interest—new to Mr. Stevenson, by-the-by—are those in Holland. The complex feelings, the fighting of love and honour, in the fervent heart of young "Dauvit" Balfour at this period are admirably shown. Mr. Stevenson has achieved the almost unique success of producing a "sequel" that is as good as the story which it continues and concludes. He says himself that "it is the fate of sequels to disappoint those who have waited for them," and that is true. Even Scott, whom in many ways he so much resembles, was not happy in his revivals of old characters and scenes; nor were Thackeray's attempts of a like kind quite successful. But Mr. Stevenson's Catrina has as much merit as Kidnapped, and higher praise it would be impossible to give.

Though The Transgression of Terence Clancy belongs to a class of novels whose chief defect is a tendency to melodrama, it is an able book. A strong human interest pervades it, and it is remarkably well written. Clancy is a brilliant Irishman, fascinating in manners and weak in character. A sturdy Englishman, the generous friend and patron of Clancy, is his direct opposite in almost every respect. While Clancy wins his way by a personal charm which has no solid virtue behind it, Simon Secretan, guiltless of personal charm, but abounding in honest worth, conciliates nobody. The former is taken on trust, and lifted into favour, without credentials; the latter, notwithstanding his good birth and blameless life and many philanthropies, is barely tolerated. The closely related careers of these two men, given as they are with evident truth of observation, make an interesting study. There is no breach of probability. Though everything tends in one case to mischief and in the other to well-doing, we have no unrelieved story of villainy and no unmixed story of rectitude. Clancy means well, and drifts rather than plunges into evil; Secretan both means well and does well, but his obtuseness goes far to account for the small appreciation he gets. Without posing as a moralist, Mr. Vallings has succeeded in showing how inevitably such a disposition as Clancy's, quick to be tempted and slow to resist, goes wrong. Good intentions in such a man are only a favourable wind that carries him on to his destruction. Of necessity Clancy and Secretan get further and further apart, though the fine friendship of the strong man for the weak one survives many shocks, and leaves some sense of pity behind it even when the cruellest of betrayals has crushed it out. Indeed, it is a distinct merit in the story that it permits one to forgive a good deal to the transgressor, out of consideration for the human nature in him. The main lines of the story are represented in the careers of these two men, but there are other characters in it as vividly drawn and as essential to its purpose. The two Tredethlyns, Nell and Kate, make another contrast, though a less complete one. They are girls we should recognise if we met them again. Kate is perhaps the more individual of the two, and her strong and weak points are well brought out in her relations with the Rushes, father and son, and with the aunt who so comically turns up to give a disconcerting blow to her pride. Mrs. French-Chichester belongs to a more familiar type, but her intrigues are admirably set forth. The whole book, in fact, is an excellent piece of work, whether regarded from a purely literary point of view or from that of the student of character and of human motives.

That the elucidation of character does not necessarily require literary skill is shown in Mrs. Jocelyn's For One Season Only. Mrs. Jocelyn, who has a somewhat rapid style, would perhaps disclaim for herself the fetters of grammar and the restraints of good English. At any rate she is to a large extent oblivious of both. But her Georgina Pombrooke, in this story, is an intensely diverting and interesting woman. Her tall stature, large hands, loud voice, decided opinions, and altogether daring manners, are something new in fiction, though conceivably possible in fact. There are people whose presence is like the letting in of a breath of fresh air. To listen to Miss Pembroke is like inhaling a strong breeze. She almost takes one's breath away. The other people in the book are not in any way remarkable, though together they make an excellent foil for the masterful woman in whose hands they are all puppets, to be moved about and disposed of as she pleases. One cannot but regret that Mrs. Jocelyn's talent for lively portraiture is not matched by equal skill in the handling of language, but it is sometimes well to be thankful for small mercies.

The mark of the amateur is strong in The Heirloom. It is writ large in a totally needless preface, and it obtrudes itself on almost every page in passages as deficient of sense as of grammar. Criticism in such a case is out of the question; but if any possible reader should wish to know what the book is like, the following sentence, taken at haphazard, will show him:

"Stepping through the casement of the library, a small room adjoining and leading to the sleeping apartment, and now the sick-room of his master, where he lay raving in the throes of delirium, Jules Massey stood upon a broad terrace which, overshadowed by a verandah-like roof, the ornamental iron-work supports of which, over-run with a luxuriant growth of creeping plants, formed in the summer evenings an enticing and attractive retreat, a retreat alas, which the master and owner of that house, as he lay there within on his bed of sickness seemed little likely ever again to enjoy."

Here it is the iron-work supports of the verandah-like roof that form a retreat on summer evenings; and the use of the terrace, which the author no doubt meant to indicate, is not shown.

Mrs. Parr never fails to tell a domestic story brightly and effectively. It is perhaps not a disadvantage that the end of Can This be Love? is foreseen almost from the beginning. The reader's interest is quickened rather than satisfied by his anticipation of what must happen, and he feels some gratification in finding that the story follows the course which he has marked out for it. Obviously, there is nothing unusual in a plot which dispossesses an expectant heir in favour of somebody else who expected nothing; and when the discarded heir and the substituted legatee are young man and young woman, it is the likeliest of things that they should join hands and fortunes. But between these events in the present story there is an interregnum, during which another suitor—who is the first and for the time being the only one—turns up, and the girl is surrounded by new conditions, which appear to leave her little freedom of choice. It is this period which gives point to the title of the story. Although there is never any doubt as to what the outcome will be, Mrs. Parr elaborates for us some very striking episodes, the interest of which is well-sustained throughout.

December Roses is a slight story, with a familiar motive; but the story is prettily told, and there is a pleasant freshness about some of the people. One feels, however, that Violet's renunciation is made a little morbid by her religious scruples, and that Eleanor needlessly delayed and imperilled a union which she had at last every reason to welcome.

Sketches of village life are not uncommon, but their frequency is a proof of the interest which belongs to things rural. Mr. Fergusson's My Village consists of a series of short descriptions of rustic people and their ways, with a vaguely indicated locality for background. Though no more than average merit can be claimed for the book, it is worth reading.

GEORGE COTTERELL.

SOME HISTORICAL BOOKS.

"A HISTORY OF NORTHUMBERLAND." Vol. I. The Parish of Bamburgh. By Edward Bateson. (Newcastle-upon-Tyne: Andrew Reid.) This is the first volume of a complete history of Northumberland, which has been undertaken by a local committee, with Dr. Thomas Hodgkin as its guiding spirit. The leading idea is to follow the lines laid down by the late John Hodgson, in the great work which he was compelled to leave unfinished. The MS. materials that he collected have been placed, by his grandson, at the disposal of the committee; and valuable assistance has also been rendered by the Duke of Northumberland, and by the learned antiquaries in which our northernmost county has always been so prolific. It was decided to commence with Bamburghshire, a district left untouched by Hodgson. The choice was otherwise a happy one; for it has given the opportunity to introduce a full description of the noble castle of Bamburgh, something about Dorothy Forster and Lord Crewe, and the name of Grace Darling. The plan of the work is on so grand a scale that the present volume, of more than 450 quarto pages, deals only with two parishes—Bamburgh itself and the adjoining chapelry of Belford. At this rate, we should be afraid to calculate how many volumes will be required for the whole county. But there can be no doubt that this first instalment is not only a most attractive book, but also an excellent example of modern research. The chief interest, of course, centres round the castle of Bamburgh and the church of St. Aidan, of both of which we have full architectural and historical details; but each little township is described with equal care and accuracy, very often from unpublished materials. The author deserves special praise, both for his method of arrangement and for the sobriety of his style. A prominent feature of the work are the illustrations. These include photogravure plates, facsimiles of old maps and drawings, and numerous woodcuts scattered throughout the text. The plans of prehistoric camps are specially valuable. We observe that the photogravures have been executed in Austria; the rest of the work reflects the utmost credit upon the local printer.

History of the Town of Wrexham: its Houses, Streets, Fields, and Old Families. By A. F. Palmer. (Wrexham: Woodall.) Topographical literature can hardly comprise a more exhaustive history of any place than that which the indefatigable Mr. Palmer is, by instalments, giving to the world. The present is the fourth volume which he has been able to fill with matters of more or less interest connected with the town of Wrexham; and it is not the last. Mr. Palmer's mode of treatment is peculiar, and scarcely admits of any event, however trivial, or any family, however unimportant, being passed over. Of course this is gratifying to local pride and local curiosity, and, in a degree, is certainly useful; but it may be questioned whether "history" be the right term to apply to such "a chronicle of small beer." We do not mean by this to disparage Mr. Palmer's labours—indeed, they fill us with increasing wonder, the more we see of them; but is it worth while to trace the ownership of every house in the town and to record, e.g. such facts as that the first house on the right-hand side of Queen-street was "occupied in 1715 by Mr. Thomas Robinson, joiner, who was succeeded by his son, Mr. John Robinson, and that about 1766 Mr. Isaac Smith came to live here and bought the house, but ultimately went to live at Croes Newydd, where he died December, 1777," and so forth? We can imagine some American genealogists, who are ever in quest of all that relates to the lineage of undistinguished emigrants; revelling in these minute particulars; but to the bulk of readers they are decidedly tedious reading. The book, however, contains other matters of more general interest. The extracts from the Parish Registers—they begin in June, 1618—supply some curious particulars. In 1721 was buried Robert Price alias "Tiockleme," and in 1775 John Hughes, alias Champion, whom Mr. Palmer thinks was the chief prize-fighter of the place. The baptism, in 1734, of Thomas, son of Wm. Henry, dancing master, is recorded. He settled at Manchester as a physician, and became well known as the friend of Dr. Priestley, whose marriage with Mary Wilkinson also took place at Wrexham. Of greater interest is the notice of Mary Evans, daughter of Mr. Hugh Evans, surgeon, who, as Mr. Palmer thinks, may be identified with Coleridge's early love. She was born in 1763; and it was in 1794 that Samuel Taylor Coleridge visited the town, and while standing at the window of the inn, saw, to his utter astonishment, Mary Evans—"quam afflictum et perditum amabam, yea, even to anguish"—pass by. The poet adds, "I sickened and well nigh fainted, but instantly retired. Had I appeared to recognise her, my fortitude would not have supported me." The letter from which these extracts are taken has, we presume, been already published.

Scrivelsby, the Home of the Champions. Illustrated. By the Rev. Samuel Lodge. (Elliot Stock.) The rector of Scrivelsby is not only interested in the annals of his parish, but holds the very proper opinion that others should have the benefit of the knowledge which he has acquired. Accordingly, he has, with infinite pains and at no small cost (for the book is beautifully got up), written and published a very complete history of the village and manor, and of the singular privilege which the possession of the latter confers on its owner. For the championship—like other forms of feudal tenure—is attached to the manor, not to the family; and if, as is the case with Scrivelsby, it has happened to be an hereditary honour, that has arisen from the simple fact that the Dymokes inherited the manor from the Marmions, the earlier grantees, because they were next of kin, and from that day to this have held it and the appendant honour uninterruptedly. Sir John Dymoke, who got Scrivelsby through his marriage with the youngest daughter and co-heir of Sir Philip Marmion, was accepted as the king's champion at the coronation of Richard II. His lineal descendant, Henry Dymoke, enjoyed the same honour when George the Fourth was crowned. Since then, either from a profounder belief in the royal title, or from motives of parsimony (for the champion was entitled to a gold cup and cover as his fee), the lord of Scrivelsby has not been called upon to discharge his service. Everything that in any way relates to the championship or to Scrivelsby has been carefully collected by Mr. Lodge, who writes with all modesty and yet at the same time with genuine enthusiasm. It is pleasant to find such a man writing that, "although the village is one of the smallest in the county, it is far from being dull or unattractive." We hope on this point (as well as in other matters) the parson and the parishioners are of one mind.

The Martial Annals of the City of York. By the Rev. Caesar Caine. (York: Sampson; London: C. J. Clark.) In an imposing volume—appropriately bound in scarlet cloth—Mr. Caine recounts the various military incidents with which, from the occupation of the Romans to the present time, York has been connected. The work has evidently been to the author a labour of love. He has fully realised the fact that the importance of the Northern city has all along been due to its military character. York has never been a commercial or manufacturing centre; and, in spite of its easy access to the sea, it is insignificant as a port. Mr. Caine has rightly devoted much attention to Roman York. He has had the advantage of being able to make use of the researches of those who have made this period of the city's history their particular study, but he is not a servile follower of other antiquaries. He ventures to differ from Canon Raine as to the fate of the Ninth Legion, whose quarters were at York. They disappear from the roll call of the Legions, but the cause of their disappearance is wrapt in obscurity. Canon Raine suggests that they may have shown cowardice in battle, and in consequence been doomed to military extinction and prohibited from serving in the field. Mr. Caine prefers to think that the Ninth Legion became incorporated with the Sixth, and that the title of Victrix was, after that circumstance, borne in common by both. He says that bricks have been found bearing the stamp LEG. IX. VIC., but this seems a slender basis on which to build his theory. The later chapters of the book contain some stirring narratives of battles fought within sight of the Minster towers: Stamford Bridge and the Battle of the Standard and, later on, Marston Moor. Mr. Caine has illustrated his volume with engravings drawn from various sources, and with sketches and photographs made by himself, and has thereby greatly added to the interest and value of his work.

We can commend, without any reservation, Mr. Philip Norman's studies on London Signs and Inscriptions (Elliot Stock), the new volume in the series of the "Camden Library." He is both an antiquary and an artist, and the last quality stands him in good stead in a treatise dealing with architectural decorations. Perhaps the best known of these city relics of antiquity is the naked boy in Panyer Alley, whose figure is supposed to represent the highest ground within the London gates. Another well-established favourite is the child, now, alas! clipped of his wings, which remained down to 1816, at Pie Corner, commemorative of the Fire of London, "occasioned," so ran the awful warning, "by the sin of Gluttony." Round these, and a host of other curious vestiges of the past, Mr. Norman has woven, from his protracted studies in this branch of antiquity, an infinite variety of felicitous illustration. With the mansions of the city he is well acquainted, and for ourselves, who remember many pleasant school-boy hours spent in the Drapers' gardens, with its fig and mulberry trees, we heartily sympathise with him in his lamentation over the loss of these open spaces in the city. Was it not said of Tom Fuller that he displayed the powers of his memory in repeating the signs from Temple Bar to the Exchange? This anecdote is almost the sole item of information that we have failed to find in this volume. Mr. Norman will be grateful to us for pointing out that the date of 1835 on p. 190 must be a misprint, and that Haydon, the artist, is not usually referred to as "Robert Haydon."

NOTES AND NEWS.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & Co. have in the press two volumes of The Letters of Harriet Countess Granville, 1810-1845, edited by her son, the Hon. F. Leveson Gower.

THE translation of the Slavonic Versions of the Book of Enoch by Mr. Morfill, announced for early publication by the Clarendon Press, will be delayed in its appearance, owing to the discovery of fresh Slavonic MSS. embodying a purer text and containing additional material. These MSS. have been found by Prof. Sokolov, of Moscow, who has most generously placed them at the service of Mr. Morfill.

UNDER the title of My Dark Companions and Their Strange Stories, Mr. H. M. Stanley will issue shortly, through Messrs. Sampson Low, a collection of legends that he has himself heard round the camp-fire during his seventeen years of travel in Africa. Most of them, it is interesting to the folk-lorist to know, describe the adventures of animals. The book will have more than sixty illustrations by Mr. Walter W. Buckley.

MESSRS. W. BLACKWOOD & SONS will publish in a few days the narrative of A Journey through the Yemen, with some general remarks upon that country, by Mr. Walter B. Harris, author of "Travels in Morocco," illustrated with three maps and engravings from his own sketches and photographs.

MESSRS. RICHARD BENTLEY & SON will publish shortly Women of Letters, in two volumes, by Gertrude Townshend Mayer. The work includes memoirs—of which we believe that some anticipations have already appeared in Temple Bar—of Lady Morgan, the Misses Berry, Mary Wollstonecroft Shelley, Lady Ann Barnard, Mrs. Opie, Sarah Countess Cowper, and Lady Duff Gordon.

ANOTHER interesting volume of Literary Recollections will be those of Mr. F. Espinasse, who is perhaps best known by his painstaking study of Voltaire. He was a prominent writer on the Critic forty years ago, and lived on terms of intimacy with Mr. and Mrs. Carlyle. The book will be published very soon by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton.

MESSRS. CHAPMAN & HALL announce Germany and the Germans, in two volumes, by Mr. William Harbutt Dawson, author of "German Socialism and Ferdinand Lassalle," and "Prince Bismarck and State Socialism." The book will deal with the social life, the culture, the religions, the politics and parties, and the Socialist movement, as well as with the great figures of the last thirty years of German history.

MESSRS. W. H. ALLEN & Co. will publish next week Sir Edwin Arnold's Book of Good Counsels, from the Sanskrit of the Hitopadesa, with illustrations by Mr. Gordon Browne.

MR. ARTHUR LILLIE has just sent to press with Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein & Co. a new book for immediate publication, under the title of Modern Mystics and Modern Magic, containing a full biography of the Rev. W. Stainton Moses, together with sketches of Swedenborg, Boehme, Mme. Guyon, the Illuminati, the Kabbalists, the Theosophists, the French Spiritists, the Society of Psychical Research, &c.

AMONG Messrs. Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner & Co.'s announcements for immediate publication are The Life of Mr. Gladstone, compiled from his speeches and public letters by Mr. H. J. Leech; and Tennyson: Poet, Philosopher, and Idealist, being studies of his life, work, and teaching, by Mr. J. Cuming Walters, illustrated with a portrait.

THE next volumes in Messrs. Bell's reissue of the Aldine Poets will contain the Poetical Works of Samuel Butler, edited by Mr. Brimley Johnson. The text of "Hudibras" has been thoroughly revised and reprinted for the first time from the last editions published during the author's life, while all the various readings of the earlier editions are also supplied by means of footnotes. A few poems, partly from MSS. in the British Museum, have been added to the edition known as Genuine Remains of Butler. Mr. Johnson has also written a new Life, which contains, in addition to a formal bibliography, special notices of the various illustrations and imitations of Hudibras which have been published at different times, together with some account of the authors from whom Butler is supposed to have borrowed, and several lists of the references to his life and work which are scattered throughout English literature.

THE same publishers will bring out next week a new volume of Lyrics and Elegiacs, by the Rev. Marcus S. C. Rickards, author of "Creation's Hope," and "Songs of Universal Life."

THE date fixed by Messrs. Cassell & Co. for the publication of the first volume of Social England, edited by Mr. H. D. Traill, is October 28. The contributors to this volume include Prof. F. W. Maitland, F. York Powell, R. L. Poole, A. L. Smith, C. Oman, F. T. Richards, O. M. Edwards, Dr. C. Creighton, W. Laird Clowes, Colonel Cooper King, and Hubert Hall.

MR. STEELE, editor of Lydgate's translation of Secreta Secretorum, and of Mediaeval Lore, is engaged with Mr. W. Marsh, late scholar of Hertford, on an elementary Latin reading book, drawn from the Chroniclers. It will be published early in January by Messrs. Rivington, Percival & Co.

Links in a Chain, by Mr. J. M. Cowan, is the title of a work on Purpose in Life, announced by Mr. Elliot Stock for immediate publication.

THE volume of stories by the Rev. Dr. Barry, to be published by the Catholic Truth Society, will be called A Place of Dreams, the proposed title, "A House of Shadows," having been anticipated.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. are about to publish a cheap edition of Helen Treveryan, by "John Roy." The title page now bears the name of Sir Mortimer Durand. The authorship was not avowed in previous editions.

THE second edition of Volume I. of Mr. Henry Dunning MacLeod's Theory of Credit will be published by Messrs. Longmans next week.

A MEMORIAL to Drummond, of Hawthornden, is to be placed over his grave at Lasswade to-day (Saturday). It consists of a medallion portrait, with the arms of his family, and the epitaph which he wrote for himself in 1640:

"Here Damon lies, whose songs did sometime grace
The murmuring Esk. May roses shade the place!"

MESSRS. SOTHEYBY will commence their season next Thursday with the sale of the library of the Rev. E. Moore, late rector of Boughton Malherbe, in Kent. It is the library of a scholar rather than of a collector, consisting of standard English authors and old-fashioned editions of the classics; Bibles and prayer books are also well represented. We notice the Aldine Euripides, Pine's Horace, Coryat's Crudities (1611), Hasted's History of Kent, and Yarrell's Birds.

THE opening lecture of the Sunday Lecture Society will be given at St. George's Hall, on October 22, by Sir James Crichton Browne, on "Brain Rest." The other lecturers in the first series will be Prince Kropotkin, Mr. R. W. Frazer, Dr. Gerard Smith, Mr. E. L. S. Horsburgh, Dr. Bowdler Sharpe, and Dr. Andrew Wilson.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

MR. J. A. FROUDE is lecturing at Oxford this term, in his private house, upon "The Life and Letters of Erasmus."

PROF. EDWARD DOWDEN, of Dublin, the new Clark lecturer in English literature at Cambridge, will deliver a course of six lectures during October. The inaugural lecture, to be given on Thursday of this week, was to deal with various points connected with the study of English literature. The subjects of the others are: "The Sentimental Movement: Richardson, Sterne, Mackenzie, Cowper;" "The Romantic Movement: Walpole, Percy, Mrs. Radcliffe;" "The Celtic Revival: Ossian, Welsh (Evans); and the Scandinavian Revival: Gray, Percy;" "Naturalism as Opposed to Romance: Fielding, Crabbe;" "The Political Movement: Burke, Godwin, Paine."

AMONG those who had announced their intention of being present at the opening of Manchester College, Oxford, on Wednesday of this week, were the following: the Principal of Brasenose, the Rector of Exeter, the Warden of Merton, the Provost of Oriel, the Warden of Wadham, Profs. Cheyne, Clifton, Dicey, Edgeworth, Froude, Green, Legge, Margoliouth, Max Müller, Pelham, Rhys, Sanday, Burdon Sanderson, Sayce, Wallace, Cook Wilson, Bodley's Librarian, and the Curator of the University Museum. It is proposed to publish a full report of the proceedings in a memorial volume.

THE new building for the department of human anatomy, in connexion with the Museum at Oxford, was formally opened by the Vice-Chancellor on October 14, when representatives of the medical schools in all parts of the country were present.

THE research fellowship at Lincoln College, Oxford, has been filled up by the election of Mr. Walter Garstang, who was for some time naturalist on the staff of the Biological Laboratory at Plymouth. We understand that the candidates were so numerous, in all departments of study, that it would not have been difficult to select a dozen as fully worthy of the appointment.

DR. J. H. MIDDLETON, though still lecturing this term at Cambridge as Slade professor of fine art, has resigned the office of director of the Fitzwilliam Museum, in view of his appointment as head of the art department at South Kensington.

MR. H. YULE, Oldham, the new lecturer in geography at Cambridge, will deliver his inaugural lecture next Tuesday, on "The Progress of Geographical Discovery." He also proposes to give a course of lectures during the present term, on "The Principles of Physical Geography."

No less than five courses of lectures on subjects connected with classical archaeology are being given at Oxford this term. Prof. Percy Gardner is himself lecturing on "Greek Sculpture, B.C. 400-320," and on "Greek Numismatics"; while he has also arranged for courses on "Types of Greek Deities in Art," by Mr. L. R. Farnell, on "Ancient Authorities on Sculpture," by Mr. H. Stuart Jones, and on "Latin Inscriptions," by Mr. F. Haverfield.

THE Oxford Magazine for October 17 prints a list of freshmen, with the schools from which they have come. The following is the numerical order of the colleges here given: Christ Church (57), New College (51), Trinity (48), Keble (46), Balliol (37), University (35), Magdalen (32), Merton (29), Exeter (26), Brasenose (24), Wadham (23), Oriel and Worcester (22), Jesus (20, including four of the name of Evans), Hertford and Queens (19), Corpus (18), Pembroke (14). From the Oxford University Gazette we gather that the non-collegiate freshmen number 51. Among the former places of education, we notice Bombay, Paramatta, Christ Church (New Zealand), Windsor (Nova Scotia), Demerara, Pietermaritzburg, Paris, Berlin, and Vienna; there are also two Mahomedans, from Rugby.

THE following have been elected to honorary fellowships at St. John's College, Oxford: the Bishops of Cape Town and Colombo, and Sir Charles Euan Smith.

OF the recent list of Queen's Scholars, it is stated that six are going to Cambridge and five to Oxford, to attend the newly founded Day Training Colleges.

WE regret to learn that there has been no election to the Shute scholarship, founded by the widow of Richard Shute for non-collegiate students at Oxford.

IT is announced that the Marquis of Bute will deliver his inaugural address as rector of St. Andrews University about the middle of next month, on which occasion the honorary degree of LL.D. will be conferred on several distinguished persons, including the Marquis of Salisbury and Mr. Gladstone.

THE committee of the Indian National Association have published (Archibald Constable) a carefully revised edition of their Handbook of Information relating to University and Professional Studies, &c., for Indian students in the United Kingdom. We observe that the expenses, at both Oxford and Cambridge, are put down at from £250 to £300 a year, which certainly does not err on the side of excess, even if the cost of living during the vacations be included. It is pointed out that a student of an affiliated college might take his degree within two years, though we are not aware that this has ever been accomplished.

TWO SONNETS OF ANTHERO DE QUENTAL.

I.

TO GERMANO MEYRELLES.

Evils alone are real, but grief exists,
And joys are only born of phantasy;
Of nothing but a dream our good consists,
Each moment, hour, and day is misery.

If we search for what is, what ought to be
By Nature's law in smallest way assists;
Save sadness, there remains no remedy
For him who to a mindborn good e'er lists!

Oh, that we had the power to pass through Life in a dream, nought seeing, sure 'twere best!

But 'twould be labour lost, 'mid the unseen!

Oh, that we might by luck lose memory too! . . .
E'en then our ills would not be lulled to rest,
For to have lived the worst has ever been!

II.

QUILA AETERNUS

(To Joaquim de Araujo.)

Thou hast not died, though vain philosophy
And proud proclaims the fact to all mankind. . .
The yoke and reins of heavenly tyranny
Are not thus straight and easy to unbind!

In vain they cry, for this great victory
Reason with which is drunken—poor and blind!—
Of thy eternal, tragic irony
Is but a novel form, and more unkind.

Spectre, thou hast not died! Thought, as before,
Must face thee, thou'rt the torment, as of yore,
Of all who over books pore year by year.

And those who love debauchery, alas!
How oft it haps that as they raise the glass,
They pause, and trembling, pallid grow with fear!

EDGAR PRESTAGE.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE opening paper in the July-September number of the Boletín of the Real Academia de la Historia is on Arabic books printed at Tunis, by F. Codera; but the bulk of the number, pp. 67-240, is occupied with memoirs, by Padre Fita, of Dr. Juan de Jasso, the father of St. Francis Xavier. The documents here first printed throw light not only on his family, but on the history of Navarre. Juan de Jasso stood high in the favour of the sovereigns of Navarre, and the family possessions were great on both sides of the Pyrenees. The contempt of the Doctor of Civil Law in Bologna and Salamanca for "Aquellos Fueros de oscura interpretación, y quisiéramos ó puntillosas costumbres" is amusingly shown. He believes that his tenants are "inductor por el espíritu maligno," not fearing either God or justice, when they oppose his violation of their fueros; but, as Padre Fita remarks, such an attitude on the part of the court may partly explain the easy conquest of Spanish Navarre by Ferdinand. The family of Xavier remained faithful to Catherine and Jean d'Albert. There is a full account of the coronation of these sovereigns, and of the regal and popular oaths sworn at Pamplona in 1494. The lengthy will of Doña Gilberma de Atondo, the grandmother of Xavier, is full of points of interest. We learn that the early form of Xavier was Exabier, perhaps = Etcheberri = Newhouse; and that Basque was spoken and Basque customs observed in the fifteenth century in districts whence they have since retreated. The last article is a well-illustrated account by Eduardo Capelle of the exploration of a cave at Cabeza del Griego, the ancient Soetobriga. Remains of two distinct races of men were found; also much pottery, arms, and utensils of stone, bone, and copper, from the neolithic to the age of early bronze. The site is evidently one of great value to the explorer.

NOTES ON TWO RECENT EDITIONS OF WORDSWORTH.

III.

Dublin.

Hitherto we have been engaged in the distasteful but not unnecessary task of exhibiting the innumerable flaws which disfigure or, to speak more accurately, altogether defeat and destroy, Prof. Knight's editorial workmanship. Our task to-day is the more congenial one of reviewing Prof. Dowden's recently published (Aldine) edition of the Poems, a work the merits of which, although

* We may state here that, besides the ordinary edition at the low price of 2s. 6d. a volume, Messrs. George Bell & Sons have just issued a large paper edition, printed on hand-made paper and elegantly bound, which is limited to 150 numbered copies. The price of this is £1 15s. net for the seven volumes, or precisely double that of the other. So far as we have noticed, the only change made is the inclusion, on a fly-leaf, of some dedicatory lines of blank verse, beginning:

"If thou indeed derive thy light from Heaven,
Then, to the measure of that heaven-born light,
Shine, Poet! in thy place, and be content."

[ED. ACADEMY.]

ey have no doubt received a general acknowledgment from more than one critic, and not hitherto been particularly described or analysed by any.

To many persons it appears to be a matter of considerable surprise that there should have been, within so short an interval after the publication of Prof. Knight's seemingly exhaustive edition, any call or even any room for another annotated edition of Wordsworth's poems. But over and above the facts that the price fixed upon Prof. Knight's volumes was such as to render them a forbidden luxury to the multitude, and that it needs but a cursory examination of his notes to convince even the most lenient judge of their faulty and inadequate character, there exists an amply sufficient raison d'être for the new edition in the circumstance—due to a combination of causes which we cannot now wait to consider—that within the last fourteen years (for it is, we believe, from the first appearance of Matthew Arnold's Volume of Selections) there has sprung up into vigorously active existence an indubitable Wordsworth "boom," not unlike in kind, though inferior in degree of intensity, to the earlier boom which lasted throughout the third decade of the century. Let us be thankful that Prof. Dowden was induced to take in hand the work he has just carried to a successful conclusion, at a season when the tide of Wordsworth's popularity—if, indeed, the qualified acceptance which the poet now finds among us may be so described—was still at the flow; and let us hope that the Aldine edition of the poems may be widely circulated and earnestly studied before the inevitable reactionary ebb sets in, and Wordsworth is once more consigned to a dusty shelf.

I. THE ARRANGEMENT OF THE POEMS.—And now to our task. At the outset we may notice the admirably sound sense which Prof. Dowden has brought to bear upon the vexed question of the arrangement of the poems. This question is discussed in the opening paragraphs of the short Preface, every page of which bears unmistakable traces of ample deliberation and solid judgment. Briefly but lucidly, Prof. Dowden sums up the several considerations which have determined him to adhere to the familiar psychological arrangement—into Poems of the Affections, Poems of the Fancy, Poems of the Imagination, &c.—originally (1812) contrived and ever afterwards unswervingly maintained by the poet himself. Prof. Dowden commences by quoting a passage from the Preface to "The Excursion," in which Wordsworth explains that the effect of his proposed scheme of arrangement, when duly placed before the public, will be to exhibit the subordinate relation of the minor poems, as of "little cells, oratories, and sepulchral recesses," to the main body of that sacred edifice, "The Recluse." He next points out how great was the importance attached by the poet himself to that arrangement; and how much of his mind, during a long series of years, went into it. And then, having thus indicated one at least of the purposes of the scheme—its importance in the eyes of its author, and its value as a characteristic product of his intellect—he goes on to notice the circumstance "that the order of the poems, within each group, is Wordsworth's order, and that it was carefully considered with a view to artistic effect." Quoting from a place in the Apology which closes the "Yarrow Revisited" series, where Wordsworth says: "the several Lays have moved in order, to each other bound by a continuous and acknowledged tie. Though unapparent," he observes that these words are true of other groups beside "Yarrow Revisited"; and, by way of illustration, he traces as follows the chain that links together the series of "Poems founded on the Affections":

"Poems which treat of the fraternal affection (the love of brother and brother, and of brother and sister) are succeeded by poems dealing with the love of man and maid, poems of wedded love, poems of parental love, its joys and sorrows. The chronology here is the chronology of human life from childhood to adult years."

Glancing at the proposed scheme of arrangement according to date, Prof. Dowden fully admits the value of the chronological method in the study of the poems, but rejects it as a basis of arrangement for a new collective edition, on the grounds that it can only be imperfectly made out, and that it was regarded by the poet with the very strongest disapproval. "Though I believe the chronological study to be highly interesting and very fruitful, I should not willingly adopt an arrangement far from well-established in many instances, and pronounced by Wordsworth himself 'the worst possible.'" Prof. Dowden therefore adheres to the poet's own system of arrangement; adding, for the use of the student, a chronological table as full and as precise as the present condition of our knowledge allows.

The account here given by Prof. Dowden of the motives which led Wordsworth to devise his familiar scheme of arrangement for the poems is, of course, so far as it goes, quite accurate; but it falls short, we venture to think, of being absolutely complete. It is undoubtedly true, but, perhaps, not the whole truth. No doubt in contriving this scheme Wordsworth aimed at bringing into clearer light the subordinate relation of his minor poems to his longer and, as he thought, more important work. But, apparently, this was not his sole aim; nor was it, perhaps, even his principal aim. The new scheme was meant to serve not only as a regulating and connecting link binding the several groups of out-buildings, each in its proper place, to the main edifice of "The Recluse," but also (if we are not mistaken) as a carefully-graduated scale by means of which the mutual relations of these several groups might be readily ascertained, and their relative value and importance determined. This, is, we think, clearly shown by the following passage, taken from Crabb Robinson's Diary (date May 31, 1812):—

"At Hammond's I found Wordsworth demonstrating to H. some of the points of his philosophical theory. . . . W. said he himself looked to the powers of the mind his poems call forth, and the energies they presuppose and excite, as the standard by which they are to be estimated. W. proposes . . . to reprint the four volumes, arranging the poems with some reference either to the fancy, imagination, reflection, or mere feeling contained in them. 'The Kitten and the Falling Leaves' he speaks of as merely fanciful; 'The Highland Girl,' one of the highest kind, being imaginative; 'The Happy Warrior' as appertaining to reflection."

From this account of Crabb Robinson's we gather the following facts: First, that the notion of a psychological classification of the poems had been slowly maturing in Wordsworth's mind during a period of several years, prior to its actual adoption for the first time in 1815; secondly, that he had—doubtless, on more than one occasion—discussed its merits and demerits with his friends; thirdly, that amongst the motives that led Wordsworth to devise this scheme, we must include the desire to exhibit his minor poems arranged according to a regularly ascending scale of relative value and importance.

Thus, the Poems of the Fancy, in the edition of 1815, follow immediately after the Poems founded on the Affections, because the mental function of which they are the outcome is, in virtue of its active character, superior to the whole tribe of the merely passive affections; while, on the other hand, they are themselves followed by the Poems of the Imagination, because the fancy, being merely "a mode of memory emancipated from the order of time and space," is of less account than the imagination, which is an "echo in the finite mind of the eternal act of creation in the infinite I AM" (Biogr. Literaria, chap. xiii.). Again, the Poems proceeding from Sentiment and Reflection are placed next after the Poems of the Imagination, because both sentiment and reflection must be reckoned, in virtue of their highly complex and derivative character, as standing higher, among the many modes of mental activity, than the imagination, which is a simple and primary function of the mind.

"It is not enough," says Wordsworth himself (Knight's Life, vol. ii., App. i., p. 328), "for a poet to possess power of mind. [e.g. fancy, imagination, etc.], he must also have knowledge of the heart [i.e., sentiment, and reflection], and this can only be gained by time and tranquil leisure. No great poem has been written by a young man, or by an unhappy one. It was dear Coleridge's constant infelicity that prevented him from being the poet that Nature had given him the power to be. He had always too much personal and domestic discontent to paint the sorrows of mankind. . . . I gave him the subject of 'The Three Graves,' but he made it too shocking and painful, and not sufficiently softened by any healing views."

That is to say, Coleridge, while he was endowed beyond almost all other poets with the sovereign gift of imagination, nevertheless failed, as a poet, for lack of the two indispensable faculties of sentiment and reflection. It is evident, then—to return to the main point of our argument—that the scheme of arrangement adopted in the edition of 1815, and jealously maintained in all subsequent editions issued during the lifetime of the poet, is, in effect, what its author designed it to be: viz., a regularly ascending scale, serving to indicate Wordsworth's own views regarding the relative importance of the several groups of poems, and comprising the following four distinct grades—Poems founded on the Affections (the lowest grade), Poems of the Fancy, Poems of the Imagination, and Poems proceeding from Sentiment and Reflection.

Strangely enough, there is one consideration which might fairly be expected to count for something in the discussion that has been going on for so long a time regarding the arrangement of the poems, and which yet appears to have been overlooked by most, if not by all, of the disputants on both sides. The consideration to which we refer arises

* Some persons will doubtless find it hard to believe that Wordsworth, of all men, ranked poems of the fancy higher than poems of the affections; but that this was a fixed principle with him in 1815—the year in which the psychological scheme of arrangement was first made public—is placed beyond doubt by Crabb Robinson, who writes (Diary, May 9, 1815):—"Wordsworth. . . . has a pride in deriving no aid from his subject. It is the mere power, which he is conscious of exerting, in which he delights; not the production of a work in which men rejoice on account of the sympathies and sensibilities it excites in them. Hence he does not much esteem his 'Laodamia,' as it belongs to the inferior class of poems founded on the affections."

Before 1827, however, the poet had changed his opinion of "Laodamia," and had—a notable point this, when viewed in connexion with his altered estimate of the poem—transferred it from its original place, to its present position among the poems of the imagination. To Mrs. A. Watts he spoke of "Lycidas" and "Laodamia" as "twin immortals." This was in 1824 or 1825.

from the fact that the psychological scheme of arrangement which is so closely identified with the poet was not by him designed to embrace the entire body of the shorter pieces, but was rather altogether restricted to the second of the three great sections into which he divided the main bulk of his verses. As he carefully explains in the Preface to his edition of 1815, this tripartite division of his work was made for two reasons: (1) in order that the work might exhibit the three requisites of a legitimate whole, a beginning, a middle, and an end; and (2) in order that it might more obviously correspond with the course of human life from childhood, through middle age, to old age, death, and immortality. The first section contains (1) the Poems referring to the Period of Childhood, and (2) the Juvenile Pieces (which, however, are in this edition represented by a few brief extracts only); the last includes (1) the Poems referring to the Period of Old Age, (2) the Epitaphs and Elegiac Pieces, and (3) the Ode on the Intimations of Immortality from Recollections of Early Childhood: to neither of these two sections has the poet applied his long-pondered psychological scheme of arrangement. It is only to the second of the three sections—the Poems of Maturity or Middle Age—that the scheme is extended. Nay, of the Poems of Maturity, it is only to those of lyrical form that this system of classification is adjusted by its author, who adopts a totally different system of arrangement—that based upon the mould or form in which the poem is cast—for the pieces which belong to the class designated by him the Idyllium: namely, the Sonnets, the Inscriptions, and the Poems on the Naming of Places. Surely, then, it is scarcely worth while to devote so much energy as some critics have given to the exposing of the weaknesses and the drawbacks of Wordsworth's cherished plan of arrangement, when this plan was not designed or employed to embrace the entire body of the Minor Poems, but was, in fact, intended by him to be applied merely to a portion of one of the three main subdivisions of that body.*

* Thus, we see that the arrangement of the material in the edition of 1815 is very far from being of a simple or homogeneous character. It is, on the contrary, a highly complex affair, in the carrying out of which not less than four distinct principles of arrangement are called into requisition. The entire system of classification and arrangement may be thus briefly summarised:—The main body of the work is subdivided into three sections—(I.) Poems of Childhood or Immaturity, (II.) Poems of Middle Age or Maturity, and (III.) Poems of Old Age or Decay, Death, and Immortality. I. The Poems of Childhood embrace two subdivisions—(a) those referring to Childhood and (b) those written in Youth; II. The Poems of Maturity comprise (a) Poems of the “Idyllium” mould, subdivided into (1) Sonnets, (2) Inscriptions, and (3) Poems on the Naming of Places; and (b) poems of the Lyrical mould, subdivided—and here the psychological scheme comes in for the first time—into (1) Poems of the Affections, (2) Poems of the Fancy, (3) Poems of the Imagination, and (4) Poems proceeding from Sentiment and Reflection. The Sonnets are further subdivided, according to theme, into (1) Miscellaneous Sonnets and (2) Sonnets dedicated to National Independence and Liberty. III. The poems of the third section are divided, also according to theme, into (1) Poems referring to the Period of Old Age, (2) Epitaphs and Elegiac Poems (i.e., poems referring to death), and (3), lastly, the great Ode on the Intimations of Immortality. In this most elaborate scheme of arrangement we find the following four principles of subdivision employed:—Classification (1) according to the mould or form in which the poem is cast, (2) according to the subject or theme to which it relates, (3) with reference to the powers of mind predominant in its production, and (4), lastly, subdivision into the three necessary parts of a legitimate whole—namely (a), a beginning, (b) a middle, and (c) an end.

II. THE TEXT.—Those who hold that the chronological order of the poems is the fittest basis for their arrangement in the collective editions of the present day allege, as the ground of their opinion, the fact that nothing can show us the growth of a poet's mind, and the progressive development of his imaginative power, so well as the study of his writings in the order of their composition. This is Prof. Knight's oft-repeated statement:—

“The special idea of this edition,” he says (Preface to Poetical Works, p. xx.), “is to give a genetic view of the poet's mind, and of the development of his genius.” “It seems desirable to adopt the chronological arrangement in this particular edition, in which an attempt is made to trace the growth of Wordsworth's mind as unfolded in his works” (ib. p. xii.). “In an edition, such as the present, which is meant to supply material for the study of the poet to those who may not possess or have access to the earlier and rarer editions, no method of arrangement can be so good as the chronological” (ib. p. xii.).

But Prof. Knight appears strangely forgetful or ignorant of the fact that, in order to attain full insight into this deeply interesting subject of the poet's mental growth and development, it is not enough that his poems be studied in their chronological order: they must also be studied in the version or text in which they originally appeared. Prof. Knight might have done much towards the realisation of his cherished idea if he had but printed the poems of early years, say, from 1791 (when “Guilt and Sorrow” was begun) to the close of the decade following the first appearance of the Lyrical Ballads, in the strict order of their composition and with a text closely identical with that of the original editions. Had this been done, we should have had in our hands a most valuable and interesting document, showing the very output of the poet's mind during those early years in which his opinions regarding social and political questions were undergoing rapid modification and development, while his critical faculty was growing daily more and more fastidious and acute. The creatures of his brain during this important period of his life would stand before us in orderly array, displaying once more the striking colours and salient outlines which rendered them on their first appearance so conspicuous a mark for the shafts of ridicule. But when we turn to Prof. Knight's volumes we find that, instead of printing the early poems in the very shape and according to the very text of their first appearance, he has preferred to give them in the shape to which, after changes and modifications without number, they were finally reduced by their author in 1849. What we find in vol. i., for example, under the title of “Simon Lee,” is not what Wordsworth gave to the world in 1798 under that name. It is the result of innumerable corrections and revisions of the original poem—corrections and revisions extending from 1800 (when a second edition of the 1798 volume was issued) to 1845. And the general effect of these successive alterations is, that the colours in which the old Huntsman was originally drawn in the portrait of 1798 are considerably softened—the tone of the picture lowered—to meet the exacting demands of unsympathetic critics. Or, again, what we find in vol. ii. of Prof. Knight's edition as “Peter Bell” is not what Wordsworth wrote in the late spring or early summer of 1798—not the poem which Dorothy Wordsworth tells us in her Allfoxden Journal was begun on April 20, under the auspices of a crescent moon—not the poem which Wordsworth some two months later chanted in the grove of Allfoxden for Dorothy and Coleridge and young William Hazlitt, “announcing the fate of his hero in prophetic tones, the while his face was as a book where men might read strange matter.” It is not even what Wordsworth published in the year 1819, after keeping back the MS. for a period of nearly twenty-one years, during which interval, as he tells us, he corrected it from time to time, so as to fit it for filling permanently a station, however humble, in the literature of his country. And we know that this original edition of 1819 was a chastened and low-toned composition in comparison with the earlier forms of the story; for we learn from Crabb Robinson's Diary (June 4, 1812) that, some seven years before it was published, the poem as it then stood was enriched with a certain character yclept “Harry the Churchwarden,” who must surely have played a broadly low-comedy part in the little prelude to the story, seeing Crabb Robinson expected “to hear this same churchwarden brought up in judgment against the author.” Chastened as it doubtless was, however, in comparison with the original draft of the poem, this first edition of 1819 is loud-toned and crude enough when contrasted with the version of 1849, which is what Prof. Knight has printed in his text. In none of Wordsworth's poems has there been so much done in the way of pruning and trimming and general toning down as in this most characteristic piece of “Peter Bell.” So that to give the version of 1849 as the output of the poet's brain in 1798 is, in this instance, an exceptionally misleading and irrational course. Or, once more, what Prof. Knight gives us in vol. i. under the title, “Guilt and Sorrow,” is not what Wordsworth published in 1798 under the title of “The Female Vagrant.” The poem of 1798 consisted of but thirty stanzas; and with these, even as early as in 1800, Wordsworth had begun the usual process of revision and correction. In 1802 the poem was practically re-written, the thirty stanzas being reduced to twenty-six. A further reduction—of one stanza—was effected, along with other changes, in 1820; and in 1827 and 1836 the poem underwent several additional alterations. At length, in 1842, the twenty-five stanzas, having been subjected to no fewer than five successive rehandlings, were finally merged in the larger poem of seventy-four stanzas published by the poet in the volume entitled Poems, Chiefly of Early and Late Years. This entire poem had existed in MS. since the year 1794; but we may well assume that the portion which the poet kept back from publication for so long a time underwent at least as many revisions as the thirty stanzas given to the world in 1798. And yet it is this long poem of 666 lines that Prof. Knight prints in his first volume as the work of 1793-4, as though all the omissions, additions, and alterations were simply to count for nothing! Here is what Prof. Dowden says of these changes:—

“The portion published in 1798 was much altered in the several rehandlings. Besides the changes made by Wordsworth from the point of view of poetic art, there are others, the object of which seems to be to moderate the force of his indictment of society.”

Need we add anything more to show the absurdity of printing the altered and re-altered version of 1842 in the place which should by rights be occupied by the version prepared by the author for publication in 1798? Surely it is an act of self-stultification for an editor first of all to arrange a number of poems according to the order of their composition for the purpose of illustrating the gradual development of his author's poetic faculty, and, immediately thereupon to minimise, if not absolutely destroy, the proper effect of his arrangement, by printing the poems, not according to the original version, but according to one which was reached only after many long years of patient and elaborate revision.

Enough, and more than enough, concerning Prof. Knight's want of sound judgment as evinced in his choice of a text. Prof. Dowden could not well feel any doubt or difficulty on this point, having deferred to Wordsworth's wishes respecting the arrangement of his poems, it was scarcely possible for him to do otherwise regarding the selection of the text. Wordsworth wrote to Dyce in 1830: "You know what importance I attach to following strictly the last copy of the text of an author"; and no doubt Prof. Dowden heartily agrees with the principle laid down by Prof. Knight: "Prima facie, it seems fair that . . . every poet should have the right of saying to posterity in what form he wishes to be finally known" (Preface to Poetical Works, p. xxv.). The text of the Aldine edition, therefore, throughout follows that found in the edition of 1849-50, the last edition of the poems issued during the lifetime of the poet, departing from it only where it becomes necessary to correct a misprint which is undoubtedly such, or a word which, though not unquestionably a misprint, is yet probably one. (We had written a detailed account of two instances of the latter kind for insertion here, but our space is too limited to permit any further reference to the subject of Prof. Dowden's choice of a text. The instances to which we refer are those in "Miscellaneous Sonnets," II., xxxiv., ll. 2, 3, and in l. 1, Stanza vii. of the poem beginning, "Inmate of a Mountain Dwelling.")

T. HUTCHINSON.

THE MAN IN THE IRON MASK.

THE "Man in the Iron Mask" is always with us, but two points at least appear to be settled with regard to this ancient problem: (1) That the mask was not of iron, but of black velvet; and (2) that the wearer was not a person of very great consequence.

These points are accepted in the latest study on the subject—a work of considerable interest and importance—just published by MM. Firmin-Didot et Cie., in Paris. It is entitled Le Masque de Fer: Révélation de la Correspondance chiffrée de Louis XIV. The authors are M. Emile Burgaud and Commandant Bazeries, the latter of whom is a master of the art of deciphering. Their argument must be left to the decision of experts; and it must suffice to say that the new claimant for the distinction of the Man in the Mask is Lieutenant-General Vivien de Bulonde, who, for precipitately raising the siege of Coni in 1691, was committed prisoner to Pignerol, and thereupon disappears from history. The letter of Louvois to Catinat ordering his arrest is here printed in full as deciphered by M. Bazeries, and conveys the King's orders.

"Que vous fassiez arrester Monsieur de Bulonde et le fassiez conduire à la citadelle de Pignerol, où Sa Majesté veut qu'il soit gardé enfermé pendant la nuit dans une chambre de la dite citadelle et le jour ayant la liberté de se promener sur les remparts avec une masque."

Of the general correctness of M. Bazeries's decipherment there can be little doubt; but the interpretation of the critical figure (330) by masque seems to need confirmation. The authors point out, for the first time, that in the draft of the dispatch of Barbazieux to St. Mars of November, 1697, there is an erasure of certain words, apparently "de ce gⁿ" (= général), which have been replaced by "de ce qu'a fait votre ancien prisonnier." The suggestion is ingenious, like the remainder of the authors' case; and the reproduction of the document which is here given will enable the reader to judge of its accuracy. The book is well illustrated with facsimiles, and will commend itself to all who are interested in the "Masque de Fer." It is acute and readable, if not convincing.

SELECTED FOREIGN BOOKS.

GENERAL LITERATURE.

- FRANCE, Anatole. Les Opinions de M. Jérôme Coignard, recueillies par Jacques Tournébroche. Paris: Calmann Lévy. 3 fr. 50 c.
 LEOLEITNER, F. Der deutsche Minnesang. Wolfenbüttel: Zwisler. 10 M.
 LEFORT, Paul. Peinture espagnole. Paris: May & Motteroz. 3 fr. 50 c.
 PINGAUD, Léonce. Les Français en Russie et les Russes en France. Paris: Didier. 7 fr. 50 c.
 BASCHER, J. M. v. Der Schweizer Staat u. Frauen-Deutschland. Freistaat u. Königthum. Berlin: Puttkammer. 2 M. 50 Pf.
 STETTENEHRIM, L. Schiller's Fragment "Die Polizey". Berlin: Fontane. 1 M. 50 Pf.
 WARSBERG, A. Führ. v. E. Wallfahrt nach Dodona. Hrg. v. J. Frischaut. Graz: Leuschner. 3 M. 50 Pf.

THEOLOGY, ETC.

- SCHAEFER, A. Die Bücher des Neuen Testaments, erklärt. 5. Bd. Erklärung des Hebräerbriefes. Münster: Aschen-dorff. 5 M.

HISTORY, ETC.

- AMÉLINEAU, E. La géographie de l'Égypte à l'Époque copte. Paris: Welter. 35 fr.
 BEAUCHET, L. Loi de Vestrogothie (Westgötalagen), traduite et annotée. Paris: Larose. 13 fr.
 DEMME, L. Nachrichten u. Urkunden zur Chronik v. Hersfeld. 2. Bd. Hersfeld: Schmidt. 4 M. 50 Pf.
 HAY, E. Die alavischen Siedlungen im Königr. Sachsen m. Erklärung ihrer Namen. Dresden: Baensch. 6 M.

PHYSICAL SCIENCE.

- PAGEL, J. L. Die Areolae des Johannes de Sancto Amando (13. Jahrh.), zum 1. Male hrg. E. Beitrag zur Literaturgeschichte der Arzneimittellehre im Mittelalter. Berlin: Reimer. 2 M. 40 Pf.
 REISS, W., u. A. STÜBEL. Reisen in Südamerika. Das Hochgebirge der Republik Ecuador. I. Petrographische Untersuchgn. I. Weat-Cordillere. 2. Lfg. Berlin: Ascher. 8 M.

PHILOLOGY, ETC.

- ABHANDLUNGEN f. die Kunde d. Morgenlandes. 10 Bd. Nr. 1. Die Çukasaaptati. Textus simplicior. Hrg. v. R. Schmidt. Leipzig: Brockhaus. 9 M.
 KAIBEL, G. Stil u. Text der Πολιτεία Ἀθηναίων des Aristoteles. Berlin: Weidmann. 8 M.
 MINOR, J. Neuhochdeutsche Metrik. Ein Handbuch. Straßburg: Trübner. 10 M.
 ROBERT-TORROW, W. De apium mellisque apud veteres significatione et symbolice et mythologica. Berlin: Weidmann. 4 M.
 WILAMOWITZ-MOULLENDORFF, U. v. Aristoteles u. Athen. Berlin: Weidmann. 20 M.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE METHODS OF THE HIGHER CRITICISM.

London: Oct. 20, 1893.

Just before leaving Europe, I have had the good fortune to receive a lesson in the methods of that "higher criticism," which we poor Englishmen are told to accept humbly from the Germans.

"Scientific criticism" has long since decided that the Song of Solomon was composed several centuries after the date to which it lays claim, and one of the proofs of its lateness is found in the little word shel "of." This, it has been revealed to the critics, had no existence in Hebrew before the Exile. Three years ago, however, Dr. Chaplin, when visiting the site of Samaria, purchased a small haematite weight, which had just been found there, containing an inscription in two lines. The letters are very distinct, and were accordingly read without any difficulty by Dr. Neubauer and myself. I gave the reading in the ACADEMY, and Dr. Neubauer published his translation of it elsewhere, of which Prof. Driver has subsequently made use.

But unfortunately the word shel occurred in it, and as the letters belonged to the seventh or eighth century B.C., this was awkward for the critics. "Scientific criticism," however, soon found a way out of the difficulty. First of all, the genuineness of the object was denied; and when this argument failed, it was asserted that the reading of Dr. Neubauer and myself was wrong. Stupid Englishmen, who are not "scientific critics," might suppose that the denial and assertion were made after a careful examination of the original object. But such a proceeding is not at all in accordance with the methods of the "higher criticism," and might have inconvenient results for "scientific" theories. So an imperfectly-executed cast was obtained, and those who had seen the original were informed that the cast was much to be preferred to it. As it happens, the part of the weight where the word shel is engraved is somewhat worn, and the cast has consequently failed to reproduce all the lines of the letters.

Fortunately, the weight is in the possession of Dr. Chaplin; and as he now resides in England, those who care to do so will have little difficulty in convincing themselves that the reading of the inscription which I have given is correct.

Of course the "scientific critics" will prefer what Prof. König in his recently published Einleitung in das Alte Testament, p. 425, calls the "authenticische Nachbildung," and will maintain with him that the same text is repeated in both lines of the inscription. In this way the obnoxious shel can be got rid of, and the dogmas of the critics remain intact. Plain people like myself, however, have a foolish preference for facts.

A. H. SAYCE.

HAD POLYCARP THE GOSPEL OF PETER IN HIS HANDS?

Oxford: Oct. 14, 1893.

In the Epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians, ch. vii., we read as follows (Lightfoot's translation in Apostolic Fathers, vol. iii., p. 474):

"For everyone who shall not confess that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is Antichrist; and whosoever shall not confess the testimony of the Cross, is of the devil; and whosoever shall pervert the oracles of the Lord to his own lusts and say that there is neither resurrection nor judgment, that man is the first-born of Satan."

In regard to the second clause of the above—which runs in the Greek thus: καὶ ὅς ἂν μὴ ὁμολογῇ τὸ μαρτύριον τοῦ σταυροῦ, ἐκ τοῦ διαβόλου ἐστίν—Lightfoot says in his note:

"What is the testimony of the Cross? Is the genitive subjective or objective, the witness borne by, or the witness borne to, the Cross? Probably the former. Perhaps it refers especially to the piercing of the side and the issue of blood and water (John xix. 34), as a proof of the reality of Christ's crucified body. Polycarp's master, S. John, when he relates it, lays especial stress on the fact as a testimony: ὁ ἑωρακὸς μεμαρτύρηκεν καὶ ἀληθινὴ αὐτοῦ ἐστὶν ἡ μαρτυρία."

This explanation is not quite satisfactory, for: (1) The meaning which Lightfoot gets out of the words would be equally well expressed if the words τὸ μαρτύριον were left out and μὴ ὁμολογῇ τὸν σταυρὸν, "whosoever does not acknowledge the Cross [i.e., the reality of the crucifixion]." (2) The reality of the crucifixion is already involved in the reality of the incarnation. No one could admit that Jesus was real flesh and blood from birth without allowing that He was such on the Cross as well. Now the reality of His incarnation has been already set forth in the first clause of this passage: ὅς ἂν μὴ ὁμολογῇ Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν ἐν σαρκὶ ἀληθεύσαι, so that a second reference to it is superfluous. (3) There is no evidence that Polycarp is chiefly or exclusively combating in this passage the views of the Docetae, who held that Jesus was a phantasm all along.

I would suggest that the true explanation of the phrase τὸ μαρτύριον τοῦ σταυροῦ is supplied by the newly found Gospel of Peter, v. 10. The soldiers and their centurion and the elders behold three superhumanly tall men coming forth from the tomb, and a cross following them. "And they heard a voice from the heavens saying: Hast thou preached to the dead? and a response was heard from the cross saying: Yea. . . . This, then, was the testimony given by the cross. Its importance for the minds of the early Christians was such, that at a very early date it found its way into the Creeds. Justin Martyr writes thus (Dial. c. Tryph. 298c): καὶ κατέβη πρὸς αὐτοὺς (sc. τοὺς κοιμωμένους) εὐαγγελισθαι αὐτοὺς τὸ σωτήριον αὐτοῦ.

Polycarp therefore, in the above passage, summarises the truth as regards Jesus Christ: (a) He came in the flesh. This comprises His earthly birth, life, and death. (b) The testimony of the Cross: that is to say, that He descended into hell and preached to the dead. (γ) His resurrection. This comprises three clauses of the so-called Apostles' Creed, viz., the third day He rose again from the dead, He ascended into heaven, and sitteth on the right hand of God. (δ) The judgment: "From thence He shall come to judge the quick and the dead. . . ." Here, then, are enumerated the four great spheres of the existence and activity of Jesus: namely: the earth, hell, heaven, and the world of His Second Advent.

The Epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians was written, according to Lightfoot, A.D. 110. If, therefore, the above explanation of the phrase τὸ μαρτύριον τοῦ σταυροῦ be correct, it affords very early evidence of the diffusion of the Gospel of Peter. The λόγια τοῦ κυρίου referred to may even be the Gospel in question or some kindred document.

F. C. CONYBEARE.

A SYRIAC MS. (ADD. 17215) IN THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

Peterhouse, Cambridge: Oct. 9, 1893.

I venture to think that the enclosed translation from a Syriac MS. in the British Museum may prove interesting to some readers of the ACADEMY. Dr. Wright, in his Catalogue, assigns the MS. to the seventh century, and says that it contains a reference to the Gospel according to the Hebrews. I do not think that the reference to the apocryphal Gospel is probable; but the fragment is still interesting, from the statement attributed to Marcion that our Lord first appeared in human form between Jerusalem and Jericho. Can anyone illustrate this statement, or suggest a probable author for the fragment?

The pages of the MS. are injured, especially at the top. It is a mere fragment, bound up with other fragments. I showed it to Prof. Bensly during his last visit to the Museum. He said at once that it was "ancient," and turned from his MS. of the Peshito to read the word "nketh" (came down) for me.

W. E. BARNES.

BRITISH MUSEUM, ADD. 17215, FO. 30.

[ro] . . . Marcion* . . . said that our Lord was not born of woman, but stole the place of the Creator and came down and appeared first between Jerusalem and Jericho, like a son of man in form and in image and in likeness, yet without our body. And he in no wise brings the history of the Blessed Mary into his teaching, and does not confess that he received a body from her and appeared in flesh, as the Holy Scriptures teach.

But Mani declares the body of the family of Adam to be wholly polluted, and says that the body is of the evil essences, and of darkness and of the Serpent. In like manner did Bardaisan reckon the body to be of hyle (ἐλν), and to have been created of the dregs of wickedness, and to be polluted, and to have no resurrection.

And the Spirit, the Paraclete, considering these very teachings of the heretics who reject the * Marcion gēr ("For Marcion") is suggested by Mr. F. O. Burkitt, who has also seen the MS.

† So the late Prof. Bensly read the word for me.

human body which was created in the image and likeness of God, declared beforehand these things by means of the divine writings of Matthew and Luke, viz., the public genealogy of the Christ and his birth in flesh, which was derived from David and from Abraham who were of the race of the family of Adam.

[vo] . . . in the Scriptures of the Gospel the Apostolic voice beginneth by saying plainly that not from angels did he take, but from the seed of Abraham he took; that these good tidings which come to the children of men might be known openly, viz., that from them the Only One of God received a body. And Adam who was fallen arose, he and this fair image (i.e., the body) which was the cause of all the way of the dispensation of Messiah, as Luke testified in the Scriptures of the genealogies reckoning backwards from Joseph, legally, in that it was necessary, and truly (cināth) in that he gave to her a true hand [in marriage].

And he confirmed the writing (machtvānūth) of Matthew, which was (dahvāth) among the Hebrews, declaring that the Christ was born of David and Abraham according to the plighted promise [deposited] with them. And he carried back his reckoning to Adam, who was the image of God and the likeness of the form of His son. And he [Adam] was the drachm that was lost by the Godhead in the dark world. And [the Godhead] sought and found it by the light of the Word which came to be revealed in the flesh, as it is written, Thy word is a lamp to my feet and a light to my paths. For He is the Son, the Word, the Lamp, the Light, and by His revelation he gave light to Adam, who was dark by reason of his transgression of the commandments, as it is said, The Lord my God shall lighten my darkness.

WAS LINDUM A COLONIA?

London: Oct. 7, 1893.

This question will, I am afraid, to most readers of the ACADEMY appear ridiculous. The affirmative answer, it will be thought, is placed beyond dispute by the evidence of the modern name Lincoln, by the express testimony of the Ravenna geographer, and by the fact that the place was in Roman times certainly important enough to have been honoured with the colonial dignity. The second and third of these arguments have some weight, though I think they are not absolutely conclusive. But there seems to be ground for suspecting that the first argument is fallacious, and that even though Lindum may have been a colony, the etymology of the modern name does not record the fact. I do not venture to say that the current derivation can be actually disproved: only that there is considerable reason for regarding it as questionable.

The Old-English name of Lincoln is recorded as Lindcylne and Lindcylne. According to phonetic laws, the element cylne should descend from a prehistoric culina, or culinia; which would be the normal representative of a still older colin(i)a.* The form of the name given by Bæda, Lindocolina (also -colinum), obviously cannot be a latinisation of the contemporary English name: it must have been preserved in written tradition from an earlier period. To all appearance it was a British name, retained from the time when the British language still possessed its flexional endings. Hence it would appear that the place had, whether at the same period or successively, two different British names—the simple Lindon (probably the original form of the Welsh llyn, "lake") latinised as Lindum, and the compound Lindo-colina. The question then is whether colina in this compound comes from the Latin colonia. That this is phonetically possible must be admitted. In British loan-words from Latin, the original long o had before the eighth century—perhaps much earlier—passed through ū and ü into a sound which Englishmen identified with i: thus Dinot is Bæda's spelling of the British form of the name Dōnātus, in Old-Welsh Dunaut. So far, everything seems to be in favour of the current etymology. My reason for doubting its correctness lies in the fact that the name Lindcylne is found elsewhere than at Lincoln. A charter of Coenwulf of Mercia, relating to lands in Kent, and dated 814, gives the boundaries of a piece of land at a place called Heanyfre as follows: on the east Spachrycg (hrycg = ridge), on the south Plumweard pearrocas (pearrocas means enclosures), on the west Lindcylne, on the north Aueue (presumably a river Avon). As Lindcylne is unintelligible as an English name, it may be presumed to be British, representing an older form Lindocolina. In this case, at any rate, the name cannot be "Lindum colonia"; and hence it is reasonable to doubt whether that etymology is correct in the better known instance. A boundary-object with a Celtic name may with probability be guessed to have been a water-course of some sort; can the word have meant a stream issuing from a lake? The last element may be compared with the frequent river-name Colne.

* Cylne might normally represent an earlier culnia, col'nia; but this seems to be excluded by Bæda's form.

The testimony of the Ravenna geographer is, as I have admitted, of some weight, especially as we know that he was right in assigning the rank of a colony to Glevum; but it is possible that he may have misinterpreted the name Lindocolina. It is worth remarking that there is nothing to show that he regarded colonia as forming part of the current name in this case, any more than in that of Glevum. As to the presumption derivable from the Roman importance of Lindum, we must remember that Tacitus says that London in his time was a very large and populous city, but not a colony. Altogether, it is not yet proved that Lindum was a colony at all; and even if this be granted, it will still remain doubtful whether the modern name contains the word colonia.

It remains to offer a suggestion as to the identification of the places named in the passage of Coenwulf's charter. The body of the document refers to land at Bexley; the hypothesis which I venture diffidently to propose may be objected to because it makes the concluding part relate to another portion of the county. The transition certainly seems abrupt: possibly some words have been omitted in the existing copy. My conjecture is that Heanyfre is a peculiar spelling of Hēan āfre (or āfre), locative case of (hēa) āfer (the high bank) = Hever. Kiburn's Survey (1659) says that a portion of Hever parish, called "the borough of Linckhill" (a name which might be a corruption* of Lindcylne), was in the hundred of Ruxley—the same hundred, be it observed, in which Bexley is situated. The maps give an unnamed stream flowing northwards into the Eden west of Hever Castle: perhaps this stream may have been the Lindcylne of the charter. If so, the Eden would be the Avon of the document. The existing name, though as old as the sixteenth century, is probably an inference from Edenbridge, which, according to the evidence of the Textus Roffensis, is a corruption of Eadhelm's Bridge. Whether I am right in these identifications, or have been imposed on by delusive plausibilities, can only be deterained by investigations which I have no time to pursue, but which I hope someone else will undertake.

* To speak more correctly, it is—apart from the etymologising spelling—the normal modern form of the word. Had it not been for the influence of the Latin name, the cathedral city would not be called Linkill.

HENRY BRADLEY.

A LINGUISTIC PUZZLE.

Anglo-Russian Literary Society: Oct. 19, 1893.

As various Russian phrases, more or less misspelt, are being circulated at the present moment in French and English newspapers, perhaps the following achievement may not be without interest.

I culled it a short while ago from the notice-board at the entrance to Leith Docks, where, I was given to understand, it had been posted up for the last ten years. Its accuracy had never been called in question, since no one appears to have identified the language. When I ventured to criticise the defects of this astonishing linguistic performance, a policeman strongly resented my audacity. He insisted that it must be right, as "it had been reprinted."

The notice runs as follows:

"СУМРГАНІЕ МОПДКОБР

Smogcanie meneps gud ygoder mopdkobr u gud Cowcxr nazionavbnobxr mopdkobr omkposmo."

After trying various languages, I arrived, by an exhaustive process, at the key to the meaning. It was simply that some Russian cursive had been read by the printer as if it had been English handwriting, many of the letters corresponding in form, though not in value. Consequently the inscription, as will be clear to students of Russian, should really stand thus:

"ЛИТ [LEITH] ЗДАНИЕ МОРЯКОВ.

Eto zdanie teper dlya udobiya moryakov i dlya veyekh natsionalnih moryakov otkrito."

The meaning is:

"LEITH—SAILORS' HOME.

This building is now open for the convenience of sailors of all nationalities."

I only hope that Russian seamen have had some other guide to the very well-appointed Home than this cryptographic announcement.
ARTHUR A. SYKES.

THE ETHICS AND ETIQUETTE OF REVIEWING.

London: Oct. 16, 1893.

It is right that I should mention at the earliest possible opportunity that the Daily News ultimately inserted, on the very day on which my letter appeared in the ACADEMY, my protest against their criticism, accompanied by a very courteous leader, which entirely explained away the obnoxious expressions to which I took exception. Under these circumstances I desire to withdraw unreservedly any imputations into which I was led by resentment against what seemed to be unrequited injury. The fact that such retorts are naturally provoked in such a case is sufficient recommendation of the principle of literary etiquette to which I appealed.

Permit me to add one word as to the main point in dispute between my Daily News critic and myself, a point to which I observe an article in the last Saturday Review is also directed. I think I can convince both my critics by an authority to which they will readily bow. I have incurred their censure because, adding a dozen Scotch tales and three Border ballads to seventy-two English folk-tales, I have called the sum total "English Fairy Tales." I would defend myself by the example of Mr. Andrew Lang, who contributed to a work entitled "English Poets" a criticism and selection of ten Scotch and three English ballads.

JOSEPH JACOBS.

APPOINTMENTS FOR NEXT WEEK.

SUNDAY, Oct. 22, 4 p.m. South Place Institute: "Dress-makers and Tailors," by Miss Frances Hicks.
4 p.m. Sunday Lecture: "Brain Rest," by Sir James Crichton Browne.
7.30 p.m. Ethical: "Studies in Philanthropy," by Miss Helen Dendy.
MONDAY, Oct. 23, 8 p.m. Royal Academy: "Anatomy, the Lower Extremity," by Prof. W. Anderson.
TUESDAY, Oct. 24, 6 p.m. London Institution: "The Principles of Commercial Geography applied to the British Empire," IV., by Dr. H. E. Mill.
THURSDAY, Oct. 26, 8 p.m. Royal Academy: "Anatomy, the Head and Neck," by Prof. W. Anderson.

SCIENCE.

SOME BOOKS ON GEOMETRY.

An Elementary Treatise on Analytical Geometry. By W. J. Johnston. (Oxford: Clarendon Press.) In writing his book Mr. Johnston has had the requirements of two classes of readers in view. The first consists of those who wish merely to understand the principles of the subject, and to see how these principles are applied in proving theorems or in solving problems. The second consists of those who are studying for mathematical honours at the universities, and who desire to pursue the subject further, especially in the works of Dr. Salmon. For their behoof in particular the last four chapters are intended, which treat of abridged notation, trilinear co-ordinates, envelopes, and methods of transformation. If one may judge from the textbooks in use, it would appear to be more difficult to satisfy the requirements of the first class than of the second. Mr. Johnston, in his endeavour to simplify the treatment of the subject, makes frequent use of the determinant form of the equation to the join of two points, and for the convenience of the beginner gives about a page of explanation of the determinant notation. It is unfortunate that, in his expansion of a determinant of the third order, he has introduced the negative sign before the second determinant of the second order. The symmetry of the determinant is thus obscured; and, as one of the consequences, the expression for the area of a triangle has to be put into the awkward form in the last line of p. 13 before it can be written down as a determinant. If, in this instance, Mr. Johnston has been less successful than he might have been in the exposition of his subject, there are many other instances where his exposition is everything that could be desired—clear, concise, and felicitous. The principal difficulty which a beginner experiences in analytical geometry is, not in comprehending the propositions of the text, but in seeing how to apply them. To obviate this, a considerable range of illustrative examples should be worked out for his guidance, and a collection of easy and well-graduated exercises set to him for solution. Mr. Johnston furnishes all this abundantly in his chapters on the straight line and the circle, and a student who has mastered these chapters need fear little interruption to his progress through the rest of the book. Among the other good points of the treatise, attention may be drawn to the careful distinction of the plus and minus signs (see, for instance, the expression for the area of a triangle on p. 24), the introduction of the ideas of the line at infinity (p. 107), the circular points at infinity (p. 334), imaginary lines meeting in a real point (p. 99), and so on; and to the excellent discussion of the general equation of the second degree in the eleventh chapter. The diagrams are good, and the printing in general is clear; but one exception ought to be made. The letter (l) for semi-latus rectum can hardly be distinguished from unity (1), a fault all the more unfortunate since both of them occasionally appear in the same formula. Finally, it may be asked whether the mnemonic for the equation of the tangent to the general conic (p. 280) is quite accurate.

Curiosa Mathematica. Part II. Pillow Problems. By Charles L. Dodgson. (Macmillans.) Mr. Dodgson tells us that nearly all of the seventy-two problems of which his book consists were solved in the head while lying awake at night. The solutions which he then found he has exactly reproduced without seeking for shorter or neater ones. The book originated in the endeavour to find a remedy for mental worry or trouble, and it shows conspicuously what an amount of proficiency can be attained (as Mr. Dodgson says) "after a little practice." Most of the problems have been drawn from algebra, pure geometry, and trigonometry, and one or two of them are easy and well-known properties. The majority, however, are not easy, and certainly not such as one would prefer to solve "in the hours of darkness." Two peculiar symbols are employed to represent the words sine and cosine, for what reason it is not stated, and with what advantage it is impossible to guess.

Die Nichteuclidische Geometrie vom Alterthum bis zur Gegenwart. Von Dr. A. Karagiannides. (Berlin: Mayer & Müller.) This pamphlet of forty-four pages is intended as an historical and critical study of what is sometimes called pangeometry, sometimes the geometry of hyperspace, and sometimes non-Euclidian geometry. It is divided into three sections; the non-Euclidians of antiquity, of modern times, and of the present. Dr. Karagiannides states the notions entertained by some of the geometers of antiquity regarding what were definitions, postulates, axioms, and particularly as to what constituted parallel straight lines. He then passes in review Gauss, Lobatchefsky, very briefly the Bolyais and Frischhauf, and Riemann. Among the non-Euclidians of the present time he discusses Helmholtz, F. Klein, Poincaré, Weierstrass; and the conclusion he comes to is, that "the various so-called non-Euclidian geometries are not founded on fact, but are a quite arbitrary façon de parler without scientific warrant or conviction."

J. S. MACKAY.

M. D'ABBADIE'S GIFT TO THE INSTITUT.

M. ANTOINE D'ABBADIE, a member and formerly president of the Académie des Sciences, in conjunction with Mme. d'Abbadie, has offered to the Institut the princely gift of the chateau and estate of Abbadia, with all its farms, and an additional fund of £16,000 for the expenses of the maintenance of the chateau.

The chateau of Abbadie, designed by the late M. Viollet le Duc, is one of the most successful adaptations of mediæval castellated architecture to the requirements of modern life; and at the same time the buildings tell of the varied tastes and aptitudes, and even of the travels, of its noble owners. The donjon tower is an astronomical and physical observatory; the spacious library has all the aids that the most fastidious student can desire. The chapel is singularly beautiful. Internally, the most striking features are the way in which the separate rooms are fitted up in different styles—Arabic, Persian, French, or English—and the great use of inscriptions in various alphabets as decorations. The park, with the outlying rocks, Arrigorriac—the red stones, whence the estate derives its Basque name—forms the extreme south western territory of France. The wide Atlantic is to the west; below is the entrance to the Bidassoa, on the other side of which lie Cap Figueras and the picturesque town of Fontarrabia; beyond are the mountains of Guipazcoa, and the French Pyrenees curving round to the east. The woods which defend it from the north drop their leaves from low ruddy cliffs into the ocean. To many a visitor Abbadia has seemed more like a fairy abode than a habitation of actual life; and all this creation of beauty is henceforth dedicated to science alone.

The stipulations annexed to the gift are simple. The thirty-five farmers are to be continued as tenants at their present rents, with succession to their children, or, in default of these, to genuine Basques. The usufruct of the estate is retained for the life of the donors; but all kinds of scientific research may be made on the estate, excepting only those involving vivisection.

The observatory is to be first employed in cataloguing 500,000 stars, a task which should be terminated in 1950. It is suggested that, in order to lessen the expense, this work should be performed by the members of some religious order.

We cannot conclude without expressing the wish that M. and Mme. d'Abbadie may long enjoy the usufruct of their lovely home, and that it may fall into the hands of the Institut as late as possible. W. W.

ANTHROPOLOGY AT THE COLUMBIAN EXPOSITION.

We quote the following from the New York Nation :—

"Of all the sciences, anthropology is best represented at the Fair, even if we limit the scope of the term to what concerns the uncivilised races. The directors of the Exposition decided not to rest satisfied with what private or governmental effort might accomplish, but to undertake active exploration on their own account. This work, confided to the capable hands of Prof. F. W. Putnam, has been fruitful in archaeological and ethnological material of great interest and value, which has been gathered in various parts of America under the supervision of some of our best anthropologists. In addition, are the usual public and private collections exhibited by nations and societies or individuals, the display of the National Museum and Bureau of Ethnology, and the various bodies of uncivilised natives grouped under different auspices in the grounds or the Plaisance. The anthropological exhibit was accorded a separate building as an after-thought, the space originally assigned to it being otherwise needed; consequently, this material was much delayed in installation and no catalogue of it is obtainable, the so-called official Catalogue being ludicrously inadequate and worthless. New material is constantly coming in even now, and this state of affairs somewhat palliates the imperfections of labelling and presentation which strike the visitor on every side. The display made by the United States Government is shown in the Government Building; and small local collections of archaeology or ethnology may be found in most of the State buildings, or mingled with other exhibits in the most unexpected places. Were all the specimens thus disseminated brought together and properly arranged, a very remarkable collection would be formed; but, as it is, much that is worthy of attention must be lost sight of.

"Beginning with the native villages on the Plaisance, among those best worth visiting is that which contains the 'Dahomeyans.' The good-natured negroes here brought together are obviously of several different tribes, but all in about the same state of culture. A Boston lady observed that she regretted having seen them when she thought of 'the gulf between them and Emerson.' But Emerson himself would have found new material for epigram, if he could have visited these people, noted their singular dances, and observed the peculiar, but effective, methods of their simple housekeeping. The women grind maize between two flat stones, the native smith will fashion a very presentable ring out of a copper penny, with his primitive tools, before one's eyes, all in a fashion as old as Tubal Cain. An observant eye will note the fetid images scratched on the rough-cast walls of their huts. Passing eastward, the Cairo-street is worth a visit, and, so far as the 'make-up' is concerned, differs chiefly from its original by the absence of the Oriental filth. Here may be seen some very clever Hindu jugglers, the leader of whom, before each trick, goes through a very reverential incantation to his patron gods with a peculiar sort of bagpipe. Every afternoon a bridal procession is led through the street, and what appear to be several genuine dervishes perform their rites before a very unsympathetic American audience. Further along, the village of the Japanese gives an excellent idea of their state of culture, their houses, methods of weaving, &c., with periodic performances in a little theatre. Across the way the Sultan of Johore displays a compact but well-selected series of utensils, samples of manufacture, models of traps and fishing-gear, and a small but well-built house. Near by is a small encampment of Bedouin, under a roof, where their methods of preparing coffee, bread-making (curiously like that of the Pueblo Indians of New Mexico), and dancing may be observed, in about the normal state of untidiness. Last of all, and decidedly the best, come the Samoans, whose village is not especially interesting, but whose dances and pantomime in their little theatre no one should miss. They are fine specimens of humanity, and their dances, which are given with an earnestness and vigour, are really admirable. One seems to catch here the aboriginal note in its purity. These people are said to be delegates from a Catholic mission in Samoa, and expect to devote their earnings to the propagation of the faith—an odd way of making the old pay tribute to the new.

"The exhibit of the National Museum and Bureau of Ethnology is designed to illustrate the condition of the North American aborigines at the advent of Columbus, classified in accordance with the linguistic map recently published by the Bureau of Ethnology. This is largely done by means of groups of life-size figures engaged in some occupation characteristic of the tribe or stock to which they belong, surrounded with products of such industry and the utensils or tools employed. The figures, when possible, have been modelled from life and are dressed in native garments. Several of these groups are among the best things of the kind ever prepared, though to be fully appreciated they require a somewhat more thorough knowledge than is possessed by the average visitor. A particularly good one is the group of Moqui women making bread. The Moqui corn, red, blue, yellow, and white, is there, with a woman grinding the parched grains, each colour being kept separate; another parches the grain, while the coloured meal, thinned from a paste to a gruel, is wiped over a hot flat stone by a third. Here it cooks instantly to a paper-like sheet, which is folded up in flattened rolls like bundles of coloured tissue-paper. With a brief explanation, such a group tells its story clearly and in a fashion to be remembered, especially when in the Plaisance one watches the Bedouin woman spreading her papery sheet of dough over a dome-like sheet of hot iron which serves the same purpose as the bread-stone of the Moqui. An extensive collection of objects illustrating the arts of women among savage and semi-barbarous people was prepared by the National Museum, and is shown in the Woman's Building.

"Prehistoric anthropology is illustrated by a collection selected by Mr. Holmes, of the Bureau of Ethnology, showing the several periods of the paleolithic age of Europe, with some of the supposed paleoliths of the United States for comparison, and other objects belonging to the neolithic age. There is also a good series illustrating the quarrying work of the aborigines of the United States, from the quartzites of the District of Columbia to the novaculites of Arkansas and the copper of Lake Superior. Another group contains selections from a collection illustrating the ceremonials of the Oriental religions of the Mediterranean basin, with special reference to them as a starting-point for a comparative study of religions. A large proportion of the synoptic State collections show illustrations of the local archaeology, many of which are well arranged and labelled. A good example is that of the State of Illinois, which has in all branches an excellent synoptic exhibit. Most of the Oriental countries having separate buildings and not occupying space in the Anthropological Building exhibit more or less anthropological material. Among many which might be mentioned as worth a visit, it will suffice to refer to the Cingalese-collection and that in the building devoted to the French colonial dependencies. The implements, &c., are not segregated, but among the things shown are many very interesting specimens.

"The Anthropological Building is a cheap structure put up at the last moment in an obscure corner of the Park; yet it contains what one is tempted to pronounce, scientifically, the most interesting collections exhibited under any single roof in the grounds. These comprise, on the one hand, the exhibits of the Anthropological Department of the Exposition, gathered for this occasion under the direction of Prof. Putnam and his assistants, and on the other the usual displays by foreign nations, scientific societies, and individuals. It will be possible here to refer only to a small proportion of the display. Beginning with foreign countries, a very large collection, almost without labels, is shown by Brazil, including remains from the shell-heaps described by Hartt, as well as many things from existing tribes. Especially beautiful is the feather work; but the absence of any means of finding out what the things are, and where they come from, is exasperating. British Guiana and Mexico also show much that repays examination by the expert, but with a lamentable deficiency of labels. The collection from the Museo Nacional de Costa Rica contains some extra fine stone carvings from Nicoya and Agu Caliente. Japan has a well-systematised and labelled collection, which does not contain much that is novel to students, unless it be the specimens from the shell-heaps which were described some years ago by Prof. Morse. China appears to have no official exhibit, but the deficiency is partly supplied by a well-selected series from the archaeological department of the University of Pennsylvania. The Peruvian collection of Montes is rich and interesting, but only partly labelled. A large space devoted to the prehistoric cemeteries of Peru attracts much attention, the aim being to exhibit an excavated area with the mummies, &c., as they would appear after the earth is removed. Here again the absence of explanatory placards deprives the display of much of its usefulness to ordinary visitors.

"A most attractive display of casts from Grecian sculptures recently excavated is to be found in the central part of the hall. Some of them are familiar; but others, especially slabs derived from tombs showing family groups, deities, &c., are new, at least to the majority of visitors. New South Wales comes to the front with a very fine collection, relating not merely to her own section of Australia, but also to the rest of that continent, Tasmania, part of New Guinea, and the islands of the Australasian seas. It comprises, besides utensils, weapons, garments, &c., of existing or recently extinct tribes, a fine series of solar enlargements of photographs of the people themselves, the best yet brought together, and also a valuable collection, loaned by Prof. Liversidge, of very rare prehistoric stone weapons and tools. All this material is well classified and labelled; an excellent annotated catalogue is distributed by the Commissioners, and also two other pamphlets, one by the Rev. Dr. W. Wyatt Gill, containing notes on the Hervey Islanders, and the other, by Messrs. Hill & Thomson, on the aborigines of New South Wales. Near the exhibit of New South Wales is a small but important collection from New Caledonia, illustrated by a remarkable collection of photographs by J. G. Peace, of Nouméa. These well repay close examination, and illustrate much better than most anthropological photographs many details of interest.

"France shows a set of the Charnay casts of ancient sculptures of Yucatan and Honduras, close to which are the more recent reproductions obtained by Prof. Putnam's party, except a few of the larger ones, which are erected in the open air not far from the building. The rapid way in which these monuments are deteriorating renders the present collection most opportune and important. The Government of Honduras has a small exhibit, mostly of fragmentary original pieces of similar carvings. A very interesting small collection from Bolivia has been received from one of the Putnam parties. Of the other contributions obtained through the official explorations, one of the most interesting is a large-sized model of the Skidegate village, Queen Charlotte Islands, a settlement of Haida Indians, renowned for its carved totem posts and richly ornamented dwellings. In this connexion, attention should be directed to the Alaskan collection of Lieut. Emmons, displayed in the gallery of the Government Building, which, with much that is modern and evidently made for sale, contains also some of the finest specimens of native work, in particular carved masks, ever brought from the North-West coast.

"A large collection of archaeological material from the Hopewell group of mounds, Ross County, Ohio, is exhibited by W. K. Moorhead. It is particularly important as comprising the spoil from an altar mound, where a vast number of objects, probably the most highly treasured of their owners' possessions, were cast into the flames on some critical occasion. These include a great many fine archaeological specimens, some doubtless of great age, among which appear a few articles of European origin, perhaps derived from the early Spanish traders. The most numerous of these are the copper ear-studs, some of them plated with silver, of which about a peck are shown; one or two brass or copper buttons; rolled sheet copper, used for cutting into ornaments; and some arabesque designs in the same material, evidently of European manufacture. Some scroll-like ornaments of mica were also evidently cut with scissors, as the natives possessed no aboriginal tools by which such clean-cut curves could be produced. It is to be regretted that so fine and important a collection as this should be almost wholly unlabelled, and that no positive marks by which they could be certainly identified have been attached to the majority of the specimens. Prof. G. F. Wright, of Oberlin, has his collections of archaeological specimens on view, where various implements over which much controversy has arisen may be inspected by the curious. Among the thousands of stone implements exhibited from all parts of the country, the fine, well-arranged series of the Missouri Natural History Society should be noticed, although there are so many well-arranged and carefully labelled specimens on view that it is impossible to refer to the greater number of them. The archaeological department of the University of Pennsylvania has a well-selected series of objects, ethnological and archaeological; and perhaps one of the largest series devoted to a single topic is that shown by Mr. Stewart Culin, in his collection of playing cards and related games. A very interesting contribution has been made by the Nez Percé Indians, at the suggestion of Miss Alice Fletcher, illustrating customs and utensils now almost or entirely out of use, but which have been restored or reproduced by the aid of the elders to whom they were familiar.

"The gallery contains the anthropological laboratories, where a vast amount of statistical information has been restated in graphic form under the direction of Prof. Jastrow, offering to the student of such matters a fund of information over which days might be profitably spent. Anthropological measurements are taken here. Near by are the well-known statues of the Harvard boy and girl. These attract a constant stream of visitors, and are generally acknowledged to form one of the most instructive exhibits in the building. Many visitors will notice several mammoth sheets of heavy paper covered with columns of figures and words in an unknown tongue. These represent the results of one of the most important of recent archaeological studies, that of the Mexican calendar by Mrs. Zelia Nuttall. Her investigations on this subject, aided by some recently discovered manuscript records of the period of the Conquest, have resulted, it is believed, in definitely solving a most intricate problem. Mrs. Nuttall's discussion will shortly be printed by the Peabody Museum of Archaeology in Cambridge.

"In conclusion, it may be said that, owing to the active exploration instituted by the directors of the Exposition into matters connected with American anthropology, it is probable that this department of science will permanently profit by the anniversary thus celebrated to a greater extent than any other line of research. At all events, there can be no question, in spite of all shortcomings, that Prof. Putnam and his associated workers have brought together for our instruction an anthropological collection hitherto unequalled and hereafter not likely to be surpassed."

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

MESSRS. W. H. ALLEN & Co. have in preparation a student's edition of the Arabic text of the Assemblies of Hariri, with English notes, grammatical, historical, and critical, by Dr. F. Steingass, author of English-Arabic and Arabic Dictionaries. The work will be issued under the patronage of the Secretary of State for India.

MESSRS. LUZAC & Co.'s announcements for this season include the following:—Jindānikāra, text and translation by Prof. James Gray of the Rangoon College; Wildeboer's Kanon Old Testament; Ritter's Pædagogic Fragments; and Harper's Assyrian and Babylonian Letters, vol. ii.

ON opening the Classical Review for October (David Nutt)—which appears after an interval of two months—most readers will turn first to the Obituary. Mr. F. Haverfield writes about Prof. Henry Nettleship as a Latin scholar and teacher; while Mr. T. Fowler, who was closely associated with him at two colleges, throws light upon his early career and his personal character. The notice of H. D. Darbishire is written by Dr. Sandys. It happens that the first article in the number is an estimate, by Mr. Darbishire, of the Göttingen school of comparative philology, as represented by Fick and Bechtel. The reviews are less important than usual; nor can we do more than refer to the critical notes, by various writers, on Aeschylus, Sophocles, Euripides, and Plato. Mr. Robinson Ellis continues his collation of the Madrid MS. of Manilius, as compared with the text of Jacob (Berlin, 1846). Prof. R. Y. Tyrrell contributes another tour de force—a Greek rendering of Capt. Morris's "Toper's Apology," in the metre of the famous scoliast about Harmodius and Aristogeiton. We quote the first stanza—μισὴ σάφρον' ἔταίρον δὲ μ' ἐρωτᾷ τίπτε παννυχίαν ἀνυστίν' ἔλκω διερῶ δ' ὅμως ὄντι μαθὼν κινῶντ' ἥμῃ καὶ ζωὴν ἀφειδέως.

Mr. Cecil Torr defends and expounds his view about the harbours of Carthage, which is briefly this: that the outer harbour was formed by piers in the sea; and that the inner harbour was nearly surrounded by the other harbour, but that its position is otherwise unknown.

THE Babylonian and Oriental Record, a monthly magazine of the antiquities of the East (David Nutt), has now entered upon its seventh year of publication. To the current number Mr. W. St. Chad Boscawen contributes the first of a series of papers, entitled "Beginnings of Chaldean Civilisation." He deals with the discoveries of M. de Sarzec at Tello, which carry us back as far as 4000 B.C. He first suggests a new reading for the name of the city, Sir-purra = "light and bright," instead of Sir-pur-la. He next propounds a chronology for the several dynastic periods, of which remains have been found; and then gives a facsimile of one of the oldest inscriptions, with transliteration and translation, throwing light upon prehistoric trade between Mesopotamia and the peninsula of Sinai. In another paper, Mr. Boscawen points out how the discoveries of the American expedition to Babylonia tend to confirm the theory of an Elamite origin of Chinese civilisation. Prof. Terrien de Lacouperie continues his study of the connexion between China and Western Asia in early times. Examining the articles of seaborne imports recorded in Chinese chronicles of the fourth century B.C., when pearls are first mentioned, he refers them all to the neighbourhood of the Persian Gulf; and he is disposed to find in the Chinese name for these foreign traders, Hwang-tche, a distant imitation of Hormuz. Incidentally, he tells us that the first settlers in Northern China found both elephants and rhinoceros in the land; the former animals were used in war by the Chinese in the sixth century B.C.

PART VI. of Dr. M. Jastrow's great Dictionary of the Targumim, the Talmud Babli and Yerushalmi, and the Midrashic Literature (Luzac) carries the work down to תר"ץ. It shows the same untiring industry and admirable condensation as the former parts. That specialists will differ from some of the author's views is no serious drawback to its merits. Students of Hebrew in general will find much to learn from it, and even Hellenists may now and then glean some fact, e.g., that τετραμούλιος = quadriga (not in the Greek lexicons). The quotations are often highly suggestive. We may mention those on חֲרִיב and חֲרִיבִית, the carob-tree; Isaiah was swallowed up, it was said, by a carob-tree, and Absalom was as tall as a large tree of this species. Also those on חֲרִיב and חֲרִיבִית; a man could evade a vow of abstinence by saying: I meant the herem of the sea (i.e., a fisher's net); חֲרִיבִית might be a substitute for חֲרִיב; does this illustrate the substitution of חֲרִיב for חֲרִיב in some Hebrew MSS. in Isa. xix. 18? And those on חֲרִיבִית, a charm of beads, a frontlet or bracelet, whence חֲרִיבִית phylacteries. See also under חֲרִיבִית, properly a cover of twigs, reeds, &c.; the ceiling in general. Does not this throw light on the double account of the letting down of the paralytic man in Mark ii. 4, Luke v. 19? Mark thinks of a roof of brushwood, earth, and mortar (ἐξορύξαντες); Luke, of a roof of tiles (δὲ τῶν κεράμων). חֲרִיבִית will cover both views (cf. quotation from Baba Kam. 66b).

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

ELIZABETHAN SOCIETY.—(Wednesday, Oct. 4.)

A. C. HAYWARD, Esq., in the chair.—Mr. Frederick Rogers gave an address on "John Stow and Elizabethan London." In the course of his remarks, Mr. Rogers said it was quite time that the phrase, "John Stow the antiquary," went out of use. As we understood the word now, it gave a very inadequate idea of Stow's work. Writing before the scientific study of history was thought of, his work was yet as scientific as he knew how to make it. Enthusiast as he was in matters relating to his country's history, his mind was shrewd and his intellectual perceptions clear; and no one was less influenced by mere sentiment. He stood foremost among the chroniclers of his time, by the sanity of his judgment, and by his unswerving adherence to what he held to be truth. It was much to be deplored that there was no complete edition of his "Survey" at a moderate price. He stood for a principle that needed much emphasising in his day, a day, as it was, of reconstruction and reform: the necessity of properly understanding the past. The same principle wanted emphasising to-day, when London was working out for itself a new, and he (the lecturer) believed, a glorious, future. Londoners should not forget their great citizen. It was a pitiful picture that we had of the old scholar in his last days, obtaining from the king only a license to beg, and gathering at a collection taken at the church of St. Mary Woolnoth, then a church attended by wealthy citizens, the sum of seven-and-sixpence. Even when the difference in the value of money is estimated, the sum is paltry enough. But the whirligig of time had brought round its revenges. If in his own day "his licensed bason little got," in ours the church where he is buried is famous through the land, because his bones rest within its walls. Mr. Rogers concluded by expressing a hope that some publisher would give us soon an edition of Stow's "Survey" that was not cut about, or else would reprint the admirable edition that Mr. W. J. Thomas edited forty years ago.

CLIFTON SHAKSPEARE SOCIETY.—(Saturday, Oct. 7.)

DR. ARTHUR B. PROWSE read his presidential address.—Alluding first of all to the impossibility of finding an altogether novel stand-point from which to view Shakspeare's work, on account of the voluminous and comprehensive literature of the subject, he stated that in preparing the address he had avoided consultation of any writings whatever, save those of the Bard himself, hoping thus to entirely avoid repetition of the ideas or opinions of any writers and critics. Choosing the theme of Shakspeare's references to Nature and natural objects, he limited himself still further to the subject of scenery almost exclusively. Quoting first the lines—

"Thou, Nature, art my goddess; to thy law My services are bound"

as showing the Bard's reverence and love for Nature, he then pointed out that there was distinct evidence also of the recognition of Nature's "law and order," as opposed to chaos. Next he passed in review the illustrations of the controlling influence over scenery of whatever pertains to the seasons: from "The uncertain glory of an April day," to the "Fair day in summer, wondrous fair," the "mellow hangings" and "plenteous load" of autumn, "all girded up in shooes;" and lastly the winter scenes, "Chaste as an icicle, That's curdled of the frost from purest snow, And hangs on Dian's temple." Next he went on to the realm of the sky, with the marvellously beautiful pictures of dawn and sunrise under numberless aspects on land and sea, remarking that Shakspeare's references to such scenes far out-number those to any other of the beauties of Nature. Then the quiet evening, when "The sheep are gone to fold, birds to their nest: And coal-black clouds that shadow heaven's light, Do summon us to part and bid good night." The moonlight too, "Decking with liquid pearl the bladed grass"; and the midnight firmament "fretted with golden fire." Then the scenes of cloudland, within infinite variety—from the glorious piled-up masses casting great shadows in endless succession over hill and dale in the bright summer sunshine, to the "threatening cloud," "in his dim mist the aspiring mountains hiding"; and lastly, the fierce thunderstorm,—the "tempest dropping fire." Many references to mountain scenes were given; and also to the softer beauties of gently-undulating woodland and pasture, where "The fields are fragrant and the woods are green"; where "The oaks bear mast, the briers scarlet hips," and there is "no enemy but winter and rough weather." The crystal spring, the merry mountain brook, and the quiet wanderings of the placid lowland river, until it reach the boundless sea, were all pictured. Bordering the ocean we find the lofty white cliffs of South-Eastern England—"The dread summit of this chalky bourn,"—with the ever-restless tides chafing at its feet, and lashed into fury at times of the striving winds, until "The chidden billow seems to pelt the clouds." But when the fury of the elements has passed, and the ocean lies sleeping once again, we hear the soothing melody of the wavelets playing on the beach; and a whisper comes over three centuries of time—"Like as the waves make towards the pebbled shore, So do our minutes hasten to their end."—Miss Louisa Mary Davies was elected president for this (the nineteenth) session, when the following plays are to be considered: "The Two Gentlemen of Verona," "Edward II.," "Love's Labour's Lost," "Richard II.," "King David," "A Midsummer Night's Dream," "Richard III. and Locrine." The hon. sec. (9, Gordon-road, Bristol) will gratefully acknowledge the receipt of anything for the Society's library, which now consists of 584 volumes.

FINE ART.

"BRITISH MUSEUM CATALOGUE OF GREEK COINS."—Ionian. By B. V. Head. (Printed for the Trustees.)

In one way this is among the most important volumes of the great British Museum series of coin catalogues. If the striking of coined money did not originate in Ionia, it was first practiced at Sardis, only a few miles inland from the Ionian coast, and the Ionians were the earliest of all men to copy their Lydian neighbours in this most useful of inventions. This book, therefore, contains an exceptionally large number of noteworthy archaic pieces of the seventh century. But, on the other hand, Ionia is, on the whole, rather poor in coins of the best period of Greek art. Of fourth century coins there are very few that attract the eye, either for artistic merit or historic interest. The enormous outbreak of coinage in the second century, after the battle of Magnesia had freed the Asiatic towns from the dominion of the Seleucidae, adds to the bulk of the book, but not to its interest. These large flat tetradrachms of Attic weight, which all the states of the Aegean seaboard issued in such numbers at that time, are almost as monotonous and inartistic as the coinage of Cistophori which afterwards superseded them.

But though Ionia is, on the whole, not very rich in coins which show the highest beauty or historic interest, there are a few among its pieces which will always rank in the foremost line among the productions of Hellenic art. Best of all are the beautiful early fourth century issues of Clazomenae, with the full-face head of Apollo and the swan. The tetradrachm, being the largest of the series, is the best known; unfortunately, only one of the British Museum specimens is in absolutely perfect condition, and the plate does not quite do justice to the lovely coin. But in all respects save size the gold stater and the silver drachm are as good as the larger pieces, and of them the Museum has excellent examples. Another coin of first-rate importance ascribed by Mr. Head to Ionia—though some numismatic authorities have supposed that it was struck by Pharnabazus on the Hellespont—is the tetradrachm of a Persian satrap, with the bearded head in a low tiara, and a lyre on the reverse. Probably the attribution to Colophon, founded on the rather unusual type of the reverse, is correct. If so, we must probably allot this beautiful coin to the wily Tissaphernes and not to the honest Pharnabazus. It is so far superior in execution to all the other money of the satraps which is portrayed on Plate xxxi., that the reader is puzzled to think how a coin-engraver of such exceptional merit came for once in a way to be employed by the Persians. It is a pity that one coin, which possesses the highest historical interest of all the Ionian issues, is not in the Museum's possession. We refer to the piece struck by the exiled Themistocles, during his tenure of the tyranny of Magnesia, bestowed on him by King Artaxerxes I. after his flight from Athens. This didrachm, whose types are a standing Apollo and an eagle, is unique, the only known specimen being at Paris. We could perhaps wish that a supplementary plate of coins not in the national collection had been added at the end of this volume, as has been done in the case of one or two other parts of the series.

Mr. Head has treated the class of coins in which Ionia is richest—the archaic issues of the period 700-550—as a single category: not endeavouring to distribute the whole mass under different towns, but classing them together as "Early Ionic Electrum." Where the attribution to a definite issuing state is certain, it is of course given; but, as all numismatists know, a great part of these archaic coins cannot be allotted with security to any city: such types as a male or female head, a lion, a bird, or a geometric flower-pattern are too vague to allow us to state without hesitation that they belong to Samos, Erythrae, Miletus, or any other of the Ionian seaports to which we are tempted to give them. Readers will notice that Mr. Head has been particularly chary in his attribution of coins to Miletus; it is—as he says—very difficult to distinguish with any certainty between Miletus, Samos, and Sardis as the place of issue of many of the early coins with lion-types. On the whole, he prefers to cut down the Milesian section to those which exhibit the combination of the lion and the star pattern, which we know from the pieces of a later age to be the undoubted badges of the city. The money of Milesian types struck by the Carian despot Hecatomnus is added at the end of the Milesian section. As Mr. Head points out, it seems to have been struck by engravers who did not understand the true meaning of the archaic pieces that they were imitating: the paw of the lion on the original coin has got quite out of place on the copy, as the animal on Hecatomnus' drachms is represented looking straight before it, and not turning its head over one shoulder as on the true Milesian issues.

Archaic as are all the early Ionian electrum coins, it is curious to find that there are other pieces whose fabric and execution would seem to point to an even earlier date—we mean the thick globular money with no definite incuse on the reverse which formed the bulk of the celebrated Santorin find, and of which the greater part is attributed to the cities of the Aegean Islands. On the whole, we are not convinced that this money, in spite of its rude and primitive appearance, was really struck before the Ionian pieces. Its rough execution we should be inclined to attribute to its distance from the centre of the invention of coinage, and not to its excessive antiquity. Undoubtedly the Santorin find consisted of very early issues; but we do not see that they need be earlier than the better-struck, though still very archaic, Asiatic money of the class that we are accustomed to give to the times of Ardys and Alyattes. All numismatists know that the shape and fabric of a coin are by no means safe indications of its date as compared with that of other pieces struck in its neighbourhood. Who, for example, would believe, from mere inspection of the coins, that the present rupees of the Indian Imperial Government, and those of most Indian native states, moneys as unlike each other it is possible to conceive, were struck at the same time and in the same country? By their fabric they might have been issued ten thousand miles and ten centuries apart from each other.

We have already alluded to the comparative poverty of Ionia in coins of the period 500-350 B.C. It would be interesting to speculate how far the falling off in its issues was due to the disasters of the great Ionic Revolt (499-493), and how far to the dislocation of ancient trade routes due to the rise of Athens to commercial supremacy by means of the Confederacy of Delos. We should be inclined to ascribe the decay of the relative importance of Ionia to the latter cause much more than to the former. Athens deliberately engrossed all the markets on which she could lay hands, and the rapid extension of the Attic coin-standard over many parts of her empire shows the way in which she ousted older competitors in the commercial field from her sphere of influence. The fact that most of the Ionian towns persisted in adhering to their old coin-standards throughout the period of Athenian supremacy would seem to show that they did not even attempt to vie with Athens in competing for the trade of these districts where the Attic standard had lately been introduced. We may suspect that between 480 and 430 the Ionians were supplanted by the Athenians as middlemen between the Hellenic West and Egypt, and also in the monopoly of the Black sea trade.

We note that Mr. Head has no final word to give on that mysterious coin, the Chian pentadrachm, which has puzzled so many commentators on the last book of Thucydides. Probably, as he says, it must have been a small electrum coin; but it still seems impossible to identify it. There does not seem to be any noteworthy Chian coinage of pieces that could have been rated as equivalent to five Attic drachms about the year 410 B.C.

We notice with much interest that Mr. Head has succeeded in marking out a very considerable number of late coins of the Ionian cities as having been produced during their rebellion against Rome at the time of the Mithridatic war. Just as Hannibal's invasion of Italy set going again some of the mints of the Italic cities, which had long been closed by order of Rome, so did Mithridates' invasion of Italy restore to life again the mints of Ephesus, and several states more. They coined gold as well as silver, and sometimes placed on their coins symbols alluding to Mithridates; but this was not invariably the case.

When speaking of a book produced by the British Museum, and edited by Mr. Head, it is scarcely necessary to add that the work keeps to the high level of its series, and is, as usual, profusely illustrated with a map, and with many dozen excellent autotype plates of coins.

C. OMAN.

SOPT, THE GOD OF THE ZODIACAL LIGHT.

IN 1887, the Egypt Exploration Fund published Goshen, and the Shrine of Sapt el-Henneh, by M. E. Naville. At that time, the main interest and attraction of this volume to the public at large lay in the Biblical connotation of its opening title. But in two recent numbers of the Proceedings of the Society of Biblical Archaeology, Herr H. Brugsch has drawn fresh attention to the book, as containing peculiarly interesting inscriptions relating to the worship of Sopt at Saft el-Henneh.

It is well known that Sopt was the feudal god of the Arabian nome, the nome of Sopt. At Saft el-Henneh, he is described upon the monuments as "Sopt, the Spirit of the East, the Hawk, the Horus of the East" (Goshen, p. 10), and yet as also connected with Tum (p. 13): that is to say, with the rising and setting of the sun. M. Naville came to the conclusion "that a careful study of the texts relating to the god Sopt would lead us to the conclusion that it is not the rising sun which he figures, but rather one of the planets—Venus, as the morning star" (p. 10). M. Naville rightly concluded that Sopt was the herald of the sun, and not the sun himself. Herr Brugsch shows that Sopt was really the god of that pyramidal glow to be seen in Southern skies shortly before sunrise, and after sunset, which is known to us as the zodiacal light; and that Horus-Sopt was the herald of the sun, not only day by day, but also at the first dawn of creation. He mentions, moreover, that the city of Goshen was "the city of the twilights."

The line of inquiry which led to this discovery of an unsuspected deity was first suggested to Herr Brugsch by Herr Gruson, author of Im Reiche des Lichtes, who told him that the ancient Egyptians represented a god crowned with what might well be the symbol of this triangular manifestation. Herr Brugsch had not hitherto noticed it, but has since found constant direct and indirect references to the fact in scenes and texts of all periods. In Goshen, pl. v., Nectanebo III. is represented as in prostrate veneration before the zodiacal lights of morning and of evening, while the stars are shining in the heavens above him. Innumerable details of this newly discovered Egyptian cult of the celestial phenomena of twilight are to be found in the scenes and inscriptions published by M. Naville in the Fourth Memoir of the Egypt Exploration Fund.

K. B.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

THE annual autumn exhibition of cabinet pictures at Mr. Thomas McLean's Gallery, in the Haymarket, will open next week.

THURSDAY and Friday of next week are the two days fixed for the private view at the Institute of Painters in Oil-Colours.

THE excavations carried on at Tell el-Hesi (the site of the Biblical Lachish)—first by Prof. Flinders Petrie, and afterwards by Mr. E. J. Bliss—are now closed; but the committee of the Palestine Exploration hope that they may soon obtain a firm for excavating elsewhere. Meanwhile, important researches are being conducted along the line of railway now in progress between Haifa and Damascus, which passes through the heart of the Northern kingdom of Israel. Mr. Bliss's final report upon his work at Tell el-Hesi will be published by Messrs. A. P. Watt & Son early in the new year, under the title of A Mound of Many Cities, with upwards of 250 illustrations.

BY courteous permission of the chairman and committee of the Manchester Art Gallery, the Egypt Exploration Fund is now exhibiting facsimile drawings of scenes and hieroglyphs copied from the tombs of Beni Ha'an, El Bersheh, and Dêr el-Gebrawi to the public of Manchester. A descriptive and explanatory catalogue of the drawings is also provided. The exhibition will remain open until the end of this month.

THERE is now on view, in the Bradford Art Museum, the very representative collection of antique lamps, belonging to Mr. William Cudworth, of that town, which has been mainly derived from the excavations in Cyprus of Major di Cesnola. By way of introduction to the collection, Mr. Cudworth has himself written a dissertation on terra-cotta lamps generally, illustrated with photographs and engravings of some of the choicest examples in his collection. It is published by Mr. Charles J. Clark, of Lincoln's Inn Fields.

IN advance of the publication of the Art Annual for 1893, Messrs. J. S. Virtue & Co. have sent us a proof, on India paper, of one of the illustrations which will appear in it. This is a line engraving, by Messrs. W. M. Lizars and J. Greatbach, after Mr. Holman Hunt's famous picture of "The Finding of the Saviour in the Temple." The publishers fear that this may be the last example of engraving on steel to be executed in England, unless the art should meet with an unexpected revival.

MUSIC.

OBITUARY.

CHARLES GOUNOD.

Sic itur ad astra: Gounod's "Faust" has made him immortal. The history of the life of a great artist is interesting, and it is profitable to trace the road along which he travelled towards the temple of fame; but—except in the case of such men as Bach and Beethoven, who revealed their genius in manifold ways as much in works of large calibre, like the Passion or the Symphony, as in small pieces, like the Fugue or the Bagatelle—it is generally possible to point to one moment that shines with special lustre, one moment in which is concentrated the essence of all the others. Such was "Marta" in the career of Flotow, the "Fantastic" Symphony in that of Berlioz, and "Faust" in that of the French master just dead.

M. Louis Pagnerre, in his Life of Gounod, calls attention to the peculiar nature of the artist—"a mixture of art and mysticism." The latter element, indeed, seems inseparable from genius; but, in the case of Gounod, it showed itself outwardly by his devotion to the Catholic Church, and by the compositions on sacred subjects with which he opened and closed his career. Among his earliest works was a Mass performed at Rome more than half a century ago; while almost his last hours were devoted to religious art. And yet not the church but the theatre was the scene of his greatest triumph. Gounod's début on the stage was with "Sapho," in March, 1851. It may be mentioned that in January of the same year some sacred pieces of his, performed at a concert in St. Martin's Hall, first drew prominent attention to the composer. An article in the Athenæum, from the pen, it is said, of M. Louis Viardot, heralded Gounod as a true genius. The merits of "Sapho" were acknowledged by Adolphe, Adam, and Berlioz, and even Auber's mot, "Ça manque d'airs," judged by the standard of to-day, was a compliment; but the work did not attract the public, and was withdrawn after the sixth performance. M. Pagnerre notices the curious fact that an opera called "Sapho" was the last produced in 1822 by Guonod's teacher, Reicha: "Le maître avait eu douze représentations; l'élève n'en eut que six."

Columns could be written about "Faust," and yet the best commentary on the work is a fine performance. It was first produced on March 19, 1859. Wagner has since come and conquered (at that time he was in Italy at work on his "Tristan"), and yet "Faust" has not, like Dagon, "fallen upon his face to the ground." The opera may be criticised: it may be found that the sentimental side of Goethe's dramatic poem has been unduly emphasised, that Gounod was not altogether oblivious of the gallery; and yet the music is irresistible. There is true feeling in it: it goes from the heart of the composer straight to the heart of the hearer. "J'entends des voix qui me chantent ce que je dois écrire, et qui me forcent à croire en elles," wrote Gounod in trying to explain that most difficult of phenomena inspiration. And again, in reply to an editor somewhat alarmed at the boldness and originality of his chords, he replied:

"N'ayez jamais peur de mes accords. Ils paraissent singuliers, mais je défie qui que ce soit de les condamner. Je les connais, et ils me connaissent."

Next to "Faust," "Roméo et Juliette" is undoubtedly the greatest of Gounod's triumphs. The opera was produced at Paris in 1867, and is still popular all over the world. To refuse recognition of its many masterly pages would be absurd; and yet, with all its merits, it will never endanger the pre-eminence which "Faust" enjoys. We have spoken of Gounod's triumphs; he had also his failures. "Faust," wrote M. Léon Escudier, "a été l'Austerlitz de M. Gounod, La Reine de Saba a été son Waterloo." And of "Le Tribut de Zamora," Berlioz said: "Je cherche à soutenir ce malheureux Gounod qui vient de faire un fiasco comme on n'en vit jamais."

No notice, however brief, of Gounod's career would be complete without a reference to the work which has won the hearts of the English public. "The Redemption," produced at the Birmingham Festival of 1882, under the direction of the composer, enjoys a reputation here which its music does not altogether justify. It seems to us to resemble Handel's "Messiah" in one point; the subject-matter makes a direct and powerful appeal to the general public, to whom the music is only a secondary consideration. In his oratorio Handel, at moments, reaches the sublime, and though this can scarcely be asserted of Gounod's work, it is far above mediocrity; but the words, in both cases, help to intensify the effect of the music.

Gounod's reverence for Mozart may, at times, have led him into exaggeration, and prevented him from duly appreciating some of his contemporaries; but, in itself, it deserves the highest respect. And if we make a certain allowance for the exuberant utterance of a poet, and remember that the special reference to Mozart as a "musician" prevents any direct comparison with Wagner, no one surely would refuse to endorse the following words from a speech by Gounod at the Académie:

"Oh, divine Mozart! hast thou reposed on the bosom of infinite beauty as the beloved disciple rested on the breast of Christ and drank in the incomparable grace which marks the great and privileged few? Prodigal fortune has given thee all—elegance and strength, abundance and moderation, luminous spontaneity and ardent tenderness, in the perfect equilibrium which constitutes the irresistible power to charm, and has made of thee the unexcelled musician—more than the first, the only one—Mozart!"

This translation is from the interesting account of Gounod's Life and Works by Marie Anne de Bovet, published only two years ago and reviewed at the time in the ACADEMY.

Gounod, the same author tells us, once commenced an article on Wagner, but "thought better of it, and buried the scrap of manuscript in a drawer of his desk." If the composer has kept his promise of writing his Memoirs, it may be that that "scrap of manuscript," though hidden, is not lost.

J. S. SHEDLOCK.

MUSIC NOTES.

SEÑOR SARASATE commenced a new series of concerts at St. James's Hall, on Saturday afternoon (October 14). The programme included two Sonatas for pianoforte and violin. The first was Beethoven's in C Minor (Op. 30, No. 2), a work in which the master displays himself in various moods: at first bold, then tender, and lastly humorous. In spite of our Popular Concerts, Beethoven's pianoforte and violin Sonatas are not often heard, and the eminent violinist acted wisely in selecting one of them. The other Sonata was Raff's in A minor. Of Mme. Berthe Marx and Señor Sarasate we have often spoken, and it will suffice to record a warm reception and a successful concert. Some show pieces for the violin led, as usual, to an encore. Mme. Marx played solos by Chopin and Thalberg.

THE thirty-sixth season of the Popular Concerts opened last Monday evening, without any flourish of trumpets, and with a programme consisting of familiar pieces. Mr. Arthur Chappell relies, and perhaps safely, on his past reputation; but it is to be hoped that during the season he will introduce as many interesting novelties as possible, or revive some old masterpieces. A new pianoforte Quartet, by Robert Kahn, is indeed promised for next Saturday afternoon. Beethoven's Quartet in C (Op. 59, No. 3) was interpreted by Mlle. Wietrowetz and Messrs. Ries, Gibson, and Whitehouse. At the opening there were signs of excitement, possibly the result of nervousness on the part of the leader. The performance was, however, a good one. Miss Fanny Davies gave a particularly intelligent reading of Bach's Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue: she played with great spirit, and evidently intends to maintain, if not improve, her reputation. Mlle. Wietrowetz performed Svendsen's charming Romance in G with great taste and feeling. M. Eugène Oudin was the vocalist; and his selection of songs by the late Robert Franz was welcome, for, as yet, they have not been sufficiently honoured in this country.

AGENCIES.

London Agents, Messrs. W. H. SMITH & SON, 186, Strand.

Copies of the ACADEMY can be obtained every Saturday morning in EDINBURGH of Mr. MENZIES; in DUBLIN of Messrs. EASON & SON, 40, Sackville-street; in MANCHESTER of Mr. J. HEYWOOD. Ten days after date of publication, in NEW YORK, of Messrs. G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTIONS

TO THE ACADEMY.

(PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.)

	YEARLY.	HALF-YEARLY.	QUARTERLY.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
If obtained of a Newsvendor or at a Railway Station	0 13 0	0 6 6	0 3 3
Including Postage to any part of the United Kingdom	0 15 2	0 7 7	0 3 10
Including Postage to any part of France, Germany, India, China &c.	0 17 4	0 8 8	0 4 4

JUST PUBLISHED.

AT ALL LIBRARIES.

MEMOIRS.

By CHARLES GODFREY LELAND (HANS BREITMANN).

In 2 vols. Demy 8vo. With Two Portraits. 32s.

A FRIEND OF THE QUEEN

MARIE ANTOINETTE—COUNT FERSEN.
By PAUL GAULOT.

From the French by Mrs. CASHEL HOEY.

In 2 vols. 8vo. With Portraits. 24s.

MRS. HUNGERFORD'S NEW NOVEL.

THE HOYDEN.

By the Author of "Molly Bawn." In Three Volumes.

LONDON: WM. HEINEMANN, 21, BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

JUBILEE OF THE DISRUPTION AND THE FORMATION OF THE FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND IN 1843.

Crown 8vo, Cloth Boards, 3s. 6d., post free.

CRAIGROWAN:

A STORY OF THE DISRUPTION OF 1843.

By W. KENNEDY MOORE, D.D.

THE BRITISH WEEKLY.—"The characters are so well drawn, and the Disruption incidents so cleverly and naturally interwoven, that the interest never flags. Dr. Kennedy Moore is thoroughly at home in his subject, and has not only the necessary knowledge for treating it well, but also the requisite sympathy. He has a vein of quiet but genuine humour, and a competent acquaintance with Scottish customs."

THE FREEMAN.—"Dr. Moore not only writes with the pen of a ready writer, but his heart is in closest sympathy with his inspiring theme. His book is full of pathetic incident, and is profusely illustrated with striking portraiture."

THE DUNDEE ADVERTISER.—"The story should help to raise the enthusiasm of the present generation of Free Churchmen at this interesting period of their Church's history, and general readers may peruse it with interest for its faithful pictures of Scottish life and character in 1843."

London: ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, 21 and 22, Farnival Street, E.C.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 28, 1893.

No. 1121, New Series.

THE EDITOR cannot undertake to return, or to correspond with the writers of, rejected manuscript.

It is particularly requested that all business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., may be addressed to the PUBLISHER, and not to the EDITOR.

LITERATURE.

Life of Edward Bouverie Pusey, D.D. By Henry Parry Liddon. Vols. I. and II. (Longmans.)

ONE of the first questions to be asked in taking up an instalment of a bulky memorial of a man who has made history is, "Have we a Life or a Life and Times?" Dr. Liddon decided for himself, his coadjutors and successors, that we should have a Life of Dr. Pusey. What he did and said and wrote as soon as he became important is chronicled accurately, sympathetically, and fully, if not quite exhaustively. Dr. Liddon explains in his preface that much may be told a hundred years hence which cannot be told now; and probably this refers to the whole of his work, though many might think that the events before 1846, where the present volumes stop, are already ancient history, of which a conscientious historian may tell all he knows. And a good deal of the evidence is evanescent. We have to thank Mr. Ward junior for letting us know that Pusey thought that all the "verts" had deteriorated except Newman and Ward: it gives us a glimpse of the reaction when the strain was over; it gives us a glimpse of an habitual way of thinking of which a biographer might have shown us more. Again, we learn incidentally that Pusey had a sense of humour, because, as it happens, Mozley indulged his sense of humour in defending Pusey at the expense of Faussett, in a way which Pusey thought unedifying. If we do not always see the central figure all round, we seldom see the background clearly. Now and then there is a crisis with picturesque and interesting groups: Archbishop Howley trying with bland dignity to lay the tempest, or Hook scenting the battle from afar at Leeds, and throwing himself with all his might now upon this side, and now upon that, in the confused and shifting fray. Often we have the saintly hero plodding his strenuous way through the mist, while the stages of his progress are marked by a dim succession of dissolving views.

Edward Bouverie Pusey was born on August 22, 1800. He was the descendant of a Walloon family, one of whose members, Lawrence Bouverie, fled from his home—at Sainghin, near Lille—and persecution in 1542, first to Frankfort and then to England. His son Edward married at Cologne a Flemish lady whose grandfather Tiberkin was burnt, and drawn to the stake by his own coach-horses. Pusey liked to think of the conscientious consistency of both Lawrence and Tiberkin, and tried to hope the best of their orthodoxy. Lawrence founded a family of Turkey merchants, which rose first to a baronetcy and then to a peerage, and claimed to be connected with namesakes who had distinguished themselves in opposition to the Valois Dukes of Burgundy, at Liege, and in their service at Bruges. Philip Bouverie, the youngest son of Viscount Folkestone, commended himself to the affectionate choice of the heiresses of the ancient house of Pusey, which had protracted a useful and creditable existence from the thirteenth to the eighteenth century on the "eye" once surrounded by marshes on the outskirts of the Vale of the White Horse. It is not impossible that they were descended from a Gilbert who came over with the Conqueror and supplanted Alured, an Englishman, in possession of a manor, granted, if so be, in the days of Canute to be held by the tenure of the Pusey horn.

Philip Bouverie Pusey was himself a remarkable man, so devoted to his mother that, when she had vetoed one marriage to which he was inclined, he remained single till her death and long afterwards—in fact, till he was fifty-two, when he married Lady Lucy, the relict of Sir Thomas Cave and the daughter of Lord Harborough, an amiable and rather silly peer, who lay in bed on her wedding day rather than give her away a second time. She, too, was memorable. Her son Edward always maintained that she had taught him in essentials all he knew of religion. His father was very masterful and, in proportion to his means, a great almsgiver, and such a strong Conservative that he long delayed the marriage of his eldest son, Philip, with Lady Emily Herbert, because the Carnarvon family then counted as Liberals and had actually supported Queen Caroline. We are not told why Mr. Pusey objected to his second son's attachment to Miss Barker, the daughter of John Raymond Barker, of Fairford Hall, which the elder brother detected as early as 1818, nor why the lady's family objected too, even when Mr. Pusey withdrew his objection in 1827. Pusey would have been sickly in any case; he suffered a good deal at Eton from shyness and unfitness for games, though his generosity and simplicity seem to have made him as nearly popular as was possible under the circumstances. That his deep affections were thwarted on the threshold of manhood left a permanent trace upon his character. When he travelled on the Continent—which his father, after some hesitation, allowed—he saw everything with the eyes of Byron: he even thought of giving up his degree, but was, of course, too dutiful to do it. When he entered for a fellowship at Oriel in 1813 he very nearly retired in despair, though he might have known that he could reckon on the influence of Keble, who had been immensely impressed by his translation of Pindar when he went up for his degree.

Before his election he had already become involved in religious controversy. An intimate school friend, who is to go down to posterity as Z, had been bitten by the lucubrations of Dupuis, an eccentric French savant who had the honesty to vote against the execution of Louis XVI., and in 1794 published a crazy key to all mythologies (including Christianity), on the hypothesis that they were explanations of historic or prehistoric zodiacs. Z expected to convert Pusey, and, failing this, persuaded himself that Pusey's answer to Dupuis would do more for truth than his adhesion. Dupuis died in 1801, deservedly forgotten; but Pusey could not forget. When he went to Germany in 1825, he wanted to arm himself to refute Dupuisianism as well as to master the untranslated portion of the works of Lessius, then the latest and, as he hoped, the ripest of apologists. In the interval between his degree and his first visit to Germany he was chiefly influenced by Dr. Lloyd, the Regius Professor of Divinity, who retained his post after his appointment to the Bishopric of Oxford. A hint from him sent Pusey to Germany, and interrupted his intercourse with John Henry Newman, before friendship could ripen into intimacy. Newman, as is known, had passed rapidly from questioning patronage to affectionate veneration: we hear nothing of what Pusey thought at this stage of Newman.

Dr. Lloyd was in earnest both about religion and knowledge, and it was an honour for Pusey to be his favourite pupil. Lloyd's high opinion of him did much to secure him the Chair of Hebrew, but it does not seem that he did anything to guide his pupil. Pusey discovered for himself very early that the Old Testament was the weak point of orthodoxy: his orthodoxy was even then of a kind to take alarm at Eichhorn, who regarded himself as "too orthodox," because he still maintained the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch while making fun of Balaam's ass. But what really influenced Pusey in Germany was the religious reaction against the Aufklärung: it had not yet divided its strength between the ultra-confessional party and the school of neo-pietists which ranged from Schleiermacher to Neander. The one fact which struck Pusey in a very complicated situation was that the elder Rationalists were in a real sense the heirs of the fossil orthodoxy of the sixteenth century: they had not started with anything like a revolt against the traditional view of the Bible, they supposed themselves to be defending its authority by explaining it rationally and historically. It is equally true that the elder Latitudinarians in England were docile to ecclesiastical authority in matters of practice, and were rewarded by being indulged in many liberties in the sphere of transcendental theory. Pusey had certainly reason to suspect that the old orthodox school of Herbert Marsh, who detected eight documents more or less in the Synoptic Gospels and tried to exclude Calvinists from ordination by eighty questions, would lapse easily into Rationalism with the progress of knowledge. But he was too respectful to authority to say so, and consequently people were much puzzled by his fervid reply to H. J. Rose, who maintained—quite falsely—that German theologians, who for two centuries and a half had been rigidly orthodox, had fallen into rationalism for want of bishops. Probably the unmistakable learning and piety with which Pusey beat the air, so far as could be seen on the Liberal side, was rather favourable to his career than otherwise; and he derived help and stimulus from his intimate friendship with Tholuck, who after a fit of school-boy infidelity had experienced an evangelical conversion.

Pusey retained a good many of the Liberal superstitions. When, at last, he was engaged to Miss Barker, he told her that her namesake St. Catharine, of Siena, was certainly hysterical, he hoped not an impostor. He lived, of course, to regret the suspicion; but it was something to have discovered that, sincere or insincere, inspired or hysterical, she was certainly prompted and used. He reproached himself a good deal in after life for having been full at this period of unripe ambitions. If so, he was soon to do heavy penance for them. It was fashionable at the time to assume that comparative Semitic philology was the key to the problems of Biblical exegesis. He laboriously mastered Arabic; and when he had returned to Oriel and married, and Lloyd had secured his appointment to the Hebrew professorship, he found that the first serious task awaiting him was to complete his predecessor's Catalogue of the Arabic MSS. at the Bodleian. The performance occupied him for seven years, and we are assured that it placed him in the first rank of contemporary Arabists: he rose morning after morning to his task, and was tempted to envy a bricklayer.

Before he obtained the Hebrew professorship, Pusey had co-operated with Newman, in appointing Hawkins to be Provost of Oriel, though Keble half desired the position in his coy way. Both from their own point of view made a mistake, the less excusable because they venerated Keble before they had read the Christian Year. Pusey never ceased to regret it: Newman thought it a felix culpa, which made the Oxford Movement possible. But Pusey dated the Oxford Movement from the publication of the Christian Year, Newman from the Sermon on National Apostasy. For the first three years Pusey (though he contributed a Tract on Fasting) was forced to stand aside. He was chained to his Catalogue. When he was set free, Newman was thinking of giving up the Tracts: they were not selling well; he was out of spirits and out of breath. Pusey's voluminous Tract on Baptism, which made up three numbers of the series, gave him a breathing space. It marked an epoch in the series and in the author's life. There are several characteristic things about it. The first edition of the first part was 49 pages, the second was 400; though the author only knew the Fathers through indices, he already trusted them fully; he insisted that the benefits of baptism were known by faith, and he was surprised that to most of the school, who thought that the benefits of conversion (which, according to him, the baptised ought not to need) were known by experience, the doctrine of baptismal regeneration appeared in the light of a soul-destroying heresy. Indeed, through all his long and full life (except, perhaps, in his early controversy with Rose), Pusey never wasted time or strength in pretending to understand the position of his opponents: he was always content to make the most of the truth they held in common with him. This was the more meritorious, as he held strongly that intellectual error, where not hereditary, is generally due to moral delinquency. According to Dr. Liddon, this conviction was impressed on him by his correspondence with Z., who (it seems) was vicious as well as perversely clever. Beyond doubt, faults of conduct and temper are punished by faults of judgment—especially in those important questions which have to be left to tact or instinct because evidence is scanty and decision urgent: e.g., all thinking men do, or do not, assume that progress is illimitable, that truth is always salutary. Pusey thought that a man, who seemed to be going wrong over any question soever, could only be set right by being brought to conviction of sin.

Mrs. Pusey was much impressed by the Tract, but she liked Newman's sermons better; and her husband's humility accepted and explained the preference. Both Newman and Pusey lived up to the saying, "In honour preferring one another." Perhaps a time came when Newman silently made allowances for Pusey's limitations; no such time came to Pusey. There can be no doubt that Pusey's domestic life exercised a decisive influence on the development of his character. The death of his eldest child, in 1832, struck him, in spite of all that Newman and Keble could say, as some sort of a judgment: as if it was his fault she missed the blessing of length of days. When in 1839 he lost his wife, who had been so strong and brilliant, while her conscience permitted her to enjoy the world and adorn it, the same thought came back with tyrannous overpowering strength: he felt called to dedicate himself to lifelong penitence and to retire from the world of Oxford dinner parties. His best friends thought the feeling morbid; perhaps intense feeling in a fallen world is hardly ever perfectly healthy. Certainly his intensity was the secret of Pusey's power. Saintliness apart, Newman was a man of genius; saintliness apart, Pusey was a warm-hearted and munificent man of learning, an heroically industrious scholar without the instinct of scholarship.

In the earlier crises of the movement he was, upon the whole, a moderating influence of a peculiar kind: he never went quite so far as Newman, he always backed him up with his full strength. In the Hampden controversy, he saw more clearly than Newman that in spite of his pretentious theories Hampden was personally orthodox; but he voted for all that was done. We are not told what part he took when Rose insisted that the Oxford writers should show cause why the Movement should not remain purely Anglican instead of becoming Patristic. A letter to Hook on the meaning of Tractarianism has a good deal of the wisdom of Gamaliel. When, in 1838, Bishop Bagot showed signs of taking alarm and Newman talked of stopping the Tracts, Pusey proved that those who had given his name to the movement were right. Both Pusey and Newman were easily pained, Pusey perhaps the more easily of the two; but when Newman was in pain, he was almost always bewildered and ready to come to a standstill. Pusey, who never took thought for himself, went his way in spite of pain. He was always steadfast, always hopeful: his other gifts seem to have ripened rather late. He developed into a great tactician, who kept an academical majority together in face of all manner of discouragement from outside; but there is little in these volumes to prepare us for this. What strikes us rather is how many false moves he made, and how little harm they did him. For instance, when he gave £5000 to the first East-end Fund, Bishop Blomfield snubbed him for wanting to earmark the churches to be built under it in the interests of orthodoxy. When Isaac Williams wished to succeed Keble as Professor of Poetry, Pusey made the mistake of accepting the theological challenge thrown down by a section of Garbett's supporters, and the further mistake of imputing the tactics of that section to all. When the Martyrs' Memorial was started, he tried to get a church built to commemorate not the Reformers, but the Reformation. When the Jerusalem Bishopric was invented, he was favourable at first to the scheme, which was popular among some of his German friends. When he discovered that there were hardly any Jewish or Anglican Christians for a bishop of Jerusalem to rule over, he drew back upon the ground that Germany was not worthy of the undesired blessing of episcopacy, with which the reigning king of Prussia wished to endow his dominions by a side wind. But, though Pusey in the period covered by these volumes seldom understood a situation, his buoyant, patient, single-hearted zeal generally enabled him to push his way through it, in what he thought the right direction, and to clear a path for others. On minor points his spirit of penitential simplicity had the effect of prudence: in 1839 he discouraged the use of vestments and the practice of hanging rooms with black velvet in Lent.

It is amazing that a man who was at the centre of things should have succeeded in fighting through the battle of Tract XC. without seeing that it was written for men who preferred the Church of Rome to the Church of England. Possibly Pusey defended Newman all the more effectually because he could not or would not understand him. He substituted the question whether the Articles condemned the Fathers for Newman's question whether they condemned Rome. Pusey succeeded in averting the suppression of Tract XC., and so enabled Newman to display "his beautiful ἡδονή" as it struck his friends: "to take out the worth of his snubbing" as it struck himself in the famous letter to Bishop Bagot. Archbishop Howley (whose part in the crisis has not been generally known hitherto) took the very sensible line that as Newman would not retract he had better not explain, and that the Tractarians would do well to drop the controversy and turn to other subjects. It would have been easy to silence Newman even without silencing Faussett; it would have been feasible to silence Pusey, but it was useless so long as nothing was done to silence Ward, Oakley, and Mozley.

At one time the three leaders of the party grouped themselves in pairs in a curious way: Keble and Newman both inherited Froude's dislike to the Reformation and the Reformers; Pusey stood by himself in hoping that the Reformers were in the main good Catholics, loyal to the Fathers though bewildered by continental theories. He was surer, also, of the Church of England than Keble, who limited himself to the position that the risk of sin in staying was less than the risk of sin in going; on the other hand, he was much less really Anglican in his temper than Keble. With the sublime absence of foresight which characterised him at the time, as soon as the quarrel over Tract XC. had been patched up, he went over to Ireland to study the working of sisterhoods. Of course he was suspected in consequence, though he came back even safer than he went: he had discovered that the system commonly misnamed Mariolatry would neither be given up or explained away. What deepened the suspicion for the time was that he set himself to naturalise the ascetic and devotional literature of the counter-Reformation, and as he agreed with Ward on the subject, said so in a preface with his accustomed chivalry.

In 1843 Pusey's own turn came to suffer from the growing unpopularity of the Movement. He preached a well-known sermon on the Eucharist. The second volume is adorned with a lifelike sketch of how he looked when preaching it. The face is curiously unlike the mitis sapientia of the portrait in the first volume. The story of his suspension is told fully for the first time. Perhaps it will hardly sustain the indignation which was provoked at the time. If, as Laud thought, a censorship of sermons is desirable for the protection of their hearers, it is obviously undesirable that a sermon which may deserve censure should be the subject of a public trial and a prolonged controversy. The six doctors were quite in their right in condemning the sermon without hearing the author, as the Congregation of the Index always does—always supposing that six doctors are to have the power of condemning sermons. When they had done this, as they wished to avoid a suspension, Hawkins, who would have made an excellent inquisitor, drew up a very skilful list of propositions to be retracted, and sent them to Pusey through Jelf. Pusey, who seems to have imagined that all the eucharistic language of every canonised Father must be absolutely accurate, declined to give way. When the suspension came, Pusey said truly that he had been condemned unheard. Hawkins was shabby enough to assert that the confidential communications through Jelf after the censure were equivalent to a hearing! It was all the more shabby because Pusey had pledged himself to secrecy as to the nature of the communications. This, no doubt, goes far to excuse, if not to justify, the harshness with which Hawkins is treated throughout the book; and he is the only person on the other side who is treated harshly. Longley, who, when St. Saviour's, Leeds, was building, was frightened and fussy to the point of being disingenuous, is let off easily upon the whole: this was due to the president of the first Pan-Anglican Conference. When even Pusey came to see that Newman could not be kept in the Church of England—an object for which he was willing to try everything, even a friendly suit in the ecclesiastical courts to whitewash the censored sermon—he came to the conclusion that it must be Newman's providential mission to reform the Church of Rome.

Nearly everything that is written about the latter half of the Oxford Movement is distressing reading, for this reason among others, that everybody asked what is right, hardly anybody asked what is true; and, if anybody thought they knew what was true, it took years to settle whether it was right or a duty to act on the knowledge. Few men have loved truth more than Pusey; few have trusted it less. When the Library of the Fathers was planned, neither he nor Newman had read Origen. Newman had looked into the reply to Celsus, and been struck by it; but Pusey vetoed the translation of a work which quoted the profanities of Celsus. Our case would be hopeless if, as he held, holiness were the only guide to truth: happily, truth frees and sanctifies.

G. A. SIMCOX.

Poems. By Arthur Christopher Benson. (Elkin Mathews & John Lane).

WE appear to be passing through one of those recurrent periods when the popular neglect of poetry is replaced for a few months or moments by a considerable curiosity. This, then, is the occasion for any man of spirit to be young, and to write in verse. The cohorts of youth seem to be multitudinous, if we may judge from the advertising columns of the poets' publishers. They come down on us, like Matthew Arnold's Bacchanals, "Scattering the past about, Clearing a stage." Not all have come to stay, not all are chosen; but all are welcome while they glitter and carol across the path of the middle-aged person: each has the charm of possibility, of the unknown sentiment. Among the poets of the present season Mr. Benson, or I am much mistaken, is not the least welcome nor the least likely to endure.

The chaos of our taste in art tends to widen and swallow us up entirely. Less and less every year is there apparent any central principle in our literature, or any formula in our plan of execution. In 1693 there was room for each individuality to express itself, yet every poet wrote in a manner resembling that of Dryden. If that was the most rigid moment in our literary history, 1893 is surely the most undisciplined. The future critic of Victorian poetry will find Mr. Watson writing by the side of Mr. Swinburne and Mr. Kipling elbowing Mr. Coventry Patmore; he must explain the phenomenon as he can. Mr. Arthur Benson enters this wrangling parliament of poets and takes a seat on the extreme right. In a French newspaper the other day it was stated that only "les auteurs Anglais les plus osés, les plus émancipés" had been invited to feast with our singular guest, M. Zola. I know not how that may have been, but I scarcely imagine that Mr. Benson was of the company. In the chaos of our living poetry he holds on his course upon the calmer wave. He seems to me the most eighteenth-century of our later candidates for Parnassus; and his verse, beyond a slight tincture of Tennyson, betrays no influence later than that of Collins and Cowper.

Those who saw the privately-printed Le Cahier Jaune of 1892 will acknowledge in the present collection increased firmness of touch, art in selection, and critical force. To approach the central characteristics of Mr. Benson's poetry, some negatives are first required. We must observe what he is not. He is then—so far as his talent is as yet revealed—not impassioned, not impetuous, not particularly versatile or varied. What we discover in this little book is reflection concentrated on natural objects with a purpose that is always directed to edification, to the moral encouragement or reproof of self. This mood, one not a little unusual in the work of a young man, expresses itself in the manner which we will presently attempt to analyse. In the meantime, be it said, to return to our negatives, that the mood excludes all reference to love, as a passion, all curiosity as to remote or wide interests, whether personal or of the race, all choice of dramatic or narrative themes. What we have here is a bundle of ethical lyrics: delicate voluntaries of the soul speaking to itself in solitude.

It might seem to follow from what has just been said that Mr. Benson is a Wordsworthian. But, although the influence of Tennyson may be felt here and there, that of Wordsworth is curiously absent. Mr. Benson's attitude to Nature is pre-Wordsworthian, and cannot be appreciated unless this is clearly understood. He observes natural objects in a Dutch, near-sighted way, and his landscapes have no distance. Most subjective, he is yet not at all analytical; and in this his manner reminds the reader, as we have suggested, of Cowper's. It is, at any rate, curiously unlike that of Wordsworth or Coleridge. There is no trace of pantheism, no consciousness of a living spirit in the broad forms of landscape; but a detached object, often a very humble one, reminds the poet of a spiritual experience, serves, in fact, as a parable to him, and in so doing reveals its aspects to him with startling clearness. It is not of an English poet of our day that one thinks as one reads these sincere and tender pieces, but rather of some of the French pastoral poets, and most of all of André Theuriot. Those who, twenty years ago, read Le Chemin des Bois with delight, have a similar pleasure offered to them by Mr. Benson to-day.

The clearness with which the natural objects are seen by our poetic philosopher must now be proved by one or two quotations. In the opening poem of the volume (it is not the best), the text of the parable is a bunch of fritillaries.

"Rare and curious things,
Indeed! no kinship theirs with homely flowers,
That bloom on gravelled hills, or in the waste,
Or in the tumbled pasture—withered, dry,
Faint-tinted, spotted like an ocelot's skin,
Streaked like the banded viper, with their lean Sleek stalks."

If there is any living poet who could give so vivid a picture in six lines, it is Lord De Tabley; and his diction would probably have been more sumptuous. Another example of Mr. Benson's effective simplicity may be taken from "The Mole":

"Thy comfortable cape so defty dight,
Unnoted girds thee round;
Who set those hands so scholarly and white
To fumble underground?"

A lyric shorter than the rest may, in this connexion, be quoted entire:

"THE WATER-OUSEL"

"A shadow by the water's edge,
A flash across the mossy ledge,
That stems the roaring race.
Dark were his plumes as dim twilight,
The crescent on his throat gleamed white,
The breeze was in his face.

"I follow, but he flies before,
And when I gain the sandy shore
Close, close, methinks, behind;
His tiny footprints speck the beach,
He fleets to some sequestered reach,
A shadow on the wind.

"Love flies me as that dusky bird;
I, too, have marked his flight, and heard
The rustle of his wings.
He leads me with divine deceit,
To trace the print of vanished feet,
Not where he nests and sings."

From "In Exile" I cut four lines for their picturesque felicity:

"The steep and stony field, I trow,
That feeds the rushing water-head,
Is thick with sorrel tall ere now,
A dimpling sheet of filmy red."

Such happy painting of familiar English features occurs in almost every poem, and is a very definite gift. Nothing is common or mean to Mr. Benson: his gaze concentrates itself on a weed, on a bird, on an insect, and does not wander from it till it has seized its form and colour, and has translated into a verbal message its parabolic significance.

Unambitious of metrical effect, Mr. Benson contents himself with simple stanzaic forms and artless measures. In this age of executive skill it is possible that some of his readers will regret a certain absence of the beauty of form. But I am not sure that this would be judicious, nor that his gnomic fancies could find a better vehicle than these very simple and straightforward stanzas.

Mr. Benson's sonnets are not always quite regular, but they are often admirably turned. The following, called "Waste," is dignified and pathetic, particularly in the sestet:

"Blind fate, that broodest over human things,
That through thy long inheritance of tears
Dost bring to birth, through sad and shapeless years,
One poet, heart and voice; but ere he sings,
Thou dost delight to sever, to estrange,
To bid the restless brain reluctant sleep,
And toss his glories to the common heap,
Waiting thy leisure, and the world's slow change.
As some dishevelled garden, when the frost Crusts the dry turf, and blunders through the lines
Of summer's green battalions, laying low
The towering lupines that untimely blow;
And o'er the leaves in rich disorder tossed
The unavailing sun in mockery shines."

In welcoming what is practically a first volume of unusual delicacy and rare moral beauty, we are permitted, perhaps, to warn the accomplished young poet of two dangers. He must not be careless (we find "O hands . . . where are thou" on p. 75, and a squinting Medea on p. 191), and he must be solicitous to interest, not himself only, but the frivolous reader. I remember that Rossetti once said to me—and startled his inexperienced listener—"literature, and poetry especially, has got to be amusing." The best poetry of the world, no doubt, with so many other qualities, does possess that of being "amusing"; and a young poet cannot afford to forget that reflections, however apt and pictorial, which are confined to the knapwort and the dragonfly may cease to hold the reader's attention. I merely indicate a danger; Mr. Benson will doubtless follow the bent of his own talent.

EDMUND GOSSE.

"GREAT FRENCH WRITERS." — Théophile Gautier. By Maxime du Camp. Translated by J. E. Gordon. Preface by Andrew Lang. (Fisher Unwin.)

"Of the man I will say but one thing, he was a good man in every sense of the word": so does M. Maxime du Camp vouch for Gautier's moral excellence. But, in truth, the statement can scarcely stand without qualification, for Gautier's "goodness" was compatible with several literary productions, with a good deal of talk, with many actions, to which the epithet "good," in any ordinary acceptance, can scarcely be applied. Speaking strictly, his "goodness" consisted in a certain generosity of temperament, in a readiness to help and support his immediate relations, and in the free acceptance of responsibilities which better men would not have incurred, and baser men would have repudiated.

The "hirsute generation" of 1830, to borrow M. Zola's expression, did not, as a rule, grow old to advantage; and Gautier should always have remained young. If there is something that provokes a smile in the figure of the boy paladin of the first nights of "Hernani," battling for the Ideal in scarlet doublet and with long flowing locks, at any rate the smile is altogether kindly. There is something bright and boyish too, albeit of non-English fashion, in the picture of his youth as presented by M. Arsène Houssaye. He is boisterous, he is noisy, he dances the mad dances of the time, he plays practical jokes at the expense of the hated bourgeois, he indulges in a thousand wild pranks, he talks a strange affected jargon—he works strangely too, lying on his stomach to write Mademoiselle de Maupin, and stroking cats in the intervals of inspiration. It is all a little crazy, and not a little affected, and yet withal exuberant and young. "We poets," says Wordsworth, "in our youth begin in gladness, but thereof comes in the end despondency and madness." Gautier did not end in madness like his friend Gérard de Nerval. But evil days came upon him. He had fairly expensive tastes, he was generous, he had no fortune. With large reading, a superb memory and a ready pen, journalism naturally became his staff of life. But as he leant upon it, it pierced his hand. He wearied of dramatic and literary criticism: hated his daily task—a task, moreover, for which he was at no time "paid profusely." "Ce pauvre Théo" became his pet rueful description of himself.

Would he have done great things, as M. du Camp argues, if he had been released from his hack work? Would the French government have earned the thanks of posterity if it had enabled him, by pension or sinecure, to concentrate his efforts on some magnum opus? Mr. Andrew Lang thinks not, quoting very appositely the case of Paul de Saint-Victor, whose newspaper criticism was often brilliant while his ambitious "Les deux Masques" did not in the least prove to be an epoch-making production. Sooth to say, Gautier, with all his great literary gifts, his varied knowledge, his love of art, his rich verbal palette, his talent for depicting the outward show of things, his "impeccable" style, wanted stuff. He was an excellent virtuoso of the pen. He played upon the instrument of language admirably, both in prose and verse. But he had nothing of deep import to say, no strong human feeling or passion calling for utterance. M. Scherer was, no doubt, looking at his work too exclusively from one point of view when he declared that all manly thought was foreign to it. But the accusation cannot be regarded as altogether unjust. And this, by the way, may help to solve the problem which puzzled Sainte-Beuve, who wondered why it was that Gautier should be comparatively unpopular, while Musset had been taken to the heart of the French people.

"Ce pauvre Théo" has not been unfortunate in his present biographer. M. Maxime du Camp had the advantage of knowing him well, and says fit things about his "youth," and his characteristics as "critic," "traveller," "story-teller," and "poet." Perhaps, if one wanted to hint a fault, one might hazard the remark that the book inclines unduly to criticism rather than biography, and that M. Maxime du Camp, who is always a serious writer, somewhat fails to place before us the living Gautier, who, serious enough in his respect for his art, was so often not serious in speech and action. But, after all, in these days of anecdote and scandal, when small personal matters receive such disproportionate attention, it is impossible to quarrel very much with a biographer for considering an author's literary work as the most important thing about him. Gautier, when we have carped our worst, has a right to a place among the "great French writers"—he ought, of course, to have had a chair at the Academy; and in M. Maxime du Camp he finds a worthy expositor and critic. Nor is the book the worse for Mr. Lang's sparkling introduction, in which, remembering doubtless Coleridge's saying that,

"Perhaps 'tis pretty to force together Thoughts so all unlike each other,"

he takes occasion to place Gautier and Scott in juxtaposition.

One little fling at perfidious Albion M. du Camp might have spared us. He quotes "the last words spoken by Sir Walter Raleigh before kneeling on the scaffold which his former mistress—she whom England still names the Great Elizabeth—had caused to be erected for him." Elizabeth may, or may not, have been great; but she had no hand in the erection of that scaffold.

FRANK T. MARZIALS.

History of St. Edmund's College, Old Hall.
By the Very Rev. Bernard Ward,
President. (Kegan Paul & Co.)

SCHOOL histories are not commonly inviting reading, but the volume before us is an exception. It owes its interest in a great degree to the fact that it is not a mere history of the school or college so well known to Roman Catholics as Old Hall; but it also gives a well-written, though of course highly condensed, sketch of the educational institutions of the English Catholic body from the days of Queen Elizabeth to the present time.

Saint Edmund's College, Old Hall, was established in 1793; but it was a daughter of Douay College, founded in 1568, mainly for training priests for the English mission, but furnishing also a means of education for the sons of the Catholic gentry who were in the time of the Penal Laws prevented from matriculating at our universities, and in many instances debarred from the use of our grammar schools. Cardinal Allen, its founder, was an Oxford man, Principal of Saint Mary's Hall in the reign of Mary I. Soon after the accession of Elizabeth he threw up his preferment and fled to Flanders; thus Old Hall has a shadowy connexion with Oxford, and the educational discipline of the mediaeval church.

Terrible as was the injury done to the higher education of France by the storm of the Revolution, it was an advantage to English Catholics as it swept away the continental colleges and compelled them to found schools for themselves in their own land. The greater part of the first batch of teachers and pupils at Old Hall were refugees from Douay; and even to the present day, as we gather from the volume before us, some of the old Douay traditions are retained.

Those who are anxious for side-lights on the Revolution and the Terror should not fail to consult Mr. Ward's pages. Many of the details he gives of the sufferings and flight of the Douay men will be new to them. They were fortunate in escaping with their lives. As it was, all the property of the College was lost. Before they left, some of their more valuable plate was buried inside the walls of the College. There it remained undiscovered until 1863, when, by the permission of Napoleon III., it was searched for and discovered by the late Monsignor Serle. The greater part of this interesting find was divided between Old Hall and Ushaw.

The College had at first to struggle with many difficulties. When founded, the English Catholic body had only just been relieved from the more stringent of the Penal Laws. They had been cowed by centuries of persecution and hardly dared to exercise their legal rights. A plan was, however, sketched for a long block of new buildings in 1793. We are glad that this costly plan never passed beyond the paper stage. Surely nothing more ugly was ever designed even in the Georgian era. It reminds us of the sketches of great men's stables and dog-kennels which are scattered through the early volumes of the Sporting Magazine. The house as it exists at present is not a work of art, but it is in no way repulsive. The chapel, though we believe but a portion of what was intended, is a favourable specimen of modern decorated architecture, although in our opinion the windows are on too large a scale for the size of the building.

Mr. Weld tells a curious ghost story regarding a member of the Weld family, which is far better authenticated than such things usually are.

EDWARD PEACOCK.

An Introduction to the Study of Political Economy. Translated from the Italian of Prof. Luigi Cossa by L. Dyer. (Macmillans.)

THIS is a careful rendering, under supervision of the author, of the third edition (1892) of Prof. Cossa's "Guide to the Study of Political Economy." The second edition was translated into English in 1880; and the translation, a modest volume of 237 pages, was commended to the English people (in a Preface) by the late Prof. Jevons. Its merits were at once recognised. The present volume is more than double the size of the old one; and, though the general plan is the same, the alterations and additions make it practically a new book.

The growth of literature on the subject has been so great that the list of writers quoted has swelled (in round numbers) from 700 to 2000. The author has modified some of the views (e.g., on Protection), to which Prof. Jevons took exception in 1880. His general attitude remains as it was. He welcomes the old and the new in political economy. Theory, practice, and history are all within the range of his sympathies. He gives every new view his ear; but his voice is still for the classical tradition, and for the economic theory that has grown out of the teachings of the classical economists. This appears especially in the "Theoretical Part" (pp. 1-110); but, as the second or "Historical Part" (pp. 113-549) is full of criticism and comment, it is hardly less evident there. Indeed, the interweaving of history and theory is a feature of the whole book.

The theoretical part deals with method, definition, classification, as becomes an Introduction. The history is not of events but of ideas, and of ideas mainly as expressed in books. It proceeds in chronological order from the Greeks and Romans to the Physiocrats and their English contemporaries (chaps. i.-viii.). After this point it proceeds mainly by nationalities; and we have chapters on political economy in England (chap. ix.), in France (x.), in Germany (xi.), in Austria, Holland, and Spain (xii.), in Scandinavia and Russia (xiii.), in America (xiv.), and, last but not least of the nations, in Italy (xv.). Then follows finally a chapter (xvi.) on Contemporary Theories of Socialism, which is scarcely in line with the others.

The title, "Introduction to the Study of Political Economy," hardly conveys the scope of the work. It is really a "guide-book to books," though it is something more. Prof. Cossa insists that it is still "an elementary book, written specially for my pupils," adding quaintly.

"I have wished [it to enable] them to learn by themselves such details touching the rudiments of political economy as have been crowded out of my lectures by the steady expansion of holiday time at the expense of term" (Pref. p. 4.)

In this country at least it will be more used by graduates than by undergraduates. Currency and finance are too little noticed, perhaps because the author has written a separate treatise on Finance; but, except on these subjects, there is no book to which we can more confidently turn for information about economic writers and writings. For past ages there are no doubt many rival works of reference. For our own times (as regards our living contemporaries in both hemispheres) this book stands by itself.

Prof. Cossa does full justice to his own countrymen; but if he has any prejudice, it is in favour of England and France. It must be said that the following passage is startling in this connexion:

"Nothing is simpler than to subtract from Mill, Garnier, and all the rest, every erroneous affirmation in religion and morals which their writings contain; the remainder is unchanged and is sound economic doctrine" (p. 108).

The translator has here gone beyond his author. The adjective in italics is not in the original; and the meaning seems simply to be that what is left is economic doctrine, which we can look at by itself.

The translation, however, is done with spirit and care. Long sentences are broken up into short, and idiom is rendered by idiom. It should be noted that the chapters have been in some instances renamed and even rearranged. Oversights in statement or description (e.g., as to Harrington, p. 182, Italian ed.) have been corrected. To the author's index of authors, Mr. Dyer has added a useful index of subjects.

J. BONAR.

NEW NOVELS.

The Prince of India. By Lew Wallace. In 2 vols. (Osgood, McIlvaine & Co.)

The Scallywag. By Grant Allen. In 3 vols. (Chatto & Windus.)

Juanita. By J. Fogerty. In 3 vols. (Ward & Downey.)

The Quarry Farm. By J. S. Fletcher. (Ward & Downey.)

From Clue to Capture. By Dick Donovan. (Hutchinson.)

For Marjory's Sake. By Mrs. John Waterhouse. (Digby, Long & Co.)

Platonica. By Henry L'Estrange. (Bristol: Arrowsmith.)

THOUGH published in only two volumes, Mr. Lew Wallace's book, entitled The Prince of India; or, Why Constantinople Fell, occupies nearly eleven hundred closely printed pages, and in reality contains as much matter as a couple of ordinary novels. The "Prince of India," the central figure in his story, is the mythical personage known to all as The Wandering Jew: the man who struck Jesus on His way to crucifixion, and received the sentence, "Do though tarry till I come," which condemns him to perpetual life upon earth until the Second Advent. As the writer has already given forth to the world several similar works of a historical and semi-theological character, such as Ben Hur, The Boyhood of Christ, &c., and exhibits abilities which qualify him to make a distinct bid for fame, his work claims a more than ordinary share of attention. The "Prince of India," having lived through all the centuries since the time of Christ, and being in possession of vast stores of wealth, is represented in these pages as having been an actively instrumental and even determinative agent in nearly every great crisis of history. Thus, he has accomplished the overthrow of the Saracens at the hands of the Crusaders; again he has embraced the Saracen side and is responsible for the defeat of the armies of the Cross, and so forth; now he appears as arbiter of the final destinies of the Byzantine empire, and his influence, as an astrologer, upon Mohammed II. procures the downfall of Constantinople. Mr. Wallace must be admitted to possess a good deal of imaginative fancy, with infinite capacity for elaboration of detail; and we ought under any circumstances, perhaps, to be thankful to a writer who undertakes to clothe the dry bones of history with flesh and blood. Many of his descriptions—e.g., the pilgrimage to Mecca, and the Byzantine palaces—are executed in a masterly manner and with fine appreciation of decorative art. Yet we should hesitate before ascribing any real genius to his work. There is little in it which enlists our hearty sympathy throughout, and much which might reasonably invite disapproval. The choice of a mere legendary character as the basis of an historical story at once diminishes our interest in the narrative of events. In point of religious views, the doctrine of a universal brotherhood based on the teaching of Christ is unexceptionable; but an insinuation conveyed in one part of the story that the cowardly fear exhibited by Demedes, a young Byzantine, when in the presence of death, was due to his Epicurean doctrines is almost puerile. Nevertheless, it is on the whole a remarkable book, and presents some valuable groupings both of historical fact and religious theory. For the story of the siege of Constantinople the author follows Gibbon closely, borrowing also from The Universal History of the Catholic Church and Hammer's Histoire de l'Empire Ottoman.

Why give a novel such a name as The Scallywag? This is the question that will occur to five out of every six readers of Mr. Grant Allen's latest book; and, indeed, one finds it difficult to admit the propriety or dignity of nicknaming a sustained work of creative art after an ephemeral piece of Transatlantic slang. However, there is not much else to find fault with in the novel, which is written in the entertaining and lively vein one expects from this author. Mr. Allen knows a good deal about men, and he talks about them well, here as elsewhere; not quite so much about women, perhaps, but sufficient for the production of some very captivating heroines. He is excellent also when he drops into scenery; but he has rather abandoned this department of late, and we have nothing of it in the present work. The Scallywag is all about Paul Gascoyne, son of Sir Emery Gascoyne, of Hillborough. The latter was unfortunate enough to succeed, in middle life, to a baronetcy without any estates; and, being unable to maintain the position and dignity of the title, he continued to ply his humble calling as cabdriver in his native town. Paul, however, has received a good Oxford education, having been "financed" by Mr. Solomons, a Hebrew auctioneer and estate agent in Hillborough, upon the implied condition of his obtaining the hand of an heiress, and so repaying the debt with abundant interest. Naturally enough, he falls in love with a penniless maiden, and then the Jew's vengeance falls on his head. Money troubles are the subject of a good deal of the story, while as a set-off, on the humorous side, we have Isabel Boyton, an American heiress, and Madame Ceriolo, daughter of an Italian organ-grinder of Saffron Hill, but posing—and cleverly posing—as belonging to an Austrian titled family. Sensational incidents are afforded in a shipwreck and the collapse of a tunnel. Mr. Allen is fond of tunnel accidents. We remember one in his prize novel.

Judged by previous performances, Mr. Fogerty is not likely to do more than barely sustain his reputation by Juanita. He possesses descriptive ability of a superficial kind without much command of executive detail, and he is rather too fond of breaking new ground and attempting fresh varieties of scenery and incident. In the present work, which starts at a spot on the West Irish coast, he tells us how the loves of Gerald Morony and Juanita, his cousin, were temporarily interrupted by the advent of Lieutenant Conder, commander of a revenue cutter, bent upon the capture of a local smuggler highly popular in the neighbourhood. For a time Juanita allows her affections to wander off in the direction of the dashing and romantic young officer, the first she has ever been introduced to. The scene is afterwards transferred to some desolate islands off the north coast of Sicily; but as the gay lieutenant has now passed out of the sphere of possible courtship, and plays a rather inglorious rôle, finally winding up as a Levantine trader and the husband of Zelig Ferranti, a young Italian of the organ-grinding order, he no longer interests the reader. There is a Jesuit who interferes dangerously at appropriate intervals, and a rascally Greek trader who seizes a favourable opportunity for doing a little piracy and brigandage. These two personages between them cause most of the excitement and interest of the second and third volumes. Putting aside structural defects, the novel is by no means dull, and should pass muster well enough as a contribution to romance of average merit.

Mr. J. S. Fletcher delights in telling last-century tales about people who lived in farmhouses and cottages in the country between Pontefract and Doncaster. The Quarry Farm is a charming little tale in one volume. It is full of quaint and homely pictures of rustic life fully equal to those in When Charles the First was King, by the same author; while, so far as we have noticed, it is free from the anachronistic blunders which disfigure the latter work. Miranda Bennett, a prim and steady young woman of business, carries on the Quarry Farm after the death of her father and mother and, in spite of gloomy forebodings on the part of her neighbours, makes a commercial success of it. Her sister Juliet—vain, idle, pretty, and eighteen years of age—lives with her, and, at the opening of the story, is engaged to a worthy yeoman named Stephen Blunt. But a handsome cousin appears on the scene, and Juliet and he fall desperately in love. Just on the eve of her wedding with Stephen, he persuades her to elope with him, and all seems to point to a sorrowful tale of ruin and desertion and misery, after the usual fashion. Things, however, take a pleasant turn after all, and the novel is thoroughly enjoyable.

Readers are apparently never weary of perusing records of the detection of crime: otherwise there should be nothing to encourage Dick Donovan, already responsible for some ten or a dozen books of the sort, to present us now with From Clue to Capture, a title sufficiently indicative of the contents of the volume. It is a collection of short stories, twelve in number, illustrated with drawings of more than average merit, mostly by Mr. Paul Hardy. Of the stories themselves there is nothing particular to be said; a family likeness necessarily pervades them, and the only originality possible is in the attendant circumstances. Dick Donovan may be congratulated on his ingenuity and fertility of resource in this respect. "The Jewelled Skull" and "The Story of the Great Cat's Eye" are about the best specimens of his skill.

For Marjory's Sake is a story of South Australian life; but in point of fact the scene might have been laid in any part of the English-speaking world, so far as any light is thrown on local peculiarities of speech or custom. A comparison of the story with any of the really good books that have been written about Australia, such as those which are constantly coming from the pen of Mr. Boldrewood—to say nothing of Charles Reade and Henry Kingsley—will at once draw attention to the poverty of resource and lack of descriptive power exhibited by its writer. Mrs. John Waterhouse tells us a story of rather humdrum domestic life, with scarcely anything in the nature of a plot, except such as is created by a misunderstanding arising from a piece of malicious scandal spread by one of the jealous lovers of the tale. Nothing in the nature of picturesque detail is anywhere to be found, and scarcely anything to show that the author is even conversant with the special habits of the people she describes.

An amusing little Jules-Vernesque novelette, named Platonis, reads quite refreshingly after the rubbish that is commonly sold for a shilling between paper covers. Two friends, Henry L'Estrange and Lawrence Raylton, start on an aerial voyage in a ship resembling a torpedo in shape and stored with vast quantities of magnetic power for purposes of propulsion through space. After visiting the moon they arrive at Platonis, a planet peopled with human beings similar to ourselves, but civilised up to the point of having a "parliament of man and federation of the world," and being entirely free—through their own efforts—from war, poverty, and such-like evils. The general idea is, of course, the same as in Lord Lytton's Coming Race and all other descriptions of Utopia. The two voyagers each have a love adventure, and ultimately return in safety to earth.

JOHN BARROW ALLEN.

SOME COLONIAL BOOKS.

Australian Commonwealths (New South Wales, Tasmania, Victoria, Western Australia, South Australia, Queensland, New Zealand.) By Greville Tregarthen. (Fisher Unwin.) This is the thirty-fifth volume of the series called "The Story of the Nations." To publications of this character it may be objected that the various parts are of very unequal interest, and yet they must be treated in a somewhat procrustean manner, the most interesting being necessarily cut short, and the least interesting lengthened out of all proportion. If anyone will cast his eye over the list of volumes already published, he will see at a glance what a want of proportion there is in the parts. Ireland seems to be treated as of equal importance with Rome, and the Barbary Corsairs with the Byzantine Empire. The writer of the present volume has done what he could to obviate this difficulty by grouping New Zealand and the six Australian colonies into a single volume. But do what he will, he cannot give a charm to these terribly modern states, and he can hardly avoid some feeling of envy towards those of his colleagues who have been entrusted with the imperishable glories of Rome, of Carthage, or of Switzerland. This is not his fault; it is the misfortune of his subject. Mr. Tregarthen gives us a somewhat matter-of-fact account of the rise of the colonies, of their several governors, and of the development of their forms of parliamentary government. He devotes nearly half the book to New South Wales; the other five colonies, of Tasmania, Victoria, Western Australia, South Australia, and Queensland, together take no more room than is devoted to the parent colony. We think he has unduly abridged his account of New Zealand; for that colony possesses an element of interest in the Maori race and the Maori wars which is wanting in the other colonies, and which, by its picturesque aspect, helps to redeem it in some measure from the painful commonplace of Australia.

The History of South Australia from its Foundation to the Year of its Jubilee. With a chronological summary of all the principal events of interest up to date. By Edwin Hodder. With two maps. (Sampson Low.) Mr. Edwin Hodder is the author of a life of the late Mr. G. F. Angas, who is justly entitled to be called one of the founders of South Australia. Mr. Angas, we are informed, entertained a lifelong desire that a history of the colony he had done so much to develop should be written, and to this end had collected a vast mass of material, hoping some day to write the history himself.

Death, however, cut short his hopes; and his son, the Hon. J. H. Angas, entrusted the materials thus collected to Mr. Hodder, who has a profound veneration for the subject of his former biography, and is deeply impressed with the importance of all that concerns him and his colony. As this history of South Australia is printed and published in London, we presume it is designed for English readers; and if so, we cannot but think it both too long and too diffuse. Mr. Edwin Hodder is undoubtedly industrious and painstaking, but he has no power of concentration: he encumbers his volumes with a quantity of unnecessary matter, and descends to the most trivial details. The exact hour at which one governor set out on an expedition, and the arrival of another at Adelaide without a guard of honour, are in his estimation facts to be recorded as history. South Australia differs from other Australian colonies in two important particulars. First, in its origin, it owes its existence to the theories carried into effect by the strong will of Mr. Edmund Gibbons Wakefield. Secondly, in its having escaped the taint of any connexion with convicts, at least so far as their importation from England was concerned, for at one time the colony was overrun with escaped convicts and ticket of leave men from the neighbouring penal settlements. These miscreants were put down by Mr. Alexander Tolmer, commissioner of police for the colony, who gives a graphic account of his encounters with them in his amusing memoirs, published in 1882. South Australia can boast of one of the greatest triumphs of engineering skill, daring, and perseverance, in the overland telegraph, 2000 miles in length, constructed in less than two years through an almost unknown country inhabited only by savages. When we come to political development, we find one Australian colony very like another; and when, as usually happens, the political leaders are half-educated men with narrow and selfish views, it is difficult to arouse much interest in their proceedings, nor, indeed, is anything of political value to be learned from them.

Outlines of British Colonisation. By William Parr Greswell. (Rivington & Percival.) Here is a strong contrast to the book which has been just noticed. If Mr. Hodder is diffuse, Mr. Greswell is concise. Mr. Hodder spins out the affairs of one colony into two volumes; Mr. Greswell manages in a single volume to give a brief but thoroughly accurate and intelligent account of the whole of our colonial empire.

"This empire," says Mr. Greswell, "is the climax of our struggles, the sum and crown of our endeavours, the chief boast of patriots, the proof of our wealth, without which England would sink into insignificance. Nevertheless it is certain that the popular imagination does not apprehend, in any adequate degree, the immense majesty of this British colonial empire; its story is neglected, its glories are hidden, its trophies are unknown as the waters in which they have been won. The very story of exploration is left unexplored by the callous legatees of the priceless heritage."

Lord Brassey has written an introduction to Mr. Greswell's book. We are glad he has done so; he will help to circulate a really useful and handy work replete with information not elsewhere to be found in so small a compass.

Illustrated Official Handbook of the Cape and South Africa. Edited by John Noble (Edward Stanford). Brown's South Africa. With maps and diagrams. (Sampson Low.) Almost simultaneously we have received these two Guides to South Africa, both of which are published at Cape Town by the well-known firm of Juta. They do not, however, cover quite the same ground. Mr. John Noble has set himself to compile, with the assistance of experts, an official record of information regarding the country, its natural resources, its history, its people, and its productions. So that the result is a sort of encyclopædia, crammed with well-ordered facts, and abundantly illustrated. Mr. Brown, on the other hand, writes primarily for the benefit of the casual visitor, who may be attracted to South Africa by sport, by the hope of health, or merely by curiosity. He is careful to supply details about steamer, railway, and coach routes, about hotels, and about prices and distances. He also gives a series of large-scale maps of the districts which tourists are likely to traverse. Both books may be impartially recommended to that increasing class of Englishmen who are attracted to the Cape by its equable climate and healthy conditions of life.

Geography of Victoria. By Alexander Sutherland. (Macmillans.) The chief interest of this little volume is that it is written in accordance with the programme of the educational department of Victoria, for use in the state schools of that colony. There is much in it that will be new to English readers, and also a few things that are not quite true—especially with regard to Europe.

NOTES AND NEWS.

THE Duke of Argyll, who has already given us so many literary surprises, now announces a volume of poems, called Crux Mundi. It will be published by Mr. John Murray.

MR. JOHN MURRAY has likewise in the press the correspondence of Joseph Jekyll with his sister-in-law, Lady Gertrude Sloane Stanley, 1818-1838. The volume is edited, with a brief memoir, by the Hon. Algernon Bourke.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & Co. have in the press an account of Count Samuel Teleki's hunting and exploring expedition to Eastern Equatorial Africa in 1887 and 1889, which resulted in the discovery of Lakes Rudolf and Stephanie. The book has been written by his companion, Lieut. Ludwig von Höhnel. It will be published in two volumes, with six coloured maps and nearly 180 illustrations.

THE next volume in Mr. Fisher Unwin's "Adventure Series," will be the Travels of Count de Benyowsky in Siberia, Kamtchatka, Japan, the Lincui Islands, and Formosa, about the middle of the last century, edited by Captain Pasfield Oliver.

MR. LEONARD C. SMITHERS has edited a collection of Eastern tales, to which he proposes to give the title of The Thousand and One Quarters of an Hour. The book will be handsomely printed and bound, and issued to subscribers, in the course of November, by Messrs. H. S. Nichols & Co., of Soho-square.

MRS. HODGSON BURNETT's new book, The One I Knew Best of All, with illustrations by Mr. Reginald Birch, will be issued immediately by Messrs. Frederick Warne & Co.

MESSRS. R. BENTLEY & SON will publish early in November a new novel, entitled Tempe, by Miss Constance Cotterell, author of "Strange Gods."

MESSRS. CASSELL & Co. will publish next month a novel entitled Lisbeth, by Leslie Keith.

MESSRS. FREDERICK WARNE & Co. will publish, at the end of the month, Mr. Silas K. Hooking's new book, One in Charity, illustrated by Mr. Harold Brown.

MR. ELLIOT STOCK announces the following novels for publication: Who Would be a Woman? and A Threefold Mystery, by Constance Serjeant.

MR. GEORGE NEWNES's announcements include Queen Victoria's Dolls, reproduced in colour, by special permission, from drawings by Mr. Allan Wright; a second series of The Memoirs of Sherlock Holmes, by Dr. A. Conan Doyle; Illustrated Interviews, by Mr. Harry How; Only a Woman's Heart, by Mr. J. E. Muddock; and a series of illustrated penny tales, reprinted from the Strand Magazine.

MESSRS. JAMES ELLIOTT & Co., of Temple-chambers, announce a poem in blank verse, entitled Avalon, by Mrs. G. T. Stuart-Menteth; and a fantastic story by Mr. Arthur Edward Waite, entitled Belle and the Dragon, illustrated with original designs by Miss E. O. Stuart-Menteth.

WITH a view to the simultaneous publication in America and this country of Vol. I. of Mr. H. D. Traill's Social England, it has been decided by Messrs. Cassell & Co. to postpone the issue until November 6.

DR. FRANCIS H. UNDERWOOD's book on Lowell, entitled The Poet and the Man, which was reviewed in the ACADEMY of September 9, is published in this country by Messrs. Bliss, Sands & Foster, of Craven-street.

WE are informed that Cécile Cassavetti's Anthea; a true story of the Greek War of Independence—of which a cheap edition has just been published by Messrs. Cassell & Co.—has been translated not only into modern Greek, but also into French and German.

MR. WILLIAM TIREBUCK's new novel, Sweetheart Gwen: a Welsh Idyll, has passed into a second edition.

THE Clerk to the House of Representatives at Washington has written to Mr. Barnett Smith as follows, respecting his History of the English Parliament:—

"Your work has been received with great favour here, and in the larger colleges and universities, and it is already regarded as a standard authority. I beg to congratulate you most heartily over the success you have achieved. You have contributed to the world a work which will prove of inestimable value to the students of constitutional and parliamentary history throughout the civilised world."

ON Monday next, Messrs. Sotheby will sell the library of the late Lewis Ll. Dillwyn, who was well known in the House of Commons for many years as member of Swansea. He was also, like his father before him, devoted to zoology; and here will be found some copies of his unfinished Contributions to the Natural History of Labuan and Borneo (1855). There are also several Americana, which have long belonged to the family; and a large number of historical tracts and broadsides. On the next day will follow the sale of the library of Mr. Henry Munster, of Brighton, whose special interest was in the productions of the Aldine press. Of these he had got nearly 150 volumes, including the first Cicero (Epistolae Familiares, 1502), two copies of the first Theocritus (1495), the first Plato (1513), and the first Greek-Latin Dictionary (1497). We may further mention a number of well-bound Elzevirs, and other rare and handsome early editions of the classics.

A NEW edition of Sidney's Arcadia comes to us from Messrs. Sampson Low. Its only real claim to newness, however, is the suppression of the editor's name; for the book is an exact reprint of the late Mr. Hain Friessell's edition, published by the same firm in 1867, though the dedication to Lord Derby, as Prime Minister, is carefully preserved. Print, paper, and binding are good; but the portrait of Sidney, reduced from Vertue's engraving, is not a happy addition.

THE FORTHCOMING MAGAZINES.

THE first number of To-Day, "Jerome K. Jerome's new weekly magazine-journal," will be published on Friday, November 10. The prospectus—which does not err through excess of modesty—holds out an unusual combination of attractions. Besides a serial novel and a short story, each weekly number is to have a full-page cartoon, an illustrated interview, a topical article, a comic poem, journalistic notes, four columns devoted to men's matters, four columns to women's, and one page to children's; while art, literature, theatre, and music are to be treated "as they have never been treated before." It is specially stated that no serial appearing in To-Day will ever be published in book-form until six weeks after its conclusion. Among the contents of the first number will be: the beginning of a story by Mr. R. L. Stevenson, entitled "The Ebb-Tide," which will run for about thirteen weeks; and the beginning of the diary of Sir William Hardman, formerly editor of the Morning Post.

WE understand that Mr. J. W. Moore, of 39, East-street, Chichester, undertakes from December 1, the publication of a new local magazine to be entitled, Southward Ho! Short stories are promised by John Strange Winter, Adeline Sergeant, M. Hepworth Dixon, and others. Prebendary Wood Stephens and Prebendary Gordon will supply papers probably on local topics; while a serial tale by Mr. Stanley Little, "A Wealden Tragedy," announces itself by its very title as concerned with that corner of England to which Southward Ho! is in the main addressed.

THE Century Magazine for November, which begins a new volume, will print a hitherto unpublished poem by Emerson, on the occasion of Lowell's fortieth birthday. Among the other contents are: a paper by Lowell himself on "Humour, Wit, Fun, and Satire"; a series of letters of Edwin Booth, illustrated with a new portrait; the first part of a novelette by Charles Egbert Craddock, entitled "The Casting Vote"; and the conclusion of the diary of the secretary of the admiral who conveyed Napoleon to St. Helena.

THE November number of the National Review will contain the following articles:—"The European Outlook," by Admiral Maxse; "The Garden that I Love," by Mr. Alfred Austin; "In Cabinet Council: a Dialogue," by Mr. H. D. Traill; "Robert Lowe as a Journalist," by Mr. A. Patchett Martin; "Reflections on the Way Home," by Mr. H. E. M. James, of the Indian Civil Service; and "The Matabele War," by Mr. W. Greswell.

THE Quiver commences a new volume with the November part, among the contributors to which are Prof. Blaikie, Canon Girdlestone, and the Rev. P. B. Power. Mr. Raymond Blaythway has an interview with Dr. Jessop; and two new serial stories, entitled "Poor Pride," by Isabel Bellerby, and "Garth Garrickson, Workman: a Story of a Lancashire Lad," are commenced. The illustrations are by W. H. Margetson, W. Rainey, C. M. Demain Hammond, the Countess Orczy, G. C. Haite, and others.

MR. FRANK BARRETT's new story, "The Justification of Andrew Lebrun," will be commenced in the November part of Cassell's Saturday Journal, beginning a new volume.

ON Monday, November 6, Mr. Gilbert Dalziel will publish Christmas Larks, containing a story, entitled "The Ghost of Aubrey Towers," by Mrs. H. T. Johnson.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

ABOUT two years ago, Mr. William J. Harvey received authority from the Cambridge senate to print the official lists of the University; and he has since been entrusted with the corresponding records of all the colleges. He has now advanced so far as to be able to issue a detailed prospectus of the work which he proposes to publish. It will consist of two distinct parts: (1) Graduati Cantabrigienses, or a chronological list of the graduates from 1439 to 1800, with an alphabetical index; and (2) Alumni Cantabrigienses, being the admissions to the several colleges, together with the university matriculations and degrees, from 1443 to 1893, together with biographical details and other notes. Mr. Harvey has—we think wisely—decided to print the latter according to colleges, so that, while Trinity will have three volumes and St. John's two volumes, each of the other colleges will have a volume to itself, with its own introduction and alphabetical index. Including an index volume, the total number of volumes will be twenty-one, each consisting of about 400 pages; and each may be purchased separately at the subscription price of one guinea. Mr. Harvey has undertaken the task on his own responsibility, and at his own cost. Subscriptions should be sent to him, addressed Heatherell, Melbourne-grove, Champion-hill, S.E. We may add that he also has in contemplation a companion work on Trinity College, Dublin, from 1592 to 1892.

MR. MONTAGUE CRACKANTHORPE (formerly Cookson) has been appointed counsel to the University of Oxford, in succession to Lord Justice Davey.

MR. F. DARWIN, reader in botany at Cambridge, has been appointed deputy professor of botany, on behalf of Prof. Babington, during the current academical year.

DURING the past week, Mrs. Moore has offered to present to the Woodwardian Museum at Cambridge the collection of Silurian fossils formed by her father, the late Colonel Fletcher; while the Clarendon Laboratory at Oxford has received from Mr. Henry Wilde the gift of a valuable magnetarium.

DR. E. B. TYLOR, reader in anthropology at Oxford, has made arrangements for three courses of lectures this term. He is himself lecturing on "Races of Mankind, as classified by Language, Civilisation, and History"; Mr. H. Balfour, curator of the Pitt-Rivers Museum, is lecturing on "Progress in the Arts of Mankind"; and Mr. A. Thomson, lecturer in human anatomy, on "Elements of Physical Anthropology, as bearing on the Classification of Races."

MR. W. R. MORFILL, reader in Slavonic at Oxford, was to deliver on Thursday of this week a fourth lecture on "Russian Novelists," dealing with Feodor Dostoevski.

MR. SEDLEY TAYLOR announces three lectures at Cambridge on "Selected Church Cantatas by John Sebastian Bach," illustrated with extracts sung by a quartet of students from the Royal Academy of Music.

IN accordance with a recommendation from the special board for biology and geology at Cambridge, a grant of £100 from the Worts Travelling Scholars Fund has been made to Mr. F. W. Keeble, towards defraying the expense of his botanical researches in Ceylon.

AT the meeting of the Cambridge Philological Society, to be held on Thursday of this week, Prof. Postgate was to read a paper on "Some Latin Papyrus Fragments at Zürich."

THE following courses of lectures are being delivered this term at Manchester College, Oxford:—"The Synoptic Gospels," "The Catholic Epistles," and "Criticism and Exegesis of the Gospels," by the Rev. Dr. James Drummond, the principal; "The History of the Religion of Israel," "The Composition of the Pentateuch," "The Doctrine of a Future Life," and "Early Buddhism," by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, the vice-principal; "Mental Philosophy" and "Ethics," by the Rev. C. B. Upton; and "The Development of Social Institutions," by Mr. Graham Wallas. All these lectures are open free to members of the university.

THE Oxford Magazine for October 25 contains a carefully compiled analytical table of the results of the recent examination for the Indian Civil Service. Out of the total number of 56 selected candidates, it appears that 45 are university men. Oxford has 28, Cambridge 9, Scotland and Ireland 4 each, and Bombay 1. Among the public schools, Clifton seems to have done best. Harrow, Rugby, and St. Paul's are altogether absent; while Eton, Winchester, and Merchant Taylors only managed to secure places near the bottom. It is interesting to find the colonies represented by Queensland, Trinidad, and Newfoundland.

THE numbers of freshmen at the several colleges at Oxford, given in the ACADEMY of last week, were not absolutely accurate. By way of correction, we are informed that Exeter has 36, and St. John's 29.

THE University Intelligence given in the Times is usually most trustworthy. But on October 25 there were two bad misprints from Oxford. Mr. Alfred Robinson, of New, appears as "Robertson"; and Prof. Pelham (whom we congratulate on his return to Council) as "Phelam."

THE following are some of the papers to be read before the University Extension Philosophical Society, which meets once a month either at Whitelands College, Essex Hall, Toynbee Hall, or University Hall: "Atomism in Psychology," by Mr. Bernard Bosanquet; "The Method of Aesthetic Science," by Prof. J. Sully; "The Nature of Aesthetic Illusion," by Mr. G. F. Stout; "The Economic Comedy of Errors," by Mr. P. H. Wicksteed; and "Aristotle's Conception of the Good," by Mr. R. G. Tatton.

SOME of our readers may be glad to have attention called to an article on the late Master of Balliol in the New York Nation of October 12. It is dated from Cambridge, Mass., and signed with the initials W. J. A.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

A VARIATION UPON LOVE.

For God's sake, let me love you, and give over
These tedious protestations of a lover;
We're of one mind to love, and there's no let:
Remember that, and all the rest forget.
And let's be happy, mistresses, while we may,
Ere yet to-morrow shall be called to-day.
To-morrow may be heedless, idle-hearted:
One night's enough for love to have met and parted.

Then be it now, and I'll not say that I
In many several deaths for you would die;
And I'll not ask you to declare that you
Will longer love than women mostly do.
Leave words to them whom words, not doings,
move,

And let our silence answer for our love.

ARTHUR SYMONS.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE new number of Mind looks somewhat alarmingly ponderous. Idealism, that is the Idealism of the neo-Hegelians, almost monopolises attention. The one article which justifies the title of Mind to be an organ of psychology and philosophy is by an American lady, Mrs. C. L. Franklin, on "Theories of Light Sensation." The writer has made a very careful study of the intricate and puzzling subject of colour-sensation. With a full knowledge of the facts to be explained, she subjects both the fashionable theories, those of Helmholtz and of Hering, to a damaging criticism. She then proceeds to expound a theory of her own, which, to say the least, is ingenious, and makes a plausible attempt to obviate the difficulties which encumber the others. The article is significant of the rapid movement of women to the front in scientific as in other battle-grounds. One may well imagine the expression with which many a German will regard this attack on their giants by an unskilled woman. Yet, unless we are mistaken, the mode of attack renders it anything but contemptible. Another woman's contribution to the journal, by the way, deserves special commendation—viz., an examination into the nature of Logical Judgment, by Miss E. E. C. Jones. The article is written more compactly and clearly than some of this lady's publications, and will well repay attention. Her remarks on the awkward attempt of Drs. Venn and Keynes to give existential import to certain forms of proposition only (particulars) are an excellent example of the value of common sense in scientific discussion. With respect to what may be called the metaphysical articles of this number, the first to claim attention is "A Criticism of Current Idealistic Theories," by Mr. A. J. Balfour. The paper, which is "a chapter extracted from an, as yet, unfinished book not especially designed for philosophic readers," aims at showing that Transcendental Idealism, in dropping out of view Kant's objective factor of knowledge (matter) and emphasising only the subjective factor (form), finds itself incapable of reaching a real world or God. It is curious to read after this the second of Prof. H. Jones's articles on "Idealism and Epistemology." Prof. Jones seems to write as a Hegelian or neo-Hegelian, and the burden of his song is precisely that his system finds no room for epistemology or a theory of knowledge. You cannot, he says, by starting with subjective ideas, find your way to a knowledge of realities represented by these ideas. You only seem to do so because you confuse under subjective states two things—viz., ideas representative of reality outside themselves, and psychical facts regarded as themselves realities from which other modes of reality can be inferred. The article is a smart bit of controversy directed in the main against Prof. Seth. The bewildered reader, anxious to know whether the newest metaphysical lights are leading, will be disposed to ask Mr. Balfour and Prof. Jones to try to come to something like a preliminary understanding as to what the new Idealism does and does not mean. If, as is presumable, they are talking about the same thing, it is pretty evident that one of the two contributors must be shooting absurdly wide of the mark. There remains to be mentioned an article on "Time and the Hegelian Dialectic," by Mr. McTaggart, which deals with the central mysteries of Hegel's doctrine.

SELECTED FOREIGN BOOKS.

GENERAL LITERATURE.

- AMERLING, W. Florentiner Antiken. München. 2 M. 50 Pf.
CHABAUD, Marius. Madagascar: Impressions de voyage. Paris: Challamel. 3 fr. 50 c.
DAREMBERG, G. En orient et en occident: paysages et croquis. Paris: Masson. 3 fr.
EHR, G. Die Schmuckformen der Denkmälerbauten aus alten Stilepochen seit der griechischen Antike. 3. Th. Berlin: Siemens. 10 M. 50 Pf.
EHRHARDT, H. Geschichte der Kunst im Gebiete der Prov. Posen. Berlin: Ernst. 8 M.
FALK, J. V. Mittelalterliches H. Immobilien. Wien: Schroll. 40 M.
HUIT, Ch. La Vie et l'œuvre de Platon. Paris: Thorin. 24 fr.
LEMAITRE, Jules. Impressions de théâtre. 7e Série. Paris: Leconte. 3 fr. 50 c.
LORENZ, O. Goethes politische Lehrjahre. Berlin: Besser. 8 M.
MALOT, Mns. Hector. Le Prince. Paris: Flammarion. 3 fr. 50 c.
PARIS, G. La Légende de Saladin. Paris: Bouillon. 3 fr.
RAYNAUD, H. Jean de Mon'ne, évêque de Valence et de Die. Paris: Thorin. 6 fr.

- REICH, E. Henrik Ibsens Dramen. Dresden: Plessner. 8 M.
SANDER, F. Rigveda u. Edda. Berlin: Friedländer. 2 M. 50 Pf.
SCHMIDT, G. Clavigo. Eine Studie zur Sprache des jungen Goethe. Gotha: Perthes. 6 M.
SENTUPÉRY, Léon. L'Europe politique: Gouvernement—Parlement—Presse. T. 1. Paris: Leconte. 9 fr.
ULMANN, H. Sandro Botticelli. München. 16 M.
WICKSELL, K. Ueb. Wert, Kapital u. Rente nach den neueren nationalökonomischen Theorien. Jena: Fischer. 8 M.
ZEICHNUNGEN alter Italiener in den Uniformen zu Florenz. München. 60 M.

HISTORY, ETC.

- BECK, L. Die Geschichte des Eisens in technischer u. kulturgeschichtlicher Beziehung. 2. Abt. 1. Th. Das 16. u. 17. Jahrh. 2. Lfg. Braunschweig: Vieweg. 5 M.
CLERC, Michel. Les Métriques athéniens. Paris: Thorin. 14 fr.
GUIRAUD, J. Les Registres de Grégoire X (1270–1276). 2e Fasc. Paris: Thorin. 7 fr. 50 c.
JOREZ, Alph. La France sous Louis XVI. T. 3. Mirabeau et les États Généraux (1784–1789). Paris: Didier. 6 fr.
LERNER, W. Studien zur Geschichte Paduas u. Veronas im 13. Jahrh. Strassburg: Trübner. 2 M. 50 Pf.
LUCK, Simon. La France pendant la guerre de cent ans. 2e Série. Paris: Hachette. 3 fr. 50 c.
MEYER, M. Maria, Landgräfin v. Hessen, geborene Prinzessin v. England. Gotha: Perthes. 6 M.
MÜLLER, G. A. Die Reitergruppe auf den römisch-germanischen Giganten-Säulen. Bülh.: Konkordia. 2 M. 50 Pf.
NIRBUHR, C. Geschichte des brüdischen Zeitalters. 1. Bd. 8 M. Versuch e. Reconstatation des Deberalles. 1. M. 50 Pf. Berlin: Nauck.
NIESE, B. Geschichte der griechischen u. makedonischen Staaten seit der Schlacht bei Chaeronea. 1. Th. Gotha: Perthes. 10 M.
REICHTAGSAKTEN, deutsche. Jüngere Reihe. I. Unter Kaiser Karl V. 1. Bd. Bearb. v. A. Kuckhohn. Gotha: Perthes. 48 M.
ROTHAN, G. La France et sa politique extérieure en 1897. Paris: Calmann Lévy. 7 fr.
SCHNORR V. CAROLSFELD, F. Erasmus Albers. Dresden: Uhlenmann. 6 M.
SCHRAEDER, W. Geschichte der Friedrichs-Universität zu Halle. Berlin: Dümmler. 31 M.
TENCKHOFF, F. Der Kampf der Hohenstaufen um die Mark Ancona u. des Herzogs Spoleto von der 2. Exkommunikation Friedrichs II. bis zum Tode Konrads. Paderborn: Schöningh. 1 M. 83 Pf.
ZAHN, J. v. Styria. Gedruckte u. ungedruckte zur steierm. Geschichte u. Culturgeschichte. Graz: Moser. 3 M. 60 Pf.

PHYSICAL SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

- BLONDÉL, Maurice. L'Action. Paris: Alcan. 7 fr. 50 c.
BOLTZMANN, L. Vorlesungen üb. Maxwell's Theorie der Elektrizität u. d. Lichtes. 2. Th. Leipzig: Barth. 5 M.
GIBARD, R. de. Etudes de géologie biblique. Le défilé devant la critique historique. 1re partie. L'écologie historique. Freiburg: Barth. 7 fr. 50 c.
HRECHT, B. Anleitung zur Krystalberechnung. Leipzig: Barth. 3 M.
LIE, S. Theorie der Transformationsgruppen. 8. Abschnitt. 28 M. Vorlesungen üb. kontinuierliche Gruppen m. geometrischen u. anderen Anwendungen. 24 M. Leipzig: Teubner.
PILSENER, P. Introduction à l'étude des Mollusques. Bruxelles: Lambert. 6 fr.
SCHREFFLER, H. Die Äquivalenz der Naturkräfte u. des Energiegehalts als Weltgesetz. Leipzig: Forster. 9 M.
SIMMEL, G. Einleitung in die Moralwissenschaft. 2. Bd. Berlin: Besser. 9 M.

PHILOLOGY, ETC.

- CLAUDIANI, C. carmina. Recognovit J. Koch. Leipzig: Teubner. 8 M. 60 Pf.
HANDSCHRIFTEN-VERZEICHNISSE, die der k. Bibliothek zu Berlin. 17. Bd. Verzeichnisse der arabischen Handschriften v. W. Ahlwardt. 5. Bd. Berlin: Asher. 28 M.
HUBNER, E. Monumenta linguae ibericae. Berlin: Reimer. 48 M.
LA ROCHE, J. Beiträge zur griechischen Grammatik. 1. Hft. Leipzig: Teubner. 6 M.
QUELLENWERKE der altindischen Lexikographie. 1. Bd. Wien: Holder. 10 M.
SCHREIBER, J. Manuel de la langue Tigrig. II. Textes et vocabulaire. Wien: Holder. 8 M.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE METHODS OF THE HIGHER CRITICISM.

Christchurch, Oxford: Oct. 27, 1893.

I am sorry to trouble you; but I cannot refrain from entering a protest against the injustice of Prof. Sayce's letter in the ACADEMY of last week, on the inscribed weight obtained by Dr. Chaplin on the site of Samaria.

The facts of the case, omitting what is irrelevant, are simple. The inscription in question was read by Prof. Sayce in 1890 (ACADEMY, August 2, p. 94) as containing the Hebrew particle shel, and was referred by him, on account of the form of the characters, to the eighth century B.C. As the use of shel at this period harmonised with the early date to which (upon other grounds) I assigned the Song of Songs in my Introduction (1891), I mentioned the fact, giving a reference to Prof. Sayce's letter in the ACADEMY, as well as to one by Dr. Neubauer, which appeared simultaneously in the Athenæum. Prof. König in his Einleitung in das A. T. (1893), p. 425, states that he procured an "authentische Nachbildung"—by which, I suppose, he means a cast—of the inscription from the Palestine Exploration Fund in London, which he submitted to the eminent Semitic palaeographer, Prof. Euting, of Strassburg, who read the inscription differently, and declared that in his opinion it did not contain the particle shel. Prof. König adds that his own judgment of the inscription agrees with that of Prof. Euting.

Upon the strength of these facts, Prof. Sayce brings a series of charges against the "higher criticism"—of prejudice and an obstinate refusal to listen to facts—which I cannot think that the circumstances at all justify. For Prof. Euting, who is the chief authority for questioning the reading shel, though distinguished for his palaeographical knowledge and acquaintance with Semitic inscriptions, is quite unknown as a critic; and of all the men in Germany (or elsewhere) who are "critics," Prof. König, as those who have read any of his writings well know, is one of the most honest, exact, and painstaking that could be named, and the very last man to go with the stream, or to adopt a view unless he had satisfied himself by independent personal investigation that it was adequately borne out by facts.

According to Prof. Sayce, however, Prof. König, finding the shel inconvenient for his theory of the date of the Song (though why he should have done so, seeing that it occurs in Jonah and is common in post-Biblical Hebrew, it is difficult to see), and being addicted to the slovenly methods of the "higher criticism," which has no regard for facts, and is never at the pains to examine original objects, was determined at all costs to get rid of the "obnoxious" word; "so an imperfectly executed cast was obtained, and those who had seen the original were informed that it was much to be preferred to it."

All that is here attributed to Prof. König is destitute of foundation in fact. As though either Prof. Euting (whom Prof. Sayce, strangely, does not mention at all), or Prof. König, would work wittingly upon an imperfect copy, or adopt such an unworthy procedure as is attributed to them, for the purpose of evading or suppressing the truth! Even if it be the case (as it very probably is) that the cast used by Profs. Euting and König was one which imperfectly represented the original, the blame (if their reading of the inscription should on this ground have been incorrect) rests, surely, not on the two German scholars, but on the authorities of the Palestine Exploration Fund, who supplied them (as they afterwards, I presume, supplied me) with the imperfect facsimile.

I cannot imagine why Prof. Sayce could not have written to say simply (if the facts so required it) that the two German scholars had misread the inscription in consequence of their having been supplied with an imperfect copy, instead of gratuitously employing the occasion for indulging in acrimonious taunts and baseless insinuations.

S. R. DRIVER.

MR. JACOBS'S REMONSTRANCES.

London: Oct. 23, 1893.

As Mr. Joseph Jacobs has introduced the name of Mr. Andrew Lang into his letters on the Ethics of Reviewing, and as all readers of his letters may not have come across the critiques to which he refers, I ask leave to state my own case. I shall not dispute Mr. Jacobs's attribution of the articles to me. I was sorry when I found that Mr. Jacobs conceived that I alluded to his birthplace, in one of them. He says that he mentioned his Australian origin in his preface. I may have been careless, but I only observed that he spoke of having heard a story in Australia. I was also sorry that Mr. Jacobs conceived me to mean that he took over Scotch ballads and tales, and altered them for the purpose of disguising their northern character. I can only say that I did not mean to make any such charge, and can only regret that my language was unfortunate enough to convey this impression. But perhaps I was more sorry, not for myself but for Mr. Jacobs, when I read, in his letter to the Daily News and in his letter to the ACADEMY, his suspicion (as it seemed) of my dishonourable motive. Mr. Jacobs has published several delightful collections of tales for children. I do not agree with his opinion on all points of folklore, and I have expressed my dissent; but I do not think there is one of his books of this kind, including his latest, which I have not warmly recommended to children in reviews. Children, I hope, do not read prefaces and notes; and, though I dislike Mr. Jacobs's treatment of Scotch tales and ballads, though I loved "Tamlane" as a child, and am not in love with Mr. Jacobs's alterations and his prose rendering of it, still, I am sure that English children will enjoy his new book, tales, and pictures.

In one of my articles I was contrasting the English popular genius with that of Scotland, and of the people of the world generally. I think that, in romance, the English people (as distinguished from its literary poets) is deficient on the whole; that the English popular narratives and poems are far below the romantic level of Scotch ballads, and of Märchen generally. Exceptions there are: the moon story in Mr. Jacobs's book is among them. Still, English popular tales, as a rule, are "drolls." One misses even such romantic survivals as Scotland has kept: "Rashin Coatie," "Nicht, Nought, Nothing," "The Red Etin, of Ireland," "The Black Bull o' Norrway"—stories found in essence everywhere except in England. That the English people once possessed them is highly probable; Sir Philip Sidney certainly knew "The Black Bull." But the characteristic thing is that England, so far as I know, has forgotten them. I therefore spoke of the lack of romance in English tales, and said that, for handsome princes, hidden treasure, magic trees, seven-headed dragons, and so forth, children must look elsewhere. I was thinking of the world-wide Märchen, in which such romantic elements occur; and it will surprise me if the topics desired are absent from Mr. Jacobs's Celtic and Indian fairy books. But, as it chances, I, too, have edited fairy books; and, among the tales, are versions of French literary fairy stories, from Perrault to the Comte de Caylus. These ingenious persons "embroider," in Mlle. L'Héritier's phrase (1696), on the old données of treasures, dragons, kings' sons, and so forth. Mr. Jacobs somehow conceived that I was alluding, not to things as old and popular as the gold of Fafnir and Grendel, or as the talking trees of South African folklore, or as the princes of European and Arab and Indian and old Egyptian Märchen and their ladies, or as the Slavonic, Romaic, and Swahili dragons, but solely to the literary French tales as adapted in my fairy books. Who could anticipate such an opinion? He even imagined, as I understand him (I shall rejoice if I am wrong), that I wished to divert the public from his English tales, to such books of my editing as contain stories rendered from the French writers of the last century. This theory (if he held it) I can honestly deny. My reference was to the Contes and legends of mankind at large, especially in Europe, and in the East. Mr. Jacobs seems to think that late French literary people invented the most ordinary properties of popular romance. This is not my notion, nor could it enter into my mind that anyone entertained such an idea. At all events, holding my own opinion that the said romantic properties are of ancient popular invention, I had not, in my mind, a shadow of a desire to tempt purchasers from Mr. Jacobs's books to my own. However, Mr. Jacobs need entertain no anxiety about my intrigues in the future. I have many a time praised his books for children; henceforth, about them I must be silent.

Mr. Jacobs thinks he has an argument, as against me, because, in Mr. Ward's "English Poets," I have written on Scotch ballads. As a matter of fact, there were few other ballads in any form, linguistically "English," worth writing about. But I did not edit Mr. Ward's book, and am not responsible for the name he gave it. Though the book was called "English Poets," I did not attribute to the English the ballads of the Scotch, for the critique was occupied with the question, Why are Scotch ballads so much more romantic than those of England? It contains the same ideas about Scotch as compared with English ballads as I maintain about Scotch as compared with English märchen. This inclusion of Scotch ballads, this defence of their merit, in a book of "English Poets," is hardly a justification of the process by which Mr. Jacobs expurgates and alters "Tamlane," and then calls a Scotch poem an English tale! But I plead guilty of a greater crime. I have, quite unjustifiably, included Claverhouse among "English Worthies." I thought that the countrymen of Marlborough and Sunderland needed the example of Dundee.

I seem not only to be unlucky myself, with Mr. Jacobs, but to involve others in my misfortunes. In the last number of Folk Lore (iv. 3, 281) Mr. Jacobs, arguing against the "Casualist" theory of the diffusion of popular tales (which I do not hold except in cases which I have not space to describe) says, "M. Bédier, in his recent study of Les Fabliaux is quite the casualist (sic) and quotes Mr. Lang as his authority." Now, in Les Fabliaux (p. 39), M. Bédier says, "les contes se transmettent par voie d'emprunt"—"stories are diffused by borrowing," and he attacks me for being of the opposite opinion, which I am not. Let Mr. Jacobs say what he likes of me, but why need he say that M. Bédier holds ideas the very opposite of what he does hold? Why say that M. Bédier cites me as his authority, when, in fact, he assails my supposed theory? This is worse than saying that Gorgonzola, in a French tale, was a dragon! Has Mr. Jacobs read M. Bédier?

I leave the topic with a renewed expression of regret that I wounded Mr. Jacobs's feelings, with a renewed assurance that I did not mean to advertise my wares to the disadvantage of his books. The delay in publishing Mr. Jacobs's letter was due to an accident. It could not well be published when it was following me about the Border; and I returned it and replied to it on the day that I received it, writing in the train to save time.

A. LANG.

AN ADULTRESS'S CONFESSION IN 1561.

London: Oct. 21, 1891.

In the volume of Depositions in the Bishop's Court at Chester, 1561-6, the most touching thing is the conscience-wrought confession of a wife who refused her husband for another man, Peter Hartley, and passed off his child as her husband's. It seems to me worthy of a wider circulation than it will get in our Early English Text Society's volume—only one person in 500,000 cares for Early English—and so I send it to the ACADEMY.

F. J. FURNIVALL.

"ELIZABETH SHUTTLEWORTH'S CONFESSION.

Responsiones personales Elizabethæ Shotilworth super certis articulis sibi per Laurencium Shotilworth obiectis, capte coram magistro Roberto Leche, &c., ix die Octobris, 1561.

This Respondent saith, that she was Lawfully married unto Laurence Shotilworth without any Lawful impediment betwix them; & that she was, and is, his Lawfull wief, and hath had vij or vij Children by the said Laurence. further beyng demaundid why she did, contrary to her promise made, & contrary to the Lawe of wedlocke, play the hoore: she answered, 'her grace was no better' beyng askid who was the Adulter with her, she saith, 'one Peter Hartley of the parish of Colne; and they were neighbours together; and the said Peter had a child bie this respondent yet Livinge, which was the last child this Respondent bare of her body' beyng askid, 'howe longe she said Peter drew into her Company unlawfully'; she saith, 'it is about iiij^{or} yeres ago; & to discharge her Conscience, this Respondent [confesses that she] had a child supposed to be her husbandes, callid Jone, bie the said Peter Hartley: and Peter Hartley hath had offence to do with her within this iiij^{or} yeres, [rather] then her husband.' beyng askid 'howe this matter first apperid to her husbandes knowledge,' she saith, 'she lov'd Peter Hartley so well, that she wold not suffer her husband to lye with her; and so, when he perceyvid this Respondent to be with child, he perceyvid her noughtie lfe and misdeamenour; & because he did not lye with her, he knewe certainly it cold not be his.' beyng demaundid 'whether she can burthen her husband with his mislyvings with women,' she answeris, 'she cannot truly burthen or suspect hym' beyng askid whether any other had to do with her but Peter Hartley, since she was married, she saith 'no'; and that, she may depose on the Sacrament. beyng askid 'whether she was compell'd by force, or alurid by faire promysse, to confesse so much against herself'; she saith 'no: for she doth hit only to save her othe, and discharge her Conscience; because hit is a matter of Truthe.' beyng askid 'howe she will lye hereafter': saith, 'she cannot mary; and her husband hath refusid her; she saith she knowis not, but as God will provide for her.' beyng threatenid to do penance, she desires [the Chancellor] to be good to her, and she will do what she shalbe assigned to do."

WAS LINDUM A COLONIA?

London: Oct. 21, 1893.

I am extremely glad that Mr. Bradley has raised the question of the origin of the name "Lincoln." Approaching the problem from another side, I have found insuperable difficulty created by the acceptance of the orthodox derivation.

Mr. Freeman observed that "the ending coln, the same, of course, as Colonia Agrippina, Köln, is, as far as I know, peculiar to Lincoln in English local nomenclature" (Norm. Cong. iv., 210). In his paper on "Lindum Colonia" (Macmillan's xxxii., 333), he went more fully into the question of the name, urging that—

"In its ending it proclaims the rank which Lindum held among Roman cities; that ending, unique in English geography, would be enough to tell us, if the Geographer of Ravenna had failed to set it down in writing, that Lindum was a colony of Rome . . . the city by the Witham keeps her earlier name as well as the title of her Roman rank, and proclaims herself through the whole of her long history as the colony of Lindum."

* In a footnote Mr. Freeman adds: "I believe that the title of 'Colonia' is not added to the name of Lindum anywhere but by the Ravenna

Returning to the subject again and again, he pointed out that—

"The name of Lincoln is purely Roman; it has ever been so thoroughly the colony that no one has ever ventured to add to it any of the common endings of the name of an English town. . . . We see the same feeling, though in an opposite shape, in the process by which the other colony of Camulodunum has received its English name of Colchester" (p. 334).

Working from this conclusion, Mr. Freeman argued,

"That if Lindum Colonia ever lay in the state of a waste chester, it was but for a very short time. It was settled again and named again while the memory of its old name and its old rank were still fresh" (Macmillan's xxxvi. 125).

And he avowed himself inclined to "make the same inference in the case of Colchester," because, "in British and in English alike it remains the city of the colony" (ib.). The case of Colchester presents its own difficulties; and I will only allude to it here to illustrate the case of Lincoln.

When we find Mr. Freeman's papers headed "Lindum Colonia" and "Colonia Camulodunum," it may, in Mr. Bradley's phrase, "appear ridiculous" to ask if Lincoln and Colchester ever had these names; but it will, at least, be admitted that the differing forms raise suspicions at the outset. For my part—though it may be rank heresy—I cannot understand on what principle such "double-barrelled" names could be formed. That "Camulodunum" became "Colonia" is simple enough; and this "Colonia" might be distinguished as "Camulodunensis" or "Claudiana," like "Colonia Agrippina." But I see no more evidence for "Lincoln" involving the form "Lindum Colonia," than for "Exeter" or "Gloucester" involving the forms, "Isca castrum," or "Glevum castrum," which, as I have elsewhere said, are mere inventions. And, as Mr. Bradley observes of the Ravenna Geographer, "there is nothing to show that he regarded colonia as forming part of the current name."

I would venture to suggest, tentatively, a fresh solution of the difficulty. Reference to the plan given in Mr. Freeman's Norman Conquest will show that Lincoln possessed a peculiar feature in the rectangular earthworks covering the city on the north. Mr. Freeman jumped at the conclusion that these were pre-Roman, and wrote accordingly, throughout, of "the earlier site of the Briton." But Mr. G. D. Clark believed them (quite rightly, I think) to be post-Roman, the work of Romanised Britons. Now, if we turn to his paper on "The Defences of York" (Arch. Journ. xxi., 221), we find him describing similar earthworks there, and comparing them with those of Wallingford and Wareham (p. 232). It seems to me that Lincoln, like York, may have outgrown its Roman limits, and have become an important stronghold of the Romanised Britons, bearing a British name (as Mr. Bradley suggests). Its case would thus be parallel to that of York, which retained its native name with no appended "ceaster."

The question is well worth following out; and, indeed, I have always thought that the place-names of our oldest towns are in need of scientific study, instead of being left a prey (as they are) to the fancies of mediæval chroniclers and the guesses of modern antiquaries.

J. H. ROUND.

Geographer, v. 31. The right of the city to the rank of colony has therefore been called in question; but it seems to me that the name of the city and the statement of the Geographer form two independent pieces of evidence which cannot be got over."

London: Oct. 21, 1893.

Mr. Bradley hopes someone will continue his investigations into the meaning of "Lincoln." I venture to add a few words to his interesting letter. I think he has made it clear that Colonia contributes nothing to the word. That Coln represents a British river-termination seems likely; and the Lind Cylne of Coenwulf's Charter (or Lind Ceolne of the Lambeth MS.) if it be, as it appears, a river-name, is a case in point. The Hertfordshire Colne had this name as far back as a Charter of Offa (785), and a Ceolnes Wylla appears in Somerset in a Charter of 808. But one naturally asks if the river Witham was ever thus designated. Leland calls the river the Lindis, and we know that the early designation of the Bishops of Lincoln was Lindisfaronensis. The Roman town, like the cathedral, was built on the hill.

We are still no nearer to the origin of Coln in the compound.

I hesitate suggesting as a possible source the Welsh word Celyn (= holly), which enters not seldom into place-names. As a parallel to such a combination, we have in the Lincolnshire Survey of Henry I. a Lindwde (now Lynwode) in Lindsey and not far from Lincoln.

As to the identification of Hever with Hean yfre there are other difficulties beside the spelling. Hever appears in compounds elsewhere in which this sense is hardly admissible, e.g., Heverslond; and if Linckhill was in Ruxley, the same Hundred as Bexley, Hever is in Sutton Lath.

Eadelm's Bridge appears in one early document for Eden Bridge; but in others equally early it occurs as Eadulf's Bridge, and in Domesday as Adelove's Bridge.

Of the other places named in Coenwulf's Charter, Plumworth (Inq. Post. Mort. 20, Henry III.) near Ospringe may represent Plumwearding. Perhaps the Lindhrycg of a Charter of Offa to Rochester (764) may contain an element in Lind Cylne.

EDMUND MCCLURE.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

Manchester: Oct. 25, 1893.

My attention has been called to a paragraph in the ACADEMY of October 14, under the heading "University Jottings," which contains the following passage:

"The new buildings of Manchester College, Oxford—for thus the old Unitarian institution originally founded at Manchester in 1786 is henceforth to be styled—will be formally inaugurated next week."

This "institution" or college has, from its first foundation in 1786, when Dr. Barnes dedicated it "To Truth, to Liberty, and to Religion," the words inscribed over the entrance to the new buildings, has, in the terms of its motto, always "adhered to its original principle of freely imparting theological knowledge without insisting on the adoption of particular theological doctrines."

It is not and never was a Unitarian institution. Under its various names of Manchester Academy, Manchester College, Manchester New College, and again Manchester College, and at Manchester, York, Manchester again, London, and Oxford (the several places of its sojourn), it has been equally free and open from all doctrinal tests or names, and striven to be not unworthy of its words of dedication and this principle of freedom for teachers and taught expressed in its motto. There has been no change in the principles or in the name of the college on its removal to Oxford, except that out of courtesy to New College, its nearest neighbour at Oxford, it has dropped the word New from the name it bore in London, and will henceforth be known as Manchester College instead of Manchester New College.

A. H. WORTHINGTON,
Secretary of Manchester College.

THE MEANING OF "GEFEIT."

Liverpool: Oct. 27, 1893.

In my notice of Mr. Leland's Heine I have myself committed a blunder—not one, however, to bring much profit to Mr. Leland.

A friend, whose learning is deeper than mine, tells me that gefeit really means "endowed (with supernatural powers) by fays," "enchanted," "charmed." Hence, in the passage quoted, verfehmt und zugleich gefeit might be translated "at once ban-smitten and spell-fenced," or paraphrased "like Cain, accursed yet unscathable." The antithesis of the epithets is thus made clear, and the harmony to which I referred remains untouched.

There is another small fault in the article: where I wrote Ary Scheffer the printer has Amy, in spite of correction of proof.

R. M. LINTOCK.

APPOINTMENTS FOR NEXT WEEK.

SUNDAY, Oct. 29, 4 p.m. Sunday Lecture: "Savages and Barbarians, viewed in the Light of Modern Research, especially in Germany and Russia," by Prince Kropotkin.
4 p.m. South Place Institute: "Engineering, Past and Present," by Mr. J. Swift.
7.30 p.m. Ethical: "War: is its Gradual Elimination Desirable and Practicable?" by Mr. Hodgson Pratt.
MONDAY, Oct. 30, 8 p.m. Royal Academy: Demonstration, "The Surface Forms of the Living Body—The Trunk," by Prof. W. Anderson.
TUESDAY, Oct. 31, 8 p.m. London Institution: "The Principles of Commercial Geography applied to the British Empire," V., by Dr. H. E. Milli.
WEDNESDAY, Nov. 1, 8 p.m. Elisabethan: "Shakespeare's Measure for Measure," by Mr. W. Poel.
4 p.m. Archaeological Institute: "The Immuring of Nuns who have Broken Their Vows," by Mr. Edward Peacock. "The Beginnings of Lithography," by Mr. Emanuel Green.
THURSDAY, Nov. 2, 8 p.m. Royal Academy: "The Surface Forms of the Living Model—The Upper Extremity," I. by Prof. W. Anderson.
8 p.m. Linnean: "A Contribution to the Phanero-gamic Flora of Mato Grosso and the Northern Chaco," by Mr. Spencer Le Marchant Moore; "A New Fresh-water Schistopod from Tasmania," by Mr. G. M. Thomson.
FRIDAY, Nov. 3, 8 p.m. Geologists' Association: Conversation.
8 p.m. Philological: "The First Riddle (so-called) in the Exeter Book," and "Puzzling Words in the Alliterative Poems," by Mr. I. G. Llanes.

SCIENCE.

A Manual of Linguistics. By John Clark. (Edinburgh: Thin.)

The word "manual" too often suggests a compendium of facts and precepts, gathered together with more regard to brevity than to style or general interest. This is very far from being the case with Mr. Clark's book, which is of real interest from beginning to end. Moreover, it supplies an actual want to both students and teachers, by serving as a guide to the somewhat confusing mass of literature which has appeared of late years upon linguistics and phonetics. A student who had mastered this book would be able to proceed straight to the study of Brugmann, Paul, and Sweet, whose writings, it is to be feared, are now perused almost exclusively by specialists. The author is also a practical teacher, as will be evident to one who tries to employ the present manual as a text-book in class. The style is terse and vigorous: the arguments are clearly stated, and the conclusions are carefully and logically drawn. The reader may possibly be tempted to complain from time to time that he hears too little of what the author himself thinks about the different conclusions arrived at by his authorities; and this is the more to be regretted because, when Mr. Clark trusts himself to pronounce a definite opinion upon difficult or controverted questions, it is an opinion that seems well worthy of attention (cf. p. 159 as against p. 30).

The manual contains a list of authorities which cannot but be most useful to all beginners of the study of linguistics; and the author has evidently been a careful gleaner of the knowledge imparted by such contemporary records as the American Journal of Philology and the Indo-Germanische Forschungen. For a future edition he might do well to add Hearn's Aryan Household, Rendall's treatise on The Home of the Aryans, and Hehn's classical work on The Wandering of Plants and Animals (especially the appendices, which are available only in the original); while for a precise explanation of accent, stress, &c., we would refer him to Arsène Darmesteter's posthumous work on the French language edited by Prof. Muret of Geneva. It seems to be a strong point with Mr. Clark that he can seize at once the relevant matter in a long and perplexed statement, and present it with lucidity and precision: for the books cited, if of undoubted importance, are also of undoubted length, and in some cases of undoubted perplexity as well.

The first chapter gives us a picture of the Aryans, their culture and original home; and we have succeeding chapters on "Letters, their Origin and Order"; "Sound Relations in Indo-European Vowels and Diphthongs"; "Semi-vowels, Spirants, &c."; "Explosives"; "Vocalic and Consonantal Affections"; "Analogy"; "Ablaut and Accent"; "Grimm's Law, Verner's Law"; "Sound Relations in English"; "Introduction and Short Vowels"; "Sound Relations in English"; "Long Vowels and Consonants." An excellent index is added.

The author seems to lay no claim to originality so far as this is displayed in actually adding to our knowledge. But he follows throughout the best authorities, such as Brugmann for general Indo-European, and Sweet for English phonology. Occasionally, however, from a laudable wish to be "up to date" and from a real sense of scientific justice, he quotes authorities such as Mr. J. Donovan (p. lxviii.), who, "with words of weight, argues that articulation had its origin in the impassioned intonations of festal excitement!" It is invidious to make distinctions between major and minor prophets; but certainly in the case of a writer whose object is to state the latest conclusions arrived at on the subject of linguistics, it would seem wiser to pay attention only to the utterances of those whom the minor prophets themselves would recognise as their masters.

The task which Mr. Clark set before him was to select leading facts and principles, and to illustrate these fully by examples; and in that task he has succeeded. It might, however, have been better if he had given yet more copious references, in order to enable the class of readers for whom he writes (i.e., beginners or laymen) to verify facts and to investigate principles for themselves. It must further be stated that Mr. Clark's book takes for granted that his readers understand a great deal about phonetics; and he constantly uses technical terms, such as the description of sounds as "low-back, wide-round," "breath-glide," "glottal buzz," &c. Take such a sentence as this (p. 212): "M.E. later is legitimately represented by latter, for the M.E. form fortified with the back-shortening termination would resist lengthening." Such sentences imply a careful training on the part of the student or reader; and we wish that Mr. Clark had explained all his terms before using them, even though the book thereby might have been rendered a little more bulky. On the other hand, there are passages, such as those on the origin of language referred to above, which have no scientific value. It would have been better to have stated the difficulties that beset the whole problem, such as the fact that language is always found in the form of a sentence only, &c., and that all beyond such facts is hypothetical. Besides, how does Mr. Donovan know that animals have no language?

The account of the second H. G. sound-shifting is not very intelligible, because Mr. Clark does not distinguish between the H. G. dialects and the so-called H. G. literary language, nor does he quite clearly distinguish the changes in anlaut, inlaut, and auslaut (chap. vii.). In the same way his remark (p. 166), that German writers on Teutonic philology do not include Anglo-Saxon among Low-German dialects, shows that he confuses the term Niederdeutsch as applied to the German dialects with the same term when applied to Teutonic languages and dialects generally. On p. 154 the different uses of pitch, stress, and accent, should have been carefully explained; and the consideration that Latin in adopting the Greek metres laid exclusive weight upon the stress accent, is sufficient proof that to Latin ears at least the Greek accent at the time of the transference of these metres seemed to be not a musical accent, but an accent denoting stress, which would in some cases, of course, coincide with the musical accent. On p. 155 the word accent should have been explained with reference to Latin; and the word "barytonesis" is too hard for a beginner.

A few remarks on minute points may claim the author's attention for a second edition. On p. 14 the second α in (not α) $\pi\alpha\rho\alpha\tau\iota$ is the Greek fashion of representing the pronunciation of the Sk. ri-vowel, and not, as Mr. Clark states, "of writing" it. On p. 17 and sqq. the headline is wrong, and seems to have been imported from a school-inspector's report. On the same page the sound r is not heard in "butter." P. l., for "wether," read "weather"; p. xlv., Mr. Clark wrongly calls mazdot, a nom. sing. masculine, "a root"; p. 290, "island" should not have been cited as an instance where sounds are spoken of; and, generally speaking, in the chapter on "Sound Relations in English," sounds and spellings are not strictly enough distinguished. On p. 285, "As hw appears as wh—'who' (hwā)," a better example would have been "what," hwat. On p. 282, "guest" and "ghost" are instances of spelling, and not of pronunciation. On p. 196, something might well have been said about the relation of spelling to speaking, and vice versa. On p. 153, l. 10, a bad misprint occurs; and, in l. 17, for "mutually," read "indifferently." Purists will not allow the spelling "disyllabic" (p. 158); and the use of "claims" on p. 159 is American-English. On p. 186 Mr. Clark states that Norman-French had no influence on the linguistic development of English. Surely it helped to settle the plural form s as the characteristic plural of English instead of -en; and surely also it had some influence upon the order of words.

But these are small points; and we are glad to be able to characterise the work before us as one likely to be useful to students and teachers alike.

HERBERT A. STRONG.

INDIAN JOTTINGS.

THE last Part of Epigraphia Indica (Kegan Paul & Co.) contains a very valuable paper, by Prof. Bühler on "The Pillar Edicts of Asoka." It is based throughout upon impressions from the originals, three of which are now published in facsimile for the first time. These edicts are seven in number, several of which are repeated on more than one pillar. Prof. Bühler here prints the text of each, in Roman transliteration, giving the several versions in parallel columns, together with an English rendering and copious notes. With regard to the three inscriptions now published in facsimile for the first time—those of Radhia, Mathia, and Rampurva—Prof. Bühler insists upon a point of great palaeographical importance, which he extends also to the two Delhi inscriptions. In each case he maintains that the verbal discrepancies are so slight that they cannot be ascribed to different draughtsmen; in other words, that the copies were made from a common MS. This agreement extends to the joining of words by hyphens, and to the separation of words by intervals. The joining of words implies that they are to be construed together, while the intervals are to be regarded as marks of punctuation. From these principles, Prof. Bühler draws rules as to the permissibility of certain proposed interpretations. He further lays down some other principles, which have guided him in dissenting from his predecessors. First, he refuses to admit any conjectural emendations which involve the alteration of the text contained in more than one version, preferring to extract a meaning from the actual readings. Secondly, he argues that a full elucidation of Asoka's edicts can only be accomplished with the help of Brahmanical literature (such as the Rajavali), and by a comparison of existing Hindu customs. Thirdly, he believes it certain that Asoka had not become a Buddhist at the time when the pillar edicts were engraved. Up to the close of the twenty-seventh year of his reign, Asoka continued to preach the spread of that general morality which all Indian religions, based on the Path of Knowledge, prescribe for the people, and which is common to Brahmans, Jains, and Buddhists. This Prof. Bühler hopes to prove hereafter, in a discussion of the rock edicts.

THE same Part of Epigraphia Indica further contains: the conclusion of Dr. A. Führer's account of several early inscriptions recently found by him in a Buddhist cave near Pabbhosa, some of which may go back to the second century B.C.; a fresh edition, from a more complete impression, of an inscription previously edited by Prof. Bühler; and a number of modern Mohammedan inscriptions from Behar, edited by Dr. Paul Horn.

AYINASH CHANDRA KAVIRATNA is going on steadily with his translation of Sanskrit medical texts. The sixth part of the translation of the Charaka-Samhitā, which has just appeared, contains much that ought to be of interest to the student of the history of medicine. A picture occurs of a domestic hospital, such as, in those days, princes and noblemen were advised to have for their own use. The requisites mentioned are much the same as the articles which are required in modern hospitals. The translator, who is himself a practising physician in India, warns us against being misled by the native terminology. He holds, for instance, that when Hindu medicine speaks of wind, bile, and phlegm, what is meant is not the actual wind in the body, or the bile that escapes from the liver, or the phlegm that is expectorated, but certain conditions of the body which are known by their action. When certain effects are produced, they are attributed to causes called wind, bile, or phlegm; but practically each of these words means no more than a certain group of phenomena which had to be named, and which might quite as well have been designated by any other technical term. He thinks that this will appear more plainly when more fasciculi of his translations have been published.

MR. G. A. GRIERSON has reprinted from the Journal of the Bengal Asiatic Society a paper of about eighty pages, on the "Padumawati" of Malik Mohammad, which claims to be the oldest known poem in Hindi, the vernacular of Northern India. The poem is interesting for many reasons. In the first place, its author, though a Musalman saint, was familiarly acquainted both with Hindu lore and with the eclectic doctrines of Kabir. Secondly, the poem itself possesses considerable originality, being based, not upon any incident in the epics, but upon the historical capture of Chitor; it is also marked by complete tolerance towards the Hindus. Lastly, it has the philological curiosity of having been originally written in the Persian character, so that it preserves the contemporary pronunciation of the vernacular. Mr. Grierson has undertaken the task of turning the Persian into Devanagari, with the help of some MSS. that give vowel points and others written in a Sanskritised form of Devanagari. He here prints in full only the introduction, with a translation and copious notes, critical and explanatory. Of the remainder of the poem, he gives an analysis, which allows us to judge of its literary merit. Hereafter, he hopes to publish, with native help, a satisfactory edition of the whole. His devotion to the subject may be gathered from the fact that he has mastered the Indian game of backgammon, in order to find the meaning of one obscure passage. The date of the poem, we ought to have stated, is 1540 A.D.: that is to say, the very year when Sher Shah, the Afghan, drove Humayun, the father of Akbar, out of India.

WE have received Part II. of the second volume of South Indian Inscriptions (Kegan Paul & Co.), edited by Dr. E. Hultzsch, epigraphist to the Madras Government. It contains the text and translation of a large number of Tamil inscriptions in the great temple of Tanjore. Most of them merely record the gift of images or offerings, the usual form being to recite that a sum of money has been lent to a village community, who are bound to pay interest in perpetuity at the rate of 12½ per cent. Some of the inscriptions are historically valuable, as supplying dynastic name, or as indicating the date of certain works of Tamil literature. The Part is illustrated with facsimiles, and with two photographs of the temple.

WE may mention here that the October number of India contains a very interesting article on the late Justice Telang, written by Prof. John Adam, of Pachayappa's College, Madras. Kashinath Trimbak Telang was not only in the front rank as a lawyer and a politician. He was also an excellent Sanskrit scholar—witness his contribution to the "Sacred Books of the East"; and he devoted considerable time to researches in Mahratta history, which (we hope) may yet see the light. He died two months ago, at the early age of forty-three.

SCIENCE NOTES.

AT the annual general meeting of the London Mathematical Society, to be held on November 9, the following will be balloted for as officers for the session 1893-4. Mr. A. B. Kempe, president; Messrs. Basset, Elliott, and Greenhill, vice-presidents; Dr. Larmor, treasurer; Messrs. M. Jenkins and R. Tucker, hon. secretaries. The following are nominated as ordinary members of council: Lieut.-Col. J. R. Campbell, Lieut.-Col. A. J. Cunningham, Drs. Forsyth, Glaisher, Hill, and Hobson, Mr. Love, Major P. A. MacMahon, and Mr. J. J. Walker. At the same meeting, which is made special for the purpose, the following resolution will be submitted by the council:

"That the London Mathematical Society be incorporated as a Limited Liability Company, under section 23 of the Companies Act, 1867, and that the council be empowered to take the necessary steps to carry this resolution into effect."

The presentation of the De Morgan medal, awarded by the council in June last, will be made at the same time to Prof. Felix Klein, the medallist, who is expected to be present to receive it.

THE Geologists' Association will hold a conversazione on Friday next, November 2, at 8 p.m., in the library of University College, Gower-street. Beside various geological specimens and photographs, the exhibits will include a collection of autograph letters of some of the earlier palaeontologists, shown by the secretary, Mr. C. Davies Sherborn.

FROM a corrected list of the different classes of members composing the Institution of Civil Engineers, it appears that that body is now composed of 5241 corporate members, and of 1177 attached classes, making together 6418.

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

MANCHESTER GOETHE SOCIETY.—(Wednesday, Oct. 18.)

THE REV. F. F. CORNISH, president, in the chair.—Mr. C. E. Tyrer read a paper on "Goethe in Sicily." Goethe, after considerable hesitation, embarked at Naples on March 29, 1787. He reached Palermo after four days of a somewhat rough passage, the involuntary leisure of which he employed in versifying some acts of "Tasso." His first impressions of Palermo and its surroundings were vivid and delightful; in fact, he seems to have seen everything couleur de rose. He calls Monte Pellegrino the most beautiful promontory in the world, and speaks with enthusiasm of the luxuriant vegetation in the gardens and open spaces. Palermo must in his time have been even more beautiful than it is to-day, when factories, railways, and ugly suburbs have detracted from its charms. In Goethe's description of Palermo and of Sicily in general, his chief interests—joy in the beauties of nature, enthusiasm for the natural sciences, and love of classical art—are very clearly displayed. On the other hand, he shows no appreciation of the remarkable mediæval architecture of Sicily, and passes by without notice buildings so fine as the Palace Chapel and the Cathedral of Monreale, with its unique mosaic paintings. He is comparatively indifferent to historical associations; and in the Valley of the Oreto, instead of listening to his guide's description of the battle between the Carthaginians and Romans fought there, he tries to make out the geology of the district by examining the pebbles in the stream. In the public garden he follows his speculations about the Urfpflanze, which later on led to the publication of his Metamorphosis of Plants (1790). He takes interest in the family of Count Cagliostro, whom later (1791) he made the subject of one of his plays, "The Gross-Kophta," and in the monstrous statues, even now visible, of the Villa Pallagonia; and he describes very faithfully the fine grotto-chapel of St. Rosalia, the patron-saint of Palermo, still apparently unchanged. From Palermo, on April 18, Goethe rode into the interior of the island with his artist-friend Kniep, passing through Alcamo, Segesta, and Castelvetro to Girgenti, and everywhere visiting the remains of classical art. The lecturer described from his own experience the temples of Girgenti, the ancient Agragas, the remains of which still exist near the southern wall that forms the base of the irregular triangle occupied by the ancient city. Portions of six temples survive; one, the so-called Temple of Concord, in an almost perfect condition, owing to its having been converted during the middle ages into a Christian church, the additional strength thus imparted to its walls enabling it to resist the action of the earthquakes which completely shattered most of the others. Several are now mere heaps of ruins. These temples, like many others in Sicily, were all built of a porous and friable limestone, originally coated with stucco for the sake of appearance and durability; and when the stucco-covering was lost, the stone beneath was gradually eaten away by the action of the Scirocco, and thus became unable to resist the earthquake shocks. Portions of the stucco-coverings of these temples, as well as of others in Sicily, were originally painted in bright colours. From Girgenti, Goethe passed into the interior of the island, an undulating hilly country, bare of trees, but richly covered with corn, and gay in spring with an abundance of brilliant flowers, the towns being perched high on the hills or on their very crests. He spent one night in a miserable inn at Castro Giovanni, the ancient Enna, on the top of a commanding rock in the centre of the island and surveying almost the whole of it, but with nothing to suggest its mythical renown as the scene of the rape of Proserpine, it being now almost destitute alike of trees, of flowers, and of water. On May 1, Goethe reached Catania, an uninteresting modern town, all its antiquities having been either destroyed by earthquakes or deeply buried beneath the lava of Etna. He then proceeded northward along the beautiful and fertile coast to Taormina. Of the remains of the Greek theatre and the prospect commanded by its site, he gives a glowing but by no means over-enthusiastic description. Goethe's last days in Sicily were spent at Messina, then still suffering from the effects of the terrible earthquake which had almost destroyed the town four years before; and his interview and relations with the governor are recorded in his diary with much vividness and humour. He took passage on a French merchantman for Naples, where, after narrowly escaping shipwreck, he arrived once more about the middle of May. The acquaintance Goethe made with "this queen of islands" was an imperfect one; and it is in particular a matter of surprise that he omitted to visit Syracuse, perhaps the most interesting spot in the whole of Sicily. But, nevertheless, he carried away with him a delightful impression, and speaks, in writing to Herder shortly afterwards, of the wealth of material he has acquired, which he will need rest and leisure to use. Of his projected drama of "Naualkaa," over the plan of which, as he informs us, he "dreamed away" the greater portion of his time in Sicily, nothing unfortunately remains save the scheme and a few fragments.—A discussion followed, in which the secretary suggested the possibility of Goethe's "Kennst du das Land" having been composed during or after his stay in Sicily.

FINE ART.

HADRIAN'S WALL.

IN the course of the last summer, much attention has been paid to the Roman Wall in Northern England. Excavations have been designed and commenced, various other investigations have been undertaken, and, in particular, the whole extent of the work was carefully examined by General von Sarwey, the military director of the Reichslandescommission, and a party of Oxford and north country archaeologists. In the following paragraphs I am speaking only for myself; but it seems worth while to inquire what light—and darkness—has recently been thrown on the problems of the Wall.

Hadrian's Wall is the name commonly given to the remains of Roman frontier works which stretch for some eighty miles from Wallsend, east of Newcastle, to Bowness on Solway. The name is more convenient than accurate, for the works consist of two parts. On the north we have the stone wall, six or eight feet thick, and originally, it may be, sixteen or eighteen feet high, with a ditch in front and turrets, "milecastles," and forts at suitable intervals. South of this, at a distance of sometimes a few yards, sometimes almost a mile, is the Vallum, which is an earthwork consisting generally of a ditch, with two ramparts to the south and one to the north. Geographically, it is best to treat Wall and Vallum together, and divide the whole into three parts. From Newcastle past Chesters to Sewingahields, the two works run close together in straight lines along high plateaux north of the Tyne. The outlook to north and south is wide, but the line selected is not specially strong for defence. At Sewingahields the country alters. The Wall, leaving the Vallum, runs along the northern brink of basalt cliffs, often impregnable and everywhere skilfully placed in strong positions. The Vallum continues in its straight sections through the valley to the south, sometimes closely commanded on both sides, and never deviating to seize a defensive position. At Greenhead the basalt and the hills end, and the Wall and Vallum, rejoining, run on side by side in straight courses over country which becomes flatter and flatter as you approach Carlisle. For the tourist, the central portion is the most interesting: there the remains and the landscape are alike most imposing. In the eastern section, Wade's military road, constructed just after 1745, has destroyed most of the Wall and much of the Vallum, while in the west Wall and Vallum have alike vanished wholly before the ploughman.

The object of the Wall is plain. Like the Great Wall of China, it is a fortification to bar ingress and resist armed attack. Inscriptions seem to prove that it, with its turrets and milecastles and forts, was built by Hadrian and his legatus, Platorius Nepos, and in general its arrangements are clear. Even the absence of a connecting road along it need not perplex us; it is possible enough that communication was along the Wall itself. One feature, however, is puzzling. The eastern and western sections, rigidly adhering to straight lines, pursue a course which is not always or especially suited for defence. The western section may be perhaps excused, for Solway Moss lay in front of it; but no such reason applies to the long stretch between Newcastle and Sewingahields. It remains true that the Wall is strongest where the Vallum is not near it, on the basalt crags of the centre.

The object of the Vallum is not at all plain. Dr. Bruce saw in it a rear defence for the Wall against southern insurgents, and called Wall and Vallum one homogeneous whole. The intimate connexion of the two is obvious, but it is equally obvious that the central section of the Vallum can have had no military object. It would have been easy to carry the work a little way up the slope to north or south, and render it capable of defence from whichever side was required; but this was not done, and the unmilitary character of the work is stamped boldly upon it. Possibly it was political: its ditch and ramparts emphasised, as in Germany, a political frontier, surveyed by civil engineers. If so, that frontier was earlier than the Wall. We cannot fix its date: we may think of Petillius Cerealis or Agricola, or anyone else, without any evidence to justify us; but we can, at least, guess that Hadrian built his stone wall because the political frontier, however much guarded by forts and the Stanegate, had proved insufficient to awe the barbarians. Dr. Hodgkin's excavations will, one hopes, reveal much more than this "blind man's buff" hypothesis, but the facts yet known do allow us to set up the non-military character of the Vallum as a working theory.

Meanwhile, other finds in the mural region throw some light on the occupation during the third century. By that time the Scotch Wall of Antonine has disappeared: if it was held, we have no traces. The English Wall was still a bulwark, but the roads and the forts along them come into more prominence. If we may trust inscriptions, the Roman troops garrisoned the Watling-street so far as High Rochester (Bremenium) and probably held a western road up to Birrens (Blatium Bulgium). These points, strangely enough, are the ends of the Roman road system as detailed in the Antonine Itinerary, and the coincidence suggests that the evidence of the inscriptions is more than an accidental negative. On the forts along the roads south of these points we find numerous inscriptions belonging to Alexander Severus, Gordian III., Philip, and the like; such, e.g., as the dedication to Dea Garmagabii erected by a troop of Suebi at Lanchester and recently published in the ACADEMY.

F. HAVERFIELD.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE COINAGE OF THEMISTOCLES.

British Museum: Oct. 23, 1893.

IN Mr. Oman's able review of my Catalogue of the Greek Coins of Ionia in the British Museum in the last number of the ACADEMY (p. 348) there is one singular statement which, as it is in direct contradiction to fact, I cannot allow to pass without correction. Mr. Oman says:

"It is a pity that one coin which possesses the highest historical interest of all the Ionian issues is not in the Museum's possession. We refer to the piece struck by the exiled Themistocles during his tenure of the tyranny of Magnesia, bestowed on him by King Artaxerxes I. after his flight from Athens. This didrachm, whose types are a standing Apollo and an Eagle, is unique, the only known specimen being at Paris."

Now this assertion that the British Museum does not possess a specimen of the coinage of Themistocles is so precise that I can only infer from it that Mr. Oman's strange oversight may be due to his having looked only at the plates, and neglected to examine the text of the work.

On p. 158 I have given a detailed description of the Magnesian coin of Themistocles in the British Museum, and on p. xlv. of my Introduction I also refer to it, explaining its light weight by the fact that it is a plated coin. In this one respect the Museum specimen, though far less well preserved than the Paris coin, is of even greater interest; and its plating of silver over a copper core has sometimes been cited by numismatists (wrongly, as I think,) as being confirmatory of the reputation for trickery with which the name of Themistocles is associated.

The Museum coin was acquired in 1841 from Mr. Thomas Burgon; but its historical importance was at that time unsuspected. The credit of identifying the coinage of Themistocles is due to M. Waddington, who published the De Luynes specimen in 1856.

BARCLAY V. HEAD.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

THE winter exhibition of 1893-4 at the New Gallery will consist of examples of the art of Italy from the commencement of the fourteenth to the middle of the sixteenth century. It will include the schools of Florence, Milan, Siena, and Rome, omitting those of Venice and its dependencies, which will be reserved for a separate exhibition on a future occasion. Examples will be presented of the following arts:—Painting, sculpture (carvings in marble, stucco, terracottas, wood, ivory, &c.; castings in bronze; plaques, coins and medals), books (manuscripts and printed books, illuminations, bindings, &c.), orfèverie (gold and silver work; gems, enamels, and jewelry), pottery (Majolica, Sgraffiato, and Luca Della Robbia ware), textiles and embroidery (tapestry, needlework, and lace), engraving, metal work (wrought and inlaid iron and steel; arms and armour), and furniture. It is intended to hold similar exhibitions at the New Gallery in future years, illustrating the arts of France, Germany, Spain, the Netherlands, and England.

It is doubtful whether a complete collection of the works of the late Albert Moore will be formed for exhibition; but a certain number of his productions have been secured, we hear, for the Grafton Gallery.

THE Burlington Fine Arts Winter Exhibition will be that of a loan collection of Japanese metal and lacquer work.

THE winter exhibition season is now at its height. The following will all open next week: the Institute of Painters in Oil Colours, Piccadilly; the Royal Society of British Artists, Suffolk-street; a collection of paintings and drawings by Mr. Albert Goodwin, at the Fine Art Society's; a collection of eighty water-colour drawings, painted on the Thames from Oxford to Greenwich, by Mr. Max Ludby, at the Dowdeswell Galleries—both in New Bond-street; a collection of silver-point drawings by Mr. Charles Sainton, entitled "Flights of Fancy," at the Burlington Gallery, Old Bond-street; and the ninth annual exhibition of ancient brocades and art needle-work, at Messrs. Howell and James's, Regent-street.

MESSRS. RIVINGTON, PERCIVAL & Co. will publish immediately Inigo Jones and Wren: or the Rise and Decline of Modern Architecture in England, by Mr. W. J. Loftie, with illustrations. In this book an attempt is made to unravel the history of Inigo Jones's two great designs for Whitehall, and also to elucidate the different schemes made by Wren for St. Paul's. The illustrations are mainly from published plates, largely supplemented by photographs, especially of those charming buildings of the transitional period, which are to be found in the West Country, where the Bath stone forms such a ready vehicle for the expression of poetry in stone.

THE Queen, we are pleased to hear, has given permission to Mr. D. Croal Thomson (the editor) to reproduce in the Art Journal, during next year, certain of the famous drawings by old masters, which have not heretofore been published, and which have long been housed in the Library at Windsor Castle. Mr. R. R.

Holmes, the Royal Librarian, has undertaken to furnish to the Art Journal such text as may be found desirable in elucidation and description of these interesting works of art. To the January number of the same review Mr. Humphry Ward will contribute a paper apropos of the great new work on Rembrandt, of which the English edition will by that time have seen the light; while, later in the year, Mr. Frederick Wedmore is expected to discuss a subject with which his name is often associated. Both in the matter of writing and of illustration, the new programme of the Art Journal will be found spirited.

MISS BRODRICK will deliver four lectures on "Ancient Egypt," at the Chelsea Club, Fulham-road, on Wednesdays at 3.30 p.m., beginning on November 22. The lectures will be illustrated with magic lantern views, and supplemented by demonstrations at the British Museum.

WE quote the following from the Oxford Magazine, with regard to the excavations carried out during the autumn on the site of Doclea, in Montenegro, by Messrs. Munro, Anderson, and Milne, assisted by M. Paul Rovinski:

"The site scarcely answered to the picture that had been drawn of it, but some useful work was done. A good crop of Latin inscriptions was reaped, much historical and archaeological material was put on record, and several new discoveries were made. The most important of these last are—a sixth century Christian basilica, and a smaller church or baptistery of perhaps earlier date. The basilica, no doubt the cathedral church of Doclea, measures about 100 feet by 60. The plan of the building is perfect, and presents novel and interesting features. Many of the columns are in situ, the platform for the high altar and the foundations of the bishop's throne remain, and the mosaic pavements of aisles and narthex are fairly complete, forming a valuable addition to the scanty number of Byzantine mosaics still preserved. The small church is cruciform, with shallow transepts and a small apse. One would take it for a first century building, judging by the solid construction and excellence of workmanship displayed; but it has now been proved, by inscriptions and fragments built into the walls, to be erected out of fragments of a great Roman civil basilica, which is the principal architectural monument of the site. These two churches, being above suspicion of late restoration, may compare in their interest for students of church architecture with the basilica of Salona. It is hoped that Mr. T. G. Jackson—who is now on the coast, superintending the building of the campanile of the cathedral of Zara—will visit Doclea and pronounce upon the new discoveries."

THE STAGE.

MR. SYDNEY GRUNDY AND THE COMEDY THEATRE.

SEVERAL months' abstinence from playgoing has generally this effect upon any true lover of the theatre—that, when the playgoing is resumed, the bad seems only indifferent, the indifferent at least tolerable, the tolerable very interesting, and the interesting absolutely excellent. But somehow I don't think that my own mood on Monday night, at the Comedy, was quite the one in which these pleasant illusions are upheld. There is little, I think, to discount; little to make allowance for—what seemed good was good in reality. I was not enthusiastic, but I was satisfied. Mr. Comyns Carr is much to be congratulated on having opened his theatre with a piece alike wholesome and clever, and with a performance finished and excellent. The faults of the play—whatever may be the occasional deficiencies of the players—are faults of almost trivial detail. Let us mention one or two of them at once, and get them out of the way.

The title, to begin with—"Sowing the Wind"—is an absolute misnomer. The wind has all been sown when the curtain rises on the first act. "Reaping the Whirlwind" is, in truth, the process to which, from the beginning to the end of the play, the characters are subjected. The mistakes and the wrong doings are all of them in the past. The entanglement, the embroilment, and the amends, are in the present. Again, the action of the piece is laid about 1820, when, as Thackeray's Vanity Fair and the existing dramas and novels of the period abundantly remind us, people's talk was in a form often curiously different from the talk of our day. Now Mr. Sydney Grundy—a writer of the most vigorous contemporary English—has pretty much confined his excursions into the talk of 1820 to the invention or discovery of the singular expletive, "Smash my toppler!"—a remark in which his Sir Richard Cursitor indulges continually. Furthermore, the "half-world" is referred to as "Bohemia." I do not speak positively; I speak interrogatively—how long before the days of Henri Mürger was the term "Bohemia" employed? Yet again—they are details always—it appears incongruous to hear a gentleman in Hessian boots, a blue coat, and a buff waistcoat, say "since when" for "how long ago?" Depend upon it, it had not in 1820 been thought necessary to use, instead of good English, an English literal translation of "Depuis quand." Lastly—but now I am referring to the scenery, and doubtless I shall be thought hypercritical—the illumination of the room (Ned Annesley's Chambers, Act II.) is very distinctly, in its level light, the illumination of early morning or of late afternoon; yet Rosamund reminds Ned Annesley in the dialogue, that it is "twelve o'clock."

And now these trivial little matters—deserving of some attention, nevertheless—having been cleared away, there remains but to pay tribute to the interest of the quite simple story, to the conception of character, and to the unfaltering vigour of the talk. The piece is quite long enough; and the dialogue in the early part of the first act might still, I think, be "cut" with advantage—the length of that act reduced by about five minutes. Afterwards, the conversation is nearly all of it actually required—it is pointed, it bears distinctly on the course and elucidation of the story. The characters—those at least that are of any importance—are few, and the intrigue is but little complicated. After the fashion of the day—from Docteur Pascal downwards—there is an elderly hero and a quite young heroine. But the hero in "Sowing the Wind" is not the lover. There is a lover, who is an amiable and practically blameless youth; but the interest attaching to him is as nothing in comparison of that which attaches to the man of whom he is the adopted son—the man to whose illegitimate daughter he is pledged and will certainly marry.

Not until the play is very far advanced does the widower, Mr. Brabazon, become aware that any child had ever been his; the secret had been kept from him by the woman who bore her, and who, when she left what is generally described as his "protection," left him to go almost inevitably along a downward path. A considerable portion of the drama is occupied by the efforts of Mr. Brabazon, aided by his quaint and faithful friend Mr. Watkin, to frustrate the alliance between the adopted son, Ned Annesley, and the young woman Rosamund, who is not yet recognised, or dreamt of, as being the actual daughter. Rosamund, who has known how to keep straight, in a life of very tortuous paths—for her mother had brought her up under the roof of that offensive roué and exhausted buck, Lord Petworth—follows the career of a public singer. Loving Annesley, she yet will not accept his hand against the desire of his guardian. Mr. Brabazon—stung to do it—speaks to her in harsh and direct terms as to the discredit of her up-bringing, as to the faults of her mother, as to the exactions and sometimes the undue privileges of her sex. And, while defending her mother and becoming the advocate of her own sex, and the accuser of his, she recognises that there is a measure of truth in that which Mr. Brabazon has asserted. Mr. Brabazon relents to a great extent before he discovers that his contest is with his own child. When he discovers it, he sees in her existence and her charm the satisfaction of a great craving for woman's affection and the chances of a new happiness. Rosamund will, of course, become the wife of Ned Annesley; Mr. Brabazon will be more comfortable than for many years past; and his great pal, the irascible yet kindly Mr. Watkin, must needs accept a solution of the matter which is not such as he had expected or deemed most fitting. And in all this story I do not find the probabilities outraged; I do not discover that Mr. Sydney Grundy has at any point neglected to read aright the instincts of human nature. He has treated character with an unconventionality and an understanding far more frequently met with in narrative fiction than on the stage; and in the middle and later portions of his drama he has written with a terseness, fearlessness, and force which must have earned commendation had they been displayed in that other form of writing—in the long or short story—with which at all events the reading public is more inclined to associate a distinctively literary skill. As for the moral of his piece, it is good and wholesome, but one must nowadays crave pardon for mentioning it. There are quarters in which a healthy tone is voted a blemish, and a wholesome moral a positive offence.

Lastly, as to the acting. It is, broadly speaking, of the modern and restrained order. Time was when the troubles of Mr. Brabazon, and the interesting woes of Rosamund, would have found more violent exposition than any they could receive at the hands of Mr. Brandon Thomas and Miss Winifred Emery. By these artists the modesty of nature is assuredly not overpassed. I am not prepared to say, indeed, that, not with ranters, of course, nor conventional melodramatic players, but with powerful dramatic geniuses in these characters, the effects would not, at least here and there, have been more thrilling. Here and there, indeed, there was a suspicion of under-acting; but it was a suspicion only. On the whole, no reasonable audience could fail to be satisfied and touched by the refinement, the intimité, of the impersonations of Mr. Thomas and of Miss Emery. Rarely have I seen Mr. Thomas so convincing—it is not invariably given to him to be sympathetic; and never have I seen Miss Emery live so completely and sufficiently in the storm-tossed character she assumes, or bring to its realisation an intelligence more delicate and a charm more tender.

All the other characters are, in reality, minor parts: even Mr. Cyril Maud's—an eccentric part, as usual, and played and dressed most ingeniously. Yet much of it is up-hill work; it cannot be altogether sympathetic; it cannot be altogether entertaining: only by effort unrelaxed and well-advised can it be made, as it is made, important. Young Mr. Sydney Brough plays pleasantly and with a touch of old-world ceremoniousness as the lover. Mr. Ian Robertson, despite the presence of several little ways he has learnt too obviously from Mr. Irving, gives a not unsatisfactory character sketch of that weaker Lord Steyne, known in the present play as Lord Petworth. Mr. Dennis is a good attorney-at-law of the old school—a personal acquaintance probably, certainly a contemporary, of Mr. Tulkington's. Mr. Edmund Maurice is full of colour as Sir Richard Cursitor. Miss Annie Hughes plays, with great point and with incisive humour, a part that is hardly worthy of her. Miss Rose Leclercq—this time wholly amusing and never lachrymose—gives distinction to a certain Mrs. Fretwell, who would fain marry her daughter to the adopted son of Mr. Brabazon, and who retains to the last an old, crusted country prejudice against the actress and the singer. The type, of course, is not new, but it is skilfully limned. The play and the performance are probably about the best, as a whole, to be seen in London this October.

FREDERICK WEDMORE.

STAGE NOTES.

THE Shakspeare Reading Society announces for performance at the Royalty Theatre, on November 9, 10, and 11, the comedy of "Measure for Measure," which is to be given under the conditions for which it was composed—the conditions, that is, of the Shaksperian stage. There will be no scenery. The stage itself will be after the model of that of the sixteenth century, and it will be flanked with groups of spectators in the costume of that period. Exceedingly interesting will it be to note the dramatic effect upon the modern playgoer of work executed under these conditions. A long and influential list of "patrons," or upholders, of the enterprise shows the curiosity that obtains among many highly cultivated, and even fashionable, people to witness an experiment which the skill and care of Mr. William Poel and his associates are preparing with the best chances of success. The honorary secretary of the Shakspeare Reading Society—who will afford information—is Miss Handson, of 13, Upper Berkeley-street, Portman-square. We may add that the scheme, while apparently simple, is in reality both laborious and costly. It will cost a hundred guineas merely to produce the "Shaksperian stage," apart from all expenses of costume.

MISS HONOR BROOKE—herself a most intelligent and even poetic reader—proposes to form a small class for the practice of Shakspeare reading. Particulars may be learnt on application to Miss Brooke, at Vallombrosa, 40, Abbey-road, St. John's Wood.

MUSIC.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

Recollections of Countess Theresa Brunswick. By Miriam Tenger, translated by Gertrude Russell. (Fisher Unwin.) Beethoven's letter addressed to "the Immortal Beloved" has given rise to much discussion. Schindler, his early biographer, thought that it was written to the Countess Guicciardi. Mr. A. W. Thayer, after due reflection, decides in favour of the Countess Theresa Brunswick; and in the little book under notice, Miriam Tenger confirms that decision by "certain communications from the lips of the Countess Theresa herself." From these it appears that there was a secret engagement between Beethoven and the Countess, which, after four years' duration, came abruptly to an end in 1810. The conversations with the Countess that are here related are very interesting; but, without doubting the good faith of either lady, the critical reader cannot forget that the Countess was speaking of events which happened many years previously, and that the author, in her turn, has written down the conversations from memory. In her preface she says, "Deeply do I regret the loss of my diaries, which would have been a valuable authority and help for my present sketch of this admirable woman." Still it must be admitted that Miriam Tenger and Mr. Thayer between them make out a very strong case. And yet the difficulty, acknowledged by Mr. Thayer, of determining the year in which the letter was written, and the strong evidence (the "Conversations-Heft" of 1823) brought forward by Schindler in support of the Guicciardi theory, must be taken into consideration. There is another matter, also, which makes one hesitate. If Beethoven was engaged to the Countess of Brunswick from 1806 to 1810, it is, to say the least, curious that during the same period he should have paid such attention to Therese Malfatti. How deep that attachment was we know from a written statement by the niece of that lady, and from a piece of writing in the hand of Beethoven himself. It has even been stated that he made an offer to her. The problem may not be a burning question, and yet, in connexion with the great composer, the smallest matters become of interest. Whatever may be the solution of this vexed question—if, indeed, it is ever destined to be solved—the story of that remarkable woman, the Countess Theresa Brunswick (cousin, by the way, of the far-famed beauty, Julia Guicciardi) in Miriam Tenger's book will be perused with deep interest. The translation is good. But there is a slip on page 91, where the B should be B flat.

J. S. SHEDLOCK.

MUSIC NOTES.

A NEW pianoforte Quartet in B minor (Op. 14), by Robert Kahn, was produced at the first Saturday Popular Concert of the season. The composer was born in 1865, and studied under Capellmeister Frank and Vincenz Lechner. He has written many songs, of which report speaks favourably. The Quartet is a work of considerable interest, and seems to deserve a second hearing; for on Saturday it was, unfortunately, placed at the end of a very long programme. The opening movement, an Allegro ma non troppo, contains good thematic material and clever developments; the Coda is particularly striking. The Andante commences with a placid theme, in which the influence of Mendelssohn is felt; that influence, indeed, extends throughout the whole movement. The Finale is lively, and canonic workings of various kinds testify to its cleverness. The performance, by Miss Fanny Davies, Mlle. Wietrowetz, and Messrs. Gibson and Whitehouse, was good and sympathetic. Miss Davies played as solo Beethoven's "Waldstein"

Sonata. In the matter of technique there was little fault to find; but her reading, especially of the first movement, was singularly tame. Of all Beethoven's Sonatas there is none in which the brío element is so essential. Mlle. Wietrowetz gave a refined reading of Max Bruch's graceful Romance in A. Though the piece cannot produce its proper effect with pianoforte accompaniment, Mr. Henry Bird, the accompanist, did his best. He also deserves praise for his share in the Gounod songs artistically sung by M. E. Oudin.

MESSRS. CHAPPELL & Co. are about to publish a new edition of The Old English Popular Music, with preface and notes, and the earlier examples entirely revised, by Mr. H. Ellis Wooldridge.

THE THOUSAND AND ONE QUARTERS OF AN HOUR. A COLLECTION OF EASTERN TALES.

Edited by LEONARD C. SMITHERS.

In One Volume; about 320 pages; demy 8vo; appropriately bound in cloth; issue limited to 800 small-paper copies, price 6s. net; 75 large-paper copies, each numbered and signed, printed on Arnold's fleur-de-lis unbleached handmade paper, royal 8vo, in special binding, price £1 1s. net. Ready in November next. Applications for circulars, specimen pages and copies, should be made to H. S. Nicolls & Co., 3, Soho-square, London, W.

NEW AND ORIGINAL NOV EL BY GILBERT PARKER

MAY NOW BE PUR CHASED ARROWSM
ITH'S ANNUAL ENTIT LED THE TRESPASSER
BY GILBERT PARKER
ONE SHILLING

All Booksellers and Railway Bookstalls. Published in Bristol by Arrowsmith and in London by Simpkin

HODDER & STOUGHTON'S LIST.

NEW WORKS.

LITERARY RECOLLECTIONS and SKETCHES.

By FRANCIS ESPINASSE. 8vo, cloth, price 12s.

CONTENTS: Some Early Reminiscences—The British Museum Library Fifty Years Ago, and After—Concerning the Organisation of Literature—The Carlyles and a Segment of their Circle: Recollections and Reflections—George Henry Lewes and George Eliot—James Hannay and his Friends—Leigh Hunt and his Second Journal—Manchester Memories—Literary Journalism—The Story of Sergeant Cox—Concerning the "Critic"—Histories of Publishing Houses: Death of the "Critic"—Two Friends of "Critic" Times: Alexander Gilchrist and Charles W. Goodwin—Lord Beaconsfield and his Minor Biographers.

SIR ROBERT N. FOWLER, Bart., M.P. A

Memoir: 1818-1891. By JOHN STEPHEN FLYNN, M.A. With Etched Portrait by Manasse. Crown 8vo, cloth, price 7s. 6d.

MICHAEL LAMONT, SCHOOLMASTER. By

Mrs. PATRICK FINDLAY. In a handsome and novel binding, gilt top, 6s.

SCOTLAND YESTERDAY. Some Old Friends.

By WILLIAM WALLACE. Elegantly bound, gilt top, 6s.

GRAEME and CYRIL. By Barry Pain, Author of "Playthings and Parodies," &c. With 19 Illustrations by Gordon Browne. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

BOGLAND STUDIES. By Jane Barlow.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

[Nearly ready.]

IRISH IDYLLS. Third Edition.

Crown 8vo, cloth 6s. By the SAME AUTHOR.

SOME SALIENT POINTS in the SCIENCE of the EARTH. By Sir J. WILLIAM DAWSON, C.M.G., LL.D., &c., Author of "The Story of the Earth and Man," &c. With 46 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d.

TWO NEW BOOKS FOR BOYS.

1. JUST LIKE JACK. A Story of the Brine and BREEZE. By GORDON STABLES, C.M., M.D., R.N. With 8 Illustrations by J. Finnemore. 8vo, cloth, gilt edges, 5s.

2. IN the FIFTEEN. A Tale of the First

Jacobite Rebellion. By the Rev. H. C. ADAMS, M.A. With 8 Illustrations by J. Finnemore. 8vo, cloth, gilt edges, 5s.

MR. J. M. BARRIE'S WORKS.

Buckram, gilt top, price 6s. each.

1. A WINDOW in THURMS 11th Edition.

2. AULD LIGHT IDYLLS. 8th Edition.

3. MY LADY NICOTINE. 8th Edition.

4. WHEN A MAN'S SINGLE. 7th Edition.

LONDON: HODDER & STOUGHTON, 27, PATERNOSTER ROW.

THE WOMAN AT HOME.

A New Illustrated Magazine for Women.

NOW READY FOR NOVEMBER. Price 6d.

SIR EDWIN ARNOLD. A Page of Confessions. See the

WOMAN AT HOME

LADY CHARLES BERESFORD. An Illustrated Interview by RAYMOND BLATHWAYT. See the

WOMAN AT HOME.

A SHADOWED LIFE. By ANNIE S. SWAN. Illustrated. See the

WOMAN AT HOME.

THE DUCHESS OF CONNAUGHT. By Dr. WILLIAM WRIGHT.
Illustrated. See the

WOMAN AT HOME.

LOVE OF NAOMI. By "Q." Illustrated. See the

WOMAN AT HOME. Of all Booksellers, Newsagents, and Railway Bookstalls. Sixpence Monthly.

100,000 Copies of No. 1 were disposed of, and a Second Edition is now Sold Out. Third Edition Immediately.

A NEW VOLUME commenced with in the OCTOBER NUMBER of

THE BOOKMAN.

Contents of NOVEMBER NUMBER. Price 6d.

THE LATE MASTER OF BALLIOL.

MR. FREDERICK WEDMORE. By Sir GEORGE DOUGLAS, Bart. With Portrait.

THE LITERARY ASSOCIATIONS OF HAMPTSTEAD—II. John Keats. Illustrated. By W. ROBERTSON NICOLL.

THE BRONTËS in IRELAND. Illustrated.

THE WRITING OF DODO: a Talk with Mr. E. F. Benson. By RAYMOND BLATHWAYT.

NEWS NOTES—POETRY—NEW WRITERS—THE BOOKMAN'S TABLE—NOVEL
NOTES. &c. &c.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London
TWO AND A HALF PER CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS repayable on demand.

TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100.

STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.

For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums on deposit, and allows Interest monthly on each completed 21.

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE

FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND

FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager

THROAT AND COUGH

Soreness and dryness, tickling and irritation, inducing cough and affecting the voice. For these symptoms use

EPPS'S GLYCERINE JUJUBES.

In contact with the glands at the moment they are excited by the act of sucking, the glycerine in these agreeable confections becomes actively healing.

Sold only in boxes, 7½d., and tins, 1s. 1½d. Labelled:

JAMES EPPS & CO., Ltd., Homœopathic Chemists, LONDON

ROBINSON & CLEAVER, BELFAST,

Were awarded the Grand Diploma of Honour—Highest Award for Irish Damask Table Linen, Edinburgh, 1890.
Two Prize Medals, Paris, 1889.

IRISH DAMASK TABLE AND HOUSE LINEN.

Fish Napkins, 2s. 11d. per doz. Dinner Napkins, 6s. 6d. per doz. Table Cloths, 2 yds. square, 2s. 11d. 2½ yds. by 3 yds., 5s. 11d. each. Kitchen
Table Cloths, 11½d. each. Strong Huckaback Towels, 4s. 6d. per doz.
Frisled Linen Pillow Cases, from 1s. 2½d. each.

IRISH CAMBRIC

Embroidered Handkerchiefs, in all the latest styles, from 1s. to 20s. each.

IRISH LINEN

COLLARS, CUFFS,

Illustrated
Price-Lists and Samples Post Free to any part of the World.

SHIRTS.

ROBINSON & CLEAVER, BELFAST.

Children's Bordered, 1s. 3d. per doz.
Ladies' " 2s. 8d. "
Gentlemen's " 3s. 8d. "

POCKET HANDKERCHIEFS.

COLLARS: Ladies' and Children's 2-fold, 3s. 6d.
per doz. Gents' 4-fold, 4s. 11d. per doz.
CUFFS for Ladies, Gentlemen, and Children, from 5s. 11d. per doz.

Hemstitched:
Ladies', 2s. 9d. per doz.
Gents', 3s. 11d. "

BY SPECIAL
APPOINTMENTS TO
THE QUEEN AND EMPRESS FREDERICK
OF GERMANY.

A. & C. BLACK'S NEW BOOKS.

Abbotsford and the Personal Relics and Antiquarian

Treasures of Sir Walter Scott: a Series of Twenty-six Plates, printed in Colours from Drawings by WILLIAM GIBB, Illustrator of "Musical Instruments," "Royal House of Stuart," &c. Introduction and Descriptive Notes by the Hon. Mrs. MAXWELL SCOTT, of Abbotsford. In 1 vol., royal 4to, price £2 12s. 6d. net.

Edition de Luxe, limited to 50 Copies with the Plates printed on Japanese paper and the Letterpress on Hand-made paper, price £5 5s. net. [Next week.]

A Year amongst the Persians. By EDWARD G. BROWNE, M.A., M.B., Fellow of Pembroke College, and Lecturer in Persian to the University of Cambridge. Demy 8vo, price 21s.

Investigations on Microscopic Foams and on Protoplasm. By Professor O. BÜTSCHLI. Translated from the German by E. A. MINCHIN, B.A. Oxon. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, price 18s. net. [Shortly.]

Principles of Political Economy. By JOSEPH SHIELD NICHOLSON, Professor of Political Economy in the University of Edinburgh. Vol. I. Demy 8vo, price 15s.

Money and Monetary Problems. By Prof. J. SHIELD NICHOLSON. New and Enlarged Edition. Crown 8vo, price 7s. 6d. [Shortly.]

Labour and the Popular Welfare. By W. H. MALLOCK, Author of "Is Life Worth Living?" &c. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Next week.]

The Process of Argument. By ALFRED SIDGWICK, Author of "Fallacies," &c. Crown 8vo, price 5s.

Dictionary of Birds. By Prof. NEWTON. Demy 8vo. Illustrated. To be completed in 4 Parts. Price 7s. 6d. each net. Parts I. and II. now ready.

Natural Theology. The Gifford Lectures, 1893. Second Course. By Prof. Sir GEORGE G. STOKES, Bart. Crown 8vo, price 3s. 6d.

Margaret Drummond, Millionaire. By SOPHIE F. F. VEITCH, Author of "James Hepburn, Free Church Minister," "Angus Graeme, Gamekeeper," &c. 3 vols., crown 8vo, price 31s. 6d.

The Curb of Honour. By M. BETHAM-EDWARDS, Author of "Kitty," "Dr. Jacob," &c. Crown 8vo, price 6s.

Paul Romer. By C. Y. HARGREAVES. Crown 8vo, price 6s.

The Great Chin Episode. By PAUL CUSHING, Author of "The Blacksmith of Voe," &c. Crown 8vo, price 5s.

NEW EDITIONS.

A TANGLED WEB. By Lady LINDSAY, Author of "The Philosopher's Window." In crown 8vo, price 6s.

ONE VIRTUE: a Fiction. By CHARLES T. C. JAMES, Author of "The Blindness of Memory Earle," &c. &c. In crown 8vo, price 6s.

THE LAST TOUCHES, and Other Stories. By Mrs. W. K. CLIFFORD, Author of "Aunt Anne," &c. In crown 8vo, price 6s. 6d.

Dryburgh Edition

OF THE

WAVERLEY NOVELS.

Illustrated by 250 Woodcuts specially Drawn and Engraved for this Edition. Now publishing in Twenty-five Monthly Vols. Price 5s. in cloth, or in half-leather, 6s. each.

Order of Publication and list of Artists.

Now ready.	WAVERLEY.	CHARLES GREEN.
"	GUY MANNERING.	GORDON BROWNE.
"	THE ANTIQUARY.	PAUL HARDY.
"	ROB ROY.	LOCKHART BOGLE.
"	BLACK DWARF.	WALTER PAGET.
"	LEGEND of MONTROSE.	LOCKHART BOGLE.
"	OLD MORTALITY.	FRANK DADD.
"	HEART of MIDLOTHIAN.	WILLIAM HOLM, R.S.A.
"	BRIDE of LAMMERMOOR.	JOHN WILLIAMSON.
"	IVANHOE.	GORDON BROWNE.
"	THE MONASTERY.	JOHN WILLIAMSON.
"	THE ABBOT.	JOHN WILLIAMSON.
"	KENILWORTH.	H. M. PAGET.
"	THE PIRATE.	W. H. OVEREND.
Dec. 1.	FORTUNES of NIGEL.	G. C. HINDLEY.
1891.
Jan. 1.	PEVERIL of the PEAK.	STANLEY BERKELEY.
Feb. 1.	QUENTIN DURWARD.	H. M. PAGET.
Mar. 1.	ST. RONAN'S WELL.	HUGH THOMSON.
April 1.	RED GAUNTLET.	GEORGE HAY, R.S.A.
	THE BETROTHED.	GODFREY C. HINDLEY.
May 1.	HIGHLAND WIDOW.	G. C. HINDLEY.
June 1.	THE TALISMAN.	GODFREY C. HINDLEY.
July 1.	WOODSTOCK.	STANLEY BERKELEY.
Aug. 1.	FAIR MAID of PERTH.	C. M. HARDIE, A.R.S.A.
Sept. 1.	ANNE of GEIERSTEIN.	PAUL HARDY.
Oct. 1.	COUNT ROBERT of PARIS.	GORDON BROWNE.
	THE SURGEON'S DAUGHTER.	PAUL HARDY.
Nov. 1.	CASTLE DANGEROUS.	WALTER PAGET.

LONDON: ADAM & CHARLES BLACK, SOHO SQUARE, W.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1893.

No. 1122, New Series.

THE EDITOR cannot undertake to return, or to correspond with the writers of, rejected manuscript.

It is particularly requested that all business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., may be addressed to the PUBLISHER, and not to the EDITOR.

LITERATURE.

Eskimo Life. By Fridtjof Nansen. Translated by William Archer. (Longmans.)

DR. NANSEN is not one of those niggardly travellers who keep their knowledge to themselves. The narrative of his trip across South Greenland, though in scientific importance infinitely inferior to the explorations of Nordenskjöld, Berggren, Jensen, and Peary, who have said their say in a few brief reports, was spun into two bulky volumes. But he has not been content with this ample tale. For, finding a few notes on the Godthaab Greenlanders still available, he has managed to veneer with them another bulky mass of compilation, preparatory to sailing on a voyage for which it is the earnest wish of every one that the courageous Norwegian may speedily return, with or without the materials for a third big book. But though Dr. Nansen is often prolix, he is seldom dull. He may take an undue care not to hide his own light under any man's bushel, and is never prone to go out of his way to laud his predecessors in the same field. Yet he writes with considerable literary power, and, if so wedded to a theory that he is unable to see the evidence against it, is almost persuasive when, as must necessarily be the case with volumes on Greenland, few of his readers can know anything about the themes under discussion. The result is a work more attractive than the majority of the many Scandinavian books on that huge triangle of ice and snow and glacier-shaven land. It has, moreover, the advantage of being illustrated with a number of roughly reproduced, but singularly graphic, sketches by Otto Sinding, who has caught the spirit of "Eskimo life" better than any artist except Rasmussen and the natives who illustrated Dr. Rink's Danish Greenland. Nor does the excellent translation of Mr. Archer lose anything by the occasional excision of passages, the dubious taste of which would have scarcely commended it to a people not yet quite abandoned to the naturalistic school.

But while Dr. Nansen's latest volume has the merit of brightness and reasonable accuracy, it is disfigured by many of the faults of its predecessor. He stretches his facts over far more pages than they will extend without help from other sources, and is often unjust to English authorities, by ignoring them when they have anticipated his own countrymen. Indeed, the first line of the title-page is utterly misleading. The book is not on "Eskimoliv." It is, indeed, questionable whether Dr. Nansen, or the majority of the writers from whom so much of his volume is compiled, ever saw a pure-blooded Eskimo. There are "Kalalek" of the uncivilised type on the Greenland side of Smith's Sound, and a few families on the East Coast. The "Eskimo," however, of whom Dr. Nansen treats are the civilised Greenlanders at the Danish post of Godthaab, one of the many "colonies" dotting the shore to 73° North. These people are all good Lutherans, nearly all capable of reading and writing, and of so mixed a race that it is doubtful if one of them deserves the name Dr. Nansen has applied to all of them. Many are more Danish than Inuit; and except that their habits are necessarily much the same as of old, and that a century and a half of missionaries has not uprooted the traits and superstitions of the days that were before Egede, it is idle to term them Eskimo. They are not even typical West Greenlanders; for, owing to the lack of sea-ice in the South—Godthaab being far outside the Arctic Circle—the dog-sledge is seldom seen, and the long dark winter and the long summer days are alike unknown. The character of the part of Greenland seen by Dr. Nansen also differs considerably from that farther north. In short, it would be as accurate to describe a village of Mexicans as Aztecs, the Indians at Lachine as Iroquois, or the habits of the Cherokees after passing a few months among the farmers of that name in Northern Carolina.

Otherwise, these sketches of the half-castes of Godthaab Fjord are very interesting; and though not new to anyone acquainted with much of the voluminous literature of Greenland, they will be fresh to most of those who read them. But the book is far too long. It is padded out with endless quotations from Egede, Dalager Rink, Holm—anybody, so long as he has the inestimable merit of being a Scandinavian. No one, indeed, could imagine after reading Eskimo Life that, with the exception of Rink's and Holm's works on the Greenlanders, almost every research upon the Eskimo is in English, German, or French. These are ignored to such an extent that very frequently, either directly or by inference, credit is given to Scandinavian writers for views which are, in reality, of English or American origin. For though Dr. Nansen may admit that there were strong men before Agamemnon, this accentuated type of Northern patriot—a veritable "norsk norman fra Norge"—will only do so if he can make them out to be Norwegians.

It is with compilation from these writers that a large portion of the book is swollen out. His own observations are very slight; and what is actually novel might go into a small pamphlet. The "science" of the book is the worst. Like the science in his former work, it bears the distinct impress of having been "got up" after the winter's return, because it was expected, not because any data were accumulated on the spot, or the gaps in our knowledge had been known to him at the time when they might have been filled in. Take, for example, the chapters on Religion and Folklore. They are mainly extracts from Egede, Crantz, Dalager, and Rink, most of which, so far as applicability to the civilised Godthaabers goes, is as near the mark as if a writer on English Society were to quote Julius Caesar as an authority, or were Captain Cook's narrative to be accepted as an accurate picture of the present condition of the Sandwich Islands. What is erroneously termed Dr. Rink's theory (p. 13) of the route taken by the Eskimo to South Greenland—namely, that the Smith's Sound Eskimo, after doubling the northern end of the country, and creeping down the East Coast, reached the most southern of the old Icelanders' "bygds"—is objected to for a very insufficient reason. The northern Eskimo on this migration, Dr. Nansen thinks, must have lost the use of the kajak, and when they again reached a comparatively ice-free sea would have found a difficulty in acquiring the art of building and employing it. But exactly the same objections apply to the other theory—namely, that the Smith's Sound people passed Melville Bay. For they, too, had lost the use of the kajak, which is not among their implements to this day. It is, however, by no means so certain as Dr. Nansen imagines, that the Eskimo, in their westerly migration, took the direct route across Smith's Sound, as he might have found had he cared to consult Mr. Markham's admirable paper in the Geographical Society's "Arctic Papers" (1875). Many years ago, the reviewer pointed out, from the distribution of certain animals, that in all likelihood not only the Eskimo, but the musk ox, the lemming, and the ermine took the same route, that Greenland trended off to a narrow point and ended in about Lat. 82° or 83° N.—deductions which have been either actually confirmed or rendered very probable by Peary's recent explorations.

Dr. Nansen, however, like many other imperfectly informed writers on the supposed eruption of the Eskimo into the "bygds" about the fourteenth century, does not seem to be aware that this was not their first appearance in South Greenland. Are Torgilsson, who flourished from 1068 to 1148 (and was, therefore, well acquainted with Red Erik's companions), is positive as to the earliest adventurers finding in Juliahehaab district fragments of kajaks and articles wrought in stone, which proved that the Skraelings had been there before them. Still later—in 1266—Thorgil Orrabeinsfostre met with them on the East Coast, so that everything tells for the theory which Dr. Nansen rejects. Dr. Rink and others hold, very justly, that, so far from the Eskimo being an Asiatic race who have crossed Behring Strait, they are sprung from some Alaskan river tribe, the settlement of Eskimo on the Siberian shore not being the parent home from whence the races spread westward, but simply one of American emigrants. So far as can be gathered, Dr. Nansen coincides; but he objects to the extent that no American people except the Eskimo use the dog as a beast of draught or burden. This is not accurate. For several of the Indian tribes near the southern limits of the Eskimo drive their dogs in tandem fashion, as do the Behring Strait Inuit. More than one—I am speaking from personal observation—put light packs on them; and as nearly every tribe keeps dogs, it was only natural that they should have been employed to drag the sledge once a region was reached where this was practicable. Had this hyperborean people come from Siberia, the chances are in favour of their having taken the reindeer with them. Yet nowhere is the reindeer tamed among the Eskimo.

It is generally admitted that the early Scandinavians have not left any traceable influence on the Greenlanders, unless the term nisa for the common porpoise, and one or two even more doubtful words, are to be accepted as such. When, however, Dr. Nansen suggests that the kajak is derived from the Norwegian draug, he forgets that the former is used on the other side of America also; and that if it was invented in Greenland, the Eskimo migration must have been easterly instead of westerly, for 3000 miles since the fourteenth century (p. 264). But if the ancient Scandinavian had little influence on the Skraelings—"the pareings of men," not "weaklings" (p. 9)—the modern ones have had a great deal. This, Dr. Nansen declares, has been invariably bad. On this point he enlarges with less than his usual good sense, and with many strictures on missionaries couched in the worst of taste. As a rule, it may be admitted that white men are "bad in the lump," and that no savage race has, on the whole, been the better for us. But after some acquaintance with the results of whiskey-cum-calico civilisation on primitive peoples, the present writer is bound to admit that it is seen at its best in Danish Greenland. Dr. Nansen is too sweeping in his conclusions, from a very limited experience of the least favourable districts of that coast; and when he declares that the only hope of the "Eskimo" regaining their ancient manhood is for the Danes to leave them alone, he is bidding good-bye to the possibility of his argument being accepted. This, indeed, he allows to be impossible. The so-called "Eskimo" are in reality a new hybrid race, which is not comparable with the ancient stock. The Danish Government has ordained a monopoly of the trade solely to keep its protégés from the vicious consequences which free intercourse with unscrupulous people would entail. It has done much to teach them the arts of civilisation, compatible with the necessity of living by killing seals and white whales; and if the end of all these efforts is an enfeebled people, this is as much due to the care of the Rigsdag as to its lack of interest. For the eternal coddling of the people has ended not only in a large deficit in the Greenland budget, but in the pampered race, knowing that the government will not see them want, losing that self-reliance and energy imperative among their savage relatives. But no one can see—as the reviewer has seen—the wild people of the other side of Davis Strait, of Cape York, and on the western extremity of the continent, without appreciating the kindly, if often mistaken, philanthropy of the Danes. Were the Greenlanders left to themselves traders would rush in with supplies of Hamburg gin, and what is already seen in the vicinity of the Arsuk kryolite mine (p. 333) would be the rule from Tessiasuk to Cape Farewell. The race would either be exterminated by drunkenness and the vices of civilisation, or die off before it could accustom itself to the deprivation of the many articles with which they have been in the habit of being supplied by the "Kablunak." Dr. Nansen, indeed, goes the length of affirming that education, by dividing the interests of the Greenlanders, has been mischievous to them, a kind of argument which we occasionally hear applied by English reactionaries to the agricultural labourer. "Poor dreamer!" the author fancies people saying, "you have nothing to say which has not been better said before." But, "I am filled," he tells us, "with a burning desire to send the truth reverberating over the whole world." In this kindly ambition his publishers will no doubt share. Still, with quite as warm a regard for a most lovable race, and one of far longer standing than Dr. Nansen's, we sincerely trust that when his tirade against the costly kindness of a nation which can ill afford it "reverberates over the whole world," this faint protest on the part of an eye-witness may follow in its rear.

The population of Danish Greenland fluctuates about 10,000. The latest census given in the book is 10,177 for 1889; next year the population, I learn from private information, was 10,516, of whom 309 were Europeans. Since 1880 the increase has been 5 per cent., the greatest growth being in North Greenland. In the "coloni" of Godhaven, on Disco Island, the actual increase has been 35 per cent.

It would be easy to join issue with Dr. Nansen on many other questions; but space will not permit, and the gallant author is not here to answer the queries that might be raised. If, however, his book is needlessly padded out with extracts from easily accessible authors, it is, on the whole, a meritorious one; and, if ruthlessly purged by a judicious editor of much which is beside the purpose, will remain a permanently creditable one. Mr. Archer, though not, we understand, personally acquainted with the Eskimo, has here and there exercised a wise discretion in omitting some objectionable passages, and the author has on second thoughts deleted much which appeared in the Norse version. But the volume requires much more drastic treatment before it can be regarded with complete satisfaction.

The translation is almost perfect, though we have noted an occasional Norse idiom and a word which might be more accurately rendered.

"Dr. Nansen," he mentions, "suggested that I should follow the example of Dr. Rink in his Tales and Traditions of the Eskimo, and treat the word 'Eskimo' as undeclinable. I have ventured, however, to overrule his suggestion. There is precedent for both 'Eskimo' and 'Eskimos' as the plural form; and where there is any choice at all, it seems only rational to prefer the regular declension."

As I am the irrational person who is responsible for the title of Dr. Rink's book, it will be scarcely expected that I should agree with Mr. Archer. There may be authority for "deers" and "sheeps" also, and we have, of course, the authority of Fluelen for "salmons"; but we require a better than the Welsh captain for "Eskimos." It may also not be irrelevant to add that, as Mr. Archer gives references to the Danish as well as to the English version of Dr. Rink's work, the "condensation" and "expurgation" in the latter were made by himself or by his express desire, and that an author may surely claim the privilege of saying how much of his early views shall or shall not be permitted to stand? When a new edition of a scientific book is published—and the "Tales of Traditions" were intended to play that part to the "Eskimoiske Eventyr og Sagn"—is it quite fair to quote the discarded early version? "Det Kongelige Grønlandske Handel" is always translated "The Royal Greenland Company." "Board of Trade" would be better; for the so-called "Handel" is actually a government department not a commercial "Selakab." Again, Brandevin is rendered "brandy," a word which in English infers some form of cognac. It is in reality rye or potato spirit (sold for fivepence a "pot"), though the Eskimo equivalent of "Snapsemik" is a generic term for any form of intoxicant. Nor is Phoca vitulina the "common seal" (p. 127), so far as Greenland is concerned. Dr. Nansen ought to have known, if he had studied the Pinnipedia, that it is one of the least frequent; the saddleback is the true Greenland species. Finally, to end fault-finding where so few faults are to be found, "Superintendent of the Settlement" is a better translation of "Colonibestyrrer" than "Colony Manager." The "colonies" of West Greenland are scarcely what is suggested by the word to the English reader. May we also beg that, before Dr. Nansen's volume appears in a new and improved edition, one of the most necessary of these improvements will be an index?

ROBERT BROWN.

Letters and Memoirs of the Twelfth Duke of Somerset. Edited and arranged by W. H. Mallock and Lady Gwendolen Ramsden. (Bentley.)

PERHAPS there was never before published a volume so full of commonplace. No one would have been more astonished—not to use a stronger expression—than the twelfth Duke of Somerset, had he been told that letters such as most of those in this publication would be thought worthy of exhibition to the world. Though they treat for the most part of personal or domestic concerns, and though even in this respect a most scrupulous excision has diminished their natural attraction, though this care has not been extended to prevent the frequently tedious repetition of the same incident to several correspondents, yet there is a lingering flavour of interest because of the consistent individuality of the subject.

In these days, when publication is so common, there is no reason why friendly and family admiration should exclude the twelfth Duke of Somerset, though he was not a remarkable or, except in rank, a very distinguished man. Yet he was, in his way, a typical noble, full of high qualities, endowed with great personal charm, whose character in manhood does not seem to have varied greatly from the account given by his mother at the age of seven :

"He is very quick, extremely idle, but his mind is activity itself. His character is downright and open, and I think too much destitute of pride and ambition."

He had liberal ideas; his quickness and conscientiousness made him a good administrator, while his rank rendered needless any striving after place and distinction in the society in which he was undoubtedly admired and beloved. There is an easy and enlightened grace about even the commonplace of the Duke which serves to carry the reader through the book, and there is occasional reward in some remark of original or peculiar interest. Scores of pages are filled with matter of no more public concern than the Duke's request to his father :

"Pray look at the steps from the [Totnes] bridge into the island, which must be finished, and inquire where the key of the gate is kept, and what facilities the people have of access for walking there."

But his account of "the famous Mrs. Wise" of Devonshire, the reputed original of Dickens's "Mrs. Wittiterley," is cut out. He had cynicism and humour, but the display of these qualities has been generally suppressed by the editors. His wife, a sister of Mrs. Norton, was certainly witty. Writing from apartments in the Palazzetto Borghese, the Duke (then Lord Seymour) said :

"I rent them from a Roman count, who appeared to us in a flowing dressing gown and boots and spurs, an unusual mixture of dress. Lady Seymour suggested he had had a nightmare, and had been riding it, as the only solution of such a costume!"

The following is from the Duke's account of Malta :

"The people seem to be an ugly and devout generation. I at least walked into two or three churches yesterday, and found them full of black mantillas listening to preaching. The men don't seem to go to church; they are chiefly employed in cheating the English while their wives pray to God that they may succeed."

We do not remember to have met before with the statement that at the outbreak of the Crimean war "Miss Burdett Coutts offered to maintain all the soldiers' wives while their husbands were fighting in the East"; and the following is certainly new. The Prince Consort was talking to the Duke about the recently erected statue of Richard I. in Palace Yard.

"The Prince said to me he could not conceive why it should be objected to, so I said: 'It may be that Mr. Cobden and the members of the Peace Society consider the statue too martial in character, and fancy that a warrior with a drawn sword at the door of the House of Commons excites too much military feeling.' 'Ah!' said the Prince, 'I suppose Richard Cœur-de-Lion is not agreeable to Richard Cœur-de-Coton.'"

One wishes that there were fewer of the dull and domestic letters and more of those containing such bright and amusing remarks as that expressing the trouble of the Lord Chancellor's daughters when yachting with their father in the Flirt on having "to go on shore with 'Flirt' written all round their hats"; or that commemorating Count Schuvaloff's difficulties in learning English. Said the Count to the Duchess of Somerset :

"He had dined lately at —, and while he was talking, a lady suddenly said to him: 'Come now, shut up!' So Schuvaloff, believing this was the polite phrase of the best society, meeting another lady at dinner next day, when she asked a political question which he did not care to answer, interrupted her with 'Shut up!' and she showed him by her change of countenance that he had made a bévue. This has much shaken his confidence in speaking English."

But no one will complain against this publication, if only because it has given us two remarks by Disraeli; a reply to "What is the most desirable life?" and a confession, almost the only one he ever made, of the pressure of age. To the question he replied: "A continued grand procession from manhood to the tomb"; and in 1878, at the highest reach of his fame and success, he sighed: "I have got the Parliament and the nation at my back, and if I were ten years younger I could settle all Europe."

Of the editing of this volume we have only to say that it is faultless, except in excessive discretion and in failure to obtain better and more generally interesting materials. But it is curious that, with such accomplished and interested supervision, there should appear misprints such as "Duke of Sunderland" for Sutherland and "Lady Llanwer" for Llanover.

ARTHUR ARNOLD.

Reflections and Refractions. By Charles Weekes. (Fisher Unwin.)

A POEM cast into an impersonal artistic shape can be judged by recognised canons. But a poem taking nearly all its interest from the expression of personal idiosyncrasy comes before a very different court, and is liked, or disliked, from reasons as personal as its own inspiration, or as the reasons for which we like or dislike the people we meet in daily life; and if it be not more personal than difficult or rugged, our judgment is likely to be somewhat of the summary kind. A Tennyson, or a Mr. Swinburne, finds his public with a volume or two; while a Browning has for years to publish at his own expense, and a Whitman to be his own bookseller. A rugged, obscure personal book, if it be at all excellent, has, therefore, a double claim upon our hospitality: the claim to be received for its own sake, and the claim to be received because of the dangers and difficulties that beset its future.

Mr. Charles Weekes's uncouthly-named Reflections and Refractions is just such a book. It is as interesting as it is rugged and obscure. There is not a poem without some unusual thought or pleasant phrase, and there is scarcely one that can be taken apart from the rest and left to explain itself with security. One of the best and most intelligible is undoubtedly "Phthisical," as Mr. Weekes has horribly named a very beautiful description of the approach of dawn, supposed to be written by a dying man. I quote the central verses:—

"Long before the dawn
Yesterday,
Sleepless thro' the twilights fair,
I was somehow drawn,
Unaware,
Into love of this old earth—
Could I say!
First the stillness; then
Round the house
Flew the owls a moment; and Silence once again:
All the land
Lay in perfect twilight; stirred
Not a mouse.

"Fallen thus on peace,
I awoke
To that speechless thought of her;
Gave me wondrous ease.
Not a stir
Marked I till the mellow-tongued
Blackbird spoke.

"Then returned the owls;
From the wall
Dropped the plaster on the walk.
In the chimney-holes
Jackdaw-talk.
In the Herrick Farm the cock
Gave a call.

"Silence then. In haste
O'er the town
Thatched and steepled, every star,
By the morning chased Crowded far
With the copper-coloured moon
Going down.

"Shortly barked the fox;
And the cart
Rumbled on the market-road;
Then the choir of cocks
Hoarsely crowed;
Lastly, pulsed once more the whole
Eternal heart."

There is surely notable literary power of some kind in this massing of significant detail; but whether a prose power or a verse power is not yet perfectly clear. Most of the other poems halt likewise between the analytic method of prose, and the synthetic method of poetry; but here and there is a poem or a stanza which in its fashion and degree is pure poetry. "Hesperus," despite its slightness, is such a poem :

"Hesperus at milking time,
Is most beautiful of stars;
Well he likes our shepherd maids,
Well he likes our lowing herds,
Rumbling wheels and clink and chime,
Of our pails and milking cars.
"All our young men are made mild
When they see him in the sky;
And whenever he has smiled,
Simple mortals do not sigh:
Hesperus is friend to all,
Hesperus at milking time."

The bulk of the poems are, however, less expressions of mood and feeling than definitions or expositions of intricate arguments, subtle conceptions, detailed observations or obstinate questionings; and if but seldom these arguments, conceptions, observations, and questionings are expressed with enough precision of form and boldness of cadence to be absolutely poetry, they are well-nigh always poetical and stimulating, and here and there put some fine or curious thought into really memorable shape, as in the little lyric called "Art"—

"Upon the mid-stream rushing hence,
To hold those wild hot lips which burn
Thy face, but never more return,
Detached from every other sense.

"Upon the stream that whirls along
To hold that wondrous hue alone;
Or that delightful undertone
Detached from every other song.

"At last, upon the flowing stream
To hold, and with the inward sight,
That thought within a blaze of light,
Detached from every other dream."

—or reset an ancient question in a new way, as in "That":

"What is that beyond this life,
And beyond all life around,
Which, when thy quick brain is still,
Nods to thee from the stars?
Lo, it says, thou hast found
Me, the lonely, lonely one."

Mr. Weekes is least successful in his longer poems, though in all there are fine stanzas and passages; for a big canvas or long discussion seems to absorb too much of his attention and make his style get out of control like a ship in a high wind. These longer poems are full of uncouth ejaculations and abbreviations, no less than of echoes from Browning, Arnold, and Omar Khayam, strange in so original a writer. The book is, however, marked by daring—and in literature the prize falls to the bold sooner or later—and is, apart from its promise, both moving and interesting.

W. B. YEATS.

Essays, Speeches, and Memoirs of Field Marshal Count Helmuth Von Moltke.
(Osgood, McIlvaine & Co.)

THESE volumes will probably attract more notice than other writings of Moltke published since his death. His letters to his mother and brothers disclose the best side of his remarkable character in private life; but they are not striking, or of peculiar interest. His précis of the great war of 1870-71 is only an abridgment of the Prussian Staff History; and, written as it was in extreme old age, it abounds in errors. The present work is divided into three parts—Essays written by Moltke when still a subaltern; Speeches delivered in the Prussian House of Peers or in the Reichstag of the German Empire; and Memoirs of his life and career contributed by old friends and kinsmen. The Essays, composed when the author was free from the responsibilities of high office, are much the most interesting part of the book. They reveal great knowledge and profound study. But they are deficient in true political insight; and they are sometimes so distorted by prejudice, and are so full of omissions and false statements, that they are occasionally mere caricatures of history. The Speeches, made after Sadowa and Sedan, when Moltke had become a pillar of the German Empire, display his power of organisation in war, and contain weighty and well-considered sentences. But they are chiefly notable for the intense dislike of France which was one of Moltke's distinctive qualities; they are such as Cato made against Carthage. The Memoirs tell us little that we did not know before. But they clearly bring out the best parts of Moltke's lofty and manly nature—his intense industry, his steady perseverance, his mastery of the details of war, his unassuming modesty, and his strong love of family. As I do not read German, I cannot decide whether this English translation is good or bad; but it contains a number of slipshod expressions, and I have noticed many errors of the press.

I shall glance at Moltke's Essays in a sequence different from that adopted in these volumes. Those on the Eastern Question, five in number, published between 1841 and 1844, when the policy of Thiers had directed the mind of Europe towards the East, and Acre had fallen, may be read with the charming Letters on the East written by Moltke when he had travelled from Berlin to visit the decaying realms of Islam, and when he first saw war on the field of Nisib. They give a graphic and interesting account of Kurdistan, and of other provinces of the Turkish empire; and they forcibly insist on the declining power of the Sultans throughout their immense dominions. Moltke's strong—nay, intense—patriotic sympathies make him point out that Austria should have a potent voice in the ultimate partition of the lands of the Turk, an event which he believed not distant; and he urged that a German should sit on a new throne in Palestine. The next Essay is one of the author's earliest works. It deals with the Belgian Revolution of 1830, and with the causes which broke up the Dutch-Belgian monarchy, an unfortunate creation of 1814-15. The tract shows real historical knowledge, and is very creditable to a young writer; but it is feeble in its conclusions and has little insight. Moltke properly dwells on the profound divisions which separated the Dutch Republic and the Spanish Netherlands in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries; and he notices how marked were their distinctions in race, in religion, in interest, and in history. But, perhaps from fear of shocking opinion in Prussia, still true to the Holy Alliance, he does not draw the self-evident inference, that Holland should not have been yoked with Belgium in a union opposed to the feelings of ages; and it is thoroughly superficial to urge, as he does, that Belgium quarrelled with Holland on mere questions of finance, and of the representation of the combined state. The Essay on Poland appeared in 1832, and attracted considerable attention at the time, the public censor of the press at Berlin observing that it gave proof of the ripest learning. Undoubtedly it is an able performance considered as a record of the remote past. Indeed, we know no better résumé of the annals of Poland down to the eighteenth century. Moltke indicates clearly and fully the causes of the anarchy and decay of Poland; but he is far from candid, and he misleads the reader when he reaches the history of modern Poland. He represents, after the fashion of Carlyle, the international crime of the famous Partition, attended with many woes for Europe, as an event inevitable in the nature of things; and he tells us nothing about the guile of Frederick, of the ferocious ambition and craft of Catherine, and of the combination of brute force and fraud, concealed under specious lying phrases, by which Poland was blotted out as a nation. One of his historical assertions is wholly incorrect: the Czartorinskis did not seek to sell their country to Russia, inclined as they were to a Russian alliance; and Moltke has not told us how Catherine, egged on by Frederick, thwarted every reform her friends proposed to save Poland from impending ruin.

The Essay on Railway Routes appeared in 1843, when the railway system was still in its infancy; and in two respects it deserves attention. It shows how thoroughly Moltke had mastered the mechanism and organisation of this new mode of transit—few engineers of the time had equal knowledge; and it points out the importance of railways in future wars, a truth little understood by the soldiers of that day. The most striking, however, of these pieces, and the most significant from every point of view, is the Essay on what Moltke has called "The Western Boundary"—that is, on the claim of France to the frontier of the Rhine. This tract was published in 1841; and it clearly discloses what even then were the ideas of able men in the Prussian army on the pretensions of Germany in a future they looked to, and what their feelings were to the foe of Rossbach and Jena. Moltke claims for an ideal Germany the lost provinces of the mediæval empire—for centuries in the possession or under the control of France—Alsace, Lorraine, Burgundy, Franche Comté, Artois, ignoring the facts that Prussia, at least, had not a shadow of right to these lands; that France can show a fair title to them, as the representative of Imperial Rome; and—infinitely more important than antiquarian pedantry—that she had made them her own by the lasting ties of national sentiment and devoted loyalty. The Essay, even if it stopped at this point, would prove how dangerous to the peace of Europe were the doctrines prevalent at the staff office of Berlin; but it breathes, besides, a persistent hatred of France which recalls the memories of 1813-14, and which accounts for much that occurred in 1870-71. France, according to Moltke, owed everything to Germany in barbarous and mediæval times: she was an effete satellite of decaying Rome until she was regenerated by the conquering Teuton. But ever since the days of Henry II., at least, she has repaid the debt of civilisation and progress by systematically robbing Germany; she has steadily pursued this detestable policy under Louis XIV., the Republic, and Napoleon; and she is the great despoiler and disturber of Europe. It is nothing to the purpose that Prussia, perhaps, owes her existence to Richelieu in the Thirty Years' War, and that French intervention in German affairs was caused in the main by German dissensions; in the long enduring relations between the two races Germany was ever in the right, France ever in the wrong. Indeed, French influence is chiefly to blame for the disgusting licentiousness of the German courts in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. But if France has plundered Germany on the west, Russia has equally plundered Germany on the east; and the day will come when the Teutonic people will have a word to say on Esthonia and Courland. These sentiments, echoing the cries heard in the camp of Blücher after Leipzig and Waterloo, may make the student of history smile. But they throw light on the Teutonic crusade led by Moltke twenty-three years ago; they explain why the annexation of Alsace and Lorraine was deemed a moderate demand by the Prussian staff; they largely account for the strong sympathy at present existing between France and Russia, which ultimately may lead to the most appalling of wars.

The Speeches of Moltke are not the least instructive part of these volumes. Made under the restraints of high office, and when Europe was observing his words, they are free from the extravagance of his earlier essays. But they follow, none the less, the same train of thought as regards the position and power of Germany; and they suggest serious doubts whether Prussian supremacy has not been fraught with many evil results. Moltke bluntly asserted that what the German sword had conquered at Sadowa and Sedan could only be retained by the German sword; he expressed a curious surprise that the good faith and pacific aims of victorious Prussia were not appreciated as they deserved to be; but he insisted that the military power of the empire should be kept at the highest point of efficiency in the distracted state of the Continent after the Peace of Frankfort. It seems never to have occurred to the speaker, who in politics was simply a Prussian Junker, that the agitation and alarm of Europe were mainly due to the immense development of the force of Germany in war since 1866, and especially to the annexation of Alsace and Lorraine: the simple logic of facts did not strike his mind. But from his point of view he uttered wise warnings against reliance on the triumphs of 1870-71; he understood how immense are the resources of France; he watched with grave misgivings with what elastic energy she rose superior to crushing defeat, and collected the elements of her military strength; he predicted that another gigantic conflict between Teuton and Gaul was certain to happen; and he told his countrymen not to be too confident, though he believed that success would attend their efforts. It can hardly be doubted that he wished to precipitate the struggle before France had become prepared; and his speeches do not conceal his dislike of Frenchmen. For the rest these utterances clearly show Moltke's perfect understanding of all that relates to the organisation and needs of the German armies; but they only repeat what he had made manifest in the great campaigns of 1866 and 1870.

The Memoirs, which form the last part of the work, are a graceful tribute by friends and kinsmen to the excellences of Moltke in private life—to his fine intelligence, to his high mental culture, to his virtues in the circle of home; but these qualities of the warrior are already known, and do not require, perhaps, to be further noticed.

WILLIAM O'CONNOR MORRIS.

Publications of the English Goethe Society.
No. VII. Transactions, 1891-92. Edited by Eugene Oswald. (David Nutt.)

MUCH may be said for and against literary societies, of which the object is the study, and usually the worship, of some one great writer; but least justification, if any, is required in the case of societies founded for promoting the knowledge of a foreign writer. A thorough knowledge of foreign literatures is not so common in England, but that the union and combination of students may be of invaluable service. And if any foreign author of the last or present centuries demand and repay the labours of an English society, assuredly it is Goethe. Friends and foes alike have recognised in him the typical mind of modern times: not the equal of Dante or of Shakspeare in his accomplishment, his actual work, but their equal in power to express, sum up, and represent the stir and tendency and movement of an age and epoch. Carlyle, Arnold, have said enough upon this. The English Goethe Society has of late passed through troublous times: there have been discussions, apprehensions, misunderstandings. It has been reported dead by some, and pronounced doomed by others. Happily, neither misfortune has befallen it: it exists, it has energetic officers, it has a goodly list of members. The scope of its aims and inquiries has been enlarged so as to include German studies other than that of Goethe and his works. In this, its seventh year, it appeals for stronger support and wider interest; and the publication of its seventh volume of Transactions should serve its purpose well. Upon that volume, with its multifarious papers, we will not discourse at length, but merely give some brief consideration to the two articles of greatest freshness and importance.

The first of these in order is a version by Sir Theodore Martin of the Roman Elegies, never before translated in their entirety. Nothing in Goethe is more characteristic, nothing more stimulating, than those wonderful Italiänische Reise, which have for their motto Auch ich in Arkadien! But not even the letters from Rome so singularly convey the spirit of Goethe under the spell of the spirit of Rome, as do the Elegies. Goethe's sojourn in Italy was the happiest and most momentous point in his life, looked back upon with constant longing and wistfulness. Like his great predecessor Winckelmann, there he "found himself," found his holy city, his Delphi, Jerusalem, Mecca. Like so many men of the North, they hungered spiritually for the antique and classic land, as their barbarian forefathers were allured by its splendour and fertility. Studying art in Rome, Goethe was enraptured by what an Elizabethan has called "the continued trophies of so old a triumphing city": calmed and consoled by her magnificent air of supremacy, the serenity of her very ruins. Here he laboured to perfection upon Tasso and Iphigenie, Egmont and Faust: he drank the inspiration of the "eternal antique." And in the Elegies, composed in the classic metre of elegy, his enthusiasm found voice, together with his irony, his mockery of reflection upon much in modern life. Rarely have the old world and the new so met and mingled as in these stately, whimsical, admirable poems. Even Madame de Staël does them something less than justice when she writes:

"Dans ses élégies, composées à Rome, il ne faut pas chercher des descriptions de l'Italie; Goethe ne fait presque jamais ce qu'on attend de lui, et quand il y a de pompe dans une idée, elle lui déplaît; il veut produire de l'effet par une route détournée, et comme à l'insu de l'auteur et du lecteur. Ses élégies peignent l'effet de l'Italie sur toute son existence, cette ivresse du bonheur, dont un beau ciel le pénètre. Il raconte ses plaisirs, même les plus vulgaires, à la manière de Properce; et de temps en temps quelques beaux souvenirs de la ville maîtresse du monde donnent à l'imagination un élan d'autant plus vif qu'elle n'y était pas préparée."

All this is largely true, but it is not quite sympathetic; it misses the depth of the joy which urged Goethe, very much in the old Roman manner of the elegists, to play and be merry with his theme for very delight's sake. Sir Theodore Martin's version is in the original metre; it is not seldom felicitous in phrase, if rarely quite felicitous in rhythm. Even in German the classic metres are not perfectly at home; in English, notwithstanding sundry Elizabethans, and Arnold, Clough, Kingsley, Longfellow, they are terribly ill at ease. Now and again the translator has hardly rendered the full force of a line or word. Thus, to take two instances of one word, he translates "Froh empfind' ich mich nun auf klassischem Boden begeistert," by the phrase "Joy! how on classical soil I feel the poetic afflatus": where the last words, so hackneyed and cumbrous, poorly convey the beautiful touch of "begeistert." And again: "In dem geistlichen Rom, kaum scheint es zu glauben, doch schwör' ich: Nie hat ein Geistlicher sich meiner Ummarmung gefreut": here "priestridden" for "geistlichen," and "prelate or priest" for "Geistlicher" completely fail to render the irony of the original. But for the most part the reader will find, if not the felicities of Goethe, yet much of his spirit; and the difficulty of translation is great. Certainly, if, as Heine declared, Goethe lived a long life of "egoistic calm," the Roman Elegies represent him at its healthiest and happiest period.

The second most notable "Transaction" is an elaborate paper upon Chamisso by Dr. Eugene Oswald, secretary of the Society. To most of us, Chamisso is best known as the Frenchman who became German, much as the German Heine became French: as the Frenchman who wrote in German, much as the Spanish Blanco White wrote in English; or as the Dutch novelist, Mr. Maartens, now writes. Some have read Peter Schlemihl and certain lyrics. But his life and character have not become familiar; indeed, Dr. Oswald's learned and exhaustive essay is almost without any English rival. In at least one respect, Dr. Oswald is in most appropriate sympathy with his subject. Few German scholars can have produced in English so admirable a piece of English literature. Equally in narrative and in criticism, the essay is most complete, yet compact and concise; and it abounds in references to the chief places in which notices of Chamisso are to be found in the writings of his contemporaries. Without any extreme of eulogy, Dr. Oswald makes us sensible of all that is winning and amiable in Chamisso, that "valuable link between two great nations, now sorely divided by exaggeration of national feeling." The writer declares: "I have read in many books about Chamisso, wondering whether he had an adversary anywhere; I found none." All his strange story, his career in the Prussian army, his literary studies, his residence with Madame de Staël, his Polynesian travels, his intercourse with notable writers, is told with great wealth of detail, and careful accuracy; and special attention is paid to his Faust and to Schlemihl. Little reference is commonly made to the fact that Goethe had a predecessor, not in Lessing alone among great modern Germans, but in Chamisso also, who, unlike Lessing, completed his Faust, though but upon a small scale. It is in Schlemihl, however, that Chamisso's peculiar genius is most and best displayed. Some notion of this strange book may be given by comparing it with Carlyle's Sartor Resartus, and with the sketches, half allegory and half fantasy, of Hawthorne. It has been variously viewed and interpolated. Dr. Oswald holds the Man without a Shadow to typify the man who, refusing to sell his soul, the essential and vital part of him, yet parts with some customary, conventional, habitual accompaniment of life: unessential, indeed, but conducive to regularity, orderliness, and peace. Winckelmann, forcing himself to enter the Catholic Church, as the price of entrance into his longed-for Italy and Rome, may not have thought himself to be selling his soul; but certainly he sold his shadow, he lived always with a certain chagrin and shame, not at home in his new faith. Possibly Chamisso, who, as Dr. Oswald reminds us, studied "Märchen, Volksbücher, fabliaux," was led to his conception by the innumerable shadow-myths and shadow-beliefs in folk-lore. For many races, the shadow is the soul: a man may be killed by injury to his shadow; when the burial of a living man in the walls or foundations of a new building became obsolete, it was in many places compensated for by the burial of his shadow: that is to say, by marking out its shape and measurements. Old stories are told how, when a band of students had agreed with the devil to learn his arts, and let him "take the hindmost" of them in return, he was cheated in the race by having but a shadow of a man left him for his fee. Chamisso may well have conjoined such popular superstitions and beliefs about the shadow, with the popular Faust legend about the soul. But whatever be the origin and interpretation of the story, it is full of a fascinating charm. Hawthorne, who had much in common with Tieck, Novalis, Fouqué, and "Adalbert Schlemihl," may well have envied Chamisso the strange conception, with which he was well acquainted.

In addition to these two very welcome contributions, the volume contains other good things, of which we will but mention "Goethe's Earliest Critics in England" and "The Artistic Treatment of the Faust Legend." Long may the English Goethe Society continue and prosper, if it will publish more such excellent and useful work!

LIONEL JOHNSON.

NEW NOVELS.

The Rebel Queen. By Walter Besant. In 3 vols. (Chatto & Windus.)

The Courage of Sylvia Fulgent. By H. B. Finlay Knight. In 3 vols. (Bentley.)

The Hunting Girl. By Mrs. Edward Kennard. In 3 vols. (White.)

Half a Hero. By Anthony Hope. In 2 vols. (Innes.)

From the Five Rivers. By F. A. Steel. (Heinemann.)

The Passing of a Mood. By V. O. C. S. (Fisher Unwin.)

Die Reiterkathe. Von Augusta Bender. (Stuttgart: Deutsch Verlags-Anstalt.)

In composing the scenario of The Rebel Queen Mr. Besant has utilised mainly three motives—two of them old and well tried ones with him, the third, we think, for him new. The resistance of Isabel Elveda to her husband, her campaign in favour of a revolt of woman, and her double defeat—first in the loss of the fortune which enabled her to carry that campaign on, and secondly in the desertion of her daughter Francesca to the other side—is a subject of which Mr. Besant is thoroughly master. We doubt whether he has ever done anything quite so good all round as The Revolt of Man; and even if this be questioned, his expertness in the matter can hardly be denied. So, again, he has drawn not a little in this new book on those other favourite subjects of his—the condition of East-end life, the relations of capital and labour, and so forth. But both these motives are only subordinate to the handling of the third subject, which is neither more nor less than the Chosen People. Now we admit frankly that the Jew in literature is to us a terror. Personally we have known by no means unsatisfactory Jews; hardly so in books. Whether this is an uncritical survival of early critical exercises in these very columns, when we toiled through the deserts of Daniel Deronda, we do not quite know. Indeed, it had seemed to us, even before making acquaintance with the gang of doleful circumcised creatures whom even Gwendolen, even Grandcourt, could hardly make tolerable, that the Jew in literature (unless, like Kingsley's Raphael, he has very little of the Jew at all) exercised a strange and terrible boring quality. We were therefore very curious to see how far Mr. Besant would be successful in this adventure. It would not be frank or honest to say that he has in our judgment utterly vanquished and brought home in triumph the object of his quest. But he has done a great deal better than we had thought possible or at least likely. Mrs., or Mme. Elveda, the rebellious wife, is a very little shadowy; indeed, so practised a novelist as Mr. Besant will probably agree with us that the difficulty of keeping up a combined interest in two generations of characters at once is one of the greatest in fiction. But the three girl Jewesses—Francesca Elveda, Clara Angelo, and Nelly (or Preciada) Bernard—are very good. With remarkable ingenuity Mr. Besant has not only cast, but kept them throughout, though they are all cousins, and latterly associates, in three separate lines or types of girlhood—those of the girl who is distinctly a lady; of her who is well educated and gentle in thought and manner, but hardly so in society or station; and of the lower middle-class damsel. Also in Clara's father, the bric-à-brac dealer Angelo, we have another excellent study. For Emanuel Elveda, the mystical wanderer and discover of something which is to prevent (or intensify) war, we owe to much less affection. Mr. Besant, whose mastery of his subject in Judaic detail is very curious, has in the persons previously mentioned "floored" his problem; in Emanuel we think the problem has a little floored Mr. Besant. But he, if he be a failure, is the only failure in the book. It contains a remarkable underplot, properly connected with the main story and turning on the fortunes of an eccentric Earl, who (not entirely unlike some real persons) chokes to sink his title and leave his revenues untouched that he may serve before the mast and have the common lot. We are not sure, indeed, that this man's son and Preciada's (or Nelly's) husband, Anthony Hayling the younger, otherwise Lord Selsey, is not the most striking figure of all. He is certainly the most uncomfortable and, we fear, the truest. For Mr. Besant, who should know the type very well, has drawn him as a typical upperworkman or lower clerk of the rising generation. And with a country whose young men display, as a rule, anything like the combination of the usual selfishness and self-sufficiency of twenty years, with the blatant conceit and hopeless shallowness in political and social ideas here attributed to Anthony Hayling—with such a country even the genius of England will be hard put to it to stave off national disaster.

Mr. Finlay Knight is a very clever man, and has a faculty of knocking off a novel in a way which, both for style of the unostentatious sort and for story, is distinctly out of the common. Also his heroine, Sylvia Fulgent, is a heroine by no means destitute of attractions. We may, indeed, doubt whether she would ever have come into being, or have largely sacrificed and a little disgraced herself for her worthless brother Fulke, if it had not been for the existence long ago of a certain Miss Louisa Gradgrind, who had a worthless brother too. But this matters very little. We do, however, wish seriously that waywardness or neo-naturalist delight in the grimy had not made Mr. Knight present his hero at the very beginning as an unmitigated sweep. We fear no milder word can be applied to a person who, having been requested by a young lady's brother to move on because his sister wishes to bathe, pulls down the river a little and then steals back through the bushes to peep at her. One may feel a kindness for Don Juan: not so for Peeping Tom. It is fair to say, however, that having made this single concession to the theory that it is the duty of English novelists to be as French as they can, and having thus taken the hero of the Femme de Feu for model, Mr. Knight proceeds to restore Lance Lister to a very decent status and make him quite worthy of Sylvia. The catastrophe is exceedingly complicated and not easy to give even a hint of; but it has a very fair element of excitement in it, and cannot be said to be in any way preposterous.

Mrs. Kennard has made something the same mistake (as it seems to us, though perhaps she might represent it as a deliberate device) in presenting her heroine in a very unfavourable light at the outset. That Rose Darlington is very nearly as fast as it is permissible to be without crossing the irremediable line; that she and her uncle live chiefly on their own wits and other people's folly; and that she hunts for a husband as hard as she can—are all things, if not admirable, not fatal. But Mrs. Kennard has made her in the early chapters of her autobiography adopt a tone which is purely and simply vulgar. The old excuse of Dickens, that we see the glaring and eccentric features of a character first, might be applied here; but it would require a rather finer touch than Mrs. Kennard has given to deserve the full benefit of it. Rose, however, like Lance, improves decidedly as she goes on. An escapade to Hurlingham with a married roué and lady-killer (who does his lady-killing not in the most finished style in the world, by the way) shows her the dangers of her goings-on; and before long she falls honestly in love with a straightforward young squire, whom she had at first laid herself out merely to catch. The whole book, it will thus be seen, has a strongly Whyte-Melville tone; and though Mrs. Kennard has not the Major's skill either at character or at dialogue, her own is not despicable. The hunting and riding scenes are as good as usual; and one, where Rose valiantly persists in jumping, or rather attempting to jump, and tumbling off every time, is very fresh and amusing.

Mr. Anthony Hope has shown so much ability in his shorter tales that we opened Half a Hero with very considerable expectations, which the early scenes well sustained. We can give Mr. Hope no higher praise than by saying that, in a certain désinvolture of dialogue and narrative, he minds us of Sir Henry Cunningham in Wheat and Tares and Late Laurels, the two most remarkable books of their kind ever written by anyone not commonly ranked in the very first flight of English novelists. It would be perhaps too much to say that, as a whole, Half a Hero lives up to this high standard. The Colonial politics of "New Lindsey" are not, or at least are not made, of the first interest; and we perceive the fact rather than understand the reason why a middle-aged and not very polished person like Mr. Medland, the Radical premier and hero, or half-hero, catches the fancy of Alicia Dercsne.

Mrs. Steel's Punjab tales have a good deal of freshness; even though the Indian story is, to our rather tardy credit, more familiar to Englishmen than it was even a very few years ago. "The Blue Monkey," a tale of the usual Hindu v. Mahomedan variance, is perhaps the most amusing; "Shah Sujah's Mouse" the most pathetic—but they are all readable. The author, however, has something to learn in actual narrative, the progress of her stories being occasionally rather obscure.

The last volume of the "Pseudonym" series might have been more frankly entitled "A Bundle of Impressions." "V. O. C. S." has done what no doubt he wished, and cut his sketches down to the almost irreducible minimum, to something like the Hogarthian "Serjeant and his Dog." It is an ingenious bit of work, and the writing is good enough; but of course opinions must differ whether it was worth doing. We, holding by the theory, which may be old-fashioned to-day, but which all the more for that will be new-fashioned to-morrow, regard these things as merely stuff and studies for stories, not as stories themselves.

Fräulein Bender's history of Die Reiterkütte, otherwise the much honoured and most virtuous Fräulein Katharina Weigoldin, is a story of the Thirty Years' War, both pleasing and pathetic, with plenty of adventure, and possessing a merit not invariably found in German novels—that of not being too much spun out.

GEORGE SAINTSBURY.

BOOKS ON ANCIENT HISTORY.

"STORY OF THE NATIONS."—Parthia. By G. Rawlinson. (Fisher Unwin.) The veteran author of a whole library of books on ancient history, and specially on the ancient history of the East, has shown once more, in writing on a smaller scale and for a more popular audience than usual, no common skill in combining his information and setting forth his story. It is really striking to consider from what unpromising materials—often only numismatic, and, when literary, inconsecutive and fragmentary—Prof. Rawlinson (aided, of course, by other explorers of the same field) has reconstructed the tale which he tells with such vigour and spirit. Gaps in our information are of constant occurrence. We do not even know to what race the Parthians belonged. Mr. Rawlinson calls them Turanians, relying on the character of their names and on their apparent type, physical and mental. Perhaps there is not quite enough to go on under either of these heads; at any rate, we cannot say either yes or no to his conjecture. It is noticeable that the faces on Parthian coins might pass well enough for either Caucasian or Jewish. At any rate, the people, or its governing class, had a character which stands out well-marked from the ranks of ordinary Eastern conquerors. On the one hand, there was, as Strabo said, "much that was barbaric and Scythic" about them. They were, and they remained, coarse in grain, in spite of a certain varnish of civilisation; and the rise of their kingdom was a reaction against Hellenism in Asia. "It set itself to undo the work of Alexander, to cast out the Europeans, to recover for the native race the possession of its own continent." But, on the other hand, they held their empire together for 400 years, a period of remarkable length in Eastern affairs; and they did so because of their great and unusual vigour of administration and government. They "possessed the governing or ruling faculty. . . . They never permanently lost a province; and, at the dissolution of the empire, its limits were as extensive as they had ever been." Of course, their system was not perfect, or even good, as measured by European standards. The story of Asinai and Anilai is a queer revelation of what might go on almost under the eyes of the Brother of the Sun and Moon. The various races of the Empire were but ill blended, and the subject-kingdoms but loosely attached; but at least the system did hang together, and it had no ordinary shocks to receive. Placed, as the German proverb says, between the devil and the deep sea—between the ambition of Rome and the flood of barbarism in North Asia—Parthia found its function in the double task of holding back the nomads from more civilised lands, and preventing Rome from acquiring a really universal empire. Scythia might have mastered all Greek Asia, if it had not found a barrier in a people too rude to be effeminate, too civilised to ignore the advantages of discipline. Asia might have been absorbed into Europe, but for a power which could organise her resources. More than this Parthia could not do, nor, if she could have done more, would it have been well for the world. Her military system (as Mr. Rawlinson points out) had no elasticity, and it was not suited for Western conquest. On her own ground Parthia was invincible, but that was all. In the province of art the limitations of the Parthian genius are even plainer. The best that Mr. Rawlinson can say for his heroes is that in art, and especially in architecture, they "made efforts and produced results not wholly despicable." The remains at El Hadhr indicate but a "mean palace," and the Parthians have left no other kind of monument of good quality. Greek art "was not unknown to them, and they imitated it upon their coins; but the travesty is painful, and often verges on the ridiculous." The series of coins of which representations are here given enables readers to see something of the decline of Greek art in Parthian hands. On p. 279 there seems to be some confusion between the kings of Armenia and of Parthia, Volageses being king of Parthia, and not (as he is there called) of Armenia. On p. 334 the Euphrates is named by a slip of the pen for the Tigris. The excellent little map of the Parthian Empire which Mr. Rawlinson has inserted gives the means of correcting this oversight. It is, as maps in history-books rarely are, well adjusted to the history taught.

Les Sources de Tacite. Par Philippe Fabia. (Paris: Colin.) In the examination of ancient historians, students (especially on the continent) are giving the first place to the question of the sources—of the authorities on which our authors relied in drawing up their accounts of the various periods. What were the materials? Were they sufficient in quantity? Were they good in kind? These questions men are rightly trying to answer, as necessary preliminaries to the further inquiry into the intelligence and the probity with which a historian used his materials. In Tacitus we have a writer most impressive in himself, and most valuable from the absence of anything better, but at the same time one whose character for intelligence and probity sinks a little lower in our eyes every time we read him. M. Fabia admits that Tacitus has been estimated at more than his real value, urging that he has been looked at and admired as if he stood quite alone, without much thought being devoted to his sources and forerunners. Yet, like other ancient historians, he worked largely, not on documents and other firsthand evidence, but on histories already written by someone else. Like all ancient art, in short, history-writing was the affair of a school, and Tacitus was but a brilliant member of a school. We should have liked M. Fabia to go further. We should be glad to see a study of Tacitus, in which it was shown that intelligence and historical insight cannot be really great in a man who omits what Tacitus omits, and who introduces at random casual and disconnected episodes quite beside his main narrative; while probity—as we understand probity—cannot be claimed for a writer who shows violent prejudice and will sacrifice accuracy on any point to rhetorical effect. But a step is taken in the right direction, when Tacitus is deprived of a part of his traditional prestige in favour of those forgotten writers on whom he built; and this is the tendency of M. Fabia's book. All the authors whom Tacitus used are lost, and we are therefore driven to make what we can out of narratives parallel to his writings, contemporary or later—Suetonius, Plutarch, or Dion Cassius. From comparing these with the Histories and the Annals, it is clear that Tacitus rested most on derived or secondary sources, that is to say, on earlier historians. He applied no doubt to the younger Pliny for first hand information about the eruption of Vesuvius, but he generally preferred to follow and to work up some published narrative or narratives. Luckily for us, Plutarch used the same authority, and based on it his Greek Lives of Galba and Otho. His giving the same incidents, the same reflections, almost the same words as Tacitus, has let us into the secret—or, rather, into one secret—of Tacitus' workshop. Did Tacitus, however, combine several narratives, or follow one chiefly, merely adding to it at times from other sources? M. Fabia decides that he had everywhere one main authority, but that he used others to complete the details. In the Histories the main authority was not Cluvius Rufus, as Mommsen thinks, but the elder Pliny; in the Annals it was Aufidius Bassus for the principates of Tiberius and Caius and for part of that of Claudius, but Cluvius Rufus for the rest of the principate of Claudius and for that of Nero. Pliny, of course, did write a history of his times, beginning where Aufidius Bassus left off; but the great difficulty lies in believing that he could have written anything with just those good qualities which the common original of Tacitus and Plutarch can be shown to have possessed. M. Fabia thinks that Tacitus drove Pliny out of sight because he had, and Pliny had not, a genius for writing: that he took Pliny's matter and gave to it its definite and perfect form; but we cannot overlook, as this argument seems to do, the fact that Tacitus must have taken sentence after sentence ready made from his predecessor, and that those sentences which we can, with Plutarch's aid, trace to this origin are not his worst. M. Fabia's investigation is necessarily very minute, but it is never dull. It never strays too far from the main question, or gets lost in detail; we always see whither we are going, and follow the route with interest.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MESSRS. LONGMANS have in the press a volume by Lord Brassey, entitled Papers and Addresses on Work and Wages.

THE stories by Mr. Frank Harris, which attracted some attention on their appearance in the Fortnightly Review, will shortly be published in volume form by Messrs. Chapman & Hall.

MESSRS. SEELEY & Co. will publish during the present month George Herbert's Poems, reprinted from the first edition, with upwards of sixty illustrations after Albert Dürer, Holbein, and Marco Antonio.

MESSRS. F. G. KITTON and C. H. Ashdown have been engaged for some time on an illustrated volume, entitled St. Albans: Historical and Picturesque. It will be published very shortly by Mr. Elliot Stock. The same firm announces a cheap edition of the rhythmic version of the Imitatione Christi, with an introduction by the late Canon Liddon.

MESSRS. CHAPMAN & HALL announce a volume of Aphorisms from the Writings of Herbert Spencer, illustrated with a portrait.

MESSRS. W. H. ALLEN & Co. will publish in a few days an illustrated work on Burma, entitled In the Shadow of Pagoda. The author was for several years resident in the country; and his book will throw some light on the extraordinary difficulties with which the Government had to cope in stamping out dacoity after the annexation.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN will issue next week a volume of sermons for children, by the Rev. W. P. Byles, entitled The Boy and the Angel.

THE new volume of "The Adventure Series" will be a reprint of William Nicholson's translation (dated 1790) of The Memoirs and Travels of Mauritius Augustus Count de Benyonsky. The "adventures" took place in Siberia, Kamchatka, Japan, the Linkui Islands, and Formosa. Capt. Pasfield Oliver is the editor of the new edition.

MR. W. GARRETT HORDER is now passing through the press a supplement to his Hymnal for the Free Churches. The contents have been drawn chiefly from living or recently departed hymnists, many of them American, who have done fine work in this department of literature; but a few have been culled from sixteenth and seventeenth century writers. Some new hymns have also been written for this collection. It will be published separately as a supplement which may be used with most existing hymnals, and also bound up with Mr. Horder's Congregational Hymns. The publisher is Mr. Elliot Stock.

JOHN STRANGE WINTER'S Christmas annual, A Man's Man, in paper covers; and Mrs. Lovett Cameron's, A Tragic Blunder, in two volumes, will be published immediately by Messrs. F. V. White & Co.

MR. ROBERT MCCLURE, of Glasgow, has in the press a limited impression of a brochure by Mr. John Muir, reprinted from the current number of the Scots' Magazine, entitled "Thomas Carlyle's Apprenticeship," a bibliographical account of Carlyle's recently-discovered writings referred to in the ACADEMY of May 6.

THE extra Christmas number of the Quiver will be published on November 27, under the title of "Christmas Arrows." It will contain a complete story, entitled "Hilda York," by Evelyn Everett Green, illustrated by Walter Paget and Allan Barraud; and a short story, by the Rev. P. B. Power, entitled "The Trade Turkey," illustrated by Gordon Browne; a sermon for the New Year, by the Dean of Armagh; and a story for children, by Mona Neale.

LIDDON's life of Dr. Pusey has already passed into a second edition.

THE fourteenth session of the Aristotelian Society will open on Monday next, when the president, Dr. Shadworth H. Hodgson, will deliver his annual address upon "The Conception of Infinity." Among the future arrangements are: "The Conception of Necessity as applied to Nature and to Man," by Mr. D. G. Ritchie; "The Import of Categorical Propositions," by Miss E. E. Constance Jones; and a symposium on the question, "Is Religion presupposed by Morality, or Morality by Religion?"

THE annual service in commemoration of the founders and benefactors of Westminster School will be held in the Abbey on Friday, November 17, at 8.30 p.m. The service will be in Latin, with the special Psalms and the Te Deum set to Gregorian music. After the service there will be a reception in the great schoolroom.

ON Friday and Saturday next, Messrs. Sotheby will sell a number of autograph letters and historical documents from different collections. They include the original collection of nearly 500 letters brought together by General Siborne for his volume of Waterloo Letters, a series of letters by Nelson and his admirals, a series of notes, &c., by General Gordon, mostly dated in 1859, the original draft of Byron's will, and a great many documents relating to America.

MARTINUS NIJHOFF, of the Hague, has sent us two interesting catalogues. One consists entirely of English books (including those about England and her Colonies), carefully classified according to subjects. The total number of lots is 2,696. The other consists of rare books and typographical curiosities, arranged chronologically in centuries. Among the Incunabula we notice a copy of the Catolicon (? 1466), which is here assigned to the Brothers of the Common Life of Cologne; and what is believed to be the only existing perfect copy of A. Van Eybe's Boeck van den Echten Staet (Deventer, 1493).

MR. JOHN MURRAY has issued a new edition of Herman Melville's two famous stories of life and adventure in the South Seas, Typee and Moo, which first appeared in the same publisher's "Home and Colonial Library" nearly fifty years ago. They are now illustrated from drawings made on the spot; and each volume has a brief memoir by Mr. Henry S. Salt. But, we regret to add, they have evidently been printed from very old and worn plates.

WE have to record the death of Mr. Leonard Benton Seeley, which took place last Monday. He was the eldest son of the founder of the well-known publishing firm, and a brother of Prof. J. R. Seeley. After graduating with double first-class honours at Cambridge in 1852, he was elected to a fellowship at Trinity. Several years ago he published a school edition of Euclid, and more recently two interesting volumes on Fanny Burney and Her Time and Horace Walpole and His World.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

THE Oxford Magazine announces that the literary executors of the late Master of Balliol are Prof. Lewis Campbell, Mr. Evelyn Abbott, and Mr. Lyttelton Gell, who are appointed with complete control over all the papers, excepting some of the correspondence.

MR. RUSKIN having been unable to be present at the Encaenia at Oxford in 1879, to receive the honorary degree of D.C.L., the university now proposes to dispense with his attendance for admission to the degree with the customary formalities, any usage or precedent notwithstanding.

A STATUE of Dean Liddell has been placed in one of the quadrangles of Christ Church, where it forms the companion to a statue of Dean Fell. It is understood to have been presented by Sir John Mowbray and the Rev. T. Vere Bayne.

MR. W. H. LILLY has been elected to an honorary fellowship at Peterhouse, Cambridge.

IT has been decided that the prize of a medal, founded at Cambridge by the Maharaja of Bhaunagar, shall be awarded to that one of the selected candidates for the Indian Civil Service who, having passed one of the honours examinations of the university, and having also spent his year of probation at Cambridge, shall stand highest in the final list of selected candidates.

MR. F. T. PALGRAVE, professor of poetry at Oxford, proposes to lecture on November upon "The Minor Elizabethan Lyrics," a continuation of his series of lectures on fluence of the Italian Renaissance on English poetry."

MR. J. RENDEL HARRIS, reader in palaeography at Cambridge, will deliver two public lectures at Oxford, in Mansfield College, next week, upon "The Influence of Homer on the Early Fathers," and "The Origin of the Ferrar Group: a Study in the Genealogical Relations of New Testament MSS." We may also mention that the Rev. Dr. Walter C. Smith—Moderator of the Free Church of Scotland, and not less well known in this country as a poet—will preach on Sunday morning in the chapel of Mansfield.

ACCORDING to the list of the Registry, the total number of matriculations at Cambridge this term have been 855. Trinity stands easily first, with 181; then follow, close together, Pembroke (63), St. John's (61), Trinity Hall (60), Clare (57), Caius (56), Emmanuel (50), and Non-collegiate (48). The only colleges that seem still to retain sizars are Trinity, Corpus, and Emmanuel.

THE total number of Non-collegiate freshmen at Oxford seems to amount to 62, which puts them above any single college. No less than eleven come from America, two from the colonies, and two from India; while the university colleges of Wales are also well represented.

THE fellowship to which Prof. Ridgeway has been elected at Caius College, Cambridge, is one on the Drosier foundation.

WE observe that Purnananda Chatterji, a native of Bengal, has received the degree of Doctor of Science, in the department of mental philosophy, from the University of Edinburgh.

AT the centennial celebration of the foundation of Williams College, Massachusetts, the honorary degree of D.D. was conferred upon Prof. C. A. Briggs, the Old Testament critic.

THE library of Cornell University now consists of nearly 40,000 volumes. Included in this total are three special collections: (1) The Moake law-library, of 13,000 volumes, comprising law reports of all courts in the English language; (2) the Zarncke collection, also numbering about 13,000 volumes, which is specially rich in German literature and philology; and (3) the Dante collection, 1650 volumes, recently presented by Prof. Willard Fiske, which claims to be more complete than that in the Bodleian.

THE new medical school at Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, has opened with a class of sixteen students for the degree of M.D., who have already graduated in medicine elsewhere. Of these, three are women—from Smith, Vassar, and Wellesley.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

SONNET-GOLD.

I.

We get it from Etruscan tombs, hid deep
Beneath the passing ploughshare; or from caves,
Known but to Prospero, where pale green waves
Roll up the wreck-gold that the mermaids keep;

And from the caverns where the gnomes upheap
The secret treasures which the Earth's dwarf slaves
Coin in her bosom, 'til the red gold paves
Her whole great heart, where only poets peep;

Or from old missals, where the gold defies Time's tooth, in saints' bright aureoles, and keeps,
In angels' long straight trumpets, all its flash;

But mostly from the crucible where lies
The alchemist's pure dream-gold: while he sleeps
The poet steals it, leaving him the ash.

II.

What shall we make of sonnet-gold for men?

The dove-wreathed cup some youth to Phryne gave?

Or dark Locusta's scent-phial, that shall have,
Chiselled all round it, snakes from Horror's den?

Or that ill ring which sank in fathoms ten

When Faliero spoused the Venice wave?

Or Inez' funeral crown, the day the grave
Showed her for coronation, all myrrh then?

The best would be to make a hilt of gold

For Life's keen falchion; like a dragon's head,
Fierce and fantastic, massive in your hold;

But oft the goldsmith's chisel makes instead

A fretted shrine for sorrows that are old,
And passions that are sterile or are dead.

EUGENE LEE-HAMILTON.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE Boletín of the Real Academia de la Historia for October opens with a paper by Padre Fita on the unpublished inscriptions of Arcos and Jerez de la Frontera; the most remarkable are two Christian inscriptions of Visigothic times. F. Codera reports favourably on the "Monedas de las Dinastías Arabigo-Españolas," by D. Antonio Vives, praising especially the arrangement and the indices. The trials and condemnation of Beatriz Nuñez, and of Manuel Gonzalez, "Judíos conversos," before the Inquisition in Guadalupe in 1485, with other documents given by Padre Fita, confirm Llorente's statistics, and prove that he has not so falsified his authorities as is commonly supposed. Explorations in Alcarria show urn burial, in conjunction with copper ornaments, but with no trace of iron; the neighbourhood has yielded elsewhere Keltic and Roman coins, mosaics, and a broken miliary stone. The beautiful monument of Beatriz Galindo, the learned friend and "camerara" of Isabel la Católica, has been preserved from destruction in Madrid.

NOTES ON TWO RECENT EDITIONS OF WORDSWORTH.

IV.

Dublin.

III. THE EDITOR'S NOTES.—Prominent among the many meritorious features of Prof. Dowden's workmanship are: (1) the commendably moderate limits within which he has compressed his notes; and (2) the no less commendable, but, alas! deplorably, rare modesty with which he has relegated these notes to the end of each volume, a position in which they cannot divide or distract the attention of the reader who desires simply to enjoy Wordsworth's poetry. In these seven volumes we can study the poems in the very order in which the author desired that they should be studied; and we can moreover study them continuously, without interruption or interpolation, whether in the shape of critical, or of biographical, or of topographical disquisition. This is no small boon to the "general reader"; and it would not be fair to close our eyes to the fact that the bestowal of it implies no small exercise of self-suppression on the part of the editor, who, in such cases, has to arrange, with what fortitude he can call up, for the relegation of the fruits of his laborious industry to a place in the background, where they will not improbably escape the notice of all save the relatively few who take up the book with the express purpose of finding them. We are of opinion, however, that it did not cost Prof. Dowden any very painful effort to rise to the level of the somewhat severe demands of the occasion; for he evidently is not one of those editors who look upon their author's text as little more than a humble but useful peg, whereon they may hang their motley wallet-ful of scraps, new and old. There can be little doubt that, if he were questioned on the point, he would readily admit that Wordsworth's poetry exists for some other, greater, end than that of furnishing the text for his editorial lucubrations. As might have been anticipated, therefore, he never for a moment forgets or oversteps the proper limits of his function as editor and interpreter of the poems. To the eager student, indeed, it will probably occur as a matter for regret that the textual notes at least have not been printed at the bottom of the page; but Prof. Dowden is Spartan enough to maintain that, in consigning all the notes alike to their present position, he is subjecting the student to a discipline which, though fatiguing, will yet prove nowise unwholesome for him. Be this as it may, one of the most conspicuous features of these volumes is the surprisingly narrow compass within which the editor has contrived to condense the results of his prolonged and arduous labour.

The necessity under which Prof. Dowden found himself to lie of thus curtailing within the strictest limits possible the editorial share of each of the seven volumes has rendered it exceedingly difficult for him to do more in the direction of textual criticism than merely place on record the various changes introduced from time to time into the text. But, in spite of the narrowness of the space at his disposal, he has, in some instances, contrived to give us a brief but invaluable hint explanatory of the variation under notice, or referring it to the particular class to which it belongs. (We may, however, here repeat what we said in one of our earlier notes, viz., that, in order to study the text of the poems with full profit, it is absolutely indispensable to make oneself acquainted with the article on the text-variations of Wordsworth contributed by Prof. Dowden to the Contemporary, and subsequently reprinted by him in a volume of collected essays and studies.) Thus, of several of the changes introduced into the "Female Vagrant," Prof. Dowden writes: "Beside the changes made by Wordsworth from the point of view of poetic art, there are others, the object of which seems to be to moderate the force of his indictment of society"—an observation which applies more particularly to the alterations found in Stanzas v. and xxiii. of ed. 1798 (the stanzas which told respectively of a grasping and avaricious landlord, and of the careless cruelty of hospital service), and to the stanza, no. vi. in ed. 1798, which, after having been given, with alterations, in edd. 1802 and 1805, was omitted from ed. 1820 and all subsequent editions. (This stanza told of the systematic persecution of the "statesman" by the grasping landlord; of the loss of his "little range of water" suffered by the former at the hands of the latter; and of the ultimate ruin and ejection of the humbler of the two neighbours). Other changes—e.g., "Saw on the distant lake his twinkling oar," for, "High o'er the cliffs I led my fleecy store" (St. i., ed. 1798); and, "In every field with milk their dairy overflowed," for, "For them, in nature's meads, the milky udder flowed" (St. xxv., ed. 1798)—introduced so early as 1800 and 1802 respectively, Prof. Dowden explains as due to the poet's desire to clear his verse as far as possible of everything in the shape of affected or poetic diction. Again, when recording the change, effected in 1820, from—

"In sleep did I behold the skies,
I saw the crackling flashes drive"—

("Complaint of a forsaken Indian Woman," ll. 5, 6.) to—

"In rustling conflict through the skies
I heard, and saw the flashes drive"—

Digitized by Google

("I heard, I saw," the present reading, dates from 1827), Prof. Dowden attributes the alteration to the fact that Wordsworth had noticed that the term "crackling" implies the sense of hearing; and, in commenting upon a change of a somewhat similar type ("Resolution and Independence," ll. 90, 91), from—

"He answered me with pleasure and surprise,
And there was, while he spake, a fire about his eyes"— to—

"Ere he replied, a flash of mild surprise, Broke from the sable orbs of his yet vivid eyes"— he observes, "Wordsworth perceived that the eyes would speak before the lips." Again, of the curious reversal of the sense involved in the change (1802) of ll. 25, 26, of the "Danish Boy" from their original shape—

"A piping Shepherd he might be A Herd-boy of the wood"— to the version ever afterwards retained—

"Nor piping Shepherd shall he be, Nor Herd-boy of the wood"—

Prof. Dowden says that Wordsworth deliberately effected it, because he noticed that a spirit wearing "a regal vest of fur" (l. 27) could not well be a shepherd or a herd-boy. This is a typical instance of a somewhat numerous class of changes, viz., those introduced with the object of getting rid of everything like inconsistency or incongruity of statement. Amongst the cases where the poet has effected an alteration of the original text for the purpose of avoiding (supposed) undue boldness of expression, Prof. Dowden draws our attention to two in particular—one occurring in "The Brothers," where what Prof. Dowden calls "an audacity of the original text" was struck out in ed. 1802, the said audacity consisting of the following lines (405-410)—

"When thou art gone away, should evil men
Be thy companions, let this Sheep-fold be Thy anchor and thy shield; amid all fear
And all temptation, let it be to thee
An emblem of the life thy Fathers lived."

Many persons will join with the writer in regretting the alteration of this striking passage. The other instance especially noticed by Prof. Dowden of the toning down of a happily bold expression occurs in the poem "To the Daisy," beginning, "In youth from rock to rock I went," the last stanza of which, in ed. 1807, ran thus—

"Child of the Year! that round dost run
Thy course, bold lover of the sun,
And cheerful when the day's begun
As morning Leveret," &c., &c.

This was altered to the present reading in 1836, a change which involved the sacrifice of the memorable phrase, "bold lover of the sun."

In a note to the poem beginning "Strange fits of passion have I known," Prof. Dowden calls attention to yet another class of changes, namely, those which have been effected for the sake of avoiding the disagreeable clash arising from the immediate repetition of the same consonant—or vowel—sound. Such is the explanation which he offers of the alteration made (1836) in l. 8, from "beneath the evening moon," to "beneath an evening moon"; and also of the change, effected in the same year, in l. 50 of "Nutting," from "Even then when from the bower I turned away," to, "Ere from the mutilated bower I turned." Of the change made in 1845, whereby the line, "I have thought of all by turns, and yet I lie" (third sonnet, "To Sleep," l. 5), became "I have thought of all by turns, and yet do lie," Prof. Dowden observes:—"Wordsworth probably did not quite like the 'do lie' of 1845, but preferred it to beginning a line with 'I' and ending it with the double sound of 'lie.'" To these instances we may add yet another (recorded, but not explained, by Prof. Dowden)—viz., the change which the poet made in the 8th and 9th lines of the little poem addressed "To a Young Lady who had been reproached for taking Long Walks in the Country." These lines, in ed. 1827, ran—

"And treading among flowers of joy That at no season fade"— a reading which, in 1836, was altered to—

"Which at no season fade"—

manifestly in order to get rid of the unpleasant iteration, "that at." (This change deserves notice all the more because, in 1836, Wordsworth effected the contrary change—i.e., that from "which" to "that"—in a large number of places of the earlier text. Cf. "Poems Ded. to National Independence," l. x., l. 3, for a like change from "that" to "who," for the purpose of avoiding tautology.)

A change recorded—unfortunately without comment or explanation—in the notes to the "Anecdote for Fathers" affords a typical example of a pretty numerous class dealt with at some length by Prof. Dowden in his study of the text-variations to which we have more than once alluded. The change to which we refer is that which was introduced, in 1845, into line 47, whereby the reading, "And five times to the child I said," became, "And three times," &c. This change comes under the head of the variations introduced by the poet into statements of a numerical character, where he apprehends that the figures originally given may appear, in some wise, extravagant or improbable to the reader. (A class which, it may be remarked in passing, in effect merges in the still more comprehensive class of changes effected with the object of enhancing the vraisemblance of the narrative.) From among the many instances of this kind occurring here and there throughout the poems, we give the following, taken at random:—

- (1) "Ten children, Sir! I had to feed." 1798.
"Six children" 1800.
"The Last of the Flock," l. 41.
- (2) "It was at least Nine roods of sheer ascent." 1800.
"It was at least Four roods" 1815.
"Hart-Leap Well," ll. 49, 50.
- (3) "Full five-and-twenty years he lived
A running Huntsman merry." 1798.
"Full five-and-thirty years" 1827.
"Simon Lee," ll. 5, 6.
- (4) "One moment now may give us more Than fifty years of reason." 1798.
"One moment
Than years of toiling reason." 1837.
"To my Sister," ll. 25, 26.
- (5) "A four-years'-darling" 1807.
"A six years' darling" 1815.
"Ode: Intimations of Immortality," l. 86.
- (6) "A Shepherd-lad; who, ere his thirteenth year." 1800.
"A Shepherd-lad; who, ere his sixteenth year." 1815.

Also—

"And though a very stripling, twelve years old." 1800.

"And though of unripe years, a stripling only." 1815.

"The Brothers," ll. 39, 297.

It is, we think, to be regretted that Prof. Dowden has in none of these instances vouchsafed a word (while recording the change in the text) explanatory of the particular character of the variation he is noting. He has not even given a reference to his Contemporary Essay. And, while we are on the subject of omissions, we may take the opportunity of referring to two more than commonly interesting changes effected by Wordsworth in the original text of the eighth stanza of "Yarrow Visited, September, 1814," the exciting cause of which, although the changes themselves are duly and fully recorded, Prof. Dowden has, to our regret, forborne to indicate. The latter half of the eighth stanza originally (1815) stood thus—

"Yon cottage seems a bower of bliss;
It promises protection
To studious ease and generous cares,
And every chaste affection!"

This the poet, in 1820, altered to—

"It promises protection
To all the nestling brood of thoughts Sustained by chaste affection!"

But the change was not altogether to his satisfaction, for in the next edition—that of 1827—we find the following variation adopted:—

"Yon cottage seems a bower of bliss,
A covert for protection
Of tender thoughts, that nestle there—
The brood of chaste affection."

The criticism which led Wordsworth to make these alterations in the original draft of this exquisite poem—the only changes he ever admitted into it, if we except a very trifling change of one word adopted for the sake of euphony—is characterised by a sympathetic insight so delicate and rare that we make no apology for quoting it at full length. It comes from the pen of Charles Lamb—a critic for whom Wordsworth was wise enough to entertain the deepest respect, and whose suggestions he almost invariably acted upon. In a letter, noticing the contents of the recent two-volume edition of the poems, dated simply 1815, Lamb writes to Wordsworth—

"I meant to mention 'Yarrow Visited,' with that stanza, 'But thou that didst appear so fair,' than which I think no lovelier stanza can be found in the wide world of poetry. Yet the poem, on the whole, seems condemned to leave behind it a melancholy of imperfect satisfaction, as if you had wronged the feeling with which, in what preceded it, you had resolved never to visit it, and as if the Muse had determined, in the most delicate manner, to make you, and scarce make you, feel it. Else it is far superior to the other [i.e., 'Yarrow Unvisited'] which has but one exquisite verse in it, the last but one, or the last two; this is all fine, except, perhaps, that that of 'studious ease and generous cares' has a tinge of the less romantic about it."

Accordingly, the "less romantic" phrase was got rid of at the earliest opportunity. How Wordsworth must have rejoiced to think that among his audience, "fit, though few," he numbered this fine spirit, who instinctively vibrated, with intensely discriminative, because sympathetic, thrill, in response to every recondite tone of romantic or passionate emotion!

T. HUTCHINSON.

SELECTED FOREIGN BOOKS.

GENERAL LITERATURE.

- FORRER, R., u. G. A. MÜLLER. Kreuz u. Kreuzigung Christi in ihrer Kunstentwicklung. Bubl.: Kommodi. 94 M.
- FRÄNKEL, L. Shakespear u. das Tagelied. Hannover: Helwing. 3 M.
- GRABARD, F. Joh. Peter de Memels lustige Gesellschaft. Halle: Niemeyer. 2 M. 80 Pf.
- GOTHFRY, M. William Wordsworth, sein Leben, seine Werke, seine Zeitgenossen. Halle: Niemeyer. 3 M.
- HEHN, V. Ueb. Goethes Hermann u. Dorothea. Stuttgart: Cotta. 3 M.
- HOLZ, G. Die Gedichte von Rosengarten zu Worms. Halle: Niemeyer. 10 M.
- HUSTIN, A. Troyon. Paris: Lib. de l'Art. 4 fr.
- MAZADE, Ch. de. L'Europe et les Neutralités. Paris: Plon. 2 fr.
- SCHNEIDER, W. L. Manuel de l'amateur de la gravure sur bois et sur métal au XV^e siècle. Tome III. et VI. Berlin: Cohen. 12 M.
- WACHSNER, E. Die romanischen Marienklagen. Halle: Niemeyer. 2 M. 40 Pf.

THEOLOGY, ETC.

- CHMANN, J. Die Klagelieder Jeremiae in der aethiopischen Bibelübersetzung. Halle: Niemeyer. 2 M. 40 Pf.
 CKER, G. Studien zur Hippolytfrage. Leipzig: Barth. 3 M. 60 Pf.
 ARAPET TER-MKERTTSCHAN. Die Paulikianer im byzantinischen Kaiserreiche u. verwandte ketzerische Krescheinungen in Armenien. Leipzig: Hinrichs. 5 M.
 AUTZSCH, E. Mittelteilungs u. alte Handschrift des Targum Onkelos (Codex Socini No. 84). Halle: Niemeyer. 1 M.
 LUPPER, A. Der Brief d. Apostels Paulus an die Philipper. Gotha: Perthes. 4 M. 50 Pf.
 LUMMEL, W. Zur Beurtheilung d. Donatismus. Halle: Niemeyer. 1 M. 50 Pf.
 EHRHARD, F. Die Bibelscripturae de divinis scripturis u. die Italia des hl. Augustinus. Leipzig: Freytag. 1 M. 10 Pf.
 VHS, Th. Skizzen aus dem Leben der alten Kirche. Leipzig: Deichert. 4 M. 50 Pf.

HISTORY, LAW, ETC.

- ARRAL-MONTFRERAT, Marquis de. Dix ans de paix armée entre la France et l'Angleterre 1793-1793. T. 1. Paris: Plon. 8 fr.
 LOCH, M. Der Vertrag nach mosaisch-talmudischem Rechte. Leipzig: Fock. 3 M.
 ARDELLI, F. La biblioteche in Italia all' epoca romana. Milan: Hoepli. 6 fr.
 OEFER, E. Das Vergeltungsprincip im biblischen u. talmudischen Strafrecht. Frankfurt-a.-M.: Kauffmann. 2 M.
 RUZA, E. Beiträge zur Geschichte des griechischen u. römischen Familienrechtes. II. Leipzig: Deichert. 3 M. 60 Pf.
 ANGLAIS, Ch. V., et H. STEIN. Les Archives de l'histoire de France. Paris: Plon. 18 fr.
 LENZEL, K. Wolfgang v. Zweibrücken, der Stammvater des bairischen Königshauses (1526-1569). München: Beck. 13 M.
 COLADONI, A. Johannes Bänderlin v. Linz u. die oberösterreichischen Taufgermeinden in den J. 1526-1531. Berlin: Gaertner. 8 M.
 ASQUER, Mémoires du Chancelier, p.p. le Duc d'Angoulême. Paris: Plon. 8 fr.
 ARSICCHETTI, N. Viaggio archeologico sulla Via Salaria. Rome: Loescher. 8 fr.
 UGGIERO, E. de. L'Arbitrato Pubblico in relazione col Privato presso i Romani. Rome: Loescher. 10 fr.
 FINDECKE'S, E. Denkwürdigkeiten zur Geschichte d. Zeitalters Kaiser Sigmunds. Zum 1. Male vollständig hrsg. v. W. Altmann. Berlin: Gaertner. 28 M.

PHYSICAL SCIENCE, ETC.

- MM, A. Experimentelle Untersuchungen üb. das Corpus trapezoides u. das Hörnerv der Katze. Wiesbaden: Bergmann. 10 M. 60 Pf.
 THOMAS, J. Die Kegelechnitte in rein projectiver Behandlung. Halle: Nebert. 6 M.

PHILOLOGY, ETC.

- OSTUS inscriptionum etruscarum. Ed. C. Pauli. Primum segmentum. Leipzig: Barth. 10 M.
 LSKKE, E. Der Dual im Attischen. Mit e. Vorrede v. F. Blase. Hannover: Hahn. 1 M. 40 Pf.
 GREGO, J. Das Hippokratess-Glossar des Erotianus u. seine ursprüngliche Gestalt. Leipzig: Hitzel. 2 M.
 UNWIG, A. Ueb. die neuesten Arbeiten auf dem Gebiete der Rigveda-Forschung. Prag: Rivná. 8 M. 90 Pf.
 AY, M. Beiträge zur Stammkunde der deutschen Sprache. Leipzig: F. W. v. Biedermann. 8 M.
 GREGO, E. Der Apologet Aristides. Leipzig: Deichert. 2 M.
 ELFT, L. Chronologie u. Topographie der griechischen Aussprache. Nach dem Zugnisse der Inschriften. Leipzig: Friedrich. 2 M.
 VENTZEL, H. De infinitivo apud Justinum usu. Berlin: Beger. 1 M. 90 Pf.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE METHODS OF THE HIGHER CRITICISM.

Rostock: Oct. 26, 1893.

In der Nr. vom 21. Oct. hat Herr Prof. A. H. Sayce eine Stelle meines Buches "Einleitung in das Alte Testament, mit Einschluss der Apokryphen u. der Pseudepigraphen Alten Testaments" (Bonn, 1893) angegriffen. Die uns gemeinsame Liebe zur geschichtlichen Wahrheit zwingt mich, auch meinerseits zu dieser Sache das Wort zu ergreifen.

Als ich im Sommer 1892 den linguistischen Character des Hohenliedes untersuchte, kam auch ein Gewichtstück in Betracht, welches Herr Dr. Med. Chaplin in Samaria gekauft hat. Die Aufschrift dieses Gewichtes war in der ACADEMY (2 Aug. 1890) veröffentlicht worden. Um ein Urtheil fällen zu können, schrieb ich an Dr. Ad. Neubauer in Oxford, ob er mir nicht eine Nachbildung jenes Gewichtes verschaffen könne. Er rieth mir, dass ich mich an das Committee des deutschen Palästinavereins wenden solle. Prof. Socin in Leipzig aber gab mir den Rath, bei Mr. George Armstrong, dem Secretär des Lond. Palestine Exploration Fund anzufragen.

Ich war so glücklich, die Antwort zu erhalten, dass er mir eine Nachbildung jenes Gewichtes liefern könne. Als ich dieselbe bekommen hatte, habe ich sie erst selbst untersucht. Dann habe ich sie an Hrn. Prof. Jul. Euting in Strassburg, den bekannten Erforscher der semitischen Inschriften, gesandt. Sein Urtheil habe ich wörtlich auf S. 425 meiner Einleitung abdrucken lassen. Das Wesentliche war, dass wir beide das Wort shel, "of" auf der Inschrift nicht finden konnten. Denn sie besteht auf beiden Seiten aus je sechs gleichen Schriftzeichen.

Ist dieses unser Verfahren gerecht beurtheilt durch Herrn Prof. Sayce?

(1) Er würdigt nicht den Umstand, dass eine Nachbildung, die ich aus dem Palestine Exploration Fund bekommen habe, mir als zuverlässig gelten durfte und musste. Denn wie konnten wir vermuthen, dass die Nachbildung wesentlich ungenau sei? Weshalb hätte der Palestine Exploration Fund eine Nachahmung, die nicht ein hinlänglich getreuer Reflex des Originals war, in seine Sammlungen aufnehmen können? Aber wir durften vermuthen, dass die Entzifferung der Aufschrift nicht gleich zuerst völlig gelungen sei. Denn dies ist schon öfter geschehen.

(2) Herr Prof. Sayce scheint noch nicht die wirkliche Beziehung des Originals und der Nachbildung festgestellt zu haben. Denn die Nachbildung zeigt auf jeder Seite des Gewichtes die gleichen Buchstaben, und zwar je sechs. Prof. Sayce schreibt:

"As it happens, the part of the weight where the word shel is engraved is somewhat worn, and the cast has consequently failed to reproduce all the lines of the letters."

Aber daraus, dass etwas abgebrochen ist, scheint sich nicht zu ergeben, dass die Nachbildung mehr Linien, als das Original, zeigt, und dass der Buchstabe s (sh) als zwei Buchstaben sich darstellt. Ausserdem muss auf der einen Seite gerade soviel abgebrochen sein, dass auf dieser Seite in Folge des Bruches genau dieselbe Buchstabengruppe entstand, welche auf der andern Seite ohne den Bruch zu sehen ist. Ich darf hoffen, dass ein englischer Gelehrter noch einmal das Original vergleicht und den Grad der Ungenauigkeit der Nachbildung feststellt.

(3) Herr Prof. Sayce setzt voraus, dass ich die Untersuchung jenes Gewichtes unternommen habe aus Liebe zur negativen Kritik. Ich appellire an die Gerechtigkeit der englischen Gelehrten. Meine Veröffentlichungen sind in England nicht unbekannt. Ich hege die Zuversicht, dass insbesondere auch meine Einleitung die Solidität meiner Untersuchungen documentiren wird. Ich bin mir bewusst, dass das gleiche feurige Interesse für die geschichtliche Wahrheit mich mit Hrn. Prof. Sayce verbindet.

Prof. ED. KÖNIG, D.D.

18 Anerley Park, S.E.: Oct. 31, 1893.

It was with some surprise that I read in the ACADEMY of October 21 the statement of Prof. Sayce, that the cast of the ancient Hebrew weight brought by me from Samaria, which has been circulated by the Palestine Exploration Fund, is "imperfectly executed." After very careful examination of the weight and the cast, both Mr. Armstrong, the assistant secretary of the Fund, and myself are of opinion that the cast accurately represents the inscription on the original. Of course, with such a small object and with some of the letters much worn, it may happen that not every specimen of the cast is equally perfect.

As a member of the Executive Committee of the Fund, I am anxious that this question should be set at rest; and in the interests of learning it is most desirable that the true reading of the inscription should be determined.

I have sent the weight and cast to Prof. W. Robertson Smith, of Cambridge, to be examined and reported on by him. Should Prof. Driver, or any recognised authority, desire to see the original and compare it with the cast, I shall have great pleasure in endeavouring to arrange for their doing so.

THOMAS CHAPLIN, M.D.

THE BATTLE OF SHREWSBURY.

Rochdale: Oct. 23, 1893.

Sir J. H. Ramsay, in the ACADEMY of October 7, raises an interesting question as to the extent of the battlefield at Shrewsbury, and he refuses to believe that "the bodies of the dead who fell in the battle covered a space of three miles." As the reviewer whose statement he here rebuts was quoting from my History of Henry IV., perhaps I may be allowed a word of reply.

Of course, neither the reviewer nor I could be held to mean that three miles of country were covered thick with dead bodies. The statement is taken from a charter drawn up forty years after the battle, according to which the bodies of the slain "circa tria miliaria et ultra in eodem campo et circiter eundem campum jacent humata"; whence I think it may be fairly inferred that, in the course of the six or eight hours during which the battle raged, the horse, foot, and archers were at close quarters from time to time over a space of country fully three miles in length. And this is borne out by the variety of the local names, such as Harlescot, Berwick, Bullfield, Husseyfield, Hateleyfield, &c., which are used to designate the field of battle, to say nothing of the burial of Hotspur's body on the next day at Whitchurch, the reported capture of Douglas on Haughmond Hill, and the tradition that Glendower watched the battle from an oak at Shelton.

On the other hand, I find it impossible to agree with Sir J. Ramsay in his belief that "the probable battle-front was not three hundred yards wide, and that the manoeuvres must have been executed within an area of four or five acres of ground" (Lancaster and York, i. 64). To support his view he gives a diagram which represents the opposing forces in neat parallelograms, coloured blue and red respectively, Hotspur's front occupying a space about three times the length of the present church, and not getting nearly so far as the adjoining vicarage, the king's army in two blocks just outside the present church-yard, and four ponds between them. These ponds play an important part in Sir J. Ramsay's estimate of the strategy of the day, for he says (p. 62): "The king's own division did not get quickly into action, being cramped between the two ponds marked B and C on the maps." Last month I spent half a day on the battlefield and looked for the ponds, but they were not to be seen. I was told that when Sir J. Ramsay was there a good deal of rain had fallen and was lying about; when I was there it had dried up.

But perhaps Sir J. Ramsay's view as to the position of the forces is based on the supposition that the hummocks of earth on the south side of the churchyard are veritable earthworks thrown up by Hotspur and attacked by Henry IV. If this could be proved, they would indeed deserve the closest scrutiny on the part of all interested in mediaeval warfare. But there is no evidence that Percy threw up any entrenchments; and I can find no earlier trace of this belief than a surmise ventured in the Gentleman's Magazine in 1846 (i. 373), where a plan of the ground is given, but the writer only thinks that the "earthworks" may have been "the Hougoumont of the day" without putting both armies in apple-pie order inside them to fight each other in a paddock of four or five acres. Eleven years later Brooke (Visits to Fields of Battle) drew a picture of the armies in parallel lines north and south of the "earthworks"; but his imagination allowed them a much longer front and a much wider interval than Sir J. Ramsay does, and Mr. W. G. D. Fletcher (Battlefield Church, p. 8) now hints that the earthworks may after all be only "old gravel pits." They are, I think, capable of a reasonable explanation. It is certain that large numbers of the dead were buried within this area, for masses of human bones have been actually cut through there. It is known that this parcel of ground (two acres in extent) was enclosed by a rectangular trench (Monasticon, vi. 1426), the direction of which can be still more or less distinctly traced. Half of this enclosed plot is occupied by the church and churchyard, the other half looks like a disused brickfield. This is what I believe it really is, and I understand that it was worked as recently as the building of the present vicarage.

J. HAMILTON WYLIE.

THE BATTLE OF "HASTINGS."

Oxford: Oct. 30, 1893.

In his amusing—though I fear somewhat one-sided—paper in the current number of the Fortnightly Review, Mr. Frederic Harrison writes as follows:

"Has not this purism been a little overdone?" said the innocent freshman. "I remember that Freeman once told us he could not bear to speak of the Battle of Hastings, lest someone should imagine that it began on the sea-shore."

It may interest Mr. Harrison to know that—thanks, in all probability, to the "seaside associations" of the name Hastings—a contemporary historian (writing about 1073 A.D.) not only located the great battle at Hastings itself, but actually transformed it from a land battle into a naval engagement: and this, too, though the compiler of the chronicle in question professes to have drawn his account of the struggle from men who had taken part in it.

"1066 A.D.

"Hac aestate Aquitani cum Anglis-Saxonibus navali praelio pugnauerunt, eosque victos suo dominio subjugarunt. Retulerunt ergo nobis qui eodem bello interfuerunt, duodecim millia hominum ex parte vincentium cecidisse."

I may add that, had space permitted it, this passage would have been quoted and discussed in my article in the Contemporary Review (written fifteen months ago), together with the whole question as to the name Senlac and many other topics. Here I may perhaps be permitted to state my own opinion that to speak of Senlac—in ordinary conversation or in ordinary writing—is a piece of pedantry: harmless, it is true, but still pedantry. Mr. Freeman justified his use of the word in his Norman Conquest on the plea that he found it convenient to speak of the "campaign of Hastings" as distinct from the "battle of Senlac." How far this is a valid plea I must leave others to determine; I will only add that, during all my childhood, I regarded the great battle as being fought quite close to Hastings, as I expect many other boys did besides myself.

It is something to have a name by which we can fix the precise site of a battle. What would not students of Merovingian history give to be able to fix the exact locality of Charles Martel's victory over the Saracens—a victory that now goes by the name of Tours or Poitiers, according to the fancy of the writer?

As to Senlac, if anyone is to bear the blame of introducing the word into English histories, it must be Lingard, not Mr. Freeman. As I have no intention of dealing with the matter anywhere else, I may be permitted to add that it is very doubtful indeed whether "Senlac" is a French word. But the question is one for philologists rather than historians.

T. A. ARCHER.

P.S.—May I add one sentence. Mr. Harrison may, of course, know the present-day Oxford better than those who live there; but, so far as an outsider like myself can judge, the vice of specialism is the very last that can be charged against the history school there as a whole. If there is a fault more marked than another in the history lecturers at Oxford, I should say that it is the fault of trying to cover not too small, but too large a period.

T. A. A.

THE ETHICS AND ETIQUETTE OF REVIEWING.

London: Oct. 30, 1893.

In the interest of the D'Israeli of the future, you will allow me to say my last word on this subject, as Mr. Lang in his letter unconsciously minimises his own seeming offences and magnifies my real one. For the latter I have no excuse, no excuse but only one, as the ballads say, "Please, sir, the other boy began it," or, at least, I thought he did. As thus.

There was no need for Mr. Lang to avow his authorship of the Daily News article. No other pen but his has that combination of common sense and uncommon wit, mordant irony and unpedantic learning, club slang and poetic grace. When I read his first article in the Daily News I was fairly amazed. There was an animus in the tone for which nothing in our slight personal relations could account. It was not alone the reference to "Australian thieves"—that feathered the arrow and winged it home—but the persistent reference to "faking" barbed it. That could only mean, I thought, an imputation that I had changed the Scots tales in my book in order to disguise their origin, as Australian cattle thieves "fake" the brands of their stolen cattle so that they should not be traced. Mr. Lang even brought in a reference to a tale from my former volume so that he might introduce the refrain, "Nix my dolly, pals, fake away." Most witty, but most galling, if any imputation was implied.

It was this reference to "faking" that chiefly roused my indignation, and justly so, I still think. Looking back now, pacified by Mr. Lang's most handsome apologies, I can interpret the facts more leniently. There was an animus, but it was a patriotic, not a personal one—it was Mr. Lang's pride as Scot that was touched. Even that, however, was no excuse for suggesting the "faking" that was not, and I can only imagine that Mr. Lang was led away by his witty analogy of Australian cattle duffers. He had thrown the reins on the neck of his good steed Irony, and it carried him far out of Courtesy Road. I am sorry to have to insist on this, but it forms my excuse for my own wanderings from the same track. If I ever frame a sentence on the model, "Scots thieves do this, and Mr. Andrew Lang does that," he shall accuse me of double-dyed arson and triple burglary, and I will hold him guiltless. All I did was to suggest that he had had the bad taste to refer to his own books as superior to mine. That was one of the points in the etiquette of reviewing to which the title of my letter referred.

I had more apparent warrant for this idea than Mr. Lang quite sees. There was not alone the preference expressed for tales with "subterranean passages, fairy gold, seven-headed dragons, sleeping beauties, strange enchanters, ogres, fairy godmothers, magic trees and wells, and valiant, handsome princes." These occur in their ensemble only among the courtly French school of Mme. D'Aulnoy and the rest, so fully represented in Mr. Lang's charming volumes; the fairy godmother, in particular, is quite a monopoly of this school. But this was not all. For more romantic tales than those contained in my volume he recommended his Daily News readers to go abroad. This he now interprets by referring to South Africa, India, Arabia, Egypt, and so forth, in Mr. Lang's well-known encyclopaedic manner. But in his article he was much more explicit in his itinerary; he went on by inviting his readers to go "to Scandinavia and Sir George Dasent, to France and Perrault, to Russia and Ralston, to Germany and Grimm, nay, to Scotland and Scott [for fairy tales] and Chambers, or to Ireland and Mr. Yeats." Now, as Mr. Lang's fairy books contain selections from Perrault and Ralston, from Grimm and Chambers, and if not from Sir George Dasent, from Asbjørnsen, Sir George's original, this looked exceedingly like a suggestion for a personally conducted tour. Here, again, I accept most willingly Mr. Lang's disclaimer; he was probably thinking of the principle on which his books were compiled, rather than of the books themselves. But he will now perhaps as willingly pardon my having taken the less favourable alternative when smarting with resentment at what I took to be a studied insult.

He will pardon me the more willingly, I hope, as under a similar mistaken idea he has himself taken the less generous interpretation of my suggestion with regard to this part of his article. I spoke of his recommending his own books; he interprets this as recommending the sale of them. Such an idea never entered my mind, and Mr. Lang is going far beyond any text I gave him in attributing it to me. Authors who take a pride in their work are generally of opinion that their books are better than the other fellows' who write in the same line. As a general rule this is an amiable delusion, and it is both more politic and in better taste not to draw comparisons. But if one commits that bêtise, one is not, therefore, necessarily thinking of the bawbees, I trust. There is such a thing as professional jealousy, and I own frankly that, with my fancied impression of a personal animus in Mr. Lang's article, I read this into it. I was thinking of him as a new Atticus, not as a re-incarnation of Codlin. Both ideas are, of course, equally absurd, I can see now, but there is nothing in the former actually "dishonourable"—a strong word to use—either to Mr. Lang or to myself. His whole letter is written in a wounded tone owing to this misunderstanding; and I readily pardon him the use of the epithet, as he will now be able to understand how one can be goaded into the use of a discourteous expression or suggestion under a fancied sense of wrong.

There are many other controversial points in his letter which I can dismiss more briefly. I do not know what M. Bédier is doing dans cette galère; I am to deal with him in another and, as I think, more appropriate place. I will only say here that the inconsistencies Mr. Lang thinks he finds in my reference to M. Bédier's relations to him are really due to inconsistencies in M. Bédier's rather pretentious volume. Further, I still think the fact that Mr. Lang contributed a selection of Scots ballads to a work entitled "English Poets," since he was aware of, though not responsible for the title, a fair defence ad hominem for my inserting a dozen Scots folk-tales among six times that number of "English Fairy Tales." If an ardent Scot like Mr. Lang could submit to such a nomenclature, I, who approach this "ancient feud" from far off Australia, might have been less roughly handled for a similar, if not the same, offence. As to the main question, I remain of opinion, both as a matter of linguistics and of folk-lore, that Lowland Scots folk-tales are practically "English Fairy Tales" even though they have retained more completely the more romantic ones, like "Childe Rowland" and the "Black Bull o' Norway," which were certainly once English. There are two folk-lore areas in these islands within which the lore and legends are in the main identical. There is the Celtic region—Ireland and Gaelic Scotland; and there is the English region running up to the Highland line. I have treated these separately, and finding that the Lowland Scots have far more in common with English than with Celtic folk-tales, I included them in my "English" rather than in my Celtic volume. They are neither numerous enough nor independent enough to be treated by themselves.

Finally, I am met by Mr. Lang's threat never to review my volumes more. Mine will be the loss, for I get more of edification, even though it be accompanied by castigation, from Mr. Lang's reviews than from those of anyone else. I have got to regard him as a sort of inspired proof-reader, who always improves my second editions, when I have them, by numerous corrections of detail. But his corrections are so confoundedly just and so scathingly witty, while the impression they leave is, as I think, so abominably unjust by their want of proportion between the few words of general and external praise, and the huge remainder of specific fault-finding, that I know nothing more damaging, and at the same time irritating, than to be reviewed by Mr. Andrew Lang. He is unconscious, I fancy, what a keen edge his irony bears, and how deeply it can wound. Still, I trust he will reconsider his decision, if only to show that, after this perfectly frank exposé des motifs on my part, he bears no ill-will for an uncounteous suggestion provoked by a fancied feeling of insulted honour. In return, I will promise not to be so hasty henceforth in imagining any lack of generosity in the foremost figure among contemporary "English" men of letters.

JOSEPH JACOBS.

DEFECTIVE PRINTING.

Bardwell Rectory, Bury St. Edmunds: Oct. 28, 1893.

Can any of your readers who have had experience in the editing of books, suggest any plan for guarding against the introduction of mistakes at the last moment by the printers?

In my edition of the Leofric Missal, p. xxxiii., l. 6, the word "Paris," which was correct in the proof-sheets, appeared as "aris"; and in a similar way in my more recent edition of the Antiphony of Bangor, the word "insignis" on fol. 15r, l. 23, appears as "insigni"; and, on p. xvi., "sometimes" as "ometimes." For the former I have been, and for the latter no doubt I shall be, taken to task by reviewers. One generally has defects enough of one's own to answer for, without wishing to have the number added to in a way over which there seems to be no control. Such faults appear to occur always at the beginning or end of lines.

F. E. WARREN.

APPOINTMENTS FOR NEXT WEEK.

WEDNESDAY, NOV. 5, 4 p.m. Sunday Lecture: "Woman, her Past and Present Position in India," by Mr. R. W. Fraser.

4 p.m. South Place Institute: "Engineering, Probable Future," by Mr. J. Swift.

7 p.m. Ethical: "Pantheism and Worship," by Mr. J. Ellis McTaggart.

MONDAY, NOV. 6, 5 p.m. Royal Institution: General Monthly Meeting.

8 p.m. Royal Academy: Demonstration, "The Surface Forms of the Living Model—The Upper Extremity," II, by Prof. W. Anderson.

8 p.m. Aristotelian: "The Conception of Infinity," by Mr. Shadworth H. Hodgson.

8.15 p.m. Carlyle Society: "John Lilburn," by Mr. H. Halliday Sparling.

TUESDAY, NOV. 7, 6 p.m. London Institution: "The Principles of Commercial Geography applied to the British Empire," VI, by Dr. H. E. Mill.

8 p.m. Biblical Archaeology: "Where was Tarshish?" by Mr. P. le Page Renouf; "The Discoveries of the American Expedition at Niffer," by Mr. T. G. Pinches.
8.30 p.m. Zoological: "A Nothosaurian Fossil Reptile from the Trias of Lombardy," by Mr. G. A. Boulenger; "Reptiles and Batrachians transmitted by Mr. H. H. Johnston from British Central Africa," by Dr. A. Günther; "A Collection of Land and Freshwater Shells transmitted by Mr. H. H. Johnston from British Central Africa," by Mr. Edgar A. Smith; "Two Collections of Lepidoptera transmitted by Mr. H. H. Johnston from British Central Africa," by Dr. Arthur G. Butler.

WEDNESDAY, NOV. 8, 8 p.m. Geological: "The Geology of Bathurst, New South Wales," by Mr. W. J. Clunies Ross; "The Geology of Matto Grosso (Brazil)," by Dr. J. W. Evans; "The Occurrence of Mammoth Remains in the Yukon District of Canada and in Alaska," by Dr. George M. Dawson.

8 p.m. Irish Literary Society: "Celtic Words in English," by Miss Eliza d'Esterre Keeling.
THURSDAY, NOV. 9, 8 p.m. Royal Academy: Demonstration, "The Surface Forms of the Living Model—The Lower Extremity," I, by Prof. W. Anderson.

8 p.m. Mathematical: Annual General Meeting—Election of Council; "Mechanical Solution of an old Geometrical Problem," by Prof. L. J. Rogers; "The Stability of certain Vortex Motions," by Mr. A. E. H. Love; "Cyclotomic Quartics," by Prof. G. B. Matthews; "The Application of Elliptic Functions to the Curve of Intersection of Two Quadrics," by Mr. J. E. Campbell.
8 p.m. Electrical Engineers: "The Electrical Distribution of Power," by Prof. G. Forbes.

FRIDAY, NOV. 10, 5 p.m. Physical: "The Separation of Three Liquids by Fractional Distillation," by Prof. S. Young, Prof. Barrett, and Mr. Thomas; "The Critical Constants of Various Ethers," by Prof. S. Young; "An Instrument for Drawing Conic Sections," by Mr. J. Gillett.

SATURDAY, NOV. 11, 9.45 p.m. Botanic: General Fortnightly Meeting.

SCIENCE.

MATHEMATICAL BOOKS.

The American Journal of Mathematics. Vol. XV. Nos. 2, 3. (Baltimore.) In No. 2, a paper, entitled "Hyperelliptische Schnittsysteme und Zusammenordnung der algebraischen und transcendenten Thetacharakteristiken," by H. D. Thompson, is illustrated with numerous well-drawn figures, and has an index to its contents. "The Determination of Groups whose Order is a Power of a Prime," by J. W. A. Young, and "Groups whose Orders are Products of Three Prime Factors," by F. N. Cole and J. W. Glover, are interesting arithmetical memoirs, following on the lines of those by Cayley (American Journal, vols. i. and xi.) and Kempe (Philosophical Transactions, vol. clxxvii). "The Projection of Four-fold figures upon a Three-flat," by T. Proctor Hall, treats of n -fold space, and gives a table of regular figures in such space, with an account of several projections. A note on a geometrical theorem, by C. N. Little, gives a theorem on the Pascal line and Brianchon point of a particular 6-gon. In No. 3 Miss Scott follows the paper given above with a memoir on the nature and effect of singularities of plane algebraic curves, which contains an application of her method (vol. xiv.) to the enumeration of the double lines involved in the singularity previously discussed. "The Elliptic Irregularities in the Lunar Theory," by E. W. Brown; "The Transformation of Linear Differential Equations of the Second Order with Linear Coefficients," by Oskar Bolza; "Certain Properties of Symmetric, Skewsymmetric and Orthogonal Matrices," by W. H. Metzler—in which results arrived at by Taber and Buchheim are proved by a different method; and "A Deduction and Demonstration of Taylor's Formula," by W. H. Echols, complete the number.

A Short Course in the Theory of Determinants. By L. G. Weld. (Macmillans.) This is a concise and, at the same time, adequate introduction to the subject, which can be read with interest and advantage by a student who has little more than an accurate acquaintance with the elementary principles of Algebra. Prof. Weld writes:

"The earlier the student is made familiar with the notation and methods of Determinants, the earlier will he be prepared to appreciate the wonderful symmetry and generality so characteristic of the various modern developments in mathematics."

The greater portion of the work is taken up with the discussion and illustration of the fundamental properties of the general forms. In chapters 4, 5, 6, our author treats of determinant minors, gives applications to elementary algebra, and illustrates the multiplication of determinants and reciprocal determinants. Chapter 7 discusses special forms as symmetrical and skew determinants, Pfaffians, alternants, and continuants. The last two chapters, upon Jacobians, Hessians, and Wronskians, and on Linear Transformations, require a fair knowledge of the Calculus. Prof. Weld writes clearly, and presents his reasonings in an attractive form. The examples are sufficient in number and, in the majority of cases, within the reach of junior students. The arrangement of the text is all that could be desired.

Enunciations in Arithmetic, Algebra, Euclid, and Trigonometry. With a few Examples and Notes. By P. A. Thomas. (Macmillans.) Our first feeling was to toss this little book on one side, but on a careful perusal of it we can cordially recommend it as well adapted to the end the author has set before him. Beginners, and even more advanced pupils, will find it useful for purposes of revision, and teachers can employ it for setting bookwork. There is no rivalry between it and the ordinary textbooks. There are a few slips in the printing. On page 19, ex. 10, the answer should be 44, 14. On pages 24, 57, 58, 64, 66, 70, 77 (2), are slight clerical errors. On p. 47 (8), "in the same plane" might be added, and $45 (iv.) needs the correction of "equal" to "unequal."

Key and Companion to Higher Arithmetic and Elementary Mensuration. By P. Goyen. (Macmillans.) We had nothing but good to say of the work to which the present is the Key and Companion; and this is an admirable complement for making a careful student quite familiar with the branches of mathematics discussed in the two works. The more elementary and mechanical examples are lightly passed over, and thus space is secured for teaching in some detail the more important ones. It is almost possible to use the Key without the text-book, so carefully are the solutions worked out. In the case of a large number of the questions, more than one solution is given, and there is, besides, a store of other useful matter.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE TE TABLET.

Barton-on-Humber: Oct. 6, 1893.

Mr. Pinches has called my attention to a very interesting tablet in the British Museum (No. 85-4-30, 15), written in the Babylonian cuneiform script, and giving the twelve months and a leading star or constellation connected with each. I am not aware that it has yet been published, and Mr. Pinches dates it "about 500 B.C.," adding that of course it may be a copy of an earlier tablet. This I do not doubt, as it is quite certain that no one in the reign of Darius I. invented a scheme of constellations. The tablet is thus unaffected by Greek influence; and therefore we see that the division of the ecliptic into twelve zodiacal parts was a genuine Euphratean product, and that the view of my late friend, George Bertin, that "the Babylonians never made use of a zodiac of twelve signs," and that "the zodiac of twelve signs . . . was introduced into Babylonia only during the Greek period [ACADEMY, January 22, 1887] by Seleucidian astronomers," must, as I ventured at the time to contend (ibid. January 29, 1887), be rejected. A division by twelve was thoroughly Babylonian (cf. Herodotus, ii. 109).

I call this the Te Tablet, because in each case, instead of either of the ordinary forms for kakkab ("star," "constellation"), the form te, an abbreviation of the Assyrian temennu, a word derived from the Akkadian dimenna, and meaning primarily "foundation-stone," and here "principal point" (i.e., chief star or sign) is used. As might be expected, the interpretation of several of the names is somewhat doubtful. The Sumero-Akkadian words are in Roman characters. The tablet reads as follows:

MONTH.	STAR OR CONSTELLATION.	MEANING OF NAME.
1. Nis'annu (Nisan)	KU-K	"The Sitter" (Aries couchant)

Mr. Pinches, from whom here I differ with much diffidence, reads Agaru ("The Workman"); but I think "Sitter" is the primary and the appropriate meaning (Akkadian ku = Assyrian usibu "to sit down," subtu "seat"), the reference being to the immemorial position of the Ram, "along the circle stretched at length" (Aratos, Phainomena, 516); and I retain the Akkadian form because, under the abbreviation ku, it obtained as the ordinary astronomical name of the Ram in the Seleukid period, which thus, it appears, was not, as is supposed by Epping, Strassmaier, and Jensen (vide Zeitschrift für Assyriologie, December, 1892, p. 223), an abbreviation of kusarikku, whatever this latter name may really mean, whether "eines der Tiere der Tiamat," "ram," or something else. We thus observe continuity of name-usage in the pre-Hellenic and Hellenic periods of Babylonian astronomy.

2. Airu (Iyyar)	Temennu and Alpu same	"The Foundation" (Alcyon) and "The Bull of Heaven" (Taurus)
-----------------	-------------------------------------	---

In Tablets Sp. 128 and 129, dated respectively 111 and 123 B.C., and translated by Epping and Strassmaier (Astronomisches aus Babylon), the form Te-te occurs in connexion with this month and sign; and, as I conjectured (Remarks on the Euphratean Astronomical Names of the Signs of the Zodiac, March, 1891), and, as now actually appears from this tablet, "the doubled form te-te shows that two constellations, originally distinct, are included in the Bull."

3. Sivannu (Sivan)	Ri'u-but-same and Mastabagalgal	"The Shepherd of the life of Heaven" (Arcturus) and "The Great Twins" (Castor and Pollux)
4. Duzu (Tammuz)	ALLAB	"The Hero" (Alphard)

There is no bright star in Cancer, so a neighbouring star is associated with the constellation. Allab (cf. the Turko-Tatar ulup "hero"), otherwise Allul, appears to me to be a Hydrae, Alphard ("The Solitary").

5. Abu (Ab)	Arû rabu	"The Lion" (in Ak. lit. "Great-dog," Leo)
6. Ululu (Elul)	AB-NAM	"The Proclaimer of rain" (Virgo)

Mr. Pinches reads "the Watering-channel," and I can illustrate this peculiar appellation of Virgo as follows: "Fîrûzâbâdî, in the Kâmûs, mentions another name for Simâk [= Spica] and Al Auwa [= the thirteenth moon-station, δ , η , γ , δ , and Virginis], Al-anharân, the two rivers, on account of their rising being accompanied by rains" (Smyth, Cycle of Celestial Objects, ii. 296). An interesting question here arises, whether the name Al-anharân was the result of independent observation, or had a Euphratean origin.

7. Tasritu (Tisri)	Ziba-(lacuna)	"The Claws" (according to Jensen and others, who connect Zibanitu with the Arabic El-zubânâ , "and β Librae)
--------------------	----------------------	--

8. Arakh-Samra	Agrabu	"The Scorpion" (Scorpio)
(Marchesvan)		"Winged-fire-head"
9. Kizallu (Kisleu)	PAPILSAK	(= the upper part of Sagittarius)

The epithet is primarily solar, Sagittarius being a solar reduplication. Hommel places Papilsak between θ Ophiuchi and π Sagittarii (Die Astronomie der alten Chaldäer, iii. 12). The Archer is winged on the monuments (vide Robert Brown, Jun., The Heavenly Display, fig. xxv.). The constellation as a whole was called Udgudua ("Smiling-sun-face," vide Robert Brown, Jun., "Euphratean Stellar Researches," Part ii., in Proceedings of the Society of Biblical Archaeology, May, 1893, p. 332); and the "hand" and "foot" of the Udgudua are alluded to in W. A. I. iii. lvii. col. 1, a further and conclusive proof that the Archer-centaur (of whom Centaurus is a further reduplication) is referred to.

10. Dhabitu (Tebet)	MUNA-XA	"The Goat-fish" (Capricorn)
11. Sabadhu (Sekat)	(As. Enzu "Goat") GU-LA	"The Urn" (of Aquarius)

Gula, also the name of a goddess, means "great," and Te gula would mean "Great-star"; but that, I think, is not the meaning here. We should read Gu-la, la being the phonetic prolongation, and Gu the amphora of Aquarius; as Prof. Lacouperie, in a comparison between Sumero-Akkadian and ancient-Chinese zodiacal names, writes, "Sumerian—a dripping vase = GU, ancient Chinese YU, a vase full" (ACADEMY, October 11, 1890, p. 322). But a still nearer allied form is to be found in the Yenissei kü "a vessel"; and probably other allied forms are the Turkic qa-b, Tchagatai ka-b, Kottic ha-m, and possibly the Assyrian ka and Hebrew ka-d, all meaning a "pitcher" or "jar." There is, moreover, no "great star" in the constellation. So, in the Seleukid zodiacal list (ap. Epping and Strassmaier) we have "GU, amphora."

12. Addaru (Adar)	DILGAN and DUKKI (?)	"The Messenger of light" (Capella) and "The Knot" (Okda)
-------------------	----------------------	--

The second name is mutilated, but I read it Dur-ki "cord-place." The Akkadian dur = Assyrian rik-su "cord," "fetter," and the Dur-Nuni ("Cord of the Fishes") is "the tail-connecting link of Aratos (Phainomena, 245), Okda ("The Knot"), called Nodus in Cicero's Aratos, a Piscium, whose name also appears in a corrupt Arabic form as Rischa (= Assyrian riksu). It is a third magnitude star, but is styled by Aratos "both beautiful and large," and may possibly have varied in degree of brightness.

The Seleukid "Sternbilder der Ekliptik" are given by Epping and Strassmaier as Ku(sarikku), Te(mennu), Mâsu, Pulukku (vide Robert Brown, Jun., in ACADEMY, December 6, 1890, p. 532). I have recently discovered the original Akkadian name of "crab" and of the sign Cancer, Arû, Serû, Zibânîtu, or Nûru, Agrabu, Pa (i.e., Pa-pilsak), Enzu, Gu, and Zib or Nûnu. Of these twelve names nine—Ku, Te, Mas(u), Arû, Ziba(nitu), Agrabu, Pa(pilsak), Enzu, and Gu(la)—are found on this tablet. Of the remaining three, Pulukku ("Division") is not strictly a sign-name at all, and Serû (otherwise Sîru) appears to be somewhat doubtful, as is the last star-name on the Te Tablet. Clearly, then, neither these names, nor the zodiacal division into twelve parts, were inventions of the Seleukid or Arsakid eras.

ROBERT BROWN, JUN.

SCIENCE NOTES.

THE meetings of the new session of the Royal Geographical Society begin on Monday, November 13, when the new president, Mr. Clements R. Markham, will give an address on "Geographical Desiderata." At the second meeting, on November 27, Dr. John Murray of the Challenger, will give an address, in which he will review the whole subject of Antarctic exploration. At an early meeting Dr. J. W. Gregory, who has just returned from Africa, will give an account of his remarkable journey to Mount Kenia. Other papers which may be expected during the coming session are on "The Ups and Downs of the Earth's Surface," by Prof. Lapworth; the "Geographical Evolution of India," by Mr. R. D. Oldham; "Journey in the Interior of Sierra Leone," by Mr. T. J. Aldridge; "Journeys on the Upper Mekong," by Mr. H. Warrington Smyth; "A Scientific Journey in Iceland," by Mr. K. Grossman; "Surveys and Research in Montenegro," by Mr. W. H. Cozens-Hardy; "Unexplored England—a Survey of the English Lakes," by Dr. H. R. Mill.

PROF. BONNEY's new work, The Story of Our Planet, will be published by Messrs. Cassell & Co. on November 25, and will be issued simultaneously in New York.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

MESSRS. LUZAC will shortly publish, for Prof. D. S. Margoliouth, collotype reproductions of two ancient Arabic papyri in the Bodleian Library, with attempts at decipherment and translation. The edition will be limited to fifty copies.

WE hear that a reprint of the oldest book in Spanish Basque, in the Biscayan dialect—the Catechism of Martin Ochoa de Capanga (Bilbao, 1656), No. 24 in Prof. Vinson's Bibliography—will be published about Christmas at the ancient city of Vizeu, in Portugal, where Viriathus, the national hero of the Lusitani, is supposed to be buried.

THE fiftieth session of the Philological Society opened on Friday of this week, at University College, Gower-street, when Mr. I. Gollancz was to discuss "The First Riddle in the Exeter Book" and "Puzzling Words in the Alliterative Poems." For the December meeting, the Bishop of Bath and Wells has promised "Miscellaneous Hebrew Etymologies," and Prof. Skeat a paper on "The Use of the Kentish Dialect by Chaucer." Besides two Dictionary evenings, when Dr. J. A. H. Murray and Mr. Henry Bradley will report on the progress of their work, the following papers are also promised: "The Accentual Element in Early Latin Verse, with a New Theory of the Saturnian Metre," by Mr. W. M. Lindsay; "The Deponent Verb in Old Irish," by Prof. J. Strahan; and "The Evolution of Gaelic Grammar," by Dr. Hugh C. Gillies. The president for the year is Prof. A. S. Napier, of Oxford.

FINE ART.

The Chronology of Mediaeval and Renaissance Architecture. By J. Tavenor Perry. (John Murray.)

THIS is, in fact, a date-book of architectural events, covering the vast period which separates the foundation of the original Basilica of S. Peter from the consecration of the present church. The idea, if not new, is certainly a happy one; and this is the first time that it has been attempted on any scale, however remotely, approaching completeness. Though we cannot regard the present volume as more than a first sketch or outline, as such it is excellent; and when it has gone through a few editions, it promises to be a valuable, as it undoubtedly is a convenient, work.

The thirteen centuries to which Mr. Perry's labours are limited constitute the period of the greatest architectural activity the world has ever seen, embracing, as they do, the whole history of the great Gothic schools (using Gothic in its widest sense) from their rise upon the ruins of Imperial Rome to their submergence beneath the classical Renaissance. Moreover, as Mr. Perry points out:

With the founding of the first Basilica of Peter by Constantine begins that introduction of new arrangements into the buildings necessitated by the altered conditions of worship which gradually caused the abandonment of classic uses, and led on to the development of the new schools of Romanesque, Byzantine, and Gothic architecture; while the consecration by Pope Urban the Eighth of the new Basilica in 1268 marks the close of the brilliant epoch, after which architecture ceased to be a living progressive art, and began only to copy forms of other periods and varying schools as the fashion of the period or as the wealth or taste of a patron might dictate."

He would, indeed, be an exigent critic who should scold Mr. Perry for having selected a too limited horizon; for throughout this immense and crowded period he has dealt with the whole of Christian architecture. He has, indeed, done more, and has surveyed mankind, if not exactly from China to Peru, at least from India to Spain and from Finland to Egypt, including in his survey the work of Mahometan sultans and caliphs as well as that of Christian kings and bishops.

Of course, the vastness of the area surveyed has made a certain eclecticism unavoidable; but we own that at times we are puzzled to discover what has guided the author's choice. Why for instance should he omit all mention of the Baptistery at Ravenna, built by St. Neo in 451, or of the Arian Cathedral (S. Martino in aureo caelo) while he dates for us the tomb of Galla Placidia and S. Apollinare in Classe. Why, again, at Lincoln, should he give St. Mary le Wigford as built in 1228, omitting all mention of the tower, a century and a half earlier, and of the rebuilding in 1260, when the window with the mullions crossing at the head (like the three clerestory windows at Wells) was inserted. The frequent allusions of the Norman cathedral towers are most suggestive facts in the history of architecture, and Mr. Perry duly records the dates of most of them; but for some occult reason he is silent as to the fall of that of Winchester, a misfortune for which the picked bones of the Red King were made responsible, though, as William of Malmesbury puts it, the building might have fallen from imperfect construction, even though he had never been buried there. Of course there must be many dates that are only approximations and some that are doubtful, or even carved inscriptions are not infallible; but to state on the same page that Theodorici's tomb (built by the Ostrogoth in his lifetime) was erected in 90, and that the dome of S. Maria in Rotondo was built in 530, is to combine the element of confusion with that of doubt; for S. Maria in Rotondo is only the later name of the tomb, and the dome in question was a single block of Istrian granite.

Occasionally, too, we come on a date that is manifestly wrong, and in such cases it will generally be found that Mr. Perry has gone to an untrustworthy authority. Unfortunately the first entry in the list is of this character. It runs thus, under head of 306 A.D.: "The Emperor Constantine begins to erect the Basilica of St. Peter." Now it is certain that, if the Basilica was erected by Constantine at all, it could not have been in the year 306, nor, indeed, before 312—at the earliest. In 306, when his father died at York, Constantine was proclaimed Augustus by the soldiery, but he did not find himself in Rome until six years later. During the interval, though favouring the Christians in the western province (which he ruled from Treves), he was officially a pagan, and in Italy the penal laws against the Christians were not mitigated until 311. In 312 he won his great victory over Maxentius before the Milvian Bridge, and this is the date usually assigned to the incident of the Labarum and the so-called Conversion. Various acts of liberality to the Christians in Rome are recorded as of this period, though, if we are to accept the theory of the personal co-operation of the emperor, the date should probably be deferred for another twelve years. Mr. Perry has, he tells us, taken the date from Mr. Augustus Hare, who certainly states that in 306 Constantine yielded to the request of Pope Sylvester and began to erect a basilica—a double blunder, as Sylvester did not become pope until 314.

The table of architectural events is prefaced by a synopsis designed to show how various styles developed at unequal rates of speed in various countries. This, too, is an excellent idea, but the execution is too jejune to be of much practical utility. Such a heading as "1225-1400. The completed Gothic style prevails generally throughout Western Europe" leaves a good deal to be desired in the way of analytical clearness.

To make the book of real value there must be a revision of authorities, and considerable additions, including the insertion of a general index; but even as it stands, it contains much information conveniently arranged, and forms an excellent foundation on which Mr. Perry, whose industry deserves all recognition, seems competent to build. It is ornamented with a series of plates from his own sketches, as "examples of the manner in which the recorded dates of buildings have been preserved." The most important of these is the Savelli tomb in the Ara Coeli church at Rome, an ancient sarcophagus with an early renaissance canopy; while perhaps the most curious is the capital in the chancel of old St. Luke's, Chelsea, attributed to some assistant of Torrigiano.

REGINALD HUGHES.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE COINAGE OF THEMISTOCLES.

All Souls College, Oxford: Oct. 23, 1893.

I must apologise to Mr. Head for my misconception, and am very glad to learn that a plated specimen of the coin exists in the British Museum. I had not fully grasped the meaning of Mr. Head's words on p. xliv.—"The Didrachm weighs 132 grains (Waddington Mélanges i. 2). The specimen described in the present volume is plated, and consequently only weighs 90 (p. 158, 1)." Mr. Head does not directly state that the "specimen here described" was in the British Museum. There is no picture of it in the plates of illustrations, and in the description on p. 158 there is given below a cross reference to Mr. Waddington's coin, which again misled me. I much regret my slip, and trust the Museum authorities will pardon it. C. OMAN.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

THE seventy-eighth exhibition of pictures by artists of the early English school (including Constable's famous painting of "Hampstead Heath") will open next week, at the French Gallery, Pall Mall. Mr. Arthur Lucas will also have on view, in New Bond-street, an oil-painting, by Mr. Francis S. Walker, of Shakespeare's house and garden, Stratford-upon-Avon, of which the artist has himself etched a plate.

MESSRS. SEELEY & Co. will publish in the course of the present month a book, by Mr. Claude Phillips, on Sir Joshua Reynolds and the Royal Academy, illustrated with nine copper-plates.

MR. WILLIAM MORRIS has had printed at his own press a booklet, containing the lecture on "Gothic Architecture" which he delivered at the New Gallery in 1889, during the exhibition of the Arts and Crafts Society. As examples of the Kelmscott Press are not so very common, it may be useful to add that this may be obtained for half-a-crown from Mr. H. Halliday-Sparling, 8, Hammersmith terrace.

THE Repertorium für Kunstwissenschaft has sustained a great loss by the sudden death of Prof. Dr. Hubert Janitschek, who has edited its sixteen volumes. The two next parts will be devoted to an index of the whole work. This periodical contains so many admirably thorough investigations of problems connected with art-history of all epochs, and reflects so well the contemporary stages of advance in study, that the promised index cannot but be of great value to students.

MUSIC.

RECENT CONCERTS.

M. PADEREWSKI'S Pianoforte Recitals are few and far between, and it was, therefore, not surprising to find St. James's Hall packed on Tuesday afternoon. The popularity which the Polish pianist has achieved here within a few seasons is astonishing; his great predecessor Rubinstein rose gradually to eminence. The programme on Tuesday was one of considerable interest. It opened with Bach's Chromatic Fantasia, and this was followed by two Sonatas not often heard. Beethoven's Sonata in D minor (Op. 31, No. 2) is one of his most characteristic works, in which the master completely triumphed over form. In an earlier Sonata, the so-called "Moonlight," and again in a later, the "Appassionata," he obtained, as here, wonderful variety of mood, and yet perfect unity. One does not think of these Sonatas as in three movements, but as various expressions of one mood. M. Paderewski's reading lacked neither feeling nor character. At times, indeed, in the recitatives of the Allegro and the theme of the Largo, the interpreter infused too much sentiment; but any minor point to which one could take exception was atoned for by the sincerity of the reading. The Allegretto was perfect: tender, yet not sentimental; quiet, yet full of latent power. The next piece, Schumann's Sonata in F sharp minor (Op. 11), is a work of very different stamp. Its technical difficulties are extremely great, and throughout one can feel that Schumann was hampered by form. There are faults of structure and development in it, and the movements are not well balanced. But the work is full of life, passion and poetry; and if one cannot forget the faults, one is quite disposed to forgive them. As compared with Mme. Schumann, M. Paderewski's rendering was somewhat too impulsive, but it was certainly striking. The pianist was very successful with the Chopin pieces. The Ballade in F was magnificently played, and so too was the fine Polonaise in F sharp minor, except for a little hardness of tone in some of the forte passages. The wild Prelude in D minor was not quite suitable after the boisterous Etude in A minor from the second set. The pianist played some variations from his own pen on "Home sweet home." They are clever, and were brilliantly performed; but if that old melody must be varied, we should like it done in a different spirit. The bravura element was too prominent, and, at times, a flippancy became manifest, which ill-assorted with the gentle theme. The programme concluded with show pieces by Rubinstein and Liszt.

The Popular Concert last Saturday week opened with Brahms's fine pianoforte Quartet in G minor (Op. 25). The performance by Mr. L. Borwick, Mlle. Wietrowetz and MM. Gibson and Whitehouse deserves high praise; they were evidently all in full sympathy with their task: the Finale was given with wonderful spirit. Mr. Borwick played as solo Chopin's Sonata in B flat minor (Op. 35), and, we believe, for the first time. There was much to praise in his rendering: the brilliancy of the Scherzo and delicacy of the Trio, the beauty of tone in the Marc proper, and the clean and crisp technique of the bizarre Finale. And yet there were drawbacks. The opening movement was petulant rather than truly passionate; the Trio of the March was affected, and the Finale given to much in the style of a brilliant toccata. Mr. Borwick is talented and intelligent, and we feel sure that each time he plays this work he will enter more fully into the spirit of the music. A word must be said respecting his solo on the following Monday. Many and just complaints have been made about the piano forte solos selected at these concerts. Sometimes they are of too light a character, and occasionally unsuitable, especially in the case of transcriptions of Bach's organ works. Mr. Borwick selected Bach's noble "Suite Anglaise" in G minor, and thus called attention to music which all pianists worthy of the name should be proud to play. J. S. SHEDLOCK.

REMINGTON & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

AT ALL BOOKSELLERS, BOOKSTALLS, AND LIBRARIES.

LITERARY RECOLLECTIONS. By Maxime Du

CAMP (Member of the French Academy). 2 vols., demy 8vo, 30s. Just out.
The Times says: "Students of modern French literature will not find little to attract them in Maxime Du Camp's 'Literary Reminiscences.'"

STEVE BROWN'S BUNYIP, and other Stories. By JOHN ARTHUR BARRY. With Introductory Verses by RUDYARD KIPLING. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. Just out.

AMONG BOERS and BASUTOS: the Story of our Life on the Frontier. By Mrs. BARKLY. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. Just out.

A NOTABLE WOMAN, and other Sketches. By

MILICENT ERSKINE WEMYSS. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.
MORNING POST says: "Is full of interest, and merits an honourable place in the historical literature of the day."

SECOND AND CHEAP EDITION, at 2s. 6d.

THE REMINISCENCES of a MIDSHIPMAN'S LIFE

from 1850-1886. By Captain CECIL SLOANE-STANLEY, R.N.
The Times says: "The Reminiscences are bright, cheery, and graphic, and may well serve to illustrate a period of naval history which has not yet had its Marryat, nor even its Basil Hall. Some of the stories here told, not for the first time, certainly read like direct reminiscences of Marryat."

THE FATAL RING: a Tragedy. By Francis Henry

CLIFFE. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.
PUBLIC OPINION says: "Mr. Cliffe has produced a work of interest and distinction."

REMINGTON & CO., LTD., LONDON, KING STREET, COVENT GARDEN; AND SYDNEY.

THE AUTOTYPE FINE-ART GALLERY,

74, New Oxford Street, London,

Is remarkable for its Display of Copies of Celebrated Works of

THE GREAT MASTERS.

Reproductions of the most important Paintings in the following Collections:—

NATIONAL GALLERY, LONDON, BUCKINGHAM PALACE,
WINDSOR CASTLE,
UFFIZI, FLORENCE,
PITTI, FLORENCE, ACADEMY OF FINE ARTS,
FLORENCE,
AMSTERDAM,
THE HAGUE,

LOUVRE, PARIS,
LUXEMBOURG, PARIS,
ROYAL GALLERY, DRESDEN, HERMITAGE, ST. PETERS-BURG, PRADO, MADRID,
VATICAN, ROME,
HABSBURG, FRANKFORT,

AND

THE PARIS SALONS.

A LARGE COLLECTION of EXAMPLES of MODERN FRENCH and ENGLISH ART in SELECTED FRAMES, suitable for HALL, LIBRARY, DRAWING-ROOM, BOUDOIR, &c.

THE AUTOTYPE FINE-ART CATALOGUE of 184 pages, with Illustrated Supplement, containing 68 Miniature Photographs of notable Autotypes, post free, One Shilling.

AUTOTYPE: a DECORATIVE and EDUCATIONAL ART.
NEW PAMPHLET—FREE ON APPLICATION.

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY, LONDON.

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

E P P S'S GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

C O C O A
BOILING WATER OR MILK.

THE NEW REVIEW.

Edited by ARCHIBALD GROVE.

No. 54.

STUDY IN CHARACTER: MARSHAL MACMAHON.
THE ARMENIAN AGITATION: a Reply to Mr. Stevenson, M.P.
By SADIK EFENDI.

THE ADVERTISEMENT NUISANCE—

I. By W. E. H. LECKY.
II. By WALTER BESANT.
III. By LADY JEUNE.
IV. By W. B. RICHMOND, A.K.A.
V. By JULIAN STURGIS.

WILLIAM COBBETT. (Conclusion.) By LESLIE STEPHEN.
IN DEFENCE OF CLASSICAL STUDY. By Professor JESU.
AN IDEALIST. By the AUTHOR of "MADEMOISELLE L&C."
OUR SPORTING ZADKIELS. By the Rev. J. W. HORSLEY.
FURTHER GLEANINGS from the PAPYRI. By Prof. MAHAFFY.
BRITISH ART in the NATIONAL GALLERY. By S. J. VICKARS.
PARISH COUNCILS and ALLOTMENTS. By BOLTON KING.
WOMAN'S SPHERE in ART. By Professor FERRERO.
LONGMANS, GREEN & Co., London and New York.

To H.R.H. the PRINCE of WALES.

BRAND & CO.'S A1 SAUCE,

SOUPS, PRESERVED PROVISIONS

POTTED MEATS, and YORK and GAME

PIES. Also.

ESSENCE of BEEF, BEEF TEA,

TURTLE SOUP, and JELLY, and other

SPECIALITIES for INVALIDS.

CAUTION—BEWARE of IMITATIONS.

SOLE ADDRESSES—
11, LITTLE STANHOPE STREET,
MAYFAIR, W.

DAVID NUTT, 270, Strand, London.

THE JEWISH QUARTERLY REVIEW.

EDITED BY I. ABRAHAM and C. G. MONTEFIORE.

Vol. VI. OCTOBER, 1893. No. 21.—CONTENTS.

Price Three Shillings. Annual Subscription, Post Free, Ten Shillings.

CONTENTS.

THE READING of the LAW and PROPHECY in a TRIENNIAL

CYCLE.—II. By Prof. A. BUCHLER.

JEWISH RELIGIOUS EDUCATION. By E. HARRIS and the Rev.

L. M. SIMMONS.

THE JEWS in the WORKS of the CHURCH FATHERS.—II. By Dr. S. KRAUSS.

MR. SMITH: a Possibility. By C. G. MONTEFIORE.

MRS. SMITH: an Argument. By I. ABRAHAM.

JEWISH ARABIC LITURGIES. By Dr. H. HIRSCHFELD.

NOTES on HEBREW MSS. in the UNIVERSITY LIBRARY at CAMBRIDGE.—VI. By S. SCHUCHTER.

CRITICAL NOTICES.—Moritz Steinschneider's Die hebraischen

Uebersetzungen des Mittelalters und die Juden als Dolmetscher.

By Dr. NEUBAUER.—Dr. Fairbairn's Christ in Modern Theology.

By the Rev. CHARLES B. URRUTY.—Dr. M. Gaster's Origin and Source of the Shulchan Aruch and the Sepher Asufah. By Dr. NEUBAUER.

—Solomon Buber's Midrash Mischle. By Dr. NEUBAUER.

—R. Smend's Lehrbuch der alttestamentlichen Religionsgeschichte.

By C. G. MONTEFIORE.—Bruno Baentzen's Das Bundesbuch. Ex. ii.

22-xxiii. 33; and Das Heiligtums-Gesetz. Lev. xvii. xxi. 19.

By CHARLES GAT.—H. Brody's Beiträge zu Salomons da-Piers's Leben und Wirken nebst Auszügen aus seinem Diwan. By Dr. H.

HIRSCHFELD.

A NEW TRANSLATION of the BOOK of JUBILEES.—I. By the Rev. R. H. CHARLES.

NOTES and DISCUSSION.—Ibn Hishm, the Mohammedan Mystic, and the Kings of Damascus, by Prof. IGNAZ GOLDZIEHER.—The Sign given to King Ahar (Is. vii. 10-17). By Prof. A. BEVAN.—Elhanan, son of Shemariah ben Elhanan, by Dr. NEUBAUER.

The present number begins a new volume (Vol. VI.) of the JEWISH

QUARTERLY REVIEW, the only review of the English-speaking world devoted to the study of the religious, intellectual, and social condition of Judaism in the past and present. It numbers among its contributors the leading scholars, Christian as well as Jewish, of England, America, and the Continent. Vol. I.-V. demy 8vo volumes, averaging from 500 to 800 pages, strongly and handsomely bound in cloth, 2s. net.

THE FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW,

NOVEMBER.

TO YOUR TENTS, O ISRAEL! By THE FABIAN SOCIETY.

MR. RUDYARD KIPLING'S VERSE. By the late FRANKLIN ADAMS.

THE LOCK-OUT in the COAL TRADE. By VACANT NASH.

THE ICE AGE and its WORK. Part I. By A. R. WALLACE, F.R.S.

DELI in SUMATRA. By R. W. EGGERTON EASTWICK.

IS MONEY a MERE COMMODITY? By WILLIAM SMART.

HOW TO SAVE EGYPT (with Map). By CORN WHITEHOUSE.

CARL WILHELM SCHEEL. By Professor THOMAS, F.R.S.

THE PSYCHOLOGY of LABOUR and CAPITAL. By ROBERT

WALLACE, M.P.

THE IRELAND of TO-DAY. Part I. By K.

THE BRITISH EAST AFRICA COMPANY. By General Sir A. A.

KEMBALL, K.C.B.

CHAPMAN & HALL, Ltd.

Price 2s. 6d., or cloth gilt, gilt edges, 5s.

WILLIAM HOLMAN HUNT

(THE LIFE AND WORK OF).

By Archdeacon FARRAR and Mrs. MEYNELL.

Being the "ART ANNUAL" for 1893, or Christmas number of the "ART JOURNAL." With line engraving of "The Finding of the Saviour in the Temple," photographs of "The Light of the World," "The Shadow of Death," and over 30 other illustrations. The last three "ART ANNUALS"—W. HOLMAN HUNT; H. HERKOMER, R.A.; BRITTON RIVIER, R.A.—handsomely bound together, cloth gilt, gilt edges, 10s. 6d.

London: J. S. VINTAGE & Co., Ltd, 26, Ivy Lane, E.C.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1893.

No. 1123, New Series.

THE EDITOR cannot undertake to return, or to correspond with the writers of, rejected manuscript.

It is particularly requested that all business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., may be addressed to the PUBLISHER, and not to the EDITOR.

LITERATURE.

Landmarks of a Literary Life, 1820-1892.
By Mrs. Newton Crosland (Camilla Toulmin). (Sampson Low.)

"A NEW king arose who knew not Joseph." It is to be feared that the King Demos of the present, literary though he be when compared with most of his predecessors, knows nothing of Mrs. Newton Crosland; but I can remember the time, nearly forty years ago, when, to a lad with a taste for desultory reading, the name of Camilla Toulmin was as familiar as were the names of Mary Howitt and Caroline Norton, which are yet visible in a faint after-glow of fame. Probably, the main reason why the vogue of Miss Toulmin has succumbed in the struggle for existence is found in the fact that almost all the work by which she made herself known to the world was allowed to remain in those Annals which, once the most fashionable of all products of literature, are now despised even by the curious investigator of the fourpenny box. There is, indeed, no contempt more profound than the contempt of ignorance; and the common estimate of the Annals, as volumes composed of vapid letterpress written up to namby-pamby steel engravings, is of ignorance all compact. True, they have been superseded by cheap Christmas books, and by lavishly-illustrated periodical literature; but there is something a little fatuous in the ordinary cheap sneer at a class of publications commended by the names of such writers as Walter Scott, Edward Bulwer Lytton, Tennyson, Thackeray, Landor, Disraeli, Leigh Hunt, and Mr. Ruskin.

But this by the way. The critic's present concern is not with the total mass of Mrs. Newton Crosland's work, but with her volume of reminiscences; and, whatever may be thought of the former, there will be but one opinion of the interest of the latter. I may just note, at the outset, that the first of the two dates given on the title-page, if not a misprint, is rather incomprehensible. Mrs. Newton Crosland, whose remembrance goes back to the Battle of Waterloo, says: "I was three years and nine days old on that eventful Sunday," which means that she was born on June 9, 1812. The year 1820 was, therefore, not the year of her birth, and it can hardly be the year from which she dates her purely literary life; for the little Camilla Toulmin does not seem to have been one of those precocious children whose "poems" and "stories" are the delight of admiring relatives, and the terror of sorely-tried friends. Indeed, prior to the time when Miss Toulmin herself became a literary producer, her interest in literature seems to have been only that of any clever and cultivated girl, and the first chapters of her reminiscences are devoted to public events and play-going rather than to bookish affairs.

Of the public events the great battle was of course the most notable. The news did not reach London till the evening of Tuesday, forty-eight hours after the victory, and the whist-club to which Miss Toulmin's parents belonged had met at the house of Lonsdale the portrait painter. In the midst of a rubber the players were startled by the newsmen's horns, and cries of "A great victory—Buonaparty defeated!" and "Courier!"

"The cards were thrown down—the gentlemen rushed into the street to procure the paper at any price the newsmen asked. The details were comparatively meagre; yet they were ample enough to convey some idea of the victory gained, and to break up the party, sending home several medical men who were present, and who intended to proceed to Brussels, or make arrangements to despatch medical students without delay. . . . The ladies also departed, for their task was to be up early to look out all the old linen they could find, and set themselves to work to make lint for the wounded. Not only did surgeons from all parts of the country hasten to the scene of slaughter, but dentists had their emissaries to extract the teeth of the dead soldiers; for false teeth were then, in a grim sense, real teeth, not made of enamel."

This last rather sickening detail of an exciting week is, I think, new; but the whole paragraph enables us to realise the changes of seventy-eight years. Among the political figures of Miss Toulmin's youth the one whom she seems to remember most distinctly is the once famous Radical, Major Cartwright, seen often by her—for he was a near neighbour—as "a tall, thin, venerable looking old man, with that bleached complexion which is often seen at an advanced period of life," always "attired in summer clothing, nankeen 'tights' with gaiters, and a long flapped overcoat." A somewhat distinguished officer in the British navy, Major Cartwright (so known in virtue of a Militia commission) withdrew from the service rather than fight against the Americans, with whom he sympathised, an act which draws from Mrs. Crosland the eminently conservative comment,—

"A fine proceeding this seemed in the eyes of certain shallow thinkers who made a hero of him; but perhaps the world would be more of a bedlam and a battle-field even than it is if our soldiers and sailors usurped the authority of their rulers instead of obeying them."

The theatrical recollections of a lady who saw the elder Kean in tragedy and Malibran in opera are of course not merely interesting but valuable as records of the most evanescent of artistic delights, and it would be pleasant to quote from them; but these things are only a prelude to the real story—not the story itself. With the exception of a few contributions to Annals, Miss Toulmin does not seem to have written anything for publication before the spring of 1841, when she sent to the Chamberses of Edinburgh a prose article and a poem, which were promptly inserted in their already famous Journal, and before long Miss Toulmin was a regular contributor and an intimate friend and guest of the two brothers and their wives. To this friendship are devoted some of the most pleasant pages of the book; and if the testimony of all who knew Robert Chambers is to be relied upon, the portrait given here is as lifelike as it is pleasant. William Chambers was an admirable man, a man who won universal respect and esteem, and Mrs. Crosland speaks of him with something that is almost warmth; but in her celebration of the charm of Robert's personality there is no "almost." Never were two brothers, each thoroughly worthy in his own way, more strikingly unlike in taste and temperament, and yet they worked together without the slightest friction. Mrs. Crosland, in an interesting paragraph, discloses the nature of the lubricating agent.

"The brothers must often have differed in their opinions on literary matters. Once I myself wrote a story for the Journal, which was accepted by Robert with words of approbation; a few days later came a letter of regret that his brother did not agree with him as to its suitability for the Journal. On another occasion I pleased William with the manuscript I offered, while his brother thought less of it; but note, this story approved by William appeared after all, while the one Robert liked was returned to me. The fact was, the younger brother, in trifling matters, yielded habitually to the elder; hence the concord of their lives."

On occasion Miss Toulmin seems to have made herself useful to her friends, not merely as a contributor to the Journal, but in humbler ways; and there is one record which will open the eyes of unsophisticated people who are ignorant of the extent to which literature is a manufacture as well as an art.

"He [William Chambers] brought me the proof-sheets of one of the Miscellany of Tracts they were then publishing, but which proved to be five pages short of the thirty-two required. It was a story, and he suggested that I should look it through, and by inventing additional incidents, or by other means, bring it to the required length. I was a little dismayed, but as the story was to appear anonymously, I thought the author—who turned out to be my friend Dinah Mulock—would not be much injured. So I set to work, studied the thing one day, and the next added the five pages necessary by putting in additional paragraphs or sentences here and there. Thus I earned a couple of guineas."

Miss Toulmin's connexion with the Annals gained for her the friendship of Lady Blessington and of her niece, the charming Marguerite Power; and at Gore House she made the acquaintance of that "glass of fashion," Count d'Orsay, who struck the young lady observer as being "mannish rather than manly, and yet with a touch of effeminacy quite different from that woman-like tenderness which adds to the excellence of a man." Here, too, she met a man who at that time seemed a much less important person than his foppish countryman: none other than Prince Louis Napoleon, who was, in her opinion, "one of the ugliest men I had ever seen," but whom she could not help admiring for "his simple manners, which were more like those of an English gentleman than what we used to associate with a Frenchman"—a delightfully insular verdict.

Of Mr. and Mrs. S. C. Hall, Mrs. Crosland has a good deal to say, but not much to tell that is of any great consequence. Mrs. Hall seems to have been her favourite, but she has evidently a warm admiration for Mr. Hall also. One paragraph seems to show that she was familiar with the once widely-current rumour—ignorance of which was indeed almost impossible—that Hall was the original of the immortal Pecksniff; but Mrs. Crosland's impression appears to be that he was rather a John Westlock, whose good ideas were developed by others—the real Pecksniffs—and that when he made claim to his own property he was, with gross injustice, regarded as an impostor.

Mrs. Crosland has evidently found considerable pleasure in the society of sculptors; and she has numbered among her friends and acquaintances at least four plastic artists of genuine distinction—Gibson, John Graham Lough, and the two Americans, Paul Akers and Hiram Powers. It was at the Loughs' house that she once met Leigh Hunt, whom she could not forgive for what she, with many other ill-informed persons, supposed to be his "ingratitude to Byron," and of whom she gives a most unflattering portrait. It is hardly worth quoting; but the curious in such matters will find it interesting to place it beside the other portrait drawn by one who was certainly as keen an observer as Mrs. Crosland—Nathaniel Hawthorne. The one is all vulgarity, the other all refinement; but probably Hawthorne, most unpolemical of men, had no views on the great Hunt-Byron controversy.

Though Mrs. Crosland is generally very genial, Hunt is not the only person of whom she speaks in a somewhat depreciatory tone. Louis Blanc, for example, is described as a "singularly repellent" person, who "looked like one who could never be transformed into a gentleman"; the Howitts are accused of exceedingly shabby conduct to their colleague, John Saunders, who afterwards became known as the author of Abel Drake's Wife, Ilirrell, and other noteworthy novels; and Mary Russell Mitford figures as "a hard-headed woman, spoiled by early and easily acquired literary success," who spoke much of celebrated people, and had not a good word for any of them, save—and the exception is rather an odd one—Louis Napoleon, who, at the time when Mrs. Crosland and Miss Mitford met, had just made his memorable coup d'état.

It would be impossible even to mention the more or less memorable shades who flit through Mrs. Crosland's pages. There is Albert Smith, the once famous entertainer who popularised—or vulgarised—Mont Blanc, and who once broke a long silence with the question, "Don't you hate your fellow creatures?" There is Douglas Jerrold, whom, in spite of his reputation for cynicism, Mrs. Crosland found full of genuine kindness and helpfulness, and genuinely troubled by the accusation of having disturbed the peace of families by his Candle Lectures. There is R. H. Horne, of whose whim in publishing Orion at a farthing Mrs. Crosland only tells half the story, his stipulation with the booksellers comprising two provisos—the first that no one should be allowed to purchase more than a single copy, and the second that no copy at all should be sold to the would-be purchaser who asked for "Orion." There are reminiscences of such very varied notabilities as Jenny Lind, Brunel, E. M. Ward, R.A., Alexis the celebrated clairvoyant, Mrs. Cowden Clarke, Mrs. Craik, the Westland Marstons, H. F. Chorley, and those two famous Americans, the shy Nathaniel Hawthorne, and the far from shy Mrs. H. B. Stowe, of whom Mrs. Crosland tells a delicious story, which seems to be as well authenticated as most of its tribe. The Duke and Duchess of Sutherland were, as is well known, among the principal lionisers of the author of Uncle Tom's Cabin.

"Mrs. Stowe was being entertained at one of the ducal residences, and the occasion was a large dinner-party. In a momentary lull of conversation, Mrs. Stowe, who had been gazing somewhat earnestly at her hostess, exclaimed in a voice that everyone could hear—'Duchess, how ever do you fix your hair?' 'You must ask Louise,' replied the Duchess of Sutherland, with a smile that in no way betrayed astonishment or rebuked her guest."

In days when Spiritualism as a fashionable craze has been entirely superseded by what is called Esoteric Buddhism, Mrs. Newton Crosland is still an enthusiastic Spiritualist; but it is not to be wondered at that the pages devoted to this theme have now a somewhat belated look. What she has to tell us about the experience and testimony of such distinguished fellow believers as Prof. de Morgan, Prof. Skinner of Cambridge, Robert Chambers, Mrs. Browning, and others has undoubtedly a certain interest, but it is an interest which is biographical rather than scientific in character. At a time when the spiritualistic controversy dealt with the question of the genuineness of the "phenomena," the evidence of such patient and competent investigators was of value. Now, however, this genuineness in a large number of cases is all but universally admitted, and the present question is whether the admitted facts demand the explanation which Spiritualism assumes—a point which Mrs. Crosland completely ignores.

It will be seen that the volume is a very pleasant specimen of the class of literature to which it belongs. No one is likely to find it dull; but it naturally makes the strongest appeal to those who are old enough to remember for themselves some of the men and women who are fast fading from the recollection of the present generation, but who had—and frequently deserved—their day of fame.

JAMES ASHCROFT NOBLE.

CENTRAL ASIA AND CHINA.

The Rival Powers in Central Asia. Translated from the German of Josef Popowski by A. B. Brabant, and edited by C. E. Black. (Constable.)

China and her Neighbours. By R. S. Gundry. (Chapman & Hall.)

HERR POPOWSKI is among the prophets who foresee the approaching end of British dominion in Asia. The Russians, he is assured, are bent on subduing Hindustan; and England is impotent to arrest their triumphant progress from the Oxus to the Indus. "The two principal wishes of the Russia people, and the two principal aims of the Russian Government, are to possess Constantinople and India." The notion that Afghanistan may be set up as a barrier against the overwhelming wave of Russian victory is dismissed as an idle dream. Not less visionary and futile, to the writer's mind, is the idea that our rivals may be compelled to fall back by diplomatic methods. It cannot be done, Herr Popowski tells us. One might be inclined to say with Sir Andrew Aguecheek: "An't be any way, it must be with valour, for policy I hate"; but even valour, it seems, will not serve our turn. Herr Popowski proves entirely to his own satisfaction that, since we cannot attack Russia in Central Asia, we are, therefore, restricted to defensive warfare, which he looks on as only a degree less unsatisfactory than the diplomatic method.

The English editor, Mr. C. E. Black, omits to say whether Herr Popowski has any special qualifications that would entitle him to teach Englishmen their duties. From internal evidence, however, it may be gathered that he knows but little about the state of English politics, and nothing from personal observation of Central Asia. He has studied the Blue-books as well as the unofficial literature of the question, and never hesitates to lay down the law in regard to military matters. But he seldom discriminates between sound and untrustworthy views; he does not perceive that unexpected events might happen any day, which would completely upset the nicest calculation of probabilities; and he proceeds on the mistaken assumption that the course of a future conflict between Russia and England in Asia may be foretold by means of a map and a couple of army lists. Ignorance of the current of public opinion in England may be inferred from the remark, that the masses in this country are exceedingly uneasy at Russia's approach toward the confines of India, and feel instinctively that this movement is carried on with an evil purpose. Elsewhere Herr Popowski speaks of the intense agitation produced in England by the Russian advance. The English masses would be more accurately described as utterly indifferent to what goes on in Central Asia; while of those who devote any attention to the subject, a large proportion believe that it will be fortunate for all parties when the frontiers of England and Russia touch. There may be an outbreak of agitation over the next move of our rivals; but we cannot pretend to be certain of it. Only the other day the Times was full of letters from "chiefs out of war and statesmen out of place," who disagreed greatly as to whether Afghanistan ought or ought not to be closed to the Cossack. Another of Herr Popowski's delusions is that, since the Secretary of State for War happens to be a civilian, and "persons of military education" have no seat in the cabinet, therefore the British government ignores the strategical aspects of the Central Asian problem; while this lack of military knowledge, it seems, is all the more palpable since the Queen as a woman holds also from military matters. It would be superfluous to argue about such propositions.

One or two examples of the author's limited acquaintance with Central Asian affairs must suffice. He quotes with approval Capt. A. C. Yate's assertion that "Russophilism predominates in Khorassan"; adding, on his own account, that the "Russian Consul at Meshed will soon exercise a predominant influence." The Hon. G. Curzon tells a very different story about the state of affairs; and it is scarcely a secret that on several occasions, lately, M. Vlassoff, the Consul referred to, has found British influence still potent at Meshed. In order to show the nature and dimensions of the danger that menaces India, Herr Popowski draws up an elaborate scheme of invasion, indicating the various routes by which Russian armies are to march. Thus we are told, among other things, that the road to Gilgit from the Baroghil Pass not only "enables the Russians to foment disturbances in Kashmir," but would also, though very inconvenient, serve as a route for the advance of a Russian column. As a matter of fact, the Baroghil route leads only to Chitral by the bed of a torrent, impracticable in summer; while the road to Yassin and Gilgit might be blocked at a hundred different points.

The qualifications of Herr Popowski's translator would not appear to include the faculty of writing lucid English. The author is made to say that in 1873 "Count Schouvaloff had, namely, been sent on a special mission to pacify England." This is rather too literal a version of the German expression. Again, we read that the native officers of the Indian army are composed of "indifferently instructed subalterns and of the sons of families that have but a slight knowledge of their profession." Does this mean that the families are wanting in military knowledge? The spelling of proper names is apparently based on no particular system. Thus, we have Cashmere and Kashmir, Bukhara and Bokhara, Muhammadan and Mahommedan. The editor's introduction is remarkable for the statement that, whereas twenty years ago India was a comparatively unfamiliar topic at home, we have since then been awakened to a sense of our responsibilities. But Sir John Strachey, in his evidence before the Opium Commission the other day, dilated on the complete ignorance of India and all things Indian which at the present moment prevails in this country; and his estimate, perhaps, is more trustworthy than Mr. Black's. In any case, however, enlightenment is not to be looked for from the publication of Herr Popowski's book in an English form.

A word should be said about the map which has been drawn for the English edition, and which is also published in a separate form, by Messrs. Stanford. It embodies some of the worst features of English cartography. A futile attempt has been made to combine the reports of conflicting authorities; and the compiler seems to have proceeded on the principle that the latest traveller is certain to be more trustworthy than his predecessors. The result is hopeless confusion. It is a monstrous absurdity to suppose that the haphazard conjectures of Cossack filibusters invalidate the careful and conscientious work of scientific explorers like Colonel Trotter, R.E., and Mr. Ney Elias. In the Proceedings of the Royal Geographical Society for November, it is said of this map that "the whole effect is pleasing, and conveys an accurate idea of the topography of the region." As a Fellow of the Society, I venture to protest against such approbation, which is altogether undeserved. As an instance of clumsy draughtsmanship and spurious geography, I may point to the delineation of the Wakhjir Pass. The political boundaries are taken, apparently without acknowledgment, from a sketch map printed in the Statesman's Year Book.

Mr. Gundry's volume on the foreign relations of China is made up of papers originally written for various periodicals. The chapters relating to French action in Indo-China have still a special interest, but the story of the late Mr. Macaulay's projected mission to Thibet and that of the campaign in Sikkim are old ones now. Although he has much to say about the beginnings of French intercourse with Siam and the neighbouring countries, the author does not seem to have consulted either Dr. Anderson's work on Siam or the seventeenth century records at the India Office on which it is based. Mr. Gundry's information about Constant Phaulkon, the Greek adventurer who was high in favour at the Siamese Court when Louis XIV.'s envoys visited the country, is derived chiefly from French sources, which should be supplemented and corrected from the evidence given by contemporary Englishmen. Mr. Gundry might have mentioned that Phaulkon sent presents to the English and received a letter of thanks from James II., taken out to Siam by the captain of the Herbert, the same ship which some years later was blown up by her captain after a desperate fight with five French men of war off Joanna. Of another adventurer of that time, Samuel Barron, Mr. Gundry tells us that he appears to have been born in Tongking but to have been of English descent. It is stated, however, in a letter of the East India Company, quoted by both Dr. Anderson and Sir Henry Yule, that Barron's grandfather was a Scotchman, his father a Dutchman, and his mother a Portuguese. Coming down to later times, it will be found that Mr. Gundry differs frequently from other authorities. He is anything but enthusiastic about the achievements of the gallant French sailor and traveller, Captain Garnier. "There are few more romantic episodes," writes Colonel Barrow, "in the history of war, than that of the exploits of the French in Tongking in 1873"; and he speaks of the capture of Ninh Binh by M. de Hautefeuille as a feat which English officers might envy. The young midshipman, with his boat's crew and an 1½-inch gun, stormed and took a large walled city. According to Mr. Gundry, "the incident may be described as unscrupulous and violent, or clever and dashing"; but he himself clearly leans to the first view.

The author's speculations as to the possible value of China, as an ally of Great Britain, may attract more attention than the historical part of his book. He believes that Chinese soldiers, instructed by British officers, would be as efficient as Cossacks. "A Chinese army and Chinese fleet, with English stiffening, might be able to effect an important diversion in Eastern Siberia while we were engaged in Kandahar." The idea that a Chinese contingent under British officers would be of service to us, in the event of war with Russia, is by no means novel; but there is very little to be said in its favour. The policy of China aims at a very different game. "A poison must be met by an anti-poison," Li Hung Chang once remarked, "and rival foreigners by pitting one against another." And even if the Chinese could be persuaded to see that, by helping us to attain our ends, they might also secure their own—a possibility which Asiatics always regard as paradoxical—there is the difficulty that the Chinese army is worthless. "For many years to come China cannot hope to create an army at all similar to those of European states; she lacks the proper material, she lacks the life-giving spirit." This was the opinion of General Prejevalsky; and—as was shown not long ago in a series of admirable and convincing articles in the Times on recent travels in the Chinese Empire—it is supported by every other authority whose evidence can be depended on.

STEPHEN WHEELER.

"THE CANTERBURY POETS." Contemporary Scottish Verse. Edited, with an Introduction, by Sir George Douglas, Bart. (Walter Scott.)

SIR GEORGE DOUGLAS has prepared a book which is certain to have a vogue—probably quite as great out of Scotland as in it—and which will deserve that vogue. He has discharged the invidious task of selection with every desire to be just; he has produced a volume strictly fashionable as regards both size and general appearance. It is to be feared—or, should one rather say, hoped?—that the majority of folk who are at all interested in the Scottish poets of to-day will be content with these 300 pages, and shirk the task of studying thoroughly the fifteen volumes of worthy Mr. Edwards, of Brechin. Sir George is painfully aware of the fact that, in making such a selection, he is certain to give displeasure to many. He "does not for one moment claim for this little book that it represents all that is good, or even all that is best, in the Scottish poetry of the period." This is carrying modesty too far—to the brink of shrinking from realising an ideal. Such a volume, while it cannot present, ought certainly to represent, all that is best in the Scottish verse of to-day. I confess that I do not quite understand the principle on which Sir George Douglas has proceeded in selecting his poets. He does not take living writers merely—but what he describes as "writers who are still, so to speak, more or less upon trial." He includes Mr. William Bell Scott and Mr. James Thomson (of The City of Dreadful Night) who are both dead.

Does he mean to say that Thomas Aird, as the author of The Devil's Dream, is not on his trial, while Mr. Scott is, although he was Aird's junior only by seven years? On what principle can it be maintained that Dr. W. C. Smith, who was born in 1824, is on his trial, and that Alexander Smith, who was born in 1830, is not? Once more, is not the title Contemporary Scottish Verse a rather unfortunate misnomer? It does something more than suggest the idea that the verse which the volume contains is written in the Scottish "dialect." Yet, as a matter of fact, Sir George Douglas has to admit there is very little of that dialect in his book. "It will," he allows, "be a matter of surprise and unfeigned regret to some readers that the most distinctive form of Scottish poetical composition—the vernacular song—is almost unrepresented. Alone, perhaps, in the native melody of 'Surfaceman' is the ancient genius of Scottish poetry heard once more." That being the case, is not "Scottish verse" altogether a misnomer for a book which is really a selection from the poetical works of Scottish writers, the great majority of whom are alive and are in the habit of writing in English?

Beyond question, Sir George has shown much judgment and discrimination in the selection he has made from living Scottish authors and in the extracts he has given from their works. Thus, Mr. William Sharp and Mr. John Davidson (not to speak of Sir George Douglas himself) are worthy, though dissimilar, representatives of the new school of Scottish poets, just as Mr. Robert Buchanan and the Earl of Southesk are worthy, and not altogether dissimilar, representatives of what must now be accounted the old school. At the same time, there may be differences of opinion as to the propriety of certain of the selections Sir George Douglas has made. Thus I can quite understand his giving Mr. Davidson's "Selene Eden" from In a Music-Hall. It is quivering—in two senses—with modernity. But I do not understand Sir George's giving from the same writer "The Rev. Habakkuk McGruher of Cape Wrath in 1879," with its

"And would ye then, false-hearted men,
From Scotland rape her dear damnation?
Take from her hell, then take as well
From space the law of gravitation."

Does not this joke about the abolition of hell look English rather than Scottish, if not an effort on the part of a Scotsman to look at his country through English spectacles? Besides, when Scotland and her "dear damnation" are brought under notice, I am somehow reminded of Mr. Pearson and his latest utterance on Pessimism, in which he says "Much that was anciently attacked as incredible has now been quietly abandoned by the Churches, and does not need to be defended."

Sir George Douglas places considerable value on the verses of three writers who have used the "Scottish dialect" (as he has, not very prudently perhaps, styled what all true "patriots" consider the national language) as their medium of poetical expression—Mr. Alexander Anderson, Mr. R. L. Stevenson, and Mr. J. Logie Robertson. The first, he holds, writes the dialect naturally, the two others use the tongue of the peasant in the spirit of the scholar. Sir George's distinction is a perfectly just one. Mr. Anderson's "Cuddle Doon" has far more genuine life in it than the, in many respects, infinitely more ambitious "Lowden Sabbath Morn" of Mr. Stevenson, though I suspect Sir George is a trifle too enthusiastic when he affirms positively that "Scotland has already made his [Mr. Anderson's] masterpiece quite her own—as much her own, indeed, as she has made Burns's songs." This being allowed, it seems to me that Sir George ends in something like self-contradiction when he says:

"It is to Mr. Robertson and Mr. Stevenson, and to the followers—for I think there will be followers—in the movements which they have inaugurated, that we must look for a revival of poetry written in the Scottish dialect."

Yet, as already observed, he says of the writers from whom he expects so much, that "they employ the language of the peasant in the manner of the scholar," that "they are 'stylists' in the language of the unlettered. Their classic elegance, their curiosa felicitas, keeps step with their command of, their erudition in, the Doric." Would not Sir George be as near the mark if he were to look for a revival of Latin poetry from modern schoolboy narratives of the joys and agonies of Caius and Balbus? Whatever there is of value in the work of the "Surfaceman," more particularly in "Cuddle Doon," which is unquestionably the best thing he has done, lies in its spontaneity, its literary and even linguistic sincerity. Mr. Anderson uses a language—a dialect, if Sir George Douglas will have it so—with which he is familiar, and, therefore, uses it to purpose. Compare Mr. Stevenson's "A Lowden Sabbath Morn" with "Cuddle Doon." It is, as I have said, much more ambitious. It depicts a much more important aspect of Scottish life. It may even be said to be less provincial. But it is essentially artificial. The curiosa felicitas of which Sir George Douglas speaks is painfully obvious. It may, indeed, be prophesied with perfect safety that the Scottish people will not support a literature entirely imitative; and unless support of this kind is forthcoming, the failure of such a literature is certain. As a matter of fact, indeed, the dominance of the English language, not only in the schools but in the homes of Scotland, is now such as to render a revival of a "national" literature north of the Tweed impossible, even if it were desirable.

WILLIAM WALLACE.

Madoc: An Essay on the Discovery of America, by Madoc ap Owen Gwynedd, in the Twelfth Century. By Thomas Stephens. Edited by Llywarch Reynolds. (Longmans.)

THE hero of Southey's disappearing epic is such a satisfying figure in Welsh tradition, that one could almost wish to keep him, as one keeps King Arthur, apart from history. But Columbus intervenes, and with him all the solid claims of the actual discovery of America. It has thus been made a personal question between him and Madoc, between history and legend; and Madoc's champions, growing combative in the dispute, have gone too far. Not satisfied with their delightful legend, they must go and try to prove it matter-of-fact, forgetting that, incidentally, they were expropriating a continent and provoking the critics. The result is this formidable counterblast from Stephens, in which the evidence for Madoc's American adventure is brought together and criticised, so as practically to dispose of the traditional grounds of the story.

Those who know Stephens in his Literature of the Kymry, know him for one of the serious and deliberate, rather than the rapid and intuitive, order of critics. In this volume, he takes up every point of the Madoc tradition, and examines it with infinite care, so that his pages make a complete cyclopaedia of Madoc literature. And a very entertaining collection it is. He begins with the bardic references, some of which date back so far, that they are almost contemporary with Madoc himself. Two quatrains in particular have been largely used in the evidence on behalf of his transatlantic seafaring. The first of these is to be found in a poem by Cynddelw, who has several poems addressed to King Owen Gwynedd, Madoc's father: and one of these is a "Marwnat," or elegy, upon Owen's ill-fated sons, including, beside Madoc, that "high-born Hoel," of whom Gray speaks in his "Bard," and who was an even more interesting figure than Madoc. In this elegy occurs the quatrain—an englyn, whose first line has generally been translated so as to lend colour to the idea of Madoc's mysterious disappearance at sea. But Stephens, referring to the original, discovered what looks like a very ingenious juggling of vowels in the word translated—seas, "myr" (plural of "mor"), and which, according to the reading in the Myvyrian Archaeology, is "mur"—wall, bulwark. This is a very good instance of Stephens' painstaking method; but it is a question whether he is right in placing so much reliance on one vowel, for the Myvyrian Archaeology is not always letter-perfect. Moreover, the last line of the englyn lends itself very well to the alternative reading of "myr." The word "porth" which occurs in it, and which Stephens translates "portal," very often means a "port" or small harbour. The whole englyn would then become—"Since Madoc was slain, by the swelling rage of seas,

I mourn a helping friend;
He was fierce in the ruthless fight;
He was a proud commander in the port."

Even if we accept this reading, however, all that it proves is that Madoc was lost at sea, which, of course, does not help much the theory of his discovery of America.

A more familiar quatrain is that cited by the famous old traveller, Sir Thomas Herbert, in one of the most memorable passages of his superb tome, Travels into Africa and Asia the Great, and repeated a little later by Howell in his Epistolae Ho-Eliaenae. In Herbert, it is simply quoted as composed upon Madoc by Sir Meredith ap Rees; in Howell it becomes an "epitaph found in the West Indies . . . neer upon 600 years since." Howell's translation, which slightly differs from Herbert's, runs :

"Madoc ap Owen was I call'd,
Strong, tall, and comly, not intrall'd
With home-bred pleasure, but for fame
Through land and sea I sought the same."

These lines were afterwards turned into Latin by Dr. Johnson; and there are various other English translations, including one by George Borrow. Howell's pleasing little fable proved long-lived, indeed; and it reappears still in Welsh folk-tales about Madoc. Stephens was the first to take up the task, with any thoroughness, of examining into these things; and it says much for Welsh adherence to such time-honoured traditions that, when his essay was sent in to an Eisteddfod competition thirty years ago, it was refused a hearing, and had to wait till to-day to be published.

There is much that might be added from the latter part of Stephens's essay, treating of the Indian traveller's tales, and the romantic fictions about a tribe of Welsh Indians descended from Madoc. But these, though they couple suggestively two races who may have had the same Oriental origin, the Kymry and the American Indians, and though they provide matter for many a galloping story of adventure, need to be read in full to be appreciated. The Madoc of history is finally reduced in these pages to very small dimensions; but the Madoc of romance is yet to be created. To understand how, one must at length lay down one's "Stephens," and take up one's "Stevenson."

ERNEST RHYS.

Caterina Sforza. By Pier Desiderio Pasolini. In 3 vols. (Rome: Loescher.)

COUNT PASOLINI, whose charming memoir of his father is well known to English readers through the translation of the Dowager Countess of Dalhousie, has fallen in love with the last lady-tyrant of the Romagna. A native of the Romagna himself, he has felt the subtle fascination exercised by Caterina in her lifetime on all around her; and now, after years of enthusiastic research, he has told the story of her life with so much sympathy and historical accuracy of detail, that the reader goes back four hundred years without an effort. Written in choice Italian, it is a most vivid study of a remarkable woman. Two volumes are devoted to the life of Caterina, beautifully illustrated with portraits, pictures of places, and facsimiles of handwriting. The third contains a digest of all the original documents consulted, no less than 1435, many reproduced in full; as well as the Recipe Book of Caterina, 510 recipes of every description. The whole work, with its elaborate indices, is at once a delightful story and a valuable history of Italy at the end of the Middle Ages.

Caterina's personality is brought before us in every page of the book. "Eroica, ma violenta, ammirazione e terrore dei contemporanei, ancor viva divenne un mito." Born in 1463, an illegitimate daughter of Galeazzo Maria Sforza, Duke of Milan, and Lucrezia Landriani, she was acknowledged by her father and brought up at the brilliant court of Milan. During the next fifty years she was connected with all the most important personages, and took part in all the chief events, of Italian history. She visited the court of Lorenzo the Magnificent, married Girolamo Riario, the nephew (or son) of Sisto IV., and for a time led society at Rome, as the most beautiful and accomplished woman of the day. Then she withdrew with her husband to govern their state in the Romagna. Her father was murdered in the conspiracy of Olgiati; her husband, after taking a leading part in the conspiracy of the Pazzi, was himself also assassinated, probably through the machinations of Lorenzo de' Medici; and she was left the arduous task of preserving Imola and Forlì for her son Ottaviano, still a boy. This needed all her resolution and diplomacy. The inhabitants of the Romagna were not easy people to govern; her state needed a military reputation, and she had to trim between Milan, Florence, and Venice. Accustomed to wearing armour and to riding every day on horseback, she directed the exercises of her troops. Innocenzo VIII. coveted her possessions for Franceschetto Cibo, Alessandro VI. for Cesare Borgia. She was almost undone by the invasion of Charles VIII. Her second husband, Giacomo Feo, was murdered, and she wedded, again in secret, Giovanni de' Medici. Their son, Giovanni dalle Bande Nere, alone of all her children, was worthy of his mother: he was the founder of modern warfare, and through him she becomes ancestor of grand dukes of Tuscany, and kings of France, Spain, and England. In diplomacy she outwitted Machiavelli; she sought spiritual advice from Savonarola. She lived in her fortresses, surrounded by plots and assassins, yet she was an affectionate mother and a pious woman. She refused the request of Alessandro VI. that she should let her son marry the infamous Lucrezia Borgia, though this would probably have saved her state. Finally, shutting herself up in her fort at Forlì, she made a desperate effort to resist Cesare Borgia, when he swept down upon the Romagna, aided by the French, to possess himself of the state from which the pope had deposed Caterina. Wounded, taken prisoner, lodged in the Vatican, imprisoned in Castel S. Angelo, tried for her life on the charge of attempting to poison the pope, her spirit never failed her. Released after eighteen months by the intervention of the French, she took refuge from the plots of the Borgias with the Medicis at Florence. Even here she found no safety. Lorenzo would rob her, at any cost, of her favourite son Giovanni; failing in this, so great was his wrath, that he tried to kill either the boy or his mother. The two escaped to the convent at Annalena, and here Giovanni, the future warrior, was brought up, dressed as a nun. After the deaths of Lorenzo and Alessandro VI., mother and son returned to Florence, where she lived in great piety, and died of consumption in 1509. Un strano mostro in femminil figura. Encouragement of art was the one quality wanting to make her the incarnation of the spirit of the Middle Ages in Italy.

P. MORGAN WATKINS.

NEW NOVELS

The Ideal Artist. By F. Bayford Harrison. In 3 vols. (Hurst & Blackett.)

An Excellent Knave. By J. Fitzgerald Molloy. In 3 vols. (Hutchinson.)

The Woman of the Iron Bracelets. By Frank Barrett. In 3 vols. (Chatto & Windus.)

The Capture of the "Estrella." By Commander Claud Harding. (Cassells.)

"Declined with Thanks." By Ernest Mulliner. (Henry.)

The Venetian Secret. By Charles Lutyens. (Digby, Long & Co.)

The Hair of Inglesby. By Violetta. (Sonnenstein.)

Mynheer Joe. By St. George Rathborne. (James Henderson.)

On Stronger Wings. By Edith Lister. (Cassells.)

MR. F. BAYFORD HARRISON certainly displays ability in The Ideal Artist, though the novel contains many things to which objection might be taken. If the author be young, there is little doubt that he will live to do work far above the average, judging from the promise now held forth. His character-drawing is very good; and that is a great point, for the reader likes to feel the living element in a novelist's creations. The plot of The Ideal Artist is by no means elaborate. The prologue, which narrates the circumstances of a duel between two young aristocrats in the first year of the present century, has a distinct bearing upon the chief persons in the real life drama. Two artist friends, Harry Coleman and Felix Vereker, occupy adjacent rooms at the Willow Green Studios. Among their models is a poor, beautiful, but consumptive girl, named Edith Crane. Coleman falls in love with her; and, although he knows she is doomed to an early death, he marries her, in order to rescue her from her squalid surroundings and to give her as much happiness as possible before she dies. The part of the narrative devoted to these two is admirable, and the most human portion of the book. The real hero of the novel, however, is Felix Vereker, who becomes engaged to a young lady of title, whose portrait he has been commissioned to paint by her father. The Earl of Lillebonne is the apparent head of one of the proudest and most ancient houses in England. He has two daughters. The elder, Lady Clara Vere de Vere, is like Tennyson's lady of that name, for she has the blood of a country lover upon her hands, whom she has sent to a premature death by her cruelty. After vainly endeavouring to entrap more eligible suitors, Lady Clara accepts for her husband a rough American millionaire. Lady Flora, her sister, is a much nobler character; and it is she who loves Felix Vereker, and remains true to him through much tribulation. Lord Lillebonne is addicted to entering his "protest" on the House of Lords Journals. But we must be excused from believing that even he would be permitted to enter a formal "protest" against Vereker, on the ground that he had committed a serious breach of privilege by proposing to marry a peer's daughter. Nor do we think that Lady Lillebonne—schemer as she was—would endeavour to capture Sir Ronald Stanley for her daughter Clara by making him intoxicated. There is a skeleton in Lord Lillebonne's family; and a literary black-mailer, named Augustus Tothill, devotes himself to the task of unearthing it. A good deal of space is occupied with the doings of this despicable creature, and we must refer the reader to the volumes to ascertain his own fate and that of the harassed nobleman. In the end, Felix Vereker proves to be the real Earl of Lillebonne, and he, Lady Flora, and the reputed Earl behave magnanimously all round. This story, as a whole, is full of interest; but we have noticed a political allusion in the first volume which is in very bad taste.

There is all the apparatus of the French detective story in An Excellent Knave, but, unfortunately, nothing more. Though Mr. Molloy is a very entertaining writer, his works make no progress as literature. There is no depth of thought or originality in them, while the style frequently leaves much to be desired. Still, the author has distinctive qualities which cannot be overlooked: he can construct a good plot and deftly weave together its various incidents. The present novel is a case in point. It certainly seemed at first as though the murder of Charles Forrester would be brought home to the artist, Hugh Moreland, his rival in the affections of Cicely Halswelle, although we feel that Moreland could not have committed the deed. Then it was a clever stroke to make the real murderer take a studio near Moreland, and under the guise of a female artist, worm out all Moreland's secrets. Finally, there seemed little hope of his escaping the retributive hand of justice when she stole Lady Forrester's jewels and again threw suspicion upon the unfortunate Moreland. The regular detective now believed he had got his prey, but the cleverer ex-detective, Gillesby, knew better, and at last fell into the right track. Very exciting is the closing scene where the murderer, surprised in his own studio, commits suicide and thus eludes the scaffold. There is also another dramatic scene, on the Thames Embankment, in which the supposed murderer hears the confession of the real criminal. Two or three of the characters are well drawn, and the novel undoubtedly belongs to that class which must be read through when they have been once begun.

Commend us to Mr. Frank Barrett for the details of a story which shall be at once sensational and yet natural and probable. His latest novel of this kind is the Woman of the Iron Bracelets, whose Prologue is concerned with a strange visit to the Derby paid by a young aristocrat and a lady whom he has met under the most singular circumstances. Then when the story opens we have a thrilling description of a railway accident and its terrible consequences. During the confusion which ensues after the accident, a young lady, "the woman of the iron bracelets," escapes from the custody of two policemen who had been guarding her, and her fetters are struck off by a Dr. Harvey, who, from her noble demeanour towards the victims of the railway accident, believes her to be innocent of crime. The doctor keeps the handcuffs, and they play an important part in the story. We are next introduced to the family of the St. Johns, and Harry St. John falls desperately in love with "Mary Smith," the young woman who had escaped from justice. Living with the St. Johns is a villainous clergyman named Lawson, who, by the aid of hypnotism, secures a firm hold upon Mrs. St. John. A long struggle ensues between Lawson on the one hand, and Dr. Harvey, Olive and Harry St. John, and Mary Smith on the other; and ultimately the clerical villain is brought to book. It would be unfair to the author to describe in detail the exciting scenes through which he pilots his characters, in order to lead up to the dénouement—these the reader must trace for himself; but they are extremely ingenious, and the plot, as a whole, is very well planned.

Nautical stories have had a great vogue recently, and a favourable specimen of the class is Commander Harding's tale of the slave trade, The Capture of the "Estrella." It is a delightful book for all readers, old and young, and there will be no complaint of a want of interest in the adventures. Lieut. Hardy is just the jolly kind of tar to inspire a passion, as the beautiful native girl whom he rescued and married would no doubt have been willing to testify. Hardy was in a very tight place indeed when he fell into the clutches of a cruel kidnapper of slaves, but he managed to escape, and to survive many other strange and romantic experiences as well. His history is told with spirit down to the very close.

One scarcely knows what to make of Declined with Thanks. Mr. Mulliner certainly shows humour, but it is ill-regulated. Still, it is impossible not to laugh at some of his scenes, and we meet with really clever things now and then. The book, as a whole, is too discursive and lacks cohesion. The remark about a distinguished novelist's wife on the very first page might well have been expunged.

A wonderful process connected with the art of the past forms the basis of The Venetian Secret. The knowledge of this secret was handed down by Titian to Alonzo Cano, but the secret itself originated with the Greeks. Titian's copy of the ancient MS. was preserved by one and then another, until it came into the possession of an English artist named Beverly. As the result of his study of the MS., he produces almost in a twinkling pictures which electrify both artists and connoisseurs. One eminent painter roundly decries the secret, while a wicked connoisseur plans a burglary to obtain possession of the MS., but fails. Beverly is recommended to publish the document to the whole world in the interests of art, and when we part with him, at the close of the volume, he is still considering the matter. Art circles must, therefore, continue to wait his good pleasure. There is a subsidiary love plot in the story, the parties concerned being the charming daughter of Beverly and the eldest son of Lord Annandale. The narrative, as a whole, is interesting enough, and some of the incidents are well worked out; but the style is capable of improvement.

When first introduced to us, the hero in The Heir of Inglesby is in Italy, for Rudolpho di Como is the son of an English mother and an Italian father. By the deaths of his father and mother, he is cast upon his own resources, and takes to the profession of an artist, in which he had shown skill as an amateur. By-and-by he comes to England, and discovers that he is heir to the Inglesby estates and a baronetcy. He marries his relative, the beautiful Gwendoline Lucas, and presumably is happy ever afterwards. Without having any striking merit, the story flows on smoothly. We have noticed one execrating misprint, "Schopin's Funeral March."

The hero of Mynheer Joe is a Yankee Admirable Crichton. The writer calls his sketch "a semi-humorous story of love and adventure"; and it is all that and something more. The scene opens at Sheppard's Hotel at Cairo, immediately after the death of General Gordon. Mynheer Joe arrives and tells of the terrible deeds which have transpired at Khartoum, where he stood by Gordon's side during the massacre. Wherever trouble sprang up, Mynheer Joe was sure to be providentially to the front. He saved his friends at Alexandria and again at Cairo; and no wonder that Molly Tanner, the pretty daughter of an American millionaire, finds his charms irresistible. But he has a rival in the affections of Molly in a Russian nobleman, Baron Popoff. This fiendish aristocrat of the North has put many a man out of the way by his famous duelling powers, and he provokes Joe to an encounter. But he at length receives a lesson. The Baron is filled with bitter hatred, and follows the American party to India, inspired with the double object of slaying Joe and of stirring up the native population against the British Government. But even here he finds Joe too much for him, and the way in which the Baron gets shipped off to Valparaiso against his will is a very smart piece of business. Then a wonderful discovery is made about Joe himself, and he and Molly are happy ever afterwards. The narrative is not allowed to lag for a moment—passion, excitement, and adventure triumph to the very end.

On Stronger Wings, which has been reprinted from the Quiver in Cassell's "Sunshine Series," is a healthy and interesting sketch of English life at the present day. There is an attractive artist who has been unjustly deprived of valuable estates, but who comes to his own in the end; there is an aristocratic family which brings ruin upon itself by its extravagance; and there are two girls in love, playing at cross-purposes. If we may take Sydney Chartoris, the East-end clergyman, as the hero, and Maude Melville as the heroine, they are above the average in nobility of character. But the artist, Herbert Verney, will likewise be a favourite with readers. The two children, Eva and Ronald, are excellently drawn.

G. BARNETT SMITH.

TWO AMERICAN BIOGRAPHIES.

Memoirs and Letters of Charles Sumner. By Edward L. Pierce. Vols. III. and IV. (1845 to 1874). (Sampson Low.) The first portion of this work, consisting of two large volumes, was published so long ago as 1878. Two other, still larger volumes, bring it to a close. It is a valuable record, carefully and conscientiously wrought, of the many important public events with which Charles Sumner was, more or less, associated. It is upon a scale too extensive to produce a perfectly clear conception of Sumner as a man; but his career as a public man is well exhibited. We need not complain of the full and precise manner in which Mr. Pierce treats his subject, and although the extracts from correspondence are extensive, they are not excessive. In some respects, perhaps, some amount of detail might with advantage have been dispensed with. For instance, it is not necessary to tell us so often where Sumner dined; for assuredly he was not a man to whom dinner was one of the chief events of life. The new volumes cover the most interesting portion of slavery history—the years just before the war, the wartime itself, and the following period of "reconstruction"; though all which Sumner was an active and persistent influence. Wendell Phillips described him as "patient in labour, boundless in resources, terribly in earnest," and termed him, not inaptly, "the Stonewall Jackson of the Senate." Where a principle was at stake, he was the most stubborn of men. He was a true fighting man, and incapable of compromise. He was disinterested and scrupulously honourable: the finest type of a citizen. Of course he was understood to be "unpractical"—all pioneers are; but the so-called practical statesman does not always realise how much might be done if he only dared. There is evidence that, if Sumner had been called to perform the duties of an administrator, he would have performed them well. For one thing, tumult and opposition neither quelled nor confused him. "It was Sumner's characteristic," we are told, "to keep his mind steady in the midst of popular frenzy. He had always the courage to challenge a universal opinion." Pre-eminently he was a leader of men. Probably on the whole he was of greater service to his country, and, through his country, to the world, by maintaining his independent position, than he could have been with any of the trammels of official life upon him. Mr. Pierce tells us that Sumner's love of life was small. He had no anxiety to live for the sake of living, and no fear of death. Yet he certainly had an immense desire to live for the sake of his public duties. Shortly before he died he said: "If my works were completed, and my Civil Rights Bill passed, no visitor could enter that door that would be more welcome than death." Yet we can hardly imagine a time when public tasks should cease to claim his attention, and he could say, "I have finished my work." To such untiring workers as he, the tasks are never done until death enters the door. Long ill, Sumner was nevertheless in the Senate House the day before he died. A few months earlier he said "he wished he had been born later, so as to be able to take part in the events which are to come soon." A lady who heard this remarked to him that "she thought the Lord knew better than he when he ought to have been born." Probably so, for he had borne enough of the heat and burden of the day, without witnessing what was to follow after he had left the scene. He looked for brighter times for his country, and not for the race-hatred which, in these latter days, has so miserably reasserted itself, and which, it would seem, the central government—notwithstanding that it crushed the rebellion—is powerless to suppress or even regulate. Sumner, happily one thinks, did not live to see that the war which maintained the Union totally failed to secure unity. Sumner was among the earliest of those "Independents in Politics" who refused to allow principles to be sacrificed to the interests of party. When Grant was nominated for his second term, Sumner separated himself from his party and strenuously opposed their nominee. And he was right; for, however great were Grant's military services, he proved himself incompetent, if nothing worse, as a President. Since then others, following in Sumner's footsteps, have helped to purify American politics. Sumner visited England several times, was well received, and made many friends. Notable among these was John Bright, a man of kindred nature, who stood to this country in much the same relation that Sumner stood to America. That Sumner was misunderstood, and had enemies, goes without saying; but the best of his antagonists realised that he was a great man, and, however much they might dislike his opinions, never questioned his integrity. Those who knew him best admired him most. Mr. Pierce quotes the testimony of opponents and friends to the purity of Sumner's character. They may be summed up in Mr. Pierce's own words, "his sense of moral rectitude was supreme in the direction of his public conduct," and in Emerson's declaration that "he never knew so white a soul."

Life of John Greenleaf Whittier. By W. J. Linton. (Walter Scott.) This latest issue of the somewhat unequal "Great Writers" series cannot fairly be classed among the best. The 188 pages devoted to the biography include 52 pages of prose quotations, and 47 pages of Whittier's verse. At the outset, Mr. Linton admits that for most of the facts in his memoir he is indebted to two previously published biographies, one by Mr. Francis H. Underwood, the other by Mr. W. Sloane Kennedy. "For the weaving of the story in its actual form" he confesses his responsibility. It is hardly satisfactory, however, that not only the facts but the very words of other writers should have been appropriated in such a wholesale fashion. Still, even extensive quotations may, under certain circumstances, be forgiven. If the "weaving" of the story had been excellent, we would not have cared to inquire too critically who prepared the material. Unfortunately we cannot praise even this. The reader who comes to the book without any clear conception of Whittier and his work will leave it not much enlightened. Two fairly good biographies are in existence, and a new biography is expected. There was, then, surely no urgency for the present work. Unless there was something important to communicate, or an excellent critical study to offer, the editors of this series should, we think, have waited for more material, and given time for more effectual treatment. When the authorised biography appears, a better study may be possible. At the same time a memoir of such a man as Whittier by such a man as Mr. W. J. Linton ought to have been excellent, and we can well believe that the editors as well as the public will feel the disappointment.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MESSRS. RIVINGTON, PERCIVAL & Co. will publish shortly a Diary of a Journey across Tibet, by Captain Hamilton Bower, of the Seventeenth Bengal Cavalry, with a map and illustrations reproduced from the author's photographs and sketches. During his adventurous journey across Tibet from east to west, Capt. Bower traversed about 800 miles of unexplored country, and spent three months at altitudes of from 14,000 to 16,000 feet above the sea, in temperatures ranging from freezing point to below zero. To Oriental scholars he is known as the finder of the Bower MS., which is far the most ancient example of Sanskrit writing in existence. A special chapter will describe the rare birds, and give a list of the plants procured, some of which are new to science.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN will publish in the course of this month Days spent on a Doge's Farm, by Miss Margaret Symonds, with a photogravure frontispiece and fifty other illustrations.

WE are glad to learn that the appeal for subscribers to secure the publication of the remarkable work of the late Mr. George Cupples on Scotch Deerhounds and their Masters, which appeared in the ACADEMY of April 15, has been successful. A fair number of subscribers have already responded to the appeal in this country; and it is gratifying to learn that considerably over one hundred have been secured at Dunedin, in New Zealand, headed by the Governor, Lord Glasgow. Messrs. Blackwood have the work in hand; and it is hoped that it will be ready by Christmas, or soon after the New Year.

THE dedication of Messrs. Archibald Constable & Co.'s Hand Atlas of India, which will be published in the course of this month, has been accepted by the Queen. The number of maps has been increased from fifty-two to sixty, and an abstract of the census of 1891 has been added.

MR. HAYWARD, of Croydon, is about to publish a work entitled These Eighty Years, or the Story of an Unfinished Life, by the Rev. Henry Solly. In addition to the author's recollections of various distinguished men, such as Lord Brougham, Lord Lyttelton, John Stuart Mill, George Odger, the Earl of Rosebery, and Samuel Morley, his own varied experiences as counting-house clerk, manufacturing chemist's assistant, Nonconformist minister, founder of the Working Men's Club and Institute movements, and of other social enterprises, may be expected to give these volumes an exceptional interest.

WE understand that Q.'s new book, The Delectable Duchy: Some Tales of East Cornwall, will be published in a few days by Messrs. Cassell & Co.

THE second volume in the "Regent Library" of fiction, published by Mr. Frank Murray, of Moray House, Derby, will be a volume of ten dramatic studies, by Mr. William Sharp, entitled Vistas, because each of them discloses a vista "into the dark zone of the human soul"—according to a quotation from the Spanish writer, Emilia Pardo Bazan, which Mr. Sharp has adopted for his motto.

Two new novels will be published next week by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin: Sweet Bells out of Tune, by Mrs. Burton Harrison; and The White Islander, by Mrs. Mary Hartwell Catherwood.

THE new volume of the "Pseudonym Library" will be A Tonquinese Idyll, by A. Calhama. It is not a translation, though the local colour is the result of first-hand impressions.

The Home Life of the Ancient Greeks, translated from the German of Prof. Blümner by Miss Alice Zimmern, will be issued by Messrs. Cassell & Co. in the course of the present month.

MESSRS. BLISS, SANDS & FOSTER announce for immediate publication the autobiography of Bessie Williams (Mrs. Russell Davies), with a preface by Florence Marryat. The author is a well-known medium, who claims to have had interviews with various historical personages, including Anne Boleyn.

MESSRS. WILLIAM ANDREWS & Co., of Hull, will publish shortly an illustrated volume entitled Bygone Scotland, dealing chiefly with the social and domestic life of former days. The author is Mr. David Maxwell.

MR. FISHER UNWIN will issue next week a volume only 5 inches by 2½ inches in dimensions. It is entitled Thumbnail Sketches, and recalls some Dutch experiences, with appropriate illustrations. The author is Mr. George Wharton Edwards.

MR. HENRY MARCH GILBERT, of Southampton, announces for publication, by subscription, a history of the Hospital of God's House (Domus Dei), by the Rev. J. Aston Whitlock, chaplain of the hospital. The book will be illustrated with a map and two plates.

MR. ELLIOT STOCK announces for early publication a new series of Popular Ancestral Tablets for recording pedigrees.

MESSRS. CONSTABLE are publishing this week Burma a Hundred Years Ago, edited by the Hon. Mr. Justice Jardine; and next week they will issue vol. ii. of the "Whitehall Shakspeare," containing "The Taming of the Shrew," "The Merchant of Venice," and "The Merry Wives of Windsor."

MESSRS. GEORGE PHILIP & SON will publish on November 20 a second work on the Gouin method of teaching languages, forming the first step in the practical application of M. Gouin's system to the teaching of French. The sale of The Art of Teaching and Studying Languages, by the same author, which was published in May, 1892, already exceeds five thousand copies. Other books and diagrams connected with the teaching of languages upon this method are in preparation.

THE first edition of fifteen thousand copies of Annie S. Swan's Courtship and Marriage: the Gentle Art of Home-making—has been bought up by the trade before publication; and Messrs. Hutchinson, the publishers, have gone to press with a second large edition. This will delay the issue of the book for a few days.

THE one hundred and fortieth session of the Society of Arts will be opened on Wednesday next with an address by Sir Richard E. Webster, chairman of the council. The Christmas lectures for young people will be delivered by Mr. Walter Gardiner, on the subject of "Plants: their Foes and Defence."

THE winter season at the London Institution will be opened next Monday, with a lecture by Sir Robert S. Ball on "Recent Researches on the Sun." This, like almost all the other lectures, will be "illustrated." Mr. H. J. Mackinder will deliver the Christmas course for young people, dealing with Marco Polo, Columbus, and Magellan. Among future arrangements, we may mention: "The Present and Future of Poetry in England," by Mr. Lewis Morris; "The Essentials of Great Poetry," by Mr. Alfred Austin; "The Uses of Humour," by Prof. J. Sully; "English Bards of the Welsh Marches," by Mr. I. Gollancz; "The Roman Wall in Northumberland," by Dr. T. Hodgkin; "Art about Us," by Mr. Lewis F. Day; "The Pond and its People," by the Rev. Dr. Dallinger; and "Cholera," by Dr. E. Klein.

ON November 2, the Edinburgh Bibliographical Society opened their fourth session—Mr. T. Graves Law, the retiring president, in the chair. Among the new office-bearers elected were Mr. William Cowan, president, and Mr. Gilbert Goudie, vice-president. The printed proceedings of the Society for the past session, illustrated with some interesting facsimiles, include the following papers:—"Andro Hart and his Press, with a Hand-list of Books 1601-39," by Mr. W. Cowan; "A Leaf of an Early Scottish Donatus," by Mr. Gordon Duff; "The Two First Books printed in the Scottish Language," by Mr. Gordon Duff; and "The Inventories of Edinburgh Printers, 1577-1603," by Mr. J. P. Edmond.

SIR HERBERT EUSTACE MAXWELL delivered his first Rhind Lecture in the rooms of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland on Monday of this week. His subject is "The Place-Names of Scotland."

MESSRS. SAMPSON LOW have now added to their cheap series of novels by William Black, Thomas Hardy, R. D. Blackmore, and W. Clark Russell, some of those of Dr. George MacDonald. The first is The Vicar's Daughter, which has for frontispiece an admirable portrait, reproduced by photogravure.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

A MEMORIAL has been addressed to the Hebdomadal Council at Oxford, in favour of providing a "research degree." The scheme proposes that the degree of B.A. may be conferred, without examination, on students who have resided for a certain period, and who have satisfied a board of faculty that the special work of research they have conducted has been such as to entitle them to a degree.

THE special board for medicine at Cambridge have presented a report, recommending that Mental Diseases should be specified in the regulations as one of the subjects on which questions shall invariably be proposed to candidates for the M.B. degree.

AT St. James's College, Cambridge, the following graduates of the college have been elected to fellowships: (1) the Rev. C. E. Graves, classical lecturer and late fellow; Porson prizeman, 1861, and second in the first class of the classical tripos in 1862. (2) The Rev. Dr. F. Watson, D.D., one of the theological lecturers, and formerly fellow; twelfth wrangler, 1868; Tyrwhitt scholar, 1871; Hulsean lecturer, 1882. (3) Mr. James Gibson, first class in both parts of the moral sciences tripos, 1890-91. (4) Mr. Ernest William MacBride, first class in both parts of the natural sciences tripos, 1890-91; university demonstrator in animal morphology. (5) Mr. Walter Coventry D. Summers, first division of first class, classical tripos, 1890; Craven scholar, 1890; Chancellor's medallist, 1892. The subject of Mr. Gibson's dissertation was "Locke's Theory of Knowledge"; that of Mr. MacBride's "The Development of Certain Organs of Amphiuira Squamata and Asterina Gibbosa"; and that of Mr. Summers's "Valerius Flaccus and his Argonautica."

THE Rev. R. B. Gardiner, of St. Paul's School, who edited, in 1889, the Registers of Wadham College from its foundation till 1719, has now in the press the second part of the same work, which will carry it on to 1871. It will be ready for issue to subscribers in the course of next year.

AT a meeting of graduates in divinity at Cambridge, to be held in the Divinity School on Monday next, Prof. J. E. B. Mayor will read a paper entitled "How to form Historical, Antiquarian, and Linguistic Collections."

AT a meeting of the Oxford Architectural and Historical Society, to be held in the Ashmolean Museum on Tuesday next, Mr. J. L. Myers, Craven fellow, will give an account of his recent visit to Greece, illustrated with lantern slides from views taken by himself.

MR. W. H. HADOW, on behalf of the professor of music, will deliver a public lecture at Oxford, in the Sheldonian Theatre, on Tuesday next, upon "Beethoven's Eroica Symphony."

MR. W. M. GELDART has been elected to the Derby Scholarship at Oxford, which is awarded every year to that recent graduate who has previously gained the largest number of university distinctions.

THE annual report of the delegacy of Non-collegiate students at Oxford embodies a review of the history of the working of the system during the past twenty-five years. The total number of such students has been 2279, of whom 508 have proceeded to the degree of B.A., not counting 1045 who have migrated to colleges or halls. The honours won comprise 20 first classes, of which 11 were in theology; and several university scholarships and prizes, again mostly in theology. The largest number of matriculations seems to have been in the period between 1877 and 1881. Attention is drawn to the fact that students are admitted without examination who show evidence of fitness for any special branch of study, but do not desire to pass through the Arts course. During the past year, 17 such students have been admitted. The most distinguished name on the list of Non-collegiate students is that of the Rev. Dr. James Drummond, M.A., principal of Manchester College.

MR. ELLIOT STOCK announces for immediate publication Llantwit Major: a Fifth Century University, by D. Alfred C. Fryer, in which an account is given of the earliest university founded in Wales. The work will be copiously illustrated.

MR. ARTHUR OGLE's essay on the Marquis d'Argenson, which won the Stanhope historical prize at Oxford this year, will be published next week by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin.

THE Union at Oxford has rejected a proposal to expend £7 in buying the works of M. Zola by the narrow majority of 261 to 223 votes.

MR. HENRY GADSBY has been appointed professor of instrumental music at Queen's College, Harley-street, in succession to the late Sir W. G. Cusins. Mr. Gadsby has hitherto been professor of harmony and class singing; he composed the music to the "Andromache," recently performed by the students.

THE Stuttgart publisher, Kohlhammer, has just issued a volume of about 230 pages entitled Festgruss an Rudolf von Roth, in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of the day on which Prof. von Roth took his doctor's degree (August 24, 1843). The book contains contributions, almost exclusively on Indian subjects, by forty-four Oriental scholars, who are friends and for the most part old pupils of the eminent Vedic scholar, the doyen of Sanskrit professors in Germany. Besides Germany, which is represented by nearly a score of professors of Sanskrit alone, there are contributors from America, Austria, England, Holland, Italy, Switzerland, and Russia. The list contains the names of Aufrecht, Bloomfield, Bühler, Delbrück, Jacobi, Kern, Kielhorn, Kuhn, Lanman, Ludwig, Nöldeke, Ostheff, Pischel, Johannes Schmidt, Sievers, Stein, Weber, Whitney, Windisch, Zimmer. The two English contributors are Edward V. Arnold and A. A. Macdonell.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE Expositor for November contains an essay by Mr. Rendall on the Pauline collection for the saints, and one of some difficulty by Mr. Cope Whitehouse (who controverts M. Naville's view) on the Land of Goshen. Dr. Bruce's interesting Pauline studies are continued. Dr. Macmillan on "Aaron's rod that budded," is, of course, purely homiletical; Prof. Findlay on 1 John i. 5-10 is a sounder exegete. Scholars will turn with interest to Part I. of Prof. Driver's reply to Prof. Marshall's defence of his now well-known discovery of the Aramaic Gospel. Has there not been rather too much discussion of a theory which needed more quiet maturing in the mind of its author?

THE Theologisch Tijdschrift for November is largely devoted to English literary productions. An article by Dr. Rovers describes at length Mr. F. P. Badham's hypotheses on the formation of the Gospels. Dr. A. Bruining reviews appreciatively enough Prof. Newman Smyth's "Christian Ethics," and B. G. van Heyst applauds the great learning and industry of Mr. Johnston's edition of St. Basil on the Holy Spirit. Among the books to which shorter notices are given are: Nos. 1-3 of Vol. II. of the Cambridge "Texts and Studies"; Charles's "Book of Enoch," Rendel Harris's article on "The Structure of the Gospel of Peter," Swete's "Gospel of St. Peter," Legge's article on the "Pistis Sophia" (in the Scottish Review), &c. Nor must we pass over Prof. Oort's discriminating review of Svend's important work on Old Testament religion, and a short paper by Prof. Wildeboer, giving a revised form of his corrected text of Psalm xvi. 1-4.

SELECTED FOREIGN BOOKS.

GENERAL LITERATURE.

- BRANDIS, G. Menschen u. Werke. Essays. Frankfurt a.-M.: Rütten. 10 M. 20 Pf.
CARL V. OSTERREICH. well. Erzherzog, ausgewählte Schriften. 3. Bd. Wien: Braumüller. 7 M. 50 Pf.
DELAVERGIERE, Eug. La France économique et l'armée. Paris: Charles-Lavausselle. 12 fr.
LAMAIRESSE, E. Le Bouddhisme en Chine et au Thibet. Paris: Caré. 4 fr.
LE ROY, Mgr. A. Au Kilima-Ndjaru, Afrique orientale. Paris: L. de Boye & Fils. 8 fr.
MARSON, F. Napoléon et les Femmes. I. Paris: Ollendorff. 7 fr. 50 c.
STUDIER, Münchener volkswirtschaftliche. Hrg. v. L. Brentano u. W. Lohs. 1.-3. Stück. Stuttgart: Cotta. 11 M.

HISTORY, LAW, ETC.

- BOSARD, Eugène. Questions Vendéennes: Cathelineau. Paris: Lamulle. 5 fr.
BUCHHOLZ, A. Beiträge zur Lebensgeschichte Johann Reinhold Patkule. Leipzig: Duncker & Humblot. 6 M.
CHUQUET, A. Les Guerres de la Révolution. 3e série. T. IX. Hoche et la Lutte pour l'Alsace. Paris: Cerf. 3 fr. 50 c.
CLERO, le Commandant. Campagne du Maréchal Soult dans les Pyrénées occidentales en 1813-1814. Paris: Baudouin. 9 fr.
CRAMER, R. Beiträge zur Geschichte Alexanders des Grossen. Rismach: Kahle. 1 M. 50 Pf.
DIECKMANN, G. Kulturbilder aus den Vereinigten Staaten. Berlin: Allg. Verein f. deutsche Litt. 6 M.
HARNERCKASSE. 7. Bd. 1266-1490. Leipzig: Duncker & Humblot. 22 M.
SAINT-AMAND, Imbert de. Marie-Amélie et l'apogée du règne de Louis-Philippe. Paris: Dentu. 3 fr. 50 c.
SCHRODER, E. A. Das Recht in der geschlechtlichen Ordnung. Berlin: Felber. 12 M.
SCHWARZ, F. v. Alexander des Grossen Feldzüge in Turkistan. München: Wolff. 6 M.
VICINI, L. Les Français à Rome pendant la Convention (1792-1796). Rome: Modes & Mendel. 35 fr.

PHYSICAL SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

- BISCHOFF, C. A. Handbuch der Stereochemie. Unter Mitwirk. v. P. Walden hrg. 1. Bd. Frankfurt a.-M.: Bechhold. 14 M.
DREIBACH, H. Die Biologie als selbständige Grundwissenschaft. Leipzig: Engelmann. 1 M. 20 Pf.
GÄRNER, Anleitung zur Spectralanalyse. Leipzig: Quandt. 2 M.
HAAKKE, W. Gestaltung u. Vererbung. Eine Entwicklungsgeschichte der Organismen. Leipzig: Weigel. 8 M.
HABERLANDT, G. E. botanische Tropenreise. Indomalayische Vegetationsbilder u. Reiseeskizzen. Leipzig: Engelmann. 8 M.
HEGEL, G. W. F. System der Sittlichkeit. Aus dem handschriftl. Nachlasse des Verf. hrg. v. G. Mollat. Osterweck: Zickfeldt. 2 M.
HORN, R. Der Causalitätsbegriff in der Philosophie u. im Strafrechte. Leipzig: Duncker & Humblot. 2 M.
VALLOIR, J. Annales de l'Observatoire Météorologique du Mont-Blanc. 1er Fasc. Paris: Steinheil. 10 fr.

PHILOLOGY, ETC.

- CORPUS inscriptionum semiticarum. Pars II. Inscriptiones aramaicas continens. T. m. fasc. 2. Paris: Klincksch. 50 fr.
PALLIOPPI, Z. e. E. Dizionario dei idiomi Romaunteche d'Engladin' ota e bassa. Faso. I. Basel: Geering. 5 M.
VARNHAAGEN, H. Ueb. die Fiori e vita di filosofi ed altri savvi ed imperadori. Nebst dem italien. Texte. Erlangen: Junge. 5 M.
ZONCHBAUER, F. Studien zu den Annalen d. Tacitus. Leipzig: Fock. 2 M.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE NORTH-PICTISH INSCRIPTIONS TRANSLATED AND EXPLAINED.

I.—The Newton Stone.

Bodleian Library, Oxford.

The Newton Stone is on the lawn of Newton House, a few miles from Inverurie, in Aberdeenshire: it originally stood "in a plantation near Shevack toll-bar, on the slope of a hill above Shevack Burn" (Lord Southesk, The Newton Stone, p. 6). It is of unhewn grey gneiss, 6½ feet high, and about 5½ feet in girth. And "it has two inscriptions—one in Ogam, and one in a script which is still harder to interpret" (Prof. Rhys in the Proceedings of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland, 1891-2, p. 280).

The Ogam is believed by Prof. Rhys to represent IDDAIQNNN (or Iddarhonn) VORRENN IPUA (or Ipoa) IOSIR.

Of the second inscription, which is in semi-Latin characters, he gives only the first two lines, which he transliterates EDDE (or Ette) KENUN VAVR. The remaining four lines he indicates by an "&c." According to Hübner (Inscr. Brit. Christianae, p. 78), Mill thought the letters Phoenician; Simonides, Greek; a certain Roman priest, Gaulish; Davis, Carthaginian; and Ceriani, Palmyrene; while "alii aliis gentibus linguisve adscripserunt." And, although even some of the most eminent Celtic scholars have propounded transcriptions and translations of them, they have remained to the present time an unsolved riddle.

A year or two ago Prof. Rhys showed me in the Bodleian a facsimile of these four lines; and in the brief time I was able to spare to look at them I made nothing of them. But having lately begged from him his copy of his paper on Pictish inscriptions, in order to revise for him at Golspie my previous unsatisfactory collation of the Golspie stone, and having found on p. 286 a woodcut facsimile of the second Newton inscription, I determined to try to make it out, and in a very short time read the last four lines into perfectly construable Latin. I have since examined five photographs of it, two of them attached by Lord Southesk to an off-print of his paper on the stone, and three which I have bought from a photographer at Inverurie, near Newton House; and the result has been merely to confirm my previous reading, except in two comparatively unimportant points. I now read the inscription in question as follows:

- (1) ÆTTÆ
- (2) ÆCNYN VAVR
- (3) 9 VONOBOTO
- (4) DN ✠ MÆLISI
- (5) VNGGI
- (6) NOVFACTVM

Now let us transcribe and translate:

- (1) ÆTTÆ
- (2) ÆCNYN VAVR
- (3) (CVM) VONO(= bono) BOTO(= voto)
- (4) D(OMI)N(I) ✠ MÆLISI
- (5) VNGGI
- (6) NOVFACTVM

i.e., "Place of the son of Nun the Great. With the good wish of Lord ✠ Mælisius, [and] of Unggus, newly made."

I have written the last line as one word on the analogy of novogestorum given by Du Cange from Eginus (ninth century) as = nove ac recens gestorum.

The only very serious doubts I have are these. In (2) c might turn out to be a g. In (4) I am not absolutely certain of D, and suspect SII at the end. But of these points, only the second is of any practical importance, and that of not much.

As my reading of (1) and (2) is very close both to Prof. Rhys's and to the Ogam on the same stone, I shall not waste space with palaeographical vindications of it; but, as regards the remaining four lines, it may save some objections if I do so. In (3), then, the first letter is the common sign for "cum," while v for b and b for v are frequent in mediaeval MSS. The v is like y (a known Irish shape). The n is minuscule, but with a tall first stroke, so that it looks like h. The b is the short-necked Irish minuscule. In (4) the d is the round Irish letter. The same n occurs again. The ✠ is swastika-shaped (as often in Christian monuments). The m looks at first sight like a round-headed croquet-hoop; but at least one photograph seems to show a ligature connecting it with the right limb of the ✠, in which case it would have the usual three upright strokes. The æ is an æ standing on part of an A, very much after the manner of the usual mediaeval abbreviation of that diphthong. In (5) the v (which I at first read as a broken A) is again y-shaped. The tag at the right-hand top of it is apparently the beginning of the first stroke of another minuscule n. The n can, however, be read as an uncial, and the mixture of uncial and minuscule forms of this letter in early Irish MSS. is common. The two g's are very much of the Visigothic shape. In (6) the n is once more like an h. The two v's are again y-shaped. The r has a curved back, and its head does not come out with equal clearness in all the photographs. The A is tall, and the part above the cross-bar is not at first detected. The OT are ligatured. The m again looks at first sight like a round-headed croquet-hoop; but it appears to be ligatured to the stem of the preceding letter, so that its shape would once more seem to be normal. The explanation of the use of ligatures and of the contraction for cum, together with the omission of a conjunction between Mælisi and Unggi (though such omission is perfectly good Latin), is probably to be found in the fact that (as my friend the Rev. Dr. Joass tells me) gneiss is an exceedingly hard stone to cut.

Who was Mælisius? I cannot be quite certain; for his name represents the common old Gaelic name Maelis or Maoliosa. But the cross before his name suggests an important ecclesiastic; and I think he was probably one of the two Mælisius's (the first for choice, to judge from the writing) who became bishops of Alban (Scotland), with S. Andrews for their cathedral seat. The first of them seems to have ruled c. 955-963 (Skene, Celtic Scotland, ii. 329); while the latter, and his immediate successor, are said by Gordon (Scotichronicon, i. 113) to have been bishops from 996 to 1025. But I find that it is under the year 1031 that the Cronicon Scotorum (Rolls ser.) tells us that "Maoliosa, Episcop Alban, quierit."

As for Unggus, "Ungus" is one of the names given to the Pictish king (otherwise called "Angus," &c.), who died in 761. As it was he who established the cult of S. Andrew, his name had double reason to be perpetuated, if indeed there is any perpetuation in the matter, and if Ungus was not an ordinary Pictish name.

We now proceed to inquire what was the inscription conveyed in (1) and (2) which was "newly made" with the good wishes of these two men, and why it was newly made.

The chances are 100 to 1 that the inscription ÆTTÆ ÆCNYN VAVR contains a proper name? Is Ette that name? Probably not, because, of the other ten stones referred to in Prof. Rhys's paper (p. 304) as being more or less Pictish in language, no fewer than seven contain a very similar word—so that ette is pretty clearly part of a formula. Again, we find that VAVR has vor(r) corresponding to it in the Ogams on the same stone, and that either vor or uorr occurs on three of the other ten stones, while on a fourth mor occurs. Now, the Scottish Gaelic for "great" is mor; the chieftain of a district was called its mormaer, "great man" (Book of Deer, lxxviii., &c.); the head of Clan Catty (Sutherland) is called Morphear ("great man") Chatt (see the obelisk on Golspie bridge); and the head of the Campbells is known as Mac Callum Mor. Again, the Scottish Gaelic genitive masculine of morismhor, pronounced vor. So that, if the lines (1) and (2) be in Scottish Gaelic, VAVR looks like an adjective in the genitive agreeing with ÆCNUN and governed by a substantive ÆTTÆ. As for the difference of vowel between vaur and vor(r), the O. Irish nom. is már as well as mor, and in Welsh it is mawr (= maur), or, when mutated, vaur (= vaur).

What Gaelic substantive would correspond to it? Dr. Joass suggests aite, a place (masculine). I point out that some of the inscriptions give eh or similar forms, and I ask how he explains the h; he replies that the actual pronunciation is ahte. This suggestion I feel sure is correct.

In the Ogam inscription on this stone we have the word apparently as Aidd*

(AIDDAIQNNVOR = ÆTTÆ ÆCNVNVAVR.)

In the other seven Pictish inscriptions it occurs twice as edd, twice as elt, once as eh, once as ehht, once as ehht, and once as eh.

Now, we get from Irish a large amount of confirmation for this variety of dialect. I say "of dialect" because our inscriptions range from Fife to Shetland, and they may, in addition, cover a period of several centuries: to expect absolute graphic or even phonetic uniformity in them would be absurd. In Irish, then, O'Reilly gives aite as a feminine substantive meaning "a place," "stead," and aite as another feminine substantive meaning 'locality.' Windisch in his Irische Texte gives instances of both aite and aite (the difference may be merely graphic). He also gives aite with the borrowed interpretations "cundach" (?roof, ?enclosure) and "aiede ædificium"; and he gives an instance of aide as the nom. sing. of this, and another of aite as the acc. pl.

As for the interchange of ai and e, I refer to Zeuss, Gramm. Celt., p. 30, for instances of e being written for ai. As for the interchange of ai and e, I refer to p. 5—but the instances there are of "infected" short a, not of the pure diphthong, and the a in aite is given as long in the Highland Society's Dictionary—and to p. 6 "vice versa . . . ai scripta est . . . interdum pro e originaria." As for the interchange of d, dd, t, tt, I refer to p. 70, "codex Sg. . . geminationem mediarum adhibet protenuibus originariis, praesertim DD pro T," and to O'Donovan's Irish Grammar, p. 28, "in the ancient manuscripts all the consonants are doubled ad libitum."

On testing ÆCNVN as a Gaelic word, we find that ÆC is doubtless the gen. of ac, "son," so that it = "son of Nun."

I pass to the Ogams on this stone. They begin AIDDAIQNNVORN, i.e., Aidd Aiq Nnn Vor, "Place of son of Nun [the] Great." They go on RENNIPUAROSIR, "in front of [the] district Place of Laughter." Here renn = Irish ren, "before"; ip = Irish ibh, and both ua and rosir are identical with Irish words. We shall find ip again in the Drosten stone; the Irish ibh postulates earlier ib, and the Highlander's tendency to sound b as p is well known. With "Place of Laughter" cf. such Irish names as those mentioned by Joyce (Irish Names of Places, p. 203) as meaning "Merry-town,"

* The first Ogam has apparently six strokes according to Lord Southesk, though the first is "doubtful, owing to a crack in the stone." So I read a (1) + i (5).

"Hill of the Joking," "Hill of the Shouting or Laughter."

Let me now say what this stone is, and what the other stones are (with one possible exception) which contain forms of the word aidd or eh. They are not tombstones at all, as everybody seems to have supposed, but march-stones. That this is true of the Golspie stone, and that it was used to distinguish from each other a kirkyard on one side and a particular man's property on the other, I shall make as clear as daylight in my next letter. Indeed, of all the eleven stones mentioned by Prof. Rhys on p. 304 of his paper, only two will be found to have any certain sepulchral connexion, and neither of those contains the word "eh."

It may be asked, why most of these stones are found in kirkyards or in the ruins of old kirks, if they are not sepulchral. The reason is that the march-stone of a kirkyard stood far better chances of preservation than a march-stone in the fields. The boundaries of secular estates were liable to alter greatly, those of kirkyards little, if at all. If they did alter, they left the march-stones behind them in among the tombstones; and the stones, if they were disturbed at all after that, perhaps only got built into a kirkyard-wall or into the fabric of a new kirk, and so got preserved in another way.

But why should not this word eh (= place) mean "burial-place"? There are two reasons. The first is, that the Drosten stone appears to distinguish the "ett" of Forcus from property belonging to a church or monastery of S. Drostan. The second is, that the edd in the Golspie stone actually has a (Norse) name given it, and that, if edd means "burial-place" in that case, the kirkyard of Kilmaly must originally have been the private burial-place of a man named McNu, who lived at least as late as the tenth century. And this is practically incredible.

That stone crosses, or stones marked with crosses, were used as boundaries of church-lands and jurisdictions, and "even to divide mere crofts of land" is already known (Stuart's Sculptured Stones of Scotland i., p. xi., and authorities there cited). On plate lxxvii. of Stuart's second vol. may be seen a representation of such a stone near Whithorn in Wigtonshire (a district once tenanted by Picts) with the words Loci Petri Apostoli on it: and of locus aidd or eh are the equivalents. And without going right through Stuart's book I will just mention two instances of the ecclesiastical use of such stones. On plate xvii. of vol. i. he figures three crosses which (together with another now lost sight of) are said to have been "originally placed to indicate the limits of the sanctuary or girth of the monastery" (p. ii.), and on plate xxxiv. he figures a cross which stands in a graveyard, and adds (p. 23) "Near to it is a fragment of another cross, and in the neighbouring fields are two small crosses of a peculiar type, said to have been two of three crosses which marked the limits of the sanctuary."

The Newton Stone, then, was originally a march-stone of the "place of [the] son of Nun [the] Great in front of [the] district Place of Laughter," and was inscribed in Ogams only. A time came when the occupier of this stead thought it desirable to have its independence acknowledged by the lords of the neighbouring church-lands, and so he obtained a confirmation "newly made" by them, which repeated in Latin letters the words "place of [the] son of Nun [the] Great." It was needless to repeat the name of the district; so that was not added. But a postscript in the language of the church was added signifying that this confirmation was made with the good will of (bishop?) Maelisius, and of Unggus—possibly the "mormaer" of the entire region, the priest of the neighbouring kirk, or the head of the neighbouring monastery.

And, as an indication that the stone may have been used to mark off Ac Nun's lands from others belonging to the diocese of S. Andrews, it is worth adding that the original position of the stone was near to Old Rayne, and that at Rayne there was a church of S. Andrew at least as early as 1178 (Maidland Club, Reg. Aberdonense, I, p. 10), though whether at Old Rayne or at Kirktown of Rayne 2½ miles distant (where the present parish-kirk is) I cannot tell.

There are two questions which might conceivably be raised into which I have not as yet entered. Is it certain that the Latin inscription was cut by the same hand which cut the two lines of Gaelic above it? And, if not, is it certain that VAVR at the end of the second Gaelic line was not added by the second hand? At present I cannot make sure about either of these points. But neither is of consequence. If Maelisius and Unggus did not originally cut the second inscription, it was enough for them to recut it or add the word VAVR: this would give confirmation and justify the expression "novofactum." On the other hand, the different manner in which the same words are represented (whether it be of phonetic origin or merely graphic) makes it unlikely that those two Gaelic lines were cut by the same hand which had cut the Ogams.

So much for the Newton Stone. In my next letters I shall give a simple, consistent, and grammatical explanation of the ten other stones furnishing inscriptions which, in the words of the distinguished Celtic scholar who has taken so much trouble to give accurate readings of the Ogams on them, "appear to be for certain more or less Pictish in point of language." E. W. B. NICHOLSON.

P.S.—I am now satisfied that the three ai's in the two lines of Gaelic are minuscules (though the loops of the e's were very hard to discover). This makes it probable that another hand cut the majuscule Æ in the Latin lines lower down: i.e., that the two Gaelic lines are of earlier date than the Latin ones. Note that in the latter the names come under each other, like those of witnesses in a charter.

The inscription probably faced Ac Nun's property, while the Place of Laughter was on the other side of the stone.

WAS LINDUM A COLONIA?

Christ Church, Oxford: Oct. 29, 1893.

An inscription, found at Lincoln in 1859 and preserved in the British Museum, may help to answer this question. The inscription is a sepulchral one, and to this effect: "D. M. Volusia Faustina c(ivis) Lind(ensis) v(ixit) ann(os) xxvi, m(ensem) i, d(ies) xxvi. Aur(elius) Senecio dec(urio) ob merita c(oniugi) p(osuit)." The mention of a decurio and a civis Lindensis proves fairly clearly that Lindum was either municipium or colonia, and the Ravenna list decides in favour of colonia. The town, then, could have the name colonia Lindum quite naturally, probably with the addition of one or two epithets taken from the name of the emperor reigning when it received colonial rights. It does not follow, of course, that Lindcelyne and Lincoln are derived from "Lindum colonia"; but, as the derivation seems to be philologically sound, it has a strong case. It is unusual, no doubt, for the name and title of a town thus to coalesce into one modern name, and the title and name are certainly placed in an unusual order; but I see no further difficulty. Mr. Round's remarks about "double-barrelled names" (p. 369) seem based on a misconception of the way in which the Romans named their towns.

F. HAVERFIELD.

Ashmolean Museum, Oxford: Oct. 31, 1893.

The question "Was Lincoln a Colonia?" will have been answered affirmatively by Mr. Haverfield on epigraphic evidence. That Lindkylne or Lindocolina may, through British mediation, be derived from Lindum Colonia has, indeed, been allowed by Mr. Henry Bradley. But the last element of the name raises an interesting question, which has never, so far as I am aware, been really grappled with. If the "Coln" of Lincoln, like the Rhenish Köln, is undoubtedly derived from Colonia; if the first element in Colchester may be reasonably connected with the Colonia Camulodunum, how does this fit in with the wider use of "Colne" as a river-name that has been referred to by your correspondents?

In this connexion, perhaps I may be allowed to call attention to a distinct class of river-names that derive their origin from Roman settlements. The general tendency of inquiries regarding river-names is to claim for them a very ancient origin; and no doubt in a great number of instances they have preserved through historic times the names attached to them by earlier occupants of the land. But there is a special class of river-names scattered throughout the former limits of the Roman Empire which have taken their rise from a very different source. In these cases the old indigenous name has disappeared, and a new one has been taken over from the Roman Municipium through whose Ager the river ran.

I will take a few examples of the operation of this law, almost at random. The Illyrian river Genusus flowed through the Ager of the Roman city of Scampa. Its old name has been forgotten, and it has become the Skumbi. A Moesian river which fell into the Lower Danube, after running through the Ager of Augustae, has become the Ogustal or Ogust, which simply represents the Rouman form of the Roman civic name. So the Dacian Ampelum—which seems to owe its name to Ἀμπελος—has lived on in the Transylvanian river Omboly. But, to return to Britain. The town Cunetio seems naturally to connect itself with the group of Celtic personal names beginning with Cuno. There is neither proof nor probability that there was in ancient Britain any parallel river-form. But Cunetio has given us the Kennet which ran through its district. The name of Gobannium is associated with fire rather than water, yet the Gavenny of Abergavenny is derived from it. Corinium has produced the Churn; Danum probably the Don, and not the converse.

Now for the bearing of this class of river-names on our numerous Colnes. It is obvious that, if the town through whose Ager a river ran was known as a Colonia, the taking over of the civic title by the river would only follow a well-established practice. The Colne of Colchester, like the name Colchester itself, is sufficiently accounted for. But, although strict official usage might confine the name Colonia to the four cities of Eburacum, Camulodunum, Glevum, and Lindum, it must be remembered that in dealing with local names we have to consider not what may have been the official rank of individual cities, but what title they bore in popular language. When then we find a second Colne flowing through the Ager of Verulamium, and a third through that of Corinium, we are justified in inferring that, at least in Romano-British mouths, those cities were given the title of Colonia. The name may then have got a wide popular usage, and have been applied to places which had not even the rank of a Municipium. The Colne of Huddersfield runs through the territory of Cambodunum, itself an unimportant town; on the other hand the parish of Colney, which points to an alternative name for the Yare, may owe its name to Venta Icenorum. Nor is this taking over of the name Colonia by local streams confined to Britain. The small river which joins the Somme at Péronne, and which, no doubt, watered the fields of its Roman predecessor, is called the Cologne.

ARTHUR J. EVANS.

THE ESKIMO MIGRATION.

Settlington Rectory, York: Nov. 6, 1893.

In his valuable review of Nansen's Eskimo Life, Dr. Brown has discussed the moot point of the route of the Eskimo migration. He substantially agrees with the Rink theory, that they are not an Asiatic race which crossed Bering Strait, and worked their way along the coast of Arctic America to Greenland; but he maintains that they probably originated in Alaska, the Eskimo of Siberia being emigrants from America.

In such a question, the origin of culture words is of great importance. Dr. Brown admits the bearing of the kayak on the question, but he does not deal with the arguments tending to show that the kayak is of Asiatic and not of American origin. At all events, it seems a curious coincidence that the little skiff which skims the waters of the Bosphorus is called a kayik, or in the French spelling a caïque, a word apparently identical with the Eskimo kayak. This kayik is a genuine Turkic word, which must have been the property of the undivided Turkic race in their primitive seat in the neighbourhood of Lake Baikal, prior to the great separation which took the Seljuks westward to the Bosphorus, and the Yakuts northward down the Lena to the shores of the Arctic Ocean. We find the word among the Turkic tribes of the Khanates—kayak, for instance, meaning a ship in the Tshagatai of Khiva—and the Yakuts also took it with them in their northward migration, kayik meaning a keeled boat in Yakut. The probability seems to be that the kayak, denoting etymologically a canoe of "birch bark," originated on the shores of Lake Baikal, and that the Eskimo at the mouth of the Lena borrowed the invention and its name from the Yakuts, and took it with them in their migration across Bering Strait to the shores of Greenland.

Other culture words tend to the same conclusion. The Eskimo sabbi, a smith, seems to be related to the Finnic seppa, a smith, a word which may be traced in Samoyed and Mongol; and the affinities of the Eskimo umiak are apparently Finnic and Lappic.

ISAAC TAYLOR.

"TO FAKE."

London: Nov. 4, 1893.

I have no wish to prolong a controversy which seems to have arisen out of misconceptions; and I may hint that Mr. Jacobs possibly attributes to myself certain criticisms of his works which I did not write, and have not even read. Such misattributions, at all events, are a common result of our system of anonymous reviewing.

But I am really curious on an etymological point: what is the origin and exact meaning of the word "fake"? Mr. Howells, it appears, uses it in the sense of "to alter, to decorate," more or less meretriciously, as if one were to say that a person "made up," dyed and rouged, was "faked." Thus, in converting a Scotch tale or ballad into English, if anyone changes "nicht, nought, nothing" into "nix," so far, in Mr. Howells's sense, that is altering or "faking." The conjunction of "nix" and "fake" almost inevitably suggests the ancient refrain, "Nix my dolly, pals, fake away." I am really sorry that this hint, purely frivolous, vexed Mr. Jacobs. But what the meaning of the refrain may be, why "nix," and what "dolly" has to do with it, or in what sense "fake" is here to be construed, I am ignorant. One has read, in Oliver Twist or elsewhere, of "faking a cly," which I conceive to be synonymous with "prigging a wipe"; but, if so, here "fake" does not mean to alter, or decorate, or "make up," but to appropriate. To a patriotic Scot, the appropriation of a Scotch tale by a Southron seems "faking" in one sense; and expurgations, alterations, changes of words, seem "faking" in another sense. From the other side of the Border those performances may be regarded as the assertion of an ancient claim, which may go back to the Treaty of Falaise. However, these differences of opinion may be dropped, and the real meaning and origin of "fake" seem a less contentious topic.

A. LANG.

"ALUMNI CANTABRIGIENSES, 1443-1893."

Heathall, Melbourn-grove, Champion Hill,
S.E.: Nov. 6, 1893.

I shall be grateful to your readers for any information respecting our Cambridge men, likely to prove useful for the purpose of annotating this magnum opus. The clergy may be especially helpful with particulars of the university career, the dates of institution, induction, death, burial, &c., of their predecessors in their respective livings, and with extracts from parish registers and monumental inscriptions relating to the same or to any other Cambridge men. From the admission registers and other records of our great public and grammar schools, as well as from private genealogies and family notes, much help can also be afforded.

I am at present more particularly engaged in annotating the names of Christ's, St. John's, Sidney, Pembroke, Peterhouse, and Magdalene men; but I am equally interested in those of the other colleges, which will be dealt with in due course.

W. J. HARVEY.

SIZARSHIPS AT CAMBRIDGE.

St. John's College, Cambridge: Nov. 7, 1893.

IN the ACADEMY for November 4, it is inferred from the list of Matriculations in the University Reporter that there are only three colleges in Cambridge where sizarships are still retained. As one of the tutors of St. John's College, which is not mentioned as one of the three, I may be allowed to point out that this statement is incomplete. At St. John's nearly twenty sizarships are elected in each year, two by the results of the Cambridge Senior Local Examinations, and the rest by the Entrance Scholarship Examination early in December, and the Sizarship Examination at Michaelmas. But, in the Matriculation List, they are no longer entered as sizarships, the University having, for some years past, abolished the distinction between pensioners and sizarships (so far as the University is concerned) by requiring the same matriculation fee of £5 from all undergraduates, except noblemen and fellow-commoners.

J. E. SANDYS.

APPOINTMENTS FOR NEXT WEEK.

SUNDAY, NOV. 13, 4 p.m. Sunday Lecture: "Egypt under the Pharaohs," by Mr. Gerard Smith.
4 p.m. South Place Institute: "Wood Engraving," by Mr. H. Croesfeld.
7.30 p.m. Ethical: "Justice" I., by Mr. W. M. Salter.
MONDAY, NOV. 13, 5 p.m. London Institution: "Recent Researches on the Sun," by Sir Robert S. Ball.
8 p.m. Royal Academy: Demonstration, "The Surfaces Form of the Living Model—The Lower Extremity," II., by Prof. W. Anderson.
8 p.m. Library Association: "Mechanical Appliances for Catalogues and Indexes," by Mr. J. Duff Brown; "District Library Associations and their Uses," by Mr. J. T. Radford.

8.30 p.m. Geographical: "Geographical Desiderata; or, Exploring Work to be done, and Geographical Problems to be solved," by Mr. Clements R. Markham.

TUESDAY, Nov. 14, 4 p.m. Asiatic: "Tours, Archaeological and Topographical, in and about Kashmir," by Dr. Aurel Stein.

6 p.m. London Institution: "The Principles of Commercial Geography applied to the British Empire," VII., by Dr. H. E. Mill.

8 p.m. Colonial Institute: "State Socialism and Labour Government in Antipodean Britain," by the Earl of Onslow.

8 p.m. Civil Engineers: Address by the President; Presentation of Medals, Premiums, and Prizes.

8.30 p.m. Anthropological: "The Relation of the Palaeolithic to the Neolithic Period," by Prof. Boyd Dawkins; "The Flint Implements of the Chalk Plateau of Kent," by Mr. A. M. Bell.

WEDNESDAY, Nov. 15, 8 p.m. Folk-Lore: "Indian Village Festivals," by Mr. F. Fawcett; "Some Recent Utterances of Prof. Newell and Mr. Jacobs," by Mr. Alfred Nutt.

8 p.m. Microscopical: "New British Freshwater Algae," by Mr. W. West; "The Value of Aperture in Microscopical Research," by Mr. T. F. Smith; "A Parasitic Disease in Flounders," by Mr. G. Sandeman.

8 p.m. Meteorological: "The Great Drought of 1893 and its attendant Meteorological Phenomena," by Mr. Frederick J. Brodie; "Thunder and Hall Storms over England and the South of Scotland on July 8, 1891," by Mr. William Marriott.

8 p.m. Society of Arts: Opening Address, by Sir Richard H. Webster, Chairman of Council.

THURSDAY, Nov. 16, 6 p.m. London Institution: "The Women of Ancient Greece," by Mr. F. Byron Jevons.

8 p.m. Chemical: "The Normal Butyl, Heptyl, and Octyl Esters of Active Glyceric Acid," and "The Ethereal Salts of Diacetyl-Glyceric Acid in their relation to Optical Activity," by Prof. Percy Frankland and Mr. John McGregor.

8 p.m. Royal Academy: Demonstration, "The Surface Forms of the Living Model—The Head and Neck," by Prof. W. Anderson.

8 p.m. Linnean: "Origin of Plant-Structure through Self-adaptation to the Environment, exemplified by Desert and Xerophilous Plants," by the Rev. G. Henslow; "Catalogue of the described Neuroptera Odonata (Dragonflies) of Ceylon, with Descriptions of New Species," by Mr. W. F. Kirby.

8.30 p.m. Historical: "The Shooting of Lucas and Lisle on the Surrender of Colchester (1649)," by Mr. J. Horace Round.

FRIDAY, Nov. 17, 7.30 p.m. Civil Engineers: Students' Meeting. "The Filtration of Potable Waters," by Messrs. J. and R. Goodman.

SCIENCE.

THE JOURNAL OF PHILOLOGY.

THE current number of the Journal of Philology (Macmillans) again shows the present trend of classical scholarship in this country towards a fresh examination of MS. authorities; while our American cousins continue to deal mainly with questions of grammar and etymology.

Perhaps the most original paper is that of Mr. Chr. Brennan—a name new to us—upon the MSS. of Aeschylus. He maintains, with much learning and ingenuity, that the Codex Mediceus does not deserve the supreme position that has hitherto been accorded to it, of being the original of all the others now in existence. He allows that it is by far the best authority, but he claims that there are passages where the readings of other families of MSS. require to be considered. His conclusions as to the genealogy of the existing MSS. are so important, that they must be quoted in his own words:

"At some time during the tenth century there was brought to Byzantium a MS., written in uncial characters, and containing the seven tragedies of Aeschylus in the following order: Persae, Agamemnon, Choephoroi, Prometheus, Eumenides, Septem adversus Thebas, Supplices. The MS. consisted of 374 pages, of which the first and last according to custom, the 264th and 265th owing to accident, were left blank, the remaining pages containing each twenty-one verses. Of this MS. two copies were made, of neither of which can the priority be determined: one of these copies now exists in the Laurentian Library at Florence, of the other a copy survives in the Library of St. Mark at Venice. At a later date, leaves 133 and 134 of the archetype were lost, with the result that, in a copy made after that loss, verses 585-647 of the Eumenides were missing. This copy no longer survives; but three MSS. derived from it are still in existence—one in the Laurentian Library, another in the Library of St. Mark, the third in the Farnese Library at Naples—in all of which the said verses are wanting. Of these, the last MS. has been throughout most audaciously corrected and interpolated. The latter MSS. are copied, either from any one of these three sources (chiefly from the Mediceus), or from them altogether, as in the case of the later copies of the Persae, Prometheus, and Septem adversus Thebas. The MS. used by Robertello for his edition of 1552, now lost, was a copy of the Mediceus, but contained annotations from some source which I am unable to determine."

Mr. A. E. Housman concludes his elaborate examination of the MSS. of Propertius, in support of his eclectic theory that the seven codices, N A F D V y v, are independent authorities, each of which must be employed if we would reconstruct the archetype; but that all the rest may be rejected, as exhibiting no element of genuine tradition not possessed by one or other of the former set. Prof. Postgate discusses the new material recently brought forward for enlarging our critical apparatus for the last book of Ovid's Metamorphoses, for which the three best authorities desert us. He himself provides a collation of some of these: a paper codex, perhaps of the thirteenth century, in the University Library at Basle; and three, of the twelfth and thirteenth century, in the British Museum.

Next in interest we should place a public lecture on "The Prosody of Mico the Levite," which was delivered last year at Oxford by Mr. Robinson Ellis. Mico was a teacher of boys in an abbey in Picardy about the middle of the ninth century, who formed a collection of lines from the Latin poets that he was acquainted with, in order to satisfy himself upon doubtful questions of quantity. This collection was so popular that several copies of it are in existence. One of these, at Brussels, has been collated by Mr. Ellis, and forms the basis of a critical edition by Traube, recently published in Dümmler's "Poetae Latini Aevi Carolini." The list of authors cited by Mico is of interest, not only as showing what Latin poets, classical and Christian, were read in the ninth century, but also as occasionally suggesting new readings. Sometimes the authors are wrongly assigned. Lucretius is quoted thirteen times; but Catullus, Tibullus, and Propertius are altogether absent. Mr. Robinson Ellis further contributes some critical notes on Euripides, Propertius, and Ennius.

Two papers of a similar character may be mentioned together. We have a second instalment of Scaliger's unpublished emendations in Nonius, the copying out of which was the very last work done by the late Henry Nettleship, in the early stages of his fatal illness; and a first instalment, by Mr. Arthur Platt, of Bentley's notes on the Odyssey, written in the margin of his copy of Stephanus' Poetae Graeci. They consist of restorations of the digamma and other conjectures, references to Eustathius, Hesychius, &c., with many corrections of Hesychius and readings from five Harleian MSS. Many of these notes of Bentley have not been published before.

Finally, Mr. W. M. Lindsay concludes his paper on the shortening of long syllables in Plautus, laying down the two following rules:—

"1. That no syllable was shortened in the metre of the dramatists, which was not shortened (partially or completely) in the ordinary pronunciation of their time.

"2. That a naturally long vowel was never shortened by the law of Breves Breviantes, unless in a final syllable."

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE S-PLURALS IN ENGLISH.

Oxford: October 30, 1893.

In his review of Mr. Clark's Manual of Linguistics in the last number of the ACADEMY (p. 371), Prof. Strong appears to me to over-estimate the Norman-French influence, in believing that "it helped to settle the plural form s (of the substantive) as the characteristic English plural instead of en": in other words, that, in a supposed struggle between the s-plurals and the en-plurals, it was French influence, thrown into the scale of the former, which helped to decide the day. Without going into the details of the question, I should like to point out one or two facts which seem to me to show conclusively that this generalisation of the use of s (itself the normal ending of the nominative and accusative plural of the masculine a-stems) is not due in the very slightest degree to the influence of Norman-French.

In the first place, the en-ending never had any chance of becoming the common English plural inflexion. It is true that we find en-forms very frequently used in Early Middle English, not only in the case of nouns really belonging to the n-declension, but also in the case of nouns which were originally vowel stems. But this is a purely Southern peculiarity which arose after the Conquest, and, like other Southern peculiarities (voicing of the initial f; the th-ending of the plural of the present tense, &c.), would naturally be absent from Modern Standard English. In the East Midland dialect, the parent of the modern language, there was no tendency on the part of the n-stems to encroach on the s-plural of the a-declension. On the contrary, we find the s-ending becoming more and more predominant. In the contemporary Peterborough Chronicle for the years 1122-31, the dialect is East Midland influenced by West Saxon; we find it rapidly supplanting the other inflexions—it is already the commonest ending, even in the case of the old n-stems—while in the Ormulum (written about 1200: dialect, East Midland) -es has become, with a few trifling exceptions, the normal plural ending of all nouns. Both these works may be said to be free from Romance influence. Even the latter writer, Orm, in over 20,000 lines (as printed), only uses some eight Romance words, and we possess no evidence at all that he was even acquainted with Norman-French.

If, then, we find that, in the dialect from which our present literary speech is derived, the s-plurals had already gained the day, at a period when, from the evidence of written documents, it was still unaffected by Norman-French influence, it is surely most reasonable to regard the development as a purely English one, in which foreign influence played no part whatever.

The French influence on the vocabulary was, in the earliest Middle English, most strongly marked in the South; and it is there, if anywhere, that we should look for evidence of an influence on the inflexions, supposing such influence to have existed. And yet it is there that we find the en-plurals. It should, moreover, be borne in mind that at this period (twelfth century) the s-ending was not yet the universal plural inflexion in French, the nominative plural of masculine nouns being still formed without an s. It is time that this ancient but baseless superstition concerning the French influence on our thoroughly English plural ending should be finally banished from books on the history of our language.

A. S. NAPIER.

SCIENCE NOTES.

THE following is a list of those who have been recommended by the president and council of the Royal Society for election at the anniversary meeting to be held on November 30:—president, Lord Kelvin; treasurer, Sir John Evans; secretaries, Prof. Michael Foster, Lord Rayleigh; foreign secretary, Sir Joseph Lister; council, Prof. Isaac B. Balfour, Andrew A. Common, Andrew R. Forsyth, Richard T. Glazebrook, Prof. Alexander H.

Green, Sir John Kirk, Prof. Oliver J. Lodge, Sir John Lubbock, William D. Niven, William H. Perkin, the Marquis of Salisbury, Prof. J. S. Burdon Sanderson, Adam Sedgwick, Prof. Thomas E. Thorpe, Prof. William A. Tilden, and Prof. W. Cawthorne Unwin.

At the monthly general meeting of the Royal Institution, held on Monday last, the managers reported that they had elected Mr. Charles Stewart to be Fullerian professor of physiology for three years (the appointment dating from January 13, 1894). Special thanks were accorded to Lord Armstrong for his donation of £100, towards the fund for the promotion of experimental research at low temperatures.

The first meeting of the new session of the Anthropological Institute will be held on Tuesday next, at Hanover-square, under the presidency of Prof. A. Macalister, of Cambridge. Prof. Boyd Dawkins will read a paper on "The Relation of the Palaeolithic to the Neolithic Period," and will exhibit series of specimens illustrating the manufacture of flint implements from Cissbury, palaeolithic implements found in one stratum in the caves of Cresswell Crag, and stone implements from Trenton, New Jersey; a paper on "The Flint Implements of the Chalk Plateau of Kent," will also be read by Mr. A. M. Bell. Among the communications promised for future meetings, we may mention: "The Northern Settlements of the West Saxons," by Dr. John Beddoe; "The Ainu of Japan," by Mr. A. H. Savage Landor; and "The Aborigines of North-West Australia," by Mr. P. W. Bassett Smith.

In Nature for November 2, there are three articles of general interest: a summary of recent work in ornithology, by Dr. R. Bowdler Sharpe; a biographical notice of Henry Oldenburg, the first secretary of the Royal Society, by Mr. Herbert Rix; and a preliminary report on the natural history of East Equatorial Africa, by Mr. J. W. Gregory. From the last we quote—

"The evidence collected proves the existence of a former race of men who used obsidian implements, and who lived in a period long prior to any existing tribes; and, also, that the glaciers on Mount Kenia once extended several thousand feet further down the mountain than at present: in fact, a regular sheet or cap glaciation preceded the existing valley glaciation."

Concerning the she-oak (Casuarina), which occurs on the end of exposed promontories along the coast, Mr. Gregory remarks that "these have doubtless grown from cones carried by currents from Australia, just as the Krakatau pumice, which now forms banks along the shore, has floated from Malaysia."

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

At the meeting of the Royal Asiatic Society, on Tuesday next, Dr. M. Aurel Stein—principal of the Lahore university, and editor of the scholarly edition of the Chronicles of the Kings of Kashmir—will read a paper entitled "Tours, Archaeological and Topographical, in and about Kashmir."

WE have received a supplement to the Pandit—the organ of the Government Sanskrit College at Benares—containing a paper by Prof. Arthur Venis, on a copper-plate grant recently found in that neighbourhood. Its historical importance arises from the fact that it supplies three new names of kings of the Pala dynasty, which reigned in Northern Bengal before the Mohammadan conquest. The actual date cannot be clearly made out; but Prof. Venis assigns it on external evidence to 1142 A.D. The Palas are generally supposed to have been Buddhists, but here they are described as being worshippers of both Vishnu and Siva. A further interest of the grant is that it gives a line of three hereditary ministers of the Pala kings, the last of whom made conquests in Kamrup (or Assam), and seems to have won the position of a dependent monarch. But we are puzzled to understand why a grant of land in Kamrup should be found in the neighbourhood of Benares. Prof. Venis prints the original Sanskrit, with a translation, and a facsimile of one or two lines. His introduction and notes show that there are English scholars in India fully capable of contributing to Epigraphia Indica.

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

HELLENIC SOCIETY.—(Monday, Oct. 16.)

PROF. PERCY GARDNER in the chair.—The chairman announced that an extra meeting of the society would be held on November 27, when Mr. Arthur Evans would read a paper on "A Mykenae Measure"; and that Prof. Jebb, president of the society, had been nominated by the council as member of the committee which was to be formed in connexion with the University Extension Society for the promotion of the study of Greek.—A paper was read by Mr. A. G. Bather, on "Acropolis Bronzes." Mr. Bather, in his paper, which was illustrated with a number of photographs, explained that the bronzes which he had examined were by no means all that had been found on the Acropolis. At the beginning of the excavation the Greek Government selected those remains which appeared to be of the greatest value, and placed them in the larger Acropolis museum. The rest were packed into several boxes and stored in the smaller museum. It was these latter which he had examined. The bronzes might be divided into two main classes—those of the geometric and those of the so-called Oriental school. The forms did not vary greatly from those which had been found at Olympia. There were fragments of bowls of every shape, which were probably dedicatory gifts to Athens. There was excellent sixth century work. A satyr's head and a sphinx were found, and many animal forms. The influence was discernible of the Aeginetan school, which was of very early date. Among the animals were a stag and a lion, sheep, owls, cocks, crows, horses, and snakes. In most of the animal figures there was no attempt at naturalism—all was strictly conventional. Bronze relief did not make its appearance before the introduction of an Eastern school. When the two schools—the geometrical and the Oriental—came side by side, each exercised a marked influence on the other. The geometric patterns lost their stiffness, and the Oriental work was improved by the introduction of geometric lines. Among the bronze reliefs was a fragment of a Phoenician or probably rather a Cypriot bowl, on which were two sphinxes confronting each other and a tree—the latter being essentially of an Asiatic character—also the hawk and horns, and also a smaller sphinx. Valuable fragments had also been discovered at Eleutherae. Mr. Bather explained in detail the characteristics of the principal bronzes and fragments which he had examined.—A discussion followed.

FINE ART.

THE SOCIETY OF SCOTTISH ARTISTS.

ON its establishment, a couple of years ago, the Society of Scottish Artists set before itself two main aims in the exhibitions for the production of which it was organised. These were, to place on view in an adequate manner the works of the younger extra-academic painters of Scotland; and to bring together such collections representative of the great art of the past and the present as should stimulate and instruct both Scottish art-workers and the Scottish public generally.

There was ample room for the fulfilment of both aims; and both have been well kept in view in the second exhibition of the Society, which is at present open in the National Galleries, Edinburgh. Its loan collection is rich and full of interest. Special attention has been given to the recent art of France and Holland; the collection of Mr. J. S. Forbes, in particular, having been very liberally made available. Diaz is represented by four examples, including a richly coloured, firmly touched forest scene; seven landscapes on the walls bear the name of Corot; there are four by Daubigny, and four by Millet, among the rest a version in coloured chalks of "L'Angelus," which, however, has neither the dignity of tone characteristic of his finer works in oil, nor that largeness of simply indicated form which constitutes the best technical merit of his work in black and white. By Rousseau is a richly-tinted rendering of a mountain gorge, "Châlet Guyon, Auvergne"; and M. Vollon, the greatest modern painter of still-life, has a study of dead game, with a great brass platter bearing a single crimson and a single yellow fruit, striking with splendid force into the grey and brown tones of the plumage. The most fascinating, however, of all the foreign pictures is the well-known "Beppino" of M. Carolus Duran, a marvel as a portrayal of child-nature, as an example of delicate flesh-painting, and as a study in superb tones of red opposed by full greens.

The "Symbolists" of present-day France are represented by M. Aman Jean, whose works attracted so much notice in the recent Champ de Mars Salon. His most characteristic contribution is an oddly naïve rendering of "The Muse seated among Laurels under the Window of a Poet"; but he also shows portrait subjects, of which one, representing a dark-haired lady clad in red, is curiously impressive in the intensity of sinister expression that appears on the sallow, hook-nosed face. The finest of the Dutch pictures is James Maris's scene "On the Y," a work full of a sense of motion and the sparkle of changeable morning light.

Among the English painters Millais is represented by three notable figure-pictures, including his "Miss Jopling," a subject less masterly in the touches that model its face than is the wont of this painter at his highest, but full of keenly seized individuality in the momentary pose and expression of figure and face alike. And Sir J. D. Linton, Mr. Tadema, Mr. T. Graham, and the late Albert Moore, are visible in works of varying importance.

The delicacy that was characteristic of the Scottish art of the past is amply present in "Rest," an exquisite cabinet-piece of Mr. Hugh Cameron. Its precision of handling and force of colouring finds expression in an early landscape, "On the Margin of the Forest," by Mr. Alexander Fraser, in Pettie's "Musicians," and Mr. Erskine Nicol's "Beggar my Neighbours." While the force and refinement of flesh-painting and breadth of effect which it attained in the hands of Paul Chalmers, are proved by such figure pictures as "Old Letters," and a "Study" of the head of a rustic child.

In the current work of the exhibition we see the working of new leaven in the art of the North: we are conscious of fresh aims and unfamiliar methods, we feel that an unwonted emphasis is being laid upon technique, and that the dominant direction of this technique is towards unity of general impression and truth, or beauty of general tone, attained by working by means of broad spaces or masses of colour, to the suppression of detail. The leaders in this new direction of recent Scottish art are Mr. E. A. Walton and Mr. James Guthrie, each of whom is represented by a typical canvas. Mr. Walton paints, with excellent sense of breezy daylight, a hill-top, with its light soil showing through the herbage, a great tree of thick-massed leafage, and a middle-distance of rocky ground, with a delicate wash of air filling the space between it and the foreground. Mr. Guthrie, again, shows a very summarily handled portrait of a seated girl. The face has an excellent suggestion of purity in its flesh-tones; the blending colours of a cushion set behind the head are exquisitely introduced; and the sense of atmosphere behind, the sense of space between the various planes of the picture, are subtly suggested. Yet we feel that a master would have caught all this truth, all this exquisiteness, and yet, by further detail, have added much more.

One of the most striking figure-pictures is Mr. J. Thorburn Ross's rendering of an episode of sixteenth century Border history: it shows Hume of Wedderburn, having slain his enemy, the Chevalier de la Bastie, riding into Duns with the bloody head secured by the hair to his saddle-bow. There is little of "local colour" in this picture, though it shows colour enough of another sort. The work is suggestive rather of a page from some fiercer and more sinister "Arabian Nights" than of an illustration of the grim ferocity of Border feud. The painter has made his subject simply an occasion for indulging in a perfect fantasia of flashing light and potent colour, afforded by the gleaming surfaces of the armour and the white steed, by the pallid and ghastly head with its ink-black hair and streaming gore, by the dancing of parti-coloured horse-trappings, and the wavings of green plumes and banners. If the picture fails of adequate accomplishment, it may at least claim to be a bold and original technical experiment; but in a smaller picture of "A Bather," while the artist's aim has been more restricted, the result attained has been more complete.

In his rendering of coast scenes and fisher figures Mr. Allan Stewart shows a force of colouring and correctness of form such as we fail to find in his more ambitious historical subject of "Mary Stuart's Last Look of Scotland." This is a studio picture, wanting in instinctiveness and spontaneity. There is some human interest, some observation of living character, in the female faces; but more of archaeological correctness in the costumes is needed to carry the spectator into the period which the painter aims at; the arms of the figures are curiously feeble and inexpressive in drawing; and more truth of tone is required to knit the dramatis personae and their background of sea and sky into one satisfying whole.

The portraits of the exhibition are numerous and interesting; and in most of them we see traces of a very definitely artistic and technical aim, the painters' effort being at least as strongly directed towards attaining truth and harmony of tone, or a decorative arrangement of colour, as towards the simple presentment of a human personality. Character, however, the seizure of a personality, has certainly been reached in Mr. A. G. Sinclair's full-length of a dark-draped lady. One might have desired more flow of line in the great masses of this picture; but the whole is full of a touching pathos in the quiet, pallid aged face, whose expression is answered and supplemented so exquisitely by the form and feeling of the delicate hand laid on the lap. Mr. J. Lavery paints, with not a little freshness and refinement of tone, a full-length mother and child; Mr. R. Brough's portrait of W. D. Ross, Esq., of Black and White, is excellent as a likeness and attractive as a work of art; Mr. Robert Burns has a capital picture of a seated child, her meditative face seen in profile, her draperies making a quiet harmony of browns and greys against a dusky background; and Mr. R. Duddingstone Herdman shows several portraits, one distinctly suggested by sixteenth century examples, the others being very graceful renderings of children.

In the department of landscape, Mr. Robert Noble, Mr. J. Coutts Michie, and, in water-colour, Mr. Robert B. Nisbet, are prominent exhibitors. Mr. G. Nasmyth Langlands marks a distinct advance in his excellent rendering of "The Summer Moon," and in his smaller picture of "A Winter Evening," with a sky, golden and rosy, brooding over farm-buildings and the snowy ground. The art of Mr. C. H. Woolford seems passing into a larger and freer phase, visible in such works as his "Summer Shower."

In sculpture, some things of worth and interest come from Mr. Pittendrigh Mac-Gillivray, M. Lucchesi, Mr. J. S. Rhind, and Mr. Frampton; and M. Ringel shows several of his individual and curiously experimental examples of tinted busts. Among the few examples of engraving on the walls, a large and very successful etched rendering, by Mr. F. Huth, of Watteau's "Fête Champêtre," in the National Gallery of Scotland, merits a word of praise.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

AN exhibition of pictures and studies by Mr. Arthur Tomson, chiefly consisting of cats, will open next week at the Dutch Gallery, Brook-street, Hanover-square.

THE following have been elected members of the Royal Society of British Artists: Messrs. A. S. Edward, Fred. Millard, S. Muschamp, B. Priestman, and Terriek Williams.

MR. ARTHUR CHARLES FOX-DAVIES, the editor of the revised edition of "Fairbairn's Book of Crests," is now engaged upon a work to be entitled Armorial Families, which is an endeavour to give the names and designations of all persons in the United Kingdom regularly authorised to bear arms, with more than 600 illustrations of complete achievements. The editor undertakes that all the armorial bearings inserted shall have been previously examined—in England, by Mr. C. H. Athill, Richmond Herald; in Scotland, by the Lyon Office; and in Ireland, by Ulster's Office. Particulars will also be added, where they can be obtained, of the liveries and cockades in use. It is hoped that the volume may subsequently be issued every year, in a revised form. The publishers are Messrs. T. C. and E. C. Jack, of Edinburgh.

THERE has been on view during the past week, in the rooms of the Society of Antiquaries, at Burlington House, a very interesting series of drawings, plans, and photographs, made by Messrs J. J. Tylor and Somers Clarke, of tombs and temples in Egypt. Some of them are destined to be published by the Egypt Exploration Fund, and others by the Society of Biblical Archaeology.

THE Photographic Salon, in the Dudley Gallery, closes to-day (Saturday). We understand that the success of the exhibition has been so great as to encourage the promoters to make it an annual one.

WE quote the following from the Times:—

"The British Museum has been very recently enriched, by the gift of the Khedive, with four mummy-coffins of great interest. Egypt has given us many surprises, but none more striking than the discoveries made in 1887 and 1891. In the former year the royal mummies, including those of Thothmes III., the conqueror of Asia, and Rameses II., were discovered. In 1891, the still more wonderful find was made of the mummies of the priests and priestesses of the order of Amen. Scholars at once associated these two results of research with each other. The mummies were found in vast excavated hiding-places, showing that there must have been a reason for the concealment. Round these coffins one of the most remarkable chapters of the religious and secular history of the world centres, the order of Amen having been probably the most powerful and perfectly organised ancient sacerdotal order. The discovery of 1891 was made by M. Grébaut in the immediate neighbourhood of Deir-el-Bahari, where he found a well giving access to an immense tomb, in which were found 163 coffins of members of the confraternity of Amen. There were also a number of ushabti figures and statues of Isis and Nephtys, the latter being hollow and containing papyrus rolls. All these objects were removed to the museum at Ghizeh, where the larger portion are now on exhibition. But the Khedive and the museum authorities decided to prevent the surplus coffins to the European powers which had shown such great interest in Egyptian exploration. Accordingly, a few months ago a raffi was held at Ghizeh, and four of the coffins and some other objects fell to the lot of the British Museum. The coffin of a priestess in the museum is that of Tent-han-f, and is very large and 'double,' presenting a fine specimen of Egyptian work, probably of the XXIInd Dynasty. The paintings which decorate it are taken chiefly from the 'Book of the Dead.' Another coffin is that of a priest whose name is unknown, but who seems to have been an incense-burner in the temple. Like that of the priestess, it is richly decorated. The coffin is probably of the time of the XXIst or XXIInd Dynasty. Along with the objects presented to the Museum are a pair of sepulchral boxes belonging to a priestess Huit. These probably contained toilet and other necessities for the deceased, and are adorned with mythological scenes."

THE STAGE.

ACTORS AND PLAYWRIGHTS.

Paris: Nov. 6, 1893.

M. DE CUREL's comedy "L'Amour brode," produced last week at the Comédie Française, proved so distasteful to the critics and to the public that the author wisely withdrew it after the third performance. M. de Curel's previous plays—"L'envers d'une sainte," "Les fossiles," given at the Théâtre Libre; "L'Invitée," played at the Vaudeville—were interesting novelties, though they contained little or no dramatic action. The interest of the audience was excited by the author's subtle analysis of the complex motives which influenced his characters, strange people who thought and acted after the manner of the personages in Stendhal, Bourget, and Ibsen's works, yet human and comprehensible in their ensemble. But Gabrielle de Guimont and Charles Méran in "L'Amour brode" are mentally and physically perverse beings, pathological "cases," and their état d'âme is morbid beyond reason. Talent and originality mark M. de Curel's latest dramatic work, but his characters are too unnatural to be successful on the stage; perhaps, presented to the public in the form of a novel, they might have met with a better reception.

The production of "L'Amour brode" has been attended with an incident of some interest to authors and actors. M. Le Bargy, while rehearsing the part of Charles Méran, was alarmed at the boldness of the dialogue and the very scabreux part he had to play; so he wrote to M. Antoine, of the Théâtre Libre, asking him to induce M. de Curel to modify certain scenes. The result was a sharp refusal from M. Antoine to do anything so impertinent, and a letter addressed by him to M. Le Bargy, of which the following passages might serve as a useful lesson to certain too pretentious actors:

"... I wish I could convince you that actors never know anything of the plays they are called upon to perform. Their business is to act, and no more, to represent as best they can personages, the conception of which is beyond them; they are, in reality, mannequins, puppets, more or less perfect, according to their talent, whom the author dresses up and moves about as he pleases. Sometimes, after long years, they may acquire a kind of purely material experience, which permits them to tell an author why a personage ought to enter or leave the stage by the right wing rather than by the left, but in no case can they, without exceeding their proper function, attempt to modify a character or a dénouement. The intellectual difference between the poet and his interpreter is so great that the latter can never fully satisfy the former. He always distorts the vision of the author, who has to accept the à peu-près, and resign himself to the inevitable."

According to M. Antoine (who, it must be remembered, is himself a talented actor, as well as a manager), the ideal of an actor ought to be to become a marvellously tuned instrument on which the author plays according as fancy leads him. He must be able to give expression to the various tones and degrees of joy and sorrow, but he must not attempt to inquire why he is asked to express these feelings: the author alone knows what he means, and is alone responsible to the public. The letter ends in a warning addressed to M. Le Bargy and the young members of the Comédie Française that, if they do not follow the current of the dramatic revolution which is taking place, they will be swept away, and with them all the old traditions of the Maison de Molière. M. Antoine has certainly done much to renovate the stage by introducing new authors, and a new form of drama; but he is greatly mistaken if he thinks that his theatre is likely to supersede the Théâtre Français and its traditions. Theoretically he may be right, when he says that the actor ought to be a mere puppet in the hands of the author; but, in practice, it often happens that an experienced actor may give valuable assistance and counsel to an author. It is no secret that Emile Augier often sought and profited by the advice of M. Got, while the celebrated Régnier was not only the friend, but the adviser of the dramatists of his day.

Diderot, in his Paradoxe sur le Comédien, says:

"Tantôt le poète a senti plus fortement que le comédien, tantôt, et plus souvent peut-être, le comédien a conçu plus fortement que le poète; et rien n'est plus dans la vérité que cette exclamation de Voltaire, entendant la Clairon dans une de ses pièces: Est-ce bien moi qui ai fait cela? Est-ce que la Clairon en sait plus que Voltaire? Dans ce moment du moins son modèle idéal, en déclamant, était bien au delà du modèle idéal que le poète s'était fait en écrivant, mais ce modèle n'était pas elle. Quel était donc son talent? Celui d'imaginer un grand fantôme et de le copier de génie."

Cecil Nicholson.

STAGE NOTES.

THE absence of important novelties—of novelties, that is, which have any literary interest or which afford opportunities for the higher acting—is the noticeable feature of the present autumn season. In more or less serious pieces, it is only revivals that are the order of the day, while the patrons of the lighter drama take their choice between such burlesques as owe half of their attractiveness to the methods of "the Halls," and such farces as an almost super-human ingenuity has stretched into three acts. As one of these last is the only absolute novelty, we will speak briefly of it first, before turning our attention to that which intends, at all events, to be more artistic work.

THIS farce in three acts is the piece which was brought out at the Vaudeville on Saturday. It is by Mr. Mark Melford—not his first venture of the kind—and seems, indeed, along with his other work, to display a very pretty talent for devising a series of laughable situations. It would be very dull work for our readers if we narrated its story: a story of this kind is only agreeable when unrolled in action before our eyes. The piece is called "A Screw Loose"; and, as the name implies, mental disease, in a form that is harmlessly entertaining, is part of its subject matter. Round the principal personage are grouped some half-dozen eccentrics, whose adventures, and misunderstandings, are much of the material of the playwright. Mr. Frank Wyatt revels in the exposition of one of the oldest of the characters, while in another part of importance Mr. W. L. Abingdon is seen. His rôle is somewhat unusual, for Mr. Abingdon is generally known as one of the few comedians who can make acceptable the villain of melodrama. Mr. Charles Hudson, and Mr. William Hargreaves, and naturally Mr. Fred. Thorne—whose figure and method are so familiar to the frequenters of the Vaudeville—are cast for parts in which they prove themselves effective. Miss Gertrude Kingston is the best known of the exponents of the female characters; and, though we do not know that she is precisely fitted to her part, she is too clever a person to permit herself to be seen wholly at a disadvantage. Her individuality is strongly marked. We may as well add, before passing on to the proceedings at another theatre, that Mr. Mark Melford's three act farce is preceded by a "fantastic sketch" of some ability, called "Best Man Wins." Mr. Alfred Phillips, Mr. Fred. Thorne, and Mr. Rudge Harding are pleasantly engaged in this performance; and Miss Ethel Waring as the young heroine, for whose hand there are rival claimants, is interesting and acceptable.

At Daly's Theatre there is frequent change of programme; and "The Orient Express" will on Monday be replaced by a revival of "The School for Scandal," the first revival of

MESSRS. HUTCHINSON'S NEW BOOKS.

The First Edition (8,000 Copies) of ANNIE S. SWAN'S New Book.

A BITTER DEBT: a Story of the Black Country. is now ready. In large crown 8vo, cloth gilt extra, with Full-Page Illustrations by D. Murray Smith, 5s. The same Author's "HOMESPUN," a Study of a Simple Folk (published in July), is already in its 82nd Thousand. In cloth gilt, 1s. 6d.; paper, 1s., with Illustrations.

The Athenæum says of this book: "The language is perfect, the highest strings of humanity are touched."

A New and Improved Edition of OLIVE SCHREINER'S Novel.

THE STORY of an AFRICAN FARM. In large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 8s. 6d. (Completing the 70th Thousand.)

"The only lady writer mentioned in the course of the lecture was Olive Schreiner. 'The African Farm' is, in the opinion of Dr. Doyle, one of the greatest works ever written by a woman."—Westminster Gazette.

BY PROF. A. J. CHURCH.

PICTURES from GREEK LIFE and STORY. In crown 8vo, cloth gilt, with 16 Full-Page Illustrations, 5s.

"It would be difficult to name a more attractive book, a volume of quite unusual excellence."—Speaker.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JAN VEDDER'S WIFE."

A SINGER from the SEA. By Amelia E. Barr. In crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

BY SARAH TYTLER.

A BUBBLE FORTUNE. In crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 5s.

"Written with the character and distinction which always mark Miss Tytler's works." British Weekly.

BY F. FRANKFORT MOORE.

DAIREEN: a Novel. By the Author of "I Forbid the Banns." In crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

BY HUME NISBET.

VALDMER the VIKING: a Romance of the Eleventh Century. With Illustrations by the Author. In crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 8s. 6d.

"Interesting from beginning to end."—Scotsman.

BY J. BLOUNDELLE BURTON.

THE DESERT SHIP: a Story of Adventure by Sea and Land. With numerous Illustrations by Hume Nisbet and Walter Buckley. In large crown 8vo, cloth gilt and gilt edges, 6s.

"A capital book of adventure. One's hands cling to the book till the last line is devoured. Contains some excellent illustrations."—Army and Navy Gazette.

NEW NOVELS AT ALL LIBRARIES.

THE LARGE FIRST EDITION EXHAUSTED.

A GRAY EYE or SO. In 3 vols. By the Author of "I Forbid the Banns."

[Second Edition next week.

"Cannot be classed with the average novel; it is worth criticism and worth reading." National Observer.

MRS. CONNEY'S NEW NOVEL.

GOLD for DROSS. In 3 vols. By the Author of "A Ruthless Avenger," "A Lady Horsebreaker," &c.

[This day.

SARAH DOUDNEY'S NEW NOVEL.

A ROMANCE of LINCOLN'S INN. In 2 vols.

"The style is polished and refined, and the story gracefully told."—Leeds Mercury.

A SECOND EDITION THIS DAY.

A STRANGE TEMPTATION. In 3 vols. By Mrs. J. KENT SPENDER.

"This captivating story, full of charm, originality, and noble thought, deserves a place among our great English novels."—Liverpool Mercury.

BY SEVEN POPULAR AUTHORS.

SEVEN CHRISTMAS EVES. Being the Romance of a Social Evolution. By CLO. GRAVES, B. L. FARJEON, FLORENCE MARRYAT, G. MANVILLE FENN, Mrs. CAMPBELL PRAED, JUSTIN HUNTLY MCCARTHY, and CLEMENT SCOTT. With 28 Original Illustrations by Dudley Hardy. In crown 8vo, cloth gilt extra, 8s. 6d.

BY SARAH DOUDNEY.

THROUGH PAIN to PEACE. With Illustrations. In crown 8vo, handsome cloth gilt and gilt edges, 6s.

BY F. FRANKFORT MOORE.

I FORBID the BANNS. The Story of a Comedy which was Played Seriously. In crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

[Sixth Edition.

"So racy and brilliant a novel."—Athenæum.

BY EVELYN EVERETT GREEN.

NAMESAKES. The Story of a Secret. In crown 8vo, handsome cloth gilt and gilt edges. With Illustrations, 6s.

LONDON: HUTCHINSON & CO., PATERNOSTER Row.

that play undertaken by the Daly company in England. It is worth while to point out that, since the establishment of the Daly company in its own theatre, or rather in Mr. Daly's own theatre in Leicester-square, the company has been by no means so exclusively American as it has been wont to be. This is, in some respects, a loss. The troupe—notwithstanding the presence of that forcible and gifted comedian, Miss Ada Rehan—has sacrificed something of its peculiar cachet. It is no longer quite American: it is an international company—an Anglo-American, if you will. But, on the eve of a revival of the masterpiece of Sheridan, we cannot very seriously take exception to this fact; for is there any American actor now living who could fairly vie with Mr. William Farren as an exponent of the part of Sir Peter Teazle? And Mr. Farren, we rejoice to say, resumes this part at Daly's on Monday. It is about twenty-two years ago since Mr. Farren—following his father's habit of performing old men's parts in his own younger years—stepped into the character of Sir Peter at the Vaudeville, playing it charmingly to the charming Lady Teazle of Miss Amy Fawcett, a delightful young comedian whose career was destined to be brief. Much may rightly be expected from the Lady Teazle of Miss Rehan, but no performance is likely to be riper or more complete than the Sir Peter of Mr. Farren.

We may perhaps be allowed to call attention to the circumstance that the two final performances of "Measure for Measure" by the Shakspeare Reading Society are appointed for this afternoon and evening at the Royalty Theatre—the first having occurred on Thursday night, too late, of course, for notice in our present issue. It will be long, in all probability, before an experiment so interesting and ingenious comes to be repeated; for, in the first place, it is costly and, in the second, it appeals to but limited and chosen and, for the most part, intellectual audiences.

MUSIC.

OBITUARY.

PETER ILTITSCH TSCHAIKOWSKY.

AMONG Russian composers Dr. Tschaiowsky held, and justly, a distinguished place, and in this country stood next to Rubinstein in public favour. The latter, however, as a pianist of the highest rank, has enjoyed special advantages, and the merit of his younger contemporary must not altogether be measured by the degree of his popularity. Tschaiowsky is best known here by his delightful songs and small pianoforte pieces; of his larger works our knowledge is only fragmentary. He wrote ten operas; yet only his "Eugény Onégin" has been heard in London. Another opera, "Mazeppa," was performed a few years ago, once or twice, in the provinces. Of his six Symphonies, only one has been performed—No. 4 in F minor, given under the direction of the composer last summer at a Philharmonic Concert. His characteristic pianoforte Concerto was introduced by Mr. E. Dannreuther at a Crystal Palace concert as far back as 1876. The young Russian School—as it is styled—has deservedly attracted a good deal of attention: its foremost representatives have won the respect of classicists by their general adhesion to the lines on which the old masters worked, and the sympathy of romanticists by the modern spirit of their music. The national element in their compositions is strong—in those of Tschaiowsky specially so. Although he made a serious study of music only after he had attained to years of manhood, he was skilled in the arts of counterpoint and canon, and could, therefore, develop his thoughts advantageously, and by masterly orchestration set them off to the best advantage. The comparison may be somewhat bold, but, notwithstanding an occasional tendency to diffuseness, we should feel disposed to name him the Russian Mendelssohn. By Tschaiowsky's death music has sustained a distinct loss. The honorary degree of Mus. Doc. was bestowed on him by the University of Cambridge last June; and this honour, together with the cordial reception given to his Symphony, seemed to render probable a closer acquaintance with the man and the musician.

J. S. SHEDLOCK.

RECENT CONCERTS.

THE fourth Crystal Palace concert last Saturday opened with Mendelssohn's Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." It was the anniversary of the composer's death, and the Overture, a "marvel of early maturity," was as good a commemoration piece as could well have been selected. But zeal sometimes outweighs discretion; and the attempt in the programme-book, in reference to Mendelssohn's early death, to justify the ways of God to man by a quotation from "Wisdom" was one which would scarcely have commended itself to the composer, who possessed to a high degree the power of self-criticism, and never deemed himself perfect. The Overture was followed by Mr. F. H. Cowen's Cantata "The Water Lily," written specially for the Norwich Festival held last month. The libretto, from the pen of Mr. Joseph Bennett, is based upon Wordsworth's "Egyptian Maid, or the Romance of the Water-Lily"; and excellent opportunities have been given to the composer to display his ability and imagination. The Prologue has been evolved by the librettist from a stanza of the poem referring to the vision of the "Egyptian Lady" beheld by Sir Galahad. The opening chorus is light and pretty, and the chorus of the "Spirits of the Air" is quaint and effective; the music, and, indeed, the orchestration, here recall a scene in Berlioz's "Faust." The "Dream" contains some good writing, though in places it is weak, and in others too sentimental. The "Prologue" concludes well with a repetition of the opening rustic chorus. The scene for Merlin and male chorus shows descriptive power, though it must be confessed that the "storm" music at the end is very conventional. The "Ina" scene, with its mournful opening, its clever realistic "boat" effects, and dignified "bird" song, deserves high praise. Scene 4, "At Caerleon," opens with a stirring full chorus; and the contrast between this and the delicate preceding number is particularly striking; the chorus, too, is dignified and dramatic. The funeral music when Arthur orders the "Dead Maid" to her rest is full of character and pathos; the weird, soft strains sung by female chorus, and the quaint orchestration, produce a marked effect. The whole passage is only twenty-five bars in length, yet it is one of the composer's highest efforts. Another number of great merit is the choral recitative and solo (Sir Galahad); the music is altogether on a high level, and the danger of monotony successfully overcome. The "love" duet at the end contains much pleasing music, but, to our mind, it lacks true fervour. The work, altogether, represents the composer in a decidedly favourable light. For one thing he deserves special praise: he has not written for the gallery. He has made use of representative themes, yet not to excess. The orchestration is one of the strong points of the work. The performance, under the direction of Mr. Manns, was in many respects good, though we doubt whether the work, especially in the matter of tempi, was given altogether in accordance with the composer's intentions: Miss Emma Juch, Miss Hilda Wilson, and Messrs. Ben Davies, Norman Salmond, and Robert Grice were all successful. Mr. Cowen was announced to conduct the Cantata, but he is at present at Milan anxiously awaiting the production of his opera "Signa."

Mr. Henschel commenced his eighth series of Symphony Concerts at St. James's Hall on Wednesday evening with an excellent programme. Tschaiowsky's "Elegie" for strings was substituted for Wagner's "Faust" Overture. The "Elegie" does not represent the Russian composer at his strongest, but it is gracefully plaintive, and served as a tribute to his memory. The performance was wonderfully clear and delicate. Mlle. Frida Scotta, a young Danish violinist, gave a fine rendering of Max Bruch's first and best violin Concerto; the reading of the opening movement was marked by great breadth, and the slow movement by tenderness, without a trace of exaggeration. The Finale was good, but scarcely fiery enough. Brahms's Symphony in C minor was given, with all due refinement and energy, under the direction of Mr. Henschel; the work is one which he evidently holds in high regard and affection. The programme included an old Irish song arranged by Dr. Stanford, and another one from his pen; they are both interesting, and were sung with fervour by Mr. Plunket Greene. An "arrangement" from "Parsifal" proved unsatisfactory; excerpts from this music-drama are bad enough, but arrangements should be strictly forbidden.

Just published, crown 8vo, cloth, gilt edges, 6s.

THE WINGED WOLF, AND OTHER FAIRY TALES.

Collected by HA SHEEN KAF.

WITH 50 ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS BY ARTHUR LAYARD.

CONTENTS.

PRINCE LUBIM and the WINGED WOLF.
FINIKIN and his GOLDEN PIPPINS.
PRINCE MALANDRACH and the PRINCESS SALIKALLA.
THE SEDGE ISLAND.
THE WONDERFUL SELF-PLAYING HARP.

THE STORY of LITTLE WHITEBEARD the SHOE-MAKER KING.
EMELIAN the FOOL.
THAVANAN the MAGICIAN.
SILA CZAREVITCH and IVASHKA with the SHROUD.
PRINCE GOLD-FISH.

LONDON: EDWARD STANFORD, 26 AND 27, COCKSPUR STREET, CHANCERY CROSS, S.W.

Crown 8vo, in wrapper, price 2s.; postage, 2d.

PLAYS FOR MY PUPILS.

By E. MAUDE JACKSON.

These Plays have stood the test of actual performance in the schoolroom with great success.
The Scenery required is very simple.

LONDON: EDWARD STANFORD, 26 AND 27, COCKSPUR STREET, CHANCERY CROSS, S.W.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 1893.

No. 1124, New Series.

THE EDITOR cannot undertake to return, or to correspond with the writers of, rejected manuscript.

It is particularly requested that all business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., may be addressed to the PUBLISHER, and not to the EDITOR.

LITERATURE.

The Autobiography of Theobald Wolfe Tone, 1763-1798. Edited, with an Introduction, by R. Barry O'Brien. (Fisher Unwin.)

WOLFE TONE is one of the most remarkable figures in Irish history, and, unlike most Irish patriots, he has the additional merit of being personally interesting. It is probable that too much attention has been paid to what he failed to accomplish, and that consequently his real merits are not so clearly recognised as they deserve to be. Tone, as Mr. O'Brien very justly observes, is the Irish Separatist par excellence. The aim and object of his life was undoubtedly to break the connexion between England and Ireland, and to establish the latter as an independent republic. Whether, indeed, his scheme had any chance of permanent success is fairly open to question. Tone himself certainly under-estimated the difficulties in the way of its realisation. Still, the combination of French republicans and United Irishmen was a formidable one, and offered sufficient prospect of success to justify the attempt being made. But because Tone failed in the realisation of his object, it is not to be inferred that his life was, even to his own generation and from his own point of view, a failure. On the contrary; for it was not so much the object Tone had in view, as the means by which he endeavoured to accomplish it, that rendered him really important.

In the fulness of their gratitude Irishmen have made patriots, among others, out of Molyneux and Lucas; but neither Lucas nor Molyneux ever represented more than a fraction of Irish opinion. Even Grattan himself, in the great hour of his triumph, spoke only for a portion, and that a very small portion, of the Irish people. Enlightened and tolerant he always was, but he was too prone to patronise the Catholics to be able to recognise the value of an equal alliance with them, even if his object had extended, as it never did, to a complete separation from England. Now it was Tone's great merit that, though a Protestant and a Nonconformist, and probably more English than Irish in his descent, he was first of all, and above all, an Irishman. No Protestant, not even Duigenan himself, detested Roman Catholicism more heartily than did he; but he detested it not because he feared it, but because, in his opinion, it cramped the intelligence of the nation. Nevertheless, his hatred of Catholicism did not prevent him from sympathising with the Catholics, or from recognising the supreme importance of their co-operation in the endeavour to throw off the English yoke. In a word, it was his glory and his chief title to the affectionate regard of his fellow-countrymen to have been stigmatised by Fitzgibbon as the father of the United Irish brotherhood.

Of Tone himself, we possess an admirable and evidently truthful portrait in his autobiography—one of the most delightful books of its kind with which we are acquainted. It was begun several years before his mission to France, in the form of rough memoranda of the chief events of his life. By degrees, and as he began to play a more important part in the affairs of his country, these occasional notes assumed the form of a regular journal. Begun, in the first instance, at his wife's suggestion, it was continued entirely for her amusement and the edification of his family. It is right to bear this in mind; for though Tone, as Mr. O'Brien truly says, was profoundly indifferent to popular opinion, yet there is a wide difference between the style of his journal and that of his political pamphlets. We are glad that Tone's son had the courage to publish his father's journal, but there is no reason to believe that Tone ever intended it to go beyond his own immediate friends. To any of us, except, indeed, "the unco' guid," it is the unconscious revelation of the man himself that constitutes the chief charm of his autobiography. Tone certainly was no saint; but a weakness for good liquor and bad language, is after all, not a very heinous sin. And then, as Mr. O'Brien says, one must never take Tone too seriously. He loved his wife dearly, and he knew that she would not be deceived by his exaggerated language. Exaggerated language and a perpetual straining to write cleverly are, indeed, in my opinion, the chief faults of the autobiography. For Tone, though not devoid of humour, was not particularly witty, and his jeux d'esprit are sometimes painfully laboured. As mere writing, his pamphlets and the introduction to his journal seem to me of a much higher order than the journal itself. But despite all that has been, or can be, said against the style of the autobiography, one cannot help recognising and admiring the transparent honesty, the manliness, the good sense, and genuine modesty of the writer. The following by no means isolated passage, written in a moment of extreme elation, as it goes far to explain the extraordinary confidence reposed in him by the French Government, will doubtless, also, in the opinion of the judicious reader, serve to cover a multitude of minor offences against the canons of good taste and good style:

"And now, am not I a pretty fellow to go to the Directoire Exécutif? It is very singular that so obscure an individual should be thrown into such a situation. I presume I do not write these memorandums to flatter myself, and I here solemnly call God to witness the purity of my motives, and the uprightness with which I shall endeavour to carry myself through this most arduous and critical situation. I hope I may not ruin a noble cause by any weakness or indiscretion of mine. As to my integrity, I can answer for myself."

Considering the important part Tone played at a very critical period in the history of England it is certainly surprising that he should be so little known, as he apparently is, to most Englishmen. The eldest of four children, he was born in Dublin in 1763. At school and college he displayed little love for learning. He was only twenty-two, and still an undergraduate, when he ran away with the lady he made his wife. After graduating at Trinity College he went to London to study law at the Middle Temple, and was finally called to the Irish bar in Trinity term, 1789; but, speedily becoming disgusted with his profession, he abandoned law and turned his attention to politics. Here he was more successful. He was taken up by the Whig Club, and for a time looked forward to the House of Commons as the scene of his future exertions. But, finding his expectations not likely to be realised, and conceiving a distaste for the "peddling politics" of the Whigs, he severed his connexion with them and struck out an independent course for himself.

"I soon," he says, "formed my theory, and on that theory I have unvaryingly acted ever since. To subvert the tyranny of our execrable government, to break the connexion with England, the never-failing source of all our political evils, and to assert the independence of my country—these were my objects. To unite the whole people of Ireland, to abolish the memory of all past dissensions, and to substitute the common name of Irishman in place of the denominations of Protestant, Catholic, and Dissenter—these were my means."

"An Argument on behalf of the Catholics of Ireland," which he addressed to the Dissenters, paved the way for a union, and in October, 1791, Tone had the satisfaction of founding the first Society of United Irishmen at Belfast. The object of the association was, avowedly, a reformation of parliament, in order to obtain an equal representation of the people of Ireland without distinction of religious creed. With this it is certain that most of the members of the society would have rested satisfied; but it seems clear that Tone and one or two other ardent spirits were from the very first in favour of a much more radical line of action. It is hardly necessary in this place to trace the history of the movement from constitutional agitation to secret conspiracy. Everyone is well aware of the extraordinary revulsion of popular feeling in Ireland consequent on the sudden and unexpected recall of Lord Fitzwilliam in March, 1795. From that moment all that was rebellious in Irish political life woke into tenfold activity. On May 10 the United Irish Society was reorganised on a distinctly revolutionary basis. Fitzgibbon and his friends at the head of the government, who had been mainly responsible for this disastrous turn of affairs, were not slow to recognise their danger. They struck, and struck hard, but merely scotched and did not kill the snake. But among others who thought it prudent at this time to quit Ireland was Wolfe Tone. His own account of the arrangement with government, by which he was quietly allowed to leave Ireland for America, is to my mind most unsatisfactory, and certainly leaves a disagreeable impression that he did not act in the matter with his usual straightforwardness. He says:

"At the time of Mr. Jackson's arrest [April, 1794] and Mr. Rowan's escape and Dr. Reynolds's emigration, my situation was a very critical one. I felt the necessity of taking immediate and decided measures to extricate myself. I therefore went to a gentleman [apparently Marcus Beresford] high in confidence with the then administration [Lord Westmoreland's] and told him at once fairly every step I had taken. I told him, also, that I knew how far I was in danger; that my life was safe, unless it was unfairly practised against, which I did not at all apprehend; but that it was certainly in the power of the government, if they pleased, to ruin me as effectually as they possibly could by my death. . . . What I had done I had done, and if necessary I must pay the penalty; but as my ruin might not be an object to them, I was ready, if I was allowed, and could at all accomplish it, to go to America. . . . As we walked together into town, I opened my plan to them both [Russell and Emmet]. I told them that I considered my compromise with Government to extend no further than the banks of the Delaware . . . that, undoubtedly, I was guilty of a great offence against the existing Government; that, in consequence, I was going into exile; and that I considered that exile as a full expiation for the offence, and consequently felt myself at liberty, having made that sacrifice, to begin on a fresh score."

Now I am constrained to confess that there seems to me something extremely disingenuous in the view Tone here takes of his obligations to Government. Fortunately perhaps for his reputation, it appears from other sources, notably the Beresford correspondence, that Government was just as anxious to get him out of the country as he himself was anxious to go. Still, I fancy that a man in whom political passion did not run so high, or a man of fine sense of honour, like Whitley Stokes for example, would have hesitated to set up any such sophistical excuse for what on his own showing was evidently a breach of faith.

On June 13 Tone sailed from Belfast, and after a disagreeable voyage, during which he narrowly escaped being pressed on board a British man-of-war, reached America in safety with his wife and family on August 1. His reception by the French minister to the United States, Adet, at first rather damped his ardour; and he was actually preparing to settle down as a farmer at Princetown, in New Jersey, when letters from Ireland induced him to seek a fresh interview with Adet. This time, in consequence of a long communication from the Minister of Foreign Affairs, De la Croix, he was favourably received, and a few days later he was on his way to France. From De la Croix's report, it is clear that the invitation to Tone was the result of a decision on the part of the Directory to consider seriously a scheme for the invasion of Ireland. It is therefore rather magnifying Tone's influence to say that he was the actual agent in bringing about the expedition. Undoubtedly he left no stone unturned in order to confirm the Directory in this intention. He was unquestionably a man of parts, and his prudent management of the business reflects great credit on him. But at a time when sheer force of character could raise men to the highest civil and military employments, it is not very astonishing that Tone should have attained to a considerable degree of eminence. Still, it is remarkable that the only Frenchman with whom he seems to have communicated freely, and for whom he had a very sincere admiration, was Hoche himself. It was Hoche's death that gave the death blow to Tone's hopes; for Buonaparte, although he kept up the fiction of an army of invasion so long as it suited his purpose to do so, never really had any of that almost personal interest which Hoche felt for the Irish. Tone had always declared that, if the French sent only a corporal's guard to Ireland, he would feel it his duty to go along with them. He kept his word, for the failure of Bonaparte's expedition was practically a foregone conclusion. The manner of his arrest and trial reflects little credit on the English Government and Sir George Hill in particular. Tone always recognised the risk he ran of being treated as a traitor. He hoped that his commission as a French officer would perhaps save him, or at least secure for him a soldier's death. He hoped, however, in vain; and in order to avoid the last indignities of a traitor's death he put an end to his own life. As one reads the closing chapter of his life one cannot help feeling an immense pity for him. He hated England, it is true, with a fierce and undying hatred, but he hated her at least in a manly fashion; and if he was a traitor, he was also the victim of a vicious system of government.

Of Mr. O'Brien's share in the present edition, it is only possible to speak in terms of warm commendation. His Introduction, though brief, is an excellent piece of clear, nervous, and graphic writing; and what is more, it really is an introduction to Tone's life. In a few brief sentences he gives the reader a better idea of the general state of political parties in Ireland at the end of last century than can be got from some books of much greater pretension. And it is not to be supposed, because this has been done briefly and clearly, that, therefore, it has been done easily. On the contrary, it is hardly possible to set oneself a more difficult task than to unwind the tangled skein of Irish politics as it found itself during the last years of the century. And although this can hardly be said to have been the object of Mr. O'Brien's Introduction, yet it is impossible to read it and not to recognise the extraordinary familiarity with the history of the times it reveals. By dividing the work into chapters arranged chronologically and adding an exhaustive index, Mr. O'Brien has added greatly to its value as a book of reference. His notes are commendably brief and to the point, though I venture to think that he has not always taken advantage of his opportunity. For example, it would have been interesting to have had his opinion on the real cause of Tone's rupture with Grattan, apparently in 1794. If my memory serves me, there is no allusion to it in Grattan's Life, and though Tone refers to it more than once (ii., 55, 97, 307, and elsewhere), he does so in such vague terms as merely to perplex. Mr. O'Brien has evidently a much higher opinion of Keogh than Tone had. It is possible he is correct in saying that Keogh was not arrested (ii., p. 1). I have hunted through the principal Irish and English papers for March and April, 1796, in the hope of confirming Tone's memorandum, but without success. Still, I do not regard this as conclusive; and I am still inclined to believe that he was really arrested, but immediately, as Tone conjectured, discharged. One error, and one error alone, and that a very popular one, I notice Mr. O'Brien to have been guilty of. Charles Lucas, although an occasional contributor to the Freeman's Journal, was not the founder of that paper. The mistake probably originated in regarding the Freeman's Journal as the successor of the Citizen's Journal, of which Lucas was the author, but which was not a newspaper at all.

R. DUNLOP.

Italian Lyrics of To-day. By G. A. Greene. (Elkin Mathews & John Lane.)

ALL interested in contemporary Italian literature welcomed the appearance, just three years ago, of the anthology, entitled Dai Nostri Poeti Viventi, edited by a young Florentine lady, Signorina Eugenia Levi. Italy is not a book-buying country in anything like the degree that Germany is, or France, or Great Britain. But, strange to say, works of literature, as distinct from productions for the moment, have relatively a better sale in Italy than in two, at any rate, of the wealthier countries named. Novelists, such as Giovanni Verga, Matilde Serao, Salvatore Farina, Antonio Fogazzaro, Gabriele D'Annunzio, can depend on a prompt demand for their romances; but perhaps this is natural enough, notwithstanding "the French tradition" which has so long lain on Italian belles lettres. It is only the younger generation in Italy that knows of the renaissance in process of rapid development. Some time ago the present writer was assured in Rome, by a cultured Tuscan who has an educational appointment in the capital and is himself a man of letters, that "we"—that is, Italy of to-day—"have no novelists save Verga and no poets except Carducci: the rest . . . all are adherents of that literary French dominion which has lingered long after the collapse of the military 'occupation.'" When reminded of that scholarly analyst of human motives and actions, Salvatore Farina; or of Matilde Serao, the fiery, eloquent, and daring author of La Conquista di Roma; or of Fogazzaro, who, both as conteur and novelist, has already done much fine work; and, again, of the younger poets: for example, that extraordinary genius, Gabriele D'Annunzio, or Arturo Graf, or the prolific Ugo Fleres, or that brilliant experimentalist, Alfredo Baccelli—he frankly expressed his ignorance of the books of one and all, with the exception that he had read part of a Neapolitan romance by Signora Serao, and thought little of it. This gentleman was representative of a class which handicaps "Young Italy" more heavily than does any other influence outside that of the critical periodicals. "As we have no choice but contemporary French literature at first hand, and contemporary French literature at second hand, naturally we read Zola and Daudet and Bourget and Catulle Mendès and even Armande Silvestre, even 'Rachilde,' and leave our Srao-Zolas, and Fogazzaro-Daudets, and Farina-Bourgets and D'Annunzio-Mendès severely alone." This, in effect, is what one too often hears in Italy. It must be admitted that there is some ground to go upon. Until ten or twelve years ago, a third-rate French novel had a better sale in Italy than the ablest romance by a native. The reading public was divided into distinct camps. That whose idol was "the innocuous" took delight in the translated novels of the author of John Halifax Gentleman, and of that heavy Teutonic comedy, The Buchholz Family: that which had its pleasure in questionable themes read translations, and imitations, of Pot-Bouille and La Terre, Crime d'Amour or Sapho, Madame Adonis or La Marquise de Sade—and their like, tolerable or intolerable. But this state of things has been giving way. For some years past the booksellers in Florence, Milan, and Rome have noted the change. The leading publishers, too, will now venture where formerly they would not have budged an inch; and, as I recently heard some one say, "In less than ten years there will be room for another Sommaruga—nay, by the beginning of the century the Sommarugas will be the real princes of the trade."* A word with Messrs. Vieuzeux in Florence or with Messrs. Loescher in Rome—those Italian rivals of Mr. Mudie—will dissipate the idea that the well-to-do Italians will read anything except native productions—or, rather, native productions without the universal "sesame" of Giosue Carducci's name on the title-page. Potent, however, as this development has been during the decade, it has become a national sentiment only within the last few years. The critical and disputatious writings of such able men as Enrico Nencioni and Giuseppe Chiarini, in a lesser degree of Edmondo de Amicis and Severino Ferrari, and, perhaps, above all—though indirectly—the weight of Carducci himself in the scale of public opinion, have been instrumental in bringing about this welcome result.

None the less is credit due to Signorina Levi for her admirable and timely anthology. Dai Nostri Poeti Viventi had an immediate success. The booksellers in Milan, Bologna, Florence, Rome, and Naples—the five great centres in this respect, corresponding to London, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Manchester, and Oxford—discovered that not only British and German but Italian purchasers were ready to pay four lire for the pretty parchment-bound antologia. The collection consists of selected poems by fifty-two living or recent Italian poets, and over thirty of those popular dialettale writers, who are captained by men of such wide repute as Tanfucio Neri, Arrigo Boito, and Luigi Capuana. It is "Le Parnasse Contemporain" of Italy; and as such has already had a great influence. In France, too, the book attracted attention. Though I have not the means of reference at hand, I believe that two articles by Miss Helen Zimmern, with translations, which appeared a year or so ago in Blackwood's Magazine, were occupied entirely with Signorina Levi's anthology.

And now Mr. G. A. Greene affords English lovers of poetry who may be ignorant of Italian an opportunity of appreciating the most noteworthy of these poets. It is a book for which there ought to be a cordial welcome, wrought as it is from first-hand knowledge and with genuine metrical craft. It is not only a service to ourselves, but a compliment to Italy—a compliment that cannot be considered premature in view of the widespread interest taken in our literature, and of translations and anthologies of our contemporary verse, such as, for example, the recent volume by Signor Bonifazio, of Genoa.

Mr. Greene proves himself a sympathetic and a trustworthy expositor: I would add an invariably discerning critic, but for certain things he has included and certain poets whom he has left unrepresented; and an impartial editor, but for his strange omission of any acknowledgment, or even barest recognition, of Dai Nostri Poeti Viventi. It is incredible that he has not seen the book; and it seems probable that he has found it of real service. He has selected thirty-four poets, all of whom are represented in Signorina Levi's volume, with the exception of two young recruits who have come to the front later, Ada Negri and Augusto Ferrero, and of the librettists G. Targioni-Tozzetti and G. Menasci, whom Signorina Levi did not regard as coming within the scope of an anthology of the most noteworthy contemporary poetry. True, he has not followed his predecessor's lead in his choice of poems, though Ersilio Ricci, Alinda Bonacci-Brunamonti, Giovanni Marradi, Domenico Milelli, Armando Perotti, A. Vivanti, and Antonio Zardo are represented in Italian Lyrists of To-day by the same pieces as in Dai Nostri Poeti Viventi; and Antonio Fogazzaro by two out of three, Arturo Graf by three out of six, Enrico Panzacchi by two out of six, and "Lorenzo Stecchetti" by two out of four; while in Carducci's "Snowfall" I recognise the lovely "Nevicata" which I first knew in Dai Nostri Poeti Viventi, and in Countess Lara's "In the Evening," that cosmopolitan lady's fine sonnet "Di Sera."

Of course there is no valid objection to even more extensive use of "material to hand." What the English reader is concerned with is the adequate representation of the leading poets, in selection and in literal and artistic translation. But Mr. Greene's omission seems to me to be due either to forgetfulness or to a discourtesy which one cannot attribute to him without adequate proof. For the rest, I have nothing but praise for a task intelligently undertaken and admirably accomplished.

No; there is one minor critical objection. If he had room for the librettists alluded to above (who, as they are included, might as well have been represented more adequately than by the fugitive trifle given, and not at his best, by Mr. Greene), and even for Zardo and, I may add, even for Milelli, well and good. But then, why exclude Raffaello Barbieri; Felice Cavallotti, whose stirring "Marcia di Leonida" hums in one's ears like some heroic strain; Luigi Conforti, with his fine nature-touches; Pasquale Papa, with his blithe madrigals; Luigi Pinelli, with his delicate "transcripts from nature"; and other poets whose names will occur to students of contemporary Italian literature?

Where Mr. Greene's book is of most value, from the student's point of view, is in the biographical prefaces which accompany the several selections. These are trustworthy, and generally adequate as concise summaries. Not only is irrelevant matter excluded, but really essential facts alone are chronicled. The critical judgments and opinions incorporated in most of these notices are examples of what criticism should be—a conscientious, catholic, and urbanely expressed estimate. They add a definite amount of information to the too slight stock of authentic data available even among those Italian sources to which one naturally turns. Again, to many readers, no doubt to the great majority, there is much in the suggestive preliminary essay which will have the attraction of novelty. In any case, it should be read carefully.

It is no slight gain for the English reader that Mr. Greene has, almost invariably, followed the original distribution of the rhymes as well as the original metre. As students of Italian poetry will readily understand, he has occasionally been embarrassed by those rhymeless dactylic endings, known as sdrucciolo rhymes, so common in Italian and often so singularly effective, as, for example, in Carducci's practically untranslatable "Inno a Satana." The frequent employment of vowel-elision, again, has been a difficulty—sometimes overcome, it must be added, with singular success.

Personally, I think the editor's arrangement, in accordance with the alphabetical order of the poets' names, a mistake. An anthology of sonnets or lyrics, with probably only one or two pieces to each poet, may be thus classified with advantage; but not a series of translations by poets of different epochs and widely varying talent and artistic motive. The result is that we have the youngest of Italian poets*—or the youngest but one—first in this volume, and that veterans such as Carducci, Nencioni, and Chiarini come after their juniors, and sometimes are juxtaposed in a most annoying way—as when we find that fine poet and finer critic, Nencioni, who was born fifty-three years ago, sandwiched between the young schoolmistress-author of Fatalità (Ada Negri), whose book is still being reviewed as "recent," and Enrico Panzacchi, with whom he has no obvious poetic kinship.

In another sense, however, Mr. Greene could not have struck a more significant note than by his start with Gabriele D'Annunzio, the Chatterton, or Oliver Madox Brown, and more, of contemporary Italian literature. There is no more interesting literary personality in Europe at this moment than this young poet and novelist: born on the Adriatic, fostered in the Abruzzi, feverishly acclaimed and perilously overwrought in Rome, and regenerated by a return to that region where he derives his best inspiration from the solitude of hill and valley and the not far distant sea.

* In allusion to the Roman literature-loving publisher, Sommaruga, whose zeal did not save him from disaster. In his day he was to "Young Italy" what Léon Vanier, with more success, has been to "Young France."

* But is not Mr. Greene mistaken in ranking Gabriele D'Annunzio under "A"? The prepositional conjunction here is an integral part of the surname. Mr. Greene, moreover, rightly tabulates Edmondo De Amicis under "D"?

It is suggestive, for those who seek parallels in literary movements, to note that, as so markedly in France at this moment, several of these Italian singers are not of unmixed blood or even always of Italian birth. Thus, Arturo Graf is of German parentage on the father's side, of Italian on the mother's, and by birth a Greek: the Countess Lara (Signora Cattermole-Mancini) is the daughter of an English father and a Russian mother, French by birth, and Italian only by adoption: Annie Vivanti is Italian through her father, English through her mother, and a Londoner by birth.

It is pleasant to note that the finer the original, the finer, as a rule, is its English equivalent. Mr. Greene is at his best in his renderings of Carducci, Arturo Graf, D'Annunzio, and Panzacchi. Of all the younger men, D'Annunzio, Arturo Graf, and Augusto Ferrero seem to me the poets from whom most is to be expected, though it may be that only the first-named will be able to join "the laureate few." Arturo Graf is as profound a pessimist as Leopardi, but he has the invariable note of sincerity which Leopardi so often failed to convey.

If Mr. Greene has sometimes failed to convey the charm of the original—as in the instance of Antonio Fogazzaro's beautiful "A Sera"—it occasionally happens that, to say the least, he gives a happier turn to his lines than we discern in the Italian. I have just compared his little poem "The Dead Child" with Signorina Vivanti's "Bambina Morta"; and though I have always thought it, since I first read it, one of the loveliest child-poems in Italian, I admit my preference for the English rendering.

It is, perhaps, easier to succeed as a translator in sonnet-form, or in "slow-paced decasyllabics." But let me finish my notice of a delightful and welcome book by quoting a stanza, in English and in Italian, to prove that Mr. Greene can catch both the sense and the music of his original, even when that original has a swift lyrical movement, and even when the exigencies of translation demand a paraphrastic rendering. The Italian excerpt is from a poem entitled "L' Orologio della Torre" in A. Bonacci Brunamonti's Nuovi Canti:

"Siccome la goccia sonora
In conca di porfido scende,
Egual, monotona l'ora
Il bronzo percosso vi rende.
Del tempo l'origine ignora
Chi il tutto nel tempo comprende.
Chiedete dell' oggi i pensieri
Congiungere al senno di ieri?"

"Like the drip of slow water descending
On the depths of its porphyry bower,
The bronze stroke of Time forth is sending
Each equal monotonous hour.
Of Time the beginning and ending
We know not, though Time be our dower.
Can we read in its last open pages
The thoughts of the sepulchred ages?"

WILLIAM SHARP.

A Book of Recollections. By John Cordy Jeaffreson. (Hurst & Blackett.)

MR. JEAFFRESON has, in his time, mixed much with literary men, and done much literary work. He has written several novels; has put together books about Lawyers, and Doctors, and Parsons; has given to the world studies on the Real Byron, and the Real Shelley, and on Robert Stephenson; has treated at length one or two historical subjects; has been a busy critic and reviewer; and has, moreover, classified and catalogued energetically among national and other archives. Assuredly one whose past has been so fully and honourably occupied may claim a respectful hearing when he speaks of his own life and its doings, and of the people he has met.

Among those people there is one who stands towering by a head and shoulders above the rest, and Mr. Jeaffreson shows some sense of proportion in devoting so many pages to Thackeray. Not that the two were on terms of great personal friendship.

"Our pleasant intercourse," says the younger man, "would not justify me in speaking of myself as one of his intimate friends, for he neither invited me to his house nor crossed my threshold during the whole course of our acquaintanceship. I was never more to him than an acquaintance, with whom he liked to chat when we came upon one another in the house of a common friend, at clubs and taverns, at the British Museum, in the public ways, and at places of public amusement."

Even so, however, it is a pleasure to meet one of the dwindling band who really had personal knowledge of the master—one whom he knew at least sufficiently well to address as "youngster" and "young 'un"; one who used, in the days lang syne, to look in of nights at Evans's on the chance of a chat; nay, one who had the courage, when directly questioned, to tell the great man he was wrong in the now historic quarrel with Mr. Yates, and that he had made "a prodigious mistake."

"The immediate consequence of these words was," says Mr. Jeaffreson, "that Thackeray, flushing with surprise and irritation, exclaimed, 'Confound your impudence, youngster!' Rising to my feet at this outbreak of petulance, I looked steadily into my companion's face before I answered slowly, 'Pardon me, Mr. Thackeray, for not flattering you with an untruth, when you pressed me to give you information.' . . . 'You were quite right,' returned Thackeray, 'and it is for me to beg your pardon. You were right to tell me the truth, and I thank you for telling it. Since Vanity Fair people have been less quick to tell me the truth than they were before the book made me successful. But, but'—as he said 'but, but,' he rose from his seat to his full height and looked down upon me with a face coloured with emotion—'But, but,' he continued, 'you may not think, young 'un, that I am quarrelling with Mr. Yates. I am hitting the man behind him.'"

"The man behind him" was, of course, Dickens, and this conversation is, on the whole, the most important thing which Mr. Jeaffreson records regarding Thackeray. Mr. Yates has, very naturally, already taken note of the words italicised, as containing a very damaging admission on the part of his erewhile adversary; and it may at once be owned that they furnish valuable direct evidence on the question whether the quarrel, ostensibly between Thackeray and Mr. Yates, was really the outcome of jealousy between Thackeray and Dickens. Mr. Jeaffreson, commenting on some words of my own—and for the courtesy of his references to myself I beg hereby to thank him—says that further evidence to the same effect will one day be forthcoming. If so, one would prefer to suspend judgment. The subject, small in one way, is really not unimportant; for nothing can be quite unimportant that tends to throw additional light on the characters of such men as Dickens and Thackeray.

There are records of other quarrels in Mr. Jeaffreson's book: as, for instance, of a battle royal, with blows and lifelong estrangement, between Sir Francis Palgrave and Thomas Duffus Hardy; and Mr. Jeaffreson has much to tell of the humours and concerns of the past generation of literary journalists, and authors of the second or third rank—Hepworth Dixon, James Hannay, Halliwell-Phillips, and others. How far that half-forgotten world retains an interest for the general reader of to-day, it is not very easy to estimate. Except to the eye of the specialist, the light very soon fades from all but the greatest names of a particular time. For myself, I own that, apart from the portions relating to Thackeray, what has interested me most in the book is the account of the author's earlier years, and the "postscript of six chapters for the benefit of social historians." Born at Framlingham, in Suffolk, and evidently retaining a keen love for his old home, Mr. Jeaffreson has succeeded in producing a graphic account of society as it existed in East Anglia some half century ago, when the small landowner still flourished, and the prosperous local tradesman often merged into the landowner, and the line of demarcation between town and county, in East Anglia at least, was not harshly drawn. A pleasant picture of middle-class life, still racy of the soil, vigorous, wholesome, uncentralised, is here presented. Such a piece of social and family history was well worth preserving.

Without being specially a good hater, Mr. Jeaffreson has his dislikes. He evidently thinks meanly of Abraham Hayward as a man of many "airs"; and poor Mr. Andrew Arcedeckne, whilom of the Garrick Club, and prototype of Foker in Pendennis, fares but badly in his hands; while it is clearly only "as a Christian" that he can be said to have forgiven a certain nameless somebody who went about the world declaring that he (Mr. Jeaffreson) had written for the Athenaeum articles which he had not written. Generally, however, this chronicle is a kindly chronicle, and leaves an impression of good temper as well as of reasonableness and straightforwardness.

FRANK T. MARZIALS.

Clear Round. By E. A. Gordon. (Sampson Low.)

For the sum of one hundred guineas steamboat and railway companies will convey with speed and comfort travellers who wish to journey either Westward or Eastward, making the complete round of the northern hemisphere. Their advertisements invite us to go, and from the crowds which gather at meal times in the saloons and dining cars it is evident that their invitation is accepted very freely. The author appears to have taken advantage of these facilities for transit from place to place. Franked by a circular ticket she travelled without rest or stay, and with but a change from ship to train and from train to ship, from Liverpool to Yokohama. The glances from the deck or observation car during her rapid progress supplied her with material for this book. Upon so slight a foundation has been built a volume of some four hundred pages. It has been, no doubt, an agreeable task to gather together and edit the mass of travellers' tales that pass from mouth to mouth, and arrange excerpts from the guide-books with which all self-respecting travellers are supplied, or which lie well thumbed upon the shelves of ships' libraries. But the labour has been undergone again and again, sometimes successfully, but too frequently as an escape for the feelings of surprise and delight which find insufficient outlet in letters to friends or relations.

The bent of the mind of the author leans towards the stories of missionary adventure and the history of early American and Japanese missions. Upon these subjects she has expended much time, and drawn largely from the legends of the French Canadian Fathers and Saints, from the pure well of Griffis, and from the life of St. Francis Xavier, and the accounts recorded of the persecution of native Christians in Japan during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. We have given to us full details of the barbarities inflicted upon Père Jogues by the Mohawks; and how, amid tortures unspeakable, though his left thumb had been cut off, and he had been suspended by his wrists so that his feet could not touch the ground, he yet converted some Hurons and baptized them with the raindrops that clung to an ear of corn brought to him as food. Before these terrible histories the persecutions of the Japanese Christians pale in severity, although Mrs. Gordon has done her best to enable her readers to make the comparison.

Touching upon events of more recent times, the tale as told by the author of Nijima, the founder of Dōshisha college; and his successful efforts to "catch" European knowledge and impart the benefits of it, together with the teaching of the Christian religion, to his fellow-countrymen form one of the most interesting episodes in the reopening of the East to Western influences. Mrs. Gordon can write graphically and condense her facts, when she leaves for a moment the story of the martyrs. Thus she describes the arrival of Commodore Perry and the opening of Japan:

"At last, in the providence of God, through the sperm whale, the Morning Land was unveiled. In 1853 warships appeared in Yedo Bay, off a small fishing village (now Yokohama); and Commodore Perry delivered a letter from the President of the United States, demanding the release of some American whalers, and that Japan be thrown open to commerce, and announced that he would return next year for the reply. One Sunday in the next year Perry returned with seven warships and anchored in Mississippi Bay, astonishing the natives by his peaceful demonstration. Divine service was held, and the Old Hundredth Psalm rang out over the waters. Frightened by the American black ships, Japan at last opened her doors and permitted foreigners to settle in certain ports."

From one of these ports to another, from Yokohama to Nagasaki, passing by way of delightful Miyanosita to Kioto and the South, Mrs. Gordon continued her pilgrimage, and caught the steamer to Hong Kong, after a stay of three weeks on land. Of the rest of her journeyings little can be said; is it not written in the guide-books, the signposts of the well-trodden round? Such observations as she makes are those of a lady deeply inspired with religious feelings, and are entitled to respect; but the general reader, beguiled by the aptness of the chapter headings—"The Children of the Sunrise," "With the Celestials," "In the Tropic of Cancer," "The Land of Mysteries"—may rightly complain of the lack of humour and the tone of seriousness with which palpable and gross travellers' tales are foisted upon him.

S. M'CALMONT HILL.

NEW NOVELS.

A Comedy of Masks. By Ernest Dowson and Arthur Moore. In 3 vols. (Heinemann.)

Dr. Grey's Patient. By Mrs. G. S. Reaney. In 3 vols. (Bliss, Sands & Foster.)

Paul Romer. By C. T. Hargreaves. (A. & C. Black.)

Wreckers and Methodists. By H. D. Lowry. (Heinemann.)

The Iron Pirate. By Max Pemberton. (Cassells.)

The Quickening of Caliban. By J. Compton Rickett. (Cassells.)

My Poor Niece. By Rosalind Masson. (Fisher Unwin.)

God's Will. By Ilse Frapan. Translated by Helen A. Macdonell. (Fisher Unwin.)

PHILIP RAINHAM, the hero of this pathetic tale, bears so close a resemblance to Robert Allisten, the "disagreeable man" of Miss Harraden's charming story, that one finds oneself unconsciously blending the two books; indeed, there is a strong spiritual affinity between them. The authors of A Comedy of Masks have other literary teachers. Their pages indicate that they have studied, and to advantage, both Thackeray and Meredith. This is not to say that the novel, either in plot, characterisation, or style, is deduced from any work or works of those authors. What is intended is far more flattering to the collaborators: nothing other than that no two writers, who had not assimilated these masters, could have produced a book like this. Notwithstanding its suggestions of other notable work, it is both fresh and spirited. Philip Rainham, the dilettante with a lung which sent him to winter abroad each year, is a delightful creation. A man of thought, at a critical moment he can be a man of action. That the girl he had loved, as child and woman, should not learn the story of her husband's baseness—that her young life should not be blasted, he takes upon himself the husband's sin, thereby branding himself, in the eyes of the woman he adored, as a seducer and deserter. This character is strongly drawn, and it is admirably conceived. As for Richard Lightmark, he is, so far as his art career goes, the living image of a score or so diplomatic painters of one's acquaintance, whose talents, lost to the City, are ultimately enshrined in the Academic body. As for Oswyn, the man of genius, to whom his art is his religion, the questionable part of his presentment is his triumph during his lifetime. To such as he fame generally comes posthumously. Admirable self-control is shown in the drawing of Charles Sylvester, the common-sense respectable man; but I do not follow altogether the later developments of his action, and this remark applies also to the doings of Eva Lightmark. I am not questioning the characterisation; I am uneasy about definite acts. The last scenes of the novel are hurried, and probability is sacrificed at the expense of compression. A Comedy of Masks stands out conspicuously; its authors are to be cordially congratulated on their first appearance.

Although Dr. Grey's Patient is avowedly a book with a purpose, Mrs. Reaney has taken care not to lay the burden of that purpose upon the reader, whose faculties will be sufficiently imposed upon in following the intricacies of the plot. In the last chapter the author's intention is divulged, and her teaching regarding the ordinance of marriage is found to be one which all right-thinking persons will applaud. If the manifest high purpose of this writer does not induce the reader to condone much that is crude and conventional, and more that is melodramatic and impossible, her ingenuity and facility will. A difficult plot is managed with dexterity, organically considered, if the filling-in leaves much to be desired. The principal doctor of a provincial town is celebrating his silver wedding, when a mysterious stranger forces himself upon him, imploring him to come at once to his wife, who urgently needs his services. Having ushered a child into the world, he is offered a thousand pounds if he will assist it out again. Here we have a gross improbability to start with. A man of education and in his right mind would make no such daring proposal to an utter stranger, whose integrity was a bye-word in the town. Moreover, the doctor would have lodged information with the police. The child, Glory St. Claire, is put from her by the fond mother, and grows up in ignorance of her parentage. We next meet the mother as the wife of a respectable citizen, and the father as a satyr of the "Modern Babylon" type. He is, moreover, in full pursuit of his daughter. This, to say the least of it, is risky; but Mrs. Reaney avoids giving offence. From this point the numerous cross marriages, real and spurious, lead to a pretty crop of complications; and although the interest is sustained, the puzzle becomes tiresome. It would be easy to make merry and to say severe things about the gross inconsistencies in this book. The author's strength does not lie in the rational delineation of incident and character, and a nimble inventiveness in regard to situation is a dangerous gift if not held well in check. Mrs. Reaney will probably do better.

Despite certain blemishes, Paul Romer is a work of considerable promise. But the author must check his proneness to exaggerate. His humour is a little strained, and his characterisation, excellent broadly considered, is faulty in detail. Faults of style there are in plenty, which the author's undoubted fluency cannot excuse. There is far too much preachment and moralising, and young men do not quote Scott in the middle of ordinary conversation. Mr. Hargreaves makes manifest his keen appreciation of natural beauty in good descriptive writing. He has a true feeling for skies: he writes about them feelingly and accurately. But his talk on art, and especially about the "masterpieces of the Academy" is belated and impossible; moreover, the monkey becomes a superfluous impertinence; after Dorine de Moneglas' "Jacko" in An Old Maid's Love, "Tim" cuts a poor figure. Mr. Hargreaves' method is admirable. His tale marches: it is constructed on sound principles, his characters and his incidents fall naturally into their places; there is no clumsy scene shifting, and for this he deserves our hearty thanks.

In Wreckers and Methods we have performance, not promise merely. Mr. Lowry's method is primarily naturalistic. He gives us a series of crisp, direct studies, troubling himself little about plot: he invites us to take the skeletons he offers us, we can clothe them or not as we choose. We find ourselves wondering how he produces his effects with materials apparently so simple. Occasionally he deals with the supernatural, but when he does so he scorns to attempt explanations. Obviously his method allows him to shirk many difficulties: abrupt conclusions and unexplained enigmas save trouble. But then stories which never fail to interest, and never fall flat—unless it be in the solitary instance of "On Friday Night"—must have a special virtue of their own. Sometimes we are reminded of Barrie, sometimes of Quiller Couch, and now and again, as in "Going Back," of Kipling, while "History" has something of the weirdness and horror of Edgar Allan Poe. Mr. Lowry is conscientious: he describes what he has seen. His tales are convincing because they are close studies made on the spot. Cornwall is being added to the corners of the earth which the higher fiction is illuminating. Mr. Lowry gives vitality to these rugged fisher-folk; he deals with them feelingly and knowingly, identifying himself with their joys and their sorrows, their backslidings and their aspirations. His terse, nervous English, his unstrained humour, will gain for him general readers, while his insight into the springs of human action will commend him to the more thoughtful. The pathos of "Baucis" is unquestionable; while nothing could be more eerie than the tale of the wrecker who, scrunching the finger of a beautiful woman between his teeth in his effort to remove from it a valuable ring, momentarily raises her from the dead.

A tale which can keep a man, who has been reviewing and writing novels for these seven or eight years past, out of his bed half through the night, especially when that reader makes no pretence to care for the impossible story, must have something fairly forcible to say for itself. I do not assert that The Iron Pirate has imagination: imagination is not made of this cast-iron kind of ingenuity, it is of a far finer and subtler texture. The story has not even originality, for most of us have conceived its plot in embryo—an ironclad pirate haunting the track of ocean-bound steamers and robbing them of their specie. Such a vessel must have some obvious advantage to permit of its escape when pursued by a ship of its own calibre. Electricity at once suggests itself; but Mr. Pemberton chooses oil as the motor that enabled Captain Black and his devilish crew to fly through the water at twenty-nine knots an hour. The terrible experiences of the men who set themselves to capture these monsters are set forth with wonderful spirit, though in almost every chapter some glaring inconsistency irritates the reader. Personally I am sincerely grateful to the author, who, heaping horror on horror's head, spares us the greatest horror of all. Sickening details of bloodshed are relieved by the real interest which any attempt to describe the awful incidents of modern naval warfare must have for Englishmen. But Mr. Pemberton does not harrow us by referring to that nameless horror which must have been associated with Captain Black's hellish trade. We can read of men blown in half, their upper members standing like busts on the deck; but we could not read of the fate of defenceless women at the hands of these furies.

To encounter three really distinctive books in succession is a stroke of good fortune. Mr. Rickett's "modern story of evolution" is stimulating reading. It proves nothing, and, I apprehend, the author had no intention that it should. Bokrie, the African, around whom the incisive speculations and criticisms of the author play like a shower of flung assegais, is supposed to belong to a tribe of half men, half apes. The weak part of the business is that, so far from this "missing link" showing to disadvantage as compared with the ordinary human being, he is, at all times, distinctly above the standard in both moral and intellectual qualities. As for his alleged weakness of will, the average vagrant, to say nothing of the self-indulgent club-man, could give him points there and beat him. His physical peculiarities do not transpire; we hear something of his webbed toes, but this abnormality is a common enough freak of Nature. Now and again the story becomes tedious from over-elaboration. Nothing in the book is more actual than the duologue between a Zulu maiden and a young English girl. I have overheard in Natal precisely the same battle of wits. But this and other digressions stop the progress of the tale, which, however, with all its faults, is brimful of meaning, suggestion, and fine satire.

There is not the slightest question that Miss Masson has a genuine gift of narrative. These tales are slight, but they are eminently artistic. So considered they surpass in excellence any of the books here reviewed. The tone of the first two is decidedly pessimistic; Da Capo, by far the strongest of the three, is almost tragic in its pathos. Nevertheless, the volume closes with a note of gladness.

Ilse Frapan's stories need no recommendation from me, though one may be permitted to express one's gratitude to Miss Helen A. Macdonell for presenting them to us in English. She has done her work well. God's Will, the longest, which gives its title to the volume, is not the best of the series: it collapses toward the end. The tales have a distinct flavour of their own, and it is a very pleasant one. I shall have sufficiently discharged my duty by strongly recommending them to those who prefer sober studies of life to sensational travesties.

JAMES STANLEY LITTLE.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Scotland Yesterday: Some Old Friends. By William Wallace. (Hodder & Stoughton.) Whether in the main the personages depicted in these twenty sketches are reproductions from a photographic memory or the creations of a well controlled imagination, it is impossible for the reader to determine. They present themselves, however, in such a questionable—or rather in such an unquestionable—shape, they wear such an aspect of week-day reality, that one feels all but assured they must have been men and women belonging to that curiously monotonous and yet so often picturesque village and town life which, in Scotland as elsewhere, is fast receding below the horizon. Either way, the result is to Mr. Wallace's praise. If "The Rustic Semiramis," "The Orra Man," "The Lost Crichton," "The Old Lady of Quality" are merely imaginary types, the skill and consistency of insight with which Mr. Wallace has simulated the actual are gifts to be envied. On the other hand, suppose the characters to be real, and one cannot fail to be struck with the sobriety and self-restraint with which the author has adhered to fact. It would have been so easy, and it must have been so tempting, to "work up" all this excellent material into short stories. A little dash of colour here, a little stroke of sensation there, and the feat would have been accomplished. Indeed, one even feels aggrieved that the story of Mrs. Blunt St. Clair, who jilted her cousin, the Earl of Dunallan, for the wild dream of attaining the crown of Italy, and who drifted back to the solitude of St. Serf's, broken-hearted and aged, should have been compressed into a dozen pages instead of being developed into a couple of Meredithian volumes. Naturally, these twenty-one sketches are not of equal interest, though the majority run each other close in that respect. In literary merit and in scrupulous workmanship, they stand on a single level, if one may except a couple of phrases which might well be modified in a second edition. "In the same category with the late Professor Fawcett" (p. 48), is not a happy periphrasis for blindness; and the fact that Mr. Grant Allen holds Teutonic good sense in contempt (p. 95) does not help the reader, with all respect to Mr. Grant Allen, to qualify in any way his appreciation of Teutonic good sense. As it seems impossible at the present moment to describe life in any odd nook and corner of the three kingdoms without reminding the critic of that magical word "Thrums," it is but fair to say that, so far as one can see, Scotland

Yesterday would have been written—it is just as likely as not—had Mr. Barrie never penned his delightful idylls; and that the interest, the keen portraiture, the touches of pathos and of humour in these sketches of an east country village and a west country town are the results of quite a different personality and a wholly independent experience. Accurate perception and long familiarity are perceptible on every page; and to those who take an interest in a lifelike portrayal of persons and circumstances which seem to be disappearing in Scotland before the spread of an Anglicising element—that such an element is spreading or even exists will perhaps be wrathfully denied—Mr. Wallace's attractive volume may be heartily commended.

Hic et Ubique. By Sir William Fraser. (Sampson Low.) A book composed mainly of personal anecdotes, and compiled by a man who has seen much of the world, is not likely to be lacking in entertainment; and an idle hour or two may be very agreeably spent in turning over the leaves of this little volume. Its contents are, however, very unequal in value—indeed, in some of them it is difficult to discern any value at all—and it would have been better if Sir William Fraser had fished in the sea of memory with a more widely-meshed net than the one which he has chosen to use. Entries that are trivial, pointless, fatuous, or for some other reason entirely uninteresting, are far too numerous; and though the volume is not too bulky to be carried with ease in the average coat-pocket, it would have been better worth carrying had it been only half the size. It is impossible that any ordinarily constituted human being can feel that he is being either instructed or entertained by an elaborate description of the personal appearance of such an utterly insignificant person as the fourteenth Marquess of Winchester; by a story of the vulgarity of a deceased Duchess of Somerset; by a rambling record of indiscretion of an unnamed "great lady"; or by various critical remarks which are not unfairly sampled by the illuminating verdict upon Rogers—"Rogers, like Cowper, will always, as a poet, please a certain order of minds." Of course, these trivialities only occupy a portion (though far too large a portion) of Sir William's pages; and his reminiscences of such distinguished persons as the first Lord Lytton, Lord Beaconsfield, Thackeray, Cruikshank, and Gustave Doré are decidedly readable. Many of the records of incident and conversation are, however, deprived of real biographical value by the omission of dates, attendant circumstances, or any other evidence which would enable us to gauge their trustworthiness. Sir William Fraser's bona fides is, of course, beyond question; but we wish he had told us whether, in compiling his recollections, he has relied solely upon memory—which plays strange tricks with all of us—or whether he has been aided by entries made in a journal or commonplace book at a time when the recorded incident or remark was too fresh to be in any way misrelated. We are specially thinking of certain stories of Thackeray, which represent the great novelist in so very unfavourable a light that it would be a real satisfaction to find any excuse for doubting their absolute accuracy; and the odd thing is that Sir William Fraser does not seem in the least conscious that he is exposing to contempt a man for whom he evidently entertained feelings of ardent respect and admiration. In addition to the purely anecdotal matter, the volume contains some scattered notes on literary matters, one or two of which have a certain interest. The derivation of the word "dandy" from "dandelion"—the bright yellow of the familiar flower being reproduced in the coats of the smart men at the end of the last century—is doubtful; but Sir William seems to be successful in clearing Pope from the charge of having perpetrated an inexcusable rhyme in the couplet:

"Worth makes the man, the want of it the fellow;
The rest is nought but leather and prunella."

He has discovered that in old dictionaries "prunello," not "prunella," is given as the name of the material referred to, and the former was in all probability the word that Pope used. There is also an interesting note on the place-name Ullin twice used by Campbell. No such place is to be found in the Western Highlands, but there is a small lake called Loch Aline; and the suggestion that Campbell utilised this name, the local pronunciation of which resembles "Ullin," is rendered plausible by the fact that "Ulva's Isle" and all the other places named are, with this single exception, well known in the district.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MR. MACLEHOSE, publisher to the University of Glasgow, will issue early in December a book on the two famous brothers, Dr. William and Dr. John Hunter, written by Dr. George Mather. Besides a full biography, it will also contain a history of the two anatomical museums which they founded, in Glasgow and in London. The illustrations include photogravures of William Sharpe's engravings after the portraits of the brothers by Sir Joshua Reynolds, and several etchings by Mr. D. Y. Cameron.

MESSRS. SAMPSON LOW & Co. will publish immediately Dr. Henry Lansdell's account of his third expedition into the interior of Asia. On former occasions he traversed Siberia and the Russian Khanates. The goal of his latest journey was Lassa, which—we need hardly say—he failed to reach, though he carried with him a letter to the Grand Lama from the Archbishop of Canterbury. But he did explore Chinese Turkestan pretty thoroughly, approaching it from Kuldja by an ice pass which he believes no European has crossed before; and then proceeded through Little Tibet into India. The book will be in two large volumes, with nearly a hundred illustrations. In appendices are given lists of the fauna collected by the author; and a bibliography of Chinese Central Asia, consisting of 742 titles, with an alphabetical catalogue of authors.

MR. J. ASHBY STERRY has just completed a novel entitled A Naughty Girl: a Story of 1893. It will be published at the end of this month in Messrs. Bliss, Sands & Foster's "Modern Library."

Polly Oliver's Problem is the title of Mrs. Wiggan's new book, which will be published next week by Messrs. Gay & Bird. The same firm will also publish a novel in two volumes by Miss Gilberta M. F. Lyon, entitled For Good or Evil; and a small volume of poems by Theodore Wratislaw, under the title of Caprices. The edition will be limited to 100 copies on hand-made paper and twenty on Japanese vellum; it is printed by the Rugby Press, and Mr. Gleeson White has designed the cover.

JONAS LIE's first novel, The Visionary; or Pictures from Nordland, translated from the Norwegian by Jessie Muir, with a portrait of the author and an introductory preface, will be published in a few days by Messrs. Hodder Bros.

By Moorland and Lea is a new volume of Nature Sketches by Mr. F. A. Knight, the author of "By Leafy Ways," announced for immediate publication by Mr. Elliot Stock. The same firm will publish forthwith a translation of the Egils Saga into English prose, by Mr. C. W. Green.

MR. STANLEY WEYMAN contributes a novel entitled "The Man in Black" to this year's Yule Tide, which will be published by Messrs.

Cassell & Co. on November 22. In addition to seven pictures in colours and tints by A. G. Elsley, Yeend King, Walter Paget, and Bernard Munns, there will be a Carol by Q., set to music by Prof. Villiers Stanford; while Mr. Manville Fenn contributes a comedy in miniature entitled "A Diamond Ring."

MESSRS. METHUEN will publish on November 28 a new edition of Dodo, by Mr. E. F. Benson, in one volume. No less than ten editions of the book in its two volume form have already been sold.

MR. CHARLES J. CLARK, of Lincoln's Inn Fields, has now ready for issue to subscribers, on account of the Hakluyt Society, Early Voyages and Travels in the Levant, edited, with introduction and notes, by Mr. J. Theodore Bent. The volume contains the diary of Master Thomas Dallam, 1599-1600, and extracts from the diaries of Dr. John Covell, 1670-1679, with some account of the Levant Company of Turkey Merchants.

THE success of the Quatuor Coronati Lodge illustrates what may be termed the "revival of learning" in freemasonry. Barely seven years ago the Lodge, which was formed on a literary basis, established an Outer or Correspondence Circle, consisting of subscribers to its Transactions; and the number of members who have already joined the association approaches two thousand. At the annual festival on November 8, Dr. Wynn Westcott was installed as Master, in the room of Prof. T. Hayter Lewis. The new wardens are the Rev. C. J. Ball and Mr. Edward Macbean.

M. PAUL VERLAINE will give a lecture, in French, on "Contemporary French Poetry," in the hall of Barnard's Inn, Holborn, on Tuesday next, November 21, at 8.45 p.m. Application for tickets, price 10s., should be made to Mr. Arthur Symonds, Fountain-court, Temple; or Mr. John Lane, the Bodley Head, Vigostreet, W.

AT the first meeting of the Royal Statistical Society, to be held on Tuesday next, at the Museum of Practical Geology, Jernyn-street, the president, Mr. Charles Booth, will deliver the opening address, entitled "Life and Labour in London: First Results of an Inquiry based on the 1891 Census."

ON Thursday and Friday next, Messrs. Sotheby will sell a collection of peculiar interest: a portion of the library of Mr. W. Carew Hazlitt, and all the papers which he inherited from his grandfather, William Hazlitt. Here is to be found not only the original MS. of the Liber Amoris, but also the private letters to Patmore upon which it was based, and the contemporary diary of the lawful wife; several folio volumes of Hazlitt's correspondence, including thirty-three letters from Charles and Mary Lamb; some long letters of Leigh Hunt on the Shelley question; and an acrostic poem of nineteen lines, by Charles Lamb, which has never been published. Among the books are: the first quarto of The Merchant of Venice (1600), and other Shakesperiana; first editions of Milton, Sterne, Gray, Goldsmith, Shelley, Keats, Poe, Tennyson, and Swinburne; a copy of Prince Dorus, with coloured plates, in the original wrapper; and a large number of volumes that are made interesting by autograph inscriptions.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

THE two vacancies at Oxford caused by the death of Prof. Jowett have both been filled up during the present week. Mr. Ingram Bywater, reader in Greek, has been translated to the regius professorship; and the fellows of Balliol have summoned Prof. Edward Caird from Glasgow to be their new master.

A LEADER-WRITER in the Times, after two days' consideration, says of Mr. Bywater:

"He has published very little; we can only recall, besides certain papers in the learned reviews, a thin book containing the Fragments of Heracleitus, with brief Latin notes."

Mr. Bywater—it ought to be unnecessary to state—is the author of the standard critical edition of the text of the Nicomachean Ethics, and a contributor to the great edition of the Scholia on Aristotle, which is being published by the Berlin Academy. He has also been for many years one of the editors of the Journal of Philology.

THERE is printed in the Oxford University Gazette a report of the proceedings of a committee of Council appointed to consider the question of the study of English. The committee first decided against the establishment of an honour school in English, and Council adopted this decision. They then suggested that English literary subjects might be introduced into the modern history school; but this suggestion met with no support from the board of faculty of modern history. Finally, they recommend the creation of a university scholarship, of the value of £30, "for the promotion of the study of the English language and literature," with a provision that the names of unsuccessful candidates may be mentioned as having passed "with distinction" and "with credit." It appears that the funds of the Taylor Institution are not available for this purpose.

IN answer to an appeal in the address of the retiring Vice-Chancellor (Dr. J. Peile), a member of the senate at Cambridge has offered to give £100, in the present academical year, for the support of higher work in the Pathological Laboratory.

CONVOCATION at Oxford has adopted a memorial to the prime minister, praying that a Commission be appointed to inquire into the present state of secondary education, before any legislation on the subject is proposed.

A MEMORIAL has been addressed to the Hebdomadal Council at Oxford, signed by all (we believe) of the demonstrators in the departments of natural science, praying that the appointment of a demonstrator should be a University act, and that he should not be liable to summary dismissal, except with the consent of the visitatorial board.

MR. HUBERT HERKOMER, Slade professor of fine art at Oxford, will deliver during next week six lectures, with demonstrations, on "Portrait Painting." Each lecture will be given twice: in the morning, to a general audience, admitted by ticket; and in the afternoon, to members of the university only.

MR. BEVAN, Lord Almoner's reader in Arabic at Cambridge, will deliver a public lecture next Saturday on "The Arabic Poets of the Umayyad Period."

Two public lectures were delivered at Oxford during this week—by Prof. Earle, on "The Saxon Chronicle: its Nature and the Benefits of its Study"; and by Prof. Rhys, on "Arthur as he figures in Welsh Literature."

AT a joint meeting of the Philological and Ancient History Societies at Oxford, held on Friday of this week, Mr. F. Haverfield was to read a paper on "Roman Britain," dealing specially with the Roads and with Hadrian's Wall.

THE lectureship in Burmese for India Civil Service probationers at Cambridge will shortly be vacant, through the resignation of Mr. Taw Sein Ko. The board will appoint his successor early in the Easter term of next year.

THE twentieth annual report of the Local Examinations and Lectures Syndicate at Cambridge, covering the work done during the session 1892-3, has just been published. About 220 courses of lectures have been given at nearly 200 places. The aggregate of the average number of students attending the courses was 16,000. The average number of weekly papers written by students was about 2600, and more than 1700 passed the examination held at the end of the courses.

PROF. KARL PEARSON will deliver four lectures at Gresham College during next week, beginning on Tuesday at 6 p.m., upon "The Geometry of Chance: being the Elements of the Theory of Errors and of the Theory of Frequency." The lectures will be illustrated with lantern and diagram, and are free to the public.

THE post of principal in the Durham College of Science, at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, is now vacant. The salary is £500 a year; and it is not required that candidates should have made any branch of science their special study.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

IN THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

SHAFTS of light, that poured from the autumn sun,
Glowed on long, red walls of the gallery cool:
Fell on marble visions of ages gone,
Still smiling Sphinx, winged and bearded Bull.

Hither a poor woman, with sad eyes, came
And vacantly looked around. The faces vast,
Their strange, motionless features touched with flame,
Awed her: in humble wonder she hurried past,

And shyly beneath a sombre monument sought
Obscurity: into the darkest shade she crept,
And rested. Soon, diverted awhile, her thought
Returned to its own trouble. At last she slept.

Not long sweet sleep alone her spirit possessed.
A dream seized her, a solemn and strange dream.
For far from home, in an unknown country oppressed

By burning sun, in the noon's terrible beam,
She wandered. Around her, out of the plain arose

Immense Forms, that high above her stared:
Calm they seemed, and used to human woes;
Silent they heard her sorrow, with ears prepared.

Now, like a bird, flitting with anxious wings,
Imprisoned within some vast cathedral aisles,
Hither and thither she flutters: to each she brings Her prayer, and is answered only with grave smiles.

Indescribably troubled, O crush me! she cries:
Speak, speak, or crush me! Their lips are dumb.

She woke, no longer in shadow, the light in her eyes;
And sighed, and arose, and returned to her empty home.

LAURENCE BINYON.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

MR. WISE contributes to the Antiquary an interesting paper on Henry VIII.'s connexion with Rockingham Park. The information contained in it will be of great service to anyone in the future who may be moved to write a life of the great Tudor. Mr. Auden prints a document relating to the tenure known as Borough-English, as it exists at Ford, Salop. We trust it may be the means of inducing some one to compile a list of Borough-English manors. It is said that this ancient method of devolution of real estate does not exist north of the Humber. Of this we have no evidence; but there are far more Borough-English manors in the East, the Midlands, and the South than is commonly supposed. Mr. Robert Blair gives a good account of the museum which forms a part of the Free Library of Sunderland. The collection of historical objects does not appear to be an important one. Mr. Bailey's notes on the stained glass in the Commandery at Worcester are worthy of attention. These relics date, we imagine, from the latter part of the fifteenth century. The designs are highly conventional, but much more pleasing than a great part of the elaborate work of the present day.

SELECTED FOREIGN BOOKS.

GENERAL LITERATURE.

- ADELIN, Jules. Les Arts de reproduction vulgaires. Paris: May & Motteroz. 10 fr.
ANTON, G. K. Französische Agrarpolitik in Algien. Leipzig: Duncker & Humblot. 2 M. 80 Pf.
BING, J. Novalis. Eine biograph. Charakteristik. Hamburg: Voeg. 4 M.
CRIZZUOLI, W. Geschichte d. neueren Drama. I. Bd. Mittelalter u. Frührenaissance. Halle: Niemeyer. 11 M.
DÜRER'S schriftlicher Nachlass, hrsg. v. K. Lange u. F. Fuhs. Halle: Niemeyer. 10 M.
FRIEDRICH, W. Sechs Monate Indien. Jagd- u. Reisebilder. Leipzig: Fischer. 25 M.
FURTWÄNGLER, A. Meisterwerke der griechischen Plastik. Kunstgeschichtliche Untersuchungen. Leipzig: Giesche. 75 M.
GALICH, A. Don Ignacio: Mœurs basques. Paris: Charpentier. 3 fr. 50 c.
GOERING, A. Vom tropischen Tiefdruck zum ewigen Schnee. Leipzig: Fischer. 25 M.
LEITZSCH, F. F. Geschichte der Karolingischen Malerei, ihr Bilderkreis u. seine Quellen. Berlin: Siemsen. 11 M.
MÉNÈS, Octave. Petits poèmes russes, mis en vers français. Paris: Charpentier. 1 fr. 50 c.
OSBORN, M. Die Tugendliteratur des 16. Jahrh. Berlin: Mayer & Müller. 7 M.
PAULHAN, Fr. Les Caractères. Paris: Alcan. 5 fr.
SANDER, O. de. Bondan Française. Kabel: Carnet de voyage. Paris: Alcan. 8 fr.
STAPFER, P. Des réputations littéraires. 1re Série. Paris: Hachette. 3 fr. 50 c.
VALLÉE, Léon. La Bibliothèque Nationale: choix de documents pour servir à l'histoire de l'établissement et de ses collections. Paris: Terquem. 15 fr.

THEOLOGY, ETC.

- BOHNENBERGER, K. Der altindische Gott Varuna nach den Liedern des Rigveda. Tübingen: Laupp. 3 M.
DIETRICH, A. Nekyia. Beiträge zur Erklärung der antientdeckten Petrusapokalypse. Leipzig: Teubner. 6 M.
FRILCHENFELD, W. Das Hohelied, inhaltlich u. sprachlich erläutert. Breslau: Koebner. 8 M.
RUNZE, G. Studien zur vergleichenden Religionswissenschaft. II. Berlin: Gaertner. 5 M.
SCHWARTZ, A. Die Erleichterungen der Schammlaube u. die Erleichterungen der Hilleiten. Karlsruhe: Bielefeld. 8 M. 60 Pf.

HISTORY, ETC.

- BILLERBECK, A. Sum. Eine Studie zur alten Geschichte Westasiens. Leipzig: Hinrichs. 5 M. 50 Pf.
BOHM EDLER v. BOHMERBERG, A. Steiner Alpen. Ein Beitrag zur Entwicklungsgeschichte der Gebirgsgruppennamen. Wien: Gerold. 8 M.
BROGLIE, le Duc de. Maurice de Saxe et le Marquis d'Argenson. Paris: Calmann Lévy. 7 fr.
BUHL, F. Geschichte der Eodimeter. Leipzig: Edelmann. 1 M. 80 Pf.
CHARLES, Fr. Etudes historiques et diplomatiques. Paris: Hachette. 3 fr. 50 c.
DACHSCHNAB, H. Gründung des Bagratidenreiches durch Anshot Bagratuni. Berlin: Mayer & Müller. 2 M. 40 Pf.
GRUPP, G. Kulturgeschichte d. Mittelalters. I. Bd. Stuttgart: Roth. 6 M. 20 Pf.
HORNIG, F. Der Volkskrieg an der Loire im Herbst 1870. 2. Bd. Berlin: Mittler. 8 M. 50 Pf.
KÜCKELHAUS, Th. Der Ursprung des Planes vom ewigen Frieden in den Memoiren des Herzogs v. Sully. Berlin: Speyer. 8 M. 50 Pf.
LETTOW-VORBECK, O. v. Der Krieg v. 1806 u. 1807. 3 Bd. Der Feldzug in Polen. Berlin: Mittler. 5 M. 50 Pf.
MONUMENTA Germaniae paedagogica. 12. u. 15. Bd. Berlin: Hofmann. 88 M.
MÜLLER, H. Die Entwicklung der Feldartillerie, von 1815 bis 1892. Berlin: Mittler. 16 M.
PRIDK, E. De Alexandri Magni epistularum commercia. Berlin: Speyer. 8 M.
PUBLIKATIONEN der Gesellschaft f. rheinische Geschichtskunde. X. Bonn: Behrendt. 10 M.
RICHTER, W. Studien u. Quellen zur Paderborner Geschichte. I. Thl. Paderborn. 2 M.
SANDER, P. Der Kampf Heinrichs IV. u. Gregors VII. von der 2. Exkommunikation des Königs bis zu seiner Kaiserkrönung. Berlin: Bath. 4 M.
SARZEC, H. de. Découvertes en Chaldée. 2e Livr. 2e Fasc. Paris: Leroux. 15 fr.
SCHNELLER, Ch. Beiträge zur Ortsnamenkunde Tirols. I. Hft. Innsbruck. 2 M.
SEBELING, M. Daniel v. Superville. Das Kanzleramt an der Universität Erlangen. Leipzig: Velt. 6 M.
WATZ, G. Deutsche Verfassungsgeschichte. 5. Bd. Berlin: Weidmann. 13 M.

PHYSICAL SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

- ALTMANN, B. Die Elementarorganismen u. ihre Beziehungen zu den Zellen. 2. Aufl. Leipzig: Veit. 32 M.
BASTIAN, A. Controversen in der Ethnologie. I. Die geograph. Provinzen in ihrer culturgeschichtl. Entwicklungspuncten. Berlin: Weidmann. 2 M. 40 Pf.

- BIESSE, A. Die Philosophie d. Metaphorischen. Hamburg: Voss. 5 M.
 KRAUSE, K. Ch. F. Der Begriff der Philosophie. 2 M. 50 Pf. Der Erdrechtsbund an sich selbst u. seinem Verhältnisse zum Ganzen u. zu allen Einzeltheilen des Menschheitslebens. 5 M. Leipzig: Schulze.
 NOVATO, M. Die Philosophie d. Nicolaus Malebranche. Berlin: Mayer & Müller. 2 M.
 PAYOT, Jules. L'Education de la Volonté. Paris: Alcan. 5 fr.
 UPHURD, G. K. Psychologie des Erkennens vom empirischen Standpunkte. 1. Bd. Leipzig: Engelmann. 6 M.

PHILOLOGY, ETC.

- GEMOLL, W. Die Realien bei Horaz. 3. Hft. Berlin: Gaertner. 8 M. 60 Pf.
 GRIMME, H. Der Strophenbau in den Gedichten Ephraems des Syrers. Freiburg (Schweiz): Beith. 4 M.
 HENRY, Victor. Précis de Grammaire comparée de l'Anglais et de l'Allemand, rapportés à leur origine commune. Paris: Hachette. 7 fr. 50 c.
 PLUTARCHI Chaeronensis Moralia, recognovit G. N. Bernardakis. Vol. V. Leipzig: Teubner. 3 M.
 SALLUSTI CRISPI, C. historiarum reliquiae. Ed. B. Maurenbrecher. Fasc. II. Leipzig: Teubner. 8 M.
 SCRIPTORUM physiognomici graeci et latini, recensuit R. Foerster. Leipzig: Teubner. 14 M.
 SUPPLEMENTUM Aristotelicum. Vol. III, pars 1. Ed. H. Diels. Berlin: Reimer. 5 M.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"GRAY" OR "GREY."

Oxford: Nov. 13, 1893.

This is a well-known instance of a word in which the spelling is still variable, and in which the variability is, in proportion to the size of the word, considerable. I am trying to collect statistics as to English usage on the subject, and shall be obliged to every reader of the ACADEMY who will send me by postcard (or by letter if he objects to postcards) a statement of his own usage in the matter. I should prefer a spontaneous statement without reference to dictionaries. I am also desirous of knowing the usage of individual printing-offices. In the course of personal inquiries I have discovered that a large number of persons have different associations with the two spellings, and instinctively use grey in certain contexts, and gray in others. Of this I should be glad also to know more. I am also told that artists, or some artists, habitually distinguish grey and gray. I shall be grateful to any artists who will inform me as to their practice. I have already before me several hundred literary examples from the past three centuries, the results of which are very curious, but which I do not now communicate, lest they should prejudice the statement of current educated usage. Address merely, Dr. Murray, Oxford.
 J. A. H. MURRAY.

THE LEGEND OF PARACURĀMA.

London: Nov. 4, 1893.

The legend of Paracurāma is thus told by the late H. H. Wilson, in his Catalogue of the Mackenzie Collection (2nd edition, Madras, 1882, p. 56):

"This hero, after the destruction of the Kshatriya race, bestowed the earth upon the Brāhmins, who repaid the obligation by banishing him as a homicide from among them. Being thus at a loss for a domicile, he solicited one of the ocean, and its regent deity consented to yield him as much land as he could hurl his battle-axe [paraçu = πικρυς] along. Paracurāma threw the weapon from Gokernam to Kumāri, and the retiring ocean yielded him the coast of Malabar below the latitude of 15°."

So, in his Glossary of Judicial and Revenue Terms, the former Boden Professor of Sanskrit describes Paracurāma as an avatar of Vishnu, who recovered Kerala, or Malabar, from the sea, "by casting his axe from a point of the coast, Mount Dilli, . . . to the extreme south; the sea retiring from the part over which the axe flew."

A strangely similar story is contained in the Dindshenchas, a collection of topographical legends in the Irish language, compiled, probably, in the twelfth century. The story has been published from the Book of Ballymote, in Mr. S. H. O'Grady's Silva Gadelica, ii. 473, 518. The following version is from the Irish MS. at Rennes (fo. 124^b). Other copies are contained in the Book of Lecan (p. 520^b) in a MS. in the Advocates Library, Edinburgh (Kilbride xvi., fo. 5^b 1), and in H. 3. 3, a vellum in the library of Trinity College, Dublin.

"[T]raig Tuirbe, canas roaimniged?"

"Ni ansa .i. Tuirbe Tragmar, athair Gobain Soir, is e rodonseib. Is on forba is e sin focseir-dedh aurchur dia bliail* a Taulaigh in Bela fii hagaiid in tulle, cona uirgeidh in fairrge, 7 ni tuidhcedh tairis. Ocus ni fes can a genelach sainriud acht minip oen dona hespadachaib atrullatar o Temraig riasin Sab n-Ildanach,† fil a ndiamraib Bregh. Unde Traig Tuirbe."

"Traig Tuirbi 'Tuirbe's Strand,' whence was it named?"

"Easy to say. Tuirbe Tragmar, the father of the Gobban Saer, 'tis he that owned it. 'Tis he that from that heritage, [standing] on Tulach in Bela 'the Hill of the Axe,' would hurl a cast of his axe in the face of the flowing tide, and forbid the sea, which then would not come over the axe. And his special pedigree is unknown, unless, indeed, he be one of the defectives who fled from Tara before the Strong-one Master of many arts, and [whose descendants] are [now] in the secret places of Bregia. Whence is Traig Tuirbi."

I believe that Traig Tuirbi has been identified with a beautiful sea-strand near Malahide, about nine miles north of Dublin. As to the Gobban Saer and Lugh the master of many arts, students may refer to Petrie's Round Towers (pp. 382, 383), O'Curry's Manners and Customs (iii., p. 41), and the Revue Celtique (xii. pp. 75-81).

WHITLEY STOKES.

WAS LINDUM A COLONIA?

London: Nov. 11, 1893.

So far as I can see, Mr. Haverfield's note leaves the question exactly where it was. Granting that the decurio of the inscription (Hübner vii. 189) is more probably a civil than a military title, the fact that Lindum had decuriones does not, as Mr. Haverfield acknowledges, prove that Lindum was a colony: at the very most, it proves only what we knew before, that the town was a place of considerable importance. Perhaps it would not even prove this; for I see that the writer of the article "Decurio" in Pauly says that the possession of decuriones is no indication of the status of a town. It is true that the only other non-military decurio mentioned in a British inscription belonged to the colony of Glevum; on the other hand, in that instance the title is DEC. COLONIAE GLEVENSIS, not DEC. alone, as in the Lincoln example. Mr. Haverfield takes no account of the only ground on which I consider the current derivation to be doubtful: viz., that the name Lindcylne occurs in Kent, under circumstances which suggests that it descends from a British Lindocolina. I do not contend that this justifies anything more than doubt of the correctness of the derivation of -coln from colonia; but it seems to me that it does justify a doubt, which would not be removed by a demonstration that Lindum had in fact the rank of a colony. The only thing that would really dispose of the objection would be a proof that the Kentish Lindcylne is a possible English compound, with lind, "lime-tree" for its first element, and denoting some object that could serve as a boundary. At present I see no likelihood of this. At the same time, I know too much of the frequency with which curious coincidences occur in language to dispute the possibility that Lindocolina might have one

* See all the MSS. save B, which has, corruptly, buil.

† A corruption of samlidánach, (the reading of the Edinburgh MS.) i.e., συνμολύτης, if one may coin a Greek word.

etymology in the Kentish example, and a totally different one in the name of the city by the Witham.

Considered apart from this one objection, the derivation of Lincoln from colonia is, as I before admitted, philologically quite legitimate. No doubt Mr. Round is right in thinking that the Latin combination Lindum Colonia is not likely to have been current as a name. But as the word lindon simply meant "lake," the Britons might very naturally find it necessary to affix some other word to distinguish the name of the town from the mere appellative. And on the supposition that the Britons had adopted the Latin word colonia, they may very well have employed that word as the distinctive affix. It is not, however, known that they did adopt the word.

Mr. Evans's letter raises a very interesting question, but I do not think that his thesis is sound, at least in the extension which he himself would give to it; and most of his examples of the derivation of river-names from names of towns appear to be either untenable or very uncertain. Instances of this mode of formation may no doubt occur; but unquestionable evidence of the contrary process are so abundant that, when a town and a river on which it stands bear the same name, the antecedent presumption must be in favour of the priority of the river-name.* This presumption may be rebutted by showing that the etymology of the name is appropriate to the designation of a town, but not to that of a river. In hardly any of Mr. Evans's instances is this kind of proof available. Until we know the derivation of Scampa, it seems rash to affirm that the Genusus had not an alias, which gave rise to the city-name, and is preserved in the modern name of the river. The Dacian Ampelum is surely more likely to have been a native word than the Greek word for vine; and if so, how do we know that it was not the ancient name of the river? We do not know the etymology of Cunetio; but the probability that it was a river-name is strengthened by the occurrence of Rhaeadr Cynwyd in Wales. As to Corinium, there are other rivers called Churn besides the one at Cirencester; the one which somehow has become Cerne gives its name to Charminster. (The O.E. form Cirne, with palatal c, indicates a British pronunciation Carini; is this a later development, or is Ptolemy's Κορίνιον a mistake for Κορίνιον?) Don is the name of many other British rivers than that which flowed by Danum; if it be objected that we have no proof that the original form was Dāno, the analogy of Dānubius seems to indicate that this form may be a river-name. Gobannium looks at first sight a strong case, because it might be taken to mean "smithy." But as there is evidence that a derivation of the word for "smith" was the name of a British deity, and that Celtic river-names were sometimes derived from names of gods, even this instance can hardly be relied upon. Mr. Evans might have quoted the name Derwent. Two of the rivers so named flowed by Roman towns called Derventio, a name which seems to mean a place abounding with oaks, and answers phonetically to the Welsh Derwenydd. This, however, may be an adjectival formation, applicable to a river as well as to a town; and another possibility is that Dervent in the river-name is a participle, having no connexion with the word for "oak."

I come now to the question of the Colnes.

*It may be worth noting that the conversion of a place-name into a river-name without change of form (i.e. without composition or derivative suffix), while quite easy in a language like modern English with its attributive substantives, or modern Welsh with its flexionless genitives, would not be at all so easy in a fully inflected language. The reverse process was, on the contrary, quite natural, because place-names very frequently originated from the locative case of a word denoting some object by which the situation of the place was indicated.

Even the bold supposition, that the Colne on which Colonia Camulodunum stood had no etymological connexion with colonia, might be defended on the same ground which constrains me to admit that the coincidence of the two instances of Lindcylne may possibly be accidental. But without going this length, it may be contended that the Essex Colne is a backward inference from Colnechester, suggested by the facts that Colne was a well-known river-name, and that the naming of towns after rivers was a familiar phenomenon. The supposition that all the rivers so named, including the Clun (formerly Colunwy) and the French Colin, derive their appellation from colonia is full of difficulty. Mr. Evans has to assume that the Britons used colonia in such a loose sense that they applied it to any Roman town (which, by the way, would destroy the evidential value of the coln of Lincoln). This assumption is quite unsupported by evidence; but even if we knew that "colonies" (so-called) were as plentiful in Britain as "colonels" are in the United States, we should still want to know why the word "colony" should have become a favourite name for rivers.

As to the identification of the localities mentioned in the Kentish Charter, Mr. McClure's suggestion, that Plumwarding pearrocas may be Plumworth near Ospringe, is plausible so far as the coincidence of name goes; but the locality is much farther away from Bexley than even that suggested by me. Apparently we have to find a river "Avene" running east and west, and a Lindcylne flowing northward into it. My hypothesis, though very uncertain, at least fulfils these conditions. If my identifications be mistaken, it is a curious accident that it should have been possible to find in juxtaposition modern names that might correctly represent the Heanyfre and the Lindcylne of the Charter, and two streams in the proper relative situation to correspond to Lindcylne and Avene. H. BRADLEY.

London: Nov. 11, 1893

Mr. Haverfield's letter practically weakens, instead of strengthening, the "Lindum colonia" derivation of "Lincoln"; for we now know, from so eminent an authority, that the town "could have the name colonia Lindum quite naturally," but that the form Lindum colonia would be "unusual," and that the coalescing of "the title and name of a town into one modern name" is also "unusual."

The bold and original suggestion of Mr. Evans on the river-name "Colne" rests on the guess that the name colonia "may have" been applied, "in popular language," to many towns not entitled to it. This, which is admittedly a new conjecture, opens up a wide field.

But the question is not merely one of names: it is one of the facts to which these names, and they alone, bear witness. Mr. Evans, for instance, selects the four cities of Eburacum, Camulodunum, Glevum, and Lindum as the true coloniae. Now there are three elements ex hypothesi in the names given them by the English: (1) the native name, latinised as above; (2) the Roman "colonia"; (3) the English "ceaster." Can Mr. Evans or Mr. Haverfield explain why "York" is formed from the first only, "Colchester" from the second (ex hypothesi) and third, "Gloucester" from the first and third, and "Lincoln" from the first and second? If they can account for this discrepancy on any definite principle, it would throw most welcome light on a very obscure period. J. H. ROUND.

London: Nov. 14, 1893.

In affirming that rivers sometimes took their designations from the names of places or districts through which they flow, Mr. Evans has raised an interesting question.

We have a modern instance of this in the Wilham, and an old one, as I take it, in the Somerset Carey (Kari in the eighth century Charter), which flows near several remarkable British earth works (Babecary, &c.) to which the British plural of Cuer, Caeraw, fitly applies.

But Mr. Evans's instances are not, I think, happily selected.

With regard to the Churn's having taken its name from Corinium, we have in such case to account for the numerous rivers which bear this designation in so closely allied forms as to suggest a common origin: e.g., the Cerne (Caern, Cart. Sax. i., 229), which falls into the Frome; the Churn in Perthshire; the Corne (Cart. de Redon) in Brittany; the Corne near Manchester (Leland); the Carun (Nennius) now the Carron; Aber-Curn-ig, now Abercorn, &c. The Kennet also seems a generic river-name: e.g., the Kent in Westmorland; Kentford in Suffolk; and the first element in Exeter, Ilchester (cf. with the river Ivel, the Ewel in Brittany), Lancaster (on the Lune and in Lonsdale), is, like that in Doncaster (cf. sever rivers Don), a river name.

The rivers called Colne, mentioned by Mr. Evans, have parallels elsewhere, which make it difficult to believe in their being all derived from colonia: e.g., Cyllan-wylla (Charter of A.D. 772), cf. the Culan in Banshire; the Caln in Wilts, and the Calunwy (now Clun) in Shropshire mentioned by Leland.

The name of the Celtic war god Camulos seems to be associated with the several rivers Camel, as well as with Camalodunum. It is possible to see in many rivers, Cole, Colne, Calne, an echo of this name. An m flanked by vowels has a tendency in the Celtic languages to disappear, leaving as compensation a lengthened vowel. Thus the Caer Coel of the Welsh, and Old King Cole himself, may contain a reminiscence of the Celtic divinity. If the ancient name of Chalons (Caladunno: Pard. Dipl.) is from an earlier Camaladunno, we have an instance in point.

EDMUND MCCLURE.

THE BATTLE OF FONTENOY: BY ONE WHO WAS PRESENT.

Oxford Nov. 4, 1891.

The following letter, which I have transcribed by kind permission of Mr. C. H. Firth from the original in his possession, gives a graphic sketch of the Battle of Fontenoy by one of the youngest officers—it is to be hoped—who were engaged. Lord Charles Hay, the author of the historic request to the French guards to fire first, was severely wounded, but recovered and survived till 1760 (Dictionary of National Biography, xxv., 253).

C. E. DOBLE.

"DEAR AUNT,—I would have writ to you since I came to y^e fi-ld but really I have not had time; I have not had time to sleep this six days but what I got on y^e ground, and nothing to cover me but y^e Skies, we have had a most bloody battle wth y^e french, yesterday we begun at 5 in y^e morning and left off at 2 in y^e afternoon, all w^{ch} time y^e french kept cannonading us; I was forced to be very civil and make a great many bows to y^e balls, for they were very near me, for both my right and Left hand men were kill'd, and all round me there were men and horses tumbling about, but thank god none touched me. we could do nothing but stand there and be knocked on y^e head, fer they had a great many batteries and three times y^e number of cannon y^e we had, and besides that they were entrenched up to y^e ears that we could not hurt them. we fir'd upon a Little

* As an evidence that philological considerations have to be supplemented by history, in tracing the modern forms of ancient names, one has simply to look at Chura and Cern-ey in their relation to Corinium, village very smartly where they had a Battery. The foot were very sadly cut to Pieces, for y^e french Put grape shot into their cannon and cut them down just as if they were sheering corn. there is a great many officers kill'd in y^e Infantry, in y^e Welsh Fusiliers only two came of y^e field Without a Wound. my Lord Charles Hay and charles Ross are both kill'd, and Andrew Sandilands very ill Wounded, and a great many Others but you will hear a more Perfect Account of it soon, and What Number of Men is not yet Known. we have a Cornett Missing in our Regiment so we think he is kill'd, and a captain Wounded. there is Not an Officer in My Lord Stairs's hurt. I Long'd for Y^m to come to it Sowrd in hand but they durst not do y^e. I had my horse shot just in y^e Knee wth a Musket ball, and I am afraid he will be always Lame. I was forced to go of y^e field and get my other horse. I did not regard y^e small Bullets after y^e cannon Balls in y^e Least, tho they came bussing about me Like Bees, and I had got by one of y^e Standards Where they came very fast for they were Shooting at y^e Standards Like Mad, but at Last we were Oblig'd to retreat for their was no standing their cannon as they were intrench'd, fer we cou'd Not see any thing scarce but their bits of White Paper in their hats but I hope we shall be revenged of them for this trick. Y^e General is very well and sends his compliments to you. I just writ y^e to Let you know I am well. I recollected y^e I must die some time or Other, and if my time was not come I was as safe there as any Where Else. Pray My duty to Mama, Grandmama, Love to my Brothers and sisters and service to Every body Else.

"I am Dear Aunt your most dutyfull

"Nephew

"CHARLES JAMES HAMILTON.

"May 12 N.S. 1745.

(In another hand)

"Brother to the Earl of "Haddington aged 16."

"HEINE, THE FRENCHMAN."

London: Nov. 7, 1891.

"To most of us," Mr. Lionel Johnson writes in the ACADEMY of Nov. 4, "Chamisso is best known as the Frenchman who became German, much as the German Heine became French."

Chamisso emigrated with his parents to Germany at the age of nine, and certainly became thoroughly German. Heine went to Paris at the age of thirty, and certainly remained thoroughly German—so much so that he rebelled against the idea of being mistaken for one of a race of which he sometimes said, in his more outrageous and by no means recommendable style, that it was "covered with a monkey-skin" (Affenhaut).

Heine would not even become a naturalised citizen of France. In his Retrospective Explanation (1854) he says:

"It was my droll pride as a German poet which prevented me from becoming a Frenchman even pro forma. It was a caprice of my idealism, of which I could not divest myself. In regard to what we generally call patriotism, I have always held free notions. Yet I could not defend myself from a kind of shivering fit when I was to do anything which, even in a slight degree, might have looked like a renunciation of my fatherland."

Again:

"Naturalisation may suit other persons. . . . It does not suit a German poet who has written the most beautiful German songs. It would be a horrible, lunatic idea for me if I had to say to myself that I am a German poet, and at the same time a naturalised Frenchman. I should feel as if I were one of those monstrosities with two heads that are shown in the booths of a fair. I should be hampered, in composing a poem, in the most unbearable manner, if I thought that one of those heads suddenly began to scan the most unnatural alexandrines in French turkey-cock paths, whilst the other head was pouring forth its feelings in its inborn, true, and natural metres of the German tongue. And oh, how utterly intolerable are to me the metres, as well as the verses, of the French—that perfumed trash! It is with difficulty I even bear their better and odourless poets. When I look upon that so-called poésie lyrique of the French, then only do I perceive the full grandeur of German poetry; and then I might truly be proud of being able to boast that I had won my laurels in this domain. Nor will we give up a single leaf of them; and the mason who shall have to adorn our last sleeping-place with an inscription, shall not have to fear a protest when he engraves upon it the words: 'Here lies a German poet!'

KARL BLIND.

APPOINTMENTS FOR NEXT WEEK.

SUNDAY, Nov. 19, 4 p.m. Sunday Lecture: "The Spanish Armada," by Mr. E. L. S. Horsburgh.
4 p.m. South Place Institute: "Tailoring," by Mr. Terence A. Flynn.

7.30 p.m. Ethical: "Justice," II, by Mr. W. M. Salter.

MONDAY, Nov. 20, 5 p.m. London Institution: "Birds, Ancient and Modern," by Dr. R. Bowdler Sharpe.

8 p.m. Royal Academy: "The Cambristry of Palatine Grounds," by Prof. A. H. Church.

8 p.m. Aristotelian: "The Conception of Necessity as applied to Nature and Man," by Mr. D. G. Ritchie.

TUESDAY, Nov. 21, 6 p.m. London Institution: "The Principles of Commercial Geography applied to the British Empire," VIII, by Dr. H. S. Mull.

7.45 p.m. Statistical: Inaugural Address by the President, Mr. C. Booth, "Life and Labour in London: First Results of an Inquiry based on the 1891 Census."

8 p.m. Civil Engineers: "The Tansa Works for the Water-supply of Bombay," by Mr. W. J. B. Clarke; "The Baroda Water-works," by Jagannath Sadasejee; "The Water-supply of Mysore, Rajputana," by Col. S. S. Jacob; "The Design of Masonry Dams," by Prof. Franz Kretzer.

8.30 p.m. Zoological: "The Spiders of the Family Atidae of the Island of St. Vincent," by Messrs. G. W. and E. G. Peckham; "List of the Hemiptera Heteroptera collected in the Island of St. Vincent by Mr. Herbert H. Smith, with Descriptions of New Genera and Species," by Mr. P. B. Uhler; "Observations on the Refraction and Vision of the Seal's Eye," by Dr. G. Lindsay Johnson.

WEDNESDAY, Nov. 22, 8 p.m. Society of Arts: "Conformation of the Horse from the Artistic Point of View," by Capt. M. H. Hayes.

8 p.m. Geological: "The Basic Eruptive Rocks of Gram, Christiania District," by Prof. W. U. Brögger; "The Sequence of Perlitic and Spherulitic Structures," by Mr. Frank Butley; "Enclosures of Quartz in Lava of Stromboli, &c., and the Changes in Composition produced by them," by Prof. H. J. Johnston-Lavis.

THURSDAY, Nov. 23, 5 p.m. London Institution: "Two Remarkable Song-Writers," by Mr. Carl Armbruster.

8 p.m. Royal Academy: "Vehicles and Varnishes," by Prof. A. H. Church.

8 p.m. Electrical Engineers: Discussion, "The Electrical Transmission of Power from Niagara Falls," by Prof. G. Forbes.

FRIDAY, Nov. 24, 5 p.m. Physical: "The Magnetic Shielding of Concentric Spherical Shells," by Prof. A. W. Rüchler; "The Action of Electro-magnetic Radiation on Films containing Metallic Powders," by Prof. G. M. Minchin.

7 p.m. Amateur Scientific: "The Dawning of Life," by Mr. J. Wilson Wiley.

SATURDAY, Nov. 25, 8.45 p.m. Botanic: General Fortnightly Meeting.

SCIENCE.

THE TĀRĪKH-I-ALFĪ.

WE understand that the Tārīkh-i-Alfī, of which Major Raverty has just completed the translation, is not a hitherto unknown Persian chronicle, though it has never been translated before, with the exception of a brief extract occupying a few pages of Elliot's Indian Historians. Major Raverty's object has been, not to publish it in a separate form, although that may be done hereafter, but to extract from it everything referring to Central Asia, Afghanistan, India, and Persia, for researches which have occupied him for many years past; and copious extracts have also been made from the history of the Crusades and of the Ottoman Empire, Egypt, and even China. As might be expected in such a vast work, it contains a great number of interesting anecdotes, adventures, memoirs, traditions, and stirring episodes, the whole of which the translator has gathered together with the object of publishing them shortly, together with others of a similar kind, which he has been collecting during the last forty years.

The Tārīkh-i-Alfī is a most important historical work, written by command of the Emperor Akbar by some of the most learned men of his court, who made use of all the most valuable histories then known; and there is no Arabic, Persian, or other work of celebrity then procurable which the authors do not quote, and generally with discerning criticism.

All the events up to the rise of the Mughals and the invasion of Islām by the Chingiz Khān were completed when one of the principal authors, Mullā Ahmad, the then Kāzi of Thathah in Sind, who had passed great part of his life in Persia, was one night waylaid in a street at Lahor by a fanatic and murdered, after which the work was completed by the Nawwāb Ja'far Beg, entitled the Āsaf Khān, a noted military captain, chronologist, and poet. He also was a Persian from Kazwin, and his father had been Wazir of Kāshān in Shāh Tamāsib's reign. He came to India in 935 H. (1577 A.D.); and, in the reign of Jahān-gir, was made atālik (governor and tutor) to his son, Prince Farwiz. Nāzib Khān was another of the authors, as well as 'Abd-ul-Kādir, the Budā'uni, the historian; but he soon quarrelled with Mullā Ahmad, as he usually did with everybody, and the work was finally finished by Āsaf Khān, with some assistance.

Contrary to the universal usage of Muhammadans, Akbar chose for the commencement of the work the date of Muhammad's death, instead of the Hijrat or Flight, a difference of just ten years; but Akbar was half a Hindu, and had an object in view in so doing. There are several copies of portions of the work both in Europe and in India; but none are complete, and many are required to make a perfect whole. Elliot says he never heard of a complete copy in India. The statement of his editor, the late Mr. J. Dowson (Elliot's Indian Historians), that the Tārīkh-i-Alfī and Tabakāt-i-Akbari are "very much in accord," is incorrect. The former is the history of all Muhammadan dynasties, the Mughals, and others, for one thousand years; while the latter is a history of the conquest of India by the Turk Sultāns of Ghazni, the Muhammadan dynasties of India up to the time of Akbar, from which Firishtah (not Dow's or Briggs's) copied most of his work, page after page being appropriated almost word for word.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"ORTHROS" AND "DAPHNE" IN THE QUARTERLY REVIEW.

Oxford: Nov. 14, 1891.

I beg to draw attention to two etymological statements occurring in an important article on "Vedic Mythology" in the current number of the Quarterly Review, which ought not to be allowed to pass without comment.

I. The Reviewer, at the end of his article, eloquently dilating on the importance of etymology as an aid to the explanation of the myths of India and Greece, and mentioning, as a case in point, the root VAR, to cover, whence the Skr. Varuna and the Gr. Uranos, goes on to tell us that "it is well known that the same root VAR, to cover, yielded in Skr. the name Vritra, a demon of darkness, the Gr. Orthros."

Vritra = Orthros! To think that such an astounding equation should be categorically affirmed in the scholarly pages of the Quarterly in October, 1893! When the words swam before my eyes, then seemed I like unto one that dreamed; I was at once borne back into the years that are past, even to November, 1855, nearly forty years ago, when the Essay on Bellerophon (reprinted thirteen years after in Chips from a German Workshop) astonished and delighted the literary world with its brilliant generalisations and picturesque etymologies. In that essay we were told, without the slightest misgivings, without any apparent qualms of an etymological conscience, that besides Kerberos "there is a second dog, known by the name of Orthros, the exact copy, I believe, of the Vedic Vritra"; and we were told that Hermes "comes ὄρθρος, i.e., with Vritra, at the time of the final discomfiture of Vritra." We find also the equation Vritra = Orthros assumed in Max Müller's Science of Language (published in 1891, ii. p. 595).

Such an equation as this of Skr. Vritra with a Gr. ὄρθρος was welcomed with delight in the fifties, in the early days of comparative mythology, or even in the sixties, in the days of the "Chips," but must be rejected in the nineties, when so much has been added to our accurate knowledge of Indo-European vocalism and consonantism. The Quarterly Reviewer might have easily found out that this old equation of 1855 really rests on no scientific basis. The Gr. and the Skr. word differ in three essential particulars: (1) in the initial sound, (2) in the vocalisation of the sonantal liquid, and (3) in the medial dental. (1) If ὄρθρος, the alleged cognate of ὄρθρος, had been the equivalent of the Skr. Vritra, there would have been, doubtless, a trace of the original initial semi-vowel in Homeric Greek or in the dialects; but no evidence for a digamma can be brought forward or scientifically inferred for this "well-known" Greek equivalent of the Skr. Vritra. (2) Gr. op cannot be the precise equivalent of Skr. short sonant r, unless v or f follow in the next syllable; but neither modifying condition is met with in the word under discussion. (3) Gr. θ is not the equivalent of Skr. t, but of Skr. dh; where there is tr in Skr. one would expect tr in Greek. The fact is, that the corresponding form of Skr. Vritra in Greek would have been, not ὄρθρος, but ὄρτρος (= ὄρτρος).

But does the dog-name "Orthros" occur in Greek literature? In the essay on Bellerophon, a passage from Hesiod's "Theogony" is the only authority for the word cited by Prof. Max Müller. But the truth is, the word is expelled from the text in all the late German critical editions of Hesiod.

II. On p. 451 the Reviewer tells us that "Daphne was an ancient word which meant originally the burning and shining dawn (from DAH, to burn)."

This etymology is another survival from the imaginative philology of forty years ago. It is found first of all (in an English book, at least) in the brilliant essay on comparative mythology, contributed by Prof. Max Müller to the Oxford Essays in April, 1856—an essay reprinted in Chips from a German Workshop in 1868. We find also the derivation of Daphne from the root DAH repeated in the Gifford Lectures of 1888, and referred to as an indisputable truth in Prof. Max Müller's Science of Language (ii., p. 621). But if we look carefully into the matter, we shall soon see that there is an insuperable objection to any connexion of a Gr. form δάφνη with a root DAH, to burn. The root DAH of Skr. grammarians represents an Indo-European root DHEG'H; this is clearly proved by the Skr. forms of the verb, such as ādhaksit, dhaksyāti (see Brugmann's Grundriss, II., p. 889). This root DHEG'H, by the way, is found in Germanic, cp. Goth. days, Eng. day. Now in Greek the regular representation of I.-E. dh (the media aspirata) is θ, which, from deaspiration in consequence of the following aspirate, would regularly become τ, cp. τῆθημι, Skr. dādhami, I.-E. dhidhemi; τρυφός, cp. Eng. deaf, from I.-E. root DHEUBH; τεῖχος, also τεῖχος, a wall, Skr. deha, a body, Eng. dough, from I.-E. root DEIG'H, to mould or form; also, cp. τρυφός and θρίξ, τέρας and θάνατος, ταχός and θάσσω, τρέφω and θρέψω. We find, without exception, that in Greek the de-aspirated representative of I.-E. dh is τ and not δ. There is no sure example of a Greek δ initial representing a Sanskrit d, the result of de-aspiration. From what has been said, it may be assumed that from the I.-E. root dhregʰn, to burn, instead of δάφνη, we should have had the form τάφνη. Daphne still eludes the pursuit of Phoebeus Apollo.

A. L. MAYHEW.

SCIENCE NOTES.

THE Christmas course of lectures for young people at the Royal Institution will be delivered by Prof. Dewar, who has chosen for his subject, "Air, Gaseous and Liquid."

THE resolution for the incorporation of the London Mathematical Society and the list of names selected for the council for the session 1893-4 (printed in the ACADEMY of October 28) were carried unanimously. The president (Mr. A. B. Kempe) informed the members present of the recent decease of Mr. W. S. B. Woolhouse, in his eighty-fifth year, and gave a sketch of his life and work. He next delivered an address, stating the grounds of the award by the council in June last, of the fourth De Morgan medal to Prof. F. Klein, of Göttingen. In the unavoidable absence of Prof. Klein, the medal was presented to Prof. Greenhill and Dr. Forsyth, who had been deputed to receive it. Both gentlemen made suitable responses.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

IN the current number of the Classical Review (David Nutt), every reader will turn first to the full obituary notice of Prof. Lushington, by Mr. Lewis Campbell. It concludes with a rendering into Greek elegiacs of "The Silent Voices," of which we must be content to quote the first two lines:—

Ἐδὲ ἂν ὀνειρόισιν κερὴ μελαστόλοισι δῶρ τοῦμον ἐπισκιδῶν τηλεπλάνοισι κέρη.

Mr. F. G. Kenyon reports on recent Greek literary discoveries. The most important of these is a considerable fragment of the "Hecale" of Callimachus, hitherto known only by a few isolated lines or single words. The lines are written with ink on one side of a wooden board, resembling a child's slate. The date of the writing is not later than the fourth century A.D. The original belongs to the Rainer collection at Vienna, and has been edited by Prof. Gomperz. Mr. Kenyon also mentions some fragments of an early Greek romance on the subject of Ninus, lately acquired by the Berlin Museum. "The date of the MS. is probably between B.C. 50 and 50 A.D.; from which it follows that, whatever be the exact date of the composition of the romance, it is certainly the earliest extant specimen of that class of literature." Mr. E. E. Sikes, following the methods of Mr. Frazer, explains some of the superstitions preserved in Hesiod's "Works and Days" from the point of view of anthropological folklore. Mr. R. G. Bury examines the use of prepositions in Lysias—oddly misprinted "Lyrics" on the cover. The most important reviews are those of Larfield's "Greek Epigraphy," by Mr. E. S. Roberts, and of Brugmann's "Indo-Germanic Grammar," by Mr. T. C. Snow. W. W. M. characteristically begins a review of two new editions of the "Vespæ" of Aristophanes, with a reference to the extraordinary visitation of last summer. Finally, we may mention that Mr. Robinson Ellis continues his collation of the Madrid MS. of Manilius.

THE English editions of Aristotle's "Constitution of Athens" still continue to attract attention on the continent. In the Berliner Philologische Wochenschrift for October 21, Prof. Bruno Keil, of Strassburg, contributes a brief and appreciative notice of Mr. Kenyon's third edition (1892); while, in the number for November 4, Prof. von Schoeffer, of Moscow, writes a long and (with slight exceptions) highly favourable review of the edition by Dr. Sandys, published by Messrs. Macmillan & Co., in the early part of the present year.

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

CLIFTON SHAKSPEARE SOCIETY.—(Saturday, Oct. 28.)

Miss LOUISA MARY DAVIES, president, in the chair.—Mr. Ulrich W. Just read a paper on "Julius und Hyppolita," and 'The Two Gentlemen of Verona.' "The Tragedy of Julius und Hyppolita" is contained in a collection of English comedies and tragedies printed in 1620, professing to be the acting library of the English players who about that time were visiting Germany. It has been reprinted, with a parallel English translation, in Cohn's Shakspeare in Germany. Cohn gives much information in reference to the travelling English actors. These found the drama in Germany in a very crude state. In the middle of the sixteenth century, Hans Sachs had taken it somewhat out of the region of ecclesiastical plays, and had given noble and energetic expression to the popular thought of his time. But in his plays there is no commanding intellectual force reaching beyond his surroundings. A generation later, Jacob Ayer, who had come under the English influence, was, in 1596, the first to write a separate part for the clown, who hitherto had been expected to improvise everything. The German stage had at this time no professional actors; and the visit of the English players, who made their first appearance in Germany in 1586, had a wonderful effect. The extant form of "Julius und Hyppolita" is evidently a very imperfect and crude representation of the play acted by the English players. There must have existed an earlier English play on the subject of "The Two Gentlemen of Verona," which until now has remained undiscovered; and it is more reasonable to believe that it was to such a play and not to the Diana of Montemayor that Shakspeare was indebted for his plot, especially as Yonge's translation of Diana was not printed till 1598, and the date of "The Two Gentlemen of Verona" is probably about 1591. The play may have been "The History of Felix and Philomena," which was acted by her Majesty's Servants at Greenwich in January, 1585.—Mr. Leo. H. Grindon, in a paper on "The Influence under which 'The Two Gentlemen of Verona' was written," said that Mr. Marshall's suggestion in the "Henry Irving Shakspeare" that the play was written more under the influence of the country than of the town is probably true enough, considering its obviously early date. But when we are told that there is certainly less knowledge of character than observation of nature displayed in its imagery, we are forced to the conclusion that there is no justification for the statement. Imagery is description of character and behaviour through the medium of symbols or emblems. Of this there is in the play one very conspicuous and beautiful example in one of the most finished passages in verse to be found in any author, ancient or modern (II. 7. 25-38). But other examples similar in quality, even approximately, do not exist. And to claim for this that it outweighs the delineations of character in the play as a whole seems unjust to the latter. Nothing can be put more elegantly and thoroughly than Julia's love and perfect faithfulness. She shows the sweetest feminine gentleness when she is so painfully made aware of Proteus's inconstancy. One of the finest attributes of a noble woman is her capacity and her willingness to forgive. Virgil, it is true, tells us of "unrelenting Juno," but we must not take the classical goddess as the type of what a woman is at her best. When searching for this, our safest and surest guide is Shakspeare. Poetry contains no line better illustrative of the good woman than "Because I love him, I must pity him."

In our earlier acquaintance with her, it is true that Julia discloses nothing dignified or pathetic. Shakspeare, when he wrote this play, was not quite competent to depict any of the deeper forms of emotion. Hence, with all the dulcet prettiness of Julia's language, there is little true poetry in it and scarcely a trace of subtlety. But the natural objects and phenomena actually mentioned in the play are extremely few, and such allusions are only of a tentative kind. These were developed later on; for example, the reference to the devouring insect in the flower-bud (I. 1. 45-9) has its finished picture in "Romeo and Juliet" (I. 1. 157-9); and Valentine's eloquent meditations in V. 4 are but the germ of immortal Arden, with its most illustrious of dukes.—Mrs. Meyrick Heath read: "Some Questionings about Act V. of 'The Two Gentlemen of Verona.'" The most superficial reader of the play is struck by the inadequacy of the denouement and the weakness of the last act in dramatic construction and characterisation. By various theories the critics have endeavoured to account for the discrepancy. Hertzberg considered that this part of the original play had been lost and incompletely supplied from the actors' parts. If not too irreverent, it would be possible to supply matter in the last scene which would render less crude and repulsive the sudden and questionable repentance of Proteus for his unparalleled falsity to friend and lover, and the almost more revolting readiness of Valentine not only to forgive so deep a wrong to himself and his love, but to proffer the lady to him who had proved himself in every respect a villain. Silvia might well have something to say both to Proteus and Valentine. She should show to Valentine some remorse and cry his pardon for herself and Proteus, who then professes his repentance. Valentine's speech would then come in with more effect, as he perhaps determines to try both friend and mistress for forgiveness and a half-mischievous offer to Silvia, with such glances at her as show the offer not to be genuine. Silvia would surely respond while Proteus is turning to the fainting page, and, reminding her Valentine that who forgives not on repentance is "nor of heaven nor earth," would be taken wholly to his faithful heart again. Some such additions might account for the otherwise outrageously Quixotic offer of Valentine. The hypothesis that "The Two Gentlemen" was intended by Shakspeare to be superseded by "Twelfth Night" is a plausible one, seeing that the characterisation and incidents in them are so much alike; but it will not explain the deficiencies of the earlier play. The dramatist's youth has been held to be sufficient explanation of the crudity of "The Two Gentlemen"; but the earlier part of the play is very charming, if a trifle sketchy, and the collapse does not come before Act V., in which there is scarcely a character that does not give the lie to the impression made on us earlier in the play. Sir Eglamour was "a gentleman valiant, wise, remorseful, well accomplished," upon whose faith and honour Silvia "reposes." In Act V., at the first hint of danger, he runs away. The Duke, incensed as he was against Valentine, and eager for the match between Silvia and Thurio, has only to see Valentine in the character of an outlaw chief, and witness his threats to Thurio if he as much as breathe on the girl he loves so well and has offered to a libertine, and he is tamed in a moment, and gives vent to the most fulsome flattery his tongue can find. Valentine, although dull, was represented as a gentleman and a true lover. Could he who had given vent to a lament unsurpassed by Romeo, see his mistress again, hear her protestations of love for him, and then, without one word of greeting to her, calmly hand her over as a proof of his forgiveness to the falsest, most perjured ruffian who has ever had his foul deeds exposed? Could Silvia, being a frail mortal woman and truly in love, suffer such an unnatural insult and say not one word of protest? It is not to be believed that Shakspeare wrote Act V. as it now stands. How, why, or when mutilated and defaced, remains to be discovered.—Miss Davies, in a paper entitled "Is Proteus the W.H. of the Sonnets!" said that a suggestion in the "Henry Irving Shakspeare" identifying these two is an interesting one; but at the outset we are met by a difficulty as to dates, those unsympathetic and upsetting factors in so many promising arguments. Mary Fitton, who is now considered beyond disproof to be the Dark Lady of the Sonnets, was born in 1578, and became acquainted with Shakspeare seventeen years later—in 1595—one year before the latest date fixed for "The Two Gentlemen," which may have been written as early as 1591. This seems to give all too short a time for the development of so ardent a love; and on the lady's part, its subsequent diversion to W.H., other reasons may suffice to dismiss the suggestion. The Sonnets are so full of personal descriptions of W.H., that it is difficult to select one that shall epitomise his charm; but we know that the poet laid all the beauties of Nature under contribution to furnish him with adequate language. Valentine's picture of his friend is glowing, but not fulsome, and lacks the fervour we should expect if the persistently-idolised W.H. were the model Shakspeare's loyalty to his friend never permits him to indulge in Valentine's upbraidings of Proteus. Although Valentine places the grievously maimed friendship high above his love, reminding us of Shakspeare's views in Sonnet XL, and although in Valentine's ready forgiveness of his peccant and repentant friend, we have a concise abridgment of the many expressions of affectionate pardon given in the Sonnets, we have against the theory of identity to place the fact that Proteus, outside the loving judgment of Julia and Valentine, leaves on the unprejudiced reader the impression of a man without steadfastness or common honour, a fluent liar, a sneak, a faithless friend, and a perjured lover. Shakspeare, in his Sonnets, adores his friend through all. It seems wholly inconsistent with such worship that Shakspeare should allow even his own inner self to draw such a picture of his friend, quite apart from the recognition of it as a portrait by the outside world.—Dr. Bertram Rogers read a paper on "Dress and Social Customs in 'The Two Gentlemen of Verona.'" The date of the action seems to be in the first half of the sixteenth century, but the allusions show that Shakspeare was referring to things with which he would be familiar from personal knowledge.

PHILOLOGICAL. (Friday, Nov. 3.)

PROF. A. S. NAPIER, president, in the chair.—A paper on Hebrew Etymologies, by the Bishop of Bath and Wells, was read by Mr. Russell Martineau, and was sharply criticised.—Prof. Skeat, at very short notice, took the place of his friend, Mr. Gollancz, who was ill, and laid before the Society some Miscellaneous Notes on Chaucer. Having before shown that Chaucer had Englished the French vire, L. ripera, as "weasel," L. riteria, Prof. Skeat now explained that Chaucer—or the French MS. he followed—has turned Seneca, Fr. Senecus, into Fr. Saint Jacques, St. James, and given us "Saint James in his Epistles," in the "Tale of Melibeus." So the plural "Epistles" is right (as those of "Seneca"), though editors have constantly altered it into "Epistle," as St. James wrote only one. All students of Chaucer MSS. know that the Harleian MS. 3943 contains an old and good part—in an older hand than any other Troilus MS.—and a later bad part. The editors of the MS. have pointed this out. But Prof. Lounsbury states that this MS. is "the worst that has been printed," and proves his saying by taking all his examples from the late bad part, and none from the old good one. This old portion has some excellent readings. It restores the right clene for clere in "Troilus," Bk. V., st. 2, setting the rhyme right—other MSS. do the same—and also gives the right latis lattice, for the unmeaning gatis of other MSS. in Bk. II., l. 615. Justice has not yet been done to Guido delle Colonne (who should not be called "di Colonna," as if he were one of the famous Colonna family at Rome) as one of Chaucer's authorities. It is he, and not Benoit de Sainte-More, who is the main source of such part of "Troilus" as Chaucer did not English or paraphrase from Boccaccio's "Filostrato." Still, Chaucer did take from Benoit a few unimportant details that Guido omitted. In the well-known crux, "as saith Trophée," in the Hercules bit of the Monk's Tale, Guido is certainly Trophee, for he mentions the Pillars of Hercules, and gives a long account of him. Possibly "Trophee" refers to Tropæus, a word having reference to victory and columns, Colonne. The opening lines of Chaucer's Prologue to the "Canterbury Tales" much resemble a passage of Guido on Spring. In the Pardoner's Tale, Chaucer inadvertently wrote Stilbon for Chiron. Stilbon is a name of the planet Mercury; and was familiar to Chaucer, because it occurs (1) in the "Epistola Valerii" of Walter Mapes; (2) in Alanus de Insulis; and (3) in Marcius Capella, all known authorities of Chaucer. His use of Zancis for Zeuxis can be illustrated from a passage in Alanus de Insulis; where one MS. has Zensis, and another Zeuxis. The Campesall MS. of "Troilus"—copied for Henry V. when Prince of Wales, first printed by Dr. Furnivall in his "Parallel Texts," is a very good one, but has faults of "anticipation": that is, the scribe writes down coming letters before he gets to them, as wommat that for woman that. Other interesting Chaucer points were also illustrated, and will be found in Prof. Skeat's edition of the poet, which nears completion.

ARISTOTELIAN.—(Monday, Nov. 6.)

SHADWORTH H. HODGSON, Esq., president, in the chair.—The president delivered the annual address on "The Conception of Infinity." There are two opposite expectations in philosophy which commend themselves, on pre-philosophic grounds, to two different classes of temperaments and dispositions: one, that the universe in its totality will, the other that it will not, prove to be within the intellectual grasp of man. An examination of the conception of Infinity may perhaps throw some light on the truth of these two expectations. Infinity belongs to a class of qualities or attributes which are quantitative. All other attributes are qualities in a narrower sense of the term, and are known to us as feelings of various kinds. All objects of consciousness, abstracting from the fact of their existence, being analysable into constituents of two kinds: (1) feeling, (2) time, or time and space together, occupied by feeling, it is the latter kind only which is immediately and necessarily quantifiable; while differences or changes between feelings are that which marks off the time, or space, which feelings occupy, into measurable quanta. Time and space, therefore, are the only possible things which are immediate subjects of infinity. Our perception of the infinity of time and space, that of time being also called eternity, rests upon the fact, constantly repeated in the most various ways, that wherever limits are found in perception, those limits always have time, or space, on both sides of them, thus making a final limit, or one beyond which there is no time or no space, impossible in perception; so that time and space are infinite both in order of increase and in order of diminution or divisibility. These perceptual facts, when gathered up into a single mental conspectus, become the conception of infinity, which may be formulated as the illimitability of time and space. But though the conception is in one sense but another aspect of the perception or perceived facts, it makes a great difference which of the two we take to represent the ultimate truth of nature. If we say the conception, then all the facts perceived being contained within the limits of the conception, which is a single item in a logical hierarchy of conceptions, the effect is that, since whatever is wholly contained within limits we imagine to be finite, the infinite universe itself seems to be finite, and to be pro tanto brought within the compass of our intellectual grasp. If, on the contrary, we take conceptions to have no validity but what they derive from perceived facts: that is, from experience, our conception of the universe will be very different. It will then appear to consist of two parts: a seen world of which we have positive knowledge; and an unseen world beyond it, which shares the infinity of time and space, but the concrete nature of which we have no means of ascertaining, except such as are afforded by the anticipations necessarily involved in practical obedience to the voice of conscience. On this view, the fact that an unseen world exists is known positively, from analysis of actual experience: our conception of its nature is a corollary from our faith in the actual supremacy of the moral law.

FINE ART.

REPORT ON A HAEMATITE WEIGHT, WITH AN INSCRIPTION IN ANCIENT SEMITIC CHARACTERS, PURCHASED AT SAMARIA IN 1890 BY THOMAS CHAPLIN, ESQ., M.D.

1. The size and form of this object are accurately represented in the woodcut given by Dr. Chaplin in P.E.F. Qu. Statement, October, 1890, p. 267. Prof. König (Einleitung in das A.T., p. 426) describes it as something like a date stone (etwa in Form eines Dattelkerns) which gives a fair general notion of the size, but misses the characteristic point of the form. The weight is, in fact, a very perfect and beautifully finished specimen of a genuine ancient type—spindle-shaped with a flat oval surface in the middle of one side. I have no special acquaintance with ancient weights, and cannot say anything as to the distribution of this particular type; it is known to me by specimens from Egypt, of much larger size but similar pattern, two of which I myself purchased at Gizeh in 1891. The flattening of the middle of one side is obviously convenient as providing a surface on which the weight rests without rolling; but I imagine also that the final adjustment to the standard was made in the process of rubbing down the flat base. The whole aspect of the weight and the skill with which it is shaped and polished seem to me to be strong presumptive evidence that it is genuine. If it be spurious, it is a forgery of a perfectly novel kind, and the first efforts of forgers in a new direction are not generally happy. Of course this argument in favour of the weight does not necessarily apply to the inscription; for it is a well known trick to put a false inscription on a genuine object with a view to enhancing its value.

2. The inscription has been studied by Prof. Sayce, on the original, and by Prof. Euting, the celebrated epigrapher of Strassburg, on the cast published by the Palestine Exploration Fund. The copy of this cast used by Prof. Euting was sent to him by Prof. König, and the results of his examination are briefly communicated by the latter in his Einleitung, p. 425 note. On one side of the weight Prof. Sayce reads רבע של and on the other רבע נצל. As regards the first side, Prof. Euting accepts רבע, but can find no trace of של; as regards the second, he admits that Prof. Sayce's reading is possible if only נצל were a real word and gave sense. But he urges that נצל gives no sense, and that the last letter may be taken as ף instead of ל, in which case the words on the second side are not genuine Hebrew, but the Arabic nisf, "half," in old Hebrew characters, and so necessarily spurious. To all this Prof. Sayce replies that the cast is imperfect and does not represent all the lines of the original, which in his opinion can only be read as he has read it.

3. In this state of the controversy a fresh examination of the original and a thorough comparison between it and the cast were clearly desirable. Through the kindness of Dr. Chaplin, I have had the use of the original for two entire days, during which I have studied it in every way, by natural and artificial light, with the naked eye and under weak and strong lenses. For the purpose of comparison I have been able to use two copies of the cast, one of which was supplied from the office of the Palestine Exploration Fund, while the other was lent me by Prof. Driver. Both these copies appear to me to be excellent, and faithfully to represent every line of the inscription. On this point I entirely agree with what has been already stated by Dr. Chaplin in the ACADEMY of November 4, from his own observation and that of Mr. Armstrong; and I may add that, at my request, my colleague Prof. Bevan and Mr. F. C. Burkitt, both of whom are very competent judges in such matters, were good enough to compare the cast with the original in the disputed place, and could detect no failure in the reproduction. Of course, the metal cast cannot perfectly represent the texture of the stone surface, and the lines are not always quite so sharp as in the original, but they are all there.

4. It is not asserted that there is any difference between the lines on the cast and those on the original, except in the place where Prof. Sayce reads \aleph and Prof. Euting cannot read that word; and as five witnesses are agreed against Prof. Sayce in saying that they can see on the cast every line that appears on the original, it seems reasonable to conclude that Prof. Euting with the cast, and Prof. Sayce with the original, really saw the same lines, but interpreted them differently. In point of fact, neither the cast nor the original shows a complete Old Hebrew \aleph (which would have, approximately, the shape of an English W), but certain detached pieces, which must be prolonged and connected by imaginary lines before we can get out of them the one letter \aleph which Prof. Sayce desires, or the two distinct letters \aleph which Prof. Euting suggests as possible. When it comes to filling up the missing parts of letters which either were imperfectly formed from the first, or have been partly defaced by wearing, the question is not one of pure eyesight, but of eyesight and judgment combined. And here the man who has the original before him has undoubtedly a great advantage over him who uses the cast, for he is in a much better position to judge how far defacing by attrition has been carried. Prof. Euting's conjecture that the place where Prof. Sayce reads \aleph may originally have contained three letters, corresponding to the \aleph or \aleph on the other side, implies an amount of wearing sufficient to obliterate entirely several of the principal lines. But the sharpness and depth of the lines that remain, and especially the sharp definition of their terminations, together with the absence of any trace, however faint, of lost lines, appear to be fatal to this hypothesis; and I am confident that Prof. Euting would never have advanced it had the original lain before him. Whether Prof. Sayce's \aleph is more defensible is a question that cannot be answered without going into somewhat complicated details. The \aleph of his \aleph seems to me to be clear enough both in the cast and in the original. Moreover, the cutting is deep and clear, showing that in this place there has been very little wearing (as might indeed be expected, since the point of the spindle would naturally be less worn than the middle), so that it is out of the question to suppose that any material part of the letter has disappeared. If it is not a \aleph it is not a letter at all. But as regards the shin (which I again ask the reader to think of as an English W), the facts are not so favourable to Prof. Sayce. The two middle lines of the W are there, no doubt, and to the right of them there is a detached stroke which would do very well for the right hand stroke of the W if only it were connected instead of detached. One might suppose that the angle of junction has been worn away, but in that case one would expect the two converging lines to thin off and become gradually weak as they approach, and this is not the case. Or on the other hand, one might admit that the angle was never closed, but argue that this is only a piece of carelessness on the part of the engraver; which is not impossible, though hardly probable. But the real difficulty of Prof. Sayce's interpretation lies in the left hand line of the supposed W. A first glance at the weight or cast does indeed show something which looks like a fragment of the upper part of the desired line. But on more careful examination under a powerful lens this fragment resolves itself into two elements (1) a clearly defined but very short cut, which has not the direction required for the left limb of a W, but rather runs parallel to the main or upright line of the \aleph ; (2) a splintered break proceeding from the lower part of the right hand edge of this cut, and trending downwards to the right. The distinction between the true cut and the break is perfectly clear to me in the original, but of course not so clear in the cast, which does not render the toolmarks quite sharply, and does not show at all the difference of surface between a saw cut and a splintered break. After having made out the composite character of this little stroke on the original, I persuade myself that with great care and strong magnifying power I can see even on the cast that the line is partly sawn, and partly due to splintering; but the study of the cast alone would hardly suggest this distinction, and so would leave it a very open question whether the whole stroke is cut (in which case it can hardly be anything else than a fragment of the fourth arm of a W) or the whole due to a superficial fracture (in which case a W is impossible). My own opinion as to the nature of the stroke is hardly more favourable to the reading W than the view that it is wholly due to a fracture; for it is the break alone which, by trending to the right as it descends, gives the line as a whole the appearance of running in the proper direction for the fourth limb of a shin.

5. I am afraid that these observations on the difficulties attending both the rival interpretations leave the matter more puzzling than ever; but there is one point not hitherto noticed on which I think that I can throw some light. I am convinced that the inscriptions on the two sides of the weight are not of the same date. The whole \aleph inscription (to name it after Prof. Sayce's reading) is much more worn than the \aleph . How can this have happened if the two inscriptions are contemporaneous? Not by weathering, one side being protected and the other not; for then there would be a difference in the surface texture of the two sides. But that is not the case, as can be seen by taking the points of the weight between the thumb and forefinger and gently rotating it, at the same time observing the reflections of the light that falls on the surface. The whole surface has been worn by similar agencies, producing a uniform texture and polish. At the same time, the weight has no tendency to roll over upon the more worn side; so that there is no physical reason why one side should be more worn than the other unless the stone is greatly softer on one side, which in so small a piece of an evenly grained haematite may be regarded as impossible. I conclude that the second inscription was engraved after the weight was worn by use. To verify this conclusion I requested a practised physical observer to look at the stone, and after careful examination he declared that he could not understand how anyone believed the two inscriptions to be of the same age. For further verification I took a strong lens and examined the toolmarks on each side, with the result that I found the second inscription to exhibit a different and inferior technique. To a certain extent the technical inferiority of the \aleph side is manifest even on the cast; notably in the letters \aleph . But on the original the same thing appears in other letters—e.g., in the \aleph . Straight strokes, which the first artist effected by a clean and uniform sawcut, are produced on the second side by two or three cuts, made by an uncertain hand, which could not keep a single direction truly.

6. Of course, if this be so—and the matter is one on which I appeal with confidence to all who will take the trouble to examine the original with minute precision—the idea that the two inscriptions are continuous and mean "quarter of a quarter of a \aleph " (whatever the last word may mean) falls to the ground. And here I may notice another little point which possibly leads in the same direction. If the weight is set on its plane base, the second inscription is right side up, and the first is upside down, which hardly looks as if they were meant to be read continuously. At all events, it is now plain that the older inscription is complete in itself, and if it really reads \aleph , it may best be interpreted as standing for \aleph , "a quarter of full weight." This use of \aleph is Biblical, the contraction is strictly in accordance with analogy, and the phrase as a whole finds its exact parallel in the adjective wāfin "of full weight" on the glass coin weights of the Arabs.

According to old Hebrew idiom, "a quarter," without specification of the unit, can only mean a quarter shekel. Now Mr. Petrie, in P. E. F. Qu. St., 1890, p. 267, makes our weight 39.2 grains, which would give a shekel of 156.8 (or something more if we allow for wearing). The weight of the old Hebrew shekel is still disputed, but the balance of evidence seems to me to favour the conclusions of Prof. Ridgeway, who puts it at 130 to 135 grains. In that case, our quarter is too heavy; but it came from Samaria, and we know from Amos viii. 5 that the merchants of Samaria made the ephah small and the shekel great in order to cheat their customers.

In truth Prof. Sayce's reading of this side gives an interpretation so easy and good, that one is reluctant to abandon it, and wonders why he himself did not hit on it. But, as we have seen, the possibility of reading \aleph is doubtful or more than doubtful. And, if this reading is given up, it does not seem possible to make any other letters out of the group of signs without inventing imaginary supplementary lines on a scale for which the general appearance of the surface affords no justification. But is it not possible that the disputed signs are not letters but numerical symbols? On Phoenician inscriptions numbers are frequently expressed by symbols in lieu of words, but even when the words are written in full the equivalent symbols often follow. Similarly, on the Assyro-Aramaic lion-weights, the denominations are expressed first in words and then in symbols, some of them denoting fractions, which were doubtless intelligible to many persons who could not read. Of symbols for fractions among the Phoenicians and Hebrews we have hitherto known nothing; but that they existed is probable, since both the Egyptians on the one side and the Assyrians on the other had a fractional notation. If, then, we find the word \aleph "quarter" followed by a group of signs that cannot be read as letters without adding supplementary lines of a very hypothetical kind, it seems reasonable to suspend our judgment for the present and keep our eyes open for fresh evidence as to Hebrew and Phoenician arithmetical signs.

7. As regards the later inscription, it is difficult to believe that it can be anything but a modern forgery. It is not, of course, inconceivable that a new inscription was cut in ancient times after the old one was partly worn down; but the probabilities are all the other way. For my own part, I have little doubt that Prof. Euting is right in reading the second word as \aleph , and explaining it to be the Arabic word for "half." But how did the forger, after copying the רבע of the other side, which means "quarter" both in Arabic and in Hebrew, come to follow it up with the word "half"? On this point I can, at least, make a suggestion, which I give for what it is worth. The lines immediately following רבע on the old side are (1) the detached oblique stroke which serves as the right limb of Prof. Sayce's W; (2) the chevron-shaped stroke which he takes for the two middle lines of the W. Now the first of these is the usual symbol for $\frac{1}{4}$ in modern Syria, and the second is the modern symbol for $\frac{1}{2}$, turned through a right angle, so as to point upwards instead of to the left (see Caussin de Perceval, Gram. Ar.-Vulg., Paris 1824, p. 73).

8. It is not denied that it is graphically possible to read the second inscription "quarter of a רבע"; and if it could be shown that רבע is a genuine Hebrew word giving a suitable sense, or even that a suitable new word of this form could be derived from a known root on ordinary etymological principles, this reading would deserve consideration, and we might after all be justified in concluding that the second inscription is ancient, though not so old as the first.

Prof. Sayce, in P.E.F. Qu. St. 1893, p. 32, reads the word netseg—i.e., נֶטֶג or נֶטֶג (the being his transcription of the peculiar Semitic \mathfrak{w} , which modern scholars commonly represent by \mathfrak{w}), and he thinks it possible that the word means "a standard weight," and is derived from the root נֶט. But every Hebraist knows that, if the word is netseg, it cannot possibly come from נֶט or from any known Hebrew root. Prof. Sayce cites Dr. Neubauer, but that scholar never made the grammatical blunder of deriving a segholate noun with initial \mathfrak{w} from the root נֶט. Further, Prof. Sayce thinks that he has found another occurrence of his new word on a hemispherical bead from Jerusalem (P.E.F. Qu. St., l.c.), of which he says that "the letters are those of the Siloam inscription, and must therefore belong to the same period as the latter." Through the courtesy of Mr. Armstrong I have been able to examine the bead itself, with a cast published by the P. E. F., and find that the first two letters may very well be נֶט, but that the character resembles that of the early Hasmonean coins rather than that of the Siloam inscription. The third letter is certainly not \mathfrak{w} but \mathfrak{h} . What these three letters mean I do not pretend to guess; and I do not see how one can reason from an inscription of three letters, not forming a known word, on a bead the nature and use of which are unknown. I will, therefore, say no more about the bead than that the inscription it bears is certainly not נֶטֶג.

W. ROBERTSON SMITH.

Christ's College, Cambridge,
Nov. 6, 1893.

P.S.—I enclose a drawing from the skilful hand of Mr. Burkitt, showing what he saw on the original. The drawing was made with the aid of a lens of low power, and does not show the composite character of the doubtful stroke in Prof. Sayce's W. Mr. Burkitt, however, agrees with my account of this stroke as it appears under a more powerful lens.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

THE following will open next week: an exhibition of French decorative art, at the Grafton Galleries; the eleventh exhibition of the New English Art Club, at the Dudley Gallery, Piccadilly; and an exhibition of pictures in black and white, at the St. James's Gallery, King-street.

MR. G. F. WATTS and Mr. E. Burne Jones have been elected honorary members of the Munich Academy of Arts.

WHAT is called "Museum Sunday" is fixed for November 26. Under the auspices of the Sunday Society, more than thirty sermons will be preached at various churches and chapels; while many museums, art galleries, and libraries will be opened in the afternoon. The Duke of Westminster and Lord Brassey are among those who have promised to admit members of the society to view their collections.

A MEDAL commemorative of the five-hundredth anniversary of the founding of Winchester College has been designed by Mr. G. Frampton. As only a limited number will be struck, orders should be sent without delay either to Mr. Cecil Smith, British Museum, or to Mr. C. B. Phillips, Culver Lea, Winchester. The price of the medal is £2 in silver, and 15s. in bronze.

THE committee of the Asia Minor Exploration Fund, of which Mr. George A. Macmillan is hon. secretary, have issued an appeal for the sum of £750, in order to enable them to undertake systematic excavations on the site of Lystra—one of the Roman colonies founded by Augustus, which contained the temple of Jupiter "before the walls," where worship was offered to Paul and Barnabas. Other archaeological work is also in contemplation, provided that sufficient money is forthcoming.

MESSRS. MARCUS WARD & Co. have sent us a generous parcel of their publications for the season. These include pocket-books, diaries, calendars, Christmas and New Year cards, &c. We would specially mention some illuminated booklets, with bindings that are equally charming in design and in colour. Experience has confirmed our former criticism of the division of the "concise diary" into four parts: one cannot always remember to put in a fresh part as the quarter day comes round. But this detail aside, we have nothing but commendation for the workmanship of the pocket-book and the convenience of its arrangements. Among the block calendars, that which derives its name from Tennyson is a novelty. Each daily leaf has a quotation from the poems, published by permission of the owners of the copyright. We cannot praise, however, the coloured illustration of the poet himself and of Maud. The calendars held together by ribbons, and also the folding calendars, are very pretty. The Christmas cards proper consist almost entirely of flowers, among which pansies predominate; there are a few landscapes, but hardly any figures. We are astonished at the uniform merit of the reproductions and the low price at which they are offered. It is also pleasing to know that, with the single exception of a metallic mount, everything has been made in the United Kingdom.

THE STAGE.

M. JULES LEMAITRE'S "LES ROIS."

Paris: Nov. 12, 1893.

THE above is the title of M. Jules Lemaitre's piece in four acts produced at the Renaissance Théâtre, of which Mme. Sarah Bernhardt is now lessee. In writing this play the well-known critic of the Journal des Débats has followed the plan adopted by M. Alphonse Daudet in "Les Rois en Exil," putting on the stage the adventures and misfortunes of princes who during the last twenty years have figured in the chronicles—often scandalous—of Paris.

In the course of the year 1900, Prince Hermann of Alfanie (a mythical country supposed to be situated somewhere on the Austro-Russian frontier) visits Paris, and meets there a charming young Socialist, Mlle. Frida de Thalberg—an orphan who has been brought up and saved from misery by Andotia Latanief, a sort of Russian Louise Michel. A platonic attachment is formed between the Prince and Frida; and when the former is recalled by his father, King Christian XVI., he returns to Alfanie a convert to Socialist theories. From reasons of state he marries the Archduchess Wilhelmine (Mme. Sarah Bernhardt), who has been brought up in the cult of monarchy by divine right and in the strict observance of old-fashioned Court etiquette. A sickly boy is born of this union, but there exists too great a divergence of ideas between the young couple for them to be able to live happily together. Under the rule of King Christian, Alfanie has "enjoyed for many years the blessings of despotism"; but new ideas are spreading and rapidly altering the hitherto peaceful relations existing between the King and his people, and the former, tired of life and unwilling to accept the changed order of things, abdicates in favour of his son.

Prince Hermann, deaf to the entreaties of his consort, and regardless of the warnings of his father's "faithful adviser," proceeds to carry out his Utopian reforms, advised and encouraged by Frida, who has become lady-in-waiting on the Princess Wilhelmine. On the occasion of a "pacific demonstration" for the redress of some old-standing complaint, Hermann orders that the people be allowed to air their grievances undisturbed. But a procession, headed by Andotia Latanief, carrying the black flag of insurrection, marches on the palace, breaks into the gardens, and threatens to invade the royal abode. The prince, in defence of the throne and those around him, is obliged to tell the military commandant to "do his duty." The troops fire on the people and the insurrection is repressed; but the hands of the would-be reformer are stained with the blood of the victims. His dream of social reform is dispelled: he is horrified at the brutality of the populace, while his ex-friends, the Socialists, vow vengeance against him.

While these events are taking place, Frida is living in a retired chateau not far from the capital; and here we find her joyfully awaiting the visit of her platonic lover. He comes disheartened, to seek consolation from his beautiful girl-counsellor; but on ne badine pas avec l'amour, as he soon finds out, for platonic affection has gradually transformed itself into passionate love, which neither of them can resist. Hermann, tired of sovereignty, and sick of the intrigues and hypocrisy which surround him, is ready to abandon throne, wife, and child if Frida will consent to fly with him. He pleads his cause in such heartfelt terms that she yields, for she also loves him passionately. But their first and, as it proves, last love-scene is suddenly interrupted by the presence of Princess Wilhelmine, who, concealed behind a curtain, has heard them. Seizing a revolver, she points it at Frida and fires, killing her husband instead of her rival.

Between the third and fourth act Frida commits suicide, and her end remains shrouded in the same mystery as that of Prince Hermann; but in the course of the most dramatic and pathetic scene of the drama Wilhelmine reveals the secret to King Christian. She confesses that, mad with jealousy and indignation, in order to save the honour of the royal house of Alfanie, she shot her husband. The king pardons her, and, in the presence of the assembled court, appoints her, during the minority of her son, regent of the kingdom which she committed a crime to save.

In this rapid account of the new play of the author of the "Flipote" and "Mariage Blanc" I have left out the part played by Prince Otto, Hermann's younger brother, a princely vireur and villain of the deepest dye, who reveals to Wilhelmine the secret meetings of Hermann and Frida. There are also several subordinate characters whose living prototypes are easily recognisable by all familiar with the secret history of latter-day royalties.

The purely literary part of "Les Rois" is excellent; the episodes are, in the main, true "human documents"; the personages are well portrayed. Yet the general effect is disappointing, owing to the lack (excepting in the second act) of dramatic action, and the little interest the spectator can feel in the vacillating character of Prince Hermann. Besides, the general tone of the work is pessimist in the extreme.

South American and other starring tours have done Mme. Sarah Bernhardt no good. There is no concealing the fact that she looks slightly aged, that her ease and supreme gracefulness of attitude and gesture are impaired, and that the "voix d'or" has lost some of its sweetness. Yet she is still an incomparable "artiste," as proved by her acting in the scene in which she tries to regain the confidence and lost love of her husband, as well as in the confession in the last act. Mlle. Valdey is charming, but rather too girlish, in the part of Frida de Thalberg; the make-up of M. de Max in the character of the decrepit, yet still kingly, old Christian XVI. is remarkable; but M. Guitey as Prince Hermann is a failure. The mise-en-scène, costumes, and general stage-business reflect great credit on the taste of the new lessee.

May I be allowed to call the attention of readers of the ACADEMY to the first volume of M. Alexandre Parodi's Théâtre (Paris: Dentu) which has just appeared? It contains, besides "Rome Vaincue," that very remarkable drama, "Ulm le Parricide." C. NICHOLSON.

STAGE NOTES.

THE week in London has witnessed two interesting revivals, and the production of a new piece which, in the slang of the moment, has "come to stay." This new piece is "Gudgeons," by Mr. Thornton Clark and Mr. Louis Parker. It is bright and clever—well conceived and skilfully executed—and its performance is in the hands of a judiciously chosen and competent company. Terry's Theatre—the playhouse at which the production of "Gudgeons" has taken place—is now under the management of the handsome and accomplished Miss Janette Steer. This is not quite her first venture as a manager, but it is the first in which she achieves a very distinct success. She plays ably and acceptably in the principal woman's character, Miss Charlotte Morland lending aid in a part of secondary importance, and Miss Sybil Carlisle being seen to advantage in one of her most graceful impersonations. Mr. Murray Carson, who has a principal man's part, generally acts with authority and force; and Mr. Hebert Waring is one of the most thoughtful and sterling of our actors, albeit he may occasionally have gone somewhat astray in the Scandinavian drama to which he has been addicted. In these very columns, some exception was taken, it may be remembered, to one or two features in his performance of "The Master-Builder": still, he is an actor whom one is glad to see, because something that is good, and much that is reasonable and judicious, may fairly be expected of him. Miss Janette Steer is to be congratulated, sincerely, on her present choice of piece, on her company, and on her own very agreeable performance.

We had looked forward with some interest to the Daly Company's performance of "The School for Scandal"; but it turns out to be, speaking broadly, one of which it is impossible to approve. Care and pains have undoubtedly been given to it by all concerned; several parts are well played; and an actress of Miss Ada Rehan's gifts and experience could not fail altogether as Lady Teazle—albeit the Lady Teazle she presents is, by reason of Miss Rehan's own marked personality, not at all the Lady Teazle of our dreams. Still, the fault is not here. Nor is it—nor could it possibly be—in the Sir Peter Teazle of Mr. Farren. Nor is it in the pretty little performance of the insignificant part of Maria, by Miss Haswell, nor in that of Charles Surface, by Mr. Arthur Bouchier. It is in quite other things. The actor to whom is entrusted the very important rôle of Joseph Surface makes the mistake of presenting the character as a fully middle-aged man. Now, the discretion and plausibility of Mr. Surface come to him by reason of his temperament, and were greatly in advance of his years. Yet even this is to some extent a detail: it is not of itself enough to permit us to view the whole performance with something like indifference and distrust. What is wrong with the performance is the re-arrangement of the comedy. Against this, wherever it has been done, and in whatever measure, we have always more or less protested. "The School for Scandal" is too great a classic to be in any way tampered with: nothing is gained, and much is inevitably lost, by any interference with that arrangement of its scenes which was Sheridan's own. Now at Daly's Theatre there is an extraordinary and quite unnecessary diminution in the number of the scenes. The object appears to be to avoid a front scene—this is a sacrifice to mere scenic effect, and not even to true scenic effect, for nothing that is now presented is the better for such alteration as is wrought. Some of the characters almost disappear; there are shorn of their fair proportions. Almost as bad as this is the emasculation, the Bowdlerisation of the dialogue. Undoubtedly things are said by several of the characters which we should resent were they uttered by characters of our own day. But in an eighteenth century comedy, they are essential for the preservation of local colour. They belong to the piece as much as the strange oaths of Bob Acres or Sir Luchus O'Trigger belong to "The Rivals." Meritorious though it be, in some respects, the Daly method of dealing with "The School for Scandal" is on the whole unwarrantable and profoundly unwelcome.

The interest displayed on the four occasions when it was performed last week—and likely to be again renewed in the further performances of this (Saturday) afternoon and evening—show how well justified has been the most laborious and ingenious effort of the Shakspeare Reading Society to perform "Measure for Measure," under the conditions which it was written to fulfil. Mr. Poel and his friends who surround him at the Royalty Theatre are to be genuinely congratulated, not upon every detail of the actual performance, but upon the spirit and the thoroughness with which they set about and carried through their production. While we are far from urging the abandonment at the ordinary theatre of so much that draws the general public to a Shaksperian play—the elaborate and beautiful scenery to which audiences have become accustomed—we must chronicle the fact that the extremely intelligent audiences gathered to see "Measure for Measure" scarcely seem to have missed the absence of scenery, so closely, with the prompt and rapid action now inculcated, has it been possible to follow the story of the play. If the dialogue sometimes seemed to be spoken too hurriedly, that was, probably, because the amateurs, with all their good intentions, had not learnt completely how to be both swift and intelligible. But, on the whole, the performances have been, and will doubtless be again to-day, a distinct success. They have presented the play with dignity, and enacted it with a quaint charm. There is a clever "Induction" by Mr. Arthur Dillon; and the prayer for the Queen's Majesty at the end is most effective. No one should miss what is the last chance for the present of seeing this remarkable performance.

MUSIC.

MUSIC NOTES.

SEÑOR SARASATE gave his second concert at St. James's Hall on Monday afternoon. The choice of Schumann's Sonata for pianoforte and violin was an excellent one, and the two middle movements were admirably played. E. Bernard's Suite (Op. 34) for the same instruments, with its French dash and coquetry, received full justice at the hands of Mme. Berthe Marx and the concert-giver. Raff's Duet "La Fée d'Amour" opens well, but soon becomes tedious; it seemed a pity to waste such fine playing on such flashy music. And why, it may be asked, did Mme Marx select Liszt's "Don Juan" Fantaisie by way of solo? The composer must have laughed in his sleeve when he offered this tawdry trash to the public. So far as the overcoming of difficulties is concerned, it may be interesting to the player; but why should the public be tortured? Señor Sarasate introduces many excellent works into his programmes. Why should he mix good with bad: the contrast is an unpleasant one.

AGENCIES.

London Agents, Messrs. W. H. SMITH & SON, 186, Strand.

Copies of the ACADEMY can be obtained every Saturday morning in EDINBURGH of Mr. MENZIES; in DUBLIN of Messrs. ELSON & SON, 40, Sackville-street; in MANCHESTER of Mr. J. HEYWOOD. Ten days after date of publication, in NEW YORK, of Messrs. G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTIONS

TO THE ACADEMY.

(PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.)

	YEARLY.	HALF-YEARLY.	QUARTERLY.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
If obtained of a Newsvendor or at a Railway Station	0 13 0	0 6 6	0 3 3
Including Postage to any part of the United Kingdom	0 15 2	0 7 7	0 3 10
Including Postage to any part of France, Germany, India, China &c.	0 17 4	0 8 8	0 4 4

NATIONAL

FOR MUTUAL
LIFE ASSURANCE.

Financial Year ends 20th November, 1893.

PROVIDENT INVESTED FUNDS, £4,700,000
PAID IN CLAIMS, £8,800,000
INSTITUTION.

All the Profits are divided amongst the Assured; already divided £4,600,000. All persons now assuring will receive an additional share of Profit over later Entrants, at the next Division in 1897.

48, GRACECHURCH STREET, LONDON, E.C.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1893.

No. 1125, New Series.

THE EDITOR cannot undertake to return, or to correspond with the writers of, rejected manuscript.

It is particularly requested that all business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., may be addressed to the PUBLISHER, and not to the EDITOR.

LITERATURE.

Glances back through Seventy Years: Autobiographical and other Reminiscences. By Henry Vizetelly. In 2 vols. (Kegan Paul & Co.)

IN this age of reminiscence-writing, it would have been matter for as much surprise as regret if Mr. Vizetelly had not fallen in with the too-prevalent literary fashion. His recollections and experiences could hardly fail to be of interest and value. He has had a long, busy, and, in one respect, important career, frequently marked by a close acquaintance with men of whom the world still delights to read. The chief incidents of that career may be briefly noticed. In his teens, having shown some aptitude for drawing, he was apprenticed to a wood-engraver, Bonner, the master of W. J. Linton, and became a pupil of Orrin Smith. Presently he went into partnership with his eldest brother, who had set up as a printer in Peterborough-court, Fleet-street, where the offices of the Daily Telegraph now are. In 1842 Herbert Ingram started the Illustrated London News, and Mr. Vizetelly, who had already drifted into pictorial journalism, was associated with the undertaking. Early in the following year, severing his connexion with the News, he brought out, in conjunction with Andrew Spottiswoode, the Queen's Printer, an opposition paper, the Pictorial Times, its principal writers being Douglas Jerrold, Thackeray, Mark Lemon (though he was editing Punch), Gilbert à Beckett, Peter Cunningham, and Knight Hunt. Before long he sold his share of the property, in order to give increased attention to the Peterborough-court business, as by that time the firm had come to print regularly a large number of illustrated books. This, however, did not prevent the brothers from entering into an outside speculation with the Puppet Show, one of Punch's many imitators. During the Crimean war Mr. Vizetelly and David Bogue established the Illustrated Times, and, thanks to equal enterprise and liberality, made it one of the most successful periodicals in London. Hablot Browne, Birket Foster, Kenny Meadows, Ansell, and Gustave Doré were among its artists; the literary staff included Mr. Sala, Mr. Edmund Yates, James Hannay, Robert Brough, Augustus Mayhew, Edward Draper, Tom Hood, T. W. Robertson, Mr. Frederick Greenwood, and Mr. J. C. Parkinson. In 1859, after losing £2000 over the Welcome Guest, in which Mr. Sala's "Twice Round the Clock" originally appeared, Mr. Vizetelly transferred his share in the Illustrated Times to Ingram for rather more than double that amount, and undertook for £4000 more to continue editing it for five years. On the expiration of his agreement, he became the Paris correspondent and general representative on the continent of the Illustrated London News at the same salary—namely, £800 a year. His duty was simply to write a short letter weekly, and to select artists to work on special occasions. Except, of course, in the dark period of 1870-71, the post yielded him a good deal of leisure, which he occupied in writing on French subjects for the Pall Mall Gazette, All the Year Round, Once a Week, London Society, and other monthly magazines. For some two or three weeks, at the beginning of 1870, he was in Ireland on behalf of the Illustrated London News and an evening paper. Returning to England in 1877, he embarked in the publishing trade, though only to be reduced to "pecuniary ruin" by the proceedings taken against him for issuing translations of the works of M. Zola. Since then he has lived in partial retirement, probably solaced by the thought that his name is inseparably associated with the development of pictorial journalism in this country.

Mr. Vizetelly's recollections extend as far back as the Reform agitation, of which he gives a rather graphic account. Here is an anecdote of Wellington, when the fever was at its height:

"I remember, on the occasion of some inspection of troops in Hyde Park, seeing the Duke most foully assailed as he rode, unattended, through Decimus Burton's archway, up the open gates of which some London ruffians had climbed. Yelled at and spat upon by these blackguards, and pelted with mud and more offensive refuse by their companions, the Duke rode calmly on at a walking pace, making no effort to avoid the filth flying around him, until the police, fighting their way through the crowd, came to the old soldier's rescue."

Elia flits across the scene at about the same period:

"My father pointed out to me the small attenuated figure of another great writer walking slowly along near the corner of Chancery-lane—his gait a trifle uncertain, and he himself, spite of the restless movement of his eyes, apparently oblivious of all that was passing around. This was Charles Lamb, whose Essays, but recently collected and published, was already a well thumbed book in our household. For this reason I had a good look at him, and distinctly remember being struck by something of a Jewish look in his face, although his dress, an old-fashioned suit of black—swallow-tail, small clothes, and gaiters—gave him very much the appearance of a decayed old-fashioned pedagogue."

Miss Landon's beauty, which enslaved Maginn and Jerdan, would seem to have been exaggerated:

"When I saw her on one occasion, no very long time afterwards, prior to her ill-fated marriage, she was certainly most unattractive, and I failed to recognise any resemblance to the flattering portrait that formed the frontispiece to one of her books. The recollection I have preserved is of a pale-faced, plain-looking little woman, with lustreless eyes and somewhat dowdily dressed, whom no amount of enthusiasm could have idealised into a sentimental poetess."

Unfavourable, too, is a sketch of Edward Irving:

"What chiefly attracted me to the chapel in Newman-street was the expectation, generally realised, of the spirit moving some hysterical shrieking sister or frantic Boanerges brother (posted in the raised recess behind Irving's pulpit), to burst forth suddenly with one of those wild rapid utterances which, spite of their unintelligibility, sent a strange thrill through all who heard them for the first time. . . . He had grown gray and haggard looking, and this, with his long straggling hair and restless look, emphasised by the cast in his eye, gave him a singularly wild and picturesque appearance. His voice, too, was piercingly loud, and his gestures were as vehement as those of any street-ranter of the day."

Macready was then the popular tragedian, but we have evidence here that his "jerky elocution and stilted mannerisms" did not impose on one of his auditors.

Naturally enough, Mr. Vizetelly is at some pains to portray for us the more prominent of the writers and artists with whom he was connected in the way of business. Among these, it is needless to say, Thackeray holds the first place. When, in 1843, Mr. Vizetelly waited upon him at his humble lodging in Jermyn-street to ask him to write for the Pictorial Times, he was not many degrees removed from poverty.

"The apartment was an exceedingly plainly furnished bedroom, with common rush-seated chairs and painted French bedstead, and with neither looking-glass nor prints on the bare, cold, cheerless-looking walls. On the table was a frugal breakfast tray—a cup of chocolate and some dry toast. Mr. Thackeray at once undertook to write upon art, to review such books as he might fancy, and to contribute an occasional article on the opera, more with reference to its frequenters, he remarked, than from a critical point of view. So satisfied was he with the three guineas offered him for a couple of columns weekly, that he jocularly expressed himself willing to sign an engagement for life upon these terms. I can only suppose, from the eager way in which he closed with my proposal, that the prospect of an additional £160 to his income was at that moment anything but a matter of indifference."

Mr. Vizetelly, while denying that Thackeray was eager for praise, though he might be depressed by disparaging remarks, admits that he was somewhat of a tuft hunter, as the authentic story of his meeting with Rumsey Foster, the "Jenkins" of the Morning Post, may be taken to suggest. Jerrold, ever ready to lose his friend rather than his joke; George Cruikshank, at that time rarely sober, but not a little vain as to his personal appearance; Harrison Ainsworth, in no wise spoilt by the striking success of his Jack Sheppard and other books; John Leech, quiet, reserved, and with that "interesting air of melancholy" which romantic young ladies had not yet ceased to like; Marryat, having nothing of the jovial "salt" about him; Samuel Carter Hall, too obviously the original of the immortal Pecksniff; Gustave Doré, who at the age of fifty was in a state of "chronic wretchedness" because French art critics refused to recognise in him a great painter, and who eventually disliked to hear his drawings spoken of—these and many more figures of the time are sketched by Mr. Vizetelly's pen. With Dickens, however, he seems to have had but a slight acquaintance. We also find Carlyle growling about literary men making a public show of them.

selves on a platform; John Bright conceitedly anxious as to the expression in a portrait of himself in the Pictorial Times; and Disraeli doing his best, evidently without much effect, to ingratiate himself with Leech—i.e., the influential Mr. Punch—at a dinner in the city.

But the interest of the book is not merely of a personal kind. Here, for example, is a story of perjury deliberately perpetrated to defeat an unjust claim:

"A London tradesman, to his great astonishment, was served with a writ for a considerable sum of money, pretended to have been lent to him by the plaintiff, whom he had never heard of, and, as far as he knew, had never seen. He hurried off to his lawyer, and explained to him his ignorance of the whole affair, which the lawyer readily believed as soon as he had glanced at the attorney's name endorsed on the writ. 'It's no use, however,' said he, 'denying the claim; Quirk, Gammon, and Snap will prove beyond a doubt that you have had the money, and you will lose the case unless we, too, can prove beyond a doubt that you have paid the money back again. . . . Our only plan is to meet roguery with roguery, and we must be prepared with half a dozen good men and true who will swear that they saw you repay the amount.'"

And this was actually done, with the desired result. Contrary to a statement made by Dr. Strauss, the Old Bohemian, the Savage Club originally had its quarters in a small room on the topmost floor of a dingy public house in Chancery-lane. Mr. Vizetelly, having been taken there by William Brough, had the empty glasses of the members present refilled, and on paying the waiter told him to keep the change. Brough ventured upon a mild rebuke. "Tipping the waiters by members," he said, "is strictly forbidden; and if visitors infringe the rule, the waiters will speedily become demoralised!"

To turn from the humorous to the pathetic, this is what Mr. Vizetelly saw and heard from the balcony of the Mansion House on the entry of the Princess Alexandra into London:

"The large space intervening between here and the Bank and the Exchange seemed one mass of human heads, intersected by a narrow strip of roadway, along which the procession was to pass. . . . To clear the necessary space opposite the Mansion House for the Lady Mayoress to present . . . the Princess with the conventional bouquet seemed an impossible task; but the police got over the difficulty in arbitrary fashion. Failing to force the crowd back by vigorous thrusts of their truncheons, they took to breaking the heads of the unfortunate possessors of front places, cracking skulls right and left with the precision of mechanism. One heard piercing screams and heartrending moans and passionate appeals for mercy, but there was no interruption to the rainfall of blows until blood spouted forth in all directions. When the carriage of the Prince and Princess moved on again, with a string of newspaper reporters at its tail, the spokes of the wheels almost grazed the shins of the pitiable-looking wretches who, with blood streaming down their faces, still occupied the first rank; and the poor Princess perceptibly shuddered at the sickening sight, while the loud welcoming cheers of those beyond the reach of police bludgeons were ringing in her ears."

In fact, a riotous mob could hardly have been treated by the police with greater severity.

Not the least attractive part of Mr. Vizetelly's narrative is that in which he sets forth some of his French experiences. If, in writing it, he has utilised his contributions on that head to English periodical literature, as is probably the case, we can only say that they are worthy of presentation in the more abiding form of a book. Especially is this true of his chapter relating to odd ways of getting a living in Paris a quarter of a century ago; it is full of curious and trustworthy information. Mr. Vizetelly became acquainted with all sorts and conditions of people, and appears to take a keen delight in describing them. Nothing came amiss to him, whether it was a court fête or an execution. He has also much to tell us of the Burgundy and other vineyards. Ville-messant, of the Figaro, once related to him the following anecdote in connexion with the funeral of Béranger:

"Paris was in a state of commotion at the time, and the government feared some disturbance at the graveside. Accordingly, as soon as the funeral cortège and the representatives of the press had entered the cemetery, the gates were closed, and a detachment of soldiers was stationed at them to hold the mob in check. As it had been arranged that a special number of the Figaro, containing an account of the ceremony, should be issued that same evening, its representative was instructed to return from Père Lachaise as speedily as possible. When, however, he wished to leave the cemetery—not caring to listen any longer to the interminable orations which, in accordance with French custom, were being pronounced beside the grave—he found his way barred by sentinels, who refused to let him out. Expostulation only led to a threat of arrest; and the reporter was disconsolately reflecting that he would not be able to get away any sooner than his confrères, when, at the corner of the avenue, he espied the hearse which had done duty at the ceremony, and the driver of which was just gathering up his reins preparatory to departing. Quick as thought, the journalist passed behind the vehicle, and, without being seen, climbed into it and stretched himself in the very place which, a quarter of an hour earlier, had been occupied by Béranger's corpse and coffin. Scarcely had he pulled the black pall over him than the hearse started off; and the gates of the cemetery being immediately opened to let it pass out, Villemessant's quick-witted young man succeeded in returning to office in ample time to allow of the Figaro anticipating its rivals with a vivacious account of the proceedings."

During the siege of Paris, as may be supposed, Mr. Vizetelly was intent upon the means of supplying the Illustrated London News with sketches of events in the beleaguered city.

"The first batch of sketches I despatched went off in a great hurry in the balloon which carried Gambetta and his secretary to the provinces. Once, when a favourable spot had been fixed upon for a descent, it was suddenly discovered that they were hovering within the German lines, and the balloon was received with a volley while it was dropping slowly down to earth. A rapid flinging out of the ballast was speedily resorted to; and one of the occupants of the car, in his nervous anxiety that the balloon should rise beyond the reach of German rifles, pitched out a bag of letters. Unluckily for the Illustrated London News, this identical bag contained the score of sketches destined for that paper, and the Germans were immensely delighted at securing such a prize." The disappointment of Mr. Vizetelly was hardly lessened by the fact that the sketches forthwith appeared in the German illustrated press.

For the rest, Mr. Vizetelly writes in a direct and unaffected style, but at times shows a weakness for vulgarisms. He has a keen eye for the faults of friends and enemies alike, and can speak with engaging candour of a transaction which hardly redounds to his credit. Of his general accuracy—a matter of importance in a collection of reminiscences, if they are to be accepted as a contribution to history—we can speak in high terms. In one instance, however, he makes a curious slip. Mentioning the death of Ingram, which occurred in America in 1860, he says, "the Atlantic cable was not much used in those days." In point of fact, the first Atlantic cable was not completed until 1866.

FREDERICK HAWKINS.

The History of the Post Office to 1836. By Herbert Joyce, C.B. (Bentley.)

THIS is a plain, unpretending statement of the rise and progress of the Post Office. It does not enter into the marvels which have been effected in that institution during the present reign; and, as a consequence, much which would have been of the highest interest to the present generation does not come within the author's purview. But it tells the story of its sure, if slow, growth with judgment and accuracy, though the history of the laying of the foundations of the building cannot be so full of interest to the ordinary reader as the narrative of the formation of the structure itself would be.

The origin of the Post Office is not free from obscurity, and its operations for nearly a century are not traced without difficulty. Even at the date of the accession of James I. the established posts did not exceed four in number. One ran—the word is possibly suggestive of too speedy a motion—to Scotland, another went to Ireland, a third proceeded south-west as far as Plymouth, and a fourth—the most important of all—passed through Kent, and carried the communications which were intended for foreign countries. A man of ability named Thomas Witherings became associated with the office about 1632; and after the duties of the foreign post had been discharged by him for three years, the improvements which he instituted led to the inland posts being placed under his charge. Witherings laid down the principle that the office should be self-supporting; and to secure this result he drew up a scale of postage, with a charge increasing according to the distance that the mails were carried—an alteration that marked the introduction of a definite system of postage. Another innovation by him consisted of the opening of a letter office in the city of London. A few years passed away, and this intelligent reformer was dismissed from his office on a general charge of "divers abuses and misdemeanours," a charge not known now to be "well or ill-founded." His successor was Edmund Prideaux, a member of a family of considerable influence in Cornwall and Devonshire. He signalled his appointment with the announcement "that there would be a weekly conveyance of letters into all parts of the kingdom"; but he did not long retain his post, although some sort of connexion with the office lasted for his life, and before the Restoration he was dead.

A great change took place under an Act passed in 1657, and renewed in 1660. A general post office for England was now established by legislative enactment, and an officer, with the high-sounding title of "Postmaster-General and Comptroller," was created for its government. Hitherto there was no post at all between one part of London and another, but by 1680 William Dockwra had perfected his plans for the establishment of a penny-post in London. They were well matured. The city and its suburbs was divided into seven districts, each of which possessed a sorting-office, and "between four and five hundred receiving offices were opened in a single morning." Such innovations did not meet with unqualified satisfaction—they never do—and Dockwra was soon ejected from the office which he had succeeded in establishing.

Under the direction of Cotton and Frankland (1690-1705), the operations of the Post Office largely increased. Cross posts were established; the posts themselves were farmed out to men of energy and capacity, who paid a share of the profits to the chief office, and under their sagacious administration the service was improved and extended. New packet-boats of considerable speed were constructed by the king's order, under the guidance of Edmund Dummer, Surveyor of the Navy, and that official himself accepted the contract for the new service to the West Indies. For him, as for the other pioneers of progress in early days, connexion with the Civil Service proved disastrous. He lost his boats, his private property was mortgaged and foreclosed, and he died "bankrupt and broken-hearted." His epitaph is well written by Mr. Joyce. "It is his honourable distinction that he succeeded in all that he undertook for others, and that it was only in what he undertook for himself that he failed."

During this same period posts were established in North America, and for some time an ocean penny postage existed between our country and that colony. A reformer, called Povey, set on foot a halfpenny post in London, and the letters were collected by men in his employ, who rang bells to announce their approach. Povey was soon dispossessed of this arrangement; but letters continued to be collected by the sound of bells in London until 1846, and in Dublin down to September, 1859. Not only was Povey's system of cheap postage discontinued, but under the influence of a Secretary to the Treasury, called William Lowndes—an official who invented the phrase, "Take care of the pence and the pounds will take care of themselves"—increased rates of general postage were adopted.

With 1720 a new name, and one still remembered, comes before us. This was Ralph Allen, immortalised by Pope and Fielding, and of such importance at Bath as to be courted by the great Pitt himself. He imbued the Postmaster-General with such confidence in his powers that, although he was twenty-six years old and without capital, they let him the farming of the by and cross-post letters for £6000 a year. Allen was possessed of many qualifications for the duty: a perfect temper, an inexhaustible stock of patience, and an unparalleled knowledge of the topography of his own country, and of the conditions of local life in the provinces. Most of the subordinate officials were against him, for he was stopping malpractices everywhere; but he overcame them all, placed the system into an admirable condition, and obtained for himself the ample fortune that he deserved, and knew how to distribute to the best advantage. Allen's labours were continued by Palmer, who was not inferior in energy or ability, but lacked the good temper of Allen. He remained invincible for many years; but his complete disregard, amounting in some instances to absolute defiance, of his official chiefs, resulted in constant friction, and the second Pitt had at last no option but to leave him out of the official list. The third great name at the Post Office was Sir Francis Freeling, best known to us as a book collector, worthy of being placed in the same category with Heber and Huth. Under his régime the highest rates ever in force were imposed in 1812. A "single" letter for a distance exceeding 700 miles cost seventeen pence.

Much valuable information is preserved by Mr. Joyce, and as it rests on official authorities, its correctness is beyond question. Perhaps the most telling illustration of the growth of the Post Office presents itself in the notice of Manchester. In 1792, the local business there was managed "by an aged widow, assisted by her daughter" and a single letter carrier. It now gives employment to about 1400 persons.

A few slight matters for correction have come under our notice during a perusal of Mr. Joyce's pages. "Lisle" is an antiquated mode of spelling for the fortress famous for all time through its gallant defence by Boufflers; Blaithwaite was never in such an exalted official position as that designated by the title of "secretary of war"; the village at which Ralph Allen was born is not now known as "St. Blaise," and has not been so called for many a long year; and if the name of "Richard Hiver" does not appear in the Return of Members of Parliament, it ought not to be difficult to ascertain the cognomen for which "Hiver" is a misprint. W. P. COURTNEY.

A Journey through Yemen. By W. B. Harris. (Blackwoods.)

MR. HARRIS'S book on the Yemen is not quite new. A considerable portion of it has already appeared in the Illustrated London News, and his account of the Yemen rebellion was printed in Blackwood's Magazine of last February. But there is a great deal of additional matter in the present volume, which is as instructive and interesting a book of travel as one could wish for. The illustrations, too, are numerous and of remarkable beauty.

Mr. Harris could not, impeded by circumstances, bring us back any account of antiquities and relics of early dynasties; nor does he add much to our knowledge of the geography of Arabia Felix. He can only tell us, as Gibbon and Burton have already told us, how vague the boundaries of eastern countries are. The real value of his book is in the account it gives us of Turkish influence in the Yemen.

In order to elude so far as possible the vigilance of the Turkish sentries, Mr. Harris determined to start from Aden on his journey to San'aa, though Hodaidah would have made a more convenient starting point. Passing through Lahej, Korseiba, and Dhama, he has returned with a history of exciting adventures, and a good deal of information as to the features of the country and the character of its inhabitants. For the most part the natives treated him with great courtesy and kindness. At Beit-Said he learnt the truth of the boast in the Arabic poem—

"A kin great of heart, Whose word is enough to shield whom they shelter."

"I had been asleep—he writes—only an hour or two when I felt myself quietly shaken; I asked who was there. A voice whispered in my ear, 'Hush! do not speak.' I struck a light, and as a wild long-haired creature leant over me to blow it out, I had just time to see the man was a stranger. 'Get up,' said the voice again, 'you are in danger. Not a word, mind. Give me your bedding and carpet.' In the dark I hurried into my clothes, while the unknown seized my carpet and such baggage as I possessed, and left. I waited for a few moments, when he returned. 'Your mules are already being laden,' he continued; then, seizing me by the hand, added, 'Follow me.' I followed him out into the quiet moonlit streets, and, keeping under the shadow of the houses, left the village."

For some hours the strange guide led the little party over a difficult country to a place of safety.

Scarcely less exciting is the account of a journey between Sobeh and Yerim. The Owd tribe, among others, had taken advantage of the rebellion to cast off all forms of government, and the march to Beet-en-Nedish was perilous in the extreme. But the faithful service rendered by Mr. Harris's comrades brought him safely through all dangers. That he was a Christian seemed to stir up no animosity in the hearts of these Mahommedans.

In addition to the great qualities of hospitality, bravery, sincerity, and beauty, virtues shared in common with all Arab races, the Yemeni are industrious and ingenious agriculturists. As in Madeira, the Atlas Mountains, and many parts of Ceylon, their land is "carefully terraced to allow of more cultivation." In the valley of Wadi el Banna, by no means the most richly tilled portion of the country through which he passed, Mr. Harris counted one hundred and thirty-seven terraces.

"The supporting wall of every terrace was in excellent repair, here every little artificial channel and aqueduct brimmed over with water; and the whole surroundings were not only the appearance of great laborious skill, but of the idea being present that the people were aware of the necessity of maintaining the results of their labour in a state of repair."

Mr. Harris suggests that the effects of this careful system of cultivation may have had much to do in gaining for the country the title of Arabia Felix.

Of Sanāa, the goal of his journey, Mr. Harris has but little to tell us. He gives us a short account of the quarters into which the city is divided; one learns, incidentally, that the Jews are well treated, and that—a common phenomena in every city and village east of Suez—the Greek vintner and shop-keeper flourishes. Mr. Harris was imprisoned on his arrival by Ahmed Faisi Pasha, and only liberated because that worthy feared that the fever, from which the traveller suffered, would prove fatal.

But though, in many respects, the result of Mr. Harris's journey is disappointing, one great good has been gained. No other authentic account of the late rebellion of the Yemeni against the Osmanli troops has been given us; nor do we find anywhere else so adequate a statement of the causes and probable results of that rising. The peoples of Arabia have already played a foremost part in forming the religion and customs of a large part of the world. The recent disturbances seem to prove that the most unchanging of men have not lost their power of effecting changes. For the rebellion was a Jehad or holy war. Co-religionists as the Turks may be, in that they follow the teaching of Mahommed, they are separated from the Yemeni people in their sympathies. The old quarrel between the Sunnis, or orthodox Mahommedans, and those of the Shiah sect is not yet over in this corner of the earth. The Imams, or direct descendants of the Prophet, dwelling at Sanāa, possessed the allegiance of the Yemeni; and now that their rule is a thing of the past, the tribes will not acknowledge any more readily the Sultan as commander of the faithful. When the qualities of the rebels are understood, it is easy to realise what may be the result of their discontent. Ahmed Faisi Pasha told Mr. Harris that the disappointment consequent on their failure to recapture Sanāa caused the Arabs to lose heart for a time. "Had they succeeded in entering the city, and brought their Imam there in state, there is some possibility that the Turks might have lost the Yemen for ever." Even when the stern measures adopted by Feiz had succeeded in reclaiming the country for his master, the Turkish authorities were fearful lest the true story of the revolt should leak out, and jealously guarded the frontiers against travellers. Nor could they have been anxious that the condition of the Turkish soldiers should become known: and the large number of deserters, invariably kindly treated by the Arabs, is ominous of future disaster to their rule.

To the Turks the loss of the Yemen were a serious matter indeed. A blow would be struck at the prestige of Abdul Hamid from which he could scarcely recover, and not only the Yemen but the whole Hejaz would renounce their obedience. Nor could any caravan pass through the Yemen in safety; for the Turkish soldiers have kept open the passes, a feat the Imams would be powerless to accomplish. So that the question is a serious one for England, because English pockets would be lighter should the Aden trade suffer hurt. But it may well be questioned whether, in this case at any rate, our interests should prompt our sympathies. The Turk, partly because of his pseudo-western inclinations, is far inferior to the Arab.

The chief lesson, it seems to us, to be learnt from Mr. Harris's book is that Turkish authority in the Yemen is decaying. The most rapacious of governors will hesitate to refill an exhausted treasury by imposing further taxes on the tribesmen. A formidable list of victories, gained by the Arabs during the early part of the rebellion, may probably be regarded as prophetic of complete success in the future. The miserable plight of the Turkish soldiers can only fill an Arab mind with contempt for the Sultan whose authority they represent. One cannot be too grateful to Mr. Harris for showing us what manner of men these Yemeni are, for describing to us the wonderful hills and valleys they inhabit, and for casting a vivid light on Turkish incompetence and failure.

PERCY ADDLESHAW.

Idyls and Lyrics of the Ohio Valley. By J. J. Piatt. New Edition. (Longmans.)
Little New World Idyls. By J. J. Piatt. (Longmans.)

THERE was exhibited at the Academy in 1844 a picture in which a railway train is represented as passing through air golden with light in spite of rain that descends in torrents. Its path is along a brown bank that rises steeply from water on which a boat drifts leisurely. It is going at great speed, to the terror of a little hare that scuds on in front of it. Lurid fire-flashes light up the engine, and the dim wagons in long trail behind it catch bright glints as the light strikes on their windows.

The beauty and power of the picture which I have tried to describe above—the painter called it "Rain, Steam, and Speed"—can not be told in words black upon white. It was the first attempt to put on canvas the beauty of a railway train, and it has remained the greatest achievement of this kind among the pictures of the world. It has not been mentioned here without a special purpose. It is an old theory with me that what the painters do the poets do, and in the same age; that the arts—not these two arts only, but all the arts—tend one way in one century. To one holding this belief it comes with no surprise that the painter having risen up among us—and that painter Turner—who could put on canvas the beauty and the mystery of that steam-chariot that carries us about the world, there should come forward a poet to sing of it. It is with very great pleasure that I have found in the grave and beautiful work of the American poet with whom this notice deals frequent allusion to the steam wonder of our age. In the poem which opens the book, "The Pioneer's Chimney," the return of the writer to what had been a wooded land is thus described:

"First indistinct, then louder, nearer still,
And ever louder grew a tremulous roar;
Then, sudden, flared a torch from out the night,
And, eastward half a mile, the shimmering train
Hurried across the darkness.

And overhead the leaves were jarred awake,
Whispering a moment of the flying fright,
And far away the whistle, like a cry,
Shrill in the darkness reached the waiting town."

"The shimmering train"—"the whistle, like a cry"—who shall say, after this, that our old, plain friend, the railway train, supplies no theme for a poet?

"Taking the Night Train" is the name of one of these poems. The language in it—I quote three stanzas—is not so subtly weighed as in the lines quoted above. The word "depot" will be a terrible shock to some, to whom I will venture to say that I personally like it in its context.

"The streets are lighted and the myriad faces
Move through the gaslight, and the home-sick feet

Pass by me, homeless; sweet and close embrace Charm many a threshold—laughs and kisses sweet.

"From great hotels the stranger throng is streaming,

The hurrying wheels in many a street are loud;
Within the depot, in the gaslight gleaming,
A glare of faces, stands the waiting crowd.

"The whistle screams; the wheels are rumbling slowly,

The path before us glides into the light:
Behind, the city sinks in silence wholly;

The panting engine leaps into the night."

I am struck by the use of the word "hotels" in these stanzas. "Inns" would of course have been affected, and "hostelries" is absurd. "Hotels" is no doubt right, but at first reading it startled me more than "depot." In "Walking to the Station," effects of steam and speed are very finely dealt with in the closing stanza. More surprising is it to find that the only light-ray which falls across the gloom of the curious poem entitled "A Lost Churchyard" comes, as it seems to me, from a railway light. Even in the description of a haunted tavern the nearness of iron roads is glanced at. To muse, the poet takes "a noiseless train."

"Homesick at times, I take a noiseless train,
Wandering, breath-like, to my home again,
See my glad brothers, in the June-sweet air,
Toss the green hay, hot sheaves of harvest bear:
The fireside warms into my heart—how plain!
And my lost mother takes her boy again;
My sisters steal around me tenderly—
And all that cannot be yet seems to be."

It is, alas, all mere seeming, for thirty years have worked their change upon the place. First came this new thing, then came that, and—the inevitable followed.

"Strange men with chain and compass came at last Among the hills, across the valley passed.

"We do not want it," many said, and one,
'Through field of mine I swear it shall not run.'
And paced his boundary-line with loaded gun."

I have said so much about what has seemed to me to be the salient feature of Mr. Piatt's volume of poems: that in it a thing deemed by many of the most prosaic is shown to admit of poetic treatment, as it has been shown to admit of pictorial treatment—and to admit of such treatment at the hands of grave and ambitious artists—that I have left myself but little space to comment on other characteristics of this book. Its merits seem to me to lie in the truthful and loving description of landscape—that far Ohio Valley seems nearer to us as we read these idyls—in the descriptions of sunset and sunrise, of pioneers and mowers. We are taken into quiet places among quiet folk, though louder places with their louder folk are never so far distant that from them there does not come that whistle "like a cry." The defect of the work is an occasional incoherency. The poet aims at condensation, with the result that his meaning is not always as clear to his reader as it doubtless is to himself. Now and again, too, a trite phrase is used, as notably in the sonnet "Awake in Darkness." But for one verbal lapse in this poem, it would rank high among sonnets dealing with that most beautiful of world-old phenomena, the love of a man for his mother.

It is risking much for any poet to issue in one year more than one volume of verse; for both of Mr. Piatt's books may be called new in this country. The public, if pleased with the first, will expect much from the second; and if not pleased with the first, will give the second no welcome. Thus, the second is in every way at a disadvantage. I must state it as my opinion that the public will not be satisfied with Mr. Piatt's Little New World Idyls, the issue of which follows so close upon that of his Idyls and Lyrics of the Ohio Valley. In the former work there are not fifty poems; but every one is good, with here and there one excellent. In the latter volume there are close upon a hundred poems; and of these perhaps only five are worthy of their author. The poem called "At the Grave of Two Brothers" is large in thought and lovely in expression; the quatrain named "Irish Ivy" embodies an interesting fact; and in "Ireland: a Seaside Portrait" Mr. Piatt paints a picture which those will like who have not in their memory Walt Whitman's painting of the same group: an old woman and a young, the old one my grey Ireland and the young one their—Walt Whitman's and John Piatt's—young-eyed America. When to the mention of these three poems, it is added that there are among the sonnets two that are tender and strong, the one beginning "If You Should Vanish," and the other named "The Child in the Street," all has been said that can be said in praise of this second book.

ELSA D'ESTERRE-KEELING.

A History of the Roman Empire, from its Foundation to the Death of Marcus Aurelius.
By J. B. Bury. (John Murray.)

WE have read, with no ordinary pleasure, Prof. Bury's admirable summary of the domestic and foreign history of the early Roman Empire. It is not only that he has filled up a long-standing gap in Mr. Murray's series of Student's Manuals, beginning where Dean Liddell dropped the thread of Roman history and ending just where "The Student's Gibbon" begins; but he has also filled up a vacant place in our historical literature at large.

We have no book which quite answers to his new volume. Dean Merivale, of course, has covered the period, and more, and has left off where Gibbon started; but, with all the great merits of his work, we must admit that it is now getting a little old-fashioned, and it is on a much larger scale than the manual before us. Something was wanted which should deal with the period in question within a moderate number of pages, and which should add to fair verdicts on the character and conduct of emperors the results of recent inquiry into Roman policy and institutions. The classification of epigraphical evidence has given us an infinity of new light on the daily life and on the social and political arrangements of the Romans; while the new school of historical inquiry, led by Dr. Mommsen, has come more into sympathy and touch with the statesmen and soldiers of the early empire. It may be that a certain similarity of political problems is enabling the end of the nineteenth century to understand more fully the first and second centuries; but, a all events, we feel that we do understand the facts which our fathers collected better than they did, and that, too, at the very time when the new evidence of inscriptions is giving us fresh material of a different sort. There is very little in the points of view thus attained which will not be found duly recognised and fitly placed by Prof. Bury; and, therefore, we welcome his book, not merely on the ground that we have nothing else quite like it, but also because what he has undertaken he has done so well. He holds the balance skilfully between the constitutional and military interests of the story on the one side and the biographical facts on the other. Tacitus, of course, overrated the importance of his great—or at least his leading—men; but it would not be well, from mere reaction against Tacitus, to neglect the pictures of the mild old age of Augustus, of Tiberius, tristissimus hominum, of Claudius, of Nero, or the Antonines. We should be losing the good side of so much good literature if we overlooked that aspect of an age which has been painted most by Suetonius, Plutarch, Tacitus himself, and the writers of the Historia Augusta; and, as it happens, the men who stand out on the canvas are interesting figures. Some we cannot understand, some we detest; and the comparative tameness of virtue is relieved by our possession of the Meditations of Marcus Aurelius. We like to see, as it were, the real flesh and blood of these men, and we should all be glad if we could know what it was that Antoninus Pius said to the tax-collector of Tuscum.

Prof. Bury begins with an account of the principate and of the joint government of the princeps and senate. The true theory of this has emerged so recently from darkness that we cannot wonder if there be some points still open to dispute; but it is a great gain to have the new views stated for us in English, fairly and lucidly. The political development of the principate between B.C. 27 and A.D. 180 into something much more like an admitted despotism is conveniently put together in a concluding chapter. The literature, both Greek and Latin, of the Augustan age and that of the Flavian and Antonine dynasties are described with considerable fulness. Foreign policy and provincial arrangements are illustrated by two coloured maps. The Roman conquest of Britain fills such a place as it ought to fill in an English history. The imperial post, the aqueducts, the provincial councils, the coinage, the schemes for the education of poor children, the first steps of Christianity, are among the miscellaneous subjects treated; and the dinners, the baths, and the games of the Roman people come into a very useful chapter (based on Friedländer) on Roman life and manners.

Of course in so large a field it was not possible to avoid some oversights. The suggestion that Horace managed the hexameter with ease is at least disputable. Not all scholars will allow that the Pharsalia "has not a spark of genius." The famous words on Pompeius Magnus, Stat magni nominis umbra, are not altogether Lucan's own, but are suggested by the Aeneid II. 223. The tax on sales of goods in Italy which Gaius abolished was 1 per cent., not $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. The last of the captured eagles of Varus cannot have been recovered from the Germans by Germanicus and also by Claudius (pp. 174, 240). P. 67 omits to mention what was the function of the Augustales. In dealing with the very perplexing story of the fall of Messalina, Mr. Bury adopts with some hesitation the statement of Suetonius, that Claudius sanctioned a marriage between his wife Messalina and Silius, in order to avoid an evil which was said by soothsayers to threaten the husband of Messalina. But how could such a marriage be valid, or even valid enough to trick destiny, unless the lady were first divorced from Claudius? and of this divorce we hear nothing.

F. T. RICHARDS.

NEW NOVELS.

The Soul of the Bishop. By John Strange Winter. In 2 vols. (White.)

Dr. Mirabel's Theory. A Psychological Study. By Ross George Dering. In 3 vols. (Bentley.)

Found Wanting. By Mrs. Alexander. In 3 vols. (White.)

Bianca. By Mrs. Bagot Harte. In 2 vols. (Fisher Unwin.)

The Autobiography of a Spin. A Story of Anglo-Indian Life. By May Edwood. (Thacker.)

The Pursuit of a Chimera, being a Midwinter's Day Dream. By C. Elvey Cope. (Digby, Long & Co.)

The Heart of Montrose and other Stories. By Esther Carr. (Fisher Unwin.)

WHEN a writer who has achieved popular and well-deserved success in one field of fiction suddenly takes a new departure, his or her admirers naturally regard the step with an interest that must needs be partly hopeful, partly apprehensive. The lady who chooses to be known as John Strange Winter has added to the pleasure of life by a series of bright stories, which have obviously had no other aim besides that of healthful entertainment; but she has become anxious to show herself capable of earnest dealing with a serious theme, and the outcome of her anxiety is The Soul of the Bishop. What will be the general opinion we cannot guess, but we should describe the book as a thoughtful, powerful, pathetic, and thoroughly unsatisfactory novel—one cause being responsible for its unsatisfactoriness both as a statement of a problem and as a work of art. The story is, to use a somewhat technical term, insufficiently motivated. If the spiritual experience which impelled Cecil Constable at the eleventh hour to break off her engagement with the bishop, whom she passionately loved, was merely a definite disbelief in certain non-essential statements in the Thirty-nine Articles, or even a vague feeling of uncertainty with regard to more important matters, an act which utterly spoiled two lives was surely an extravagant response to the true moral demands of the situation; and as such, it fails to win our comprehending sympathy. If, on the other hand, Cecil had come to be a disbeliever in the central truths of Christianity, we are left without any indication of the road by which she travelled from thoughtless acquiescence to thoughtful assurance of scepticism; and there is a hiatus in the story which renders it practically unintelligible. It is probable that John Strange Winter is entirely unaware of the indistinctness with which she states the personal problem that Cecil Constable has to solve; and, indeed, the indistinctness seems to be largely due to a lack of knowledge which, in a book of this kind—that aims not only at seriousness, but at thoroughness—is difficult to excuse. The whole story is grounded upon the assumption that the Thirty-nine Articles are a creed, acceptance of which is incumbent upon every Churchman, instead of being (what, of course, they are) a legal document with which the laity have no more vital concern than they have with a judgment of the Privy Council. A bishop in real life would have explained this at once; but John Strange Winter's bishop shares her own foggy, and the mist shapes itself into the Brocken spectre of story to which these volumes are devoted. Of course, from an artistic point of view, an error of this kind would be of little moment did nothing depend upon it; but here it dominates the story, and, for well-informed people, destroys all verisimilitude. If it were possible to set aside this central defect, The Soul of the Bishop would be a work of great fascination. To speak of a story as at once strong and ineffective may seem paradoxical, but readers of the novel will understand the paradox. Though the book, as a whole, is a failure, some parts of it touch a high-water mark of success, after a fashion which indefinitely enlarges our conception of the author's possibilities of imaginative and dramatic achievement.

Mr. Ross George Dering has scored a distinct triumph, and Dr. Mirabel's Theory will probably be one of the most sought-after novels of the season. Dr. O. W. Holmes's lady friend, who declined to read Elsie Venner because she objected to "medicated" friction, probably represents a large class which has something to say for itself; but the most eager opponent of medication who has been tempted to begin Mr. Dering's story is not likely to lay it down until he has finished it. During the past few years several novelists have dealt in a somewhat tentative fashion with the subject of hypnotism; but so far as we can remember, no one has ventured to utilise the creepy suggestion of more than one respectable authority, that a malevolent operator can employ his power not merely for the illicit subjugation of the patient's will, but "even for the extinction, instead of the resuscitation, of his vitality": that, "in short, hypnotism may be employed as the instrument of safe and secret murder." Perhaps one need not greatly regret the neglect of such a gruesome narrative theme; but if it be treated at all, it is well that the treatment should be in the hands of a writer, like Mr. Dering, who knows what he is about. The hypothesis upon which the story is founded is clearly insusceptible of easy and convincing verification, but this is a matter with which the purely literary critic has no concern. His business is with the novelist's treatment of his material; and Mr. Dering proves himself a master of the very difficult art of mixing science and story, in such a fashion that the former intensifies rather than dulls the interest of the latter. As a work of pure narrative art, Dr. Mirabel's Theory is a masterly performance. It is from first to last thought out with unusual care; it has both symmetry and proportion, and yet neither has the obtrusiveness that gives an effect of artificiality—witness the subtly suggested contrast between the tragedy which is being enacted within the walls of Gorse Cottage and the quiet comedy of village life all around it. The story moves, with no hasty rush, but with unbroken constancy of progress, to its inevitable climax, or rather climaxes; and as they are reached or neared, we have some half-dozen situations which in intensity of thrilling interest have few rivals in recent fiction. The machinery which brings about the dénouement is set into action with singular skill; and Mme. Mirabel, the evil protagonist of the story, is a sombrely impressive creation which no novelist need be ashamed to own.

Mrs. Alexander's Found Wanting is a very creditable novel. The story, without being specially absorbing, is interesting enough to satisfy ordinary requirements, but the writer does not rely upon it exclusively: she appeals to those who like to see something of thought and finish in the management of character and situation. Mr. Riddell, the middle-aged widower, whose death sends his daughter out in the world, represents a familiar type, for he is of the family of Dickens's Turveydrop and Daudet's Dolabelle; but his conceit, his priggishness, his sickening selfishness, and his consistent assumption of the rôle of a domestic martyr, are individualised skilfully, without the aid of those touches of exaggeration which are so tempting yet so fatal. A newer type—new indeed in real life, and as yet almost unknown to fiction—is that of the woman journalist; and as exhibit it by the straightforward, business-like, kind-hearted Mme. Falk, it presents a decidedly attractive appearance. The only failure is, unfortunately, the character whose action dominates the story—the plausible guardian of May Riddell who, after winning her affections, turns out to be anything but what her fancy painted him. Mr. Piers Ogilvie is "found wanting," not only morally, but artistically; and in the world of fiction a lack of lifelikeness is much more fatal than a lack of principle. Only a novel with a very strong constitution could survive the chapter in which Ogilvie does his worst.

That high-minded and loyal-hearted gentleman, Mr. Gilead P. Beck, said some very severe things about the ungallant masculine critics who are occasionally guilty of the outrage of "slating" a lady's novel. We have so much respect for Mr. Beck that we will not say all that we think about Mr. Bagot Harte's Bianca. It is to be hoped that we are not flagrantly unchivalrous in suggesting that nature has not provided Mrs. Harte with the equipment of a novelist. Her book has, however, one merit which it would be ungracious to ignore. It consists of only two volumes.

A "spin" is, we believe, Anglo-Indian for a worn-out flirt who has run through her chances in the matrimonial mart, and who is—as more familiar slang has it—on the shelf. Flirtation in the hands of a competent chef can be made a very appetising side-dish of fiction, but it is hardly satisfying as a pièce de résistance; and the Autobiography of a Spin, with its unbroken record of hand-squeezings, and kisses behind fans, and other details of ineffective philandering, seems to us a little monotonous and tiresome. Miss May Edwood has a certain amount of vivacity, but hardly enough to keep our interest alive through rather more than two hundred pages all devoted to one theme.

The pursuit of entertainment in the perusal of The Pursuit of a Chimera is a vain thing. Had the disordered fancy, of which it is all compact, been the substance of a real instead of a manufactured dream, we should think with deep sympathy of the indigestion which must have preceded it. Here is a passage, descriptive of an adventure with a corpse, which is a pleasant thing to go to bed upon:

"The protuberant eyes met mine in a ghastly stare; his purple face was puffed out past all recognition, and his blue-fat lips were wreathed into a smile so horribly sarcastic, so malevolent, and so grotesquely devilish, that I let the bloated body fall from my arms to the ground, which it struck with a sickening thud. As it did so a piercing scream issued from the thing's lips, and though I knew it was but the escape of the imprisoned gases, my over-wrought nerves gave way before it."

We should think so; but what about the reader's over-wrought stomach? This kind of thing really ought to be made penal.

Boys and girls will find very pleasant reading in The Heart of Montrose and its three companion stories. One of these deals with the boyhood of King René of Sicily, another with the girlhood of Catherine II. of Russia, while Twins is a romantic tale of present-day life. All four stories are prettily imagined and told.

JAMES ASHCROFT NORLA.

GIFT BOOKS.

Nursery Rhymes. By Mrs. Richard Strachey. With Illustrations by G. P. Jacomb Hood. (Bliss, Sands & Foster). It is not everybody who can write verses for children, and there are very few who can sing them so well as Mrs. Richard Strachey. They are daffodils out of her garden, as she calls them in the pretty verses which introduce the rest.

"Who shall have the daffodils in my garden growing Daintily befrilled in white, with yellow furbelowing?
Baby boy and baby girl,
Cheek of rose and tooth of pearl,
Golden head and dancing feet,
Drops of life all perfect sweet,
You shall have the daffodils within my garden growing."

This is a good prelude, and here is the first of the flowers:—

"I have learnt a new song
From the linnet, the linnet;
Sweet will you listen
A minute, a minute?
Sunjoy, and showers,
And windcries are in it,
And babble of flowers
Begin it, begin it."

Those who hear the beginning will not be easily satisfied till the end, nor after it, until they have listened to all the "New Songs" that the volume contains. For they are all new in the best sense, not seeking after novelty, but finding it everywhere, by that freshness of heart which makes the world for ever young. Wind songs, sowing songs, bird songs, fairy songs, leaf songs, all sorts of songs, even pony songs, and all of them musical, now tender, now sportive, save where a little touch of sadness comes and flies like a summer cloud. Not the least pretty (nor the least original either) are the variations on some nursery rhymes. Nobody knew before what were the consequences of fetching the rabbit skin to wrap that Baby Bunting in; but every father and mother ought to know, and so we recommend them, as well as their children, to study this very charming little volume, and to look at Mr. Jacomb Hood's delightful illustrations.

The Pope's Mule and Other Stories from Daudet. Translated by A. D. Beavington Atkinson and D. Havers. (Fisher Unwin.) Those who have never read Lettres de mon Moulin and Contes du Lundi have here an opportunity to make acquaintance with some of the best of Daudet's short stories—all too short, we should think, if they were not so complete. For its rich invention and exquisitely controlled extravagance there is nothing better than "The Pope's Mule." We would it were really true. The notion of a real Pope, daily mixing for his mule a large bowl of fine French wine mixed with spices and sugar and giving it to him with his own hands, is fine. Such a mule as this, though generally sweet tempered, would surely have a reserve of strength which could be used with terrible effect on occasion. The kick which he stored for seven years could have no ordinary effect; and we are not at all surprised to hear that all that was left of Tistet Vedène was a cloud of golden dust with an ibis plume floating in it. How different from this are the pathetic tales of the Franco-German War, like "The Standard Bearer" and "The Turco of the Commune." The latter is the best of all; but why discriminate when all are so good?

Lily and Waterlily. By Mrs. Comyns Carr. (Innes.) The story of Lily is neither a fairy tale nor an allegory, but a nondescript somewhere between the two. The land in which Ruby and Pearl live is equally dubious: now it reminds one of this world before the Fall and now of this world after it, now of Fairyland, and now of those strange regions first discovered by that Alice whose adventures have been edited by one "Lewis Carroll." It is a strange land; for animals, though they spare Ruby and Pearl, are allowed to eat each other, while the little human babies are not permitted to take the life even of a flower. Mother Nature regulates all this, and would appear in this portion of her dominions to have adopted the principles in force in the Regent's Park and the Zoological Gardens. Our first parents lost their Eden through eating apples, but Pearl and Ruby lose theirs through plucking a flower. They are only restored by a vicarious sacrifice by a lily, who comes to life again and turns into a beautiful prince who marries Pearl, and a beautiful maiden who marries Ruby—we forget which. A field mouse on the same day turns into a mate of the proper sex for the other human inhabitant of this strange country, and so the tale ends with the marriages of two pairs of babies. It is all very mixed and incoherent, neither good sense nor good nonsense, but yet readable and written with no little fancy and charm. The story of the Waterlily is pretty, and the illustrations are very nice—so that the volume may fairly claim its position in the series of "Dainty Books."

A Jacobite Exile. By G. A. Henty. (Blackie.) Mr. Henty has in this story tried fresh scenes, and with his usual skill and success. He makes his young hero, Charlie Carstairs, figure in the service of Charles the Twelfth of Sweden—the successful Charles who crushed Russia at Narva, not the unsuccessful Charles who was overthrown at Pultowa, or died before Frederickshall. It is really very surprising how Mr. Henty works up the historical materials at his command, which with his wonted conscientiousness he mentions in his preface. He has never produced a more truly historical romance, and scarcely ever a more piquantly written narrative. One, at least, of his battle-pieces is full of the old "special correspondent" fire. The private adventures of Charlie Carstairs and his father are also pleasantly told; and Mr. Henty shows a good deal of shrewdness in making Charlie take part in Marlborough's campaigns, but not in the rising of the Young Pretender.

Fergus MacTavish. By J. Macdonald Oxley. (Hodder & Stoughton.) Perhaps the most notable thing about this book—which, by the way, is remarkably well-printed—is the fact of its scenes being laid in a district that writers of books for boys have hitherto not utilised, that of which Lake Winnipeg may be regarded as the centre. Otherwise Fergus is but a good and essentially Scotch lad, passing through the first stages of his moral curriculum. He has adventures of various kinds, and proves his physical and moral courage to the satisfaction of all who have any right to be concerned. Finally we are given to believe that Fergus MacTavish was "ordained to the Christian ministry," and "came to have a snug home of his own upon the island, with Ruth for a loving happy helpmate." But here we have only to do with Fergus as a lad, and with his work among the Indians. This story is clearly and vigorously written, and ought to be a favourite with the boys of the present day—evidently a large band—whose idol is the well-known missionary, Mr. John G. Paton.

Graeme and Cyril. By Barry Pain. (Hodder & Stoughton.) This is a good healthy book for boys, and the characters in it are well drawn and discriminated. It seems to be part of the nature of things that the bad boys are more attractive in literature than the good ones; and Cyril, with all his faults—and these faults are not of a generous kind—is more interesting than the manly, noble-minded Graeme, about whose career one never feels a moment's anxiety. Graeme is a fine fellow though, and by no means one of those perfect creatures without individuality who sometimes serve as heroes to boys' books. The charm of the story consists mainly in the picture of school life, and is much increased by the variety and humour of the less important characters. The "Celestial" and "Fathead" are excellently drawn, and the dialogue throughout is natural and spirited. There was no occasion for such a very sensational ending. Cyril had done nothing to deserve so fatal a termination to his career, even from the artistic point of view. The problem as to what Burton and his uncle were to do with his father, the burglar, is left unsolved; and, what to us is a greater disappointment, we hear nothing more of Neddy Trigman after the first part of the book, and he is the most amusing and original of the whole dramatis personae.

The Black Bar. By G. M. Fenn. (Sampson Low.) The author never wrote a more thrilling tale than these adventures of a middy while capturing slavers. About three fights a day seem to have been his average allowance; but the skippers of slave-ships luckily cannot shoot straight, at all events in fiction, and he escapes as if he bore a charmed life. The critic gladly turned into a boy for the nonce, and read The Black Bar from cover to cover.

In the Land of the Golden Plume. By D. L. Johnstone. (W. & R. Chambers.) The author may well call this, in his sub-title, "a tale of adventure." From the first page to the last the action never flags; and a good deal of information about North Queensland, gold-digging, and the like, is acquired insensibly while following the adventures of the hero. Half a dozen illustrations add to the attractions of the book, which cannot fail to delight boys whose attention has been in any way turned to Australia.

In Africa with the Union Jack. By W. Pimblett. (Virtue.) The history of the British arms in Africa possesses a painful interest at present. Mr. Pimblett begins his book at the English struggle with Napoleon. Thence he passes on to the Abyssinian War and the dash on Coomassie, reaching more familiar ground in the Zulu Wars, and the conflicts with the Arabs in the Soudan, together with the death of Gordon. The author has done his work well, and this is just the book for an intelligent boy; but the following sentence might be amended with advantage: "Fierce Arabs slashed at them from close quarters, and when not cloven asunder by some heavy sabre, gashed to death."

Jennifer's Fortune. By Mrs. Henry Clarke. (S.P.C.K.) This is one of the best of the many Cornish stories which have lately appeared. Jennifer is a charming heroine, and the dialect is well managed without being obtrusive. Helen, her foil, lives in London. "With London's misery at her doors, with London's rich opportunities for gaining knowledge, for giving service, within her grasp, her keenest interest was in the cut of a frock, her most serious occupation the arrangement of a dinner-table." But trouble and the influence of the heroine gradually call forth her true and better nature. Mrs. Clarke has so skillfully managed the evolution that the reader regrets, for Helen's sake, the unequal distribution of happiness at the end. This is a distinct improvement on Honor Pentreath, Mrs. Clarke's last story.

For the Sake o' the Siller. By Maggie Swan. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.) The authoress of this "Fifeshire Story of Forty Years ago" has beyond doubt a knowledge of the Scottish character and a command of the Scottish dialect. She weaves both with very considerable effect into the evolution of a simple yet satisfactory tale. Perhaps the plot is commonplace. Effie Blyth, an orphan girl left with no "tocher" but winsomeness, is unwise enough to prefer her showy but selfish lover, Will Graham, to the modest, unassuming, but loyal Alec Cummings. By a possibly too familiar device—the drowning of Will Graham—all is made to end well. Among the less ambitious Scotch stories of the time, this ought to take a good place, as several of the characters are remarkably well drawn, particularly the rapacious and vindictive Aunt Teenie.

The Close of St. Christopher's. By Emma Marshall. (Nisbet.) Mrs. Marshall's dean scarcely bears comparison with other famous deans in fiction, although "his library is filled to overflowing with volumes of every century both B.C. and A.D." The heroine (who at one time appears as Miss Sidney, at another as Miss Sydney) leads a quiet existence until her lover rescues her from a railway accident. She has long believed in him, although he is generally deemed fond of horses and betting. A man of this kind would hardly tell his girl cousin that at his country house "he would try to be what she would like him to be." However, the transformation does ensue. The grammar of the authoress is at times queer. A person "who she had never seen" is as bad as "I should be best satisfied to see the dean." The story is sufficiently commonplace.

Phil Thorndyke's Adventures, and other Stories. By F. M. Wilbraham, E. M. Piper, and Others. (Hogg.) This is a singular medley of stories, ending in an historical sketch of King Alfred, suited for a "Child's History of England." The Druids are introduced, as usual in such histories; but amends are made to modern research by stating that the University of Oxford was "long believed, but incorrectly, to have been founded by Alfred." The illustrations are equally varied; and a coloured plate shows the contemporaries of Alfred clad apparently in armour, while a castle of the twelfth or thirteenth century occupies the foreground. Miss Wilbraham's tale is carefully studied, but the others are mediocre.

Jim. By Ismay Thorn. (Wells, Gardner, Darton & Co.) The authoress is hardly so successful as usual in this story of a boys' school. Its atmosphere is unreal, and some of the boys are prigs. "Jim" himself is far too good for a schoolboy. Girls will like the book more than boys. The writer has introduced a capital incident, and vouches for its having actually occurred. It rescues the book, at any rate, from the charge of being namby-pamby.

In the Fifteen; a Tale of the First Jacobite Insurrection. By H. C. Adams. (Hodder & Stoughton.) This story is very carefully written, and ranges over a stirring period in the history of England, from the Battle of Killiecrankie to the execution of Lord Derwentwater and his associates in the Rebellion. The manners of the time, too, are well painted, and there is a good chapter introducing the condition of the London streets and a combat with the Mohocks. Nevertheless, the action hangs throughout, and Mr. Adams would probably succeed better in a romance pure and simple than in an historical tale.

A True Cornish Maid. By G. Norway. (Blackie.) The incidents of Cornish life in the last century are here worked up into a pleasant story. The superstitions connected with holy wells and the "Piskies," the pilchard fishery, taking a French privateer, and smuggling, lend themselves happily to the author's needs, while Wesley's teaching is just beginning to leaven the old Cornish ruggedness. Mr. Norway's tale can be read with considerable pleasure.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MR. I. GOLLANCZ'S long-expected edition of Lamb's "Specimens of Elizabethan Dramatists" and "Garrick Extracts" is nearly ready for publication by Messrs. Dent & Co., in their Temple Library. The volumes will include sixty-eight "Fragments" contributed by Lamb to Hone's Day Book, which have not yet found a place in any previous edition. The identification of these valuable "Fragments" has entailed much labour on the editor. For the first time Lamb's text has been revised and corrected throughout, bibliographical and other errors have been removed, and the extracts chronologically re-arranged; brief critical notes are appended to each volume. In addition to the ordinary small and large-paper editions, there is to be a limited edition, illustrated with portraits of dramatists and actors and with views of the theatres.

THE new edition of Mr. Whympers's Scrambles among the Alps—which has long been out of print, and exceedingly scarce—will be issued by Mr. John Murray in the course of a few days. Mr. Whympers has himself taken special pains with the illustrations, which number 137 in all; the paper has been made for the purpose at Messrs. Dickinson's mills; and the binding—a dainty white cover, sprinkled with snow crystals—is the work of Mr. Zaehnsdorf. Only a limited number of copies will be printed.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. will publish, in time for Christmas, a nursery rhyme book by Miss Christina G. Rossetti, entitled Sing-Song. It will have 120 illustrations by Mr. Arthur Hughes, engraved by the Brothers Dalziel.

MESSRS. RIVINGTON, PERCIVAL & Co., will issue immediately in their series of "Periods of European History," European History, 476-918, by Mr. C. W. C. Oman.

MR. WILLIAM MACKAY, of Inverness, will shortly publish, by subscription, a history of the parish of Urquhart and Glenmoriston, based mainly upon original documents and local traditions. Special chapters will be devoted to the ancient royal castle, and to the incidents associated with the battle of Culloden. The book will be handsomely printed, and illustrated with portraits, plans, and facsimiles.

MR. ELLIOT STOCK announces for early publication a new work, by E. V. B., under the title, A Book of the Heavenly Birthdays. It will be fully illustrated by the author. The same house will publish immediately Guesswork for Christmas.

MESSRS. F. V. WHITE & Co. will publish next month the late Lady Duffus Hardy's novel, A Buried Sin, in three volumes.

MESSRS. SPOTTISWOODE & Co. will issue early in December, Clubs: a list of 950 clubs frequented by the English in all parts of the world, for 1894, by Mr. E. C. Austen Leigh. The list has been carefully revised, and the names of over 200 clubs appear in their places for the first time.

WITH reference to the sale of the Hazlitt papers, mentioned in the ACADEMY of last week, Messrs. Elkin Mathews & John Lane announce that they have acquired the rights of reprinting from the original manuscripts the Liber Amoris, hitherto garbled, the letters from Hazlitt to Patmore, and the diary kept by Mrs. William Hazlitt in Scotland while the divorce proceedings of 1822 were going on, together with facsimiles of a letter from Sarah Walker to Hazlitt and a letter of Hazlitt's to Patmore; also an unpublished portrait of Hazlitt. The book is now in the press, and will be issued immediately.

MESSRS. MORISON BROS., of Glasgow, will publish shortly The Auld Scotch Preceptor, by Mr. Nicholas Dickson, completing the sketches of Scottish Church life depicted in the author's former works.

THE Letters of James Russell Lowell have already reached a third edition, in their two-volume form.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR will unveil the Lowell memorial in the Chapter-house at Westminster, on Tuesday next, November 28, at noon.

WE have received a catalogue of choice, rare, curious, and valuable books, issued by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, of New York. The first subject for remark is that the books of American authors are conspicuous by their absence: even when binders are mentioned, the most frequent names are Riviere and Zaehnsdorf. It is also curious to notice which of our own authors are in repute in the United States. First editions of Dickens and Thackeray, and illustrations by Cruikshank and Phiz, seem to be as much sought after there as here. Among the moderns, there is a special demand for Robert Bridges and William Watson, and for the issues of Mr. Daniel's private press at Oxford. A complete set (34 volumes) of the works of Richard Jefferies is priced at 370 dollars. But what we most grudge to our cousins is the original MS. of Charles Lamb's story, "Cupid's Revenge," which is not to be found in Canon Ainger's edition. There are also fifteen letters of Mr. Ruskin, which we are told have never been published.

MISS BEATRICE HARRADEN has received an overwhelming number of letters, asking the source of the quotation whence she took the title of her book (now in its ninth edition), Ships that Pass. The lines, "Ships that pass in the night," may be found in Longfellow's Tales of a Wayside Inn, the third evening, Theologian's Second Tale (Elizabeth), fourth part.

THE FORTHCOMING MAGAZINES.

WE understand that, with the new year, the Rev. J. B. Mayor will cease to be editor of the Classical Review. He has laid English scholarship under a heavy obligation to him, both by his energy in starting the review seven years ago and by the judgment and care he has shown in the management of it. It has become indispensable to English and American classical scholars, and is now well and favourably known on the Continent, where it has even been held up as a model for foreign journals to imitate. No small amount of good original work has appeared in it, and its reviews of books, though sometimes rather late in appearing, are usually both authoritative and excellent. The scholarly judgment of Mr. Mayor and of his colleague, Mr. A. M. Cook, of St. Paul's School, has secured this success; but the enterprise of Mr. David Nutt in venturing on a monthly journal of such a kind deserves also to be recognised. We believe it to be no secret that Mr. Marindin, late of Eton, known as one of the editors of the new Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities, succeeds to the editorship.

FROM next year Folk-Lore, hitherto the joint property of the Folk-Lore Society and Mr. David Nutt, will become the sole property of the Society. Mr. Jacobs has been compelled by pressure of work to give up the editorship; and Folk-Lore will in future be edited by a committee consisting of Mr. Clodd, Miss Roalfe Cox, Mr. Gomme, Mr. Jacobs, and Mr. Kirby, with Mr. Alfred Nutt as chairman and acting-editor. The forthcoming number of Folk-Lore will contain the following articles: an answer by Mr. Lang to Mr. Jacobs's strictures upon his preface to Miss Cox's "Cinderella"; a criticism by Mr. Nutt of Mr. Jacobs; Mr. Newell's views respecting folk-tale diffusion;

Mr. Hartland's paper on "Pin Wells and Rag Bushes," read before the British Association; text and translation of twenty-five articles from the Dinnahenchas, edited by Mr. Whitley Stokes from Kilbr. xvi.; the Sanctuary of Mouni, with illustrations, by Miss G. M. Godden; and Folk-Tales from Melanesia, collected and translated by the Rev. Dr. R. H. Codrington.

THE new volume of the Bookworm, which commences in December, will be a considerable improvement in many ways on its predecessors. Contributions have been promised by Mr. William Carew Hazlitt (reminiscences of Messrs. Sotheby's auction rooms and on early English book collectors), Mr. A. W. Pollard, Mr. Clouston, Mr. Ashbee, Mr. Walter Hamilton, and Mr. Gleeson White. A series of articles on Modern Book Illustrators, including one on Mr. Harry Furniss with examples of his work, will be one of the features of the new volume.

THE Christmas number of the English Illustrated Magazine, to be published next Monday, will be enlarged to 164 pages. Mr. Thomas Hardy writes about "Ancient Earthworks at Dorchester," illustrated from photographs; Mr. George Gissing upon "The Muse of the Halls," with illustrations by Mr. Dudley Hardy; Mr. Phil Robinson on "The Queen's Lion at the Zoo"; E. Nesbit contributes a "Ballad of the White Lady"; while there will be nearly a dozen short stories, by Mrs. Steel, Messrs. W. E. Norris, E. F. Benson, Anthony Hope, Barry Pain, Max Pemberton, R. Barr. Almost every single thing will be illustrated.

IN the December number of Cassell's Magazine, which begins a new volume, two serial stories will be commenced: "The Slave of Care," by C. E. C. Weigall, and "Margaret's Way," by Annie E. Wickham. The author of "How to be Happy though Married" and George B. Burgin will take opposite sides in a discussion on "Is Marriage a Lottery?" Mr. J. E. Hodgson, R.A., will contribute a complete story entitled "The Fortunes of Grey House," and Mr. Raymond Blathwayt "A Talk with Jerome K. Jerome."

A STRIKING portrait of "Mark Twain" will accompany the first instalment of his new story in the December Century, which will also contain a paper by Mr. Beyer on Berlioz, also illustrated with a portrait.

BOTH the Century and St. Nicholas will appear at Christmas in specially designed covers.

THE first number of Mr. Frederick Millar's anti-Socialist weekly, the Liberty Review, will be published by Messrs. Watts & Co. on December 2. It contains articles by Ouida, the Earl of Onslow, Dr. Mortimer Granville, Canon Hayman, Mr. George Candy, Q.C., and Mr. Charles Fairfield. The price will be twopence.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

THE University of Oxford proposes to confer the honorary degree of M.A. upon the following: General Sir George Chesney, representative of the city in parliament; Mr. B. H. Baden-Powell, author of The Land-Systems of British India, in three volumes, published last year by the Clarendon Press; and Mr. J. F. Blumhardt, teacher of Bengali.

MR. M. R. JAMES, of King's College, has been appointed director of the Fitzwilliam Museum at Cambridge, in succession to Prof. Middleton. Mr. James has hitherto been assistant-director of the Museum, and is the author of a comprehensive catalogue of its illuminated manuscripts, which will be published almost immediately by the University Press. He was also joint-editor of the earliest edition of the Revelation of Peter which appeared in this country. Next Monday he has undertaken to read a paper before the Cambridge Antiquarian Society upon "The Interior Decoration and Furniture of the Abbey of St. Edmund at Bury."

A PUBLIC meeting will be held on Saturday next, December 2, at 2 p.m., in the theatre of the University of London, Burlington-gardens, to consider the question of a memorial to the late Master of Balliol. The Speaker of the House of Commons will be in the chair; and it is hoped that the meeting will be attended, not merely by Balliol men, but by all those who are interested in doing honour to Prof. Jowett's memory.

THE board of electors to the chair of Latin at Oxford having been fully constituted by the appointment of a Greek professor, notice is now given that candidates must send in their applications by December 12. The duties of the professor are: "to lecture [not less than forty-two times in the year] and give instruction on the history and criticism of the Latin language and literature, and on the works of classical Latin authors." The "and" we have italicized is presumably intended to be epeexegetical.

A REPORT of Mr. T. G. Jackson, the architect for the repair of St. Mary's Spire at Oxford, recommends that eleven new statues should be carved to replace those in the pinnacle groups, which are in a hopeless state of decay, at a cost of about £80 for each statue. It is proposed to follow the general conception of the original figures—saints, bishops, &c.—as to subject, pose, and treatment, but not to attempt to copy the mannerism of fourteenth century work. The sculptor suggested is Mr. G. Frampton, who has just designed the commemorative medal for the Winchester quingentenary.

IN Convocation at Oxford on Tuesday, a grant of £100 was voted towards the fund for explorations in Asia Minor; and Mr. Arthur Thomson, lecturer in human anatomy, was raised to the status of a professor. A scheme of amended regulations for the Arnold historical essay was vetoed by the Vice-Chancellor—which is, we imagine, not a very common occurrence.

A SYNDICATE has been appointed at Cambridge to consider how better provision may be made for the safe keeping of the records of the university, which were seriously imperilled on the occasion of a fire in the tower of the Pitt Press on November 8.

THE Rev. Dr. C. H. H. Wright delivered his first Grinfield Lecture at Oxford during this week, on "The Septuagint Version of the Book of Ecclesiastes."

IT is interesting to notice that Mr. J. B. Bury, of Trinity College Dublin, has been appointed an examiner at Oxford in the school of modern history.

THE Oxford Magazine supplies some statistics—whence collected we know not—about the generation who were in residence about ten years ago. The total number of matriculations during the three years 1880-82 was 2289, of whom 589 for various reasons never proceeded to their degree. Out of 1708 who did graduate, 1129 took honours, and 271 obtained a first-class. Of these graduates, again, 575 are now clergymen, 225 barristers, 76 solicitors, and 27 doctors. The corresponding figures for Cambridge are proportionately larger throughout, except in the case of those who failed to take degrees. Oxford also shows absolutely more honour men, more first-classes, and more barristers. From the same source, we learn that the Union at Oxford is full of vitality. It has 256 new members this term, of whom 209 are freshmen. "This is the best number for many years, ever since the Junior Common Rooms began to hit it hard."

ON Wednesday of this week the Marquis of Bute was formally installed as Lord Rector of the University of St. Andrews. The subject of his inaugural address was a review of the early ecclesiastical history of Scotland. Among those upon whom the honorary degree of LL.D. was conferred on the occasion were: Dr. William Huggins, Prof. James Dewar, the Rev. Dr. Albert Loewy, M. Demetrios Bikelas, and Father Joseph Stevenson.

THE following appointments have been made in the Queen's Colleges, in Ireland: at Belfast—Dr. W. H. Thompson, to the chair of physiology, recently founded and endowed by Mr. Dunville; and Dr. Johnson Symington, of Edinburgh, to the chair of anatomy; at Galway—Mr. A. C. Dixon, to the chair of mathematics.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

IN THE FORUM.

I SAW where Rome lay dying all her length, Fought the last fight; her hills, which were her breasts,
Feeding no more her children; her full strength
Maim'd like tall columns shorn of their crests;
Within her windy temples birds had nests—
O wreck'd great Mother! splintered idle spear!
The long shore of a sea that howls a wintry year!
Waste as a winter sea that grieves the land,
Torn, derelict, wind-bitten thou liest, and far,
Shed like a blight upon that silent strand,
The havoc of the Flavian and her scar:
Ah, tired fighter spent and stain'd with war,
The Cross is king, the Cross is king!—and thou, Fading, must hear the hymn to gods thou couldst not know.

Not vain, thou bulwark of the world, not vain
The great broad Book thou gav'st thyself to rear,
While through the tireless eye of thy last fane
We hail the face of Jove serenely clear,
Or swoon to peace as, dropping tear by tear,
The pity of his grave-eyed spouse shall fall,
And Mother Earth, which bare, shall serve us for a pall.

For we are men, O Mother, and thy sons;
Thou wert of earth and ours that parentage:
The pride of life, the race to him who runs
Boldest and first, the reverence of age—
Give of thy milk that, budding our courage,
Naked, alert, our faces to the light,
We bear our part—and thine—nor dizzy in the fight.

Now flags the sun that saw thee born, a flood
Of mellow quietness steepes thy broken line
Of domes and cypresses, and now in blood
He sinks beneath thy cloudy Palatine:
Thy passion, O Mother, weary and supine,
Shall it soon end? Now is the hush of things,
And Hesper, Night's pale herald, folds his silver wings.

Dusk as the purple of the night to come
And lovely as the sighing of her pain,
Thou shalt endure for ever, O my Rome,
Still as thy calm white Gods; nor shall disdain
Nor anguish nor the galling of the chain
Move thee or them to bondage worse than death, While on thy Capitol the caged wolf bares his teeth.

MAURICE HEWLETT.

Rome: October, 1893.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE current number of the Jewish Quarterly Review (David Nutt) is scarcely so interesting as usual. Dr. H. Hirschfeld calls attention to the large recent additions to our knowledge of Jewish liturgies written in Arabic. Dealing specially with the class of poetry called Piyyut, he points out their linguistic and metrical peculiarities, and gives as an example "The Tale of Hannah and her Sons," in Hebrew characters with an English translation. Dr. S. Krauss continues his examination of the references to Jews to be found in the Fathers, here treating of Eusebius and Ephraim Syrus, the latter of whom he maintains—against the common view—to have had a good knowledge of Hebrew. Prof. A. Bücheler also continues his elaborate investigation into the history of the reading of the Law and Prophets in a triennial cycle. Under the title of "Mr. Smith: a Possibility" and "Miss Smith: an Argument," the two editors (Mr. I. Abraham and Mr. C. G. Montefiore) discuss the question of conversion from Christianity to Judaism, in the different cases of a man and a woman. The Rev. R. H. Charles prints the first instalment of his translation of the Book of Jubilees, from new and unpublished MSS. Among the reviews, we may specially mention those by Mr. Upton of Fairbairn's "Christ in Modern Theology," and by Mr. Montefiore of Smend's "Lehrbuch der alttestamentlichen Religionsgeschichte."

THE MATHEMATICAL PROFESSORSHIP. AT AUCKLAND.

INTENDING candidates for the professorship of mathematics at University College, Auckland, New Zealand, ought to be made acquainted with the circumstances under which the post has been declared vacant. For ten years the chair has been filled by Mr. W. S. Aldis, who was senior wrangler and first Smith's prizeman in 1851, and subsequently principal of the College of Science at Newcastle-on-Tyne. He accepted the Auckland chair in 1883, on the usual understanding that the appointment was to last as long as he fulfilled his duties satisfactorily.

On May 19 last, Prof. Aldis read in a newspaper that the Council of the College had on May 15, at a meeting to which he was not summoned, decreed his dismissal. But no direct announcement of this decision, which was taken on the casting vote of the chairman, was made to him. A month later, on June 9, at another meeting of the Council, it was resolved to inform the professor that his services were no longer required.

The published intimation of the Council, after the first meeting, that Prof. Aldis's successor would receive £300 a year less salary suggested that the professor's dismissal was to be attributed to motives of economy. No cause was then publicly stated. At the second meeting, however, it was declared that Prof. Aldis had of late spent fewer hours in lecturing than had been prescribed by the Council. It was not denied that the diminution in the number of the lectures had been due to a diminution in the number of students requiring instruction in the higher branches of mathematics; and it was further acknowledged that Prof. Aldis, in correcting papers at home and in private study with pupils, had spent three or four more hours a week than was promised in the College Calendar.

On June 22, two days after Prof. Aldis had received formal notice of his dismissal, he asked for the grounds of the decision at which the Council had arrived. The Council was obdurate, and declined all explanation. At a meeting on August 21, not only was the proposal rejected (again by the casting vote of the chairman) to rescind the resolution dismissing him, but the professor was censured for the tone of letters sent by him on the subject to the public press. The chairman, on August 21, publicly asserted, for the first time, that the professor was dismissed "for gross neglect of duty."

It is not surprising to learn that, when the Council applied to the New Zealand Minister of Education for the services of the Agent-General in London in selecting a new professor, the request was refused, although such a refusal was without precedent in colonial history.

On October 2 the Council made a report of the case to the Minister of Education, of which a summary alone has been published. According to the summary, they attributed their action to "the small amount of work done by the professor and the disproportion between that work and the emoluments received." At the same time Sir Walter Buller, Dr. Selwyn, Master of Selwyn College, Cambridge, and Mr. R. Mackenzie, Rector of the Edinburgh Academy, were invited to select a successor to Prof. Aldis. The salary, it was further resolved, was to suffer no reduction.

Thus Prof. Aldis, a man of undoubtedly high character and attainments and an efficient teacher, has been dismissed without specific cause shown, and without any opportunity being afforded him of answering such charges of neglect of duty as may have been alleged against him. He has, moreover, suffered the unwarrantable indignity of reading in the public press the fact of his dismissal, and that at a moment when he had no reason to suspect that such a step was even in contemplation. "I consider," telegraphed Sir Robert Stout, an ex-premier of the colony, when he learned of the Council's procedure, "the Council has inflicted a grievous injury on higher education." Fair-minded men in this country will endorse that view.

Prof. Aldis has fortunately found a powerful champion in Dr. E. A. Abbott, who has set forth in print a very plain statement of the facts. "How can colonies," Dr. Abbott asks, "expect us to send them able teachers of high character if this is the treatment accorded to them?" Such an incident has occurred before, and it looks as if some strong expression of English public opinion is needed to prevent its recurrence. At the present juncture, it is desirable, at any rate, that university men of position should decline all requests made to them by the Auckland Council to aid in the selection of professors for New Zealand, until the publication of a full explanation of the treatment to which Prof. Aldis has been subjected.

SELECTED FOREIGN BOOKS.

GENERAL LITERATURE.

- BOURATIERRE, A. de la. Les Débuts de l'Imprimerie à Poitiers (1479-1515). Paris: Paul. 4 fr.
DAASP, Jean. Le Japon contemporain. Paris: May & Motteroz. 3 M. 40 Pf.
DUPUCH, R. La Côte du Violon ancien. Paris: Fissore. 5 fr.
FALKER, J. v. Das rumänische Königsschloss Pelesch. Wien: Gerold. 50 M.
MOYNIER, Marcel. France noire (Côte d'Ivoire et Soudan). Paris: Plon. 7 fr. 50 c.
ORLEANS, le Prince Henri d'. Autour du Tonkin. Paris: Calmann Lévy. 7 fr. 50 c.
REZOUARD, Ph. Bibliographie des éditions de Simon de Colines 1530-1548. Paris: Paul. 40 fr.
RUMER, H. Geschichte d. Osnabrücker Buchdrucks. 1. Thl. 1617-1707. Osnabrück: Rackhorst. 2 M.
THOMAN, Ernest. Les Belles-lettres françaises (1550-1800). Paris: Paul. 40 fr.
VALLÉE, Léon. La Bibliothèque. Paris: Terquem. 18 fr.

THEOLOGY.

- KÖNIG, E. Alttestamentliche Kritik u. Christenglaube. Bonn: Weber. 2 M.

HISTORY, LAW, ETC.

- BAHRFELDT, E. Zur mittelalterlichen Münzkunde Pommerns. Berlin: Weyl. 2 M.
BLOCH, le, de Paris. 3e Partie. Champigny, Loigny, Orléans. Paris: Baudoin. 8 fr.
BURDACH, K. Vom Mittelalter zur Reformation. Forschungen zur Geschichte der deutschen Bildung. 1. Hft. Halle: Niemeyer. 4 M.
CALLIANO, G. Prähistorische Funde in der Umgebung v. Baden bei Wien. Wien: Braumüller. 3 M. 40 Pf.
CROMB, C. Die Grundgesetze des französischen Obligationenrechts. Mannheim: Bensheimer. 9 M.
DUQUESNE, L. Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule. T. 1. Provinces du Sud-est. Paris: Thorin. 18 fr.
MEYER, E. Geschichte d. Alterthums. 2. Bd. Geschichte d. Abendlandes bis auf die Fenerkriege. Stuttgart: Cotta. 15 M.

- MOLTKE, Graf. H. v. Gesammelte Schriften u. Denkwürdigkeiten. 8. Bd. Berlin: Mittler. 9 M.
NÄCKE, P. Verbrechen u. Wahnsinn beim Weibe. Wien: Braumüller. 5 M.
TAINE, H. Les Origines de la France contemporaine. Le Régime Moderne. T. 2. Paris: Hachette. 7 fr. 50 c.
WOHLWILL, A. Hamburg während der Pestjahre 1712-1714. Hamburg: Gräfe. 2 M. 40 Pf.
ZEISSBERG, H. R. v. Belgien unter der Generalstatthalerschaft Erzherzog Carl (1793-4). 2. Thl. Leipzig: Freytag. 3 M. 40 Pf.

PHYSICAL SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

- ARZDUF, A. Physikalische Chemie der Krystalle. Braunschweig: Vieweg. 7 M. 50 Pf.
BASTIAN, A. Vorgeschichtliche Schöpfungslieder in ihrem ethnischen Elementargedanken. Berlin: Felber. 3 M.
CHODAT, R. Monographie Polygalacearum. Pars II. Basel: Georg. 3 M.
COCHERIS, P. Les parures primitives: avec une introduction sur les temps préhistoriques. Paris: Jouvet. 19 fr.
FRIEDRICH, G. Ostafrikanische Fische. Hamburg: Gräfe. 2 M. 50 Pf.
SADLER, R. Die parasitischen Exoskeeten. Hamburg: Gräfe. 5 M.
SCHWEINFURTH, G. Abyssinische Pflanzennamen. Berlin: Reimer. 6 M.
SPRECKMANN, G. Beiträge zur Zahlenlehre. Oldenburg: Eschen. 2 M.
STEINER, K. Die Philosophie der Freiheit. Berlin: Felber. 4 M.
TORQUIST, A. Fragmente a. Oxfordfauna v. Mar in Deutsch-Ostafrika. Hamburg: Gräfe. 3 M.
VALENTIN, V. Aesthetische Studien. 2. Bd. Berlin: Felber. 5 M. 40 Pf.
WEIMANN, A. Die Allmacht der Naturzüchtung. Ein Erwidern an Herbert Spencer. Jena: Fischer. 2 M.

PHILOLOGY, ETC.

- BÜTTNER, C. G. Anthologie aus der Sushali-Litteratur. Berlin: Felber. 18 M.
DELITZSCH, F. Beiträge zur Entzifferung u. Erklärung der koptischen Keilschrifttafeln. Leipzig: Hinzel. 8 M.
EKKART, R. Niederdeutsche Sprichwörter u. volkstümliche Redensarten. Braunschweig: Appelhaus. 8 M.
MANITIUS, M. Analekten zur Geschichte des Homs im Mittelalter (bis 1800). Göttingen: Dieterich. 2 M. 80 Pf.
ROTH, Rudolf v., Festzug an, zum Doktor-Jubiläum 31. Aug. 1893 v. seinen Freunden u. Schülern. Stuttgart: Kohlhammer. 12 M.
SOHN, A. Zum arabischen Dialekt v. Marokko. Leipzig: Hinzel. 3 M.
WERNER, C. Neue griechische Zauberpapyri. Leipzig: Freytag. 5 M.
ZEIDLER, V. Die Quellen v. Rudolfs v. Ems, Wilhelm v. Orlens. Berlin: Felber. 8 M.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"DAW" IN MALORY'S "MORTE DARTHUR."
The Scriptorium, Oxford: Nov. 9, 1933.

Possessors of the handsome edition of Malory's Morte D'Arthur, recently published by Mr. David Nutt, may like to correct an oversight in the Glossary, where, with reference to the passage on p. 585, Book xi. ch. x., "the Quene . . . felle to the erthe in a dede swoone, and thenne syr Bors took her vp and dowed her, & whanne she was awaked she kneled afore the thre knyghtes," &c., daw is said to mean "to moisten, sprinkle with cold water." This is an unlucky "shot." There is no such sense of daw in English of any age. The meaning here is "to awake (any one) from sleep or (more usually) from a swoon, to bring back to consciousness, revive, bring to," a common transitive use of daw, "to awake from sleep, recover from a swoon," which in its turn is a well-known transferred sense of daw, "to dawn, become daylight." In the transitive sense, "to bring round from a swoon," daw was in common use from the Middle English period down to the seventeenth century. Palsgrave has "I dawe from swooning, je reuiue, je reuscite." Drayton (1614) Polyolb. vi. 90 has "Thinking her to daw whom they supposed fain in some enchanted swoond." Ray has it as a north country word: "To daw in common speech is to awaken; to be dowed . . . to be fully awakened." Daw, M.E. dawen, as I need not remind English scholars, is O.E. dagian, a common Germanic derivative verb from day, day. Though it survives in Scotch: "The cock may daw, the day may daw," it has been displaced in English by the extended derivative dawn, which in the sixteenth century had also the same transitive sense: cf. Palsgrave, "I dawne or get life in one that is fallen in a swoone, je reuiue . . . I cannot dawne him." So in many sixteenth century authors. JAMES A. H. MURRAY.

FATHER JUVENAL: AN UNRECORDED TIBETAN LEXICOGRAPHER.

London: Nov. 18, 1893.

It appears that a new name must be added to the scanty list of Europeans who have studied the Tibetan language. Everything hitherto known on the subject is summarised by Mr. Clements R. Markham, in his introduction to the Narratives of Bogle and Manning (second edition, 1879). But we find no mention here of the name of Father Juvenal, a Roman Catholic missionary in Agra at the end of the last century, who has been rescued from oblivion by the recent publication of a volume entitled Travels in India a Hundred Years Ago (Osgood, McIlvaine & Co.). The author is Thomas Twining, who went out to India in the Bengal Civil Service in 1792. Two years later, when he was not yet nineteen, he undertook an adventurous journey to Delhi, where he obtained an audience of the Great Mogul, Shah Alam, then living under Mahratta protection. During one stage of this journey, from Farrukhabad to Agra, he had for a companion Father Juvenal, of whom he gives a very lively account. Unfortunately, he does not supply any biographical details, except that he was a Roman by birth; but he leaves the impression that he must have died shortly afterwards.

Here is the passage about his Tibetan studies:

"He [Father Juvenal] had made two excursions to Tibet, and resided there long enough to be able to compile a dictionary of the language. He showed me this laborious work, now nearly completed, although he said another journey to Tibet would be necessary. When terminated, he meant to transmit one copy of it to Rome and another to the University of Oxford, of which, at his request, gave him the address."

It is, we fear, too much to hope that any copy of this eighteenth century Tibetan dictionary can be now in existence.

J. S. C.

A CHILD MARRIAGE IN ENGLAND IN THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY.

Manchester: Nov. 15, 1893.

The Historical MSS. Commission have recently issued (XIII. Report, App. Part. vi., p. 275) the Diary of the Earl of Anglesey, a man of grave deportment, and high office under Charles II., who writes, under date May 20, 172:—

"This morning about ten of the clock at Lambeth, the Archbishop of Canterbury married my grandson, John Power, not eight year old, to Mrs. Catherine Fitzgerald, his cousin german, about seven year of age. I gave her in the chapel, and they answered as well as those of her age. The wedding dinner and supper gave them, and the rest of the day and till late at night was spent in dancing, &c., and I lay in my house. I did duties, and commended them to God's blessing."

It is remarkable how unconscious he appears to be of the impropriety of such a union. Dr. Rivalry may be interested in this pendant to important notes on these early marriages of the sixteenth century. Can a later instance be cited of child marriage in England?

WILLIAM E. A. AXON.

THE BATTLE OF SHREWSBURY.

Barnf, Aylth, N.B.: Nov. 15, 1893.

Without wishing to dogmatise on the exact area covered by the operations in this battle, I utterly reject the theory that "horse, foot, and archers were at close quarters from time to time over a space of country fully three miles in length." If Mr. Hamilton Wylie includes in his "close quarters" the pursuit of fugitives, that might well be. But if he means a battle-front, or a series of engagements, extending over anything like such an area, then Shrewsbury would stand alone among the battles of our mediaeval history. No such battle-front could be made out either at Towton, or Tewkesbury, or Barnet, or Bosworth. Yet Shrewsbury was not an encounter between factions in which the all forces of the country might be arrayed on one side or the other, and for which at any rate long preparations might have been made. The Percy rising was a bolt out of the blue—a hasty feudal outbreak, undertaken and suppressed with forces raised at a few days', I might almost say at a few hours', notice. If Percy's line could measure miles in length, what becomes of the districtus aditus—the narrow or awkward approach—the salient fact of the action preserved by Scottish tradition? And, again, if his front covered a large expanse of open field, why did the king abandon for once the invariable English formation of three divisions in line for one of two divisions? I found the answer to both these questions on the ground, where the well-protected centre of Hotspur's position made an attack from the two flanks necessary.

With respect to the earthworks, I have spoken of them with caution, as the digging for brick-earth was patent. But I incline to believe that there were earthworks there, not thrown up by Hotspur in the short interval before the king's attack, but of older date, and giving an extra motive to him for standing battle there. With respect to the ponds or water holes, not only were they full when I saw them, but one of them had on the inclination of its bank an old pollard oak, old enough to have witnessed the fight, and giving a clear indication of the antiquity of the bank on which it grew.

Lastly, I would ask, if the burial of Hotspur at Whitchurch is to be taken as an indication of the extent of the battlefield, where is the limit to be drawn?

J. H. RAMSAY.

P.S.—When Mr. Wylie speaks of "horse, foot, and archers at close quarters," &c., I trust that he does not wish the reader to suppose that English men-at-arms in those days ever went into action on horseback.

MARGARET OF ANJOU.

Westward Ho, North Devon: Nov. 10, 1893.

With reference to the doubt expressed by Sir James Ramsay as to the year of Margaret of Anjou's birth, it is to be observed that the historians of the House of Anjou agree in stating that, of Duke René's children, Louis was born Oct. 16, 1427, Nicolas (and his twin sister Yolande) Nov. 2, 1428, and Marguerite, March 23, 1429. The style used is therefore obvious; and the date required will be March 23, 1429-30.

G. W. WATSON.

THE METHODS OF THE HIGHER CRITICISM.

London: Nov. 22, 1893.

I do not presume to enter into the discussion concerning the characters inscribed on Dr. Chaplin's Samaritan weight, or to estimate their value with regard to the date of the Canticles. I may say, however, that to me the title chosen by Prof. Sayce, and which I have repeated above, has appeared not quite appropriate.

Now, however, I am concerned with some statements towards the end of Prof. Robertson Smith's communication in last week's ACADEMY. Prof. Sayce (who is in Egypt) is accused of having committed a serious "grammatical blunder" in "deriving a segholate noun with initial Nun, namely netsey, from the root yatsag, for "every Hebraist knows that, if the word is netsey, it cannot possibly have come from yatsag, or from any known Hebrew root. Now, "every Hebraist knows," though, it would almost seem, Prof. Robertson Smith does not, that verbs with initial Nun are so closely related to verbs with initial Yod (the Nun being softened down into Yod), as to make it sometimes of little importance which form is chosen as the root. Indeed, with reference to these two forms, yatsag and natsag, what Gesenius had previously referred to the latter he subsequently derived from the former. And as to segholate nouns with initial Nun, it may be seen from the Lexicon that these are sufficiently numerous. With the possible meaning of netsey I have nothing now to do.

THOMAS TYLER.

THE WORD "FAKE."

London: Nov. 21, 1893.

Mr. Lang has started (ACADEMY, November 11) an inquiry as to the origin of the slang word "fake"; and since no one better qualified has replied to his challenge, I venture to make a suggestion.

Dr. Skeat thinks that the Dutch facken, to catch a gripe, affords a "plausible origin" for the word (Principles of English Etymology, First Series, p. 483, 1st edit.). But, with all reverence to the scientific philologists, I would call attention to what seems to me a more probable source.

In the "Rehearsal" we read: "I love to be merry sometimes; but when a knotty point comes I lay my head close to it, with a snuff-box in my hand; and then I feague it away, i' faith" (Act ii. Scene 4).

This passage is partly quoted in Dennis's Remarks on Cato, from which large extracts are given in Johnson's Life of Addison. But in many editions of the "Lives," a misprint occurs of league for feague.

In my recent edition of Johnson's Life of Addison (p. 107), I have pointed out that Richardson (followed by Ogilvie, Annandale, and Hunter) gives the meaning of feague as to beat or whip; and all of them regard the word as connected with, or even derived from, the German fegen. But in Stratmann and Bradley's Middle English Dictionary we find the word fegen, to adapt, fit, join; and the meaning is illustrated by a quotation from the "Ormulum": "Mannes bodi feged is of foure kinne shafte." So far as I know, the change from fegen to feague is quite natural; but the change from feague to fake is highly improbable. The use of the word, however, should surely count for something; and the expression, "feague it away" is curiously like the "fake away" of Ainsworth's rollicking song.

F. RYLAND.

"ITALIAN LYRISTS OF TO-DAY."

London: Nov. 21, 1893.

I should be unreasonable indeed were I to find fault on the whole with Mr. William Sharp's gratifying and appreciative review of my Italian Lyrists of To-day; yet there is one point on which it clearly calls for a reply.

Before he has fully entered upon his criticism of my work, he brings against me a charge of forgetfulness or discourtesy, for not acknowledging that I had made use of Signorina Levi's familiar and invaluable anthology, Dai Nostri Poeti Viventi. Most certainly I knew and consulted it, just as I consulted those portions of Signor Raffaello Barbiera's anthology which treat of contemporary writers; and I used it as anthologies are meant to be used, though my chief debt must still be to the original authors. As Mr. Sharp opines, it was of real service to me. It is so well known and so highly prized, that I should have thought any reference to it somewhat superfluous. But I am most ready to make the fullest avowal of my indebtedness to it, and to express my regret if I have omitted making an acknowledgment which I certainly did not know to be customary in the case of anthologies. Mr. Sharp's tribute to its merits is entirely justified; and every writer on this subject, even though he be himself an Italian or have the close connexion with Italy and its literature which I have enjoyed from my birth and early training in that country, must of necessity consult a collection so admirable and so discriminating.

But, in self-defence, I must be allowed to point out that Mr. Sharp, in his desire to prove what I should never have thought of denying, has—I am sure inadvertently, for his otherwise appreciative and impartial tone forbids any other assumption—somewhat misrepresented both the nature and the extent of my indebtedness to this excellent work. From his fourth paragraph, following as it does upon a long and well-deserved eulogy of Signorina Levi's volume, a careless or uninformed reader might almost imagine that my Italian Lyrics is little more than a translation of Dai Nostri Poeti Viventi. Mr. Sharp, indeed, admits that I have not followed it in my choice of poems; but the incomplete figures which he proceeds to give would surely produce a contrary impression on a reader less thoroughly acquainted with the subject than he himself is.

Let us get to the facts.

A full comparison of the two books gives the following results. As against seven writers (Mr. Sharp's estimate) represented in Italian Lyrics by nine pieces, all of which occur in Signorina Levi's more ample selections (Mr. Sharp's expression, "the same pieces," is doubtless a slip), there are sixteen, represented by twenty-seven pieces not one of which is to be found in her book, though she has other poems of theirs. Further, her selections and mine agree in part, and in part only, in the cases of eight writers, of whom I give fifty pieces, of which fourteen are also included in her anthology.

Finally, comparing the two works in their entirety, Dai Nostri Poeti Viventi contains 154 poems (excluding those in dialect, which did not enter into my plan), Italian Lyrics of To-Day includes ninety-two, besides a fragment; and there are twenty-three in common.

When one considers that, in the case of many poets, certain pieces inevitably suggest themselves for inclusion in every collection—pieces, the rejection of which would be deplorable—it must be evident that any two anthologies treating of the same limited period will in great part cover the same ground, and that the editor who is most pressed for space (as, for instance, by the intrusion of biographical matter) will rightly include such pieces in preference to others. Mr. Sharp himself, if I may judge of his predilections by the poems cited in his article, would have done so. He could not, indeed, have avoided it; his extensive further knowledge would not enable him to reject such poems as these, though it would give him the opportunity of including many others.

In the analysis above given, I have accepted Mr. Sharp's figures, though I might possibly demur to Perotti being included among the writers represented in Italian Lyrics solely by pieces also given in Dai Nostri Poeti Viventi, as I have added in my biographical notice a short but complete poem not quoted therein. Signor Marradi's inclusion in this list is an accident somewhat injurious to him. Signor Nicci's single sonnet is the only case in which there is an absolutely identical selection in the two books. Further, I have included Signor's Fogazzaro's "A Sera" in the list of twenty-three pieces common to both books, though my translation, as a glance will show, is taken from the complete poem, in the Valsolda volume, and not from Signorina Levi's perhaps judiciously curtailed version. Mr. Sharp mentions my translation of Carducci's "Nevicata" (of which the original was published in or before 1886) as an instance of parallelism; but of eleven poems of his given by me, this is the only one which is also to be found in Dai Nostri Poeti Viventi.

I repeat that I am very far from ascribing to Mr. Sharp any intention of bringing against me a charge of undue indebtedness to a single anthology; but I am bound to defend myself against any misconception to which certain expressions of his, together with the figures accompanying them, may possibly have given rise. Having, I trust, dispelled any such misunderstanding, I have again to express my regret if I have offended against any law of literary ethics or literary courtesy of which I was unaware; and I hope Signorina Levi will accept my expression of the high value which I have always attached to her delightful anthology.

I am glad to have the opportunity, while thanking Mr. Sharp for his criticism of my own volume, of answering his question as to my alphabetical allocation of Signor d'Annunzio's and Signor De Amicis's names. The De of names having the ablative form is written with the capital letter, as Mr. Sharp points out, while the di of the genitive is, I think, usually given in small letters and ignored in alphabetical arrangement. I am aware that Signor d'Annunzio's name is usually written with the capital, and I do not lay down the law on the subject; but I have taken my spelling from his own letters.

G. A. GREENE.

"THE IRON PIRATE."

London: Nov. 21, 1893.

It would be a kindness if you would allow me space to correct a slight error which your reviewer made in his recent criticism of my book, The Iron Pirate. He says "Mr. Pemberton chooses oil as the motor which enables Captain Bluck and his devilish crew to fly through the water at twenty-nine knots an hour." This is an entire misapprehension. The ship, whose specification was drawn up for me by one of the foremost marine engineers living, is driven by gas. Believing with many who have given the subject thought, that gas is one of the maritime motors of the near future, I have endeavoured to show theoretically in The Iron Pirate what are its shortcomings and what its advantages. As this is the backbone of the book, may I crave leave to record this correction.

MAX PEMBERTON.

APPOINTMENTS FOR NEXT WEEK.

SUNDAY, Nov. 28, 4 p.m. Sunday Lecture: "Curiosities of Bird Life," by Dr. R. Bowdler Sharpe.
4 p.m. South Place Institute: "The Shipping and Carrying Trade of England," by Mr. W. C. Steadman.
7.30 p.m. Ethical: "The Problem of the Unemployed," by Mr. J. A. Murray Macdonald.
MONDAY, Nov. 27, 5 p.m. Hellenic: "A Mykenæan Treasure from Aegina," by Mr. Arthur Evans.
5 p.m. London Institution: "Zante and its Earthquake," by the Rev. H. A. Boys.
8 p.m. Royal Academy: "Pigmæta," I, by Prof. A. H. Church.
8 p.m. Society of Arts: Cantor Lecture, "The Art of Book and Newspaper Illustration," I, by Mr. Henry Blackburn.
8.30 p.m. Geographical: "The Antarctic Region and the Scientific and Commercial Results of its Exploration," by Dr. John Murray.
TUESDAY, Nov. 28, 6 p.m. London Institution: "The Principles of Commercial Geography applied to the British Empire," IX., by Dr. H. B. Mill.
8 p.m. Civil Engineers: Discussion of Papers on Water-Works in India and Masonry Dams.
8 p.m. Colonial Institute: "Matabeleland," by Mr. Archibald R. Colquhoun.

WEDNESDAY, Nov. 29, 8 p.m. Society of Arts: "The Regulation of Street Advertising," by Mr. Richardson Evans.
8 p.m. Irish Literary: "The Romance of Elizabethan Ireland," by Mr. T. W. Rolleston.
THURSDAY, Nov. 30, 6 p.m. London Institution: "The Uses of Humour," by Prof. J. Sully.
8 p.m. Royal Academy: "Pigmæta," II., by Prof. A. H. Church.
8.30 p.m. Antiquaries.
FRIDAY, Dec. 1, 7.30 p.m. Civil Engineers: Students' Meeting.
8 p.m. Geologists' Association: "A Discovery of Fossils at Little Stairs Point, Sandown Bay, Isle of Wight," by Mr. T. Leighton; "The Sharks' Teeth from British Cretaceous Formations," by Mr. A. Smith Woodward; "The Breaking-up of the Ice on the St. Mary River, Nova Scotia, and its Geological Lessons," by Mr. Geoffrey F. Monckton.

SCIENCE.

A NEW THEORY OF THE LATIN SATURNIAN METRE.

MR. W. M. LINDSAY has put forward a new theory of the Saturnian Metre in the second and third numbers of the American Journal of Philology for 1892. He makes two types of line, (1) the A-type:

xx(.) xx, xxx, || xxx, xxx
dabunt málum Metélli || Nævio pœtæ, with an occasional variety of the second half-line,

|| xxxx, xx,

e.g., adlocútus súmmi.

(2) the B-type:

xx(.) xx, xxx, || xxxx, xx
prím(a) incedit Cêreris || Proscérpina piér,

with an occasional variety of the second half-line,

|| xxx, xx,

e.g., fuisse vírum.

The metre goes by accent (including not only main accents, but secondary accents, which follow strict rules), not by quantity, but pays regard also to what is the leading feature of Romance poetry, the counting of syllables. A normal number of syllables, seven in the first half-line, six in the second, is found in every line under certain fixed laws of elision (e.g., prim(a) incedit Cêreris ||), prosodical hiatus (e.g., || aureo eclutro), and "resolution" of syllables (e.g., optumus may be scanned as the equivalent of trisyllabic optumus). The most recent statements of the quantitative theory (by Reichardt and by Zander), and of the accentual theory (by Thurneysen), are tested, and found wanting, by an appeal to the dramatic verses of Livius Andronicus, Nævius, and the older poets, which prove, for example, the quantities, itáque, famá, Luctus, and the accentuations apúd-nos, cápitibus, pléríque(-) ómnes.

After a discussion of the text and scansion of the extant Saturnian lines and fragments, it is shown in the concluding section how the Latin Saturnian may have been derived from the Indo-European line:

xx xx xx xx || xx xx xx xx

(cf. the Gâyatrî páda of the Vedas), by successive modifications at successive stages of the phonetic development of the Latin language, such as the earlier shifting of the accent to the first syllable of every word, the later penultima law of accentuation, and the syncope of short vowels in post-tonic syllables; and it is suggested that, of the various rhythmical elements of the Indo-European line, assonance, alliteration, counting of syllables, accent, &c., the first became the chief feature in Celtic, the second in Teutonic poetry. In a note appended to the concluding article the existence of Saturnians in the dialectal (Umbro-Oscan) inscriptions is denied, excepting in two Pelignian epitaphs (Zv. 13-14), which follow an earlier type of Saturnian.

Mr. Lindsay is to read a paper on this subject before the London Philological Society on March 2 of next year.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"LIFE WITH TRANS-SIBERIAN SAVAGES."

London: Nov. 9, 1893.

[Messrs. Longmans, Green & Co. have forwarded to us the following letter addressed to their firm. We will only state that we know "X" to have had no personal motive in the matter, and that he is not now in England.—ED. ACADEMY.]

The other day I arrived here after a long absence on the Continent, and found awaiting me your letter of October 20, an unexpected number of reviews of my Life with Trans-Siberian Savages, including one in the ACADEMY, which, like all the other reviews I have seen, is of the most favourable nature.

I found enclosed also a letter published in No. 1113 of the ACADEMY by some anonymous correspondent signed "X," to which you specially call my attention, which is both curious and remarkable. It is curious, in that it ridicules the review by the ACADEMY, as also the thirty-five other reviews you have kindly forwarded to me. It is remarkable, in that from beginning to end it exhibits egregious ignorance, stupid fabrication, and unscrupulous misrepresentation, some of which, for the benefit of the casual reader, are acutely tipped with the numbers of the pages in which it is pretended the alleged statements by me may be found.

1. The readers of "X's" letter are referred to "pp. 101-2" for the statement by me that in Sakhalin

"we have not only thousands of miles of snow, but an Arctic winter of nine months' duration without a single remission and 46 degrees of frost for the greater part of the time."

Now "X" knows that very few of his readers would take the trouble to look at the pages referred to, and that if they did they would find this alleged statement is not there. Here are examples of "X's" methods. "X" altogether ridicules the idea of Sakhalin being a cold country, exclusively on the ground that it is, he says, within the same latitude as Central France. This, again, is not true, nor have I anywhere stated it. Admitting that I had made this statement, however, his conclusion on the mere ground of latitude exhibits the most egregious ignorance. If "X" would go to school for ignorant and anonymous correspondents he might be shown, perhaps for the first time, such a thing as isothermal maps. In every one of these maps he would find that Kamchatka is precisely within the same degrees of latitude as the present United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. Yet only such a discoverer as himself would attempt to cast ridicule upon the fact of the known degrees of cold which prevail in Kamchatka. On the same maps "X" would find that the average temperature for January in parts of Sakhalin is given as ten degrees below zero. Therefore a statement, which might be found in a part of my book not referred to, that sometimes it falls to fourteen below zero, only four degrees below the authentic January average, has nothing in it which can fairly be accepted as reliable proof that my book is "a romance of adventure," and "quite incredible."

2. In one single sentence, acutely tipped "pp. 154-5," "X" represents me as stating that, at a certain point which, he says, is several hundred miles north of the limit of typhoons, my ship was sunk by a typhoon; that the naked survivors were tossed, "like chips," on a half-submerged ledge of rocks, where,

"after further dangers and escapes almost equally marvellous," and receiving such injuries "through being dashed on and off the rocks" (this alleged quotation is a fabrication) as to be unable to walk, I escaped on a raft, and was fortunately received "in a capital native hotel."

Now, certainly, from the reading of this garbled balderdash, nobody in the world would imagine what a reference to the pages mentioned would show: that between the wreck and the reception into a native hotel I distinctly state how I was received on another ship, on which other ship, after encountering another typhoon, I reached another country, hundreds of miles away; and that the port of Hakodate, in Yezo, a northernly island of Japan, was the place in which I was taken ashore and received "in a capital native hotel." I have nowhere stated the point at which my ship was wrecked, yet "X" does not hesitate to assert that it was several hundred miles north of where typhoons occur, regardless of the fact that typhoons, ignorant of their chart lines, do not always stop short at them, but sometimes produce their most destructive effects for long and various distances beyond those lines.

3. "X" represents me as saying—what he deems preposterous—that the dirty Ainu can be leeward of deer and not be scented by them, and that their poisoned arrows "usually" pierce the heart or the pericardium of these animals.

The first of these statements is one which nobody not egregiously ignorant of sportsmanship would deny; the second is not to be found either on the page referred to or anywhere else in my book. I simply state the result of two post-mortem examinations, without venturing any generalisation on the matter.

4. In another of his prolific single sentences, "X" represents me as stating that I was made head wizard, and that I reduced the lens of my camera to ashes. These are utter fabrications.

"X" expresses a doubt whether or no I exist. On this point I could hardly hope to give a demonstration such a distinguished scientist would accept as conclusive. Perhaps the evidence of the principal members of your firm with whom I have come in such pleasant contact on different occasions might be more satisfactory.

B. DOUGLAS HOWARD.

SCIENCE NOTES.

THE Royal Society's medals have this year been adjudicated as follows: The Copley Medal to Sir George Gabriel Stokes, for his researches and discoveries in physical science; a Royal Medal to Prof. Arthur Schuster, for his spectroscopic researches, and his researches on disruptive discharge through gases and on terrestrial magnetism; a Royal Medal to Prof. Harry Marshall Ward, for his researches into the life history of fungi and schizomycetes; and the Davy Medal to Messrs J. H. van't Hoff and J. A. Le Bel, in recognition of their introduction of the theory of asymmetric carbon, and its use in explaining the constitution of optically active carbon compounds. The medals will, as usual, be presented at the anniversary meeting on St. Andrew's Day (November 30). M. Le Bel has promised to attend in person, and it is hoped that all the medallists will be present. The Society will dine together at the Whitehall Rooms on the evening of the same day.

THIS week has brought us the first monthly part of Messrs. Frederick Warne & Co.'s Royal Natural History, edited by Mr. Richard Lydekker, of which we will only say now that it seems to carry out the lavish promise of the prospectus; and also the announcement of an entirely new edition of "Jardine's Naturalist's Library," under the editorship of Dr. R. Bowdler Sharpe, to be published by Messrs. W. H. Allen & Co. To choose between the two would truly be an embarrassing task. The latter, we may observe, is to be published, not in parts, but in volumes, each consisting of about 320 pages, with from twenty to forty coloured plates. The total number of volumes will probably be about twenty-five. The first to be issued, early in the coming year, will be: British Birds, by Dr. Sharpe himself; Monkeys, by Mr. H. O. Forbes; and Butterflies, with special reference to British species, by Mr. W. F. Kirby. The contributors further include Prof. R. H. Traquair, who is responsible for the Fishes; and Mr. W. R. Ogilvie Grant, who has undertaken to deal specially with Game Birds.

SIR ROBERT BALL's new work, The Story of the Sun, will be ready for publication, by Messrs. Cassell & Co., early in December. The book will be furnished with coloured plates and numerous illustrations.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

WE have received from the American Bureau of Ethnology another of the admirable series of linguistic bibliographies, compiled by Mr. J. C. Pilling. It deals with the Chinookan languages, that is to say, with the languages spoken by a small group of Indian tribes who live near the mouth of the Columbia River. The name "Chinookan" is derived from one of these tribes, which a French fur-trader wrote down as "Chinouque" in 1820, and which has become well known as being the basis of the Chinook Jargon, the lingua franca of the coast of North-Western America. In the actual vernaculars, very little has yet been printed, though the Bureau of Ethnology is now preparing for publication a grammar, dictionary, and texts, compiled by Dr. Franz Boas. With regard to the Jargon, of course, the case is different. It has received considerable attention from philologists, as being a typical example of artificial language; and a manual of it was published by Mr. Horatio Hale in 1890. The latest development is due to a French missionary, Father de Jeune, who, finding it impossible to teach the Indians to read in Roman characters, has adapted the Duployan system of shorthand to the Jargon, and multiplied copies of his compositions by the mimeograph. Of these curious publications, two facsimiles are here given; and it is stated that the Indians have taken to the system so eagerly that they are now teaching it to one another. It is hardly necessary to add that Mr. Pilling's bibliographical work has been done with his usual accuracy and minuteness. His devotion transforms what might in other hands have been a mere list of titles into a comprehensive treatise on the subject, enlivened by personal details. We may, however, call his attention to the review of Hale's Manual, by Dr. Robert Brown, in the ACADEMY of September 13, 1890, which contained not a little original matter.

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

CAMBRIDGE PHILOLOGICAL SOCIETY.—(Thursday, Oct. 26.)

PROF. JERR, president, in the chair.—Mr. J. H. Moulton read a paper, of which the following is an abstract:—Lightfoot's objection to the reading Νύμφαν . . . αὐτῆς in Col. iv. 15 is that the "Doric Νύμφαν" is most improbable. If, however, the name is Νύμφα, the objection disappears, and we may follow Westcott and Hort, who have not even an alternative. It is natural that a common noun should be slightly altered to make a proper name, and the influence of Homer's νύμφα φίλη would alone account for the change from the η declension to the α . All original α nouns in Greek (Sanskrit etc. -i) have traces of y before the α . Nouns without y fall into two classes. (1) Three which appear in Homer, νύμφα, πόρνα, πρόβα. These are vocative, α being the Indog. vocative of $-ā$ nouns. In νύμφη Homer keeps the distinct nominative: the voc. νύμφα is used by Blon, and Theocr. xxvii. has κῆρα φίλα, a clear imitation. Πρόβα, which like the masculines μητέρα etc. is also nominative, is originally the voc. of πρόβα*. Πόρνα is voc. of πόρνα*, which is to πόρνα (Sanskrit patni) as θεράνη is to θεράνα; "handmaid" possessing forms with α suffix as well as i , "mistress" followed suit. Theocritus makes πόρναν (xv. 14, where πόρναν is an improbable correction) an extension from voc., exactly like our νύμφαν. In an epitaph by Erinna (?) we may perhaps read νύμφαν εἰσαν (cod. εἰσαν), but εἰσαν would also serve. Aeolic extended the analogy of these vocatives, having Ἀρρόδιτα, νύμφα (quoted with "ὄλον παρὰ τῷ ποιητῇ"), ἱερὰνα, and I think νῶρα; but the nom. πρόβα, modelled on πρόβα, shows that Aeolic merely followed Homeric. Monro's argument against Fick, that Aeolic is "more primitive" here than Homer, must be reversed. It is even doubtful whether the Indog. had the α voc. except in a few set phrases: the remains are very scanty. (2) Post-Homeric irregular α nouns, when proper names, are from the vocative analogy. The earliest example of a certain α is ἱερὰ in Alcman, from which time the nouns become more and more frequent: only five have not a quotable parallel form in $-ā$ ($-η$), which may be assumed for all. To account for this tendency towards the α declension we have the analogy of class I., with the two forces mentioned by Brugmann (Gr. Gram. p. 102), and the influence of $-α$ nouns on those in $-η$. Θέρμα, τόλμα (τῆλμα*), ἄμαξα, and γέφυρα (γέφυμα*) are the most likely neuters in the list (see Wheeler, Nominal Accent, p. 35 n.).—Dr. Postgate read a paper on some Latin papyrus fragments written in uncials in the Zürich library. The chief of these fragments, which consists of disjointed moral and religious precepts, appears to have been part of a Christian boy's writing-exercise in an early century of our era. The words, forms, and constructions show popular (or Romance) traces, e.g., "in muto" (motto, mot), "gresso" (for -u), "simolationem," "magis sicut" for "magis quam."

CAMBRIDGE PHILOSOPHICAL SOCIETY.—(Monday, Oct. 30.)

PROF. HUGHES, president, in the chair.—The president read a paper on "The Geological Evidence for the Recurrence of Ice Ages." He pointed out that the advocates of the astronomical explanation of glacial ages have urged that there has been a recurrence at regularly varied intervals of combinations, the result of which must have been circumpolar vicissitudes of climate; and, seeing that the secular recurrence of these conditions formed a necessary part of their theory, they gladly welcomed any confirmation of it, such as was offered by those geologists who saw in the character of the stones in certain conglomerates traces of ice-action in several successive geological periods. The value of this evidence he now criticised. He laid before the society examples of the striated boulders and rock floors supposed to present glaciated surfaces; and with a view to the elimination of sources of error in the identification of the work of ice, he exhibited a series of specimens illustrating the various ways in which results were produced, sometimes exactly the same as, and often closely resembling, the forms, markings, and other characters relied upon as proofs of ice-action. By reference to these he showed that the faceted stones, from which the extension of the glacial conditions over parts of Southern Germany was inferred, found their exact counterparts among those trirumbed by blown sand into roof-like forms and ridges, and had no parallel among undoubtedly glacially dressed stones. The scratched stones in the base of the New Red or so-called Permian of England (with the exception of one single specimen, which he said must have got into the collection in Jermyn-street by mistake) he compared with those produced by earth movements, in which the included pebbles of the conglomerate were protruded through the softer matrix and scored and indented by harder fragments held in the mass. The supposed glaciation of the boulders in the basement beds of the Carboniferous he explained in the same way, producing examples in which the matrix and included fragments were scored alike by movements along small fault faces. He exhibited a portion of the solid Silurian floor on which these conglomerates rested, which was striated in a manner that might easily be mistaken for glacial action; but he explained that he had taken this from a thrust plane, and pointed out the difference in the mineral condition of the surface between these slickensided surfaces and those produced by glacial action. He excluded from the present discussion cases in which ice-agency was inferred only from the size and shape of the stones or their isolation in finest material. He admitted the probability of evidence of ice-action being found along known axes of recurrent upheaval, such as those in the most ancient rocks along the Scandinavian range, or in the more recent deposits along the Alpine chain, or further south in the Carboniferous boulder beds of India, Africa, and Australia; but he pointed out that these last at any rate could lend no support to the astronomers' contention, seeing that they surrounded a basin whose centre was in equatorial not in circumpolar regions. He was willing to admit that in the astronomical combinations we might find a vera causa of vicissitudes of climate; but he urged that all the evidence from direct observation went to show that extreme glaciation does and did always bear a direct relation to earth movements.

ELIZABETHAN.—(Wednesday, Nov. 1.)

FREDERICK ROGERS, Esq., in the chair.—A paper on "Measure for Measure," by Mr. William Poel, was read (in the author's absence) by Mr. Arthur Dillon. Mr. Poel believed that in "Measure for Measure" we had Shakspeare's word in the great bout of slander and abuse between the play-wrights of his day. The evidences of this are manifold. A contemporary writes: "Our Will hath given them a purge." And internally the play bears marks of hasty adaptation. Possibly an early attempt, comprising most of the finest literary and dramatic passages, had been laid aside, and was suddenly taken up and fitted to new and ultra-artistic use, as a weapon of self-defence; for there is indication in the Sonnets and elsewhere that some special slander was alive against Shakspeare at this time. Out of all proportion for the balance of the play, the Duke repels the slanders of Lucio, as disproportionately heaped upon him. The dramatic interest of the situation would be stronger and more appealing, if the Duke kept his dignity, and played with Lucio's extravagance. Unfortunately, the Duke condescends to be angry. For once, Shakspeare was blinded by private passion; yet, with all this allowed, it is a fine rejoinder in the battle of the plays. In the last scene we have slander on slander heaped, credited and discredited, while the truth hides in the centre: and only the accident that the Duke has been omnipresent finally makes it manifest. This is Shakspeare's comment on all the evil speaking. Balancing this ill repute is the good repute of Angelo; a good repute as false as the slander. Angelo is a sympathetic part; one, that is, whose story we follow with a personal interest. He is a man who rises by his fall. His humiliation culminates in his having to accuse Marianna, adding this to her other injuries. True, he repents when he is found out, but not because he is found out; with him ruth begins when he regrets the death of Claudio, which has followed as a necessity on his first false step. When his shame is full, he asks for nothing but his punishment; and finally parts from his pride, in taking pardon through the prayers of the woman he has wronged. In the early scenes, Angelo, with his self-righteous cruelty, is farther from salvation than Mistress Overdone, the protectress of Lucio's abandoned child. But that, at the close of the play, the old self is dead we must credit, by the Duke's words: "Your evil quits you well," and the "quickening in his eye."—An interesting discussion followed, criticising Mr. Poel's paper, and dealing with the (then) forthcoming performance of the play at the Royalty Theatre, the introduction of women to the English and continental stage, and the influence of scenery upon the drama. It was opened by the chairman, and continued by Mr. J. A. Jenkinson, Mr. A. C. Hayward, Mr. W. H. Cowham, Mr. James Ernest Baker, Mr. Arthur Dillon, and others.

VIKING CLUB.—(Thursday, Nov. 9.)

W. WATSON CHEYNE, Esq., vice-president, in the chair.—A new set of laws, prepared by a special committee, was submitted, and, after some slight amendment, adopted. In accordance with the new Law-Book, the club is now founded as a social and literary society for those interested in the North, and lays itself out as a special medium for the study of Northern antiquities, literature, history, &c. The Proceedings will be published. Provision has been made for the appointment of local secretaries in various districts in the North, for the collection of folklore, and to report new discoveries of antiquities. A scheme is also under consideration to form a union of Northmen and their societies throughout the world. Commodious and suitable premises for holding meetings have been secured in the King's Weigh House Rooms, Thomas-street, Grosvenor-square, W. The subscription for town members is 10s., and country members 5s., including a copy of the Proceedings. Mr. J. Romilly Allen has been elected hon. editor of the Proceedings, and Mr. A. W. Johnston, Law-Man (president of council). The first session under the new constitution will begin in January, for which a syllabus of papers is now being prepared.

RUSKIN SOCIETY.—(Friday, Nov. 10.)

SYDNEY ROBERTS, Esq., in the chair.—Mr. Arthur Boutwood read a paper, at the commencement of which he urged that the present-day movement towards social reform is at heart a moral and spiritual movement. Often this seems as though merely concerned with political changes, a view which is partial and misleading. In reality, this movement forms part of a wider movement tending towards a healthier national life, a higher standard of social conduct, and a more altruistic interpretation of duty. Ruskin emphasises the essentially moral and spiritual character of the reform that is needed; and as a step towards accomplishing this he completely subordinates all forms of human activity (including the economic) to ethical ideas. In conclusion, Mr. Boutwood insisted that too much should not be expected from politics which, though democratic, may remove some of the hindrances to the development of national vitality.

FINE ART.

COLONEL GOFF'S AND MR. WATSON'S ETCHINGS.

THOUGH some of the best prints of Mr. C. J. Watson and of Colonel Goff has been seen during the last few years at the Royal Society of Painter-Etchers, Mr. Dunthorne has done well to assemble in his gallery in Vigo-street what I take to be an almost complete representation of the etched work of these two artists. Mr. Watson and Colonel Goff, if not precisely masters, are students of the highest class, in the best of all schools. If their inspiration is not always personal, their methods are genuine. They are not—one need scarcely say it—they are not by any means the equals of any one of the five masters of the craft whom our generation and the generation immediately preceding it have seen: they do not, and it is hardly likely that they ever will, step up into line with Méryon and Jacquemart, with Whistler and Seymour. Haden and Legros. But in the second rank—which is a very high rank—they take an honourable place. Each has done much that is worthy to be classed with the work of etchers avowedly so admirable and so interesting as Mr. William Strang and Mr. Frank Short. And now, at Mr. Dunthorne's gallery, there re to be seen about five and forty etchings by which of these sterling practitioners of a fascinating yet much-abused art.

It might be ungracious to carry out in detail a comparison between the works of two men who ally themselves for the purposes of an exhibition, but who have not perhaps more in common than that which is necessarily held in common between two artists, both of whom are on the right track. But one may say, briefly and broadly, these two things: first, that of the two men's work, that of Colonel Goff is likely to make the larger and readier appeal to the general public; and, second, and by this we give the reason for the judgment which has just been pronounced, that of the two men's work, Colonel Goff's is the more exible and the more immediately engaging, while Mr. Watson's is the more solid and the more learned. Colonel Goff's sketches are of very various effects, and they record pleasantly and dexterously—in some cases, indeed, quite admirably—a pleasant impression. Mr. Watson's—sometimes apparently less free and less spontaneous—are yet executed with unflinching directness and with the larger measure of technical mastery. To carry the comparison one step further—to take into account subject as well as treatment—it may be said that, while Colonel Goff is sometimes disposed to treat country themes and often deals with the interest of "effects" of light, Mr. Watson's work is rather with the record of permanent line: his themes, indeed, are generally in towns and are generally architectural.

Among Mr. Watson's etchings, "Temple Bar" is about the first to be noted of his earlier work, his work of fifteen years ago. It is good, but at that period he had perhaps scarcely learnt to see his subject pictorially: he was rather a good architectural draughtsman, charging himself with the chronicle of certain acts. "Mercery-lane, Canterbury," whenever it was executed, is likewise a little wanting in individuality. "Camden, Gloucestershire" is, in picturesqueness at least, a distinct advance on both of these. "The School House, Marken," one of several quaint studies in the Low Countries, is exceedingly good and simple, being especially happy in its treatment of woodwork. "Mill Bridge, Bosham," is composed charmingly, and is carried exactly as far as it required to be carried, and not an inch further. "Chartres" is clearly picturesque, but at no sacrifice of strength. It might be hinted, I think, a little more richly than is the case with the particular impression exposed to view at Mr. Dunthorne's. There is an exceedingly good "Yarmouth," with that which is of very frequent in etching, a successful sky effect. "Bishopgate Bridge, Norwich," which was so fascinated all East country artists from "hotman downwards, is of perfect solidity and strength. Something has induced Mr. Watson to tackle on two occasions subjects which the genius of Méryon has long ago made immortal. One of them is the "Rue Pirouette"; the other the church of "St. Etienne du Mont." Though the "Rue Pirouette" of Méryon does not belong to his best period, being a work of 1860, when his nobler work was over, it is not the least subtle of his experiments in pure draughtsmanship. The sterling work of Mr. Watson will hardly cause us to forget it. Mr. Watson's "Saint Etienne du Mont" is an accuracy of portraiture of the particular building, which Méryon's great print is without. It has delicacy also, but it is the direct and capable vision of a comparatively, perhaps one might say a wholly, unimaginative man, while Méryon's is a piece of creation such as could be vouchsafed only to a magnificent and impressive genius. In "Ponte del Cavallo, Venezia," Mr. Watson gets much nearer to the particular charm of Mr. Whistler than he does, in the instances just quoted, to Méryon's deep fascination. "Ponte del Cavallo" is, indeed, an exquisite and highly desirable etching. "Noord Dijk, Dordrecht"—a flat land with windmills—is likewise among the most absolutely satisfactory instances of Mr. Watson's vigorous and refined craftsmanship. Very little of Mr. Watson's work appeals to the mere admirer of pretty pictures; very much of it appeals with force to the serious student familiar with the methods of the masters.

Of all Colonel Goff's etchings with which we are acquainted, "A Summer Storm in the Itchen Valley" bears the palm for popularity. It records quite impressively an agreeable and characteristic "effect" in English landscape, and by its vigour and its freedom, as, likewise, by its theme, it recalls to some extent the work of Mr. Seymour Haden. It is, indeed, judged from whatever point of view, a highly successful performance. "Folkestone Beach" is somewhat spotty and black: I doubt if the medium selected was the best for recording the impression which the scene produced. With this particular subject I fancy I see Colonel Goff more successful in the medium of water-colour. "London Bridge," again, is, on the whole unsatisfactory, the scale and strength of the structure being by no means suggested; and both are suggested, I may be permitted to say, with absolute mastery in a rare dry-point by Mr. Whistler, of "the Leyland period." But the "New Pier, Brighton," is a very agreeable, if not a very masterly, dry-point of Colonel Goff's; the "Hôtel Metropole, Brighton," is a more than interesting—it is a most ingenious—experiment in a night effect; while the "Old Chain Pier"—in reality a vision of the Brighton "front," looking westward—becomes more attractive and more satisfactory the more one knows it. I have yet to mention two etchings with an approval not less complete. One of them is "Shoreham—the Ford"—a most spirited vision of water, of the smaller shipping, and of a flat land. The other is "The Pool, Aldrington," a delightful and true sketch, in which a careful and economical selection of material has been placed at the disposal of a hand that is flexible and free. Colonel Goff and Mr. Watson, each in his own fashion, do much to maintain the best traditions of their art.

FREDERICK WEDMORE.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

THE winter exhibition at the New Gallery, as already announced in the ACADEMY, will be illustrative of early Italian art. Besides pictures and sculpture, there will also be examples of books, goldsmith's work, pottery, textiles and embroidery, engraving, metal-work, furniture, and musical instruments. The Earl of Carlisle is president of the general committee.

NEXT week, Messrs. J. & W. Vokins will have on view, at their gallery in Great Portland-street, a collection of upwards of three hundred mezzotint and other engravings after George Morland, in continuation of a similar exhibition which they held nearly ten years ago. We may add that they have issued a most instructive catalogue.

THE other exhibitions to open next week include: the final series of Mr. John Varley's drawings of the East, dealing with the cities of Northern India, at the Japanese Gallery, New Bond-street; and a collection of pictures of "Out-of-the-way Places," by Mr. Blandford Fletcher, at Messrs. Tooth's gallery in the Haymarket.

MESSRS. HUTCHINSON will publish immediately an important work, entitled French Illustrators, by M. Louis Morin, with an introduction by M. Jules Claretie. It will contain fifteen plates, printed in colour on Japan paper, and produced by Goupil in Paris under the superintendence of the artists. More than sixty French illustrators will be represented by over 100 drawings, sketches, and portraits in the text. The edition for this country is limited to 130 copies.

The following have been elected members of the Institute of Painters in Oil Colours—Messrs. Arthur Burrell, J. T. Nettleship, and H. Caffieri.

AN extra general meeting of the Society for the Promotion of Hellenic Studies will be held at 22, Albemarle-street, on Monday next, November 27, at 5 p.m., when Mr. Arthur Evans will read a paper on "A Mykenaeen Treasure from Aegina."

ON Monday evening, at the Society of Arts, Mr. Henry Blackburn will deliver the first of a course of three Cantor Lectures upon "The Art of Book and Newspaper Illustration."

THE STAGE.

M. VICTORIEN SARDOU has "put his foot in it"; and that is the theatrical event of the week—unless, indeed, the marriage of Miss Sylvia Grey, which threatens to deprive the world of the most graceful dancer since the Sallé whom Voltaire praised, may not fitly be accounted the more important circumstance. As regards the Sardou business, it is briefly the following: Some one accused this most prolific and dexterous dramatist—a master of his own craft certainly, if hardly a master of literature—of having in a recent play shown himself a plagiarist of an English drama of at least a generation ago. This accusation M. Sardou—tertile in plots and clever in the management of them—naturally denied; but the incident appears to have led him to a loss of temper, as he took occasion to protest violently, and seemingly without cause, against the pecuniary treatment he had received from English managers, and in especial from Mr. Bancroft. He said that "Diplomacy" was taken from his "Dora," and that it had never been acknowledged or paid for. Mr. Bancroft has been able, we are glad to say, to show M. Sardou, or to show the world, that M. Sardou was wrong. "Diplomacy," from the beginning of its course, even until now, has always been acknowledged as an adaptation of M. Sardou's "Dora"; and if M. Sardou has not himself received the pecuniary rewards of its performance, that is only because he had made over his interest in the play to a theatrical agent, to whom Mr. Bancroft has remitted, it seems, sums of money much larger than those sums by payment of which to M. Sardou the agent in question secured the rights and the opportunity of profit. In a cooler moment than the present, M. Sardou will probably be led to a more favourable view of the conduct of Mr. Bancroft than any he has yet expressed.

MUSIC.

RECENT CONCERTS.

A PIANOFORTE Quintet by Goldmark was given for the first time at the Popular Concert last Monday. This composer owes his reputation, justly described in the programme book as "not exactly European," principally to two works—his opera "Die Königin von Saba" and to his "Country Wedding" symphony: the former based on a Bible story cannot be performed in England; the latter, a clever work, though in the strict sense of the word no symphony, has been played at the Crystal Palace. On this occasion, however, we have to speak of him as a writer of chamber music. His Quintet is a decidedly disappointing work.

With one or two exceptions the thematic material is trivial—indeed, the principal theme of the first movement bears an unfortunate resemblance to a popular street tune—and the developments are not interesting. The Adagio in the sombre key of E flat minor opens well, but is spun out, and therefore becomes tedious. The Scherzo is a compact movement; the themes are taking, and the workmanship is clever. The Finale is weak. Lady Hallé gave a vigorous rendering of an old favourite at these concerts—Tartini's "Il Trillo del Diavolo." Herr Schönberger played Beethoven's Sonata in A (Op. 101). The execution throughout was remarkably neat. His conception of the work was excellent, though at times, especially in the opening movement, there was a tendency to exaggerate the sentiment. Mr. David Bispham sang two fine songs—one by Franz, one by Schumann—with admirable taste and feeling. He also gave Loewe's "Archibald Douglas," and rendered all justice to it: there are fine movements in the composition, but as a whole it seems dull. The programme commenced with Schubert's Quartet in A minor; and with Lady Hallé and MM. Ries, Gibson, and Piatti as interpreters, there was nothing to do but enjoy the romantic music.

On Tuesday afternoon, Miss Theresa Gérardy, sister of the talented young violoncellist of the same name, gave a pianoforte recital. She plays well, and, on the whole, made a very favourable début. Excitement or nervousness caused her now, and then, to hurry.

M. Siloti, from Moscow, gave the first of two pianoforte recitals at St. James's Hall on Wednesday afternoon. This pianist was heard here two seasons ago, and attracted notice. His technique is phenomenal, and his touch is good, and when he so wills it, delicate. But there are moments when he thunders like a giant, and appears to lose self-control. Nothing could have been more temperate than his reading of pieces by Bach and Handel; and he deserves praise for selecting two Preludes and Fugues from the "Wohltemperiertes Clavier" instead of playing, as is so frequently done, some transcription of an organ Fugue or Toccata. M. Siloti's performance of Chopin's G minor Ballade was too excitable, while that of the "Funeral March" Sonata was very unequal. And why was the Trio of the March given at such a rapid rate? The pianist was heard to greater advantage in pieces by Arensky and Tchaikowsky; but the "Onéguine" Fantasia, if showy, was commonplace. An interesting feature of the programme were the variations by Liszt, Thalberg, Pixis, Herz, and Chopin on an operatic theme. This set of variations was originally called "Hexameron"; but the variation by Czerny being omitted, it became practically a "Pentameron." M. Siloti was heard at his best in this curious medley.

Mr. Henschel gave the second of his Symphony Concerts on Wednesday evening, when the lion's share of the programme fell to Mr. Paderewski. His reading of Schumann's pianoforte Concerto disappointed us when we first heard it, and still disappoints us: it is too objective, and he loves to dwell upon certain notes, rendering the effect, at times, almost mawkish. [In playing Chopin, some affectations show up the weaker, sentimental side of his music, but are not at variance with it whereas similar treatment ruins the sentiment of Schumann.] The pianist was afterward heard in his own Polish Fantasia (Op. 19) for pianoforte and orchestra, written specially for the Norwich Festival, but which we heard for the first time on Wednesday. It is full of characteristic rhythm and melody; and it has a certain barbaric brilliancy, which recalls Tchaikowsky in certain passages of his pianoforte Concerto. The writing for the solo instrument is extremely difficult, showy, and, at times, tricky; but although it is prominent throughout, the orchestra, especially in the matter of colouring, adds materially to the effect of the piece. A great composition it cannot be called, for it consists of a series of melodies strung together more or less loosely. The performance was a triumph for the pianist, and the applause at the close was so prolonged that he sat down and repeated the closing section. The programme included Haydn's Symphony in G (Breitkopf Edition, No. 13) one of the old master's ripest efforts. Haydn is related to have said—"the whole art [i.e., of composition] consists in taking up a subject and pursuing it"; but he has clearly shown in many of his works that the better the subject, the better the pursuit. The performance, under Mr. Henschel's sympathetic guidance, was excellent. Of Mr. E. Moór's Overture in D minor, with which the concert opened, we must take another opportunity of speaking.

J. S. SHEDLOCK.

W. THACKER & CO.,

87, NEWGATE STREET, LONDON.

THACKER, SPINK & CO., CALCUTTA.

Just published, crown 8vo, 4s. 6d.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY of a SPIN: a Story of Anglo-Indian Life. By MAY EDWOOD, Author of "Elsie Ellerton," &c.

"In Anglo-Indian society a 'Spin' appears to be a young lady who visits India in order to obtain matrimony by means of a vivacious, not to say bold, demeanour. The author of this book describes such a person, and her heartless conduct in the pursuit of her object, which, however, does not appear to have been successful."—TIMES WEEKLY.

Recently published.

THE SPOILT CHILD: a Tale of Hindu Domestic Life. By PEARLY CHAND MILLER. Translated by G. D. OSWALD. Crown 8vo, cloth, 4s. 6d.

"Every chapter of the story is a picture of native thought and native prejudice, presenting the ever-enduring hatreds of Hindoo and Mussulman in a vivid light."—TIMES WEEKLY.

"Its merit lies in the quiet humour and quaint illustrations with which the author embellishes his narrative."—ACADEMY.

ELSIE ELLERTON: a Novelette of Anglo-Indian Life. By MAY EDWOOD, Author of "Stray Straws," &c. 3s. 6d.

"Rudyard Kipling has taken the most becoming phase of Anglo-Indian life and in the main made the most of it."—HORN NEWS.

"This novel is amusing, pure in tone, and distinguished by much local colouring."—ATHENÆUM.

THE POINTS of the HORSE: a Familiar Treatise on Equine Conformation. By Capt. M. H. HAYES, F.R.C.V.S. Describing the Points in which the perfection of each class of Horses consists. Illustrated by 76 Photographs of Typical Horses and 204 Drawings after Photographs. Fcap. 4to, handsomely bound, 2s.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

RIDING: on the Flat and Across Country. A Guide to Practical Horsemanship. Third Edition. 10s. 6d.

THE HORSEWOMAN: a Practical Guide to Saddle-Riding. By Mrs. ALICE HAYES. 10s. 6d.

VETERINARY NOTES for HORSE-OWNERS. Fourth Edition. 12s. 6d.

ILLUSTRATED HORSE-BREAKING. 21s.

"Simply a little gem, with which any player can create immense success."—STRAIT.

L'ADIEU. Romance for Piano and Violin (or Piano and Violoncello). By G. J. RUMI. Each part free 1s. 6d.

CHARLES WOOLHOUSE, 174, Wardour Street, London, W.

ELKIN MATHEWS & JOHN LANE'S NEW BOOKS IN BELLES LETTRES.

GALE (NORMAN).—ORCHARD SONGS. Title-page and Cover design by J. Illingworth Kay. Fcap. 8vo, 5s. net.

Also a Special Edition, limited in number, on small paper (hand-made), bound in English vellum, £1 1s. net.

[Very few remain.]

LE GALLIENNE (RICHARD).—The RELIGION of a LITERARY MAN. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

Also a Special Rubricated Edition on hand-made paper, 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

[Ready.]

EGERTON (GEORGE).—KEYNOTES: Short Stories.

With Title-page by Aubrey Beardsley. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

[Ready this day.]

DAVIDSON (JOHN).—A RANDOM ITINERARY:

Prose Sketches, with a Ballad. Frontispiece and Title-page by Laurence Housman. Fcap. 8vo. Uniform with "Fleet Street Eclogues." 5s. net.

[Ready this day.]

GRAHAME (KENNETH).—PAGAN PAPERS: A

Volume of Essays. With Title-page by Aubrey Beardsley. Fcap. 8vo, 5s. net.

[Ready on Wednesday.]

GARNETT (RICHARD).—A VOLUME OF POEMS.

With Title-page designed by J. Illingworth Kay. 350 copies. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

[Ready on Wednesday.]

PASTORALS of FRANCE.—RENUNCIATIONS: A Volume of Stories. Title-page by John Fulleylove, R.I. Crown 8vo, 5s., net.

[Ready.]

BENSON (ARTHUR CHRISTOPHER).—POEMS. 550 copies.

12mo, 5s. net.

[Ready.]

WYNNE (FRANCES).—WHISPER: A Volume of Verse. With a

Portrait and a Memoir by KATHARINE TENAN HINKSON. Foolscap 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

[Ready.]

GREENE (G. A.).—ITALIAN LYRISTS of TO-DAY. Translations in the Original Metres from the Italian of Carducci, Stecchetti, D'Annunzio, Panzacchi, Fogazzaro, Graf, and about 30 other Living Writers. With Bibliographical and Biographical Notes and an Introduction. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

[Ready.]

THOMPSON (FRANCIS).—A VOLUME OF POEMS. With Frontispiece, Title-page, and Cover Design by Laurence Housman. 500 copies. Pott. 4to, 5s. net.

[Ready.]

WILDE (OSCAR).—DRAMATIC WORKS.—Vol. I., LADY WINDERMERE'S FAN: A Comedy in Four Acts. Binding designed by Charles Shannon. 500 copies, small 4to, 7s. 6d. net; also 50 copies, large paper (all sold) 15s. net.

[Ready.]

GOSSE (EDMUND).—THE LETTERS of THOMAS LOVELL BEDDOES. Now first Edited. Pott. 8vo, 5s. net.

[Ready immediately.]

JAMES (W. P.).—ROMANTIC PROFESSIONS: a Volume of Essays.

With Title-page by J. Illingworth Kay. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

[Ready immediately.]

CHILD'S CHRISTMAS BOOK. JOHNSON (EFFIE).—IN THE FIRE, and OTHER FANCIES. With a Frontispiece by Walter Crane. Imperial 16mo, 3s. 6d. net.

[Very few remain.]

LONDON: ELKIN MATHEWS & JOHN LANE, VIGO STREET, W.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1893.

No. 1126, New Series.

THE EDITOR cannot undertake to return, or to correspond with the writers of, rejected manuscript.

It is particularly requested that all business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., may be addressed to the PUBLISHER, and not to the EDITOR.

LITERATURE.

The Religion of a Literary Man. By Richard Le Gallienne. (Elkin Mathews & John Lane.)

NOTHING would be easier than to receive this book with violence, either of praise or blame: it is an excellently honest book, and has all the perilous qualities of perfect honesty. Mr. Le Gallienne is honest enough to set down his very personal thoughts about life and death, which are certainties for all; and about the mysteries beyond and beneath, before and behind them, which are for all uncertainties, but of a very various uncertainty for various men. He has done it simply and sincerely, without fear of diverse assailants. I can scarce conceive the man who will accept the whole book, who will not be distressed, amused, or angered, somewhere in the course of his perusal. Here is a "Literary Man" expounding his "Religion"; and he contrives to do it, literary and religious though undoubtedly he is, without arguments or appeals, metaphysical, historical, or theological. His method is a mingling of mysticism unmethodical with "sanctified common-sense": were a Catholic or a Calvinist to argue with him, he would answer their mysticism by his common-sense, and their common-sense by his mysticism. Clearly, he is invulnerable; but the Catholic or the Calvinist would take this pleasant strategy with good humour, strong in the knowledge that Mr. Le Gallienne, like many another literary man of eminent charm, is averse from the dogmatic, the scholastic, and, shall I say, the severely logical. Out of his meditations, not wholly aesthetic and poetical, in the cant sense of the words, he has extracted a number of wholesome and inspiring truths, many engaging fancies, some less engaging flippancies, but no matter of necessary offence. And he has given them to us in the best prose that he has yet written; best in its sustained and equal excellence throughout.

The one difficulty, for a not entirely contemptible class of readers, is a question of language. What is "religion"? If "Christianity" be true, can there be in it anything not "essential"? and a score more of like questions. What Mr. Le Gallienne has written composes a set of convictions to be respected; but were the English language alone at stake, we should protest against his phraseology. To quote an eminent Unitarian and an eminent Agnostic: Dr. Martineau writes:

"A God that is merely nature, a theism without God, a religion forfeited only by the nil admirari, can never reconcile the secular and the devout, the Pagan and the Christian mind. You vainly propose an Eiphrwides by corruption of a word."

Mr. Leslie Stephen writes upon the Divinity of Christ:

"Unsectarian Christianity consists in shirking the difficulty without meeting it, and trying hard to believe that the passion can survive without its essential basis. It proclaims the love of Christ as our motive, while it declines to make up its mind whether Christ was God or man, or endeavours to escape a categorical answer under a cloud of unsubstantial rhetoric. But the difference between man and God is infinite; and no effusion of superlatives will disguise the plain fact from honest minds. To be a Christian in any real sense, you must start from a dogma of the most tremendous kind, and an undogmatic creed is as senseless as a statue without shape or a picture without colour. Unsectarian means unchristian."

Carlyle, again, was once used to laugh at the Athanasian controversy, at Homoousion and Homoiousion dividing the Christian world: in later years, "he perceived Christianity itself to have been at stake. If the Arians had won, it would have dwindled away into a legend." It is confusion of words to speak, as Cardinal Newman puts it, of "faith," and explain it to mean "the faith of Marcus Antoninus, St. Austin, and Peter the Hermit, of Luther, Rousseau, Washington, and Napoleon Bonaparte." This is the amiable, but worthless principle of "frittering away the meaning of definite terms till they are available for anything, or adopting a neutral term which, by a little management and stretching, will include opposites. . . . A term is gradually stripped of the associations which make it what it is, it is 'defecated to a pure transparency,' and then it is ready for use."

What Mr. Le Gallienne describes as "essential Christianity" is often admirable morality and fine sentiment: a man will go well through life, acting up to it; but it is just as much, and just as little, "essential Christianity" as it is essential Buddhism or essential Devil-worship. Fielding's Parson Thwaekum was not wholly judicious in his definitions: "When I mention religion, I mean the Christian religion; and not only the Christian religion, but the Protestant religion; and not only the Protestant religion, but the Church of England": yet his method is less hazy than that of Mr. Le Gallienne, who is rather a disciple of the Parson's antagonist, Philosopher Square. Passing over the historical fact, that Christians of all kinds and nations have lived and suffered and died, in the strength of their dogmatic creeds, their faith in an incarnate God, we may ask whether the apostles and evangelists, the witnesses and recorders of Christ, give us no testimony worth considering, yet intensely "theological." And Mr. Le Gallienne tells us:

"It is no longer necessary for us to dispute painfully concerning documents. All such matters the German commentators and M. Renan have already settled for us, and faith has really nothing either to hope or fear from the discovery of any number of gospels. In short, we have accomplished the inestimable separation between theology and religion. Our religion no longer stands or falls by the Hebrew Bible."

Upon the words italicised—not by Mr. Le Gallienne—it is unnecessary to speak: φωνάρτα συνηγορίαν. As well might one seriously criticise the remark that all social questions have been settled for us by the French Revolutionists and Shelley. As to the "blessed divorce" between theology and religion, Mr. Le Gallienne uses freely the term "God"; he preaches the "love of God": we cannot love abstractions nor emotions personified, and Mr. Le Gallienne clearly uses the term in some theistic sense. But in doing so he is, to that extent, a theologian; for the most part he is, indeed, no theologian. Newman writes that by theology he does not mean

"a series of pious or polemical remarks upon the physical world viewed religiously, nor yet 'the Evidences of Religion,' nor yet that vague thing called 'Christianity,' or 'Our Common Christianity,' or 'Christianity the law of the land,' if there is any man alive who can tell me what it is. I discard it, for the very reason that it cannot throw itself into a proposition."

For, as he said long before becoming a Catholic, "Christianity is faith; faith implies a doctrine; a doctrine, propositions; propositions, yes or no; yes or no, differences." The "essence" of Christianity is not any "morality" taught by Christ, with some infinitely gracious and loving authority: not a sentence of the Lord's Prayer but is older than Christ's human life on earth: scarce a precept in the Sermon on the Mount but may be paralleled from earlier teachers of the East. The "essence" of Christianity lay in the revelation of a Divine personality entering into new relations with men: in the faith that this man was not god-like, nor demigod, nor divinely inspired, but God. That very definite "theological" faith has been the essential strength of Christianity, from the death of Saint Stephen to the death of Father Damien: it has been no vaguely realised subtlety of the schools, but a living reality. Take that away, and you will be left with a precarious theism and a morality quickened by theism; but Christianity will be gone. Whatever be the basis of morality, whether we follow Kant, or Mr. Spencer, or another, no "theologian" has yet found it in Christianity, which teaches the highest morality yet taught, but does not claim, in its most primitive historical form, to have discovered the "categorical imperative" or first revealed the conscience.

"Whether 'twere best opine Christ was,
Or never was at all, or whether
He was and was not, both together,—
It matters little for the name,
So the idea be still the same."

That "essential" view of Christ was held by Browning's professor in "Christmas Eve"; it failed to satisfy Browning, who held, as Mr. Swinburne says of him, "with a force of personal passion the radical tenet of the Christian faith—faith in Christ as God—a tough, hard, vital faith, that can bear at need hard stress of weather and hard thought." It was not the view of Napoleon, with his famous, "General, I am a judge of men, and tell you that Christ is not a man . . . if you do not understand that Christ is God, why then I was wrong in making you a General." Coleridge also, starting with Unitarianism, ends his life of thought in "No Christ, no God; no Trinity, no God:" and he saw clearly the truth of aut Deus aut non bonus. "If Christ was merely a man, he could not have been even a good man. There is no medium." If this "theology" of the Incarnation be included by Mr. Le Gallienne among his early "perversions" and "ingenuities," his hard "intellectual statements," he might at least offer an explanation of the way in which the whole worship of the early Church, as in Pliny's days, and the whole spirit of martyrdom, were bound up with this "opaque dogma." His book is distinctly marred by a "popular" superficiality of treatment, when he touches, not with the least irreverence, yet with an easy assurance, upon questions which have imposed upon many men years of spiritual agony and mental labour.

"Je n'arrivais pas au point d'émancipation," said Renan, "que le gamin de Paris atteint sans aucun effort de réflexion, qu'après avoir traversé Gesenius et toute l'exégèse allemande. Il me fallait dix années de méditation et du travail forcené, pour voir que mes maîtres n'étaient pas infailibles."

But Mr. Le Gallienne's main contention is grounded upon the view that churches and theologians have been stout guardians of ecclesiastical powers and of dogmatic formulae, but have notoriously failed, or frequently failed, or have an irresistible tendency to fail, in preaching gentleness, charity, brotherliness; he proceeds, or apparently proceeds, to insist that the claims of such churches and the doctrines of such theologians, being of less importance than the homely, human virtues, should be ignored. It is not clear whether he means that they should be relegated to the background, like Epicurean gods, or positively rejected and denied. He denies their connexion with "essential" Christianity: it may be that he allows them to rank with "unessentials." Certainly, he maintains that "the world has never tried the Gospel of Christ." We are told, somewhat ex cathedra, that "it is only Christ's moral precepts that are to be taken literally . . . all the rest is parable"—a notable dogma of private judgment. If Mr. Le Gallienne is to be taken literally, he is a follower of Count Tolstoi: he will not go to law, he will give his cloak to the taker of his coat. Probably Mr. Le Gallienne does not mean this verbal adherence to the letter; it would be hard for him to justify so rigid a position. He means us to believe that the great commandments of love and charity have never been obeyed, through the fault of ecclesiastics "unspiritually minded, as the majority of ecclesiastics must be." It is a paradox, scarcely charitable and certainly unhistorical: the world knows well the triumphs of Christian ideas, the purification of life, the vindication of man's rights, the assertion of woman's dignity, the denunciations of slavery. In the language of the Catholic Church, four sins "cry to heaven for vengeance": one is the defrauding the labourer of his wages. "Organised Christianity has probably done more to retard the ideals that were its Founder's than any other agency in the world." It is a strange reading of history which so upbraids the one protector of the weak and champion of the oppressed in ages of strong lawlessness. When accusations are brought against "organised Christianity" of cruelty and wrong, the accusers, in their just zeal, forget the words "not peace, but a sword": words which do not justify violence and pride, but which show us the Founder of Christianity prophesying them. Where, again, does Mr. Le Gallienne learn that original Christianity was "a sweeping crusade against dogmas and formulae"? Rather, "these ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone": "I come not to destroy the law, but to fulfil": "if he neglect to hear the church, let him be unto thee as a heathen man and a publican." It seems almost impossible to read the Gospels and not to see that the future of Christianity is throughout depicted as one of antagonism, up to the end, between the spirit of the world and the spirit of truth: an antagonism in which even "the very elect" shall be in danger of falling away, and there shall be little "faith on the earth," at last. But it is useless to criticise an arbitrary system of interpretation, which accepts and rejects upon a principle purely subjective. Rather, we are forced to wonder that any one should think it worth his while to claim the term "Christian" for his own who believes that the very companions of Christ were, from first to last, unable to understand Him; while still our whole knowledge of Christ rests upon the testimony transmitted by them to their successors. If that be indeed so, whatever date we assign to whatever scriptures, the literary and religious problem is insoluble: men under hallucinations and misconceptions, as Père Didon observes, do not conquer the world with them.

The utterances of this book are in praise of high feeling, of courageous bearing, of good fellowship:

"Erfüll' davon dein Herz, so gross es ist,
Und wenn du ganz in dem Gefühle selig bist,
Nenn' es dann, wie du willst,
Nenn's Glück! Herz! Liebe! Gott!
Ich habe keinen Namen
Dafür! Gefühl ist Alles;
Name ist Schall und Rauch, Umnebelnd Himmelsgluth."

True enough,

"Wenn man's so hört, möcht's leidlich scheinen, Steht aber doch immer schief darum;"

The next line may be left unapplied. The sentiment of the book is cheering and exhilarating: here is no foolish "religion of art," no unworthy pessimism, no grandiloquence about anything. But there is an incurable sentimentality, not of the gushing and wordy sort, but somehow inherent in the very strength of the writer, an intrusion of fancies into the place of thoughts. Thus Mr. Le Gallienne assures us that, whether there be a life to come, or no, "it does not really much matter." In another place, in pleasant allusion to Sir Thomas Browne, we read that "there are few of us . . . who do not sometimes, when the world is budding and shooting in the spring, pray softly in our own way for the souls of those beloved who are no longer with us in the sun and the sweet air."

Mr. Le Gallienne dare not trifle and sport with the sorrow and the wistfulness of death; but a pretty sentiment is too much for him. Whether our mother, wife, or child be dead for ever, and eternally lost to us, "does not really much matter" to them or to us: but when we feel prettily sentimental, we may be moved by the hawthorn buds, and the daisies, to "pray softly in our own way" for their souls. This is not a satisfactory substitute for even "conventional Christianity." Indeed, much of Mr. Le Gallienne's pleasant language is an ingenious evasion, self-deception, method of illusion. Thus, he assails the common notions of individuality, personality, and maintains that if we meet new friends, with the qualities dear to us in old friends dead, then "we have not to wait to meet our old friends again in heaven, we meet them again already on earth—in the new ones." Anything less true to, at the least, my own experience, I cannot conceive, nor anything more cynically heartless, did Mr. Le Gallienne really mean it. It is but a bold and ingenious way of not facing the reality of death: just as to plead our ignorance of the degree and way in which others suffer pain and sorrow, is but an escape from the haunting reality of the world's unhappiness. So anxious seems Mr. Le Gallienne, with a praiseworthy instinct and desire, to show how rare a world it is, that he is something too apt to "whistle, as he goes, for want of thought." Omnia exiunt in mysterium: that theological commonplace is a better reply to "the riddle of the painful earth," than a gay minimising of the darkness. It is in a happier vein, that Mr. Le Gallienne practically tackles the "problem of pain," by telling the age a salutary home-truth, that it is exceeding cowardly. A valiant and valuable reply!

One habit of the writer is a little provoking: his serene assumption that all the world, or at least all the "spiritualists" in it, are of his mind about the gravest and most solemn questions. "We" know, in these enlightened days, how to take Inspiration, Miracles, the Trinity: "we," the heirs of all the ages. "I" would be at once more modest and more true: there is no arrogance in saying that "I" am forced, for such and such reasons, to take certain views of sundry matters: the book is a confession. But to assume that other views are unworthy of the least recognition, and are held, in fact, by no one not behind the spirit of the times, is a little arrogant and very misleading. Also, Mr. Le Gallienne, with excellent intentions, takes a rosier view of modern tendencies than actual experience can confirm. Thus, he praises the "Relative Spirit," justly indeed, though the Relative Spirit was mischievous enough when applied by the Sophists of Greece to the study of ethics.

"Before the breath of that genial spirit," writes Mr. Le Gallienne, "the icy conventions and prejudices of mankind melt away as frost in the sun, and the liberated souls of men and women laugh and are glad in the joyous developments of their natures as God made them."

But the application of the Relative Spirit to that "icy convention," the sanctity of marriage, has resulted in the "joyous development," in many countries, of certain statistics nothing else than appalling. Indeed, the book suffers from a certain indecision of manner: now we have some graceful disquisitions, a little in the manner of Mr. Stevenson, and presently an essay in stricter reasoning, pursued for awhile, and broken off in a whimsical flourish, with an airy caprice. It is as though triolets and villanelles were interpolated into Euclid and the Thirty-nine Articles. A difficulty is stated, an answer is suggested; we are intent upon the matter, and suddenly we are whisked away upon the tail of an epigram into the next paragraph and a new theme. Recast into that perilous form, a "sonnet sequence," the book would be a more perfect whole; the hinting method of poetry will not do for prose, if the prose is to state a plain argument.

Mr. Le Gallienne's attitude towards theology is in part explained by the words:

"One has been . . . brought up to regard religion as something supernatural imposed upon our human nature, rather than something blossoming out of it. . . . Religion, we are accustomed to think, is an accomplishment taught in schools, like algebra, an 'optional' subject indeed, and we may, if we will, learn drawing instead."

Here, at least, Mr. Le Gallienne should drop the plural, and speak for himself; for that is not an universal experience. In such a case, religion and its science, theology, are thrust upon the learner forcibly, foolishly, as classics or mathematics may be indiscreetly thrust upon young scholars, and crammed into unwilling brains. Theology, unvitalised and unrealised, may be true theology, but it is untrue communicated. But as well might one deny the beauty of poetry, if poetry be prosaically imposed upon us, as deny the living truth of theology, for the deadening manner of its communication. It is not too much to say that all theology, including "the arbitrary dogma of the Immaculate Conception," flows from within, from the first utterance of conscience; it is all implicit there, and "external" evidence does but confirm and verify our anticipations. In the vast riches of Catholic theology there is nothing, not the most dryly technical of propositions, but is alive, and can appeal to the emotions and affections. It is, after all, a shallow and hasty thought, that to most Christians of dogmatic communions their theologies and creeds are dreary and unreal things: only inexperience of a dogmatic religion, taken to heart and soul, could affirm it. Again, so far as the book betrays any metaphysical reading, it is reading of Mr. Spencer, whose "experience and utility" theories are hard to reconcile with Mr. Le Gallienne's excursions into mysticism, while they amply explain his attitude towards a reasoned theology, the science of the truths of God. Hence his delicate dancing round the questions of sin and free will, responsibility and obligation.

I have seldom met with a book from which I differed so widely, while admiring and enjoying it so greatly. It stoutly sets its face against pestilent modern affectations of artistic license and personal licentious-ness, against the claim to be "unmoral" and the pretence of being blasé: it appeals to sane emotions, to natural wonder and pity and humility and humour. There is a frank zest and lust of life in it, the better spirit of Whitman: it is always reverent in intention, and the writer cannot have realised how certain phrases would jar upon certain readers. For all the flaws that may be thought discoverable in it, it is no foolish book to throw aside: it expresses a tendency of belief and thought, of which the "essentials," though held by not a few, have rarely of late found expression so pleasing. Said David Balfour to Alan Breck, "Alan, I'll not say it's the good Christianity as I understand it, but it's good enough." Compared with the graceless gospels of suicide and dyspepsia, so glibly offered for our acceptance just now, Mr. Le Gallienne's religion is "good enough": at least, it is a gospel of faith, hopeful and unashamed. For frequent reading, I shall continue to prefer the "Religion" of another "Literary Man:" those Confessions of Saint Augustine, which tell how he passed from an airy and elegant rhetoric into "conventional Christianity," and even became a "dogmatic theologian" of the first order: a progress, so far at least as the first part, made by countless others, under his guidance and illumination. But if the "Kingdom of the Spirit" is to come—(it was, surely, not "Joachim de Lyra," but Joachim of Flora who made the famous prophecy)—heretical, as it will be, it will yet be less distressful than the ashen kingdom of despair and death prophesied by the professional mourners of literature. Let us thank Mr. Le Gallienne for his book, and counsel him, in all goodwill, before issuing a second edition, to study that forgotten but memorable work, The Eclipse of Faith.

LIONEL JOHNSON.

The Letters of Lady Burghersh (afterwards Countess of Westmoreland). Edited by her daughter, Lady Rose Weigall. (John Murray.)

THIS is an interesting, nay, a delightful book. The venerable figure of the late Lady Westmoreland is still remembered as one of the great personages of the high life of London in the last generation. A favourite niece of the two famous Wellesleys, she moved in the innermost circle of the aristocratic caste, which ruled England half a century ago; and as the wife of Lord Burghersh, a well-known name in the diplomatic world of the days of Metternich, her continental experience was almost unrivalled. This volume is a series of letters from her pen, written in the first years of her married life, which records all that she saw and heard, in the camps of the allied armies, between Leipzig and the fall of Napoleon; and few reminiscences of the time have an equal charm. The historical value of the work is not great, in the sense that it is a trifle containing little that is new; yet it brings out strikingly the divided counsels and hesitations of the League of the Continent, in the presence of its late master, still feared, though stricken; and it throws some fresh light on the state of opinion in France. As may be supposed, too, it reflects the ideas and sympathies of our aristocracy of that day: it overflows with hatred of that "odious Buonaparte": with convictions that Frenchmen were slaves or fools, and with glorification of Uncle "Arthur"; and this characteristic gives it freshness and interest. But what makes it such pleasant reading is this: it portrays vividly, and with a most graceful touch, the leading personages in the ranks of the Allies; it tells us a number of new anecdotes about men and things in a memorable time; it places before us, from the inner side, many incidents of 1813-14; and it narrates adventures which might well amaze and even shock fine ladies of our day. Not the least attractive feature of the book is the picture the author unconsciously draws of herself. Gay, brilliant, fascinating, and courted by the great, Lady Burghersh had none of the false pride of station: she was a true woman and a devoted wife; she had no airs and silly pretensions; and her courageous and elastic nature got over difficulties at which weaker spirits would have quailed. The volume is edited by one of her daughters; and the editing is, on the whole, good. But Lady Rose Weigall should have pointed out that Generals Lauriston and Reynier ought not to have figured in her mother's pages as Laureston and Regnier; and that, as well as Bertrand, they were not "French marshals."

Lord Burghersh, previously one of Wellington's aides-de-camp, was appointed in the autumn of 1813 a military attaché to the Austrian army, then engaged, with its allies in Saxony, in the operations that preceded Leipzig. Unlike Hotspur, he would have his Kate go to the wars; and his young wife, though in delicate health, was only too glad to be his companion. The difficulties of the journey were no joke: the Channel and even the North Sea were made dangerous by French cruisers; and the travellers were obliged to make a long detour, through the Sound to Gothenburg, on the coast of Sweden, escorted by British men-of-war, with convoy. From Gothenburg they had to go across Sweden, and to traverse the Baltic until they reached Stralsund. The journey would have seemed impossible to a fair patrician of our day. They had the accompaniments of the English "milords" of the time—a good carriage, and well-trained attendants; but between vile roads, detestable inns, dirt, abominable cookery, and every kind of discomfort, they were in a purgatory for several weeks.

"We generally find but one room of a few feet square to eat, drink, and sleep in. I have never seen a carpet or curtain, basin or jug; but as soon as we have arrived at our sleeping place, we sent the servants into the yard to snatch up the pans the chickens fed out of, or the pails from the stable, and made use of them."

When Berlin was reached Lord Burghersh went forward to join the headquarters of Prince Schwartzburg, while his wife remained a short time in the Prussian capital. She was soon in the midst of the social life of the Court, receiving the welcome due to a niece of Wellington; and she has gracefully portrayed the chief personages who passed before her observant eyes—relics of the old circle of Frederick the Great, and the leading men and women of the new era. What struck her most was the grave tone of thought that pervaded all classes and ranks in Berlin, characteristic of past sufferings and present dangers, completely unknown in the world of London, and the admirable charity of the great ladies of the Court.

"There is a patriotism and earnestness of which we have no idea in England, nor have we a conception what these poor people have sacrificed in the good cause; for the poverty and wretchedness to which they have reduced themselves is shocking. There are now 38,000 wounded in this town, and the princesses and ladies have many of them sold their jewels to assist them. . . . Tout respire le militaire throughout the country. . . . The women hardly dress at all smartly. . . . They were saying yesterday that no ladies were now seen to ride in Berlin, for all superfluous horses have been sent by them to the armies."

Lady Burghersh was ere long on her way to Frankfort, where the allied sovereigns had come to gather after Leipzig. The "good cause" was in a most triumphant state: the "Corsican tyrant" had been defeated, and a march across the Rhine was in prospect. Lady Burghersh was, except two sisters of the Czar, almost the only lady in the allied camp, but she made herself at home with kings, princes, generals, statesmen, and even Cossack officers; and her gay and brilliant conversation had charms for all. Alexander spoke to her thus of Wellington—Vittoria had perhaps kept the coalition together:

"Ah si nous avions un capitaine comme celui là nous aurions beau mieux fait." I said I 'did not think it was possible to "mieux faire." 'Ah, Madame, c'est que le bon Dieu nous a servi de capitaine, et que l'exemple des Anglais nous a donné du courage.'"

She thus describes the "parterre des rois" and their followers:

"I was as much examined as I examined, and I am told I gave satisfaction, and that I am threatened with a great dinner at Schwartzburg's to create better acquaintance. I never was so disappointed as in the Emperor Alexander. He is the image of —, only fair instead of red, and very like W., the dentist. He has certainly fine shoulders, but beyond that he is horridly made. He holds himself bent quite forward, for which reason all his court imitate him and bend too, and gird in their waists like women! His countenance is not bad, and that is all I can say of him. The Emperor of Austria is a little wizened old man, not to be known from the D— of G—; but as for the King of Prussia, I never saw a more interesting person. . . . He has two sons with him [afterwards King Frederick William and the Emperor William], very nice boys. Then I must not forget the Grand Duke Constantine. He is like the Emperor of Russia, but without exception the greatest monster I ever saw. Then came the Grand Duke of Weimar, Prince Paul of Württemberg, the Elector of Hesse, &c., &c.; Old Platow, the finest old weatherbeaten face I ever saw, and very like the little prints I had of him in London. Barclay de Tolly, an ugly old fellow; Miloradovitch Czernicheff, and old Blücher who never was beat."

Lady Burghersh followed the Austrian army in the invasion of France in 1814. The "princesse Anglaise," as she was chivalrously called, had won the hearts of Schwartzburg and Metternich, and roughed it as gallantly as any subaltern. She had to put up with all kinds of discomforts, but had a tea-table for princely soldiers and statesmen:

"In this one room we have our beds, we eat and we sit, and one goes out while the other dresses. . . . Aubin and the servants sleep on straw in the kitchen and the stables! I don't mind it at all; and in this beautiful room I have always tea going on, and Schwartzburg, Liechtenstein, and most of the staff generally come in and drink tea."

The allied armies overran whole provinces of France without meeting a hostile force; and it was believed in their camps that all was nearly over:

"The accounts given by spies, deserters, and prisoners all agree that there is no army, at least none to be seen. I would bet a great deal we have an immediate peace."

The French, too, had lost all faith in the Empire; the nation, indeed, was worn out and indifferent:

"They all talk of Buonaparte exactly in the same manner, as a monster whom they detest; and then, with the levity and gaiety of the French, in the midst of their complaints at all they suffer under him, the loss of their children by the conscription, the ruin of commerce, &c., they mix it up with jokes and quizzes of him, and les gentilleses du Roi de Rome."

After La Rothière, the swarm of kites and crows sung out over the eagle that seemed to them dead, and spread their wings for a flight to Paris. Old Europe was fighting against one great man, sustained only by the wrecks of an army. But the divisions of the coalition gave Napoleon his chance; and he seized it with matchless and characteristic genius:

"Each Power has its own view and object. The Emperor Alexander has set his heart upon entering Paris, and is exactly like an eager child about it. . . . Old Blücher is determined on his side to get to Paris first, and being used to victory, sets off likewise, pushes on à tort et à travers, and consequently gets a fillip. . . . Poor Schwartzburg has really a hard task to play."

Montmirail, Vauchamps, and Montereau taught the invaders what Napoleon could still be; and panic fell on the allied councils. No wonder they were called les misérables by their scornful enemy:

"I don't know what they mean to do, but I know that Buonaparte is employing all his energy, all his activity, and all his power, and that we are dilatory, uncertain, and (entre nous) frightened. Alexander as much so as any, with all his bravado."

In the alarm that pervaded the Austrian leaders—Schwartzburg had fallen back and sued for an armistice—Lady Burghersh was actually sent back to Dijon. Overwhelming force, however, backed by the treason of such noble supporters of the "good cause," as Bernadotte, Talleyrand, Murat, and Marmont, at last prevailed over genius in war, and the Allies made their way to the French capital. Lady Burghersh joined her husband after the fall of Paris, and describes, from the point of view of a great English lady, enthusiastic for the Bourbons and old Europe, the triumphal entry of the Comte D'Artois. It is known, however, now that the homage given to the Allies was that of a mere faction; the mass of the citizens did not bow the knee to the conquerors. Lady Burghersh condemns with merited scorn the functionaries who forsook and betrayed Napoleon:

"What I own disgusted me was to see Monsieur surrounded by Talleyrand, Ney, Marmont, Oudinot, &c., the National Guard, and the very populace who, three weeks ago, were shouting 'Vive l'Empereur!' . . . All I have seen of the French people, and particularly of the Parisians, makes me think them the most despicable set of animals, and I do heartily pity the Bourbons and all their ancient followers to find themselves amongst those of the new regime."

The true wife and woman had no soft words for Marie Louise and her heartless conduct. And if her daughter has added in a note that Lady Burghersh in after years had reason to think well of the discredited empress, we can only say that Lady Rose Weigall should say as little as possible of Madame Neipperg, the paramour of her chamberlain before the grave had closed on the agony of St. Helena:

"She cried very much, but consented to leave Buonaparte, for which I think she is a monster, for she certainly pretended love for him, and she always behaved very well to her. . . . I think it is quite disgusting in her to abandon him in his misfortunes, after pretending, at least, to idolise him in his prosperity, and I feel exactly the same about all his marshals, &c., who have left him."

Lady Burghersh treated with characteristic disdain the parvenu noblesse of the fallen empire—in her eyes, the démimonde of an evil state of society:—"I confess I cannot stomach treating these people de princes et princesses, and I cannot conceive how the old French will bear it."

We have outrun our space, or would quote more passages from this very attractive volume.

WILLIAM O'CONNOR MORRIS.

A Year Amongst the Persians. By Edward G. Browne. (A. & C. Black.)

IN the last ten years we have had perhaps a dozen books dealing with the same route and the same circumstances in Persia. Yet in one important matter Mr. Browne's volume differs from and excels all others, for so far as we can judge, he is the only writer of travels in Persia who has had full colloquial command of the language. More than any other author, Mr. Browne has given us an insight into modern thought, and especially the religious thought of Persia. He has supplemented and adorned this with very many extracts from and translations of Persian poetry. This is all to his credit. On the other side, it must be said that he has given us very many needless, useless pages, filled with writing which has no charm whatever. This book, which is heavy to hold and, in some parts, heavy reading, might have preserved throughout a novel and instructive character, had it been entitled "Talks in Persia," and limited to about half the present size.

But though in his notes of travel Mr. Browne does not shine, though his writing in this respect is careless and commonplace, the volume is for the reason we have stated a very valuable contribution to the already large pile of books on Persia. Alone, among so many writers, Mr. Browne possesses the key of the native ideas and mind. If, in addition to his knowledge of Persian language and poetry, Mr. Browne possessed the descriptive powers and the luminous pen-away of Lord Dufferin, this volume would have outweighed in general interest the work of any preceding writer upon Persia which has lately come under our notice.

We shall proceed to examine the quality of this chief interest in Mr. Browne's work. Among a people of certain refinement in their outward manners, there is a want of civilisation in their outspoken depreciation of each other. Mr. Browne says:

"No sooner had we alighted at one place to examine the quarters offered, than all the competitors of its owner cried out with one accord that if we put up there we should assuredly suffer from the poisonous bugs with which they averred the house in question swarmed."

Doubtless other travellers have heard such observations, and their ignorance has advantages; for it is certain that many a British traveller in Persia has smiled superbly at curses, and obtained credit for a lofty indifference to native ill-will when in reality his attitude was simply due to lack of understanding. Mr. Browne found that because of "the favourable opinion of the Prophet Muhammad entertained by the author, Carlyle's Heroes and Hero Worship is very highly esteemed by Muhammadans acquainted with English." He also gives at least one piece of news, that of the destruction of the only railway in Persia—from Teheran to the shrine of Shah Abdul Azim. Less than five years ago it was torn up and completely wrecked by a mob, exasperated at the accidental death of a man who had tried to leap from the train while in motion. Very shrewdly the author ascribes such folly not merely to ignorance and bigotry, but also to the not wholly unjustifiable anger of the Persians against the Shah's system of traffic in concessions for his personal benefit. Another item of news is the fall of "Manijak," or Azizu's-Sultán (the Darling of the King), the boy favourite who accompanied the Shah on his last visit to London. This boy has been "hurled from the pinnacle of power down to his original obscurity. The cause of his fall was, I believe, that one day, while he was playing with a pistol, the weapon exploded and narrowly missed the Shah. This was too much, and Manijak and his favoured kinsmen were shorn of their titles and honours and packed off to their humble home in Kurdistan."

Persian mosques are not open to unbelievers, and many a curse has fallen upon unheeding ears of Englishmen while simply gazing upon the exterior of these buildings. But Mr. Browne's understanding was open when, in company with a Musulman friend, he approached the golden dome of the shrine near Teheran, and the language of the custodian dervishes compelled both to move away.

The most interesting part of Mr. Browne's work is the record of his talks with Persians upon their beliefs in the supernatural and upon religion. He took especial and unprecedented pains to master the mystery of Babism. Bab, who was executed by order of the Shah many years ago, promised one "whom God should manifest"; and this deliverer has been generally acknowledged by Bab's followers in the form of Behá, a Persian living in exile at Acre. Said a learned Babí to Mr. Browne:

"Behá has come for the perfecting of the law of Christ, and his injunctions are in all respects similar; for instance, we are commanded to prefer rather that we should be killed than that we should kill. It is the same throughout, and, indeed, could not be otherwise; for Behá is Christ returned again even as He promised, to complete that which He had begun. Your own books tell you that Christ shall come 'like a thief in the night,' at a time when you are not expecting him."

The religion of Behá is eminently Protestant. Mollahs and priests alike are rebuked in the following verse:

"It is not meet for any one to demand pardon before another; repent unto God in presence of yourselves."

Mr. Browne made interesting inquiries among the Zoroastrians, many of whom live in Yezd under severe restrictions, of which one limits the colour of their outer garments to yellow. He says:

"Whilst I was in Yezd, a Zoroastrian was bastinadoed for accidentally touching with his garment some fruit exposed for sale in the bazaar, and thereby, in the eyes of the Musulmans, rendering it unclean and unfit for consumption by true believers."

But when a Persian applied the term "fire-worshipper" to the followers of Zoroaster:

"The Dastúr at once flashed out in anger. 'What ails you if we prostrate ourselves before the pure element of fire,' said he, 'when you Muhammadans grovel before a dirty black stone, and the Christians bow down before the symbol of the cross?' Our fire is, I should think, at least as honourable and appropriate a Kibla as these; and as for worshipping it, we no more worship it than you do your symbols."

These extracts will serve to show that this is a volume in which those who have read all previous publications upon Persia and the Persians will find much new matter, both highly interesting and instructive.

ARTHUR ARNOLD.

Seers and Singers: a Study of Five English Poets. By Arthur D. Innes. (Innes.)

It is one of the penalties of a period which is, as the present, far more critical than creative, that, in the great efflux of the reviewing spirit, when everyone is for expressing his particular opinion upon everything, the old systems and canons of criticism should begin to be neglected, and the taste and tenour of the individual should come to be the criterion of judgment. We are reminded that all criticism is, in effect, a record of impressions, that we can only judge a thing in the light in which it appears to ourselves, that the personal view is, after all, the safe one.

To this school of impressionist criticism Mr. Innes has added his dainty volume, which bears its own manifesto at the opening:

"I may as well begin," he says, "by humbly acknowledging that no one need look for scientific criticism from me, because they will only find personal impressions. And that must be my excuse if the impertinent third vowel seems to crop up with undue frequency. Personal impressions have no business to be put forward with the dogmatic assertiveness of impersonal statements."

Now, all this is very frank, and (may I add?) refreshingly modest; moreover, it prepares us, without affectation, for exactly the kind of entertainment which Mr. Innes has made ready. There are five singers (or are they seers?) considered in the volume—Wordsworth, Tennyson, Browning, Matthew Arnold, and Mrs. Browning; and each of them is sifted and judged entirely in accordance with Mr. Innes's personal taste. He applies no critical foot-rule to their stature, finding so many cubits wanting to their perfection; he is content to jot down, in easy, colloquial, unstudied language, the impressions which their work has made upon him. And in so doing he has given us a chatty, companionable volume, full of thought, never perhaps very subtle or original, but always hale, sane, and worthy consideration.

The dangers, however, of this personal kind of criticism are inevitable; and they re-appear, in a greater or less degree, upon every page of Mr. Innes's book. Having, as it were, no standard by which to estimate his own impressions, proceeding in too irresponsible a habit altogether, he is continually led into vigorous, hearty judgments, which do credit, indeed, to his fearlessness and freedom, but which cry out, at the very moment of their utterance, for the saving restriction of a second thought. He is at his best, for instance, in speaking of Browning, whose energy, dramatic fire, and thoroughness are, by nature, akin to Mr. Innes's own cast of thought. But he is, one feels, too little tolerant of qualities which, standing at the pole of Browning's equipment, have yet excellences of their own outside the reach of Browning. Mr. Innes seems to lack, for one thing, the musical ear. He is not quick to distinguish between melody and jingle; and, missing this difference, he is, in more than one place, seriously unjust to Mrs. Browning. Again, he is so keen an advocate of the healthy mind in the healthy body, that he overlooks the delicate skill with which Tennyson has drawn weakly and unsympathetic characters like the heroes of "Maud" and "Locksley Hall": he has so little patience with the character that he will not stop to appreciate the characterisation. He would have everyone never turning his back, but marching breast forward, never doubting clouds will break: a sound, wholesome desire, of course, but one that, widely satisfied, would limit too narrowly the confines of dramatic art.

Again (and this is natural to his unfettered criticism) he scarcely "gets at" Matthew Arnold. He pictures him going out upon the hillside with "Marcus Aurelius in his pocket." Now, that is very neatly said: but, is it just? Is not "The Scholar Gipsy" full of the fresh, eager breath of the ridges above Hinksey? True,

"The eye travels down to Oxford's towers," but not with the cold glance of pedantry: here is the spirit of academic life set free, the voice of culture taught by the many voices of the country-side, the rich imagination running riot within sight of those gray spires, musical with the enchantments of the middle ages. If Mr. Innes finds too much of the academic spirit there, one can only part touch with him, and open the volume again at "Sohrab and Rustum," with its keen, heated rush of onset, its vehement eloquence, and ask him: Is the academic spirit too strong there? That is the worst of impressionism; it is inclined to be impulsive.

But enough of discussion. It is the penalty of Mr. Innes' sincerity that he provokes it. His book is eminently wholesome, vigorous, and suggestive; and, where it seems least critical, it is apt to prove most obviously sincere. When so many things are said for the sake of seeming in the fashion, it is pleasant to read things written simply and solely because they are things felt. It is a great advantage, after all, to be independent.

ARTHUR WAUGH.

NEW NOVELS.

A Strange Temptation. By Mrs. J. Kent Spender. In 3 vols. (Hutchinson.)

Margaret Drummond Millionaire. By Sophie F. F. Veitch. In 3 vols. (A. & C. Black.)

Amabel. By Cathal Macguire. In 3 vols. (Fisher Unwin.)

Milliara. By Noel Hope. In 2 vols. (Fisher Unwin.)

A Bubble Fortune. By Sarah Tytler. (Hutchinson.)

The Strange Adventures of Anelay Moreland. By R. Shelton Gresson. (Remington.)

Not in the Betting. By Sir Randal H. Roberts. (White.)

A Strange Temptation is not quite a failure, but it is the next worst thing—a good story spoiled by prolixity and misplaced ingenuity. The first volume is, in schoolboy and Society phrase, "not half bad"; the second flags; the third is almost intolerable. The temptation of Polly, the 'Frisco dancing girl, which takes place almost at the beginning of the first, is certainly odd, but not quite impossible or incredible. She has a physically weak "chum," Azalea Deverill, who comes into an inheritance in England just before her death. Azalea having expressed a desire that she could make her friend her heiress in turn, Polly, who is desirous above all things to give herself what, in the slang of English Ibsenism, is styled "a chance," sees no great harm in transferring herself to England. As the eccentric Miss Deverill, she charms and tortures everybody around her, at the same time going through a course of self-education. She marries a young man with a strong and even stiff sense of honour, has a child by him, plagues him, and for a brief period is a Society lioness. Then, of course, we have the inevitable and conventional. Ben, an old 'Frisco lover, turns up, relentlessly vindictive, and tells all. Poor Polly is driven from her home and child by her outraged husband, and takes for a time to travel, drink, and Monte Carlo. Perhaps Mrs. Kent Spender ought to have killed Polly straight off. She does nothing of the kind. A reconciliation between Polly and her husband is effected by a saintly Sister who has, in her time, loved the husband, but is now a model of self-sacrifice. There are some good points in Polly. As an adventuress, she is decidedly an original. But her story is spun out to an unconscionable length; and her experiences in Society and—after her fall—on the Continent, verge, to say the least of it, upon caricature.

If only Miss Veitch had not succumbed to the three-volume temptation! Even as things are, Margaret Drummond Millionaire is a distinct advance upon anything she has yet written. Most of her previous books have been almost too emphatically one-character stories; this is a story of several characters, all equally good and well drawn, and, although dominated, by no means crushed by the heroine. If, indeed, there is any one portrait in the story that has an element of artificiality in it, it is the so-called millionaire of a girl, with English education and English ideas, almost hurled into a Scotch ultra-Presbyterian parish. She strives too much, and perhaps cries too little. There is a want of heartiness, also, about her courtship, and her Colonel MacDonald is too much of the merely eligible combination of military man and country gentleman. But Miss Veitch is thoroughly at home in the essentially Celtic parish—in or near Arran, apparently—in which Margaret Drummond by a stroke of fortune finds herself playing the two parts of heiress and reformer. The two leading characters there—Lindsay, the fisherman and poacher, with a "bad character" and the best of hearts, and Captain Matheson, the crabbed, suspicious, Conservative (and yet Radical), and generous opponent of Miss Drummond and her reforms—are as life-like as any sketches which have recently appeared in fiction. Owing, no doubt, to the exigencies of the three-volume system, we have rather too much of the conversations and tricks of McBurnie—a Holy Willie with variations; but he is a strong character all the same. The half-mad minister and his bigoted and narrow-minded sister (although she belongs to the Scotland not of to-day or of yesterday, but of the day before yesterday) are also good portraits. Miss Veitch would do well to cultivate the good-nature of Scott when dealing with fanaticism. But we have in Margaret Drummond, not only her best work so far, but one of the best novels dealing with life in Scotland that have appeared for many a year.

Amabel is a tiresome, provoking, improbable story, which is written, nevertheless, with a good deal of ability and a very considerable amount of knowledge as to the ways of the "ranks." Amabel, who loves and marries beneath her, is a very poor edition of Amelia Osborne. There was no real necessity for her so marrying at all; at all events, there seems no good reason why any mystery should have been made about her true position in the social scale. But when she had married she ought to have shown a little more spirit. "Her forgiveness and love have been divine," says her unworthy husband, when he is about to ride away to the death which he has merited. But most readers of her story would have been better pleased if there had been a little more temper, even though there had been also a little less love and forgiveness, on Amabel's part. Some of the minor characters in the novel—in particular Alice Amabel's rival and the "chum," who is her husband's worst friend—stand out from the rest as being successfully, as well as carefully, sketched. So much good work has been put into the writing of this story that one cannot but regret the comparatively unsatisfactory nature of the result.

There is certainly nothing conventionally Australian—no bushranging, no bank robbery, no conflict with aborigines—in Milliara. It is described in the title-page as a romance, but in reality it is a study in Australian still life during the later sixties, being, in fact, a picture of emotion and intrigue on "a sheep station of about 150,000 acres of purchased land, having a river frontage to the Emu, and consisting for the most part of gently swelling slopes and undulations only slightly timbered." Into this paradise (Milliara by name) there enter Death and the serpent. Death carries off Mr. Newton, the master of Milliara, and throws upon Bell Newton, the strong heroine of the story, the responsibility of looking after her mother, her mother's baby, and her own destinies. The serpent follows Death in the person of "a tawny girl with piebald hair," otherwise Miss Bentinck, a clever, scheming governess. Miss Bentinck, however, proves a special providence in spite of herself. An incorrigible and insatiable flirt, she contrives to steal Bell's weak and undesirable fiancé, and so leaves the field open for the true Lubin, the honest, patient, and self-sacrificing lover. Perhaps we have too much of Miss Bentinck and her clandestine interviews with Harcourt. On the whole, however, Milliara must be regarded as a remarkably well-constructed and well-balanced story, and as notable above all things for that "quiet power" of which we hear so much and see so little in present-day fiction.

A Bubble Fortune is one of the slighter efforts of Sarah Tytler's too prosaically middle-class muse. Essentially, at all events, it is an old story—the temptation of a worthy man by means of a fortune which ought really to have been his, the overcoming of the temptation with the help of the worthy man's worthier daughter, and the marriage of the heir to the daughter. The author of Logie Town seemed—nay, was, at one time—fitted to do better work than the manufacture of such commonplace pattern folk of both sexes. But one must take the Harry Newton and the Fanny Newton and the Miles Newton that she draws, and allow them to be more than fairly agreeable people of the Annie Swannish variety. Harry, indeed, falls rather rapidly from his tolerably high intellectual estate to be little better than a Tim Linkinwater. But Miles has a fair amount of spirit, and is not obtrusively Antipodean in the more offensive sense. On the contrary, "he was a man who, practically, did not understand the meaning of the word blasé. He called nothing common or unclean; such terms as 'snob' and 'cad' seldom fell from his lips."

The ultra-fashionably miserable heroine of The Strange Adventures of Anelay Moreland must be allowed to be consistently "fey" from the beginning to the end of that portion of her story which is told by R. Shelton Gresson. Her parents first leave her and then die. She is accused of theft. She is accused of murdering her first husband, and in consequence fails to secure a most eligible second. And all through, one can see she is a being that was made to be loved and petted, and to be married to a Romeo of a young man, and to be happy ever afterwards. What could possibly be nicer—or worse? In addition, everybody in the story is as wretched as he or she well can be, including Lord Kelvar, who ought to have been Anelay's second husband, and who dies immediately after he hears from her own lips—"The man I married was poisoned a few hours after the ill-fated ceremony took place by a woman whom he called his housekeeper, but who was bound to him by a closer tie." There are passages in the book which show that its author can draw minor characters of the "kindly motherly body" sort more than fairly well. But in such a tragedy as this he (or she) is clearly out of her depth.

The supreme, if not the sole, virtue of Sir Randal Roberts's new story is in the fact of its being told in one volume. One is painfully well acquainted with almost every member of its performing troupe of blackguards, fools, and lovers—Darcey Blackstone, the blackleg fortune hunter; Elise de Charmantelle, the siren, swindler, and finally traitress; Mr. Aluminium, the big and vulgar fly, who walks so readily into Elise's parlour; and the very conventional Benedick and Beatrice, Kit Bellenden and Anne Cottesmore. The battle-field is introduced into this book as well as the hunting-field and the paddock, and for this small mercy we ought perhaps to be grateful to the author. It should be allowed, also, that his animal spirits are never exhausted, and never fail to be contagious.

WILLIAM WALLACE.

SOME CLASSICAL TEXTS.

FOR some years past it has been known that Messrs. George Bell & Sons had in preparation a new edition of Walker's Corpus Poetarum Latinorum, under the supervision of Prof. J. P. Postgate. The modern standard of classical scholarship seemed to demand not only a specially prepared text, but also something approaching a complete apparatus criticus. Hence the work has taken much longer time than was anticipated; and the publishers have decided to issue it in four parts, instead of in two volumes. The first part is now before us, consisting of just 300 pages of closely printed quarto pages. It contains Ennius, Lucretius, Catullus, Vergil, Horace, and Tibullus; the second part, completing the Augustan period, is promised early next year. Ennius has naturally been entrusted to Lucian Müller, who has made some slight changes in his own edition of the Fragments (1885), and has prepared a detailed account of the MS. sources, which are especially difficult in this case. H. A. J. Munro had promised to undertake Lucretius. The actual text is that of the third edition of Munro, which was published after his death by Mr. J. D. Duff; but Prof. Postgate has introduced certain changes of orthography, and has augmented the apparatus criticus. For Catullus, Prof. Postgate has made himself responsible, repeating the pretty and cheap edition which he brought out in 1889. The text of Vergil was finished by Prof. Nettleship so far back as 1890; upon the critical introduction he was engaged at the time of his fatal illness. Horace is due to Mr. James Gow, and Tibullus to Edward Hiller, who again has not lived to see his work published. We will only add that Prof. Postgate has indited a Preface to the "kind reader," which it is a pleasure to read; and that the price of all this quantity of Latin literature is only 9s.

Cornelii Taciti Dialogus de Oratoribus. A Revised Text, with Introductory Essays and Critical and Explanatory Notes, by W. Peterson. (Oxford: Clarendon Press.) Mr. Peterson has published an edition of the Dialogus in which, while including and summing-up the results of all previous inquiry, he has made valuable contributions of his own to the reconstruction and the elucidation of the text. It is unfortunate that a cloud of suspicion should hang over the authorship of the treatise, and certainty in the matter is perhaps unattainable with our present means of information; but we cannot help feeling, with Mr. Peterson, that "there seem to be data enough, in spite of difficulties which need not be ignored, for a pretty confident acceptance of the traditional view." Mr. Peterson dwells on the converging probabilities which point to Tacitus as the author, shows at what point of Tacitus' life he might well have turned out just such a piece of work, and insists that the style may quite well and naturally be the style of that man at that time. Yet the theory which attributed the authorship of the Dialogus to Quintilian is not so dead that it can be overlooked; and the present editor has taken a good deal of trouble in meeting the arguments, chiefly based on language, by which Novak has sought to revive it. Andreen, on grounds both of apparent date and actual style, has endeavoured to show it impossible that Tacitus should have written the book; but he does not, as we understand him, go on to find an author for it. Mr. Peterson makes out a good case for rejecting both of these cognate views. If the choice of words and the turn of phrase in the Dialogus remind us often of the Institutio Oratoria, they also recall again and again the Tacitus of the Histories and the Annals; and the verdicts found in the Institutio and the Dialogus do not always coincide.

"For example, there is a slight difference in their estimate of the proemia of Mapalla Corvinus, Vibius Crispus is spoken of with more appreciation by Quintilian than by Tacitus, and Salsus Bassus is credited with a higher degree of poetic perfection by the latter than by the former." On Lucan, too, perhaps, there was a difference of opinion. The style of the Dialogus, says Mr. Peterson, is what might have been expected of a young man (p. xlvii.). Much, therefore, depends on showing that it was written, or at least might have been written, at a date which would leave Tacitus still young; and Mr. Peterson, taking the end of A.D. 74 as the most probable date for the historical groundwork of the treatise, feels forced to infer that it was composed during the good years of Domitian's reign, about 84-5. His argument, though not perfectly conclusive, attains a high degree of probability. The commentary is very full, and evades no sort of difficulty. So much of the needful help in interpretation is given in the well-arranged essay on the "Substance and Scheme of the Dialogue" that there is plenty of room left in the notes for the discussion of difficult passages, and for the adducing of parallel words and thoughts from Cicero or Quintilian or Tacitus himself. That this should be done with thoroughness, as Mr. Peterson has done it, is desirable in connexion with the problem of authorship, but it will also yield a good deal of purely meditative pleasure to ripe scholars. Nemo alicujus rei naturam feliciter perscrutatus in re ipsa, said Bacon; and we do not get all the enjoyment, all the flavour, out of a classical author, especially a latish one, except by ruminating on his words, along with those of many another writer. We find in C. 3 a good example of a passage emended, on conjecture, of course, but yielding an excellent result with a minimum of change. Mr. Peterson reads "Tum ille Intelleges tu quidem quid Maternus sibi debuerit, et agnosces quid audisti." This seems to us preferable to the simple leges, and to the various choice and arrangement of words with which Bahrens, Nipperdey, and Halm have followed it up. At the end of the chapter (where, by the way, he reads "aggregando") Mr. Peterson has, perhaps, put the emphasis on the wrong thing in his explanatory note. Why waste your time on tragedies, Aper says to Maternus, when you might have your hands full of forensic work? "You could hardly meet the demand even if you had kept to the traditional type of tragedy, instead of encumbering yourself" with Roman subjects. But we cannot make out from the Latin that any stress is laid on the Roman type of the tragedy. The novum negotium is like the novam et recentem curam of C. 6, and means merely a fresh task: tragedy-writing in general, not any special sort of it.

The Eighth Book of Thucydides' History. Edited, with Notes and Introduction, by H. C. Goodhart. (Macmillans.) Prof. Goodhart has provided the often despised eighth book of Thucydides with a good and solid commentary, which leaves no difficulty unexplained, or at least unexplored, and which is as useful on the side of historical annotation as on that of the explanation of the text. We are glad to see that, like Prof. Tucker, he stands up boldly for the genuineness of the book which he edits. "There is not," he says, "and never has been, any real possibility of doubt." No one could ever suggest many points of difference between Book VIII. and earlier books. The two differences most commonly alleged are the absence of speeches in Book VIII. and the occurrence of non-Thucydidean expressions. But, as Prof. Jebb argued some time ago, there is very little occasion for speeches in the last book. As to the remarkable expressions, we must distinguish. No book of Thucydides could be genuine unless it did contain a good many words which do not occur in others of the books; and as to the proportion of such strange words,

"the facts are very much the contrary of what is generally asserted. The number of words used in the eighth book and not elsewhere in Thucydides is between 140 and 150, or just about half the number which is found in each of Books I. and II., and fully a quarter less than in any other book except Book V., which has 131."

But as to the harshness and irregularity of expression and the confusion of construction which may be alleged against Book VIII., Mr. Goodhart believes that, while the book has certainly not had the author's final revision, the worst cases are due to corruption in the manuscripts. This line of defence is good; but, after all, how can critics judge of the genuineness of Book VIII. on grounds of style (other than such statistics as Mr. Goodhart has collected), when they are not agreed as to what Thucydides' style was? Against Classen's view, that the characteristic of Thucydides as a writer is his simplicity and naturalness, against Dr. Rutherford's talk about "page after page of the most regular and transparent of styles," we may set Quintilian's judgment of the writer as densus et brevis et semper sibi instans, and insist that no one is to expect from Thucydides freedom from harshness. In fact, did any reader of Thucydides ever fail to appreciate the parody of his manner—"Pigs is a hard thing to drive especially many by one man very?" Another strong point of Mr. Goodhart's piece of work is his careful comparison of Thucydides' account of the revolution of the four hundred with that given in the Ἀθηναίων Πολιτεία ascribed to Aristotle. The upshot of his comparison is that, though "Aristotle's account introduces new difficulties, and somewhat uncomfortably disturbs our confidence in the completeness if not in the accuracy of Thucydides' narrative," yet the two accounts may on the whole stand side by side. No two accounts of an historical event do agree perfectly: our own authorities do not give the same version of the battle of Tel el Kebir. But Aristotle and Thucydides are rather complementary than contradictory of each other. The latter deals only with the temporary and transitional arrangements of 411 B.C.; the former expounds the more elaborate constitution which the authors of the revolution meant to have ultimately established. It is curious that, while in c. 63, Mr. Goodhart has the usual reading ἐς ἀλγερχίαν ἐλθεῖν, he yet prints and translates on p. xix. ἐς δ. κατέλθειν.

Herodotus VIII., with Introduction and Notes, by E. S. Shuckburgh. (Cambridge: University Press.) It is peculiarly important, when a single book of Herodotus or Thucydides is edited, that the reader should be made clearly to understand that what he reads is only a part of a very highly wrought whole. The nature of the whole work, the links which bind its parts together, and the place of the part selected for special treatment, require to be plainly set forth. Mr. Shuckburgh has done full justice to this aspect of the task before him, as well as to the difficulties of the text and the features of the New Ionic dialect. His unusually full account of what has previously happened in the great quarrel of East and West puts the reader exactly where he ought to be for understanding the course of events in the eighth book; and when he has read that marvellous chronicle, it will not be the fault of either Herodotus or the present editor if he do not look forward with keen interest to what is to come in Book IX. The commentary is like Mr. Shuckburgh's other work: it is thoroughly honest and, therefore, very useful. He is not one of those editors who find a virtue in indecision, and students who go to work with him will feel that they are in the hands of a competent and clear-headed critic. But he cannot, any more than other historians, remove completely the difficulties about the position of the oracle of Delphi in 480 and 479 B.C. Why did it adopt a discouraging tone when Athens applied for advice? and why, having adopted that tone, did it modify its answer under pressure of importunity? The former question may be answered by Prof. Mahaffy's suggestion, that the priests hoped, by gaining the favour of Xerxes, their certain master as they thought, to remain under him a wealthy and protected corporation. Or we may admit that Mr. Shuckburgh's opinion is quite plausible, that the priests, being usually under Spartan influence, took the Peloponnesian view—that to save Northern Greece was impossible, and the only hope was to abandon it and defend the Isthmus of Corinth. But then, on either hypothesis, why did these prudent priests change their tone and give Themistocles the lever he wanted for working on Athenian feeling? Also, how can Mardonios have declared so pointedly (in ix. 42) that we, the Persians, will not touch Delphi, and therefore need not dread the gods of the land, after the attempt already made to seize the oracle and its treasures which is described in viii. 35-39?

Euripides: Bacchæ. Edited by A. H. Cruickshank. (Oxford: Clarendon Press.) The modern schoolboy is hard to satisfy if an edition like this fails to meet his needs. It is prepared by a thoroughly sound scholar, himself a schoolmaster, and well acquainted with the editions of Kirchhoff, Paley, Sandys, Tyrrell, Elmsley, and Wecklein. It is excellently printed, with full notes, dealing with grammatical difficulties, questions of metre, and various lectiones; plenty of parallel passages are adduced, and two indices at the end. This is clearly enough help—possibly too much, but that is the fashion of the day. The editor has allowed Goodwin's grammatical views, e.g., on l. 343, to filter into his notes, which is not the case with many school editions in which the old-fashioned views still appear, and give boys a good deal to unlearn later. We do not think the grammatical note on l. 33 is clear enough for a schoolboy's use; and the rendering of l. 647 seems clumsy. The question of the dropped augment is discussed on l. 767; but should not the other instances in the play—ll. 129, 563, 1084, 1134—have been collected, and a complete note compounded? In the introduction (p. 9) it is said that "we do not much sympathise with the fate of Pentheus." We think a boy does so: Pentheus is wrong-headed in a most British way, while Dionysus is typically Greek. Might not the division into scenes, here only given in the notes, and some slight stage directions, be wisely printed at the side of the Greek text, as in Mr. Sidgwick's Scenes from Greek Plays?

NOTES AND NEWS.

WE are requested to state that Lord Tennyson, who is at Farringford engaged upon the memoir of his father, wishes to borrow all letters of the late Laureate which are not formal notes written in the third person. As soon as he has copied such letters as may be intrusted to him, he will return them to the lenders.

WE hear that the new edition of the Correspondence of Edward Fitzgerald which Mr. W. Aldis Wright has in hand will contain something like fifty new letters; and that Mr. Edward Clodd has also been entrusted with some hitherto unpublished letters of Fitzgerald for an article which he is writing for the English Illustrated Magazine.

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN, as Empress of India, has been pleased to accept the dedication of a second series of Indian Stories (Indian Nights' Entertainment), by the Rev. Charles Swynnerton, chaplain on the Afghan Frontier. The volume, which will be illustrated, as in the former series, by native hands, will comprise some remarkable legends of the Paladin type.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. announce for publication next year a History of the Church in the First Six Centuries, by Archdeacon Cheetham, of Rochester.

THE same publishers will shortly issue a volume of essays on Contemporary Thought and Thinkers, by Mr. R. H. Hutton, reprinted from the Spectator.

MESSRS. KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRUBNER & Co. will issue immediately Living English Poets, with a frontispiece by Mr. Herbert Railton. It forms a handsome volume, printed on hand-made paper and bound in parchment, like a volume with a very similar title which was issued by this firm just eleven years ago.

MESSRS. SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & Co. announce for immediate publication Russia's March towards India, in two volumes, with a new map of Central Asia showing the disputed territory.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN will publish immediately the new volume of the "Pseudonym Library." It is by John Oliver Hobbes, all of whose other works have been published in the same series. A Bundle of Life, as the new story is called, will contain, in the form of a dedication and an epilogue, two pretty poems by the author.

MR. LESLIE KEITH's new novel, Liabeth, will be published in three volumes by Messrs. Cassell & Co., about December 12.

"THE ETHICAL LIBRARY" is the name of a new series of books, whose main purpose is to deal with the most prominent questions of the inner and outer life, which have been hitherto regarded as the monopoly of the theologian, from the point of view, and in the spirit, of the student of philosophy. Though the problems which will be discussed are old ones, the manner of treatment will be comparatively new, inasmuch as no doctrinal assumptions will be made with which the student of science and philosophy need find himself out of sympathy. The first volume, by Dr. Bernard Bosanquet, entitled The Civilisation of Christendom and Other Studies, is now ready; early volumes will appear from the pens of Mr. Leslie Stephen, Prof. A. Sidgwick, Mr. David G. Ritchie, Dr. Sophie Bryant, and Mr. J. H. Muirhead, the editor. The London publishers are Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein & Co., and simultaneous editions will be issued by the New York house of Messrs. Macmillan & Co.

Round the World by the Doctor's Orders is the title of an illustrated volume of travel, by Mr. John Dale, announced for publication by Mr. Elliot Stock. The same firm will issue immediately a novel by Miss Constance Serjeant, entitled A Three-Fold Mystery, the scene of which is laid in Monte Carlo.

MR. HENRY J. DRANE will publish in a few days a collection of papers and stories, in two volumes, by Mr. W. W. Fenn, entitled Twixt the Lights: Odd Tales for Odd Times, with a frontispiece by Louise Jopling.

MESSRS. WILLIAM ANDREWS & Co., of Hull, will publish in a few days Biblical and Shaksperian Characters Compared, by the Rev. James Bell.

A THIRD edition of Mr. Frankfort Moore's new novel, A Gray Eye or So, will be ready next week. Messrs. Appleton, of New York, have arranged to include the book in their "Town and Country Library."

MR. STANLEY WEYMAN will contribute the leading serial to the Monthly Packet for 1894. The title is "My Lady Rotha," and the story deals with the period of the Thirty Years' War.

IN next week's number of Cassell's Saturday Journal will be commenced a series of articles on the romance, reality, and revelations of railway life, by Mr. Max Pemberton. The first article will be entitled "Red Lights—and After!"

THE Harleian Society is now issuing two volumes containing the Hampshire Allegations for Marriage Licences which were granted by the Bishops of Winchester between 1689 and 1837, edited by Mr. W. J. C. Moens; and also, to the members belonging to the register section, the Registers and Monumental Inscriptions at Charterhouse Chapel, edited by Dr. Collins.

At a meeting held on November 7, the council of the Hakluyt Society elected Lord Aberdare a vice-president of the society, and the Hon. G. N. Curzon and Mr. E. Delmar Morgan members of the council. Mr. William Foster, of the Record Department, India Office, was at the same time appointed hon. secretary, in succession to Mr. Delmar Morgan.

At the meeting of the London Ethical Society, to be held in Essex Hall, Strand, on Sunday, December 3, Mr. Leslie Stephen will deliver a lecture on "The Advantages of Competition."

At the meeting of the Elizabethan Society, to be held at Toynbee Hall on Wednesday next, Mr. Lionel Johnson will read a paper entitled "Sir Philip Sidney's Defence of Poetry, and Elizabethan Conceptions of Art in general."

A MEETING of the Bibliographical Society was held at 20 Hanover-square, on November 20. In the absence of Dr. Copinger, the chair was taken by Mr. Henry Wheatley. A paper was read by Mr. Redgrave on "Erhart Ratdolt and his Work at Venice," in which the interesting conjecture was put forward that Ratdolt, whose first publication was the Kalendar of Johannes Regiomontanus (1476) may have been employed by the mathematician during the short time that he was himself a printer. In the discussion which followed, Mr. Weale mentioned several facts as to Ratdolt's methods which have hitherto escaped notice in England. The paper was illustrated with a peculiarly fine collection of Ratdolt's works, brought by Mr. Redgrave from his own library. A copy of the Appian, with the border in red instead of the more usual black, attracted special attention.

A CORRESPONDENT writes:—We read in Sir Herbert Maxwell's Life and Times of the Right Hon. W. H. Smith, just published by Messrs. Blackwoods (i. 84.):—

"To one long connected with the house, . . . Smith remarked: 'God bless all I touch. I think there must be some truth in the motto on my father's seal—Deo non fortuna fretus.'"

To this the editor appends a footnote, giving—apparently in cold blood, and not by way of (Scottish) joke—the following translation of the motto into English: "Freighted not by fortune but by God."

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

NEXT Tuesday, the vexed question of English will again come up for consideration at Oxford. In order to obtain a definite expression of opinion, two alternative resolutions will be submitted to the vote of Congregation: 1) for the establishment of an honour school; 2) for the establishment of a scholarship, with a subsidiary list of those candidates who may have passed with distinction or with credit. This second alternative, it will be remembered, represents the report of a committee of Council on the subject.

On the same day, a decree will be proposed appointing Dr. J. S. Haldane, now assistant to Prof. Burdon Sanderson, to the University office of lecturer in physiology for a term of three years, terminable only by the action of the vice-chancellor and proctors upon reasonable grounds.

THE following have been re-appointed as university lecturers at Cambridge for a further term of five years: Mr. W. Gardner and Mr. A. C. Seward, both in botany; Mr. E. G. Browne in Persian; and Dr. Hill, in advanced human anatomy.

MR. R. P. GRENFELL, of Queen's College, has been elected to the Craven fellowship at Oxford, which is now in the nature of an endowment for classical research abroad for a period of two years. We believe that the special subject to which Mr. Grenfell proposes to devote himself is Greek palaeography, following the example of the last Craven fellow from the same college, Mr. T. W. Allen.

THE scholarship of the British School at Athens, offered to the University of Oxford, has not been awarded.

PROF. MAX MÜLLER will deliver two public lectures at Oxford next week, on Thursday and Saturday, upon "Ancient Prayers"; the Rev. Dr. Mills will lecture (subject to certain contingencies) on Wednesday, at the Indian Institute, upon "The Religion of the Zend Avesta in its relation to Christianity"; and Mr. D. G. Hogarth will give a lecture, also on Wednesday, upon "The Proposed Exploration in Asia Minor," illustrated with lantern-views from Mr. Munro's photographs.

At a meeting of the Cambridge Philological Society, held on Thursday of this week, Prof. Henry Sidgwick was to read a paper on "The Interpretation of the Ἀθηναίων Πολιτεία (c. ii.), in its bearing on the Tenure of Land at Athens in the Time of Solon."

THE Oxford Magazine prints a report of a paper recently read by Mr. Falconer Madan, on "The Past History of Science at Oxford." Part of it was devoted to rehabilitating the shadowy figure of Roger Bacon; and it was suggested that the meeting of the British Association at Oxford next year (just six hundred years after the probable date of his death) would be a fitting occasion for printing in full, for the first time, the last of his works, Compendium Studii Theologiae.

MR. JAMES MACKINTOSH has been elected to the chair of civil law at Edinburgh, vacant by the transfer of Prof. Goudy to Oxford.

WE extract the following analysis of results of the recent examinations at London University from the University Correspondent:—Out of 375 candidates for the B.A. degree, only 154 passed; out of 150 candidates for the B.Sc. degree, only 65 passed. For the former examination the most successful institutions seem to have been Aberystwith, Bangor, Cardiff, Holloway and Birmingham, Borough-road, Cheltenham, and Bedford College; for the latter, University College, London, stands easily first, with eleven successful candidates.

The tenth annual meeting of the University Association of Women Teachers was held at University Hall, Gordon-square, on November 25. Miss Haigh, head mistress of the Reading High School, presided. In her opening speech Miss Haigh expressed satisfaction at the growth and success of the Association. She suggested the advisability of having local branches, which might organise lectures open to the public, and so increase the usefulness of the Association, and at the same time make it more widely known. The report presented to the meeting showed an increase of 64 in the number of members, which now reaches a total of 490.

PART III. of Archæologia Oxoniensis (London: Frowde) contains some interesting "Notes on the Heraldry of the Oxford Colleges," by Mr. Percival Landon. It appears that the University has always claimed immunity from the jurisdiction of the College of Arms, under the terms of a charter first granted by Henry III.

"The results of this immunity show themselves in one or two curious ways: chiefly in the coats 'in tierce,' of which there is no other illustration in modern English heraldry; but more noticeably in the fact that, of all the colleges in Oxford, the arms of two or three only are habitually represented correctly or even uniformly."

The arms of the University, in their present familiar form, cannot be traced back earlier than the fifteenth century. An open book is the conventional charge of any university; three golden crowns are the arms traditionally ascribed to St. Edmund; the legend inscribed upon the open book has undergone many changes. One of the earliest forms was "Veritas liberabit Bonitas regnabit" others were "Sapientia et Felicitate," and "In Principio erat Verbum et Verbum erat Deus." The present motto seems not to have been regularly adopted before 1640. On some old representations, various kinds of supporters are to be found. Mr. Landon then proceeds to discuss the arms of the following colleges: University (which can produce no authority for its four martlets, as the arms of Alfred), Christ Church, Balliol, Queen's, and All Souls. We may add that Mr. Landon has sent the following correction to the Oxford Magazine:

"On page 152, for 'up to the year 1515, the arms of the See of York were the keys and papal mitre of St. Peter . . . but Wolsley altered them to . . . read 'The ancient arms of the See of York (though the cross keys and crown are occasionally found) were identical with those of Canterbury, but Wolsey probably caused the final adoption of . . .'"

ORIGINAL VERSE.

ON A PORTRAIT BY SEBASTIANO DEL PIOMBO, IN THE TRIBUNA DEGLI UFFIZI, FLORENCE.

WHAT thoughts are those in dreamy slumber bound,

O nameless singer of forgotten lays
Yet garlanded with ever-living bays,

That give thy face a purport so profound?
What novel charm have thy sweet musings found?

What lights of dying and of dawning days
Cross in the shadowed splendour of thy gaze?
What triumph saw thee as its victress crowned?

Thoughts of the old time and its chivalry,
Thoughts of the new time and its strange Greek lore,

Gleams of a world beyond the western sea,
The sunset of a faith whose reign was o'er,
The dawn of knowledge that has made us free,
All that has come and all that comes no more.

ALFRED W. BENN.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE greater part of the Boletín of the Real Academia de la Historia for November is occupied with an examination and illustration, by Padre Fita, of papers by Isidore Loeb and H. Graetz, on the secret instructions of the Inquisition, entitled "Censura et Confutatio Libri Talmudi." Padre Fita fixes the date to 1488. He says (p. 406) that the law of Recesvint, forbidding Jews to give evidence in criminal cases, was in force up to that date. Is not this true of Castille only? In several of the Fueros and Capitulations the testimony of Jews is allowed, and the oath to be taken is given at length in the Fueros de Navarra. F. Codera prints an Arabic inscription of the eleventh century, lately found in the chapel of St. Catherine, Toledo; he also mentions Spanish-Arabic books in the library of Algiers, and gives the titles of sixty-six others lately acquired by the Academia. F. Coello carefully traces out a Roman road, not mentioned in the Itineraries, from Sigüenza to Chinchilla.

NOTES ON TWO RECENT EDITIONS OF WORDSWORTH.

V.

Dublin.

But it is high time for us to be getting on to another branch of our subject. We have here, of course, done no more than indicate a few out of many instances where Prof. Dowden has dropped a brief but important hint regarding the character of the text-variation he is recording; but we trust that we have succeeded in exciting the interest of the reader to the extent of leading him to search for other instances of a like nature through the seven volumes of the Aldine edition. If he does this, he will be rewarded by coming frequently upon some valuable observation on the textual changes, such as those we have been quoting, or that which stands below the list of pentimenti found on p. 261 of vol. ii.—

"The stream came thundering down the dell,
And gallop'd loud and fast." 1800.

"The Torrent thundered down the dell
With unabating haste." 1815.

"The Torrent thundered down the dell
With aggravated haste." 1827.

"The stream came thundering down the dell
With aggravated haste." 1836.

"The Torrent down the rocky dell Came thundering loud and fast." 1842—whereupon Prof. Dowden comments as follows: "Boldness in these readings was followed by tameness, by infelicity, and, finally, by felicity."

In a note upon the "Excursion" (Aldine Ed. vol. vi., p. 348) Prof. Dowden speaks of certain words as affording an indirect clue to the date of the edition in which they occur, according to the special conditions and limitations under which they are found to be employed. Such words, he says, are "frame," "sweet," "towards," &c., with regard to which we know that Wordsworth's ideas regarding their proper use and value underwent, as years went by, certain definite modifications. It may help us to understand something of the severely accurate logic by which the poet ever strove to regulate his use of the vocabulary—the raw material, so to speak, of his poetry—if we now endeavour, with the aid of Prof. Dowden's Notes for the Minor Poems, and those of Prof. Knight and Mr. J. R. Tutin (P. W., vol. v.) for the "Excursion," to trace the history of one or two of the words specified above, as employed by Wordsworth throughout the long period of his poetic activity.

I. FRAME.—The history of "frame" furnishes us with an apt illustration of the curious fancy which Wordsworth seems, from time to time, to have taken to a certain word—a fancy which, sooner or later, his good sense and sound logic were pretty sure to lead him to abandon, even though this entailed upon him the irksome necessity of effecting a change in several places of his text. The word "frame" is found in at least forty-two passages here and there throughout the poems; in thirty-two of these as a verb, in ten as a substantive. It occurs in "Peter Bell" (1798), though here its insertion into the text may very likely belong to a much later time; in "Michael" (1800); in the Sonnet "To Lady Beaumont" (1807); in the second Sonnet "To Sleep" (1806?); in the "White Doe" (1807); in the "Song at the Feast of Brougham Castle" (1807); in No. 2 of the "Coleorton Inscriptions" (1811); in No. 3 of the same (1811); in the "View from the Top of Black Comb" (1813); in "To H. C., Six Years Old" (reading of 1815); in the "Thanksgiving Day Ode" (1816); in "The Waggoner" (1819); in Sonnet II. xxv. of the Miscellaneous Series (1820?); in "Ecclesiastical Sonnets,"

I. xiv. (1822); and in the 1827 version of the third stanza of the "Emigrant Mother." But it is when we come to examine the "Excursion" that we meet with the main evidence of Wordsworth's strong, though short-lived, partiality to this word. In the "Excursion" it is actually employed in at least twenty-seven places; and employed, too, with an exceptionally wide scope of signification, some of the senses borne by it being what everyone must admit to be unusual, if not strained. This was in 1814, or rather, let us say, in the period reaching from 1810 to 1814, these being the years in which the greater part of the "Excursion" was composed, and the whole finally got ready for the press. But Wordsworth's fancy for the word, though hot enough for the time, was not after all very long in cooling; seeing that in the course of the very earliest revision to which the "Excursion" was subjected,* viz., that of 1827, "frame" and its family ("framing," "framed," &c.) were ruthlessly banished from not less than twenty-two of the twenty-seven places already mentioned. A twenty-third eviction followed in 1836, thus leaving but four, out of the entire number of places in the "Excursion" where the word was originally found, in which it was—and to the present day continues to be—retained. Meanwhile, the like process of eviction was carried out in the case of the Minor Poems: seven changes of this nature taking place in 1827, one in 1832, and three in 1836—ten in all; leaving but four, out of the original fifteen places, in which the word was permitted still to stand. Thus—to give the result in one word—of the total number (forty-two) of places in which "frame," or one of its derivatives, originally stood in Wordsworth's text, there are but eight in which it has contrived to escape the drastic revisions carried out by the poet in the years 1827-1836.

But why was all this trouble taken to get rid of a word which contains no element of offence, and can boast of a respectable and well-attested English descent? The explanation, we believe, lies herein; that it seemed to Wordsworth, on mature reflection, that in most of the passages into which he had introduced his pet word, he had put it to a use which failed to stand the rigorous after-test of logic and good sense. The verb "frame" is one with the Mid. Eng. fremen and the Anglo-Saxon fremman, to "promote," "set up," "effect," "do"; literally, to "further," since fremman comes from the A.-S. adj. fram "strong," "good" "well set up," lit. "forward," the adjective itself originating in A.-S. prep., fram, "from," "away," "forth from." The origin of "frame" (subst.) is, of course, identical with that of "frame" (verb). Hence it is clear that the strict meaning of the word is to "construct from below or within," to "set up," or "project"; the special notion implied being that of an underlying structure of several parts set up with the object of supporting an upper or outer covering or integument—in short of a "framework" in the proper sense of that term. Such a framework is found in the system of cross-beams and rafters which holds up the roof of a house; and it is found, too, in the complex structure of bones, &c., which supports our bodies and which we call the human frame or skeleton. Now, of the eight passages in which the word "frame" is retained throughout by Wordsworth, four exhibit the word as a substantive, signifying "the bodily frame," viz., "Michael," ll. 43, 44; 454, 455; "Excursion" IV., ll. 165-6; VI., 1025; VIII., ll. 321-324; and two exhibit the word as a verb bearing the special, proper signification defined above. These two passages are—

* In the ed. of 1820 the changes introduced were very few and unimportant, by no means amounting to what might justly be termed a revision of the text.

"Ye Lime-trees . . . be not slow a stately growth to rear
Of pillars, branching off from year to year
Till they have learned to frame a darksome aisle"—

"Coleorton Inscription," No. III.

and—

" . . . Where the rock and wall
Met in an angle, hung a penthouse, framed
By thrusting two rude staves into the wall
And overlaying them with mountain sods"—

In the first of these two passages the idea conveyed is that of the formation of a regular framework of rafters by the meeting branches of the double row of lime trees for the support of the leafy roof above; and, in the second, it is that of the construction of a penthouse or sloping shed by means of two staves erected against a wall and overlaid with sods of turf. There remain two other passages to be accounted for: in these the word is apparently used in the sense of "compose," "invent," "construct." One occurs in "Miscellaneous Sonnets" I., xiii., 3, "The very sweetest [words] Fancy culls or frames"; and the other in the "Song for the Feast of Brougham Castle," l. 162, where edd. 1807—1842 read, "That for a tranquil Soul the Lay was framed," and the subsequent edd. read, "How by Heaven's grace this Clifford's heart was framed" (in this latter version the word is manifestly equivalent to "constructed," "formed," "moulded").

Thus we see that in six out of the eight places where he has retained the word "frame," Wordsworth employs it in the strict and proper sense specially belonging to it. On the other hand, out of all the thirty-three passages from which the word was ousted during the period 1827-1836 there is not one in which it is thus correctly and appropriately employed. As a verb, it is used in the sense of "to shape" (Misc. Son. II., xviii.; Coleorton Inscr. II., 15; Excurs. VII., 359); "to build" (Excurs. V. 14; IV., 203; VI., 780); "to compose," "invent" (e.g., a poem, a book, a ceremonial service: cf. "White Doe," l. 1832; Excurs. IV., 105; "Thanksgiving Ode," l. 226); "to design" (Excurs. III., 472; VIII., 224; V., 990); "to form" or "afford" (Excurs. VII., 599; IX., 567); as a substantive it signifies "body" (Eccles. Son. I., xxv.), "outline" ("View from Black Comb," l. 25), "form," "shape" (Excurs. VIII., 504), "character," "essence" (Excurs. II., 710). These various significations are all more or less vague, loose, and remote; one or two of them being quite inappropriate and strained. For example, it is surely a scarcely permissible use of the word to write, "Do we behold the frame of Erin's coast?" putting "frame" in the sense of "line" or "outline"; nor is it much more appropriate to say, "Gifted with a power to yield music of finer frame," when the word is apparently equivalent to "character," "essence" ("music composed of finer elements"). So that the conclusion appears fairly established that, in making this wholesale clearance of "frame" and its kindred from his text in 1827, Wordsworth was mainly influenced by the desire to bring his style as far as possible into agreement with the conditions imposed by sound logic and good sense. We must not omit to call attention to one curious point in this history. In 1827—the very year in which he carried out such a sweeping process of banishment against "frame" and its tribe—we find the poet introducing a variation into the third stanza of the "Emigrant Mother," in such wise as to bring into the poem the very word he was so busily engaged in removing from other passages of his poetry. In 1820 the lines ran—

"Once did I see her take with fond embrace
This infant to herself; and I, next day,"—

This Wordsworth altered, in 1827, to—

"Once having seen her take with fond embrace
This infant to herself, I framed a lay"—

It certainly looks very strange that the word should be introduced here, while it was being struck out of so many other passages throughout the poems. But perhaps Wordsworth made this particular alteration long before 1827. He may have made it in 1821, for instance, or shortly after; and he may then have suffered the alteration so made to stand, on the ground that the sense in which the word "frame" is employed in it is absolutely identical with that in which it occurs in a passage where it has been allowed to stand all through, namely, in line 162 of the "Song at the Feast of Brougham Castle": "That for a tranquil Soul the Lay was framed." Notwithstanding, Wordsworth cannot have felt altogether satisfied with this use of the word, for in 1837 he took the trouble of altering a passage in the "White Doe" (l. 1032), which had previously run thus: "A mortal song we frame," to "A mortal song we sing."

II. TOWARDS.—This word is one of a fairly numerous class of adjectival adverbs of the genitive form, including "forwards," "upwards," "backwards," "inwards," "outwards," &c., the corresponding accusative forms being "toward," "forward," "upward," &c. ("Towards" and "toward" are, of course, used not only as adverbs, but as prepositions also.) The adverbs "amongst," "amidst," &c., are of a like character to the genitive forms ending in s, the t in these and similar words being merely euphonic (cf. O.E. alongst = along, onest = once). Now, during the successive revisions of 1827, 1832, and 1836, Wordsworth, who from the first, used the genitive and the accusative forms indifferently, frequently cut off the final s or t from the adverbial forms "downwards," "towards," "upwards," "amongst," "amidst," "betwixt," and the like, where he thought that the harmony of the verse could be enhanced in this manner. Instances in plenty will be given lower down of the change from "towards" to "toward" here and there throughout the "Excursion." Here it must suffice to refer to line 15 of "Yarrow Unvisited," where "downwards" was in ed. 1832 altered to "downward"; to "Excursion" IX. 352, where "amongst" was, in ed. 1836-7, altered to "among"; and to the following instances of the change from "betwixt" to "between"—line 24 of "She was a Phantom of delight"; line 60 of "The Affliction of Margaret"; line 13 of the third sonnet, "To Sleep" (these three changes dating from 1832); line 33 of "Joanna" (1836); "Excursion" IX., 254 (1836); VII., 336 (1836); and line 29 of "Alice Fell" (1843). But this elision of the final s or t is after all a matter of trifling moment; and had we nothing further to say concerning "towards," than that it frequently, in and after 1827, suffered the loss of its final consonant for reasons of euphony, we would never have thought it necessary to write a note on the subject. There is, however, another, and that a very interesting feature in Wordsworth's dealings with this word, on which we have something not unimportant to say. In Wordsworth's writings of an earlier date, "towards" is invariably treated as a dissyllable. But, as time went by, a complete revolution took place in the poet's practice in this particular; and from 1836 onwards "towards" may be fairly said to be treated as a monosyllable in every passage where it is to be found. The history of this revolution is pretty much as follows.

"To-wards" is found in line 31 of "The Old Cumberland Beggar"; in ll. 440 and 1111 of "Peter Bell"; in line 6 of "Joanna"; in l. 69 of "The Kitten and Falling Leaves"; in l. 36 of "Fidelity"; in l. 41 of the fourth poem, "To the Daisy"; in l. 100 of "The Blind Highland Boy"; in l. 146 of "Laodamia"; in l. 218 of the "Thanksgiving Day Ode"; in l. 5 of the second "Ode to Lycoris"; in l. 5 of "Ecclesiastical Sonnets" I., ix.; in l. 9 of "Ecclesiastical Sonnets" III., xxxv.; and in at least the eleven following passages of the "Excursion":—I., 707; II., 154; II., 90; II., 589; II., 638; III., 478; IV., 396; VI., 471; VII., 49; VII., 494; I., 846. These instances range in date from 1797 to 1822, in which latter year the "Ecclesiastical Sonnets" were composed. Even so late as 1822, then, Wordsworth occasionally employed the word "towards" as a dissyllable. But, in the meantime, he had begun to use the word as a monosyllable also. The earliest instance of this latter use which we can find occurs in a sonnet of the political series composed in 1810 ("Poems Dedicated to National Independence" II., xxviii., 9):—

"And piety tow'rds God. Such men of old"—

In the "Excursion," which was for the most part written in the years 1800-1813, "tow'rds" occurs at least eleven times as a monosyllable, and in one passage the word, used monosyllabically, is actually printed in full—"towards." This is in IV. 506, "The Solitary lifted towards the hills"; but in every other place where the word has a monosyllabic value only, it is, in the original edition of 1814, as well as in the octavo of 1820, invariably printed "tow'rds," and this is the form in which, with but one exception, it appears in the collective edition of 1820 also. In the version of "Peter Bell" given in this said edition of 1820, line 553 is altered from its original purport, "So, faltering not in this intent," to the shape which it has ever since retained, "So toward the stream his head he bent," where "toward," as a monosyllable, is printed in full. This, however, is, as we have said, quite exceptional, the normal form of the word in ed. 1820, when representing one syllable only, being the abbreviated one, "tow'rd." We now come to ed. 1827. In that edition a wholesale revolutionary process was begun, which was virtually carried out to completion in ed. 1836, whereby the word "towards," in every place where it was originally employed by the poet as a dissyllable—whether in the Minor Poems or in the "Excursion"—was either retained with a monosyllabic value, or else removed from the passage altogether. The carrying out of this process involved the alteration of twenty-four distinct places—of eleven, that is, in the "Excursion," and of thirteen in the Minor Poems. In 1827 the alteration was effected in five places, and in 1832 in one; but in 1836 it was accomplished in no fewer than fifteen places, leaving but three to be still attempted. These three, finally, were successively carried out, one by one, in 1843, in 1845, and in 1849 (they were Excur. IV., 396; I., 846; VI., 471).

This was a troublesome process. It was accomplished in several ways—now by substituting two adverbs (or prepositions) for the dissyllabic "to-wards," as, for example, "forth to" ("Peter Bell," l. 1111); "down to" ("Highland Boy," l. 100); "so with" (Eccles. Son. III., xxxv.); "when in" (Excur. I., 707); "full on" (Excur. III., 478); "straight toward" (Excur. VI., 494); "forth towards" (Thanks. Day Ode, l. 218); and now by replacing it with a verb of motion, e.g., "seeking" ("Laodamia" l. 146); "watches" ("Old Cumberland Beggar," l. 31); "following" ("Fidelity," l. 36); "to meet" ("Joanna," l. 6); "drawn towards" (Excur. IV., 396); "led towards" (Excur. VII., 49); "raised toward" (Excur. II., 154). In other instances the whole sentence was recast, and the obnoxious dissyllable thus got rid of. At the same time, as if to emphasise his lately-formed opinion that "towards" must be regarded as being strictly and properly a monosyllable, Wordsworth altered the printing of the words from "tow'rds"—the shape in which it appears in edd. 1814 and 1820—to "towards" or (more often) "toward." Thus we find "toward" for "tow'rds" five times in 1827, twice in 1832, and twice in 1836 (it is unnecessary to trouble the reader with the exact references to these instances). Again, we find "tow'rds" of 1814, altered in 1832 to "tow'rd," and again altered to "toward" in 1836 (Excur. VI., 857). Occasionally, though rarely, the final s is preserved, as in Excur. VII., 398, where "tow'rds" of 1814 becomes "towards" in 1836. It will be noticed that there are a few straggling instances of "tow'rds" to be found in edd. 1827 and 1832: in fact, it was not until the appearance of the stereotyped edition in 1836-7 that this abbreviated form of the word was finally got rid of, and the full forms "towards," "toward," finally established in possession. This concludes, we believe, all that there is to be said on the subject of "towards."

III. SOMBRE.—The word "sombre" or "sombrous" was originally found in six different places of Wordsworth's poetry. The following quotations give the earlier reading in each instance:—

1. "Where, mixed with graceful birch, the sombrous pine
And yew-tree o'er the silver rocks recline."
"Evening Walk," ll. 156-7.
2. "The cypress waves her sombre plume."
"Eclipse of the Sun," 1820, l. 63.
3. "Brightening with waterbreaks the sombre ghyll."—"Evening Walk," l. 72.
4. "Heard them, unchecked by sight of sombre hue."—Sonnet composed at Rydal, "May Morning," 1838.
5. "Through paths and alleys roofed with sombre green."—"Duddon Sonnets" II., 12.
6. "And like a star that, from a sombre cloud."
"Itinerary Series," 1833, No. X.

The word has been retained by Wordsworth in the first and second of these passages; it has been got rid of in the remaining four instances, "hollow" being substituted for it in No. 3, "saddening" in No. 4, "darkest" in No. 5, and "heavy" in No. 6. In this particular treatment of the word we have another illustration of the rigour with which Wordsworth discarded every usage that appeared to him inconsistent with the strict requirements of propriety and good sense. The word "sombre" is evidently connected in some way or other through the French with the Latin umbra. Diez derives the French word sombre from sub umbra; Littré derives it from ex umbra, and to this latter derivation Skeat appears somewhat to incline. In either case, the word "sombre" will most appropriately mean "shady," or "shaded," or "over-shadowing." When preparing his poems for the edition of 1845, it appears to have occurred to Wordsworth that the word "sombre" should not be employed in poetry, as it so often is in prose and in our common speech, in the sense of "dark," "dusky," "dull," but that its use should be carefully restricted to such places where it could bear the meaning most appropriate to it in virtue of its etymology, namely, that of "giving or affording shade." Accordingly, in that year he altered the line of the Duddon Sonnet, and also that of the Rydal "May Morning" Sonnet of 1838. The passage in the sonnet of the Itinerary Series of 1833 had been altered already in 1843, and l. 72 of the "Evening Walk" had been corrected in 1836.

IV. SWEET.—Wordsworth's original text is absolutely infested with this word; nor was it until he was preparing his poems for the edition of 1827 that he saw the necessity there was for thinning out the crop. Very likely it was the recollection of something Coleridge had said that induced him to remove the word from certain of the passages in which it stood. We know at least that Coleridge censured Lamb for an excessive use of such adjectives as "charming," "admirable," "exquisite," &c., on the ground that such words are expressive of feelings rather than vehicles of ideas; and he would probably have condemned the incessant use of "sweet" on the same grounds. Anyhow, in 1827, Wordsworth removed the word from ten places in the poems; in 1832 from one place; in 1836 from ten; in 1843 from one, and in 1845 from three. Thus "sweet" was removed from twenty-five places in all. Even after this vigorous weeding out, the word is still frequently found up and down throughout the poems. The opinion quoted above as having been given by S. T. C. to Lamb will be found in Lamb's Letters, vol. i., p. 9 (Ainger's edition).

But it is high time for us to make an end of our remarks. In the course of this paper we expressed regret at one or two omissions made by Prof. Dowden. It is only fair, however, to recollect that an editor is to be judged according to what he explicitly undertakes to do; and most certainly Prof. Dowden had not taken upon him the task of supplying such information as we regretted the absence of. Therefore, although we regret that it is not to be found in his notes, we cannot attach the slightest blame to the editor for the omission. So, too, although we may unite with the Athenaeum critic in regretting the absence of full information regarding the source of the quotations embodied in Wordsworth's poetry, we must not suppose that this is due to any deficiency of zeal or industry on Prof. Dowden's part. His notes could not be made to contain everything, and, moreover, he was under the necessity of cutting these notes as short as possible, so as to bring the work within the limits of seven volumes. As it is, the edition, as originally projected, was to have been one of five volumes; and, if we do not mistake, it was at first advertised as such. All this serves to show how necessary it was for Prof. Dowden to avoid going in any direction outside the limits he had imposed on himself. These limits he has laid down in his Preface; and it must be confessed that, within them, he has amply fulfilled everything that he undertook to do. Instead, therefore, of grumbling over the omissions, we ought to be thankful for what we have got, and welcome everything in the Notes, over and above the information as to date, occasion, and text-collation, as an act of free grace on the part of the editor. The edition, as it stands, is indeed a solid monument to Prof. Dowden's devotion to Wordsworth:

"My task," he writes in the Preface, "in this edition has been entered on with zeal and carried through with patience. Wordsworth, more than any other writer, was for me a teacher and inspirer during many years. My reverence for him and for his work in literature will be shown, I trust, if not by fervid words, at least by my fidelity in my record of facts."

And, indeed, it was impossible for that reverence to find a worthier or a more beneficent means of expression than this admirable edition, in which we find "such a presentation of Wordsworth's Poetical Works as Wordsworth himself would have approved."

TOM HUTCHINSON.

P.S.—Since writing the above I have had an opportunity of examining copies of the six-volume editions of 1840 and of 1841. I find that every one of the new readings recorded by Prof. Dowden as appearing in ed. 1843 are found in ed. 1840 also: in other words, that within the short space of three years after the issue of the much-corrected edition of 1836-7 (the text of which was revised with special care for the purpose of having it stereotyped), Wordsworth actually undertook the fatiguing and perplexing labour of a fresh revision. The text of 1840 remains unaltered in edd. 1841 and 1843, save that one or two misprints which had escaped the proof-reader in 1840 are corrected in ed. 1841. It will be proper, therefore, to substitute "1840" for "1843" wherever a new reading appears in Prof. Dowden's notes with the date "1843" affixed.

A propos of the change from "that" to "which" effected, contrary to his usual practice, by Wordsworth in a few instances, with the view of avoiding an excessive iteration either of the th- or of the -at sound, it may be well to add the following to the instances given above. In "Laodamia," line 51, we find, "That then when tens of thousands were deprest," in ed. 1815, which in the following edition (1820) is altered to "which then when," &c. (one wonders why Wordsworth suffered then when ten to remain unaltered from 1815 to 1849). Wordsworth's strong dislike to the frequent iteration of the th- sound is well illustrated by the history of lines 9 and 10 of "The Redbreast and the Butterfly." In edd. 1807-1820 these lines read thus:

"The Bird whom, by some name or other,
All men who know thee call their Brother."

His objection to the hum of the labial-nasal in whom, some, name, led Wordsworth into a grammatical error in edd. 1827-1845, which read:

"The Bird who, by some name or other," &c.

But why did he not alter "whom" of 1807-1820 into "that" in accordance with his general practice in edd. 1827-1836? Doubtless it was because of the unusually large number of th- sounds occurring in the opening lines of the poem. In lines 1-7 this sound occurs no less than ten times over; and in the ninth and tenth lines, as quoted above, it actually occurs five times. Small wonder, then, that Wordsworth felt reluctant to add a sixth th- sound to the five already standing in these two short lines. However, the claims of grammar prevailed over considerations of euphony, and in his final revision of the poems (for ed. 1849), Wordsworth corrected thus:—

"The Bird that, by some name or other," &c.

With regard to the rejection, in 1827, of the dissyllabic preposition "toward" from all passages in which it is found in the earlier editions, it may be well to explain that it was allowed to stand unaltered in line 123 of "Troilus and Cressida," the diction of this Adaptation from Chaucer being designedly suffered to retain as much as possible of its antique character.

T. H.

SELECTED FOREIGN BOOKS.

GENERAL LITERATURE.

- BAPTIST, Germain. Essai sur l'histoire du Théâtre. Paris: Hachette. 80 fr.
- CAPRIVI, Graf v., Reden im Deutschen Reichstage, Preussischen Landtage u. bei besonderen Anlässen. 1883-1893. Hrg. v. K. Arndt. Berlin: Hofmann. 5 M.
- CHAMPFLURY, Œuvres posthumes de: Salons 1846-1857. Paris: Lemerre. 3 fr. 50 c.
- GARNIER, E. Dictionnaire de la Céramique. Paris: Lib. de l'Art. 30 fr.
- GENÉ, R. Hans Sachs u. seine Zeit. Leipzig: Weber. 10 M.
- LAFONT DE SAINT-MUR, Baron. Impressions de voyage dans Paris ancien et moderne. Paris: Savine. 8 fr. 50 c.
- LETOURNAU, Ch. L'Évolution littéraire dans les diverses races humaines. Paris: Battaille. 8 fr.
- LOUBRAU, P. de. La Méditerranée pittoresque. Paris: Colin. 25 fr.
- MELCHIOR DE VOUGÉ, le Vicomte. Cours russes. Paris: Colin. 3 fr. 50 c.
- MORNIER, Marcel. France Noire (Côte d'Ivoire et Soudan). Paris: Plon. 7 fr. 50 c.

- PARIS, Comte de. Une liberté nécessaire: le droit à l'association. Paris: Calmann Lévy. 1 fr.
- PUIGARAU, L. Le Crime à Paris: Les Malfaiteurs de profession. Paris: Flammarion. 3 fr. 50 c.
- REHER, F. v. Geschichte der Malerei vom Anfang des 14. bis zum Ende des 18. Jahrh. München. 6 M.
- WIDMANN, M. Albrecht v. Haller Staatsmann u. Haller Bedeutung als politischer Schriftsteller. Bielefeld: Kuhn. 2 M. 50 Pf.

HISTORY, ETC.

- BEAUVENUS-BEAUPRÉ, C. J. Costumes et institutions de l'Anjou et du Maine antérieures au XVI^e siècle. T. II. et T. III. (Fasc. 1^{er}). Paris: Pedone-Lauriel. 18 fr.
- FORBER, R. Die frühchristlichen Altarblätter aus den Gräberfeldern v. Achmim-Panopolis. Bielefeld: Kuhn. 85 M.
- HANDY BEY et TH. REINACH. La Nécropole royale de Sâd. 36 Lâv. Paris: Leroux. 200 fr.
- KÖHLER, J. Geschichte der Festungen Danzig u. Weichselmündung bis zum J. 1814. Breslau: Koebner. 40 M.
- MARCEL, G. Reproduction de cartes et de globes relatifs à la découverte de l'Amérique du XVI^e au XVIII^e siècle. Paris: Leroux. 100 fr.
- MAULDE-LA-CLAVIERE, M. de. La Diplomatie au temps de Machiavel. Paris: Leroux. 24 fr.
- MONUMENTA Germaniae historica. Legum sectio II. Capitularia regum Francorum. Tomi II pars 2. Hannover: Hahn. 9 M.
- PÖHLMANN, R. Geschichte des antiken Kommunismus u. Sozialismus. 1. Bd. München: Beck. 11 M. 50 Pf.
- SELER, Peruanische Alterthümer. Berlin: Mertens. 100 M.
- TAINE, H. Le Régime moderne. T. II. Paris: Hachette. 7 fr. 50 c.
- VINCENT, Ch. La Naissance d'une Ville: légende de la fondation de Marseille. Paris: Dentu. 12 fr.
- WEIGEL, M. Das Gräberfeld v. Dahlhausen, Kreis Ostprignitz. Prov. Brandenburg. Braunschweig: Vieweg. 8 M. 50 Pf.
- WISSENER, L. Le Régent, l'Abbé Dubois et les Anglais. T. II. Paris: Hachette. 7 fr. 50 c.

PHYSICAL SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

- ADAM, Ch. La Philosophie en France (première moitié du XIX^e siècle). Paris: Alcan. 7 fr. 50 c.
- DIPPEL, L. Handbuch der Laubholzkunde. 2. Tl. Diestyles, Choripetalae. Berlin: Parey. 25 M.
- JANKEL, O. Die coccaen Seelschier vom Monte Bala. Berlin: Springer. 10 M.
- KÜLPE, O. Grundriss der Psychologie, auf experimenteller Grundlage dargestellt. Leipzig: Engelmann. 9 M.
- PROGER, Julien. La Vie et la Pensée. Paris: Alcan. 5 fr.
- ZIMMERMAN, O. E. B. Die Bakterien unserer Thier- u. Nutzwässer. 2. Reihe. Chemnitz: Bula. 4 M.

PHILOLOGY, ETC.

- CATALOGUS dissertationum philologicarum classicarum. Leipzig: Fock. 2 M. 50 Pf.
- FAISERICH, Th. Kabiren u. Kellinschriften. Leipzig: Pfeiffer. 8 M.
- GRÖGER, W. Etymologie u. Lautlehre d. Afghänischen. München: Franz. 1 M. 70 Pf.
- KRUMSACHER, K. Mittelgriechische Sprichwörter. München: Franz. 8 M.
- SCHWALLY, F. Idioticon d. christlich-palästinischen Aramäisch. Gießen: Ricker. 6 M. 40 Pf.

CORRESPONDENCE.

WAS DANTE ACQUAINTED WITH CLAUDIAN?
Stanhoee Grange, Norfolk.

In the almost certainly apocryphal letter of Dante to Guido da Polenta (Epist. viii. in Fraticelli's edition, Epist. iv.* in that of Giuliani) Dante is made to quote as Virgil's the hemistich: "minuit praesentia famam." As a matter of fact the quotation is from Claudian's De Bello Gildonico:

"Vindictam mandasse sat est; plus nominis horror, Quam tuus ensis aget, minuit praesentia famam" (vv. 385-6).

This attribution to Virgil of a passage from Claudian is one of several reasons for rejecting this letter as spurious; for it is hardly credible that anyone so intimately acquainted with Virgil as Dante was, should have been guilty of such a blunder.

It is, however, curious—and I am not aware that the point has been noticed before—that Dante apparently was familiar with the passage from Claudian quoted in the letter. After a discussion in the Convito as to the origin and growth of good fame, in the course of which he quotes the Virgilian: "Fama . . . Mobilitate viget, viresque acquirit eundo," he concludes by saying it is evident that the image created by fame alone is always an exaggeration of the truth:

"Apertamente adunque veder può chi vuole, che la immagine, per sola fama generata, sempre è più ampia, quale che essa sia, che non è la cosa immaginata nel vero stato" (Conv. I. 3).

He then proceeds in the next chapter to show how, on the other hand, presence has exactly the opposite effect, and unduly diminishes the actual worth of a person:

"Mostrata la ragione innanzi, perchè la fama dilata lo bene e lo male oltre la vera quantità, resta in questo capitolo a mostrare quelle ragioni che fanno vedere perchè la presenza ristigne per opposito . . . Dico adunque, che per tre cagioni la presenza fa la persona di meno valore ch'ella non è" (I. 4).

There certainly seems here to be a distinct reminiscence of Claudian's "minuit praesentia famam," though, of course, it is quite possible that the resemblance is merely accidental. The occurrence of the quotation, however, in the above-mentioned letter is in favour of the supposition that Dante had it in mind while writing this part of the Convito, or at any rate that the forger of the letter (if it be a forgery, of which there can be very little doubt) thought so. For it is just the sort of coincidence that a skilful literary forger, such as Gian Mario Filelfo, for instance, would take care to introduce, in order to give the desired colorito dantesco to his fabrication; while the fact that Dante had just been quoting the Aeneid would account for the slip of attributing Claudian's words to Virgil.

Some think there is also a reminiscence of Claudian in Dante's description of the rape of Proserpine (Purg. xxviii. 50, 51); but Dante was more probably thinking of Ovid's account in the Metamorphoses (v. 385-401) than of any particular passage in Claudian's De Raptu Proserpinae, the former being his favourite authority in mythological matters.

It is further suggested that it was from Claudian (De Bello Getico, v. 75) that Dante got the name of Ephialtes (Inf. xxxi. 94), this being, as has been asserted, the only passage in Latin literature in which the son of Alaeus is mentioned by name. I may point out, however, that the name occurs also in the Culex of Virgil (v. 234), with which Dante was presumably well acquainted; and that, moreover, it is twice mentioned in Servius's Commentary on Virgil (viz., in the notes on Georg. I. 280, and Aen. VI. 776), which was, of course, almost as familiar to mediaeval students as the poems themselves.

It is further supposed that it was from Claudian (De Bello Getico, v. 75) that Dante got the name of Ephialtes (Inf. xxxi. 94), this being, as has been asserted, the only passage in Latin literature in which the son of Alaeus is mentioned by name. I may point out, however, that the name occurs also in the Culex of Virgil (v. 234), with which Dante was presumably well acquainted, and that it is, moreover, twice mentioned in Servius's commentary on Virgil (viz., in the notes on Georg. i. 280, and Hen. vi. 776), which was, of course, as familiar to mediaeval students as the poems themselves.

PAGET TOYNBEE.

EAST GARSTON, BERKSHIRE, IN DOMESDAY.

Pembroke College, Oxford: Nov. 26, 1898.

In reading the account of Berkshire given in Domesday, certain reflections have suggested themselves to me, which some of my friends tell me may possibly be of interest to readers of the ACADEMY.

They relate to East Garston in the Hundred of Lamborne, which does not appear in Domesday otherwise than as ten (formerly thirty) hides held at Lamborne by Geoffrey de Manneville in succession to Esgar. The Testa de Nevill speaks of Esgarston and Esegarston (pp. 107, 124, 131); and, according to Murray's Handbook for Berks, the village of East Garston is locally called Argason. One would have supposed that East Garston was so called in order to distinguish it from West Garston, but there is no West Garston to give point to the contrast. It is therefore only natural to conclude that East Garston is a corruption, and that the true name of the village is Esgarston, as having been held by Esgar, or Asgar, the Staller, the antecessor of Geoffrey de Manneville.

J. L. G. MOWAT.

WAS LINDUM A COLONIA?

Christ Church, Oxford: Nov. 21, 1898.

Mr. Bradley, has, I think, misapprehended the evidence for the colonial rank of Lindum. It is twofold: (1) an inscription, mentioning a civis Lindensis and a decurio, proves the town to have been colonia or municipium; and (2) the Ravenna list styles it colonia. Mr. Bradley takes exception to part (1) by reference to Pauly, and otherwise he seeks to show that decurio proves nothing about the status of the town. The word decurio can, of course, mean several things: as used here, unqualified and directly after the words civis Lindensis, it means a municipal decurion. Now, municipal decurions existed only in towns with municipal constitutions, municipia or coloniae; the statement in Pauly on the point is both misexpressed and misleading. We must conclude, therefore, that Lindum was a colonia.

In discussing the derivation of "Lincoln," we have, then, to consider colonia a "vera causa." It is not a wholly good cause; there is a technical awkwardness which I mentioned in my first letter, and which, for that matter, was quite understood by Mr. Freeman while he upheld the Lindum-colonia theory. But, despite this real awkwardness, colonia is, to my judgment, undoubtedly a "vera causa," and those who discuss the name "Lincoln" are bound to consider it as such. This correspondence, however, began with a denial of this proposition. Further I have no wish or right to go. As to "Lindcylne," I have too much respect for Mr. Bradley's scholarship to question his specialist judgment on a matter of which I am largely ignorant. Similarly, I must leave Mr. Round to settle with himself whether the case for the Lindum-colonia derivation is weakened or strengthened by a proof that Lindum was a colonia.

F. HAVERFIELD.

Having been allowed by the Editor to see the preceding letter, I should like to say that I would by no means presume to contend with Mr. Haverfield on his own ground; and that I am not particularly surprised that a suggestion derived merely (as I stated) from a glance at a dictionary proves to be fallacious. That I allowed the reference to Pauly to appear in print was a piece of inconsiderateness which I repented too late. However, Mr. Haverfield does not say that the epigraphic evidence alone would prove that Lindum was a colony; and with regard to the only other evidence, if the Ravenna geographer knew the two names Lindum and Lindocolina, he could hardly help inferring "colonia" by way of interpretation of the longer name. Of course I do not assert that his statement had no better foundation than this. If it were proved that Lindum was a colony, the etymological question would then stand as follows: On the one hand, there is the difficulty of supposing that a city that was a Roman colony had by purely accidental coincidence a name admitting of derivation from colonia; on the other hand, there is the difficulty of supposing that the coincidence of form between the two names recorded as Lindcylne is purely accidental. The choice thus lies between alternative unlikelihoods; I prefer to keep my judgment in suspense.

HENRY BRADLEY.

London: Nov. 18, 1898.

There seems to be so much interest taken in the "Colne" question that it may be worth while calling attention to the four adjacent villages of Colne ("Colun" in Domesday), on the upper Colne in Essex, resembling the group of three ("Colne" in Domesday) on the upper Colne in Gloucestershire. The Huntingdonshire Colne is "Colne" in Domesday; the Lancashire one is "Colnun"; and the Devonshire "Colun" and "Colum" of Domesday are, I presume, Columb and "—culme."

Doubtless the Essex Colnes took their name from the river; but the similar group of the Rodings (each of them "Rodinges" in Domesday) seems more likely to have given its name to, than derived it from, the river.

Mr. Bradley's reference to the "Decurio Coloniae Glevensis" seems to support my suggestion, in spite of Mr. Haverfield, that we should have expected Colchester to be "Colonia Camulodunensis."

J. H. ROUND.

TO "FAKE."

Cambridge: Nov. 27, 1898.

The quotation from my book is incorrectly given by Mr. Ryland. I do not say that the Mid. Du. facken means "to catch a gripe," which comes very near to being nonsense, but "to catch or to gripe." Anyone who refers to the passage in my Principles of Etymology (i. 483) will see that the argument in the context is carefully suppressed. The argument is that, as a fact, several slang words have been borrowed from Dutch; and I remain of opinion that fake is merely the Mid. Du. facken, to catch or seize. I will venture to add that clj may very well be the Du. klead, garment, and that "to fake a clj" meant originally to steal an article of clothing.

Before Mr. Ryland corrects me, he should learn the alphabet of the subject. His own suggestion is out of the question, because he has misquoted the Middle English word in Stratmann, and evidently does not know how it was pronounced. The Middle English word is fezen, where the z was sounded as a y, not as a g. Hence this Middle English word became, quite regularly, the familiar provincial English fey, also spelt fay. There are two verbs of this form. But I need not go into particulars; both are given, spelt fay, in the Century Dictionary, and they are, of course, perfectly well known.

It is clean impossible to get feague out of the Middle English form; see my Principles of Etymology (i. 364), which may be perused by Mr. Ryland with advantage. I subscribe, accordingly, to the view of the Century Dictionary: viz., that feague is not English at all, but borrowed from Low German fezen, Dutch vegen, cognate with one of the Middle English verbs above mentioned.

Another useful rule in etymology is to remember that a change from k to g is common, but that a change in the other direction (unless there is something to cause it) is scarce and improbable. Here, again, we are asked to neglect facts, and to fancy that feague became fake. At what date, one would like to know; for faike, to grasp, already occurs in Gawain Douglas.

I do not say that my guess is correct; but all serious students will see that Mr. Ryland's guesses must, in any case, be rejected.

WALTER W. SKEAT.

THE METHODS OF THE HIGHER CRITICISM.

Christ's College, Cambridge: Nov. 26, 1898.

Mr. Tyler is very angry with me, but he has not even attempted to show that my statements are incorrect. It is a grammatical blunder to derive a form netseg from a root yatsag; if yatsag is the root, Prof. Sayce's new word must be read nitseg. And it is strictly true that a form netseg cannot come from any known Hebrew root. Of course it would come naturally enough from a root natsag; but that, on Mr. Tyler's own showing, is not a known root, but only a possible or hypothetical one.

WM. ROBERTSON SMITH.

"THE HISTORY OF THE POST OFFICE."

London: Nov. 27, 1893.

I thank you for the kindly terms in which you have been pleased to speak of my History of the Post Office in the ACADEMY of November 25.

But among the things set down for correction there is one to which I feel constrained to refer, because it impugns my accuracy on a matter of fact. "Blaithwaite," writes your reviewer, "was never in such an exalted official position as that designated by the title of Secretary of War."

On this point it may be sufficient to state that in the letter from which I quote, he is so designated by the Postmasters-General of the day.

That letter is dated June 18, 1695, and its address is as follows:

"To Mr. Blaithwaite, Secretary of Warr to His Majesty of Great Britaine."

HERBERT JOYCE.

APPOINTMENTS FOR NEXT WEEK.

SUNDAY, Dec. 3, 4 p.m. Sunday Lecture: "The Body's Servants: a Talk about Cells and their Work," by Dr. Andrew Wilson.

4 p.m. South Place Institute: "Unskilled Labour," by Mr. Tom Mann.

7.30 p.m. Ethical: "The Advantages of Competition," by Mr. Leslie Stephen.

MONDAY, Dec. 4, 8 p.m. Royal Institution: General Monthly Meeting.

5 p.m. London Institution: "When and Why an Electric Spark Oscillates," by Prof. C. V. Boys.

8 p.m. Royal Academy: "Selected Palettes," by Prof. A. H. Church.

8 p.m. Society of Arts: Cantor Lecture, "The Art of Book and Newspaper Illustration," II., by Mr. Henry Blackburn.

8 p.m. Victoria Institute: "Habit in Man," by Dr. Schofield.

8 p.m. Aristotelian: "The Import of Categorical Propositions," by Miss E. E. Constance Jones.

TUESDAY, Dec. 5, 6 p.m. London Institution: "The Principles of Commercial Geography applied to the British Empire," X., by Dr. H. B. Mill.

8 p.m. Biblical Archaeology: "The Hebrew Text of one of the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs," by the Rev. Dr. Gaster.

8 p.m. Civil Engineers: Discussion, "Impounding Reservoirs in India, and the Design of Masonry Dams," 8.30 p.m. Zoological: "The Geographical Distribution of Earthworms," by Mr. F. E. Bedford; "A Collection of Coleoptera sent by Mr. H. H. Johnston from British Central Africa," by Mr. C. J. Gahan; "A Collection of Petrels from the Kermadec Islands," by Capt. F. W. Hutton.

WEDNESDAY, Dec. 6, 4.30 p.m. National Indian Association: "Akbar, the Great Mogul," by Sir Roland K. Wilson.

8 p.m. Society of Arts: "An Artist's View of Chicago and the World's Fair," by Mr. F. Villiers.

8 p.m. Geological: "The Purbeck Beds of the Vale of Wardour," by the Rev. W. B. Andrews and Mr. A. J. Jukes-Browne; "A Variety of Ammonites (Staphanoceras subarmatus, Young, from the Upper Lias of Whitby," and "A Picrite and other Associated Rocks at Barnton, Edinburgh," by Mr. H. W. Monckton.

8 p.m. Elizabethan: "Sir Philip Sidney's Defence of Poetry, and Elizabethan Conceptions of Art in general," by Mr. Lionel Johnson.

THURSDAY, Dec. 7, 6 p.m. London Institution: "The Essentials of Great Poetry," by Mr. Alfred Austin.

8 p.m. Royal Academy: "Methods of Painting," by Prof. A. H. Church.

8 p.m. Linnean: "Catalogue of the described Neuroptera Odonata (Dragon Flies) of Ceylon, with Description of New Species," by Mr. W. F. Kirby; "The Cause of the Fall of the Corolla in Verbascum," by Signor U. Martelli.

8 p.m. Chemical: "An Apparatus for the Estimation of the Gases dissolved in Water," by Dr. Truman; "Metallic Oxides and the Periodic Law," by Mr. R. M. Dealey.

8.30 p.m. Antiquaries.

FRIDAY, Dec. 8, 5 p.m. Physical: "A Potentiometer for Alternating Currents," by Mr. J. Swinburne; "The Specific Resistance of Sea-Water," by Mr. W. H. Preece; "The Self-Induction Coefficient of a Circular Current," and "The Field of a Cylindrical Coil," by Prof. G. M. Minchin.

8 p.m. Philological: "The Use of the Kentish Dialect by Chaucer," by Prof. Skeat; "The First Riddle (so-called) in the Exeter Book," by Mr. I. Gallacher. SATURDAY, Dec. 9, 3.45 p.m. Botanic: General Fortnightly Meeting.

SCIENCE.

SOME BOOKS ON POPULAR SCIENCE.

Jottings about Birds. By C. Dixon. (Chapman & Hall.) Mr. Dixon sets an example of unwearied industry to bird lovers. His pen seems never idle, and has here contributed nine pleasant chapters to ornithology. Most readers will prefer those on "The Birds of Algeria" and "A Visit to St. Kilda" to the more technical papers. They contain pleasant descriptions as well as exhaustive lists of the birds to be found in those localities. Of course, Mr. Dixon once more draws his sword in the old ornithological quarrel between those who ascribe birds' actions to instinct and those who deem them caused by imitation and memory. At times he begs the question, as when he writes of inherited habit, "Like most new theories, it is being pushed too far, asked to explain too much, and made to account for phenomena which are much more plausibly explained in other ways." The truth is, that at present a balance of probabilities on these questions is alone possible, but one side possesses a much longer and wider prescription than the other. The frontispiece is a coloured figure of Saxicola sebolmi, only two examples of which are known to science.

The Industry of Animals. By Frédéric Houssey. (Walter Scott.) This volume of the "International Science" series surveys animal economy, the methods of defence, dwellings, and provision for rearing the young among different creatures which are generally regarded as possessing curious instincts. Thus ants, bees, and wasps are carefully treated and abundantly illustrated. Social birds are also described, and there is a singular account of animals which paralyse their victims before devouring them. The English translation is not always what could be wished. To make up for it there is a good index. M. Houssey sums up, that degree of perfection in industry among animals is independent of zoological superiority, and that such glimpses as man is able to obtain of their habits "allow us to conclude that their psychic faculties are of the same nature as our own. Man in his evolution introduces no new factor." But some old-fashioned people will still believe that man alone is endowed with reason.

Romance of Low Life amongst Plants. By M. C. Cooke. (S.P.C.K.) Mr. Cooke has done good work among cryptogamic vegetation, and this well-illustrated book aims at giving a general account of the different families of the lowest forms in plant life. Thus ferns, mosses, liverworts, lichens, algae, and fungi are successively described. There are sections on the most interesting phenomena of the latter—luminosity, hibernation and the like. Dr. Cooke's name is sufficient assurance that these matters are brought up to date, and his book ought to be in constant demand in many a country house where the inmates investigate the wonders of the woods and fields.

An Elementary Text-Book of Agricultural Botany. By M. C. Potter. (Methuen.) This praiseworthy attempt to simplify vegetable morphology cannot be too highly recommended to botanical students. Beginning at the cell, and passing on to the root, stem, and flower, it paves the way for a clear understanding of the leguminosae and grasses which are most valuable to agriculture. By the aid of diagrams inserted in the text the learner may thus gain a sound elementary knowledge of agricultural botany. These pages, Mr. Potter tells us, are but the extension of lectures delivered by him at Newcastle in 1890, which proved useful. In another edition the word "stoma," as the plural of the breathing apertures in leaves, ought to be altered into "stomata."

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE ORIGIN OF THE ORDINARY SIGN FOR α .

Queen's College, Oxford: Nov. 6, 1893.

Lehmann (Tachygraph. Abkürz., p. 38) explains the waved or s-shaped stroke, which is the usual sign for α , as a variant from the oblique stroke, which is the tachygraphical α ; and Prof. Vitelli (Museo Ital. i., p. 172) accepts this theory. But a simpler explanation is to suppose that the s-shaped stroke is not in its origin a "sign" at all, but a slightly modified form of the two letters α , as they were written in the Ptolemaic cursive of the third century B.C. Some instances arranged in historical order will make this clear.

The first stage is where α and ι are joined, but are written separately, the result being like λ with the cross-bar slanting upwards from the line: e.g., in British Museum Papyrus civ., l. 2, and No. xiii., l. 2, in the second part of the Petrie Papyri recently published by Prof. Mahaffy, both of the third century B.C. The next stage, which in point of time is contemporary with the first, is where the two letters are written without lifting the pen, the ι being joined by a curve to the right-hand stroke of the Alpha: e.g., in the same British Museum Papyrus l. 20, and No. xvi. (a) and (c), Part ii. of the Petrie Papyri (200 B.C.).

In the second century B.C. the peculiar angular form of Alpha went out of use, except in abbreviations, e.g., $\tau\rho = \tau\rho\alpha(\pi\epsilon\tau\eta)$, and in the combination $\alpha\iota$. In British Museum Papyrus cccci., which belongs to the end of the second century B.C., α is sometimes written ϵ . The only change here has been to broaden the opening of the ϵ . This is the form of α which occurs so often in the Papyrus containing the Ἀθηναίων Πολιτεία.

Passing on to the first appearance of the "sign" on vellum in the great uncial MSS. of the fourth and fifth centuries, the chief change was that α was connected with the preceding letter, and so falls below the line. Often it was written just as in the Ἀθηναίων Πολιτεία, but the tendency naturally was to round the angle of the α , and so make ϵ s-shaped (see Lehmann, Table iii. 18, 2-6).

In minuscule, the s-shaped form is always used when the "sign" was written on the line apart from the preceding letter, as, e.g., in the Arethas MSS. (T. W. Allen, Notes on Abbreviations, p. 5, note 2). But when, as was generally the case, the "sign" was joined to the previous letter, the more angular form survived occasionally, e.g., in ἐκλείψαι and ἐμπερῆσαι (Lehmann, Table iii. 19).

With the other and really tachygraphical sign for α (\vee) this explanation has, of course, nothing to do.

B. P. GREENFELL.

SCIENCE NOTES.

THE annual course of Christmas lectures at the Royal Institution will this year be delivered by Prof. Dewar, upon "Air Gaseous and Liquid"; the date fixed for the first lecture is Thursday, December 28.

At the last meeting of the Royal Botanic Society, the Duke of York was elected a fellow. The list of donations to the gardens of the society included an interesting collection of orchids from Ceylon, presented by Mr. Sheppard.

At a recent meeting of the Geological Society, Dr. George M. Dawson read a paper on the occurrence of mammoth remains in North-Western America. He dwelt upon two points: (1) that the remains are almost entirely confined to the limits of a great unglaciated area, and absent from the area once covered by a great ice-mass; (2) that, at the time of the existence of the mammoth, the North American and Asiatic land must have been continuous, for the remains are found in islands of the Bering Sea.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

PROF. MAX MÜLLER has received from the King of Siam an offer of sufficient funds to guarantee the continuance of "The Sacred Books of the East." The money will be used, in the first place, for printing a translation of the remaining portions of the Buddhist Tripitaka.

We have received a copy of Mr. T. Tyler's paper on "The Nature of the Hittite Writing," reprinted from the Transactions of the Oriental Congress, which met last year in London under the presidency of Prof. Max Müller. In Mr. Tyler's view, the Hittite inscriptions are, with the partial exception of proper names, ideographic or pictorial. There is not, he thinks, at present, any evidence which would justify our regarding these inscriptions as phonetic, or even as generally of a mixed character, phonetic and ideographic. With regard to some symbols, he claims to have furnished "a fixed point in Hittite research not at all likely to be disturbed." The language of those who made the inscriptions was Semitic, either pure or impure, though probably the hieroglyphs were used also by those who were not Semites. The equilateral triangle on the Hittite monuments Mr. Tyler had previously discussed in the ACADEMY and in Nature. He was led to infer the sacredness of this symbol from its occurrence in the remarkable groups delineated on five faces of the cubical Tarsus seal in the Ashmolean Museum. Now he goes beyond his former position, and concludes, from a seal-impression in the Louvre obtained at Aidin, that the triangle came to be regarded even as an actual deity. In the triangle, too, he finds a link of connexion between the Hittite and the Phœnician, or, rather, the Carthaginian, monuments. With the paper are given nineteen illustrative figures.

MR. ROBERT BROWN, JUN., who was secretary to the Tenth Section of the same Congress, has also sent us a print of his paper on "The Celestial Equator of Aratos." In continuation of former studies on this subject, he examines the passage of the Phainomena describing the celestial equator, and explains each of the constellations there mentioned by reference to Babylonian origin. His arguments are based 1) upon a reconstruction of the star-map of Sphæratean astronomy, circa 2000 B.C.; and 2) upon the evidence of archaic sculpture. His paper, too, is abundantly illustrated.

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

ANGLO-RUSSIAN LITERARY SOCIETY, IMPERIAL INSTITUTE.—(Tuesday, Nov. 7.)

DR. A. CAZALOT, Esq., president, in the chair.—The president announced that valuable additions had been made to the society's library by presents from Russia. Miss Vishevalzoff, of Tamboff, had sent an interesting account of the opening of public reading rooms in connexion with a museum at that town. All was done by private donations, and showed thoughtful and generous initiative on the part of some members of the landed gentry and nobility.—By an interesting coincidence, almost at the same time a letter was received from the eminent author, Count Leo Tolstoi, and a paper about him, entitled, "Tolstoi at Home," written in excellent English by a Russian lady, Mme. Malewsky-Malewitsch. The letter ran as follows: "I am much obliged to you for the desire you have expressed to elect me a member of your society. I sympathise most heartily with every means tending to unite people, irrespective of political parties, and especially when there is conscious spiritual union between persons who belong to various nationalities and countries, which is now being brought about with so much energy and rapidity all over the world. Your society has similar objects, and, therefore, I wish it the greatest success. I shall be very happy to receive more detailed information about your proceedings."—The paper on Count Tolstoi began with a description of his home, situated about fifty miles south of Moscow in the government of Toula. When in distress, the poor for miles around come to him for relief. In personal appearance he is a tall man, with a long, white beard and piercing dark eyes. He is dressed in loosely-fitting garments, and generally carries a broom or something of the kind. One of Tolstoi's theories, says Vogué, which he sets forth in his Three Deaths, is that the best and happiest man is he who thinks least and who dies a simple death; in this respect the peasant is happier than the noble, the tree than the peasant, and the death of an oak tree is a greater loss to the universe than that of an old princess. The influence of Rousseau may be traced in Tolstoi's opinions: his hatred of civilisation and of property. The Count would give up all his own possessions, were it not for his wife's objections on account of his nine children; and, as one of his principles is never to try to conquer error by force, he does not press the point. On the subject of education, also, Tolstoi's opinions resemble those of Rousseau: he maintains that man is naturally good, but spoiled by society, and, so far as possible, he is educating his children on the principles set forth in Emile. The success of his novels gave him great pleasure; and although he now considers them as unwholesome mental food, it is doubtful whether he really regrets having written them. He prefers writing in winter, and sometimes remains seated at his study-table day and night. The result of this labour is a number of bits of paper covered with writing, illegible to anyone but his wife, who sorts the confused mass and copies it out for the press. The paper ended with the expression of a hope that Tolstoi may again take up his pen as a writer of fiction, but at present he is engaged in tending sick peasants and tilling the ground.—Mr. Howard Swan then explained Gouin's "Series Method of Teaching Languages," which had already attained such successful results, by insisting that children should only use the words of the foreign tongue, taking in the idea, and not translating words from their own language, as in a dictionary. It appeared that by this system the power of concentration both in the teacher and in the pupil was increased, and a certain new interest aroused. Ideas and afterwards phrases were grouped round certain verbs, which gave action to the whole "Series" method. The Central School of Foreign Tongues, Howard House, Arundel-street, supplies all the necessary tuition, both for teachers and pupils in this new and ingenious method.

GOETHE SOCIETY.—(Wednesday, Nov. 8.)

DR. RICHARD GARNETT in the chair.—The secretary reported on the recent publication of the seventh volume of the Society's Transactions, its reception in the English and German press, and the consequent accessions of new members.—Mrs. R. Freilgrath Kroeker, a daughter of the German poet Ferdinand Freilgrath, read the third act of her translation of "Iphigenia auf Tauris," as yet unpublished. The same act was then read in German, with parts distributed, by Miss Carey, and Messrs. Meusch and Hermann Meyer.—Dr. Eugene Oswald read a paper on "Iphigenia in Delphi." He showed from quotations in Goethe's Italianische Reise, and from his letters written in Italy to Charlotte von Stein (as published in the Schriften der Goethe-Gesellschaft, Bd. II.), how the idea of writing a play on the subject apparently arose in Goethe's mind while he was engaged in transferring his

"Iphigenia auf Tauris" from the prose of 1779—contemporary with Gluck's Opera—into the verse of 1786. It was, in this connexion, necessary to bring out the fact that the Italianische Reise was not put together before 1814. The first volume, here alone of moment, appeared in 1816. It is largely composed from passages of letters written to Charlotte von Stein and to Herder, which Goethe asked his correspondent to hand back to him on his return for that purpose, and the text of which, when he set to work so much later, he modified in a manner now ascertainable by the publication of the German Goethe Society. We are thus enabled to see that the idea of an "Iphigenia in Delphi" had really been entertained by Goethe, however vaguely, when at Weimar, and must have been a subject of conversation between him and her, who for years previously was the depository of whatever formed in his mind. What is not in those letters, but is found in the Italianische Reise, is the actual plan of the play. Whether this sketch was suggested by his own reading remains doubtful. A minor writer of the Augustan age, Ovidius Julius Hyginus, in his Fabularum Liber, gives, under the head of Aletes, a tradition of Iphigenia in Delphi, probably based on plays now lost. His text and Goethe's plan were compared. They coincide in a recognition—the ἀναγνώρισις recommended in Aristotle's Poetics—differing therein from Dr. Garnett's play, in which Iphigenia is slain by Electra. In Goethe's plan Electra hastens to Delphi, in the hope that Orestes is coming; and she purposes to dedicate to Apollo the fatal axe which has wrought so much harm to the house of Atreus. In Hyginus's sketch Electra goes on to Delphi to consult the oracle about the life or death of Orestes; and of the dedication of the axe there is no mention, a brand from the altar serving for the attempt on Iphigenia's life. The texts of both plans were given, as also a late reference of Goethe's, in a letter of 1817 to his friend Zelter, in which he speaks of the plan as attractive to him, because he had become so much at home (eingesiedelt) in the house of Atreus. Inquiries at the Goethe Society at Weimar, and of the Director of the Goethe-Schiller Archives, made it certain that no fragment of the play was found among the MSS. left by Goethe. But if Goethe did, in this instance, fail to carry out his intention, he sowed seed, some of which fell on fruitful soil. His plan inspired five German dramatists, between 1843 and 1872, to write complete plays on the theme: Kannegiesser, Halm, Gelseler, Widmann, Allmers—the latter, with advantage, condensing the story into one act. Time was wanting to go through their productions in detail, and the lecturer gave, instead, an analysis of Dr. Garnett's one-act dramatic poem, with extracts.—The chairman added some observations on the character of Iphigenia as delineated by Goethe, and on the excellence of the translation which had been read.

ASIATIC.—(Tuesday, Nov. 14.)

LORD REAY, president, in the chair.—Dr. M. A. Stein read a paper on "Tours, Archaeological and Topographical, in and about Kashmir." The facilities offered by previous visits to Kashmir and a comparatively near residence had induced Dr. Stein to undertake the task of a new edition of Kalhana's Rājatarangini or "Chronicle of the Kings of Kashmir." A liberal grant given by the Kashmir State Council had enabled him to publish in the course of 1892 the first volume of the edition which contains the whole of the original Sanskrit text, based on the Codex Archetypus of existing MSS. The tours made in Kashmir in the summer months of 1891 and 1892 were intended to elucidate important points in Kalhana's narrative connected with the ancient topography and the antiquities of the Valley, and to furnish fresh materials for a detailed commentary on the work which Dr. Stein hoped to give in a second volume. The Rājatarangini is our oldest written authority for the history of the various dynasties which ruled Kashmir from the earliest period down to the time of Kalhana, who began to write his Chronicle in the year 1148 A.D. Even if we discard the account given of the first three dynasties, which appears largely legendary and is vitiated by an artificial chronology, there still remains for us in Kalhāsa's work a continuous historical narrative extending over more than 500 years, which from the beginning of the Kārkota dynasty we can accept as reliable, and which grows more and more accurate and full of interesting details as we approach the time of the author. There is no other part of ancient India the history of which during the same protracted period could be traced with even approximately equal clearness or accuracy of detail. Great importance must, therefore, attach to the full explanation of the contents of the Kashmirian Chronicle. Prof. Bühler was the first to recognise the causes of the great difficulties experienced in the interpretation of the work, and to point out that for a full understanding of its contents a close study of Kashmirian antiquities, but especially of the ancient geography of the country, was indispensable. The materials hitherto available for such researches in Kashmirian Sanskrit texts, in the Survey Maps, and in the works of European visitors soon proved insufficient. Dr. Stein, therefore, found it necessary to supplement them by personal explorations in Kashmir, to which he devoted his vacations of 1891 and 1892. In the course of these explorations, which extended also to a number of less-known temple ruins of architectural interest, he received very great assistance from the rulers of the Kashmir State. On the recommendation of Colonel W. F. Prideaux, the Resident, he obtained Parvānas from the Mahārāja and the President of the State Council, authorising him to make archaeological explorations in all parts of Kashmir, and was furnished also with a grant towards the expenses of test excavations. The explorations of 1891 were begun in August near Uri, the ancient Uraid, in the Jhelam Valley, where distinct relics of the Hindu period were found in the form of ornamental slabs, showing relief representations of Kashmirian temples. The first site explored in Kashmir proper was the collection of ruined temples situated high up in the valley of the Kanknāl River, to the east of Mount Haramuk. These ruins Dr. Stein was able to identify, by reference to the name borne by the mountain ridge, below which they lie, with the temples built by various Kashmirian kings in honour of Śiva Bhūtesa. Excavations made near the remains of the largest of these temples cleared up interesting details connected with their architecture. From there he visited the sacred lakes, below the glaciers of the Haramuk Peaks, which rank in Kashmirian belief among the sources of the holy Gangā, and have since early days formed the object of pilgrimage.—Some time was spent in Srinagar in visiting ancient sites in the capital and its immediate neighbourhood. In numerous places, such as Khandabhavan (Skandabhavana), Narwōr (Nadavāna), Jyethir (Jyēthēśvara), it was possible to fix the exact position of ancient temples mentioned by Kalhāsa. These identifications, as well as the survival, in local tradition, of the old names for many quarters of the city, will be of great help in constructing a map of the ancient Srinagar as it existed in Kalhāsa's times. The whole of September was devoted to archaeological explorations in the eastern part of the valley, the Madavardīya of Kalhāsa. Visits were paid on the way through the Vullar Pargana (Sanskrit Holada) to the ruins of the Padmaśvāmin temple at Pampur (Padmapura), to the sacred springs at Khunāmōh (Khonamūsha), Uyan (Ovana), &c., to the temples at Laddu and other ancient remains in this neighbourhood. Excavations in the ruins of a temple of small but elegant proportions, found near the hamlet of Nāraṣṭān at the head of the Trahal Valley, proved of special interest. By excavating the courtyard in front of the temple and subsequently clearing the stoneline basin of a spring which was discovered there, a considerable number of statues and reliefs of all sizes, representing Vishnu, Śiva and other deities, were brought to light. A good many of the statues were of excellent workmanship, and closely resembled in style the Buddhist sculptures from Gandhāra, showing, like these, unmistakable traces of the influence of late classical art. Two small inscriptions were also found, but did not furnish a clue to the ancient name of the temple. All the sculptures have been carefully removed to the State Library at Srinagar. From Nāraṣṭān the route led into the Liddar Valley, where ancient remains were found at the temple of Māmāleśvara, and near Sālī, Hotamur, and other villages. At Bum'n, near the famous pilgrimage place of Mārtand, Dr. Stein was able to identify the ancient Hindu temple, now converted into a Muhammadan Zīārat, as the Bhīmākeśava temple mentioned by Kalhāsa. It was erected by King Bhīma Śāhī, who ruled in the Kābul Valley about the middle of the tenth century. Of the several sites of historical interest visited in the Parganas of Kotlīār, Bhring, and Shāhabād, the sacred spring Pāpasīdāna near the village of Kothār (Kapateśvara) deserved special notice. Here the buildings mentioned by Kalhāsa as having been erected by the famous King Bhoja of Ujjain could still be identified accurately. Reaching Hirpur (S'irapura), at the entrance of the Pir Panjāl Pass, Dr. Stein was able to clear up by personal inspection some important points relating to the ancient topography of this route, such as the position of the old frontier guard station Kramavarta Kotta (now Kāmelān Kōt.) The tours of 1892 differed somewhat from those of the preceding year, inasmuch as the investigations had to be carried on two occasions to some distance beyond the limits of Kashmir. The first tour led to the south, across the Pir Panjāl range, into the valley of Loharin where Dr. Stein believes he has found the ancient Lohara, so frequently mentioned in the Annals of the later Kashmirian Kings. A proper understanding of much in Kalhāsa's narrative depended on an exact knowledge of the position of Lohara Kotta; but this ancient mountain stronghold had previously set at naught all attempts at identification. The position of several localities mentioned in connexion with expeditions from and against Lohara could also be determined in the neighbourhood. Lohara possesses additional interest, as being undoubtedly the "Fort Lahūr" which Albēruṇī mentions in his India as the nearest place to Kashmir which he had reached when accompanying Mahmūd of Ghazna on his fruitless expedition against that country. The other tour beyond the frontier of Kashmir was directed into the valley of the Kishangangā. There Dr. Stein succeeded first in finding the ancient but well preserved shrine of the goddess Śārādā, near the modern fort of Shardi. By carefully following Kalhāsa's indications, which show an intimate acquaintance with this remote region, it was possible also to discover subsequently the position of the fort of S'irah'id, in which the pretender Bhoja and the rebels allied with him had stood a long and memorable siege by King Jayasimha's forces. The remainder of the vacation was spent on a rapid survey of ancient sites in the western portion of the Kashmir Valley. Near Barāmūla (Vardhamūla) the site of the old frontier station Dvāra was identified. Further down the Jhelam, near the village of Zehenpur, Dr. Stein recognised in three mounds, recently quarried in parts for materials to be used on the new Tonga road, the remains of Buddhist stūpas. On his return journey to Srinagar, he took occasion to visit the neighbourhood of Trigām, where he had been led by Kalhāsa's indications to look for the site of the ancient town Parīhāsapura. On the alluvial plateau near this village he found a series of extensive ruins, which can with certainty be assumed to belong to the great temple buildings erected here by King Lalitāditya. The decayed state of the ruins above ground shows that the destruction of the buildings must date from a comparatively early period; and this is fully borne out by a statement of Kalhāsa, who records that King Śamkaravarman had already built his temples at Pattan with materials from Parīhāsapura. The approaching close of the vacation prevented a thorough exploration of these interesting ruins. This remains therefore an attractive task for a future visit to Kashmir.—In the discussion which followed, Dr. Thornton took occasion to point out that, in view of the results communicated, it was necessary to abandon the mistaken identification of Kalhāsa's Lohara with Lahore, the capital of the Panjab. He also drew attention to the efficient help rendered by the Kashmir State authorities to Dr. Stein in the course of his explorations, and moved that the thanks of the Society be conveyed to the Mahārāja and the State Council of Kashmir. This motion, being duly seconded and supported from the chair, was passed unanimously.

HISTORICAL.—(Thursday, Nov. 16.)

SIR M. E. GRANT DUFF, president, in the chair. The following were elected fellows of the Society: O. Raymond Beazley, Rev. T. Edwards, W. M. W. H. Russell, Horatio Childs.—A paper was read by Mr. J. H. Round on "The Shooting of Lisle and Lisle on the Surrender of Colchester, 1649," reviewing the evidence available for the case, and vigorously protesting against the canonisation of this "barbarous murder" by certain modern historians—Mr. H. E. Malden and Mr. R. Beazley took part in the discussion, in which the importance of Mr. Round's arguments was fully recognised.

FINE ART.

THE MUSEUM OF ALEXANDRIA.

Few visitors to Egypt are probably aware that Alexandria once more possesses a Museum. Thanks to the energy and generosity of a portion of the foreign community residing there, such, however, is the case. The institution of an Athenaeum with courses of lectures of which an account has already appeared in the ACADEMY, has been followed by the foundation both of a public library and of an archaeological museum. By an arrangement with M. de Morgan, the museum is not only to contain a collection of the antiquities found in Alexandria and its immediate neighbourhood but will also represent the Greek and Roman periods of Egyptian history, and thus supplement the Museum of Gizeh.

Though open barely a year, the museum already well stocked with relics of the past. Objects have been sent to it from Gizeh, and numerous presents—many of them of great value—have been made to it by the inhabitants of Alexandria. The administration has been fortunate in the choice of a curator, Dr. Botti, who has been selected for the post, being not only an enthusiastic archaeologist, but also a good scholar and student of ancient Egyptian history. He has already arranged the collection, labelled the objects contained in it, and published a Catalogue under the title "Notice des Monuments exposés au Musée Gréco-Romain d'Alexandrie."

The Catalogue, which has just appeared, admirably compiled, and is divided into two parts, the first containing a general description of the objects exhibited, while the second is a catalogue raisonné, intended for scholars. The inscriptions published and annotated in the second part give the book the character of a valuable independent archaeological work. So also does the exhaustive list of the marks on the handles of Greek amphorae discovered at Alexandria, of which there is a very large number in the museum. The list shows that most of the pottery used at Alexandria was imported from Rhodes, though there are a few specimens from Knidos, as well as some examples of native Alexandrine manufacture.

One of the most interesting portions of the collection is a series of sepulchral vases discovered in 1886, near the ancient Kanak Gate, many of which found their way to New York. The vases are inscribed with Greek partly in capitals, partly in cursive, in which we learn that they contained the names of various Greek mercenaries in the service of Ptolemy IV. and his successors. Among them we find Cretans, Thracians, Acarnanians, and Arcadians.

I may also mention a fragmentary Greek inscription found at Menahiyeh, the ancient Ptolemais, in which reference is made to a "curator of Greek libraries" (ἐπίτροπος βιβλ[ο]θηκ[ῶν] ἑλληνικῶν) in the reign of Hadrian, as well as certain statues from the Birket el Qārdin at Fayyūm, which exhibit a curious combination of Greek art with the native art of the so-called Saitic school. One of them is dedicated to "the eat God Soknopaios," explained by Dr. rebs as the representative of the Egyptian sbk-nob-aa, "Sebek lord of the island"; hile another, which is dated in the month Tybi the fourth year, was offered "on behalf of reus." Dr. Botti suggests that this Ergens, whom we have no other record, may have en a local ruler of the Fayyûm in the later reek or earlier Roman period.

I must not forget to say that the Catalogue as been made very complete by the addition of ronological tables. These include not only e Egyptian kings so far as they are known to s from the monuments, but also the Prefects f Egypt under the Roman domination, and air successors the Præfecti Augustales.

A study of the Catalogue brings one fact ery clearly to light. The number of inscribed onuments found within the walls of alexandria itself, and consequently of service etting the ancient topography of the city, ery small indeed. That such monuments ist underground is indubitable, and excava-on alone is needed to discover them. Some f the leading citizens have already started a md for the purpose; the amount raised in this ay, however, is wholly inadequate for clearing way the masses of débris which cover the ains of the ancient Alexandria. Unfortu-ately, the work must be undertaken now or ever: the modern city is rapidly advancing estward, and the district in which the rincipal buildings of ancient Alexandria once stood will soon be covered with streets of ouses underneath which it will be impossible o dig. The importance of such excavations ay be gathered from the fact that we do not t present know the precise situation of the amous Museum; even the site of the Tomb of lexander is uncertain. If once the sites were ertainated, there would be a chance of dis-covering the relics of the libraries—at all events f that of the Museum—which were the chief jory of the Alexandria of the past. Could not e Egypt Exploration Fund find some way in hich to unite its forces with those of the archæological Society of Alexandria?

A. H. SAYCE.

MR. VOKINS'S MORLANDS AND THE NEW ENGLISH ART CLUB.

N exhibition removed widely from the ommonplace, and therefore worth notice, t that curiously comprehensive and well-nigh mplete exhibition of engravings after George orland, held at Messrs. Vokins's, in Great ortland-street. People who buy Morland's ictures, at prices by no means insignificant, re far from being foolish because they happen o be in the fashion, the range and charm f Morland's art thoroughly justifying e vogue of his pictures. Yet, still greater, I old, is the wisdom of the purchaser of the ezzotints, in which it was now William ard and now Raphael Smith who captured nd retained in black and white all, and some-imes more than all, the fascination of Mor-nd's art. These men and their fellows—Dean, nd John Young, and others—found in mezzot-aint the most perfect means of expressing such ruths and beauties, of light and form, of ostume and character, of town and country icident, of English landscape and interior ecoration, as they were mainly concerned ith; and, after having during the last genera-on and for no small part of our own ex-erperienced an inexcusable neglect, it is well that e works which they produced should have isen, of late, to a high place in public favour. The number of such prints—the number of ifferent subjects, I mean—executed after orland is quite amazing. The Messrs. okins exhibit about three hundred and wenty; and though a certain number of these are not mezzotints at all, but wrought in stipple, and a certain number are the mechan-ically "coloured" prints which appeal to minds the least instructed and eyes the least sensitive (there is a silly rage for them just now, with which the true collector has nothing to do), and a certain number again, albeit in mezzot-aint, are of somewhat inferior workmanship, it yet remains true that a remarkably large number are mezzotints of the highest class. The finest prints of all, as a rule, it may be said, are those which were wrought either by John Raphael Smith or by William Ward; and if between the works of these two men we must needs discriminate and pronounce, then it must be said, perhaps, that great as are the per-formances of John Raphael Smith, those of William Ward evince a yet closer and more sensitive appreciation of the characteristics of George Morland's art, of his aims as well as of his achievements.

I cannot think that the New English Art Club has quite so interesting an exhibition as usual. It is always worth seeing, because the contributors, or at all events many of them, aim rather at personal expression than at ful-filling the demands of the conventional; but works of high distinction are somehow for the most part lacking this winter—the masterpiece has been conceived, perhaps, but has scarcely been executed. M. Blanche, it is true—a foreign visitor and an honoured guest: a modern of the moderns—sends a single portrait of remark-able accomplishment, so far as it goes, but it is scarcely of the first order. Mr. Wilson Steer, whose work is wont to be among the most refined, the most individual, and the most engaging, furnishes a portrait of Miss Frowde, which has conspicuous qualities. Yet it is rather ragged: in texture not exactly pleasing; scarcely as a whole to be accounted such a success as more than one, for instance, of his earlier visions of Miss Pettigrew. Mr. Walter Sickert, in exposing a picture of the Hôtel Royal, Dieppe, has at all events sent a canvas of curious force and individuality: the memory of it does not, like that of too many works, pass at once out of the mind. Mr. Bernard Sickert, too, is interesting, even if incomplete. Mr. George Thomson is good. Mr. C. E. Holloway—a man of ability not, perhaps, fully recognised—paints the Thames this time, on the lines of Mr. Whistler. Where is Mr. Roussel, whose work is habitually engaging and artistic? Him, at least, we miss. Mr. Moffat Lindner sends an evening vision of that much painted town, the Yorkshire Richmond. Turnerian methods may have suggested something in the work, and the recent performances of M. Claude Monet may have been yet more influential. In any case, Mr. Lindner—whose work has not too often reached the level now attained—is to be con-gratulated on success. Mr. Brabazon reminds us, by his "Evening in Provence," that he is a refined and potent colourist. Is Avignon, I wonder, the place meant to be suggested in this agreeable record of atmospheric effect? Mr. Francis James, when he leaves his delightful flower-pieces, his roses and his orchids, and his equally forcible and refined studies of Nürem-burg and Rothenburg interiors, and addresses himself to pure landscape, has a singular faculty for the suggestion of stainless daylight. Crisp and clean in a remarkable degree is Mr. James's study of flat lands and intersecting waters—"Near Venice," it is called—in the present exhibition. The same so rare quality—and allied, as it is here, with an admirable definiteness of draughtsmanship—was to be noted, we remember, in his "Pankhurst's Shop," the outside of a Sussex wheelwright's, exhibited in the summer at Mr. Van Wisselingh's.

FREDERICK WEDMORE.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A LOST PICTURE.

In years gone by, previous to the revolution-ary convulsions of 1848, there was a notable picture in the Grand Ducal Gallery at Florence, of a lady, life size, three-quarter length, gloved on the left hand, and holding on her left arm, by a gold chain, an animal peculiar to the West Indies, Hayti, and South America, called the Agouti. The chain about her own neck she holds between her right hand fingers. This picture furnished Mrs. Merrifield with an illustration for her work, Dress as a Fine Art. The painter was Il Parmegiano, and the lady is supposed by some to represent his wife. This picture, together with another, a Gil Blas in the disguise of a physician feeling a lady's pulse, said to have been by Ribera or Velasquez, has disappeared since 1848. Can any of your readers give any clue to their whereabouts, the first one in particular?

X.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

THE following exhibitions will open next week: the thirty-second winter exhibition of sketches and studies by members of the Royal Society of Painters in Water Colours, in Pall Mall East; a collection of water-colour drawings of Spain, by Mr. A. Wallace Rimington (the etcher), at the Fine Art Society's, in New Bond-street; and a collection of water-colours, by Mr. D. S. MacColl (the critic), at the Goupil Gallery, Regent-street.

MESSRS. MATHIESON & BRISKINE announce a handsomely illustrated edition of "Tam O'Shanter," to be issued in parts, to sub-scribers only, in the course of next year. The illustrator is Mr. James E. Christie, who is painting six pictures specially for the work, which will be reproduced by the Goupil process of photo-aquatint. There will also be a fac-simile of the original MS. of the poem; and Prof. David Masson has undertaken to contribute an introductory preface, notes, &c., extending to about forty-eight pages.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL having completed the delivery of his Rhind Lectures in archæo-logy, they will be published very shortly by Messrs. William Blackwood & Sons, in a handy crown octavo volume. The subject of the course was "Scottish Land-Names: their Lan-guage and Lessons, with Rules to direct the Study of them."

THE December number of the Illustrated Archæologist will contain the paper read before the anthropological section of the British Association by Dr. Robert Munro, on "Flint Saws and Sickles." Other illustrated articles will be on "The Excavation of a Pictish Tower in Shetland," by Mr. Gilbert Goudie; and "The Celtic Brooch and how it was Worn," by the editor, Mr. J. Romilly Allen.

To help a very poor Church in South London, Mr. St. Chad Boscawen will give a lecture upon "The Threshold of History," on Monday, December 11, at 4.15 p.m., in the Banqueting Room, St. James's Hall. Tickets may be obtained from the lecturer, 29, Albert-square, Clapham-road, S.W.

THERE has just come to hand the first number of the publication which is the organ of the Society for Checking the Abuses—only the abuses, be it well understood—of Public Advertising. It is called A Beautiful World, is published by John Bale, of Great Titchfield-street, and will appear quarterly at the modest price of sixpence. A Beautiful World—not-withstanding a title that suggests the possibility of too exalted an ideal—is, we are delighted to see, a highly practical publication. In it the aims of the Society, which resents the recent developments of hideous street advertising, and the scarcely less offensive defacement of the fields by the erection of enamelled plates, are plainly set forth; and, from its contents, it is happily evident that some good has already come of the Society's efforts. Six hundred people—a very large proportion of them being the bearers of well-known and respected names—have already banded themselves together in the cause which this Society exists to further. The formation of branches in provincial towns is now advocated, that local opinion may be influenced; and the year 1894 is not likely to pass away without the introduction of a Bill resulting, it may ardently be hoped, in an accomplished Act of Parliament.

THE STAGE.

THE "ANTIGONE" IN FRENCH.

Paris: Nov. 25, 1893.

THE reprise, on Tuesday last, of "Antigone": "tragédie de Sophocle, mise à la scène française," by MM. Paul Meurice et Auguste Vacquerie," will be a red-letter day in the annals of the Comédie Française. "Antigone" was first performed at the Odéon in 1844; and the present revised version is a faithful translation from Sophocles into noble and sonorous French verse, while the scenic arrangements are copied, as closely as possible, from those which existed on the Athenian stage.

When the richly-painted curtain of Greek design sinks through the floor of the stage, the audience find themselves in front of the palace of Creon, built on a second stage, to which access is obtained by flights of steps on each side. The two central portals open on the atrium of the king's apartments, the door of the left wing of the palace gives access to the gynæceum, the right to the rooms occupied by the members of the household; the decoration is polychrome. Below the raised platform, on the ordinary stage, stands the altar of Dionysos, on each side of which are grouped the fourteen members of the Chorus (pupils of the Conservatoire); in the centre stands the Choregus. On the right we obtain a glimpse of the walls of the city; on the left is a vista of barren country; above, the bright blue sky.

With animated gesture, the Chorus, in strophe and antistrophe, chant the story of the attack and defence of the seven gates of Thebes, the dire conflict and death of Eteocles and Polyneices, and the coming of Creon. Antigone (Mlle. Bartet) appears draped in white and robed like a Tanagra statuette; in fervent yet subdued voice she tells Ismene that she is determined to set Creon's proclamations at defiance, and honour with funeral rites the remains of their brother Polyneices. In the next scene, the portals of the palace are thrown wide open by the guards, and Creon (M. Mounet-Sully) appears, splendidly attired and of imposing aspect.

The tragedy is divided into three parts, with entre-actes between, and pursues its fatal course with an ensemble at once impressive and picturesque. M. Mounet-Sully, in the first part, tears his passion rather too much to tatters, even for such a tyrant as Creon; but his rendering of the last scene is a noble example of histrionic art. His royal robes torn and soiled, his face haggard and pale, he returns bearing the corpse of Hamon, stopping at intervals to bewail "the irreparable and deadly errors of a perverted mind." With many efforts he drags the body gently up the steps which lead to the palace; but as he is about to cross the threshold, he finds himself face to face with the blood-stained body of his wife, Eurydice, lying at the base of the statue of Pallas, surrounded by her weeping attendants. Uttering a wail of anguish, he drops the body of his son and falls to the ground; then rises, and, moaning, totters off the stage, led by his officers: "Lead away now this shadow of a man, who, O my son, unwillingly slew thee, and thee, too, my wife. O wretched man that I am!"

Mlle. Bartet's Antigone is an exquisite piece of acting. It might, however, be objected that her demeanour is scarcely stern enough: that her attitude is not sufficiently defiant when she rebels against Creon's decree and calls upon him to remember that "the unwritten and immovable laws of the gods" are above all human rules. She possesses the sweet grace and melodious accents of Racine's heroines, rather than the proud and rebellious character which becomes the ill-fated daughter of Oedipus. But if she is at times wanting in energy, her rendering of the scene in which, "unwept, friendless, and unwedded," she is led away to her cavern-tomb was pathetic beyond description. M. de Férandy was perfect in the short but difficult part of the First Messenger. M. Paul Mounet, as Tiresias, delivered his imprecation against Creon with great effect. The other personages were as perfect as could be desired.

And now I come to the only serious criticism which can be made on this very remarkable performance; and it concerns the Chorus. When played at the Odéon in 1844, "Antigone" was accompanied by Mendelssohn's incidental music. For the present occasion, M. Saint-Saëns has composed a series of accompaniments and two songs, which are played by a small orchestra behind the scenes. The strophes and antistrophes, instead of being simply declaimed by the Choregus, are chanted by the "fourteen old men of Thebes," with the unfortunate result that the words are almost lost to the audience. This was particularly noticeable in the song of Eros, first sung in solo, then taken up in chorus; again, in the invocation, "O Bacchus, who dwellest in Thebes, the mother city of Bacchanals," the stirring strains of the orchestra, the clashing of the cymbals, formed a charming musical interlude, but fatal to the effect of the poet's verses. The beauty of the poem itself requires no music to enhance the impression it produces; the discreet accompaniment of a lyre or a flute, as used on the Greek stage, may sometimes be accepted to mark the rhythm of the lines, but no more.

Mme. Sarah Bernhardt has played "Phèdre" twice at afternoon performances; and the term "genius" may without exaggeration be used in speaking of the way in which she interpreted the part of Racine's heroine. I am only too pleased to offer this amende honorable, as I was rather severe with regard to her personification of the Princess Wilhelmine in "Les Rois."

CECIL NICHOLSON.

MUSIC.

MUSIC OF THE WEEK.

WAGNER has killed much music, but not Balfe's "Bohemian Girl." Every seat was filled at Drury Lane on Monday, on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of its production; and the favourite airs were received, as in the olden days, with enthusiasm. The opera has had a long life, and that life, as yet, is not ended. Many composers have arisen since the days of Balfe, and won the favour of the public: Gounod's "Faust," Bizet's "Carmen," and Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana" have achieved brilliant victories, but the "Bohemian Girl" has not been thrown into the shade. The special occasion will perhaps account for part of the enthusiasm, but we believe that this opera lives by reason of its genuineness. Balfe wrote as he felt. As compared with the melodies of Mozart, those of our English composer may be trivial, but they are thoroughly natural. Writers such as Schumann or Brahms often express their thoughts in a complicated manner, but such mode of expression with them—at any rate in their best works—is not forced. "Know thyself" was the advice of the ancient sage; "Be thyself" is a piece of advice on which composers who desire a lasting reputation will do well to reflect.

On Monday afternoon M. Siloti gave his second Pianoforte Recital. The most important piece of the programme was Schumann's Sonata in F sharp minor (Op. 11). His rendering of the short slow movement, though slightly affected, was good; but the rest of the work was played in a rough, spasmodic manner. Lately we differed from M. Paderewski in his interpretation of this Sonata; but that of M. Siloti was positively bad. Next came a series of pieces by Russian composers. Here the pianist was quite in his element; the tone was pleasing, and the technique perfect. The characteristic Prelude by Glazounoff and Rubinstein's Third Barcarolle were given with extreme delicacy, and the extremely difficult "Islamei" Fantasia by Balakireff was brilliantly played. Of the Chopin pieces of the first group, the A flat Ballade was the most successful; the Fantasia and the Barcarolle sounded cold. Perhaps Chopin would have played them thus had he lived amid the steppes of Russia instead of in the salons of Paris.

On Monday evening Dr. Stanford's Quartet for strings in G (Op. 44) was given for the first time at the Popular Concerts. This work, dedicated to the Newcastle Chamber Music Society, was actually played for the first time in London at one of the Kensington Guild concerts in 1892. In the opening Allegro the thematic material is not particularly fresh, yet it contains some good workmanship. But, as a whole, it is dry; the most striking passage is the one leading to the recapitulation section. The Poco allegro e grazioso which follows is a clever and concise movement: it has something in it of the spirit both of Mendelssohn and Brahms, though more of the latter. The Largo seems to us the finest portion of the Quartet. The broad principal theme sounds as if it were a solemn hymn sung by some ancient bard; the chords by which it is at first supported are quite in keeping with this idea. The theme is afterwards taken up by the cello, while the violin has a counter theme, which opens with the ecclesiastical phrase of which Mozart and Mendelssohn made such frequent use. The merry Finale brings the work to a successful close. The work was admirably performed by Lady Hallé, and Messrs. Gibson, Kreuz, and Piatti; Mr. Rees was absent for the first time for thirty years. Herr Schönberger, the pianist, played Chopin's Fantasia in F minor: the opening was affected, and many subsequent passages were given in a hard, unsympathetic manner. But he was recalled, and gave the first Prelude and Fugue from the Well-tempered Clavier. Mr. and Mrs. Oudin were the vocalists, and much applauded.

J. S. SHEDLOCK.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTIONS

TO THE ACADEMY.

(PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.)

	YEARLY.	HALF-YEARLY.	QUARTERLY.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
If obtained of a Newsvendor or at a Railway Station	0 13 0	0 6 6	0 3 3
Including Postage to any part of the United Kingdom	0 15 2	0 7 7	0 3 10
Including Postage to any part of France, Germany, India, China &c.	0 17 4	0 8 8	0 4 4

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 9, 1893.

No. 1127, New Series.

THE EDITOR cannot undertake to return, or to correspond with the writers of, rejected manuscripts.

It is particularly requested that all business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., may be addressed to the PUBLISHER, and not to the EDITOR.

LITERATURE.

Letters of James Russell Lowell. Edited by Charles Eliot Norton. In 2 vols. (Osgood, McIlvaine & Co.)

In his brief "editorial note," Mr. Eliot Norton has explained that his "attempt was to secure" for the work "so far as possible an autobiographic character." This, no doubt, was a good plan in its way; but if there was an intention to make this collection of letters serve in place of a biography, we fear the editorial judgment was at fault. For, at the very best, such a collection is an inconvenient and roundabout process for getting at any total conception of a man's career and character. In the first place, unless the writer of the letters be a much more regular correspondent than Mr. Lowell was, gaps are inevitable; and such gaps are likely to occur at the most important points when, under the pressure of other interests, letter-writing would be neglected. In the second place, in familiar letters so much is necessarily allusive, the knowledge of the receiver of the letter being properly assumed. But the stranger who reads, years afterwards, needs explanation and description, which it is the business of the biographer to give. Although, in the present case, the editor has added an occasional useful footnote or paragraph, there is still much which to the reader of the present day conveys no meaning whatever. Finally, with a biographical intent in view, letters, and passages from letters, have been inserted which are of no real importance. In short, while we have here too much for a perfect collection of letters, we have not enough material of the right kind for a sufficient record of the life.

Assuredly Mr. Norton, in his time, has done some admirable editing, and there is nothing in the present work to indicate that it is not admirably edited also. On the contrary, no reader can doubt that infinite pains have been expended on it, and that the result is, on the whole, after making the deductions we have just indicated, highly satisfactory. We could wish, indeed, that Messrs. Osgood's edition, published in England, contained the three portraits which, we understand, Messrs. Harper give to American readers; but Mr. Norton is not responsible for this. The only anxiety we feel, when we receive a book of this kind from Mr. Norton's hands, is lest, in striving to maintain his character as a discreet editor, he may have failed to be as judicious as an editor should be. Mr. Norton belongs to the school of which the late Mr. Bowdler was an eminent representative: a school which assumes the existence of a class of readers always hankering after something they should not know, and which, instead of studying the interests of more worthy persons, devotes itself to thwarting those unholy desires. The intention is excellent; but misunderstanding is only too likely to be the result. Here, as ever, Mr. Norton harps on the old string: "Vulgar curiosity . . . always alert to spy"; "the infidelities of untrustworthy friends," &c. Surely any man who is not ashamed of his life will pray that the perpetuation of his memory may not fall into the hands of the Bowdlerisers, for their very manner and language suggest concealment, even where there is really nothing to conceal. Mr. Norton affirms that "there was nothing in Mr. Lowell's life to be concealed or excused." We are quite sure of that. A more obviously candid man than Mr. Lowell it would be difficult to name. Anyone acquainted with only his public writings can surely see this much. Why, then, in such a case, allude to vulgar curiosity at all, or even hint at concealment? Montaigne's precept should be hung up as an illuminated text on the walls of the workrooms of all biographers and editors of letters: "All actions equally become and equally honour a wise man." The biographer or editor who rises to the height of this sentiment does not either conceal or excuse. He does not bind himself to tell everything, and he does not tell everything; but neither does he explain that he has made omissions or feel that such an explanation is needed. And for this reason: that he knows his business is to give a total impression which is absolutely true; and his skill consists in so arranging the material he selects for use, that the "honour" in the actions may be made manifest. Then, while "vulgar curiosity" is not gratified, the honest reader feels secure in the knowledge that he is studying the life of a real man, and not some maimed and distorted monstrosity, substituted for the reality by reason of an unworthy fear of Mrs. Grundy.

Taking the book as it is, however, there undoubtedly is much to be thankful for. If Mr. Lowell cannot properly be described as a great letter writer, he is, for that very reason, in some ways the more pleasing. His letters are totally without affectation of any kind. He was accustomed to write freely what was uppermost in his mind, conscious only of the one reader whom he was addressing, and not eager to present a finished essay even to him. As a consequence, his letters belong less to literature than to life. They reflect his passing moods, and thereby his character very accurately. We see here the cordial, straightforward, earnest man, whom we have met before, but less intimately, in his books: the steadfast friend and good hater, the man of strong animal spirits, who, if sometimes depressed, was too buoyant to be depressed for long. Here are keenness, energy, impetuous generosity. In fact, here are all the qualities which go to make (what we have already in the ACADEMY maintained that Mr. Lowell was) a man of the world of the best type. Scattered up and down are also some good bits of criticism of men and things, and of course many admirable epigrammatic phrases.

English politics and politicians interested Mr. Lowell while he was resident in this country, and he did not fail to express his private opinion of some of the leaders. Writing in 1884 to Mr. Eliot Norton, he remarked:

"What puzzles and sometimes bores me in Gladstone is that he takes as much interest in one thing as in another; and is as diffusively emphatic about it—in John Inglesant (which I couldn't read) as in Gordon." (II. 321.)

Two years later he noted "one secret" of Mr. Gladstone's power as a speaker, "that he is capable of improvising convictions." Of Lord Randolph Churchill in 1886 he said, he "is taken seriously now and will have a front seat. He ought to build a temple to the goddess Push." With reference to Mr. John Morley, he noted that—

"The cheerful fanaticism of his face is always exhilarating to me, though I feel that it would have the same placidly convinced expression if my head were rolling at his feet, at the exigencies of some principle." (II. 379.)

Turning to literary topics, we find this acute remark about Dickens:

"Dickens appears to make his characters as the Chinese do those distorted wooden images. He picks out the crookedest and knottiest roots of temperament or accidental distortion, and then cuts a figure to match." (I. 349.)

On one occasion he had been asked to write an article on De Quincey, but he excused himself on the ground that he never wrote about anyone without reading him through, so as to get a total impression—which shows how thorough he was in his work—and he added: "The only feeling I find in my memory concerning him is that he was a kind of inspired cad; and an amplification of that, with critical rosewater, wouldn't answer your purpose."

That Mr. Lowell liked England and its people there is no room to doubt. He visited us often, and felt at home among us; but, for all that, he was a very thorough American. "The more I see of the Old World," he said on one occasion, "the better I like the New." Our aristocracy did not inspire him with reverence. "I like men vastly better than dukes," he said, though he admitted that where the two qualities were united he was willing to encounter the product; and he was pleased to admit that the Duc d'Aumale had "a real genius for looking like a gentleman." Of the French generally he said they "are the most wonderful creatures for talking wisely and acting foolishly I ever saw"; and again:

"The French are fearfully and wonderfully made in some respects, but I like them and their pretty ways. It is a positive pleasure (after home experiences where one has to pad himself all over against the rude elbowing of life) to go and buy a cigar. It is an affair of the highest and most gracious diplomacy." (ii. 102-3.)

Still, he took care, in the same letter, to refer to Americanism, "which weighs a man honestly, without throwing in the bones of his ancestors."

Of passages of wit and wisdom there are many, of course: such as—

"What a frank creature the sun is, to be sure, as an artist. He would almost take the nonsense out of a Frenchman."

"Tailors, by the way, differ from the rest of mankind in this, that whereas all other men in Adam died, so, by the consequence of Adam's transgression, these get their living."

"Death is a private tutor. We have no fellow scholars, and must lay our lessons to heart alone."

Not the least remarkable fact made visible by this book is the steadfastness of Mr. Lowell's friendship. In his case the rule seemed to be: once a friend, always a friend. These letters are addressed to comparatively few persons, whose names figure for many years. Some of the most touching passages relate to this theme of friendship. In 1871 Mr. Lowell wrote:

"It is always my happiest thought that, with all the drawbacks of temperament (of which no one is more keenly conscious than myself), I have never lost a friend. For I would rather be loved than anything else in the world."

And again, a little earlier:

"When my heart is warm towards anyone I like all about him, and this is why I am so bad (or so good) a critic, just as you choose to take it. If women only knew how much woman there is in me, they would forgive all my heresies on the woman question—I mean they would, if they were not women."

These quotations indicate pretty accurately, we think, the positive merits of the volumes.

WALTER LEWIN.

The History of London. By Walter Besant. (Longmans.)

THE ambitious-sounding title which—possibly with some subtly humorous intention—Mr. Besant has chosen to give to this little book is very far from suggesting a correct notion of its purpose. A better, or at least a more accurately descriptive, name would have been "Lessons on the History of London for London Boys and Girls." That such a book was needed is obvious: the wonder is that the need has not long ago been supplied. Mr. Besant's volume is in plan and style exactly what was wanted. An elaborate detailed history on the one hand, or a meagre chronicle of events and dates on the other, would have been equally useless for the end in view, which is to awaken in young Londoners an intelligent interest in the past of their city, and to impart such a knowledge of the cause of London's greatness as will be of practical use to those who will one day have to perform the duties of citizens. The author has made no attempt at completeness of narrative, but has judiciously selected such incidents and facts in the history of London as are best worth knowing, and has treated them in such a way as to bring out both their intrinsic interest and the illustration which they are suited to afford of the spirit of former ages, and of the course of development in institutions, manners, and sentiments. The book well deserves to be used in every school in London, and older readers than those for whom it is primarily intended may derive pleasure and instruction from its pages. The "illustrations" are worthy of that much misused name, and are both well chosen and well executed.

Excellent as the book is, however, it contains a considerable number of errors of detail which it is to be hoped will be corrected in a future edition. They are not of great intrinsic importance, and are seldom or never of the author's own making, being mostly copied from writers of authority, by whom it is pardonable to be led astray. Still, it is especially desirable that a work of this kind should be as accurate as it can possibly be made; and perhaps the space that can be given to this article may be more usefully employed in an attempt to correct Mr. Besant's mistakes, trivial though they may be, than in a detailed justification of the high praise expressed in the foregoing paragraph.

One of the most persistently repeated of etymological fallacies is that the name of London means "the lake fort." Mr. Besant says (the punctuation, which is a little puzzling, is the author's own):

"The fort was called Llyn-din—the Lake Fort. When the Romans came, they could not pronounce the word Llyn—Thlin in the British way—and called it Lon—hence their name Londinium."

Now it is perfectly certain that the Britons of the first century did not speak modern Welsh, though they did speak a language out of which modern Welsh has been developed by a long process of gradual change. It has of late years been found possible, by a comparison of the Celtic languages with each other, and by utilising the evidence furnished by ancient Celtic proper names, to arrive at fairly certain conclusions with regard to some of the phonetic and grammatical features of the ancient British tongue. On the ground of these conclusions it may be affirmed that, if the compound which a modern Welshman would write Llyn-ddin existed in the first century, it must have had the form Lindodunon. It is not easy to imagine any reason why the Romans should have found any difficulty in pronouncing this name correctly. Even if the Britons did pronounce the initial l after the fashion of the modern Welsh ll (which is, to say the least, not proved), the difficulty with the initial does not explain why the Romans chose to say Londinium instead of Lindodunum. As a matter of fact, where it is possible to test by etymology the Roman renderings of Celtic names, they are usually found to be remarkably correct—at any rate, when the places denoted by the names were well known; and if Latin historians and inscriptions give us the name of a British city as Londinium, it is reasonable to believe that *Londinium was what the natives called it themselves. What the real derivation of Londinium may be is a doubtful question on which I do not wish here to enter; but I believe all Celtic philologists will agree that, if the name cannot be explained without arbitrarily altering its recorded form, it ought to be treated as, for the present, inexplicable.

Another fallacious statement is that "the governing body [of London before the Norman Conquest] was the 'Knigheten Guild.'" If some intelligent foreigner, writing about London under Queen Victoria, were to say that its municipal government was in the hands of the Stock Exchange, or of the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, his representation would probably be about as near the truth as the assertion which Mr. Besant has adopted from Mr. Loftie. It is true that an association called cnihla gild is known to have existed in London as in some other towns, and seems to have been an influential body, most likely because of its possession of corporate property and the wealth and station of its members. Whether its purposes were primarily religious or social, or whether it was chiefly a sort of mutual insurance society, there appears to be no evidence to determine. But the fancy that it had anything to do with municipal government has no foundation whatever. It is recorded (whether truly or not) that the society was dissolved in 1125, and that its fifteen members, after making over the landed property of the body to the priory of Christ Church or Holy Trinity, were admitted as inmates of that establishment.

* There may have been also another form, Londomion, which has some documentary authority, and from which the English form of the name seems to descend.

In the derivation of local and other names Mr. Besant has often followed untrustworthy guides. The name of Charing Cross has nothing to do with Edward I.'s chère reine. The name of St. Mary Woolnoth is not derived from the word wool; the affixed word, as Mr. Round some time ago pointed out in the ACADEMY, is the old English personal name Wulfnoth. The title of another church, Saint Benet Sherehog, is explained by Mr. Besant as meaning "skin the pig." But shearing and skinning are two different operations. Perhaps Mr. Besant will be surprised to learn that people used to shear "hogs," and actually to get wool from them: they do it still in some parts of Yorkshire. Chelsea cannot be "chesil island," and Battersea is neither "Batter's island" nor "the island of boats," but, according to the documents, Beadoric's island. The Steelyard was not "the Yard where a Steel or Balance had formerly been kept." A balance was never called a "steel," though a certain kind of balance was called a steelyard—i.e., as understood by Englishmen, a rod of steel; but the word has probably been corrupted by popular etymology. The name Steelyard, as designating the house of the Hanse merchants in London, has an intricate history, which has not yet been fully cleared up. The words Gaul and Gaelic have no etymological connexion, as Mr. Besant's italics seem intended to imply that they have; nor was the Gaulish tongue more akin to Gaelic than to Welsh. Finsbury is not derived from fen. Westminster was not so called to distinguish it from "St. Paul's, which was the East Minister"; the true explanation is given by the author himself elsewhere. Perhaps Mr. Besant may think it pedantic if I object to the expression "to hold a witan"; but what would he say of any one who talked of the Romans "holding a patres conscripti"? Yet this would be a strictly parallel mistake. The last point that I shall mention is that the author gives for Chaucer's birth a date which all competent inquirers are now agreed in regarding as erroneous.

If it were necessary that London children should be misinformed about these matters as a condition of receiving the valuable teaching so pleasantly conveyed in this volume, it would no doubt be worth while to pay the price. However, the teacher who uses the book can obelize the questionable statements; and if Mr. Besant ever finds leisure to investigate for himself the points to which I have called attention, he will probably think it needful to make some corrections that will render a good book still better.

HENRY BRADLEY.

THREE BOOKS ON SOUTH AFRICA.

Adventures in Mashonaland. By Two Hospital Nurses: Rose Blennerhassett and Lucy Sleeman. (Macmillans.)

Among Boers and Basutos. By Mrs. Barkly. (Remington.)

Khama, the African Chief. By Mrs. Wyndham Knight-Bruce. With a Preface by Edna Lyall. (Kegan Paul & Co.)

It is delightful to encounter a book to which one can accord something like uncompromising praise. The first volume on our list has a remarkable fascination, even for those not specially interested in South Africa. It possesses most of the virtues and none of the faults incident to this class of literature. The author is never prolix, never unduly egotistical; she dwells upon the adventures she shared with Miss Sleeman with just the amount of detail and personal gossip, proper to give spice to her story. The splendid spirit which enabled these two ladies to brave the dangers of the African wilds, sustains them in this milder but scarcely less hazardous enterprise; for assuredly Adventures in Mashonaland is a performance of which a practised writer would have no reason to be ashamed. Over and over again, places, persons, incidents, and situations, and more than these, the political and social aspects of the great experiment in imperial extension, upon the later developments of which all eyes are now turned, are brought home to us in pictures, vivid in their intensity and as true as they are vivid. Miss Blennerhassett hits off these pictures with enviable ease, employing remarkably few words in achieving her purpose. Let the reader turn to p. 30, where in one short paragraph we are brought face to face with Bishop Knight-Bruce. The description of Mr. Rhodes is no less vivid. "We were especially charmed by the great man's simple manners and boyish enjoyment of a joke . . . He is the darling of Fortune, and that blind goddess does not often select her favourites from the Sunday-school." Anyone who has not grasped the fact before will feel, in reading Miss Blennerhassett's plain, unvarnished account of the Cape Premier's doings when he visited the Pioneers' camp at Umtali, that, in him, South Africa has discovered the greatest Englishman who has ever directed her fortunes—a man, in fact, who, should no accident of policy or conduct cut short his career, may live to solve the imperial problem, using the word imperial in its broadest significance. Miss Blennerhassett is no less successful in presenting us with a portrait of Mr. Selous, who is known throughout South Africa as the man who "never tells a lie"; while the popular faith in Mr. Rhodes takes the form of invoking him, when any difficulty arises, as the man who will "square it."

After reading this modestly written narrative, and that of Mrs. Barkly, it will be obvious that in opening up new countries it is not men alone who show a cheerful readiness to face danger and privation. Miss Blennerhassett tells us that zeal for hospital reform led her to become a nurse. In 1890 an epidemic of typhoid was raging at Johannesburg, and trained nurses were sorely needed. Miss Blennerhassett volunteered to go out to the "Golden City." She did excellent work there, and afterwards at Kimberley she continued her ministrations to the sick. About to return home, she was intercepted by Bishop Knight-Bruce, who prevailed upon her and Miss Sleeman to accompany him to Manicaland, to nurse the trekkers and settlers in the country then being opened up by the Chartered Company. But the bishop's zeal went in front of his performance. The ladies were condemned to experience agonising delays, and constant chopping of plans; until deserted by the bishop, who was compelled to go on in front of them, they had ultimately to make their way to Beira alone. Arriving there, they discovered that no means of transit into the interior was available. The Portuguese and the Chartered Company were at each other's throats; the famous battle of Chua (Masse-Kesse) had just been fought. Urged by well-intentioned and kindly counsellors to go home and abandon the enterprise as hopeless, these intrepid women would listen to no such advice. They drifted to Mozambique and Quilimane, finding means, on their return, to get carried up the Púngwé to 'Mpanda's. There any provision for further transit was wanting. Nothing daunted, they determined to accomplish the journey to Umtali on foot; and they actually set out, accompanied by Dr. Granville, medical officer to the mission, and by seven "boys." Lady Florence Dixie does not mind telling us that Sir Beaumont did not prove an ideal helpmate during her Zululand adventures, and these ladies are not at pains to conceal the fact that they entertained no very high opinion of their male companion. It is evident, however, that poor Dr. Granville was quite unfitted for roughing it up country, and his fate should warn delicate men to eschew such enterprises. But Miss Blennerhassett is the soul of charity, and she does not make capital out of the doctor's ineptitude. She is evidently strong all round, and has the tolerance of all strong persons for weakness. Thus the drink failing, which is, as everyone who has been in Africa knows, the great curse of the country, is excused on the score of the mnusi arising from enforced idleness; and this notwithstanding the fact that her difficulties as a nurse were, in a large number of cases, greatly increased by reason of the intemperate lives her patients had led.

It will not be necessary to go further into the details of these ladies' journey to Umtali and their experiences there.

Deserted by bearers; beset by lions, leopards, crocodiles, rats, and insects; stricken by fever; bereft of provisions and money—nothing but a positive passion for nursing and the true altruistic spirit could have sustained them. Even now, as we learn from the narrative of Mr. Ellerton Fry, who has just started the work of constructing the trans-continental telegraph from Cape Town to Cairo, the journey from Beira to Umtali is not without its difficulties. What it was two years and a half ago this book discloses.

The book I have left was refreshing reading. It not only revived one's respect for the Chartered Company and its leaders, which recent revelations had weakened, but it assured us that the spirit of such women as the Countess of Pembroke and Florence Nightingale lives in our countrywomen to-day. Among Boers and Basutos confirms this last belief, while it certainly does much to increase our admiration for the African pioneer. If Arthur Cecil Stuart Barkly was not a hero, then no such type exists; while the becoming modesty of Mrs. Barkly's narrative is not likely to blind the reader to the fact that, in her way, this wife was no less heroic than her husband. Without making an attempt at literary perfection, the author of this interesting book paints for home readers a vivid picture of life among the Basutos. We see how this branch of the great Bantu race live, and how English folk fared among them in those days immediately preceding, and succeeding, the ill-fated policy of disarmament. Most English gentlewomen would think it hard enough to be called upon to rough it as, even in the days of peace and tranquillity, Mrs. Barkly roughed it. Not to see a white woman for six months, to be without servants, with little children to look after, besides constantly having to cook and attend to other domestic affairs, to see after the cows and horses, to superintend the bread-making, curing hams and bacon, making butter, drying sheep-skins and preparing them, drying fruit, keeping an eye on the garden and the wheatfields, and washing linen, with a thunderstorm every afternoon thrown in—surely, this is what the vulgar would call "a large order." But this was nothing to the terrible experiences which followed, when, banished to Wepener, in the Orange Free State, Mrs. Barkly eagerly awaited news from her husband, shut up as he was in Mafeteng, which he held for the Queen, with a little force of eight Europeans and a few score natives, against seven to eight thousand determined Basutos.

The book speaks well of the missionaries, though it confirms Miss Blennerhassett's statement that the French missionaries achieve the greatest measure of success. The reason is, that they begin at the right end. They teach first the dignity of labour and its inevitableness. One is inclined, however, to question the accuracy of the information which Mr. Barkly received and transmitted to Sir Henry, regarding the disaster at Isandhlwana; nor is one quite satisfied with the account of certain uses to which dynamite was put during the rebellion. We are glad that neither of these writers make the gorge to rise by tall talk about the spread of Christianity and the march of civilisation in Africa. It is far better to be frank, and to confess that in all these extensions of spheres of influence and annexations of territory, we are simply carrying out an inevitable law which decrees that we must spread ourselves over the earth; while we are more consciously engaged in seeking new markets for our goods, and fresh homes for our surplus people.

We must not blame Mrs. Wyndham Knight-Bruce in that she attempts to prove too much in her little book about that remarkable man Khama, the paramount chief of the Bechuana. It is as irrational to make Christianity responsible for the rascals, which it is notorious throughout South Africa the mission stations turn out, as to ascribe all Khama's excellent qualities to his acceptance of the Christian faith. Still, it is doubtful whether Khama would have been the splendid fellow he is, had he not come under the influence, during his boyhood, of a Lutheran missionary. The particular creed under which he was made to see the beauty of the moral law, or to be more accurate, the creed which stimulated his inborn perception of that law, would be extra-human indeed, if it did not make capital out of this conspicuous success, while ignoring its many lamentable failures. Nevertheless, it is the duty of everyone who knows anything about the under-current of African affairs, to expose all attempts to confuse the issues in dealing with that country. The virtues of Khama, the Christian, of which Mr. John Mackenzie and others were telling an unheeding public years ago, are now brought into the light of day, that their white effulgence may contrast dramatically with the blackness of Lobengula. But, if any one will read the early history of the Matabele king, as set forth in a MS. from the pen of the late Thomas Baines, recently discovered in the office of the Natal Mercury, and which reached this country a fortnight ago, he will see that this potentate is by no means so black as he is painted, while Major Leonard's testimony is to the same effect. The upshot of these remarks is that Mrs. Knight Bruce's book should clench the teaching of the others, which tends, as it seems to me, to enforce the lesson that, although it is right and proper we should gain a general influence over the natives of Africa, still Africa is not for us a nation, it is for the Africans. We might, indeed, destroy them with dynamite and Maxim guns, though when Khama can show a community, happier and more truly prosperous than any European state, what right have we to talk cynically about the survival of the fittest and the inevitable fate of inferior races? The one great and paramount temptation before us in Africa, which we have to face and to crush under foot, is to be rid of the natives by the easy means of giving them free access to alcohol. If we flood the country with drink, we shall destroy the native races, and we can go in and possess the land undisturbed. But retribution will be swift and certain. Prolonged manual labour is impossible for the European in Africa, so that without the natives we must perish. The eloquent words of Khama may be fitly quoted in conclusion :

"Lobengula never gives me a sleepless night; but to fight against drink is to fight against demons, and not against men. I dread the white man's drink more than the assegais of the Matabele, which kill men's bodies and is quickly over; but drink puts devils into men, and destroys both their souls and their bodies for ever. Its wounds never heal. I pray your Honour never to ask me to open even a little door to the drink."

JAMES STANLEY LITTLE.

NEW NOVELS.

The Handsome Humes. By William Black. In 3 vols. (Sampson Low.)

Outlaw and Lawmaker. By Mrs. Campbell Praed. In 3 vols. (Chatto & Windus.)

The Romance of a Country. By M. A. Courtois. In 2 vols. (Fisher Unwin.)

Alice Lauder. By Mrs. J. Glenny Wilson. (Osgood, McIlvaine & Co.)

The Haunted Station, and other Stories. By Hume Nisbet. (White.)

A Singer from the Sea. By Amelia E. Barr. (Hutchinson.)

Upper Bohemians. By F. G. Walpole. (Digby, Long & Co.)

A Liberal Education. By Mrs. George Martyn. (Frederick Warne.)

ALTHOUGH The Handsome Humes, as a whole, is not equal to Mr. Black's best work, it contains two or three scenes which he has never excelled for genuine, unstrained pathos. The descriptions are also excellent, and the scenery round about Henley and Oxford is touched in with remarkable fidelity. The author has somewhat handicapped himself by his choice of subject, and it argues unusual literary ability on his part to have more than overcome his difficulties. Sidney Hume is a scion of a proud and handsome race. He is introduced to us on his coming of age, and his mother is anxious that he should make a great match in the world. For that reason she cultivates Lady Helen Yorke, the only child of the wealthy Earl of Monks-Hatton. Lady Helen admires Sidney on her own account, and angles for his affections with no little skill and persistency. But, alas for her! Sidney Hunt has fallen in love with Anne Summers, a girl fair as the spring, but the daughter of an ex-pugilist! In extenuation, we must hasten to add that never was seen a superior man to this in the character of a prize-fighter, while rarely had any man—prize-fighter, aristocrat, or poet—had such a lovely daughter as Anne Summers. Their affection is mutual and instantaneous; but troubles arise, and the course of their love runs anything but smoothly. Mrs. Hume discovers it, and waxes wroth; Lady Helen discovers it, and, knowing her own affection to be hopeless, abandons the chase; and old Summers discovers it, and resolves to efface himself. With a breaking heart, he tears himself away from his daughter—who is the very light of his life—and sails for the Antipodes. He will not stand in her way; and he knows that, if he remains in England, the Humes and society at large will look down on his child. After some years, unable to resist his longing for her, he returns, witnesses for a brief moment her married happiness, and then indirectly lays down his life for her. In the end, Hume's own family come to be proud of his young wife, and of her uncommon beauty, for wherever she goes she is the cynosure of all eyes. We can congratulate Mr. Black on producing a very charming novel, and one which demonstrates that his power of entertaining his many readers is far from dying out.

Mrs. Campbell Praed never wrote a more exciting story of Australian life than Outlaw and Lawmaker. It is full of go from beginning to end, the reader's attention being kept constantly on the stretch. The various characters, also, are drawn with more graphic power than this authoress usually exhibits, while the pictures of life and descriptions of scenery in the Bush are very vivid. But when we have awarded this high praise, the reservations begin. The human passion manifested is somewhat too warm, and we are not sure that the unconventional but fascinating heroine, Elsie Valliant, will be quite appreciated by the phlegmatic Britisher. The best of her lovers, Frank Hallett—a worthy young fellow in every respect—she treats coolly and cruelly; from a second, Lord Astar, she accepts a magnificent set of diamonds, only to find his intentions are dishonourable; a third violently takes her in his arms and imprints burning kisses upon her lips: while a fourth drugs her with chloroform, and carries her off to a mountain fastness. As Elsie was discontented with the placid existence led by her sister, Lady Ina Gage, and was always craving for excitement, it must be confessed that she had plenty of it. But, in the end, she lost all her lovers. One of them died a violent death, another went after other game, the third disappeared as completely as though he had been swallowed up by an earthquake, and the fourth—the best and most highly esteemed of the party—married her sister, became a prominent Australian politician, and lived happily ever afterwards. The hero, Morris Blake, of Barolin Gorge, is an Irishman who had been implicated in the Fenian rising, and who was supposed to have been drowned. But he settled in Australia, where he led a dual existence. As "Moonlight," he was a notorious desperado and outlaw, who committed the most startling robberies, and defied all the civil forces of the colony. As a citizen, he was a brave, handsome fellow, with an all-conquering eye and an eloquent tongue. He was elected to the Legislature, and his powers of oratory were such that he was appointed Colonial Secretary. By a fine stroke of irony, he was urged, in this capacity, to take vigorous measures to apprehend the terror of the colony, "Moonlight"—himself, to wit. No wonder a man so strangely out of the common acquired an irresistible hold over Elsie Valliant. His end was dramatic, in keeping with his life. He had just succeeded to the headship of his family as Baron Coola, when his double identity became known in the colony, and he was hunted to his death. His old chum, Dominic Trant—who had some power of hypnotism, and was the lover who drugged Elsie—was supposed to have had to do with his betrayal. It will be seen, from this brief synopsis of the main narrative, that lovers of the sensational will find plenty of material here to whet their appetite.

Considerable power of imagination is displayed in The Romance of a Country. The author calls his story "A Masque," which is a great straining of an old poetic term. However, the matter is of little consequence, for one can cheerfully acknowledge that it has no slight idyllic and dramatic claims. In the first volume, the fair country is sought; while, in the second, it is found. Both search and discovery are accompanied by many sad scenes; yet the fortunes of Ascar, Alvo, Ivlon, Ered, and others will be traced with real but melancholy interest. There is true pathos in the chapters describing the death of Ivlon, the meeting of Ascar and Ered after untold suffering, and the great struggle of Alvo with his enemies. If the work should have any allegorical meaning, we have failed to discover it. In any case, it is far superior to most of the works of the half-mythical and wholly bloodthirsty school of fiction, which is now so much in vogue.

A light and delicate touch is observable in Alice Lauder, which, on the whole, is admirably written. The author has a faculty for seizing upon the minor shades of character, and also for depicting the poetic aspects of nature. It is a story of the Antipodes, and the burden of it is the resolve of the heroine to put away from her the delights of love in order to devote herself to the operatic or dramatic stage. Both she and the principal male personage, Arthur Campbell, are well drawn. Occasionally we meet with a humorous bit of description, as in the case of Lady May Carr, who walked the deck of the Suez "with that superb air of self-satisfaction which only an Englishwoman of a certain rank, supported by a lifetime of cold baths, High Church services, Parisian corset makers, and invitations to Court can possibly command."

Eerie, ghostly, gruesome, are the epithets best befitting Mr. Hume Nisbet's collection of stories, The Haunted Station, &c. Unlike many doctor's prescriptions, we should feel inclined to label this volume, "Not to be taken at bedtime." Seriously, some of these psychological stories are very clever, though their creepiness equals their cleverness. One or two of them might have been left unwritten, as there seems to be no useful purpose answered in making the reader sup full of horrors. We cannot help feeling glad, however, when retribution—in the form he dreads it most, that is, disgorged wealth—overtakes Mr. John Dagget, the evil spirit of "A Deadly Voyage." He was the owner of many coffin-ships, and his principal business was to sink them, to drown the sailors, and to rob the widow and the fatherless. The last sketch in the volume, "Humphrey Bolin's Account of the Spanish Armada," is in a different vein from the rest, being a breezy and vigorous transcript from one of the most stirring pages in English history.

Mrs. Barr's story, A Singer from the Sea, is equal to anything she has ever written for power of character-delineation and literary finish. The narrative deals with fisher-life on the wildest part of the Cornish coast; and John and Joan Penelles, with their daughter Denas, are real people, throbbing with human emotions and vitality. Denas had a piquant face, which developed into one of actual beauty, and a strange haunting voice, upon which crowds came to hang enraptured when she sang fisher-songs. She was made much of by her friend Elizabeth Tresham, who belonged to an old family; but Miss Tresham threw her over when she found that her brother Roland Tresham was making love to her. Roland and Denas eventually eloped together, and, having been married at Plymouth, went on to London, where Denas took to the stage, and made a considerable success. Roland at length thought they would do better in the States; but on arriving there they failed completely, and passed through terrible suffering. Tresham was a weak, vain, selfish creature, and he abandoned his wife to utter poverty and despair. She lost her child, and found her husband—but only to lose him also. He was repentant, however, and nothing in life became him like the leaving of it. Denas returned to the home of her youth, where she was reconciled to her parents, and married her old honest lover, Tristram Penrose. Several of the scenes are pathetically treated, and the whole sketch is distinguished for its fidelity to local circumstances, character, and scenery.

A ruthless exposure of the seamy side of life in certain aristocratic circles is made by Mr. Walpole in Upper Bohemians. The hero, Sir Hubert de Rasleigh, "was strikingly handsome, with dark waving hair, large deep-blue eyes, jet-black moustache, and a full mouth"; but he had "a frequent curl of the upper lip, which conveyed an expression of disdain and cynicism." That upper lip had much to answer for. Sir Hubert played it very low down on Coralie, an actress, cruelly injured his wife, and betrayed a young Italian duchess. He fell into the clutches of a pair of harpies, Mr. and Mrs. Fairfield, who lived on their aristocratic dupes, and who eventually caused Sir Hubert to be tried for forgery. How he escaped sentence the reader must discover for himself. The novel is decidedly clever; but while moving among the hypocrites of the gilded saloons, we long for an occasional breath of fresh air.

A Liberal Education—the latest addition to the dainty little series known as "The Tavistock Library"—is a sketch of the career of one Hector Argentine, an undergraduate, who is cut off by his father with the proverbial shilling, on account of his youthful follies. But adversity, combined with his love for Daisy Lambert—a bewitching little creature—prove the saving of Argentine. He goes through many perils in India, but survives the dangers of the battle-field, after showing no ordinary heroism, to win his English flower, and wear her for life. The respective fathers of the two lovers are old Anglo-Indian officers, and they are drawn with some skill. Certain parts of the story are rather thin, but as a whole it is prettily written. The writer is also happy in describing an English landscape.

G. BARNETT SMITH.

NOTES AND NEWS.

WE hear that Mr. William Heinemann has decided to publish a complete edition of the works of Turgeneff, in ten or twelve volumes, newly translated into English by Mrs. Garnett. The edition will be equipped with prefaces and notes.

MESSRS. SWAN SONNENSCHN & Co. have just sent to press an important work by Miss Edith Simcox. Its title will be Primitive Civilisations; and its chief concern is to sketch the history of ownership and agrarian and economic conditions among ancient Egyptians and Babylonians, ancient and modern Chinese, and some scattered stocks of apparently kindred origin. The book is not designed to support any particular historic or economic theory, though the evidence it brings together does, as a matter of fact, tend to favour the views of a group of scholars who—on quite other grounds—assume a prehistoric connexion between the men of China and Babylonia, and of Babylonia and Egypt; and it at the same time goes to show that the stability of these primitive states was not unconnected with the character of their economic system, which contained some fundamentally humane and democratic elements. This comparative study of their characteristic institutions throws curious light on questions of ethnographic relationship, and deals with such questions as marriage, the family, early law and customs.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. announce a volume of Charges and Addresses by Bishop Westcott.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & Co. will publish in a few days Dr. William L. Davidson's Burnett Lectures for 1892 and 1893, entitled Theism, as grounded in Human Nature, historically [and critically handled.

MESSRS. W. H. ALLEN & Co. will publish in a few days a new work by the Rev. D. F. G. Lee, entitled Sights and Shadows, being examples of the supernatural.

MESSRS. KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRÜBNER & Co., will shortly publish an essay by Mr. Schutz Wilson on "The Two Lookaley Halls," which was submitted to Lord Tennyson himself, and received his approval. Besides being a criticism of the poems, it is an appreciative notice of the late Laureate as a "Politician," not in connexion with party politics or struggles, but "as one holding a high ideal of the commonweal of his native land." The title of the book is 'Tis Sixty Years Since.

The Praise of Poets: from Homer to Swinburne, by Mrs. Estelle Davenport Adams is announced by Mr. Elliot Stock for immediate publication. The work is a classified arrangement of all the best tributes in verse to the great poets of all ages and countries. It is arranged chronologically, and has two full indexes of subjects and authors.

MR. HERBERT COMPTON's forthcoming A King's Hussar, which Messrs. Cassell & Co. will publish in a few days, is dedicated to Lord Roberts.

MR. WILLIAM HEINEMANN will publish immediately, under the title of In the Track of the Sun, Mr. F. D. Thompson's experiences during his globe-trotting round the world, elaborately illustrated with novel views. The author commenced his rambles from the Union Club in New York, travelling through the States, Japan, China, India, Egypt, Central Europe, and back across the Atlantic to America.

As recent events in India have necessitated the addition of fresh matter, Messrs. Remington & Co. announce that the publication of Colonel Maude's Memories of the Mutiny will be delayed for about a fortnight.

THE president of the Sette of Odd Volumes has issued invitations for a soirée on Tuesday next, December 12, to be held in the galleries of the Royal Institute of Painters in Water Colours, Piccadilly. Mr. Bernard Quaritch, the librarian to the Sette, has promised to exhibit a collection of ancient illuminated MSS., and to deliver a brief address thereon; and so the portrait of a monk in his scriptorium appears on the invitation cards. By the way, we may take this opportunity of recording the existence of Odd Volumes at Hongkong, whose interests comprehend natural science as well as literature.

THE second series of lectures given by the Sunday Lecture Society begins on Sunday next, December 10, when Sir Benjamin W. Richardson, will lecture on "The Mastery of Pain," in St. George's Hall, Langham-place, at 4 p.m. Lectures will subsequently be given by Prof. A. A. Rambant, Royal Astronomer of Ireland; Dr. R. D. Roberts; Prof. Percy Frankland; Mr. C. T. Dent; Mr. Arthur W. Clayden; and Prof. Raphael Meldola.

THE Irish Literary Society gave a dinner on Saturday last to Mr. T. W. Rolleston, its energetic hon. secretary, who has worked very hard to make that body the influential one it is. Mr. Barry O'Brien occupied the chair; and among those present were Messrs. A. P. Graves, Standish O'Grady, Lionel Johnson, Dr. Todhunter, Goddard Orpen, Prof. Hull, Miss Eleanor Hull, J. A. O'Shea, Miss Bryant, D. J. O'Donoghue, Harold Frederic, Alfred Nutt, and Miss Marie Belloc. Mr. Rolleston was presented with a handsome gold watch and chain and an illuminated address, and a copy in gold of the Tara brooch for Mrs. Rolleston. Mr. Graves read a poem he had written for the occasion (a copy of which appeared on the menu card), and several Irish songs and harp solos were given. The names of the dishes were printed in Irish only; and the cover of the menu card was an etching of Trinity College and the Bank of Ireland, by Mr. Francis S. Walker.

DURING the whole of next week, Messrs. Sotheby will be engaged in selling miscellaneous collections of books, brought together from various quarters. But it happens that the greatest rarities will all come up on Wednesday. These include: one of the hundred presentation copies of the Bible, printed at the Clarendon Press for the Caxton Exhibition of 1877—from which the name of the donee has been carefully erased; the Countess of Huntingdon's Hymnbook, with marginalia by Coleridge, and an unpublished hymn in his autograph; the Edinburgh edition of Burns's Poems, with the blanks filled in by the poet; Tennyson's Poems, chiefly Lyrical, containing also the Poems of Arthur Hallam, which it was originally proposed to issue in the same volume; a complete set of The Corsair, containing several contributions by Thackeray not hitherto identified by bibliographers; a presentation copy of Bleak House, from Dickens to his two daughters; and interesting MSS. and letters of Burns, Scott, and Rossetti.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

THE proposal to establish an honour school in English at Oxford has been approved in Congregation, by the substantial majority of 110 votes to 70.

AT the meeting held on December 2, in the theatre of the University of London, it was resolved to raise a Jowett Memorial Fund, to be lodged in the hands of trustees, and to be applied under their direction from time to time towards maintaining, strengthening, and extending the educational work of Balliol College. It was also resolved that subscriptions might be specially appropriated to the erection of a memorial to the late master, in the chapel of Balliol or other convenient place.

MR. H. H. TURNER, of Trinity College, Cambridge, chief assistant at Greenwich Observatory, has been elected to the Savilian chair of astronomy at Oxford, vacant by the death of Prof. Pritchard.

THE delegates of the common university fund at Oxford have reappointed Mr. Robinson Ellis to be reader in Latin, and Dr. E. B. Tylor to be reader in anthropology. The readership in Greek is now vacant, through Mr. Bywater's nomination to the regius professorship.

AT Cambridge, the Walsingham medal, given by the High Steward, for an essay in natural science giving evidence of original research, has been awarded (for the first time) to Mr. E. W. Macbride, of St. John's; and Mr. Arthur Willey, of London, has been elected to the Balfour studentship, for original research in biology.

MR. BRYCE's valedictory address, on resigning the regius professorship of civil law, will shortly be published by Messrs. Macmillan & Co., under the title of Legal Studies in the University of Oxford.

THE Oxford faculty of theology are raising a fund to enable Mr. Stanning, senior demy of Magdalen, to visit and examine the MSS. in the library of Mount Sinai. We may mention also that Mrs. S. S. Lewis, of Cambridge, has issued an appeal for subscriptions, in order to provide better accommodation for the same library, in which she discovered her famous Syriac codex of the Four Gospels. She asks for as much as £3000.

THE University of Cambridge has made grants of books printed at the Pitt Press to public libraries at the following places: Chesterfield, Cork, Darlington, Hanley, Holborn, Kendal, Longton, Mansfield, Poplar, Pontypriid, and Rathmines.

WE hear that Mr. James Bonar is a candidate for the chair of moral philosophy at Glasgow, which will presently be vacant through Prof. Caird's removal to Oxford.

THE Marquis of Bute, who is this year Lord Rector of St. Andrews, has given £1000 to found a Dundee scholarship at that University.

MR. T. W. ALLEN, of Queen's College, Oxford, has been appointed to a classical lectureship at the Royal Holloway College, Egham.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

EROS AT YULE-TIDE.

I MET him in these gardens gray,
Silvered with frost and crystal dew.
He watched the ghostly alders away,
The palpitating mists at play
Over the paling blue.

His golden curls were dank with sleet,
His rosy lips were blanched with cold,
His mantle, like a winding-sheet,
About the white, the bleeding feet,
Clung with funereal fold.

I would have warmed him in my breast,
I kissed his brow between the eyes.
He spurned me with the hand I pressed,
"Hence—and obey my last behest!
Alone the love-god dies."

Cambridge: December 3, 1893.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE Expositor for December gives an opportune criticism of one of Prof. Ramsay's theories, already criticised independently by Prof. Schürer—viz., that which relates to the meaning of Galatia in the Acts. The author is Mr. Chasse, of Cambridge, who undertakes to test the theory by the light of the grammar and the dictionary. The venerable Bishop of Bath and Wells collects and discusses the Biblical evidence as to the duration of the sojourn of the Israelites in Egypt, and calls attention to difficulties which Egyptologists may perhaps be able to solve. Dr. Driver and Dr. Bruce continue the valuable papers already mentioned; philology and exegesis are therefore admirably represented.

SELECTED FOREIGN BOOKS.

GENERAL LITERATURE.

- ARNHART, L. Grundlagen der Erziehungalehre als Naturwissenschaft. Leipzig: Klinkhardt. 2 M. 40 Pf.
BISMARCK, Fürst, politische Reden. 8. Bd. 1879-1881. Stuttgart: Cotta. 8 M.
DISTRICHOW, L., u. H. MUNTER. Die Holzbaukunst Norwegens in Vergangenheit u. Gegenwart. Berlin: Schuster. 45 M.
FAUDET, Emile. Seizième Siècle: Etudes littéraires. Paris: Lécène. 3 fr. 50 c.
FLOURENS, H. Alexandre III.: sa Vie, son Œuvre. Paris: Dent. 10 fr.
GROSSER, E. Die Anfänge der Kunst. Freiburg-L.-B.: Mohr. 6 M.
LENZ, A. Die Zwangsverheiratung in England. Stuttgart: Enke. 3 M. 60 Pf.
MERSHARD, L. Éléments de critique musicale. Paris: Fischbacher. 3 fr. 50 c.
MONTÉOUR, Maurice. Le bouchon de paille. Paris: Dent. 3 fr. 50 c.
OLLIVIER, Emile. Solutions politiques et sociales. Paris: Soc. des Revueurs français. 3 fr. 50 c.
PINART, A. L. Recueil de cartes, plans et vues relatives aux États-Unis et au Canada 1631-1731. Paris: Dufour. 800 fr.
PENN, S. M. Goethe. Leipzig: Fock. 5 M.
RIVOLI, le Duc de. Les Miroirs Vénitiens: description, illustrations, bibliographie. Paris: Rothschild. 150 fr.
ROSENFELD, C. Die Pflanzen im Volkstümlichen Glauben. Cassel: Kessner. 4 M. 50 Pf.
WUNDT, Th. Wanderungen in den Ampezzaner Dolomiten. Berlin: Mitacher. 20 M.

THEOLOGY, ETC.

- CORPUS scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum. Vol. XXVI. Leipzig: Freytag. 9 M. 60 Pf.
GRUNDRISSE der theologischen Wissenschaften. 6. Abth. Hebräische Archäologie v. J. Benzinger. Freiburg-L.-B.: Mohr. 10 M.
MÖLLER, W. Lehrbuch der Kirchengeschichte. 3. Bd. Reformation u. Gegenreformation. Freiburg-L.-B.: Mohr. 10 M.
ROEDER, E. Psyche. Seelenwelt u. Unsterblichkeitsglaube der Griechen. 2. Hälfte. Freiburg-L.-B.: Mohr. 11 M.
ROSEN, C. F. Geschichte der neuteamentlichen Offenbarung. München: Beck. 12 M.

HISTORY, ETC.

- BLUM, H. Das Deutsche Reich zur Zeit Bismarcks. Politische Geschichte von 1871 bis 1890. Berlin: Meyer. 6 M.
BRUNNER, H. Forschungen zur Geschichte d. deutschen u. französischen Rechts. Stuttgart: Cotta. 18 M.
CURTIUS, E. Gesammelte Abhandlungen. 1. Bd. Berlin: Besser. 11 M.
GRIB, O. Zur Dogmatik des römischen Bürgerrechts. Tübingen: Laupp. 4 M.
GESCHICHTSBLÄTTER, hanische. Jahrg. 1892. Leipzig: Duncker & Humblot. 5 M. 60 Pf.
GRINDEL, A. Geschichte der Gegenreformation in Böhmen. Hrg. v. Th. Tupet. Leipzig: Duncker & Humblot. 12 M.
GUTHRIE, O., u. W. SCHULTZE. Deutsche Geschichte von der Urzeit bis zu den Karolingern. 1. Bd. Die germanen. Urzeit u. die german. Mittelmeerstaaten. Stuttgart: Cotta. 6 M.
KÖNIG, L. Die päpstliche Kammer unter Clemens V. u. Johann XXII. Wien: Mayer. 2 M. 30 Pf.
SABATIER, Paul. Vie de Saint François d'Assise. Paris: Fischbacher. 7 fr. 50 c.
TREUENFELD, E. v. Auerstedt u. Jena. Hannover: Halving. 20 M.
URKUNDEN, ägyptische, aus d. k. Museum zu Berlin. Griechische Urkunden. 8. Hft. Berlin: Weidmann. 2 M. 40 Pf.

PHYSICAL SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

- FESTSCHRIFT für Johannes Overbeck. Leipzig: Engelmann. 24 M.
GASPARD, A. Les Gommages laques des Indes et de Madagascar. Paris: Soc. d'éditions scientifiques. 4 fr.
HERN, P. de. La Chaleur. Liège: Neustrass. 10 fr.
HILSON, Cyriacus. La sidérurgie en France et à l'étranger. Paris: Bernard. 125 fr.
JUBILÉ de M. Pasteur (27^e Décembre 1892). Paris: Gauthier-Villars. 10 fr.
ROTH, J. Allgemeine u. chemische Geologie. 3. Bd. 1. Abth. Berlin: Besser. 9 M.

PHILOLOGY, ETC.

- BRARDT, L. Die Entstehung der homerischen Gedichte. Leipzig: Duncker & Humblot. 13 M.
- BRADTON, J. A. Assyrische Gebete an den Sonnengott f. Staat u. königliches Haus an der Zeit Assarhaddons u. Assurbanipals. Leipzig: Pfeiffer. 40 M.
- BYER-LÜNK, W. Grammatik der romanischen Sprachen. 1. Bd. Formenlehre. 1. Abthg. Leipzig: Reisland. 11 M.
- TUDINER zum germanischen Alliterationsvers. Hrsg. v. M. Kufus. Berlin: Felber. 2 M. 40 Pf.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE BATTLE OF SHREWSBURY.

Rochdale: Nov. 29, 1893.

Sir James Ramsay credits me with the theory that the battle-front at Shrewsbury was three miles long. Let me assure him that I have no such belief. Having found no contemporary evidence to settle the point, I am content to leave the position of the armies unsettled. I merely enter a caution against accepting as genuine history a conjectural view (backed by a picture), which would limit the battle-front to a length of 300 yards, and the manoeuvres of the two armies to an area of four or five acres.

In the absence of an exact reference, I am unable to trace the "districtus aditus of Scottish tradition," unless it is to be found in the Scotichronicon (ii. 438), where it is stated that Percy had told his men to take quarters for the night; but that while they were dispersed for this purpose, the king's army came up "on the other side of a narrow pass" (ultra quondam strictum passum). "Plainly between the ponds," says Sir James Ramsay (i. 61). But who knows whether the ponds were there at the time? And even if they were, it would be a guileless sort of manoeuvre to surprise your enemy in broad daylight, by suddenly appearing between two small ponds about thirty yards away from him.

Neither can I agree with Sir James Ramsay that the armies were "raised at a few days, or even a few hours' notice"; for Hotspur had seen for some time carefully laying his plans. Prince Hal was already on the spot with a large force that had been just operating against the Welsh, and the king merely diverted to Shrewsbury a ready-made army with which he was marching against the Scots.

Sir James Ramsay thinks that the supposed earthworks were really an "old entrenchment," not thrown up by Hotspur, but merely utilised by him for the occasion. It ought, however, to be understood that this is pure guesswork. The probabilities are all the other way. For it is known that the ground supposed to have been occupied by the "old entrenchment" really had buildings upon it when the battle was fought (quondam placeam errae cum omnibus adificiis supra aedificatis, donasticum vi., 1426). Seven years after the battle, it is described as being enclosed with a ditch (quae quidem placea terrae fosso includitur), doubtless to mark it as the spot where so many of the dead had been buried.

The "old pollard oak," which Sir James Ramsay thinks was growing there 500 years ago, escaped me; but I confess it opens up a new terror for the critical student. If it is really three times the age (say) of the Blenheim oaks, the fact should be capable of definite proof; and I hope that some competent authority on the spot will settle the question for us once for all. Otherwise, I feel sure that before long traditions will bud; and the visitor will be told that Hotspur was sitting on that oak, or under that oak, when he was surprised by the approach of the king's army between the adjoining ponds.

J. HAMILTON WYLIE.

APPOINTMENTS FOR NEXT WEEK.

- SUNDAY, Dec. 10, 4 p.m. Sunday Lecture: "The Mastery of Pain," by Sir Benjamin Richardson.
- 4 p.m. South Place Institute: "Workers in Precious Metals," by Mr. W. A. Steward.
- 7.30 p.m. Ethical: "Ibsen's Women," by Miss M. S. Gilliland.
- MONDAY, Dec. 11, 5 p.m. London Institution: "Old Buildings and the Story they tell," by Mr. Arnold Mitchell.
- 8 p.m. Society of Arts: Cantor Lecture, "The Art of Book and Newspaper Illustration," III., by Mr. H. Blackburn.
- 8.30 p.m. Geographical: "The Evolution of the Geography of India," by Mr. R. D. Oldham.
- TUESDAY, Dec. 12, 8 p.m. London Institution: "The Principles of Commercial Geography applied to the British Empire," XI., by Dr. H. E. Mill.
- 8 p.m. Civil Engineers: "The Manufacture of Coaks and Barrels by Machinery," by Mr. L. H. Hansome.
- 8 p.m. Colonial Institute: "Uganda," by Capt. W. H. Williams.
- 8 p.m. Society of Architects: "Organs, Archaeological and Architectural," by Mr. A. G. Hill.
- 8.30 p.m. Anthropological: "A Critical Study of Australian Crania," by Mr. W. L. Duckworth; "An Unusual Form of Rush Basket from the Northern Territory of South Australia," "A Modification of the Australian Aboriginal Weapon, termed the Leonie, Langeel, Bendil, or Buccan," and "An Australian Aboriginal Musical Instrument," by Mr. R. Etheridge, jun.; "The Aborigines of North-West Australia," by Mr. P. W. Bassett Smith; "Rites and Customs of Australian Aborigines," by Mr. H. B. Purcell; "Japanese Onomatopoeia and the Origin of Language," by Mr. W. G. Aston.
- WEDNESDAY, Dec. 13, 8 p.m. Society of Arts: "Carriage-way Pavements for Large Cities," by Mr. L. H. Isaac.
- 8 p.m. Irish Literary Society: "The Irish Peasantry to-day," by Mr. Justin McCarthy.
- THURSDAY, Dec. 14, 7 p.m. London Institution: "Canons and Catches," by Mr. W. H. Cummings.
- 7.30 p.m. Civil Engineers: Student's Meeting, "Continuous Automatic Railway-Brakes," by Mr. H. J. Orford.
- 8 p.m. Mathematical: "The Stability of a Deformed Elastic Wire," by Mr. A. B. Basset; "The Linear Automorphic Transformations of certain Quantities," by Mr. R. J. Dallas; "A Theorem of Liouville's," by Prof. G. B. Matthews.
- 8 p.m. Electrical Engineers: Annual General Meeting; Reception of Annual Report; and Election of Council and Officers for 1894; Discussion, "The Electrical Transmission of Power from Niagara Falls."
- 8.30 p.m. Antiquaries.

SCIENCE.

THE INSCRIPTIONS OF SOUTHERN ARABIA.

Sud-arabische Chrestomathie. By Fritz Hommel. (Munich: Franz.)

PROF. HOMMEL's new volume will be heartily welcomed by Semitic scholars. It provides us at last with that much-needed work, a full and complete introduction to the inscriptions of Southern Arabia. It is only quite recently, thanks mainly to the labours of Dr. Glaser, that the importance of these South Arabian inscriptions has been fully revealed to us. It is becoming more and more probable that some of them go back to the second millennium before the Christian era, and that they testify to a power which once held rule from the shores of the Indian Ocean to the frontiers of Midian and Edom.

The inscriptions, as is well known, fall into three great groups, of which the third group—that of Hadhramaut—is still known to us by a single inscription only. The other two groups, however, are well represented, and they present us with two dialects which are closely related to one another. The older dialect is that of Ma'in, hence called Minaean; the later that of Saba, or the Sabaeen. Dr. Glaser has sought to show, by arguments which have not as yet been overthrown, that the kingdom of Ma'in preceded that of Saba; and since Tiglath-pileser III. of Assyria mentions a king of Saba, while the queen of Sheba or Saba visited Solomon, and the kings of the country were preceded by Makarib or high priests, we may form some idea of the antiquity of the Minaean monarchy. More than thirty kings of Ma'in are known to us, and inscriptions mentioning some of them have been found in Northern Arabia on the high road to Egypt and the Mediterranean.

Prof. Hommel's book is intended to teach us how to read and translate the Minaean and Sabaeen texts. The first part, which has just been published, contains an account of their alphabet and phonology, followed by a grammar of the two dialects so far as it has at present been made out, with appendices on the early Arabic names of the days of the week and the South Arabian months. Then comes an exhaustive bibliography of books and articles relating to the inscriptions, which begins with Niebuhr in 1774 and ends in 1892. Lastly, we have a selection of the most important and interesting of the Minaean texts, with notes upon each, and a glossary of the words and proper names contained in them. A complete lexicon of all the words found in the Minaean and Sabaeen inscriptions, with references to the passages in which they occur and comparisons with the cognate languages, is reserved for the second part.

There is only one thing in the Chrestomathy which I regret. From motives of economy the work has been autographed instead of being printed. This makes it somewhat trying to the eyes to read, and the eyes of scholars are not always of the best.

In his remarks upon the alphabet Prof. Hommel, while maintaining his opinion that the Semitic alphabet was derived from the cuneiform characters of Babylonia, does not seem to break with the common belief that the so-called Phoenician alphabet presents it to us in its oldest form, and that consequently letters in the South Arabian alphabet which denote sounds not heard in Canaan are derived by differentiation from other letters. As the readers of the ACADEMY already know, I have myself come to a much more revolutionary conclusion. We know that the sounds in question belonged to the parent Semitic speech, and their absence in the language of Canaan must have been due to phonetic decay. Now I fail to discover any evidence for the theory that the symbols representing them are derived—at all events in the majority of instances—from other symbols in the same alphabet; on the other hand, it seems to me that the three letters which express the three kinds of s claim as independent an origin as those which express a and b. But if this be the case, it becomes impossible to derive the alphabet of Arabia from that of Canaan; it must have been the alphabet of Canaan which was derived from that of Arabia.

The progress of archaeological discovery favours this view of the matter. The oldest inscription in the Phoenician alphabet yet found is not older than the tenth or ninth century before the Christian era; whereas, if Glaser and Hommel are right, there are Minaean inscriptions which are at least five centuries earlier. Moreover, the Phoenician alphabet, when it first makes its appearance, is already full-grown; while the Tel el-Amarna Tablets have informed us that at an older epoch the system of writing used in the country was not an alphabet at all, but the cuneiform syllabary of Babylonia. If the so-called Phœnician alphabet developed in Canaan, how is it that no traces of the development have been found anywhere in Syria? We find cuneiform texts or Hittite hieroglyphs, and the fully-formed Phœnician alphabet of the time of the Israelitish monarchy; but we find nothing else.

The names given in Canaan to the letters also bear out the view that the alphabet came to Syria from Arabia. When they were first given, the letters must have borne some resemblance to the objects which the names denote. Now, this is the case if we turn them on one side, and then compare them with the corresponding letters in the alphabets of Arabia. Alaph, "the bull," for example, at once becomes a bull's head; beth, "a house," takes the form of the house which appears in the semi-hieratic graffiti of the VIth Dynasty in Upper Egypt; daleth becomes the "door" of a house revolving on its hinge; taaddé the trident with which fish were speared; resh the contour of the human face as it is represented in the Hittite hieroglyphs. As Prof. Hommel himself remarks, "The picture of the mouth is far more recognisable in the South Arabian than in the Canaanitish pé."

As I have said, the letters usually require to be turned on one side in order to harmonise them with their Arabian equivalents. This points to an Arabian practice of writing vertically, actual examples of which have been found on the rocks. We must not, however, suppose that the Canaanite alphabet was taken immediately from those of South Arabia. Though the power of Ma'in extended to the far north at an early date, it is probable that it was rather from the intermediate alphabets of Midian, of Edom, or of some neighbouring district, that the alphabet of Canaan was derived, than from that of Ma'in itself. It may be that we shall have to seek one of the intervening links in what Prof. D. H. Müller has called the Proto-arabic alphabet. We are only at the beginning of discoveries; and until Edom and Northern Arabia have been thoroughly explored, the question of the origin of the alphabet is likely to remain unsettled.

A. H. SAYCE.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE S-PLURALS IN ENGLISH.

Copenhagen: Nov. 18, 1893.

I am very glad to see Prof. Napier attack the theory lately adopted by Prof. Strong, that Norman-French influence helped to settle the plural ending -s in English. In my Studier over Engelske Kasus (Copenhagen, 1891, p. 94 sqq.) I have discussed the question; and as my mother tongue is not much known in England, you will, perhaps, allow me to shortly repeat to your readers my reasons for rejecting that "ancient but baseless superstition," as Prof. Napier terms it. They were:

1. The growth of the plural s cannot be separated from that of s in the genitive case. Now the latter gained ground even more rapidly and more extensively than the plural s, and French influence is here utterly unimaginable. Why, then, resort to it with regard to the other ending?

2. The plural in s was extended to many nouns long before the Conquest: O.E., wyrmas, winas, sunas, &c. This shows that the tendency of the language would have been the same, even if William the Conqueror had never crossed the Channel.

3. S became universal in the North at an earlier date than in the South, where we should expect to find French influence strongest.

4. In Old French s was not used to the same extent as now as a plural ending, being the sign of the nom. sing. and of acc. pl., but not of nom. pl. If, therefore, an Englishman of (say) the thirteenth century used the s in the nom. pl., he was in accordance with the rules of his native tongue, but not with those of French.

5. If s was due to the Normans, we should expect it in the plural of adjectives as well as of nouns.

6. And, finally, it is worth noting that the two endings, Norman s without any vowel, and English es (originally as) with the vowel pronounced, were kept distinct for about four hundred years in English; they are not confounded till, in the fifteenth century, the weak e disappears in pronunciation.

OTTO JESPERSEN.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

MR. E. R. WHARTON, fellow of Jesus College, Oxford, has reprinted from the Transactions of the Philological Society a paper entitled "Some Greek Etymologies," which may be regarded as a sort of supplement to his Etyma Græca (Rivingtons). He here deals with four classes of cases:—(1) With reference to the modern theory, that the prothetic vowel is really the first vowel of an originally bi-vocalic root, he admits this theory where other languages besides Greek have a similar vowel, and also where two forms can be best explained by starting from a bi-vocalic root; but he maintains that in many cases such an explanation is impossible, and the words in question must be regarded as compounds. (2) He discusses the great difficulty in Greek vocalism, connected with the occasional appearance of i where we should have expected e, and of u where we should have expected o. (3) Admitting Leskien's principle, that a phonetic law has no exceptions, as doubtless true within each dialect, he argues that there were as many dialects in Greek as in English, and that every poet and each of his hearers and readers must have been familiar with several. Thus, in Latin, ovis and bos are loan-words (the proper Roman forms being avis* and vos*); while the i in solium is Oscan. Again, in the sentence "the skipper met the shipper in a well-equipped skiff," we have four different dialects; and Prof. Joseph Wright gives miscen, misel, and miscin as all used for "myself" in the Windhill dialect of Yorkshire. So, in Greek, whether an initial vowel should preserve its aspiration must have depended upon dialect, just as it did in Latin and still does in English. (4) Finally, he examines a number of cases where it is difficult to decide whether a word is a compound or a derivative, or of what elements an admittedly compound word is made up. Here are some of his ingenious etymologies, under this heading: διδρασκω "dressed hide," = "twice spoilt, dis + φειρω, diverted from its natural use as a covering for the beast, first torn off and then tanned; εχελυς, "eel" = εχyu-χελυς*, "snake with the mouth of a tortoise," εχyuς* being the exact equivalent of Latin anguis; κροκόβειλος, "lizard," = "saffron coward," from the colour and shyness of the animal—the application of the word to the crocodile must have been a litotes, or joke.

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

METEOROLOGICAL.—(Wednesday, Nov. 15.)

Dr. O. THEODORE WILLIAMS, president, in the chair.—Mr. F. J. Brodie read a paper on "The Great Drought of 1893, and its attendant Meteorological Phenomena." The author confined his investigation to the weather of the four months, March to June, during which period the absence of rain was phenomenal; barometric pressure was greatly in excess of the average; temperature was high, with a large diurnal range; and the duration of sunshine was in many places the longest on record. The mean temperature over England was about four degrees above the average. Along the south and south-west coasts the sunshine was between fifty and sixty per cent. of the possible duration. The rainfall was less than half the average amount over the southern and eastern parts of England, the extreme south of Ireland, and a portion of Durham and Northumberland; while over the southern counties of England generally the fall amounted to less than one third of the average. The smallest number of days with rain was at the North Foreland, where there were only eighteen.—Mr. W. Marriott gave an account of the thunder and hail storms which occurred over England and the south of Scotland on July 8, 1893. Thunderstorms were very numerous on that day, and in many instances were accompanied by terrific hailstorms and squalls of wind. It was during one of these squalls that a pleasure boat was capsized off Skegness, twenty-nine persons being drowned. About noon a thunderstorm accompanied by heavy hail and violent squall of wind passed over Dumfries, and along the valley of the Nith; many of the hailstones measured from one inch to one and half inch in length. At the same hour a similar storm occurred at Peterborough. From about 10 p.m. there was a succession of thunderstorms over the north-east of England and south-east of Scotland, and at many places it was reported that the thunderstorms were continuous for nine hours. Two storms were remarkable for the immense hailstones which fell during their prevalence over Harrogate and Richmond in Yorkshire. The hailstones were four and five inches in circumference, and some as much as three inches in diameter. Great damage was done by these storms, all windows and glass facing the direction from which the storm came being broken. It is computed that, within a radius of five miles of Harrogate, not less than 100,000 panes of glass were broken, the extent of the damage being estimated at about £3000. The thunderstorms in the northern part of the country travelled generally in a north-north-westerly direction at the rate of about twenty miles an hour. They appear to have taken the path of least resistance, and consequently passed over low ground and along river valleys and the sea coast. Several storms seem to have followed each other along the same track.

ARISTOTELIAN.—(Monday, Nov. 20.)

SHADWORTH H. HODGSON, Esq., president, in the chair.—Messrs. W. H. Fairbrother, J. S. Mackenzie, G. N. Rhodes, and H. Sturt were elected members.—Mr. D. G. Ritchie read a paper on "The Conception of Necessity as applied to Nature and Man." The object of the paper was to attempt to prove that the only necessity which can be recognised in the order of nature, and in the phenomena of human society, is a necessity of thought, a logical necessity. J. S. Mill maintained this opinion, but without admitting its full import, for in his theory of inference he denied any necessity in thought itself. The possibility of knowledge implies that there are "necessary truths," or, rather, that all truth, which is really and completely truth, is necessary. Truth and logical consistency are not ultimately distinct. "Chance" or "contingency" is merely a name for our ignorance. The scientific study of nature involves the assumption that nature is throughout an intelligible and coherent system. In a "law of nature," the "must" is the "must" of logical necessity, not of legislation; and such "laws" are most correctly formulated as hypothetical propositions. "Causes" are not ultimately distinguishable from "reasons." The necessity eliminated from physical causation by Hume reappears as a necessity of thought. The posed ethical objections to psychological necessitarianism are mostly removed by a recognition that physical necessity is logical necessity: necessitarians have, as a rule, given too little attention to the importance of ideas (e.g., of edom, of divine grace) as causes, indirectly influencing human conduct through the feelings it may gather round them.

FINE ART.
OBITUARY.

SIR ALEXANDER CUNNINGHAM, K.C.I.E.

MOR-GENERAL SIR ALEXANDER CUNNINGHAM, the veteran Indian archaeologist, died at 10, Kensington, on Tuesday, November 28, the eightieth year of his age. Though he had for some time been afflicted with a painful lady, he preserved his interest in his favourite pursuit, and took pleasure almost to the last handling his invaluable collection of coins and showing them to visitors.

His father was Allan Cunningham, the Nithsdale poet and assistant of Chantrey. Three of his brothers also won distinction in literature: Captain Joseph Davy, the eldest, as author of the standard history of the Sikhs—work too candid to meet with official favour; Peter, the well-known London antiquary; and Donald Francis, editor of Marlowe, Massinger, and Ben Jonson. Alexander was born in London in 1814, and educated (with his brother Peter) at Christ's Hospital. After passing through Addiscombe, he obtained his commission as second-lieutenant in the Bengal Engineers in June, 1831. From the first he seems to have held good appointments, being on the staff of the Governor-General (Lord William Bentinck) in 1834, and afterwards employed on special duty in Oudh. He was as no less fortunate in taking part in the hard fighting of those days. He was present at the battle of Punniar, and played a prominent part as field engineer in both of the Sikh Wars. In 1846 he was appointed commissioner to demarcate the boundaries of Kashmir on the Tibetan side. During the Mutiny he found himself in Burma, whence he was summoned to be chief engineer in the North-Western Provinces, after the pacification. He retired from active service in 1862.

Meanwhile, he had already made his mark in archaeology, to which the remainder of his life was to be devoted. In his early days, he formed the acquaintance of James Prinsep, the founder of the scientific study of Indian inscriptions and coins. The first of his numerous contributions to the Journal of the Bengal Asiatic Society was written, in 1834, as an appendix to a notable paper of Prinsep's on the coins and relics discovered by Ventura and Court in the Tope (stupa) of Manikyala, in the Punjab. In 1837 he excavated on his own responsibility—as was the fashion of those days—the group of Buddhist ruins near Benares, known as Sarnath, and made careful drawings of the sculptures. In 1851 he undertook a more difficult task, the thorough examination of the thirty Topes near Bhilsa, in Central India, which are generally called after the largest of them, the Sanchi Tope. The work in which he published his results (1854) is the first serious attempt to reconstruct the history of Buddhism from its architectural remains. In the same year he brought out a Physical, Statistical, and Historical Account of Adakh; and yet earlier (in 1848) an Essay on the Arian Order of Architecture, as exhibited in the Temples of Kashmir.

Not only these elaborate publications, but his draft scheme for the systematic investigation of Indian antiquities (1848), naturally led to his appointment as the first director-general of the Archaeological Survey, when that department was organised by Lord Canning in 1861. Cunningham was now in his element. Every cold season he minutely explored some portion of the immense ruin-strewn plain of Northern India, from Taxila in the west to Gaur in the east; and every year he published a report of his discoveries. To the twenty-three volumes of these annual reports, a most useful index has been compiled by Mr. C. V. Smith. In 1866, in a cold fit of parsimony, his department was abolished; but it was re-established, with Cunningham again at its head, in 1870. The intervening period was spent in England, and bore fruit in the publication of what was intended to be the first of two volumes on the Geography of Ancient India, dealing with the campaigns of Alexander and the itineraries of the Chinese Buddhist pilgrims. Cunningham finally retired in 1885, after a service in India of more than fifty years; and the opportunity was taken to re-constitute the Archaeological Survey according to Provinces, under the general control of Dr. Burgess.

Annual reports by no means exhausted Cunningham's energy. In 1877, he brought out—what was again intended to be the first of a series, under the title of Corpus Inscriptionum Indicarum—an edition of the Edicts of Asoka, with a detailed discussion of the two alphabets used; in 1879, a handsome quarto, with plates, on the Stupa of Bharhut, which he assigns to the third century B.C.; and, in 1883, a Book of Indian Eras, with tables for the calculation of dates.

His return to England was saddened by a disaster that befell his heavy baggage. His unique collections of so many years, including his papers and notebooks and his immense series of copper coins, were lost by the sinking of a steamer in the Hooghly. His gold and silver coins escaped, being fortunately in England at the time. Most of these were transferred two or three years ago to the British Museum, on most generous terms, thereby doubling the number of many sections in the national cabinet, and adding not a few unique specimens. Nevertheless, he soon began to collect afresh; and many rare things were sent him, both by his son in India and by native dealers in Central Asia.

Two more of his books must yet be mentioned: a volume on Coins of Ancient India (Quaritch, 1891), in which he explains his views about the origin of money, and deals particularly with the coins of dynasties that are practically unknown to everybody but himself; and Mahabodhi (W. H. Allen, 1892)—the most magnificent of all—giving an account of his excavations at Gaya ten years before, and of the reconstruction, under his supervision, of the great Buddhist temple, which he associates with the name of Asoka. And, lastly, this very week has brought us the Transactions of the Ninth International Congress of Orientalists, containing a paper by Cunningham on "The Ephthalites or White Huns," in which he first collects the literary evidence, and then illuminates the entire subject from his wealth of numismatic learning. No scholar need desire to leave a more characteristic posthumous memorial.

It may be true that Sir Alexander Cunningham failed to quite satisfy the very exigent standard of modern scientific archaeology. He was prone to rashness in identification; some of his pioneer work has already required to be done over again; his philological theories were to the last those of an amateur. But he was a most indefatigable and devoted student, with an experience absolutely unrivalled, and the eye of an eagle for a promising site. For coins, in particular, he had acquired an insight that was almost infallible. His name will be honoured, together with those of Colin Mackenzie, James Prinsep, James Fergusson, and James Burgess, as one of the creators of Indian archaeology.

J. S. C.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

THE annual distribution of prizes by the president to the students of the Royal Academy takes place to-day (Saturday) at 9 p.m. The galleries containing the competition works will be open to the public next Monday and Tuesday.

THE following exhibitions will open next week: a collection of water-colour drawings, chiefly of the old English school, at Mr. Thomas McLean's Gallery, in the Haymarket; a collection of drawings of Sussex, Hampshire, and Scotland, by Mr. A. W. Weedon, at the Fine Art Society's; a series of landscapes in oil, recently painted in the Highlands by Mr. S. J. Barnes, at the Dickinson Gallery; and a picture of "Nelson's Last Signal at Trafalgar," by Mr. T. Davidson, at Mr. Arthur Lucas's Gallery—the three last all in New Bond-street.

MR. HUGH THOMSON has contributed eight full-page drawings to the version of "The Piper of Hamelin," which Mr. Robert Buchanan has made for Mr. Comyns Carr's Christmas production at the Comedy Theatre. A special edition of the poem, with these illustrations, will be issued by Mr. William Heinemann, simultaneously with the first performance.

THE January number of Messrs. Cassell's Cabinet Portrait Gallery will contain a portrait and biographical sketch of the late Prof. Tyndall.

AT the meeting of the newly incorporated Society of Architects, to be held on Tuesday next, at 8 p.m., at St. James's Hall, Mr. Arthur G. Hill will read a paper on "Organs, Archaeological and Architectural," illustrated with limelight views.

It has been decided that the memorial to Dr. Collingwood Bruce, the Newcastle antiquary, shall take the form of a recumbent effigy, to be placed in St. Nicholas's Cathedral. The treasurer of the committee is Dr. Thomas Hodgkin.

MESSRS. EYRE & SPOTTISWOODE have printed, on behalf of the Secretary of State, a descriptive catalogue of the paintings, statues, and framed prints in the India Office, compiled by Mr. William Foster. The old Company was munificent in many ways, and not least in commissioning pictures and statues of its most distinguished servants, from the time of Clive downwards; and the succession of modern officials has been continued by means of engravings. As a work of art, the first place must be given to Flaxman's marble statue of Warren Hastings, which stands in a place where it cannot be very well seen. From an historical point of view, perhaps the most interesting is the half-length portrait of Tipu Sultan, which seems to be authentic, having been painted by the Mr. Cherry who was assassinated at Benares in 1799. There are also several curious paintings of Indian scenes in the last century, and others by native artists, chiefly Persians. Mr. Foster has compiled the catalogue with industry and discretion. Much of his information is derived from the MS. records of the Company, which frequently gives the history of the pictures and the prices paid for them. On p. 17 the quotation is surely from Malcolm's History of Persia; and on p. 11 it might have been explained that the "colossal figure of Buddha," introduced into the picture of Colonel Colin Mackenzie, is actually the monolithic Jain statue at Shravan Belgola, in Mysore, of which Mackenzie is known to have taken accurate measurements.

THE STAGE.

"L'ATTAQUE DU MOULIN."

Paris: Dec. 2, 1893.

IN an article, entitled "Le Drame Lyrique," in the Journal on the eve of the first night of the four-act opera, "L'Attaque du Moulin," M. Zola gives the following definition of what the French lyrical drama ought to be: "Je me suis imaginé que le drame français lyrique, tout en partant de la symphonie continue à l'orchestre, qui développe les situations et commente les personnages, tout en ne faisant plus du chant que l'expression des cerveaux et des cœurs, pouvait s'affirmer à part, dans la passion, dans la clarté vive du génie de notre race. Je vois un drame plus directement humain, non pas dans le vague des mythologies du Nord, mais éclatant entre nous, pauvres hommes, dans la réalité de nos misères et de nos joies. Je n'en suis pas à demander l'opéra en redingote ou même en blouse. Non ! il me suffirait qu'au lieu de fantoches, au lieu d'abstractions descendues de la légende ; on nous donnât des êtres vivants, s'égayant de nos galetés, souffrant de nos souffrances. . . Je rêve que le drame lyrique soit humain, sans répudier ni la fantaisie, ni le caprice, ni le mystère."

In order to realise this dream, it is necessary that the musician should be able to write his own poem ; but if he cannot, he must so identify himself with his collaborator that their two personalities merge into one, which, adds M. Zola, is the case with MM. Gallet and Bruneau in the two chefs-d'œuvre, "Le Rêve" and "L'Attaque du Moulin." Now, the term chef-d'œuvre is rather too ambitious for these operas. "Le Rêve," though somewhat monotonous, was a work of originality, and the "form" was new ; but the same cannot be said of "L'Attaque du Moulin."

The plain truth is, that M. Gallet has converted M. Zola's nouvelle into a four-act opera of the usual conventional type. The plot is dramatic, but not deeply interesting. It contains sufficient chauvinisme to stir the hearts of a French audience ; and he has added to the interest of the story by introducing a new character—Marceline, a poor widow who has lost her two sons on the battle-field, and denounces the iniquity and horrors of war in an impassioned lamento: "Ah ! la guerre, l'horrible guerre !" which is one of the most striking passages of the opera. Another innovation is the episode of the young sentinel in the third act, a home-sick recruit who (while on duty, and contrary to all discipline) sings a mournful aria descriptive of his native village, his lone mother, and the sweetheart he has left behind him, far away "on the other side of the great river" (the Rhine). The last act, in which the old miller, le père Merlier, allows himself to be shot by the enemy in order to save the life of Dominique, his daughter's affianced husband, brings the drama to a climax. But, from the rise of the curtain to its fall, the action and the characters are devoid of novelty.

"L'Attaque du Moulin" is a drama such as we have often seen on the boards of the Porte-St. Martin or the Ambigu. The original story, which first appeared in Les Soirées de Médan, was related as an episode of the Franco-German War ; but M. Gallet has transferred the scene to the campaign on the French frontier in 1792, and the Prussians, who are not named, become "the enemy," thus all disagreeable allusions are avoided.

M. Bruneau's score, the outcome of two years' assiduous work, is deserving of more than cursory notice or flippant criticism. It has been written con amore, but it scarcely deserves the title of chef-d'œuvre conferred on it by M. Zola. It is a success from the popular point of view ; but it marks no new departure in musical composition, nor does it confirm the great expectations held forth by "Le Rêve," which, I think, will always be preferred by connoisseurs.

Cecil Nicholson.

MUSIC.

SCHUMANN'S "GENOVEVA" AT DRURY-LANE.

SCHUMANN'S only opera was performed for the first time in England at Drury-lane on Wednesday afternoon, and for this we are indebted to the Royal College of Music. It seems to be generally admitted that Schumann's genius was lyrical rather than dramatic, and it is scarcely likely that his opera will ever form part of the regular répertoire of any opera house ; but the Royal College deserves the thanks of all musicians for this opportunity of hearing Schumann's interesting music. It may be true that the libretto is weak, and that the music when weighed in the dramatic balances is found wanting ; and yet it is only in connexion with the stage that the work can be fairly judged and properly enjoyed. In spirit, Schumann was at one with Wagner. Both assigned an important rôle to the orchestra, and both waged war against the conventional operatic forms ; but Schumann modified, whereas Wagner remodelled. There are moments in "Genoveva"—for instance, in the scene where the heroine hurls at Golo the epithet "shameless bastard," or at the opening of the last act—when Schumann certainly shows the influence of Wagner. (He wrote his opera, "Genoveva," between January and August, 1848. We know that he heard "Tannhäuser" frequently, and in a letter addressed to Mendelssohn (November 12, 1845) he writes: "Perhaps we shall soon have a talk about Tannhäuser"; and in another letter, written a few days later, he speaks of meeting Wagner and other musicians once a week. And further, we know that Wagner discussed the libretto of "Genoveva" with Schumann, and offered advice, which, apparently, was not accepted.) But there are other moments when either bald recitative or thematic development of purely musical interest show that the composer had made no radical reformation. Some contemporary critics of Schumann attacked his opera because it was too advanced ; but in our day the charge will be that it is not advanced enough.

The plot of the opera need not be described. Something was said about it in the ACADEMY in 1887, when the first act and portions of the other acts were given at a Bach Society concert. The Overture is one of Schumann's greatest ; and a performance of the opera adds greatly to its interest, for it is a Vorspiel in the true Weber-Wagner sense. The March chorus in the first act is very fine, and so is the Recitative and Scena which follows. The greater part of the second act is dramatically weak, but the Finale is exceedingly effective. The first part of the scene with the magic mirror (the breaking of which by Siegfried forms an effective stage picture) has some weird and highly dramatic music ; the orchestral colouring is most appropriate. In many parts of the opera, indeed, the orchestration seems above Schumann's average standard.

Of the performance we can speak most favourably. Miss Una H. Bruckshaw as Genoveva sang well, but her acting was still better. Miss Kirkby Lunn, who took the rôle of the witch Margaret, has a good future before her ; she sang and acted remarkably well. Mr. A. H. Archdeacon was satisfactory as Siegfried, Mr. W. Greene less so as Golo. The chorus singing was excellent, and the stage management deserves the highest praise. Dr. Stanford conducted with zeal and intelligence.

J. S. SHEDLOCK.

RECENT CONCERTS.

THE new Queen's Hall, Langham-place, was opened to the public on December 2. On the previous Saturday the fine organ was tried by Mr. W. T. Best, and there were songs and performances by a military band ; but the real test was last Saturday, when Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was given under the direction of Mr. F. C. Cowen. There was an excellent orchestra, and a well-balanced chorus composed of good voices. Mme. Albani, Mr. M. Hoare, and Mr. E. Lloyd, the vocalists, were in excellent voice. The work went smoothly, and it soon became apparent that the large, elegant hall was, from an acoustical point of view, entirely satisfactory. London can now boast of having as commodious and comfortable a concert room as could be desired. Mr. Frederic Dawson, the pianist, played Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto with skill and intelligence. Some allowance must be made for excitement, and for the fact that he was playing in a new hall ; but the first movement was not given with sufficient dignity. He was, however, recalled twice at the close of the work.

It is interesting to hear novelties, and Mr. Arthur Chappell has commenced to introduce them somewhat early in the season. We have already had Quartets by Goldmark and Stanford, and last Monday a Quartet for strings by Bazzini was given for the first time. The composer, a violinist of some renown, born in 1818, appears to be still living, and to have been a prolific writer in many branches of his art. The Quartet under notice is not epoch-making, but is a clever and pleasing work. The opening movement, Allegro Giusto, is Mozartian, and, to speak frankly, a bit tedious. The Andante is interesting, but has weak moments. The Tempo di Gavotta is quaint and dainty, and the Finale clever and lively. The whole work shows clearly the influence of Haydn and Mozart, with every now and then a dash of Mendelssohn. The performance, under the leadership of Lady Hallé, was all that could be desired, Mlle. Janotha, the pianist, played Chopin's Barcarolle in F. sharp major (why was it advertised, and announced in the programme-book, as in F. sharp minor?) neatly, but with a certain indifference. It is one of the composer's most poetical works, and will not bear cold treatment. Mlle. Janotha was more successful in her encore, the Berceuse. Miss Fillinger, the vocalist, sang well.

MR. HENSCHEL gave Rubinstein's Ocean Symphony (Op. 42) at his third concert on Wednesday evening. It is now more than thirty years since this work was first produced in London, but it has not been heard of late. The first movement, an Allegro Maestoso, is noble in conception and clever in development, though its length (fourteen minutes in performance) is somewhat excessive. The Adagio is vague, the Scherzo too Beethovenish to pass as original, while the Finale has more sound than depth of meaning. The Symphony includes other movements, which were omitted: those that were played occupy in performance three-quarters of an hour. It does seem strange that the composer should make a long work still longer—for two movements were added some years after the first production ; and unless they are of exceptional interest, one may be thankful that they were not given on this occasion. If the first movement only were heard at concerts, it would prove a success ; it seems wrong to suggest mutilation, but, unfortunately, as the work proceeds, interest diminishes. Miss Beatrice Langley played Spohr's violin Concerto in D minor. Her performance of the Adagio showed refinement, but she was overweighted in the other movements. Mrs. Eaton gave a powerful rendering of Weber's "Ocean, thou mighty monster"; her high notes, however, were shrill.

SUPPLEMENT.

The Brontës in Ireland; or, Facts stranger than Fiction. By William Wright. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

DURING the past twenty years Brontë literature has accumulated so steadily that the pleasure of receiving a really fresh addition to it has an element of unexpectedness. Still stranger is it that the most interesting book about the Brontës since Mrs. Gaskell's biography of the eldest of the Haworth sisters should deal only incidentally with the more illustrious members of the family, and be devoted mainly to progenitors of whom the world has heard little or nothing, and to whom it might be supposed altogether indifferent. Such, however, is the case; and it is safe to say that the perusal of Dr. Wright's volume will terminate with the conviction of any prepossession of indifference.

The attractions of the book are threefold: (1) it gives the portrait of a very remarkable person and tells the story of an extraordinarily romantic life; (2) it finds in that story of fact many of the materials which went to the production of an arresting and memorable work of fiction, the Wuthering Heights of Emily Brontë; and (3) it strongly suggests, if it does not positively demonstrate, that the story-telling instinct of the younger Brontës of Haworth was not a Melchisedec of faculty, coming into existence without ascertainable origin or ancestry, but an inheritance from at least two previous generations.

The mere story told has so many of the constituents of romantic interest, that on all other but literary grounds Dr. Wright's title sub-title is amply justified. The first actor in it is one Hugh Brontë, the great-grandfather of the novelists, a farmer living on the banks of the Boyne, somewhere above Drogheda, whence he crossed to Liverpool to dispose of his cattle. During one of his return journeys, an infant boy was found in the hold of the vessel. Mr. and Mrs. Brontë, determined to adopt the foundling; and the dark-complexioned, repellent-looking young stranger, to whom they gave the surname of Welsh, was brought up with their own golden-haired children. As he grew older, he made himself useful and even indispensable to Hugh Brontë; and when the latter died, saving his farm and business in a most unsatisfactory condition, Welsh appeared before the orphaned family as the opulent and capable master of the situation. There is something of the novelist's picturesqueness in the description of his shiny and gorgeous raiment, and of "the smile of satisfaction that gave prominence at once to the cast in both eyes and to the jackal-like entals"; but concerning the broad facts of his meeting, and the stranger events that followed, there seems no reasonable doubt.

When all were assembled he [Welsh] began once, in the grand cattle-dealer style, to express sympathy with the family, and to declare that on one condition he would carry on the rearing and supply the wants of the family as nothing had happened. The condition was that the youngest sister Mary should become his wife. The proposal was rejected with a great outburst of indignant scorn. Many hot and bitter words were exchanged; but as Welsh was leaving the house he turned and said, 'Mary shall yet be my wife, and I will scatter the rest of you like chaff from this house, which shall be my home.' With these words he passed out into the darkness."

This is certainly a melodramatic situation, and Dr. Wright would have done well if he had been more sparing of imaginary adornment in a narrative of actual fact; but the temptation was doubtless great, for of true stories there are indeed few which conform so closely as this to the conventions of fiction. Whether Welsh's threat were or were not uttered in the words attributed to him, the words at any rate represent his purpose; and, strange to say, he was enabled to put it into execution. The sister loathed him, and the position of the brothers seemed secure; but he married the one and ousted the others by a scheme of such ingenious villainy that any novelist inventing it might fairly ask for congratulations upon his skill. The brothers were exiled from their home; and some years afterwards Welsh, who had assumed the name of Brontë, persuaded the eldest of them to entrust him with the care of his little son Hugh. He promised to make the child his heir, and to give him the "education of a gentleman," the condition being that the boy's severance from his parents should be final. For the lad who was destined to become the grandfather of two women of genius now began seven years of physical and mental torture, the torturers being his uncle Welsh, and a factotum of his, one Gallagher, whose cunning malignity was even more unendurable than the other's consistent and shameless brutality. At last, when a big lad of fifteen, the victim, by a cleverly planned ruse, escaped from his tormentors, found friends and work in a distant village, managed also to obtain a fair measure of education, married under circumstances as romantic as those of his earlier life, begot children, the eldest of whom was the now well-known Patrick Brontë, and became a notability of the countryside and one of the earliest exponents of a doctrine of tenant-right. To this story many pages of Dr. Wright's volume are devoted; and until it is read, lovers of plot and adventure are certainly not driven to seek it between the covers of any novel.

So much for the narrative interest of the book: its other elements of attractiveness must now be described. Dr. Wright tells his story not for its own sake merely, but for a purpose, and this purpose is, I think, attained. It will be seen further on that there is substantial reason to believe that the history of Hugh Brontë's career was known to the younger members of the family at Haworth parsonage; and it is certainly a history which, if known, would be likely to stamp a deep impression on sensitively imaginative minds. It is, moreover, a matter of common knowledge that the two great Brontë sisters—despite their wonderful inventive fertility—were singularly fond of utilising in their fiction real persons, real places, real incidents. Jane Eyre, Shirley, and Villette are full of such materials, which can be readily and, in most cases, indubitably identified. Wuthering Heights lends itself to the same identifying process, but much less fully, and the boundary of the field within which it can be applied is curious and suggestive. The topography of the book is unmistakable: it was that of the Yorkshire moorland, the only ground which Emily Brontë ever really knew; and those who are acquainted with the country will not hesitate to accept Mr. Erskine Stuart's statement, that the house which is the scene of the sombre action was some lone farmstead not far from the fall, "so that anyone," remarks this writer, "who visits Ponden during a snowstorm will be thoroughly able to appreciate Lockwood's walk from Wuthering Heights to Thrushcross Grange." But the personages and incidents of the story have, so far, remained entirely unidentified; and, indeed, almost every writer upon the Brontës has been more or less exclamatory upon the imaginative power which called into being creations so entirely alien to the writer's experience. Even now there is still sufficient matter for admiring wonder; but it is hardly possible to doubt that the principal character, two at least of the subsidiary characters, and certain not insignificant situations have been traced to their originals. Heathcliff the foundling, "the little black-haired swarthy thing, as dark as if it came from the Devil" (brought, it may be noted in parenthesis, from Liverpool), can be none other than Welsh; Joseph, the stern Protestant hypocrite, is not less certainly the wily malignant Catholic hypocrite, Gallagher; and Nelly Dean is a portrait perhaps suggested by, rather than reproduced from, the "Aunt Mary" who fell a victim to the wiles of the wretch whose character justifies Charlotte Brontë's description of Heathcliff as "a man's shape animated by demon life—a Ghoul, an Afreet." These correspondences are unmistakable, and it is not difficult to find others; at any rate there is nothing to put the least strain upon credence in Dr. Wright's suggestion that

"Edgar Linton is the gentle and forgiving brother of Alice [Hugh Brontë's Catholic wife], our friend Red Paddy McClory, who took his sister home after her runaway marriage with a Protestant, and finally took the whole Brontë family under his roof and gave them all he possessed. Even Isabella Linton's flight and marriage had solid foundation in fact, either in Alice Brontë's romantic elopement with Hugh, or in the more tragic circumstances of Mary Brontë's marriage with Welsh."

Seldom, I think, has a novel, and, at first sight, startling literary theory been supported by a greater weight of cumulative internal evidence.

The external evidence that Emily Brontë was acquainted with her grandfather's story is, in itself, hardly conclusive; but its corroborative value is sufficiently great to make it satisfying. Hugh Brontë, the grandfather, was, as has been said, a person of some mark in his own district. He was a man of character, of originality, of "views"; but it was by his remarkable talent as a raconteur that his local fame was most largely won. Dr. P. W. Joyce, in the preface to his fascinating Old Celtic Romances, gives us some interesting personal experiences of the Irish story-tellers, those Celtic fellows of the Arabian hakkawāti; and Hugh Brontë was one of the last of the race. Dr. Wright has known several men who heard him at his best, and he gives their impressions.

"He would sit long winter nights in the log-hole of his corn-kiln, in the Emdale cottage, telling stories to an audience of rapt listeners who thronged around him. Mrs. Brontë plied her knitting in the outer darkness of the kitchen, for there was no light except from the kiln, which lighted up old Hugh's face as he beeked the kiln and told his yarns. The Rev. W. McAllister, from whom I got most details as to Brontë's story-telling, had heard his father say that he spent a night in Brontë's kiln. Brontë's fame was then new. The place was crowded to suffocation. At that time he reserved a place near the fire for Mrs. Brontë, and Patrick, then a baby, was lying on the heap of seeds from which the fire was fed, with his eyes fixed on his father, and listening like the rest in breathless silence."

Dr. Wright adds, on the evidence of his informants, that "none of Brontë's stories were so acceptable as the plain record of his early hardships"; and as Patrick grew up, it is certain that he became acquainted with these exciting episodes in the family history. To the fact that he himself in after life became a gifted story-teller, we have comparatively recent and first-hand testimony; and Miss Nussey, the most intimate friend of Charlotte, and a frequent visitor at Haworth, bears witness to the exceptional sensibility of Patrick Brontë's second daughter to her father's stories. The instinct of Miss A. Mary F. Robinson (Madame Darmesteter), who owed much of her information to Miss Nussey, seems to have brought her close to the heart of the mystery; but in her fascinating Emily Brontë in the "Eminent Women" series she was diverted from the true path by a fixed idea that the author of Wuthering Heights had made "copy" of her brother Branwell's profligacy. Still it was she who was the first to emphasise the fact that "while the West Riding has known the prototype of nearly every person and nearly every place in Jane Eyre and Shirley, not a single character of Wuthering Heights ever climbed the hills round Haworth"; and it is she who makes the significant remark that

"Emily, familiar with all the wild stories of Haworth for a century back, and nursed on grisly Irish horrors, tales of 1798, tales of oppression and misery—Emily, with all this eerie lore at her fingers' ends, would have the less difficulty in combining and working the separate motives into a consistent whole."

Such, then, is a brief summary of Dr. Wright's case; and even in this condensed form I think it will be recognised as a strong one. One practical advantage in accepting it is manifest; for it concludes, without casting discredit upon anybody, the controversy concerning Branwell Brontë and the authorship of Wuthering Heights. The story which suggested the book had been told in the family, and was the common property of its members—of Branwell as much as of Emily. It was she only who gave to it an impressive artistic form; but Branwell, who tried many things, may have made tentative essays in the working up of the familiar material, and we are not reduced to the decision between the shameful alternative of lying by the brother or imposture by the sister.

Dr. Wright's concluding chapters are, in a sense, supplementary rather than integral; but they are not wanting in either relevance or interest. They deal with the reception of Jane Eyre by the Irish kinsfolk of its author; with Hugh Brontë's single visit to England, undertaken with a view of inflicting corporal punishment upon the maligner of his grand-daughter in the Quarterly Review; and with the authorship of the notorious article that had aroused his ire. The long discussion of this matter is now for ever closed. In the Bookman for September, 1892, Dr. Robertson Nicoll announced his discovery, in a letter written by Sara Coleridge (and, doubtless, read by thousands who had not discerned its significance), of clear proof that the article was written by her friend Miss Rigby, afterwards well known as Lady Eastlake. This, however, is not all. Dr. Wright has made the further discovery—from internal evidence which had independently convinced Mr. Andrew Lang, and which is sufficiently definite to convince any one—that the portion of the article which has called forth universal indignation and contempt was not the work of the hand which wrote the main body of the criticism, but was an interpolation from the pen of Lockhart, or one of his subordinates, inserted to preserve the traditional tone of the Review. The piecing is done in a most unworkmanlike character, and the review as it stands presents the odd appearance of an ill-written passage of vulgar and malevolent abuse sandwiched between two other vigorous passages of warm appreciation. An unexpected solution this of a problem which has puzzled all would-be solvers for forty-five years.

It will be seen that the book is full of curious interest; but it is a pity that Dr. Wright should allow himself so many lapses from elegance of style. Why, too, will he persist in adding a final "e" to proper names which have hitherto dispensed with it? It is difficult to excuse "Becky Sharpe," but, in a book with such a theme, to excuse "Heathcliffe" is impossible.

JAMES ASHCROFT NOBLE.

ITALY AND CORSICA.

A Wild Sheep Chase. From the French of Emile Bergerat. (Seeley.)

A Lotos Eater in Capri. By Alan Walters. (Bentley.)

Here and There in Italy and over the Border. By Linda Villari. (W. H. Allen.)

A Wild Sheep Chase is an account of a journey through Corsica, undertaken, in company with Prince Roland Bonaparte, by the witty Frenchman whose name "in journalism" is Caliban. The sort of thing has been often done before, but rarely with such lightness of touch and such a contagious gaiety. The wild sheep is, of course, the mouflon, the indigenous goat of the two great Western islands of the Mediterranean, who appears, horns and all, on the cover; but that is the only place where he does appear, for, like Mme. Benoiton in "The Fast Family," though he is always coming on the stage, the curtain falls without his appearance. We have heard so much of late about the island odours, and the island forests, and the island vendetta, that one hardly expects to come across many new facts. In this we are not disappointed, nor are the few facts that are freshly presented to us of much importance; but all the same, the book is full of novelty and interest. Matthew Arnold's phrase of letting one's consciousness play freely about a subject exactly describes M. Bergerat's method; and with him, at least, it works admirably. You open at a description of the Casa Bonaparte at Ajaccio, and get ready to wade through a sea of patriotic platitudes. You find instead a humorist turned melancholy by the spectacle of three English girls, to whose family the first floor of the unauthentic building has been let. But the bad moment does not last. The cries of the newsboys dissipate it: they are screaming out (it is in 1887), "Great Scandal at Paris! Sale of the Legion of Honour," of the decoration founded by the Napoleon at whose birthplace we are standing. But Caliban scouts the story as impossible.

"However rich you may boast of being, and however great a fool I may choose to fancy you, there is one thing which no power, human or superhuman, no power in heaven or earth would make you do—and that is, to take a sum of money out of your safe and fling it out of window."

"The man capable of taking a sum of money and flinging it out of window for nothing, for fun, would not be a man: he would be a god. Such a one does not exist. Now such an action as that would be less lunatic than for a man of our time to buy the red ribbon, because the red ribbon has this peculiarity—that it is given to any one who asks for it, and for nothing!"

"To say of a member of the Legion of Honour that he has bought his decoration is the same thing as saying of an Academician that he paid for his fauteuil with gold. A man obtains his decoration—as a man becomes one of the Forty—in the first place, because he has deserved it, and, secondly, because he has left no stone unturned to get it."

The book is full of plums, to pick out which would serve no useful purpose; for, unlike most funny books, it is not tedious, and the air of spontaneity is wonderfully maintained. It contains, besides, some admirable descriptive passages. Of these last, perhaps the most striking is an account of the author's visit to those famous brigands, the Bellacoscia, and of the dinner with the younger members of the family, at which the champagne is opened by a long shot from the carbine of Uncle Antonio. Needless to say that after this Uncle Antonio's health is drunk with enthusiasm. Prince Roland is evidently a persona gratissima in Corsica; and M. Bergerat, as his companion, lived in the reflected light—and smoke—of his popularity. The peasants hunted up in his honour all the old Genoese arquebuses and matchlocks, and loaded them up to the muzzle till they burst in their hands, "under our noses and in our hair, which was standing on end with fright. And they were happy—happy." The gun is, in fact, the plaything and the pet of the Corsican, not to say his guide, philosopher, and friend. Indeed, M. Bergerat opines that "he plays too much with it, and it takes away his confidence in Justice, who is armed only with a pair of scales." M. Bergerat does not pose as a politician, but here and there his opinions crop out, as when he condoles with the Corsicans for having been deluded by the impostor King Theodore, whom he, by-the-by, makes die in the Tower, whereas, as his translator points out, he never was in anything more romantic than the Fleet. Such impostors, he says, "do occasionally impose on the most sceptical of nations, and reign even for twenty years," but notwithstanding all this light-hearted flippancy, Caliban is an acute observer; and he goes to the root of the matter when he warns "the pastors of the people of 'l'oltaire'" that at bottom the Corsican is an Italian, joined only to the French through bonaparte, and, after all, preferring Paoli to him. His opinion of the duty of the Government to Corsica is comically summed up in few words. That duty is, he says, to colonise it. How France has hitherto performed her duty may be judged from the fact that, when a Corsican wants to feel proud of being French, he goes (on foot) to look at the column of granite lying in the grass at Calvi, "cut once upon a time to support in the Place Vendôme the least curly of his countrymen. It has been there since 1805, watch in hand, that column." Finally, he makes his Corsicans say to M. Carnot:

'If you judge us worthy—as worthy (to speak with reverence) as Tonquin—to enjoy the benefits of scientific progress, see for yourself the condition we are in. Make it possible for us to get some good out of our soil, our air, our water, and create a Corsican commerce. Up to the present time we have exported nothing but deputies.'

In A Lotos Eater in Capri Dr. Alan Walters has essayed to do for the island of Tiberius much the same as M. Bergerat has done for the island of Napoleon. As might be expected from the differing nationalities of the two writers, the Englishman's book is as far ahead of the Frenchman's from the point of view of information as in point of style it is below it. Nobody, however, who knows his subject so intimately as does Dr. Walters, and who is as full as he of enthusiastic appreciation, could well fail to write an interesting book. He draws a very graphic picture of an island "in which it seemed always afternoon"; but, as a matter of fact, it seems to have provoked him to much hard work. A vast deal of energy has gone to make up this volume, and a great deal of reading as to the sojourn of the Emperors on the island, as to the mythology of its Greek name, as to its story under Norman and Angevin, and as to its capture during the Napoleonic wars. He has further investigated Ischia and Procida, and made excursions to the mainland: to Amalfi and La Cava, to Pozzuoli and the Littus Veneris. Among the many figures that Dr. Walters passes in review, that of Tiberius has taken the strongest grip on his imagination, and the last scenes of that strange career are sketched with abundant vigour. The ashes of Tiberius were laid, not without difficulty, in the mausoleum of Augustus, which the visitor to Rome now looks for in vain. You seek in the Palazzo Corea, in a sunless vicolo near the Ripetta, for all that is left of the vast tumulus of earth once raised on a lofty basement of white marble shaded by evergreens and crowned with a bronze statue of Augustus. Now it is used as a circus of the baser sort, and

"you can walk in through the gloomy marble-paved cortile and take a place among the canaglia, and listen to the dubious quips of Pugliaccio, the white-robed jester, and watch Bucesfalo's performing pony and the thrilling antics of half-naked nymphs, and all the rest of it, for the sum of two sous. And if amid the ringing laughter and bravos of the unwashed 'plebs urbana' you can spare a thought for the dead past, you may remember that you are sitting on the grave of Tiberius Claudius Nero."

This passage fairly gauges the author in his serious mood—which we own to finding far preferable to his merrier moments. In his jocose manner is the account of a Tarantella in Capri, which he describes as "reel fandango, gavotte, and war dance all in one." The best performance, that of "the most massive female I ever saw," is thus described:

"The passage of a camel through the eye of a needle would be a joke to the passing [of that] 'too, too solid' lump of flesh through any ordinary English doorway. The little room seemed to shrink into half its dimensions as she took the floor, 'teres atque rotunda,' portly and immense, with no woeful want of wilful waist, and with as little 'linked sweetness long drawn out' as there was in the strains to which she danced. But for all that, she was far and away the best dancer of the lot; and if Behemoth, in his native swamps, seeks ever to fascinate his equal half by a coy and graceful pas de seul, then hath he no mean rival in this incarnation of Balzac's 'embonpoint flottant.' By mere efflux of time, the gay revel was at last concluded—at least, I presume that it was; for when Signora Cantara Butta sank on to the edge of a chair, looking as "fresh as paint" after ten minutes posturing, to which 'Ta-ra-ra-boom-de-ay' is child's play—

'The wedding guest
Here beat his breast' and sought the sweet influences of Pleiades in the soft spring night outside."

The author's sense of humour is evidently quite Italianised; but, apart from this defect, the book is a good example of its kind, albeit it falls under Dr. Johnson's condemnation of sheep's head, as being but "confused feeding."

Here and There in Italy is mainly a reprint of magazine articles, giving the writer's experience as a traveller in more or less out of the way places. Some of these were, indeed, hardly out of the way at all, being somewhat hackneyed twenty years ago, while others remain to this day comparatively unknown. Bordighera, San Martino di Castrozza, Capri, Courmayeur, and the Val d'Aosta, belong to the former class; Chiesanuova, Browning's Asolo, and San Marino, to the latter. The articles are vivaciously written, but contain a good many slips, not generally of much importance, it is true, but which should have been put right in a reprint like this. The statement, for instance, that the Grand Paradis and the Matterhorn are two of the four highest peaks in Europe is so startlingly incorrect that one wonders where it can have been picked up; and, though a lady may be forgiven an imperfect acquaintance with the literature of Hannibal, it is odd to be told at the present day that the Carthaginian descended into Italy by the Little St. Bernard. Per contra, there is a very good description of Chiesanuova, a little-known Veronese health resort, and the famous natural bridge of the Ponte de Veja some ten miles above it. It is a curious place, just on the Tridentine frontier and hard by the Thirteen Communes, one of those islands of Germanic population which are found all along the border from the Val d'Ayas to the Vicentina. The most up-to-date of the papers is that on New Rome; and we note, with satisfaction, that Mme. Villari has not fallen into the vulgar fashion of abusing "the cust modern Italian" for what he has done in that city. "New Rome," she says, "is not the saddening sight one expected to see. In spite of hideous modern buildings, reckless destruction of beautiful things, and all the vulgarities of hasty civilisation, it is a 'grand city.' Such, indeed, is our own opinion; but how few ladies, who knew Rome in the days of oil lamps, would have the courage to say so. Of course, such papers as these ought not to be judged by any severe standard, nor is such demanded by the public for whom they are written. With all that is asked in that respect, they, no doubt, fully comply. We should add that this lady's style is bright, simple, and unaffected.

REGINALD HUGHES.

NEW NOVELS.

To Right the Wrong. By Edna Lyall. In 3 vols. (Hurst & Blackett.)

A Gray Eye or So. By F. Frankfort Moore. In 3 vols. (Hutchinson.)

A Wasted Crime. By D. Christie Murray. In 2 vols. (Chatto & Windus.)

The Curb of Honour. By M. Betham Edwards. (A. & C. Black.)

Two Bites at a Cherry. By T. Bailey Aldrich. (David Douglas.)

Stories of a Western Town. By Octave Thanet. (Sampson Low.)

Foes in Ambush. By Capt. Chas. King. (Lippincotts.)

The Bridal March and the Watch. By J. G. Williams. (Digby, Long & Co.)

The Boy-God. By E. M. Lynch. (Fisher Unwin.)

To Edna Lyall's able historical romance there is a notable drawback, which one might think so experienced a novelist would have been careful to avoid. John Hampden is the hero of To Right the Wrong. The paramount interest centres in him—in his personality, sayings, doings, and influence; without him, the novel would be like, say, "Don Juan" with the part of Don Juan omitted. Yet somehow beyond the middle of the second volume Hampden dies; and with his disappearance goes also, I fear, much of the interest which hitherto sustained the reader. I use this verb advisedly; for Edna Lyall's new story seems to me at least to need some more central historical attraction. The period of the Civil War has still for us the romance of charging horse, of the sudden trumpet, of sword-thresh and stirrup-clank; and there must be few who do not instinctively rally with militant partisanship either to the Royalists or to the Parliamentarians: who, so to say, do not grip either the pike of the Round-head or the sword of the Cavalier. There have been several good stories written upon this theme—notably, within the last few years, two romances of exceptional verve and dramatic appeal: so that Edna Lyall does not break new ground—on the contrary, her book appears under a heavy handicap. However, every reader does not strain his or her ears for the sound of the fray; and there must be many who will derive much pleasure and interest from To Right the Wrong: who will find in its sedate movement a greater charm than in a more vigorous and dramatic recital, and will eagerly apprehend rather than resent the mass of facts which Edna Lyall has interpolated into her story of "quiet loves and mild vicissitudes." Moreover, it must in justice be added that there are doubtless many readers who will find To Right the Wrong a stirring tale even when considered as a military romance: for it is full of martial episodes and much mention of "weapons that be for the effusion of blood," though the present writer may not happen to be moved by it in this way. Edna Lyall's humour is genuine, if slight; and one cannot but smile with her over Original Sin Smith and other minor personages in her story. She has taken infinite pains to make the book a trustworthy record not only of events, but of persons. To this end she has had the occasional guidance of Dr. Gardiner, Canon Venables, and other historical students; while, through the assistance of the Bishop of Durham and Col. Waller, she has been able to adapt from the Letters, Aphorisms, and Sermons of Whichcote and the Vindication and Divine Meditations of Sir William Waller, much matter of authentic interest. The greater part of the book, from the death of Hampden, is occupied with the love affairs and mischances of the younger people. Here Edna Lyall is on familiar ground. No one better than she understands the nature and wants of the young girl who is on the verge of womanhood. Rosamond, in this story, is one of her happiest creations.

To turn from Edna Lyall's To Right the Wrong to Mr. F. Frankfort Moore's new novel is an abrupt and, to one reader at least, a refreshing change. True, the one is light, while the other is full of high seriousness: the one is debonair where the other is earnest: the one is a sketch, where the other is a picture; but then the one is amusing, where the other is instructive. A Gray Eye or So is not so good a story as its popular predecessor, I Forbid the Banns; but it is much cleverer and, for those who do not lust after plot, more entertaining. Mr. Frankfort Moore would do better not to strain so constantly after Meredithian epigram and point; still, better than to imitate the cheap and generally stale epigrams which pass for Oscarian originality. How easy—and how wearisome—the composition of yards of "smartness," such as, "Advice, my dear Harold, is the opinion asked by one man of another when he has made up his mind what course to adopt." Mr. Frankfort Moore, however, has a pretty wit of his own. He is a quick observer; he has a light touch; his irony is native, and so has a special charm. If the personages of his story are old types, they are dressed in the newest fashion and talk in the current vogue. In one or two instances, notably in that of Archie Brown, the son of a millionaire contractor, with his passion for the legitimate drama, the author has added a new portrait to the gallery of fiction. This extraordinary being, partly a recognisable sketch from life, partly a fantastic exaggeration of the wealthy "masher" type, is a genuine creation. Mr. Frankfort Moore is particularly successful in his minor characters, though he might have given us more concerning that conscientious historian, the heroine's father, who was engaged in writing a book on Irish informers, and had made such satisfactory progress that by the time he had finished his seventh volume he was almost ready to start the letter C. Father Conn, the Irish priest, is delightful, and, in a different way, so is the cynical old roué, Lord Fotheringay. There is enough of real feeling beneath all the pleasant fooling to prove that Mr. Frankfort Moore could do stronger work than A Gray Eye or So, though at present he is certainly most successful when he touches lightly light things. By all means let him go again to Shakspeare for his next title; but in that wealth of suggestive phrases let him select more happily than in the present instance. The foolish designation may keep many from perusal of a witty, bright, and entertaining novel.

Mr. D. Christie Murray's new book should convince even those who do not particularly care for his work that he is a master of his craft. He has never written a more conventional novel, so far as plot is concerned; and even the characters are wearisomely familiar—the irascible but kindly squire; the well-meaning but rather dunder-headed son and heir, who insists on "marrying beneath him"; the young woman in question, refined in manner, but come of an ill stock and with obnoxious relatives. Miss Mary Marsh (later Mrs. Robert Audley), the nominal heroine, is a younger relative of Becky Sharp; but she lacks her prototype's cleverness, and at the last acts in a way that would have made Mrs. Captain Rawdon Crawley smile with cynical amazement. With a conventional plot and conventional characters, it must have been difficult for Mr. Christie Murray to weave anew a story that would have a strong appeal. He has, moreover, not even taken the trouble to make Mary Audley attractive; and, what is much more serious, she is from first to last a mere automaton, not a living creature evolved out of the ferment of imagined realities. Robert Audley is a man of indifferent fibre intellectually, though a good fellow and an honest. Old Sir William, though a baronet, is neither a rake nor a pauper—and for this mercy we are grateful, a fresh run upon bad baronets having recently set in with astonishing vigour. Yet, in the face of all this, A Wasted Crime is an able and interesting book. It is possible that some of Mr. Christie Murray's admirers may rank it higher among his writings than the present critic can conscientiously do; but it is, at any rate, better worth perusal than the majority of more ambitious tales. The secret is in the telling, in the craft. It is a novel that would be a weariness to the flesh if from a 'prentice hand, for the stale matter of it is redeemed only by the winsome manner. Artistically, as well as otherwise, the author made a mistake when he gave the book its present title, which tells too much. The name under which it appeared during its serial publication was better—"She would be My Lady!"

The Curb of Honour is not one of Miss M. Betham Edwards's successes. It has charming Pyrenean vignettes, but transcripts from nature do not make a novel. The story moves awkwardly, notwithstanding the unmistakable skill of the author. The conversational portions are often laboured, and there are radical objections to the acceptance of this romance as an accurate picture of life. What manner of man is this who, with his lady companions beset in a snowdrift, responds to a remark from the driver ("Here we are, that is all I know") with "an Aristotelian, or rather Kantian conclusion, but which, unfortunately, won't help us much." The novel, however, improves greatly towards the close, and the concluding chapter is a piece of masterly tragi-comedy. Seldom does one come across the record of such a wooing as that of the cynical and yet hyper-sensitive Rugden and the waspish Lamenta Tart. When I say that this scene is suggestive of Balzac, I mean a high compliment; for I am one of the dwindling minority who regard the author of the Comédie Humaine as the greatest novelist, not only of France, but of the world. Lavinia Tart—or Lamenta, as she is always called—is a reality. No one can fail to recognise this, though there will be wide divergence of opinion as to the ethic of Rugden's "curb of honour."

The next three books upon my list are by American authors. That by Mr. Aldrich and that by Octave Thanet are more than ordinarily good. In prose, as in verse, Mr. Aldrich is an artist. He rarely misses his aim; and it is his instinctive fear of falling short of it that, doubtless, has always made him avoid the extreme of tragedy or strong emotion—or, rather, that has prevented him from approaching the strenuously emotional or the tragic except with merely critical interest. This little volume of seven bright, entertaining tales should prove one of the most popular in Mr. David Douglas's excellent series of "American Authors."

Octave Thanet's work is so uniformly good that it is almost an impertinence to lay stress on the literary excellence of her Stories of a Western Town. Each of the six tales is convincingly satisfactory in execution and in effect. In a sense they constitute a single book; for all are episodes connected more or less directly with one person, the young man who gives his name to the sixth story, Harry Loosing. As in all Octave Thanet's fiction, the characters are clearly drawn, and speak and act in a way that makes the reader at once believe in them as actualities. How true if unexpected a touch, for example, is that where the old German workman in "The Besetment of Kurt Lieders"—who, by the way, has what his good wife would call an exasperating habit of suicide—gives vent to a boorish gibe at a man having been fool enough to listen to a woman's pleading, when Thekla comes to him with the good news of her successful appeal on his behalf with his late employer. What delightful humour there is in the story of the old fellow's sulky attempts at suicide, and his indignation at interference: how "he kicked me when I was try to come near to git the rope off his neck; and so soon like he could git his breath swore at me." Thekla learned how to baffle him. "Onct he tooked 'Rough on Rats,' and I found it out and I put some apple-butter in the place of it, and he kept wondering and wondering how he didn't feel notings." The story of that abortive hanging, with its sequel, is pure comedy, and, moreover, something quite new of its kind. A word of praise should be added for the thirty dainty illustrations by Mr. A. B. Frost.

It is scarcely fair to turn from the genuine comedy and exquisite pathos of Octave Thanet's Stories of a Western Town to Captain King's Foss in Ambush. The two books, however, appeal to a wholly different audience. Charles King is literary first cousin to Gustave Aimard and Mayne Reid. The American boy delights in him; and this new story, with its full tide of Arizona bluster and blasphemy, and its mixture of Arizona and Apache warfare, all this, with the frequent mention of the word hell, will be a pure joy to a certain class of readers. It is robust, no doubt: so is a bull on the rampage.

Björnson's Bridal March was worth translating, and is worth reading: so is Turgenieff's The Watch: but what one has to do with the other, or what artistic connexion there is between the Russian and the Norwegian novelist, it is difficult to see.

The Boy God is an essay in narrative-dialogue rather than a story, though a story of a kind there is. It is an extremely clever analytical study of love as a factor in the lives of several typical "sweet girl-graduates." Yet I should not be surprised if most readers found more pleasure in the superabundant notes and quotations which make up so large a portion of this quaint little book. The Boy God has playfulness, wit, and genial satire; though, notwithstanding its nominal advocacy of the "independent girl," it is doubtful if the dignified Girttonite will approve of so perilous an ally. Nevertheless, a serious face lurks behind the laughing mask. The book should be read and pondered, as well as taken up for enjoyment. It is charmingly bound and printed, with several dainty illustrations. The Boy God: Troublesome and Vengeful, is a really welcome addition to the literature of the Marriage Question.

WILLIAM SHARP.

GIFT BOOKS.

Reminiscences of the Great Mutiny. By William Forbes-Mitchell. (Macmillans.) We make no scruple about including this among the adventure-books which boys should be encouraged to read these Christmas holidays. It is a plain narrative of the experiences of a sergeant of the Ninety-Third Highlanders during the Mutiny; and it is rendered the more trustworthy, because the writer made notes at the time and has re-visited the scenes described. He has also lived for many years in India, and is therefore able to look back upon that wild year of horrors from a truer perspective than most of his comrades. He can actually now talk on familiar terms with one of the few survivors of the Sepoys against whom he once fought so fiercely, and take down from his lips the tale of an English deserter who commanded the artillery inside Delhi, and who is believed to have shot Adrian Hope with his own hand. Scarcely less remarkable is the story of the spy, who was detected and hanged during the third (and final) march on Lucknow. He was a Rohilla noble, who had twice visited England—in the suite of Jang Bahadur, and with the notorious Azimulla, the agent of Nana Sahib. The revelations of this man to the author, who had him in charge the night before his death, seem to bear the stamp of veracity. To those who know Indian history it is also interesting to learn that the Rohilla Ghazis were the most formidable foes that the Highlanders had to face. Another romance with a pregnant meaning will be found in the Appendix, where the author gives reasons for ascribing the assassination of Major Neill in Central India, in 1887, to revenge for a well-known incident that took place just thirty years before. But, of course, the chief interest centres round the storming of the Secundrabad and of the Begum's Palace. The description of the latter throws some welcome light upon the death of Hodson, which may have been due to his own rashness, but not to his lust for plunder. That loot was to be had at the capture of Lucknow, our author testifies: "I could myself name one deeply encumbered estate which was cleared of mortgage to the tune of £180,000 within two years of the plunder of Lucknow." To return to the Secundrabad. The author tells about two men in his own company, both of superior education but of unknown antecedents, who evidently hated one another with a mortal hatred. One went "fey" just before the assault, broke out into blasphemy, exposed himself, and was shot down. The other stood over him, and said solemnly: "The fool hath said in his heart, there is no God. Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord. I came to the Ninety-Third to see that man die." He then rushed to the storm, shouting at every bayonet-thrust verses from the Paraphrase of Psalm cxvi. On the following night, the author's nerves were too much shaken to let him sleep, and he heard the terrible struggle fought over again by his dreaming comrades, oaths and shouts of defiance being curiously mingled with prayers. It would be easy to quote pages from this book. But we have said enough to show that truth may sometimes be, not only stranger than fiction, but also no less interesting to read. There is, of course, truth and truth; and we by no means recommend to boys Mr. Forrest's official records of the Mutiny.

Through the Sikh War: a Tale of the Conquest of the Punjab. By G. A. Henty. With illustrations by Hal Hurst, and a Map. (Blackie.) Last Christmas, if we remember aright, Mr. Henty gave us a story of the Mutiny. He has now gone ten years back in Indian history, and laid his scene in the Punjab, which was then indeed a land of romance. His hero is, of course, an English boy, who is called on to join his uncle, an adventurer in the service of Ranjit Singh. Fifteen is, indeed, an early age to begin active life in India; but we believe that the great Malcolm was no older when he first landed at Madras. The incident of the boy's devoting himself to the study of the vernacular during his voyage out is curiously paralleled by the true story of Thomas Twining, in his Travels in India a Hundred Years ago, just published by Messrs. Osgood, McIlvaine & Co., where, again, the hero is not more than seventeen. The picture of the Punjab during its last few years of independence, the description of the battles on the Sutlej (especially that of Chilianwalla), and the portraiture generally of native character, seem admirably true. The few errors we have noticed are quite insignificant. Ghulab Singh was not a Sikh, as he is called throughout. Bhop Lal is not a good name for a Pathan, nor Akram Chunder for a Kashmiri. It is probably only by a slip of the pen that Sir Henry (Hardinge) is once called commander-in-chief (p. 156). On the whole, we have never read a more vivid and faithful narrative of military adventure in India.

The Castle of the Carpathians. By Jules Verne. With numerous illustrations. (Sampson Low.) On this occasion, M. Jules Verne comes before us in his more sober, and indeed didactic, vein. About one half of the book is a picture of village life among the mountains of Transylvania, which recalls, in its simple realism and acute discrimination of character, the stories of Erckmann-Chatrian. The other half, rather clumsily dovetailed into the former, has to do with a haunted castle, which somehow fails to impress us with a proper feeling of eeriness. Ultimately, the mysterious sights and sounds are all explained (as we anticipated) through electricity, the phonograph, and similar devices. Baron Rodolph, the inhabitant of the castle, and its legitimate owner, is an unsatisfactory creation; nor can we say much more for the Roumanian count, by whose means the secret is disclosed. There was no need for such a terrible catastrophe. We have noticed one solecism in Latin—immanum pecus (p. 3)—for which we fancy that the English translator and not the French author must be held responsible.

The Lost Trader; or, the Mystery of the "Lombardy." By Henry Frith. (W. & R. Chambers.) Mr. Frith writes good sea-stories, and this is the best of them that we have read. He is a member of the school of Mr. Clark Russell, about as good a master as could be selected; and here, as in the books of that most admirable marine novelist, we have mutiny, fighting, hair-breadth escapes, incidents of tempest, and the usual marvellous coincidences by which each separate climax is arrived at, and the final dénouement is attained. We are inclined to think that the action of the master of the Indiaman in sending off his treasure, his passengers, and the remainder of his crew, and remaining on board himself while the mutineers and the pirates are close at hand is a little unnatural; but in these matters it is possible to be hypercritical, and boys are not likely to find fault with so enthralling a story as The Lost Trader.

Just Like Jack: A Story of the Brine and the Breeze. By Gordon Stables, M.D. With eight illustrations by J. Finnemore. (Hodder & Stoughton.) Dr. Gordon Stables knows life on board of a man-of-war, and he also knows something about the South Seas. He has here ingeniously—and rather audaciously—combined the two. The boy-hero is first of all carried off by one of Her Majesty's despatch-boats, while he is enjoying a swim off the British coast. Such an incident is conceivable; but we decline to admit the possibility of his being taken as an involuntary passenger to the Bermudas and then to the Galapagos Islands. There, at last, he resolves to find his way home to England on a Yankee barque. But the crew mutiny; and the hero with the captain are marooned on an uninhabited island in the Southern Seas. After beating off an attack by Papuan head-hunters, they finally make friends with them, and by their help recover their own ship. Improbabilities of many kinds abound, though we believe Dr. Gordon Stables has authority for his marine crocodiles. He also introduces his own comments more than is agreeable to the taste of one of his readers. Still, he must have the credit of having invented an original character in Zach, the Yankee captain and naturalist. The dog, Jack No. 2, is also good, but we have too much of him.

Ivar the King. By Paul Du Chaillu. (John Murray.) M. du Chaillu has, as everybody knows, very much interested himself in the Viking Age, and now endeavours by means of a tale to impart his knowledge of the manners and customs of the Norsemen to those English boys and girls who, according to his theory, are almost exclusively descended from them. The result has been a story which has more of archaeology than human interest, more of didactic purpose than living imagination. Ivar is, of course, a splendid fellow. We learn how he is brought up, what weapons he used, and what maidens he fell in love with, and—what is of much greater importance to the reader—the adventures he undertook with his foster-brothers, Hjalmar, Sigmar, and the rest. These are thrilling enough, and succeed each other with rapidity and variety, until the hero ends by marrying the noble and lovely Randalin. There is enough material in the book for many romances, and boys will no doubt read it all with avidity, despite the absence of that imaginative talent which alone can put new life into the bones of past ages.

The Desert Ship: a Story of Adventure by Sea and Land. By John Bloundelle-Burton. (Hutchinson.) A perilous quest of concealed treasure is one of the most well-worn of narrative motives; but it never seems to lose its attractiveness, nor is it likely to lose it for the first time in the pages of Mr. Bloundelle-Burton's intensely exciting story. The author has managed to hit upon a novel and interesting setting for the old theme, the nature of which is shadowed forth in Mr. Hume Nisbet's frontispiece. Not merely local tradition, but other evidence, seems to prove that the great Colorado Desert was once an inland sea, opening up from the Gulf of California; and Mr. Bloundelle-Burton has utilised the idea of a ship forsaken by its crew, stranded on the desert plain and left with its costly freight to reward the adventure of the adventurous. It is a motive which lends itself to natural, as distinguished from forced, invention, and there is no lack of such invention in these stirring pages. The only criticism that we feel inclined to make is purely literary. Seeing that the story is supposed to have been written at the beginning of the present century, the style is surely a little old-fashioned.

Toddleben's Hero. By M. M. Blake. (Methuen.) This is a pleasantly written—and most emphatically well printed and beautifully illustrated—story of the Camel Corps in Egypt. It is short and full of incidents, but perhaps not suited for the comprehension of the very youngest children. For the true heroine of it is a governess, who, having become penniless, is jilted by the officer to whom she had been engaged. Danger and suffering, however, improve Major Earnshaw; and—which is more important—he is brought into contact with a singularly unselfish nature in Dick Graham, the brother of the governess's pupils and Toddleben's hero. Dick, too, has fallen in love with Margery Dawning, but he sacrifices his own feelings to bring about a reconciliation between her and Earnshaw. Altogether, this is a very readable and "naturally" written story.

Suppleback. By R. Ward. (Chapman & Hall.) The fun of an Irishman disguised as a Maori, who figures in this story, is a trifle too boisterous and stagey. Otherwise it is well planned, well put together, and well written. The athletic performer who gives his name to the book, and who turns out to be an English squire's roving son, is, in every respect, a capital fellow, and makes as good a boys' hero as we have come across for a long time. The missionary's daughters, whom Jack comes across and, of course, falls in love with as the queen of a murderous tribe, is also admirably sketched. Altogether, too, there is so much in the way of good nature and of heartiness of all kinds in this book that it is delightful from the first page to the last.

Weird Tales from the Northern Seas. From the Danish of Jonas Lie. By R. Nisbet Bain. With twelve illustrations by Laurence Housman. (Kegan Paul & Co.) These stories of sea-demons and goblins are certainly as grim and ghastly as the most ardent lover of horror can desire, and doubtless present a faithful picture of the wild superstitions prevailing among the seafaring population of Northern Norway. The translator's style is wanting in flexibility, and gives the impression that he has been hampered by the endeavour to adhere as closely as possible to the forms of expression of his original. The book is therefore not very easy reading, but will be interesting to students of folk-lore. The illustrations show vigorous inventive power, and are in excellent keeping with the grotesque and gloomy spirit of the tales.

The Tragedy of the Norse Gods. By Ruth J. Pitt. Illustrated by G. P. Jacomb-Hood and J. A. Brindley. (Fisher Unwin.) In this book the principal incidents of the divine mythology of Scandinavia are presented in the form of a continuous story. The author makes no pretence of acquaintance with the sources in their original language, and the authorities she has followed are not all of equal value; but, although the book would not bear to be criticised from this point of view, it is attractively written and shows a keen feeling for the poetical aspect of the legends. The ethical meanings which the writer finds in the mythology are, we fear, often read into the text rather than legitimately inferred from it. Although moral and religious instincts have always had their part in the shaping of mythology, the part has never been relatively a large one, and it is difficult for modern readers to avoid overrating it. The proper names are treated in rather a haphazard fashion: either the original forms should have been used, or the names should have been frankly anglicised. Such a form as "Vanen," for example, has no justification in an English book. It should be either "Vaner" or "Wanes." The two illustrations by Mr. Jacomb-Hood are full of spirit; the two by Mr. Brindley are rather weak.

In the Grip of the Algerine: an Historical Tale of the Mediterranean. Being the Personal Narrative of Sir Lester Willoughby, Knight, transcribed by Robert Leighton. Illustrations by Maynard Brown. (Sunday School Union.) Lester Willoughby, a boy of sixteen, the son of a Devonshire squire, has obtained an appointment as one of Queen Elizabeth's pages. On his way to Bristol to meet his uncle, by whom he is to be conducted to London, he is seized by the crew of an Algerine corsair. Rescued by a Spanish man-of-war, he becomes a comrade and afterwards a fellow-captive of Curvantes, who figures largely in the story. In the end he escapes and returns to England, in high favour with the queen, and marries the love of his boyhood. The book is written in good English, with just enough of archaism. If there is not much individuality in the characters, there is, at any rate, plenty of interesting incident.

Evil May-day: a Story of 1517. By E. Everett-Green. (Nelson.) "Evil May-day" is the name given by contemporary annalists to the day of the disastrous riot directed against the foreign workmen in London. The incident obviously affords good opportunities for a writer of fiction, and it is curious that, so far as we are aware, it has not before been used as the foundation of a story. Miss Everett Green has made of it a very pretty story indeed.

A Champion of the Faith. By J. M. Callwell. (Blackie.) This "Tale of Prince Hal and the Lollards" is much above the average in merit. Its historical characters have been very thoroughly studied, and are presented gracefully and clearly. As a picture of the times the book does not achieve success, but we pardon this in view of the excellence of one or two of the characters. The love-story of the hero and heroine is pleasantly told, taking up the centre of the canvas, and into this story come several historical personages—notably Prince Hal and Lord Cobham. Prince Hal's encounter with the Chief Justice is described, and his character briefly indicated, and the sketch of Lord Cobham is altogether admirable. It is strange that a character and career so striking as Lord Cobham's should not yet have found a novelist of distinction to embody them in fiction. The novel before us makes a creditable and successful effort to supply this omission, and may be recommended to any reader anxious to know something of the John Oldcastle who "died a martyr."

The Story of Herbert Archer, and other Tales. By Lady Charles Llynne and Others. (Hogg.) On the whole, these stories may claim to be possessed of interest, without rising above the level of the average child's story of the present day. Three out of the six are historical. The best in the collection seem to us to be—"A Tale of the French Revolution" and "A Seaside Home." The most remarkable feature of the book is the three coloured illustrations, which are, indeed, of quite unusual beauty. In reality, and not in name only, they embellish the book.

The Winged Wolf and other Fairy Tales. Collected by Ha Sheen Kaff. (Edward Stanford.) Though the maker of this book, who chooses so curious a pseudonym, disclaims any merit but that of a selector and editor, children and their elders will be grateful to him for collecting such a delightful store of Eastern tales. They are one and all delightful, and do not decline in imaginative force or interest of any kind as they go on. Indeed, the first of all, "Prince Lubin and the Wolf," is by no means the best of the series, though it is excellent; and "Prince Goldfish" is nearly as good as any, though it is the last. For force of imagination, there is nothing like "Thavanan the Magician"; for humour nothing like "Little Whitebeard" and "Emelyan the Fool"; for playful fancy, like "Finikin and the Golden Pippins"; for pathos, nothing like "The Sedge Island." If any one doubts, let him read the book and discriminate for himself. Let him also admire the spirit and imagination shown in Mr. Arthur Layard's illustrations.

Drolls from Shadowland. By J. H. Pearce. (Lawrence & Bullen.) The cleverness of these cold, uncomfortable little stories is undeniable. Mr. Pearce has a weird imagination, and an unusual gift of curdling the blood with a few strokes of the pen. Though he seems, to give him due credit, to be sincerely discontented and pessimistic, and hits hard at shams, he seems also to enjoy curdling for curdling's sake. At all events, he is an artist at it; and if anyone is suffering from a plethora of happiness, or from undue content with the world as it is, or from such exuberance of fancy as to wish to know what the birds say, or to be a tree, or any complaint of this kind, he cannot do better than read Drolls from Shadowland. But let him not imagine for a moment that the title of this book promises anything in the slightest degree cheerful. The Drolls are like shadows leaping on the wall on a dark night with a corpse in the house. If anyone not in the best of spirits is disposed to take with Mr. Pearce "the unexpected journey," or enjoy his "pleasant entertainment," let him refrain; he had better stop at home and play backgammon with his wife.

Fifty-two Stories for Boyhood and Youth. Edited by Alfred H. Miles. (Hutchinson.) "Christmas comes but once a year, and when it comes it brings good cheer" for the boy and girl of the period in the shape of two story-books from the workshop of that most industrious of editors, Mr. Alfred Miles. In ten years it is to be hoped that some, at any rate, of his boy friends will have learned to love the fascinating anthology of the century's song which is his editorial chef d'œuvre; but, in the meantime, here is food more convenient for them. Of course, the majority of the stories are, as they ought to be, narratives of exciting, perilous, or comical adventure, such as every naturally constituted boy delights in; and there are sections of these entitled "Boys on Sea and Shore," "Boys Abroad," and "Boys in the West." Another group certain to be popular is "Boys after School," in which we have a good story by the editor himself, "Saved as by Fire." The last section, "Famous Tales by Famous Writers," contains half a dozen tales by the three great Americans, Poe, Longfellow, and Hawthorne; and the collection is quite as good as any of its four predecessors. It could not be better.

Fifty-two Stories for Girlhood and Youth. Edited by Alfred H. Miles. (Hutchinson.) Most of what we have said of the book just noticed applies also to this collection of stories. We notice, however, a more distinct bid for the interest of "youth," as distinguished from "girlhood," in the wholesome, interesting, and inspiring set of tales devoted to "Life and Service," to which Mrs. G. L. Banks, Miss Sarah Doudney, and other writers less known but not less worth knowing—among them the famous "Anon."—contribute some charming stories. In this volume, even more conspicuously than in its masculine companion, Transatlantic writers are well to the fore; and girl-lovers of the beautiful work of Louisa M. Alcott, Mary E. Wilkins, Horace Scudder, and T. B. Aldrich will think this a decided recommendation.

Fifty-two Stories for Children. Edited by Alfred H. Miles. (Hutchinson.) This book has one virtue which does not belong to its two companions—the virtue of novelty. Mr. Miles has previously catered for boys and girls who are, at any rate, big enough to resent being classed among "the little ones," but now he extends his benefactions to the smaller fry who have not reached the age for such prideful deprecation. They are fortunate juveniles; for, whether they have mastered the art and mystery of reading, or have to seek the clerical services of their seniors, here are narrative delights for every week of 1894. There are, of course, the fairy and wonder tales which will always be the prime favourites of the nursery; but there are also pretty tales of home life which will grow in favour with growing knowledge, and some narratives of adventure which will be read or listened to with an almost painful pleasure of excitement. A better story-book for the nursery than this we do not know. It only wants a few more pictures to be perfect.

Mary: a Nursery Story for Very Little Children. By Mrs. Molesworth. Illustrated by L. Leslie Brooke. (Macmillans.) It really cannot be expected of us to find anything new to say about Mrs. Molesworth. She does not attempt those higher flights of pathos, sometimes attained so successfully by the late Mrs. Ewing. But, when she abandons the supernatural and confines herself to the prosaic world of the nursery, she is without a rival. There are no stirring incidents here (except, perhaps, the natural consequences of harnessing a puppy-dog to a perambulator), but the art of the born story-teller is shown by the skill with which the every-day life and every-day talk of quite young children is reproduced. The mother, for obvious reasons, is kept rather in the background; but we are glad to see that the father is, for once, not represented as either stupid or selfish. The illustrations by Mr. Leslie Brooke, though certainly well drawn, do not quite reconcile us to the loss of Mr. Walter Crane.

A Young Mutineer. By L. T. Meade. With Illustrations by Gordon Browne. (Wells Gardner, Darton & Co.) Let us confess at once that we are not properly equipped for criticising such a book as this. Though not ignorant of Mrs. Meade's reputation as a writer for girls, we have never read anything of hers before; and we must confess that we are disappointed. The style is smooth enough and lifelike; even in the rather bookish conversation, and in the use of the standing epithet "sweet," we recognise the little women of the end of the century. But we object to the central feature of the story, and still more to the method of its development. The "young mutineer" is a girl of some eight years old, who is passionately devoted to her elder sister, and refuses to be reconciled to her engagement and marriage. Her morbid jealousy of the husband brings on a real illness, which can only be cured by her joining the newly married couple. So far, the situation, though awkward, is not impossible. But the authoress must needs emphasise the difficulty by making the little girl become a cause of serious estrangement between husband and wife. The wife is silly enough to tell him that her duty to her little sister is of equal validity with her duty to him, and to act accordingly; while he is provoked (not without reason) into playing the donkey generally. Of course, all comes right in the end, owing to a precocious recognition by the child (assisted by a candid friend of the husband's) of the true state of affairs. But we cannot regard the moral as a wholesome one, either for little sisters or for young wives. Mr. Gordon Browne's illustrations are admirable, and the good printing of the book make it very easy to read.

Songs for Somebody. By Dollie Radford. The Pictures by Gertrude Bradley. (David Nutt.) Something of the Walter Crane or Kate Greenaway air pertains outwardly to this quaint, square little book with its illustrations, some in colour and others in gray ink. The cover of the volume is charming—white lettering, and pink and yellow tulips on a ground chocolate or slate-coloured. We hope that the very young children, for whom the book is meant, will properly appreciate this. In regard to the illustrations, whether borders or separate pictures, they are drawn with a good deal of character and grace, those in a single tint being generally preferable to the polychromatic. They have a great advantage—all of them, we mean—over too many of the so-called "aesthetic" illustrations of the day, in that they venture to be joyous, and even dare to be modern. No trace of the woe-begone English "Primitive" or Pre-Raphaelite lingers here—a matter on which the common sense and pure taste of Miss Bradley deserves to be congratulated. Not for her, it seems, does infirm draughtsmanship find its excuse in the affectation of melancholy. The verses themselves, which celebrate many a possible deed and thought in a young child's life, are of a sincere and not too calculated simplicity. Dollie Radford is agreeably at home with child-life, and is not afraid to be naïve. Her sentiment, to boot, is always wholesome; and it is a cause for satisfaction that here, at all events, even if there is no surprising skill, something is offered to the young child which the young child will understand.

The Gentle Heritage. By Frances E. Comp-ton. With Illustrations by T. Pym. (Innes.) Five children with vivid imaginations, a nurse with no imagination at all, and a real live Bogey—what more can we want! This Bogey had a nasty habit of lurking in dark corners during the daytime, and, what was much worse, of getting under the bed during the night. But not content with all this, he actually took the house next door, and made his appearance now and then in the green lane which separated the two gardens. Now, however, he began to redeem his character, and turned out to be nothing worse than a dear old blind gentleman with one arm, who was very fond of children and gave delightful tea parties in his lovely garden. It was dear little Paul who first found out how really nice he was, but his elder brothers and sisters were not long behind; so that before the end of the book, instead of being frightened at him, they came to love him very much and willingly learnt from him all that he could tell them about the "Gentle Heritage"—what this was we will leave little boys and girls to find out for themselves.

Topsy and Turvy. By P. S. Newell. (Fisher Unwin.) From the fact that the copyright of this amusing publication belongs to the Century Company, and other bits of internal evidence, we are inclined to think that its ingenious author is American. With a rare modesty, Mr. Newell places his name on the title-page in such an unobtrusive manner, that it may easily escape the observation of the careless. But this would be a pity, for the book is decidedly good of its kind. Perfect originality cannot be claimed for it, as the drawing which represents something quite different when turned topsy-turvy has amused all of us before now; but some of these drawings are very good, as the little Japanese girl behind the fan, which turns into a giant carrying her off when reversed, and the innocent maidens who are transformed into bearded ruffians, or the last of all, when the word "puzzle" reads "The End" when upside down.

My Aunt Constantia Jane. By Mary E. Hullah. (Bliss, Sands & Foster.) To keep up the dignity of an aunt at the age of eleven in a household where your niece is only one year younger, and your stepsister and her husband are old enough to be your own parents, is, indeed, a difficult task. But Aunt Constantia Jane is no ordinary character, and has, moreover, been brought up in the States, where self-reliance and mature manners are sometimes developed at a surprisingly early age; and for a while she is quite equal to the occasion, and conducts herself in a very spirited and amusing manner. But, after all, she is only a child, and, after a gallant struggle, is glad to drop the rôle of aunt for the more comfortable one of sister. The gradual accomplishment of this change is admirably told, and the adventures of the young people are delightful. We confess, however, to some misgivings about clever Uncle Phil. He was a very nice uncle, perhaps, but we don't think much of his poetry nor yet of his talent for practical jokes. We fear that those novels he is always writing will never come to very much. However, despite Uncle Phil and the poor illustrations, it is a very nice little story.

Two Little Children and Ching. By Edith E. Cuthell. (Methuen.) Ching, though only a dog, is certainly the hero of this tale; but, like many other heroes, he is not appreciated as he should be. The General is delighted to have his small Indian grandchildren to live with him; but when Ching announces his arrival by jumping on grandpapa's gouty toe, he is not given quite such a warm welcome. Perhaps Mrs. Prance, the housekeeper, was his worst enemy; for she banished him to the stable, and even tried to get him sent away altogether. This was too much for Guy and Vi, with whom it was a case of "Love me, love my dog," so Guy determined to run away with him to his father in India. Unfortunately, his pocket-money and his courage both gave in before they got very far, and were found stranded at a railway station by an uncle, who brought them back safely, much to the joy even of Mrs. Prance. This was not the last of Ching's adventures; for shortly afterwards he was stolen by a dirty little boy, who kept him for ever so long, to the great distress of the children and also of the sympathetic reader. But we are thankful to say that we are not left for ever in suspense. Ching is restored, the father (though this is a minor matter) comes back from India, and everything ends in the best possible manner.

Ermengarde: a Story of Romney Marsh in the Thirteenth Century. By Mrs. Hadden Parkes. (Elliot Stock.) There is a very fair proportion of "story" in this pretty volume, and, though conventional, it is sufficiently entertaining. We have, however, rather too much of the other two items in the sub-title, "Romney Marsh" and the "thirteenth century." History, archaeology, and topography are most admirable studies; but as materials for a juvenile story they have to be used cunningly, as a cook uses garlic. Mrs. Parkes's garlic is not used cunningly. When the boy-hero addresses the girl-heroine in this fashion: "As thou knowest, Etoile, the great Anderida Forest extended as far as Berkshire and Hampshire," and goes on to be instructive for two or three pages, the skipping signal cannot be mistaken, and the youthful reader acts accordingly. But the boy or girl who does the skipping judiciously will find interest, and even excitement, in the story of Etoile, or Ermengarde, and her faithful Reignold.

Keith's Trial and Victory. By E. Everett-Green. (Sunday School Union.) Keith's trial is her father's marriage with a fierce and vindictive Italian lady, who has a still fiercer maid. Lord Delamere, Keith's father, although he is represented to be a sane and respectable English nobleman, becomes utterly helpless when his wife has to be guided or checked. The story is, therefore, from some points of view, melodramatic, absurd, and impossible; but it is not entirely a failure. The religious faith by which Keith wins her victory over her incredible and preposterous trials is delicately and convincingly drawn, without insincerity or exaggeration. The lessons of brave patience and meek humility which the tale inculcates are presented in a fashion which will win the respect of all fair-minded readers, and impress the minds of those young people for whom, presumably, the book is primarily intended.

Lord Lynton's Ward. By Helena Brooks. (Jarrold.) This is generally such a charming story that the blots in its plan and execution become all the more obvious and regrettable. Lord Lynton's ward is an extremely ingenuous, truth-loving child, to whom we are introduced while still under the care of his father, an impossible "parson," or rather "squarson," of the old High Church Tory "persuasion." The author is guilty of more than one offence against her craft: her chief fault is making Norman Rosslyn, Lord Lynton's ward, much too precocious for a child of such tender years, while her literary style suffers from a plethora of fine writing, and a liking for such affectations as "a luxuriantly appointed apartment," which induces a suspicion of an occasional consultation of George Robins's sale catalogues as the sources of her "derangement of epithets." A better knowledge of children's intellectual growth, and a merciless employment of the pruning knife, may be safely recommended as literary cauteries and tonics which might perhaps neutralise the graver imperfections of her art. At the same time, Lord Lynton's ward is a charming little fellow, who is certain to make all his readers in love with him long before he delivers the remarkable speech on his eighth birthday with which the book ends.

Field and Street. By the Rev. Harry Jones. (S.P.C.K.) By telling the story of the friendship and intercourse of two boys, one a Londoner and the other a countryman, Mr. Jones endeavours to suggest the great advantages that spring from intercourse between town and country, and to demand our sympathy for country holidays and similar schemes. The book, therefore, is that terrible monster, a novel with a purpose; but never was a monster more harmless and innocent. The little story is full of wisdom and kindness. It is not at all concerned to unravel its plot, but turns out to have no plot in particular, and to be merely a means by which Mr. Jones gives us some results of his wide experience of life and his tolerant and accurate knowledge of human nature. It is readable from cover to cover.

Little Miss Vixen. By E. Everett-Green. (Olipphant, Anderson & Ferrier.) The rigid moralist will perhaps opine that the tempestuous temper of little Nin Vixen is made dangerously picturesque and charming; but everyone else will be delighted with the vivacious picture of children and their ways. The story is a thoroughly wholesome and natural sketch of a company of merry, and sometimes naughty, children; and it is calculated to amuse the mind and improve the temper of even a dull old bachelor. We heartily recommend it as a Christmas present.

Little Count Paul. By Mrs. E. M. Field. (Wells Gardner, Darton & Co.) Mrs. Field's story is dated in the "troublesome times" of the French Revolution. She makes no effort to describe the fierce intoxication of the time; her hero is in the time, but not of it. The book, therefore, is another and a favourable example of that type of tale which describes the adventures and perils of some inoffensive individual whom the Revolution nearly destroys.

A Fair Claimant. By Frances Armstrong. (Blackie.) We are already tolerably familiar with this story. The heroine is lost or stolen in her childhood, and when she grows up she becomes, quite by accident, a down-trodden governess in the very house in which she was born, and of which she is owner. The theme is an old one, but Frances Armstrong has written a very pleasant variation on it. The heroine is lost and found again most ingeniously, and her character is naturally and prettily described. The workmanship throughout is painstaking and thorough. The author has succeeded in persuading herself of the reality of her tale, and therefore it at once secures the attention of the reader. We do not understand in what sense the book is "a study for girls": it is nothing worse than a novel for girls, and the average girl will be entirely delighted and satisfied with it.

Only my Sister. By the Ven. G. R. Wynne. (S.P.C.K.) The Archdeacon of Aghadoe has put together a capital story without depending for its motive on love. A young brother and sister living on the West coast of Ireland discover the wonders of the land, a pair of antlers of the Great Irish Elk, prehistoric antiquities, and the old monkish beehive cells. The book is instructive at the same time that it is amusing. It ends with a forest fire in Canada.

Swirlborough Manor. By S. S. Hamer. (Olipphant, Anderson & Ferrier.) A very pleasant story, with no obtrusive moral, somewhat in the fashion of John Halifax. Effie makes a delightful heroine; and if rather hard on Mr. Sperrin, her musical lover, marries the right person in the end. He has been to Oxford, and, of course, took a first class there; but it is unfortunate that he should have an acquaintance capable of saying "I and two of my friends."

With the Sea Kings, by F. H. Winder (Blackie), is just the book to put into a boy's hands. The usual high-spirited lad runs away to sea in Lord Nelson's stirring days; and every chapter contains boardings, cuttings out, fighting pirates, escapes of thrilling audacity, and captures by corsairs, sufficient to turn the quietest boy's head. The story culminates in a vigorous account of the battle of Trafalgar, as seen from the Victory. Happy boys!

Money: The Boy and Man. By L. B. Walford. (S.P.C.K.) After tracing the rise of a London gamine into a hard-hearted, purse-proud millionaire, Mrs. Walford ends by depicting his repentance. It is a telling story; but the individuality of the accessories, especially that of the clergyman, is scarcely in the best style of the authoress.

Dick's Water-lilies; and Other Stories. By Crona Temple. (S.P.C.K.) Something after the fashion of the late Mrs. Gately's Nature Parables, divers weeds and flowers are here allowed to blossom into moral teachings. Miss Temple has a light touch and describes her plants carefully. This is just the book for a school library.

Dick's Match (S.P.C.K.) depends for its interest on poaching. This leads to a case of conscience which forms a severe trial to the hero and heroine; but eventually Dick marries, and the match he makes is most satisfactory.

Ida Cameron. By Margaret Parker. (Olipphant, Anderson & Ferrier.) The scene of this tale is laid in Australia. Ida is a discontented perverse girl, who only comes to a better mind after some years of discipline, and in the end finds more happiness than she deserves.

In Quarantine. By the Author of "Nicola." (S.P.C.K.) A little girl sent during convalescence to a country house is amused by her aunt with a dozen stories. They are brief, incisive, and likely to do good as well as to amuse.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1893.

No. 1128, New Series.

THE EDITOR cannot undertake to return, or to correspond with the writers of, rejected manuscript.

It is particularly requested that all business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., may be addressed to the PUBLISHER, and not to the EDITOR.

LITERATURE.

Familiar Letters of Sir Walter Scott. In 2 vols. (Edinburgh: David Douglas.)

THE season of 1894 opens prosperously with the publication of the Familiar Letters of Sir Walter Scott, a book sure to be widely and ardently welcomed, whether as a precious addition to our somewhat meagre store of epistolary literature, or as an important supplement to the two main sources of information hitherto accessible to the student of Scott's career: namely, the Life by Lockhart, and the Abbotsford Journal, first published in its unabridged form some three years ago. The new volumes include not only the correspondence now in the possession of the Hon. Mrs. Maxwell Scott at Abbotsford, but also a considerable number of heretofore inedited letters exchanged by Sir Walter with certain of his dearest friends, these having been placed by the representatives of the latter at the disposal of the editor and publisher, Mr. David Douglas. By him the large mass of material thus acquired has been reduced to chronological order, and arranged in a series of twenty-four chapters, of which each chapter (excepting Nos. I. and II., which between them cover an interval of ten years—1797-1806, and Nos. XXI.-XXIV., which are all four of them occupied with the letters of the one year 1825) contains the correspondence of precisely one twelve-month. Furthermore, to every chapter has been prefixed an ingeniously chosen motto, allusive to or descriptive of the leading poem or novel of the year, together with a brief table of "Family Annals and Literary Work," designed to afford the reader the means of following the clue of the great writer's life-story from the opening to the close of the period covered by the correspondence (1797-1825), and serving to supply him with those miscellaneous items of information—dates, names of persons and of places, &c.—for which he would, in the absence of such aid, be forced again and again to lay down his book in order to search through the pages of Lockhart's ten volumes. By means of these simple expedients, and with the aid of an occasional foot-note to illustrate some obscurity or disentangle some perplexity of the text, the editor has contrived to convert an unsorted heap of correspondence into an orderly and articulate biographical narrative.

Perhaps the most interesting of the several series of letters in this delightful collection is that which is also considerably the longest: namely, the correspondence which, during the years 1806-1824, passed between Sir Walter and his devoted friend and admirer the Lady Anne Jane, daughter of the second Earl of Arran, and wife of John James, first Marquess of Abercorn. Notwithstanding that this lady occupies anything but a prominent place in Lockhart's biography, she appears to have stood higher in Scott's esteem and affection than did any other of the many illustrious women who from time to time cultivated his friendship. From the very first a charming air of mutual confidence and unaffected intimacy pervades their correspondence. Scott does not hesitate to fill his letters to the Marchioness with the simplest details of his domestic life at Ashiestiel, unburdening all his petty anxieties and half-formed plans, literary and other, with just the same ingenuous candour which we might expect to find him using towards his mother or his favourite aunt, "Miss Christie" Rutherford. On August 6, 1806, for example, he writes from Ashiestiel:—

"I am now, thank God, got to my little farm, and I really wish I had the lamp of Aladdin or the tapestry of some other Eastern Magician, whose name I have forgot. . . . Could I possibly command so easy a conveyance, I would certainly transport your Ladyship to this retreat, with which I have the vanity to think you would be pleased for a day, were it only for the extraordinary contrast between the scenery here and at the Priory.

Our whole habitation could dance very easily in your great Salon without displacing a single moveable or endangering a mirror. We have no green pastures nor stately trees, but, to make amends, we have one of the most beautiful streams in the world, winding through steep mountains, which are now purple with the heath blossom. We are eight miles from the nearest market town, and four from the nearest neighbour. The former circumstance is productive of very curious shifts and ludicrous distresses well worthy of being recorded in the *Miseries of Human Life. . . . For example, my scrutoire having travelled by some slow conveyance, I was obliged to sally forth and shoot a crow to procure a quill, which performs its duty extremely ill, as your Ladyship is witness. I am afraid that this candid declaration of our wants, and the difficulty of supplying them, will make the Marchioness bless her stars that the lamp and tapestry are out of fashion. But don't be afraid too soon: for the main business of the day we have the best mutton in the world, and find by experience that the air of our hills makes an excellent sauce. Then we have pigs and poultry, and a whole apparatus of guns, fishing-rods, salmon spears, and nets for the employment of male visitors, who do not find their sport less agreeable because part of their dinner depends upon it.

"Then grouse-shooting begins bye-and-bye, and I have some very good coverts on the moors, besides the privilege of ranging over those of the Duke of Buccleugh, a favour not the less readily granted because, like many other persons in this world, I make more noise than I do mischief. Then, if all this is insufficient, you shall have hare soup; for am I not the Sheriff of the County, and may I not break the laws when I please, and course out of season? Besides all this you shall have one of the kindest welcomes which our hospitable mountaineers can afford. So pray don't quarrel with my lamp or tapestry any more. I only wish it was possible for you to make good this little dream."

* Scott contributed a review of this diverting little volume to the Edinburgh Review, No. 17, October, 1806, Jeffrey adding some, if not all, of the "reviewers' groans" with which it concludes. —(Lockhart's Life, chap. xvi.)

The Marchioness was not to be tempted northwards; but before long a well-timed gift from his kind friend at Stanmore Priory reached the pen-lorn bard of Ashiestiel, in the shape of a little parcel of goose quills, described by the giver as possessing the invaluable attribute of "everlasting durability."

Again, when in January, 1812, after much tedious negotiation, a pension on retirement was allotted to Scott's colleague, George Home of Wedderburn, and Scott at last found himself in possession of his full stipend as a Clerk of Session, he loses no time in communicating the welcome news to his "dearest friend":

"I should be very unjust to your kindness did I not take an early opportunity to inform you that the pension business is at length completely and finally settled. . . . We are now, my dearest friend, as comfortable in our circumstances as even your kindness could wish us to be. Neither my wife nor I have the least wish to enlarge our expense in any respect, as, indeed, our present mode of life is of that decent kind which, without misbecoming our own situation, places us, according to the fashions and habits of our country, at liberty to mix in the best society here. So that we shall have a considerable saving fund for the bairns."

Lady Abercorn's reply shows how truly deserving she was of the unlimited confidence reposed in her.

"As your success in life," she writes, "is amongst the very few things that can give me real pleasure, you may believe your two last letters have been most welcome. I do most sincerely rejoice that you are now quite independent of power and party. I hope before I leave this world to see you once by your own fireside, with all your family about you. I could never see a man I more highly respect and admire; and I do assure you I have more pride in your calling me your dearest friend than I should in being so considered by the greatest monarch in the world."

A recent critic* of these volumes has expressed his surprise that, notwithstanding their close intimacy, Scott should have deliberately refrained from taking Lady Abercorn into his confidence respecting the authorship of the novels; observing that "she often refers to the subject, and he exercises much ingenuity in diverting her suspicions." A more absurd mistake was never made. So far was Scott from attempting to divert his noble friend's suspicions, that he positively leaves no stone unturned to put her in full possession of the truth. It must be borne in mind that Scott's letters to the Marchioness were handed about amongst her family and friends; in them, accordingly, he was compelled to write ambiguously on the question of the authorship, in order both to avoid a general discovery, and to relieve his correspondent from the difficult and unpleasant task of dissembling her knowledge of the facts when assailed by the persistent inquiries of busybodies. Writing to her in January, 1815, he promises to tell her "what he knows, or rather guesses," about Waverley when they meet in London in the month of March; but when he arrived there early in April he found that the Abercorn household were out of town, and the family residence in St. James's-square was occupied by strangers; nor does he seem to have met the Marchioness for some years to come. But, in the first place, how was it possible for her to entertain a doubt as to the authorship of Guy Mannering when she had in her desk so irrefragable a proof of its origin as Scott's own letter to her on the Dormont case? (I., p. 292). Then, when the Black Dwarf and Old Mortality were on the eve of publication, he writes to her:

* See Athenaeum, No. 3448, November 25, 1893.

"I have sent you a set of novels which I am strongly inclined to swear are the production of the unknown author of Guy Mannering, about which you are so much interested. I suppose it will be soon published in London; but I hope these volumes will reach your Ladyship before that takes place. The bookseller here says he is not to publish till next week, but gave me a reading of the volumes, and at my earnest entreaty parted with the set. I have the honour to beg your acceptance of it. I cannot think it at all likely that young Harry Mackenzie wrote these books. I should like to know if you are of my opinion as to these new volumes coming from the same hand."

At other times he would order an advance copy of the new novel to be sent to her direct from the publisher, with the words "from the Author" inscribed on the fly-leaf. St. Ronan's Well and The Heart of Midlothian were sent in this way; and, in acknowledging the latter, the Marchioness says:

"Some time ago I received the last four volumes of Tales of my Landlord 'from the Author.' Who he is I shall probably never know from himself, though with the world I am inclined to suspect. The first three volumes kept me in such a state of agitation and interest that I could hardly get on with it. Certainly the feeling was mixed with a severe pang, and as he who knew how to rate the talents of the writer was not here to give me his opinion, and to enjoy the perusal of the work, I almost wished the book had never come out.* I should be sorry to think anyone else but the one I imagine the author had written it."

Lastly, Scott, in the course of his correspondence with the same friend, alludes both to the Abbot and to "Tales of the Crusaders, by the Author of Waverley," as to books of his own composition, without the slightest attempt at pretext, subterfuge, or mystification. Indeed (to quote the words of his biographer):

"No one of his intimate friends ever had, or could have had, the smallest doubt as to the parentage of the novels; nor, although he abstained from communicating the fact formally to most of them, did he ever affect any real concealment in the case of such persons; nor, when any circumstance arose which rendered the withholding of direct confidence on the subject incompatible with perfect freedom of feeling on both sides, did he hesitate to make the avowal."

These early letters pleasantly illustrate the cordiality of Scott's original relations with the notorious Jeffrey, and explain the causes which gradually led to the severance of their literary connexion, if not, in some measure, to the impairing of their mutual regard. Scott had known Jeffrey very intimately from 1792; and when the latter became editor of the Edinburgh Review he naturally joined him as contributor and near ally. For a few years (1803-1806) there was scarcely a number of the Edinburgh which did not contain one or more essays from his pen. But the deepening Whiggery of the political articles under Jeffrey's editorship gradually damped Scott's ardour; and finally, in 1809, when the Quarterly was started, changed the friendly contributor into an avowed opponent of the editor-critic, though (if we may trust his own assurances on the subject) his kindly sentiments towards the man remained unaltered. In 1805, however, the feelings of the two litterateurs towards each other were, as Lockhart says, those of mutual confidence and gratitude; and, on the death of Jeffrey's first wife in the summer of that year, they exchanged letters, in which these feelings were unaffectedly and pathetically expressed. Scott's letter has not been preserved; but its sympathetic character may be gathered from Jeffrey's touching reply, which Mr. Douglas gives us (I., 30), and which certainly exhibits the writer in a much more favourable light than as editor and critic.

* The Marquess of Abercorn had died on January 27, 1818, some six months before this letter was written.

"I think," writes Scott to Miss Seward in 1806, "were you to know my little friend Jeffrey you would perhaps have some mercy on his criticisms; not but he often makes his best friends lose patience by that love of severity which drives justice into tyranny; but, in fact, I have often wondered that a man who loves and admires poetry so much as he does, can permit himself the severe, and sometimes unjust, strictures which he fulminates even against the authors whom he most approves of, and whose works actually afford him most delight. But what shall we say? Many good-natured Tories (myself, for example) take great pleasure in coursing and fishing, without any impeachment to their amiabilities, and probably Jeffrey feels the same instinctive passion for hunting down the bards of the day."

Eighteen months later he writes to the same friend:

"There is a clever little Pamphlet come out against Jeffrey by Mr. Coplestone of Oxford. I gave it to the Critic this morning, and he is so much delighted with it that he says he means to request the favour of the Author's contributions to his Review! To be sure he is the most complete poco curante that I ever knew."

But it was one thing to smile indulgently at the astounding levity displayed in the alarms and excursions of the pert homunculus, and quite another to feel the prick of his dexterous bodkin as it stole slyly through the pages of a certain dumpy quarto entitled Marmion. On the 18th April, 1808, Scott writes to Robert Surtees:

"I am very glad you like Marmion. It has need of some friends, for Jeffrey showed me yesterday a very sharp review of it—I think as tight a one as he has written since Southey's Madoc. As I don't believe the world ever furnished a critic and an author who were more absolute poco curanti about their craft, we dined together and had a hearty laugh at the revival of the flagellation, &c."

It is impossible to doubt, however, that in this careless, off-hand account of the affair Scott seriously, though unconsciously, misrepresented his own feelings. He was far too much of a poet to possess that reckless indifference to criticism which he here endeavours to assume; and the truth is that the severity and injustice of Jeffrey's strictures on Marmion mortified him not a little, and precipitated the breaking off of his connexion with the Edinburgh. We cannot help thinking that it was mainly in reference to Jeffrey that he wrote to Lady Abercorn:

"You ask me why I do not rather think of original production than of editing the works of others, and I will frankly tell your Ladyship the reason. In the first place, no one acquires a certain degree of popularity without exciting an equal degree of malevolence among those who, either from rivalry or the mere wish to pull down what others have set up, are always ready to catch the first occasion to lower the favoured individual to what they call his 'real standard.' Of this I have enough of experience; and my political interferences, however useless to my friends, have not failed to make me more than the usual number of enemies."

And to Joanna Baillie he writes, of Jeffrey's review of Marmion:

"I have no fault to find with his expressing his sentiments frankly and fairly upon the poem, yet I think he might, without derogation to his impartiality, have couched them in language rather more civil to a personal friend, and I believe he would have thought twice before he had given himself that air of superiority in a case when I had any chance of defending myself. Besides, he really wants the taste for poetry, which is essentially necessary to enjoy, and of course to criticise, it with justice. He is learned in its canons, and an excellent judge of the justice of the sentiments it conveys, but he wants that enthusiastic feeling which, like sunshine upon a landscape, lights up every beauty, and palliates, if it cannot hide, every defect. To offer a poem of imagination to a man whose whole life and study has been to acquire a stoical indifference towards enthusiasm of every kind, would be the last, as it would surely be the silliest, action of my life."

In justice to Jeffrey, we are bound to record that some two years afterwards he confessed, and somewhat grudgingly expressed regret for, his harsh maltreatment of Marmion. When forwarding to Scott the proof-sheets of his review of the Lady of the Lake, he writes:

"I think it right to let you see these sheets before anyone else sees them. . . . I am now sensible that there were needless asperities in my review of Marmion, and, from the hurry in which I have been forced to write, I daresay there may be some here also. I have bungled your poetical characters, too, by beginning my sketch on a scale too large for my canvas, and the mere unskilfulness of the execution I fear has given it something of the air of caricature."

This seems, after all, to be but a halting and reluctant attempt at an apology; nor does Scott appear to have been in the least deceived as to its true value.

"I have little to complain of the Edinburgh Review," he writes to Morritt, "Jeffrey sent me the sheets with a kind and, for him, an apologetic letter. . . . And, indeed, his general tone is much more civil and respectful than is usual for the Review where an author is neither a philosopher nor a Foxite. But, after all, and among friends," &c.

* Joanna Baillie had mentioned a report that Scott was about to publish a new poem, which was to be dedicated to Jeffrey!

Yes, in all such cases "there aye remains the immedicable But!" The two men still continued to speak of, and on rare occasions to address, each other in terms expressive of the warmest friendship; but from this time (1808) forth they met as seldom as possible, doubtless feeling that the more widely asunder their paths diverged, the better chance they would have of preserving their ancient feelings of mutual kindness. But there was no longer between them the same free interchange of good offices that there had been in the days before Marmion. Scott writes to the Marchioness in June, 1808:

"I am endeavouring to get a copy of the Elgin Letters by my interest with little Jeffrey the Reviewer, who was the fair lady's counsel in the case; but I doubt greatly being able to succeed in that quarter, for since I gave up assisting him in the Review, when their politics became so warm, my credit with him is a little at ebb."

And when, in 1817, Jeffrey applied to Scott to write a short notice of C. K. Sharpe's edition of The Secret and True History of the Church of Scotland for the Edinburgh Review—adding significantly that "the notes, though full of talent and information, were far too Jacobitical for him"—Scott declined, partly on the ground of ill-health, partly on the plea of being already pledged to Gifford for an article on the book in question;

"though [he rejoins defiantly] I am very sorry, for I like the subject, and would be pleased to give my own opinion respecting the Jacobitism of the editor, which, like my own, has a good spice of affectation in it, mingled with some not unnatural feelings of respect for a cause which, though indefensible in common sense and ordinary policy, has a great deal of high-spirited Quixotry about it."

Finally, when Scott, to testify his personal goodwill to Jeffrey, consented once more to occupy a place in the Edinburgh, it was not by an essay upon any topic in the remotest degree connected with politics, but simply by an article on the purely literary subject of Maturin's "Women; or, Pour et Contre," that he chose to be represented. Of Jeffrey's note in acknowledgment of this favour we will say nothing but that it affords a fresh illustration, if one were wanting, of the incorrigible levity and poco-curantism of the homunculus literatulus.

The life of Scott, it has been said, is a tragic drama in the fullest sense, moving and teaching us at once through pity, and love, and terror. Of that drama, however, we have, in these Letters, only some scattered, disconnected pages from the earlier scenes; the dire catastrophe is wanting. Nevertheless, by combining the traits which abound in these pages, scattered and fragmentary though they be, we may at will construct for ourselves a complete and life-like picture of the great protagonist. Here—in these unstudied utterances flung straight from the heart upon the paper—we have proof and token in plenty of his "antithetically mixed nature," of his modesty and self-reliance, of his humour and romance, of his boyish gaiety and pensive melancholy, of his lion-like courage and maiden-like tenderness, of the Titanic power and industry of his creative genius, of the passionate vitality, the immovable steadfastness, of that pure and faithful love which remained with him from its birth in the budding prime of his manhood until his eyes were closed in death. In a word, we have, in these Letters, the clear, reflected image of Walter Scott, the Poet, the Novelist, the Man. And this being so, it were surely waste of breath to bestow upon them another syllable in the way of recommendation.

THOMAS HUTCHINSON.

Moltke: a Biographical and Critical Study.
By William O'Connor Morris. (Ward & Downey.)

THIS book was worth the writing. It is indeed too early to forecast the position which Moltke is destined to hold among the great captains of the world. It is still impossible, as the author himself admits, to know exactly the share taken by the famous Chief of the General Staff in the organization of the Prussian Army. It is too soon, while some of the actors are yet alive, to estimate the importance of the position of Moltke among the founders of the German Empire. Many years must elapse before a true historical perspective will enable the future to form an accurate judgment on Moltke in any capacity; and it is not until then, when it has become manifest whether the German Empire is a permanent factor in European policy or a mere passing phantom, that the Field-Marshal and his coadjutors will take their place in history as the builders of an edifice of strength or the creators of a weak and sprawling giant.

Yet Mr. O'Connor Morris's book has a distinct value, because of the deficiency in his range of knowledge which he himself admits in his preface.

"Unfortunately," he says, "I do not know the German language, and thus I have been unable to read some books which throw light on Moltke's career; and, in many instances, I have been obliged to rely on translations."

This frank confession of inability to read his hero's own language at once gives the measure of Mr. O'Connor Morris's book. He does not attempt to write a full biography: he is not ambitious of laying before his countrymen an authoritative view of Moltke's career. He bases his Study on English and French works, or on German authorities filtered through English or French translations. Critics should be grateful to Mr. Morris for confessing his ignorance of German. Writers of a less assured position would not have dared to be so frank, for fear of flippant criticism. As it is, Mr. O'Connor Morris has given the keynote to his attitude, and has made his reviewer's task comparatively easy. Moltke was a successful man. He is regarded by his countrymen with enthusiastic, almost extravagant, admiration; and all English writers upon his career hitherto have regarded him from the German standpoint. This appeared markedly in the obituary notices which were published in our newspapers after his death. English military writers, overcome by the recollection of his successes, and studying him through the medium of German military literature, have blindly accepted the German estimate of his character and career. Mr. O'Connor Morris's book comes as a wholesome corrective to all this eulogy. He is, fortunately, unable to read the official documents in German which lay undue weight on the merits of Moltke and his armies, and depreciate the valour and ability of their enemies. In short, Mr. O'Connor Morris looks at Moltke from a French standpoint, sobered by the fact that he is not himself a Frenchman. His sympathies for France have been made manifest in previous books. His appreciations of Turenne, of Villars, and of Napoleon showed an extraordinary insight into the French national characteristics; and the most eloquent pages in his present volume are not devoted to the praise of his hero, but to the recognition of the merits of the French defence against the soldiers Moltke directed. We in England have been inclined to over-rate the performances of the German armies in the great war of 1870-71, and have not yet sufficiently understood the merits of the defeated French because they were defeated.

Mr. O'Connor Morris's book is almost entirely devoted to a critical narrative of the Franco-German war; and it is in these pages that he confers a service on thoughtful Englishmen, in laying weight upon the merits of the French rising against the German invaders. He brings out clearly what ought never to be forgotten: the essential difference between the opposition made by the armies of Napoleon III. and by those of the Government of National Defence. The German military authorities, and Moltke with the rest of them, believed that the catastrophe of Sedan had finished the war, and that Paris would speedily surrender, as she had done in 1814 and 1815. Never were sanguine mortals more disappointed. Paris was heroically defended; new armies sprang up into being in the provinces—a man of genius, General Chanzy, was for some time at their head. The invaders were in a critical position, and Moltke found it far more difficult to conquer the raw levies of the Republic than the trained soldiery of the Second Empire. As Mr. O'Connor Morris finely says:

"A nation's most precious possession is its honour; and France would have forfeited this great heritage had she tamely bowed her neck to the yoke after Wörth, Spicheren, Gravelotte, and Sedan. She took the wiser and nobler course; and if she has suffered in the result, the gain has been infinitely more important. By the defence of Paris and the great national rising, she has blotted out the disgrace that fell on her arms; Metz and Sedan did not leave her degenerate; she justified her claim to stand in the rank of the ruling powers and races of mankind" (p. 384).

These sentences explain the value of Mr. O'Connor Morris's book. He has penetrated the reason that prevents the French people from feeling humiliated by the recollection of the events of 1870-71. Englishmen are apt to express a belief that France has fallen from her high estate to rise no more, and they cannot understand how France can hold up her head again as a great power. They have not read aright the history of the Franco-German war, and believe that a renewed struggle would terminate in a similar result. Mr. O'Connor Morris then has done a real service in pointing out the merits of the national defence of France; and a perusal of his book may tend to preserve Englishmen from believing too blindly in the omnipotence of military Germany.

Mr. O'Connor Morris's appreciation of the French character and his admiration of the French nation has enabled him to point out one of the chief blots on the character of Moltke himself. Moltke hated the French people—in this he believed himself justified by a recollection of the conquest of Germany by Napoleon; but he also despised the French people, and looked on them as hereditary foes, which was unworthy of a great general or a great man. Mr. Morris on more than one occasion lays weight on this defect in Moltke's character. In speaking of the surrender at Sedan he says: "Moltke did justice to the courage of the French, but was harsh, peremptory, and stiff in his manner, and his language showed that he desired rather to annihilate foes already crushed. . . . Moltke's bearing was unnecessarily severe, and in the hour of his triumph he ought not to have sneered at the presumption and shallowness of the French people, an expression which wounded French nature to the quick. The conduct of Marlborough to Tallard, and of Napoleon to the Austrian officers at Ulm presents a striking and painful contrast; and the attitude of Moltke on this great occasion revealed a dislike and scorn of France and a want of tact and of knowledge of men to be noticed in more than one passage of his career" (pp. 208-209).

Again, speaking of the national rising in France, Mr. O'Connor Morris remarks:

"Like most soldiers, Moltke had little faith in moral power in conflict with material force. He had a rooted dislike and contempt for Frenchmen, and he did not believe that France would make a real effort to vindicate her great name, and to oppose the invader" (p. 218).

It was Moltke who insisted on the annexation of Lorraine, and who thus is answerable for the oppression of Europe beneath a mass of bloated armaments. A wise statesman, who had read history aright, would have been satisfied with exacting from the defeated nation the expenses of the war, and would have spared France the humiliation of a loss of territory. As it is, France is preparing for a mighty effort to reach the Rhine once more; and it may be doubted whether the recollection of the glory of Sedan will compensate in the eyes of future generations for the hideous error which has kept the continent for more than twenty years on the verge of an explosion.

Mr. O'Connor Morris has on former occasions proved his fitness to write military history. He has the topographical instinct and the unwearied diligence which are indispensable, and unites with these qualities a lucid literary style, not often found in writers on military history. He does not allow his narrative to be weighed down by a multiplicity of details, and he dares to use his own judgment. His Study of Moltke should take rank among his best books. He had formed a clear conception of what he wanted to write, and he has carried out his aim. He did not intend to write a definitive life of Moltke; but he did wish to show to the English reader a view of Moltke's character differing from the usual eulogy. His Moltke appears to us far superior to his Napoleon (reviewed in the ACADEMY of June 17), because in this book he has fully carried out a well-defined idea, whereas in the other he seemed to have been cramped, and not to have written with his usual freedom and correct sense of proportion. However, there are not many men living who could have undertaken in one and the same year to publish two Studies on generals differing so widely as Napoleon and Moltke, and to have shown, in both of them, knowledge, ability, and literary skill.

H. MORSE STEPHENS.

Spring's Immortality: and other Poems. By Mackenzie Bell. (Ward, Lock & Bowden.)

WHATEVER may be his limitations, Mr. Mackenzie Bell thinks his own thoughts, and expresses them in his own style and language. He does not, like Lycidas, "build the lofty rhyme": indeed, it may be said that he does not "build" any rhyme at all, for his verse is remarkably simple, natural, and unstrained. It has no lyric raptures, or philosophic introspections, or airs of mystery or profundity; but it is wholesome, honest, and sincere. These are virtues to be welcomed in a poet, as in any other craftsman; but as it is the poet who can best make our common speech glow for us with new lights and meanings, they are especially to be welcomed in him. Almost every one of these unpretending poems will appeal straight to the heart of the reader with a force which plainly comes straight from the heart of the writer. The most hardened reviewer, dealing with such a volume, would find his critical instinct overborne by newly-awakened sympathies. Not that there are any slips or flaws here over which a hardened reviewer might rejoice, for true and spontaneous feeling generally expresses itself in the aptest words. It is when a writer is trying to say something without having felt anything that he blunders and makes play for the critical lookers-on.

Two things especially are evident from these poems. One is that the writer is no stranger to the sorrows of humanity; the other is that his experience, whatever it may have been, of the ills and burdens of life has given a deeper tenderness to his nature, a greater buoyancy of hope to his spirit. Of his quick sympathy with the poor in their peculiar troubles there are many proofs. Here is one, in the pathetic vividness which he gives to a picture unmistakably drawn from life. The lines form the opening passage of a Madeiran idyl—"Francisca to Jaspear":

"The rich—the rich alone—may dream of death
As solace for their sorrow, not the poor.
Whate'er their grief, the poor have work to do
If they would not behold their dear ones starve.
Now were I dead there's none to pluck the fruit
And sort it on our stall o' market days,
Mother is ill, and through the scorching hours
Father is busy 'mid the sugar canes."

No dreams of death that come to the rich could yield a hundredth part as much solace in sorrow as helpful work gives to those who must do it. Francisca, in this idyl, does not understand this; but her very words are a realisation of the truth of it, as the poet intends they should be. The poem is a practical rendering of that "balance of life," which he elsewhere describes in half a dozen simple quatrains.

But Madeira seems to have had inspirations of unmixed joy for Mr. Bell, as well as those in which shadow and light were blended. Another Madeiran idyl—"João to Constança" ("A Lesté Sunrise in Madeira")—begins with these bright lines:

"Yonder flush across the sea
Brings the morning back to me
When you seemed to lend the light
That dispersed the lingering night;
When I heard your step, and knew
Joy of joy! 'twas surely you;
When I turned and saw your face,
Saw you glide with girlish grace;
Though before my heart was moved,
Then it was that first I loved."

The rest of the poem is a glowing description of Madeiran clouds, peaks, banana trees, and trellised vines, in which these southern surroundings are made to recall the love whose plighted troth they looked upon. One would be glad to give the whole poem, but here are ten more lines of it:

"Hoey cloudlets, lately dun,
Seemed as now to hide the sun;
Other cloudlets seemed to stand
Ready waiting his command.
Brighter, brighter grew the group,
Every tint was in the troop,
Red, and blue, and rich maroon,
Fleecy white appearing soon,
As at length we plighted troth,
Hallowed moments for us both."

Mr. Bell has all a poet's love of Nature, and some of these poems, as in the instance just noticed, are full of the sunny South. But his verse owes little to the imagery of mere scenery, while it owes much to the suggestions which the simplest things in Nature are as well able as the grandest to afford. "Fresh leaves and meadow flowers"—what time

"The cuckoo's voice, from copse and vale,
Lingers, as if to meet
The music of the nightingale
Across the rising wheat"— are a testimony to him of the immortality of Spring. He inscribes a poem to some sub-tropical flowers grown in the open air of December at Madeira, but they are flowers that "only blow." And he confesses:

"'Tis England's flowers—
The lily and rose of English bowers—
Retain the perfume and the glow."

Even among England's flowers those which appeal to him most strongly are those which owe least to the gardener and most to Nature. All this is as it should be, as it must be, in a poet who can minister of the simplest balms to suffering that cannot nurse its grief. He desires no more, he says, than "Assurance that my strain has cheered

One soul, if only one,
And shed on the dark path it feared
A passing glimpse of sun."

Mr. Bell will certainly not lack th assurance. There are poems in this volume that will bring light and cheer to many a drooping spirit. There are others—notably "The Taking of the Flag" and "The Keeping of the Vow"—that will be read with pleasure for the vigour with which they are written. And there are others—more particularly, perhaps, the sonnets—on which readers will dwell with the delight which thoughtful verse, the genuine outcome of true feeling, never fails to give.

GEORGE COTTERELL.

The Land of Poco Tiempo. By Charles F. Lummis. (Sampson Low.)

THIS is a charming volume, and of varied interest. It appeals to the ethnologist, and to the lover of archaeology and folklore. It is a protest against the rush and hurry of our restless civilisation: it tells of reposeful life in a land "in which it seemeth always afternoon." Such is the picture of the opening chapters. But a turn of the kaleidoscope; and suddenly in this very land our nerves are thrilling, as perhaps they have not done since the first perusal of the best of Cooper's novels, at the stirring narratives of the races of the married and the single in the Pueblo, at the recital of the deeds of the Apache, and when we follow the trail of the renegades. Then, again, a distant echo of sixteenth century Spanish life comes before us in the "New Mexican Folklore Songs" and in "A Day of the Saints"; while the final chapter, "The Cities that were Forgotten," is a thorough exposure of one of the greatest mare's nests that was ever constructed out of the unsubstantial theories of the antiquary in his study.

The style of the book, too, though at times irritating, is not wholly unsuitable to its contents. There is some tall writing, and a good deal of exaggeration: words and phrases are used which belong to the English of the New Hemisphere, and are unknown to that of Europe. Without the title, "Lo, Who is not Poor," we should hardly have recognised our poet Pope in "the hunchbacked sermoniser in pentameter" who opens chapter ii. There is a vein of sarcasm and satire, or rather of what the French call malice, running through almost every chapter, which gives piquancy to the whole. The illustration on p. 287 of "a Quivira myth-maker" is one of the prettiest bits of quiet satire that we have seen for a long time.

One thing that the book greatly needs is a good map. This is an annoying omission. The uninformed reader will be constantly asking himself, Where do these Pueblo Indians live? Where is this land of Poco Tiempo? It is chiefly in that south-western territory of New Mexico, among the latest additions to the great republic of the United States; and the whole story of the book is laid in this territory, in Arizona, in the south-western corner of Texas, and in the neighbouring districts of Mexico proper. The more serious purport of the author is a rehabilitation of the accounts of the early Spanish historians, and a defence of the Spanish methods of dealing with the Indians.

Many of the facts brought forward are of the greatest value to the anthropologist. It is curious to remark how little the deeper qualities of the Pueblo Indian have been affected by the great material changes wrought by the conquest. Then he had no beast of burden, no domesticated animals, no cattle, no sheep, no tools of metal. Now he has horses, cattle, is a mighty shepherd, and the ass figures as the "genius of the adobe." Even in his religion Christianity is but superimposed upon his older faiths. Yet he remains substantially the same man he was before: the deep imprint of race is not in the least obliterated. The climate remains the same; his numbers are about as large as at the time of the conquest; it is hard to say whether he has advanced or retrograded in civilisation, for he had a civilisation before the European came. Perhaps the Spaniard has made him even more careless of time, and more averse to hurry than he was before. Our author lays stress on his holding two logically incompatible religions, and believing in both. The fact is not so uncommon as it may appear at first sight. We made inquiries on the subject many years ago in South America, and have found many examples of it since.

The author justly praises the work of the Spanish missionaries, but he does not ask why this influence has been more successful and permanent than that of the missionaries of the north. The Spaniard of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries had something in common with the religious rites of the Indians of the Pueblo. On Saint's days he, too, danced before the Holy Sacrament, he held his Auto (dramatic performance) in honour of the day, and the Bullfight often followed these severer exercises;* so he could easily find place, with a little change, for the Indian dances and games and processions in the ritual of his Christian holidays. But to the New Englander this was impossible, and an abomination to be rejected. There was thus a wide gulf between the races. The darker mysteries, the tortures of initiation into Indian rites or Indian manhood, found their counterpart in the processions of flagellant penitents, in the thorny robe, in the dragging of the heavy cross or bearing of the heavy images. To this day barefooted Penitentes toil along mountain paths often covered with ice and snow, and carry their heavy crosses all the night through in the Ascension processions to the shrine of Roncesvalles; and these things were then common throughout Spain, and they gave an additional point of contact between the European and the Indian mind.

"There is a pleasure in poetic pains Which only poets know."

But the duller nerve and coarser sensibility of the Indian perhaps needs real pain and even torture to enable him to feel the thrill of delightful anguish which the poet suffers in fancy alone. He enjoyed his torture. If the Spaniard allowed, or even encouraged, self-inflicted torments in his converts, he was equally ready to inflict them on himself, and to welcome torture and martyrdom at the hands of the heathen or the renegade.

* All these and more were combined in the fêtes at Azpeitia in 1622, in honour of the canonisation of Loyola.

But the whole book is not taken up with these horrors. There is plenty of lighter matter. The old story of the two Irishmen who took a keg of whisky to Epson and sold every drop of it, and yet found themselves next morning drunk and with only threepence in their possession, re-appears as a genuine Pueblo tale. The chapter on the Spanish-Mexican folk-lore songs, with the music, is most acceptable. The Coplas tell of the dislike of the Pueblo Indians for blonde, or fair people—but among the mingled peoples of South America, and in Paraguay, folk used to sing like this:

"Black eyes and brown
You every day may see,
But the blue eyes of my love
The gods have made for me."

In the final chapter, which exposes the myth of the forgotten cities, before cutting open the pages to read, we were struck with the likeness of the sculptured beam (see illustrations, pp. 301, 304), and its use in construction, with that of the huge beam which supports the front story of old Basque houses. Doubtless some northern Spaniard carved and placed it there, thinking of his home so far away. These Indian ruins are really churches built by the early missionaries.

Portions of this book have probably already appeared in periodicals, but the chapters were well worth collecting. They make up a variety of dishes, some of which should please the taste of almost every reader.

WENTWORTH WEBSTER.

NEW NOVELS.

Mademoiselle Miss, and other Stories. By Henry Harland. (Heinemann.)

White Poppies. By May Kendall. (Ward, Lock, Bowden & Co.)

The Emigrant Ship. By W. Clark Russell. In 3 vols. (Sampson Low.)

One Never Knows. By F. C. Phillips. In 3 vols. (Ward & Downey.)

Cheap Jack Zita. By S. Baring Gould. In 3 vols. (Methuen.)

Such a Lord is Love. By Mrs. Stephen Batson. In 2 vols. (Innes.)

A Romance of Lincoln's Inn. By Sarah Doudney. In 2 vols. (Hutchinson.)

A Prison Princess. By Major Arthur Griffiths. (Cassells.)

The Sin and the Woman. By Derek Vane. (Remington.)

The Tutor's Secret. By Victor Cherbuliez. Translated by Paul Derechef. (Arnold.)

MR. HENRY HARLAND's stories in the little volume entitled Mademoiselle Miss are very good stories. They are, indeed, some of the best that we have recently seen, in a kind which has recently been cultivated "with almost feverish eagerness"—as the usual novelist would say. Their goodness varies, of course, and Mr. Harland has been well advised to put his front foot foremost. "Mademoiselle Miss" is an amusing, but not impossible, young Englishwoman who, misled by guide-books, plants herself, all innocently, in a Latin Quarter Hotel inhabited by étudiants and étudiantes; and by dint of the same innocence, coupled with a fortunate ignorance of the latest improvements of the language of Racine, achieves a considerable sojourn without either doing, suffering, or even thinking any evil. Such a story might be extravagant or niais with great ease; Mr. Harland has kept it from being either. "The Prodigal Father," a wicked anglicised American, who is confronted at an advanced period of life by Ithuriel, in the shape of his son, brought up in purest Massachusetts orthodoxy, is a less original subject, well saved from commonplace. And so is "A Sleeveless Errand," a sort of topsy-turvy pendant (if we may be permitted such a phrase), in which a faithful American painter, constant to his early love, after many years comes back from Paris and finds that she is not all his fancy painted her. "The Funeral March of a Marionette" is a risky subject well carried off; and if "A Light Sovereign," more ambitious than any, has a little less reality about it, it is by no means a failure. If anybody says, "Do you mean to call these masterpieces?" we shall only reply with the old and triumphant "Vous nous égarez de la question." A popinjay is not a roe; but when you shoot at a popinjay you can't do more than hit it. Mr. Harland has hit his. And we will add that it is perfectly clear why he has hit it. It is because, while using a gun new-fashioned in appearance, he has condescended to aim straight, and take old-fashioned precautions in loading—which things our new-fangled story-shooters too often disdain to do.

We look to Miss May Kendall for a mixture of cleverness, humour, and gloom; and we get it punctually in White Poppies. It is true that the hero, who undertakes to pay his father's debts out of the profits of reporting (they must have been very small debts or it must have been very large reporting), not only performs that feat, but to all appearances (Miss Kendall will not let us be certain even of this) marries his beloved. But if these two persons knew what perils they had escaped! Again, Miss Kendall does not say so, but we feel nearly certain that on at least two different occasions she had almost made up her mind to mulct them of their loves, if not their lives. Even as it is, she exacts a plentiful tale of death and dool by dooming the handsome and lovable, if rather Philistine, Vi. Romilly, who has a hopeless tenderness for the reporting discharger of debts, to the Salvation Army and a cruel fate; while her cousin Henrietta, a plain and passionate blue stocking, is slighted by several professors and left on the plain road to the Open Door. Verily the bloodthirstiness of the lady novelist is astonishing! Nevertheless, White Poppies is full of ingenious observation ingeniously expressed, of acute and not obstreperous satire, and of a criticism of life which, if it looks rather obstinately at the black side, cannot be said to look at what does not exist.

It is extremely pleasant to observe that Mr. Clark Russell has risen quite to his own best level in The Emigrant Ship. There were those who, though they did not object to the bluff sailor man and the rather featureless passenger maid thrown into contact by Love upon the sea from which his mother rose—to the open boat voyage, most inadequately provisioned—to the ship feloniously directed to the desert island—and to all the legitimate apparatus of those romancers who use the ocean, have mildly complained of late that Mr. Russell has been rather lazy in handling these well-known things. If this complaint is repeated in reference to The Emigrant Ship, it will argue a nasty repining temper. The earliest adventures of Charles Morgan on board a vessel bound from Bristol Citee, but by no means found or fitted "ship-shape and Bristol fashion," and with a brace of scuttling scoundrels for captain and owner, though extremely well done, are something in the common way. But when Mr. Morgan, after an excessively palpitating experience on the Great Salvage, apparently falls on his feet and the deck of a friendly barque which just wants a mate, his adventures are only beginning, and the rest of them is most surprising and agreeable. A set of demure, though technically piratical, foremast men, who run away with an emigrant ship to find a new Pitcairn Island in the Southern Sea, a ship manned with a girl crew, and many other astonishing things, reward the reader's faith in Mr. Russell, whose characters, by the way, share the freshness of his plot. Brigstock, a sort of nineteenth-century Fifth Monarchy man or Adamite, with a seventeenth-century mixture of Antinomianism and piety, is good; Alice Perry, the handsome and not bad-hearted virago, is excellent, nor do the others match them ill.

Mr. F. O. Philips is one of those persons, fortunate and wise in their generation, who, having found something that they can do, and that pleases a sufficient number of their contemporaries, proceed to do that something, not with any vain repetition, but with something of a judicious "sticking to the coo." We are pretty certain that those who have liked the author's former books will at once take to the company of lords, captains, actresses, and others, who are introduced to them in the opening pages of One Never Knows, and will not be disenchanted as they go along. As for those upon whom the particular enchantment does not work, why they have only got to go to another sorcerer.

In Cheap Jack Zita Mr. Baring Gould has worked back from his late loved Devon and Cornish coasts to the Eastern Counties, the scene of his first success, and his one approach to a masterpiece. The fen country provides, or rather provided at the period of the story and of Waterloo, scenes as suitable for this author's bold if rather melodramatic talent as the Essex shores; and he has arranged some tableaux of a sufficient luridness. The fight with flails between two mounted men on the dyke, which occurs just after the beginning, with its counterpart and revanche, the burning of the mill and the death of the victor in the former contest at the end, allow Mr. Baring Gould to ply his black and crimson vigorously, and he avails himself of the chances. He is less fortunate, as it seems to us, in the character who is his hero, if he has a hero—the "Fen Tiger," Drownlands, who fights his foe, kills (it is hardly fair to say murders him), and is himself unquestionably murdered by a very offensive specimen of the local preacher and agitator. Drownlands is a Brontëish personage, who does not seem at all at home in the surroundings of a prosperous fen farmer; and whether he is hectoring or making love, carrying on vendetta with his kith and kin or prosecuting rioters, he is very much a figure of carton-pierre. Nor has Mr. Baring Gould made his niece, Kainie, or Kerenhappuch, life-like; for she is, by turns, wildly eccentric and quite ordinary. Mark Runham, her half-brother, and Drownlands's aversion, is only meant to be an ordinary youth—and is one. But Mr. Baring Gould has certainly done a good deal to redeem these and other things by the figure of his heroine, Cheap Jack Zita, or Zita Greenway, who has, indeed, an inherited and incurable love for profiting by the "General Jackass," as her father has taught her to call the British public, but is otherwise a perfectly natural and delightful girl. She has enough gipsy blood in her to make her not hesitate to set fire to a house in order to save her lover and (as she thinks) her rival; but is generous, humorous, and extremely piquant. Perhaps she was rather thrown away on the honest yokel, Mark. The patter of her examination before the Ely magistrates is great fun; and Mr. Baring Gould, in divers passages, has poured obvious and very unsparring satire on certain agitations and ideas which are of all time.

There is a little nonsense, but also a fair proportion of sense and talent, in Mrs. Stephen Bateson's Such a Lord is Love. We wish that Mrs. Bateson had not sought to heighten the charms and abilities of her heroines by contrasting them with the silliness and ill-temper of their mother. The silly, ill-tempered ridiculous mother is a cheap and uncomely motive better left to the Americans, who have always been fond of it. The conjugal provocations of Adria Nevill are perhaps not absolutely sufficient to justify her conduct; and her sister Elizabeth, beloved by the learned and unintelligible Mr. Campion, is not a real person at all. But Adria and her elder sister, Bell, have the life which Campion himself and some other characters also lack.

Miss Doudney's story is of a somewhat older type, but in its way a very fair specimen of that type. The heroine, Nellie Stanley, is a daughter of nobody, who has pretty evidently gipsy blood in her. A penniless governess, she is sought by a young man of good family, heir to a small squire, and by name Mayne Comberford; and the courtship is carried on in Lincoln's Inn and the Fields thereof. Mayne's people do not oppose the match, and ask her down to their place; but the mother takes a strong dislike to her. At church she sees Lord Wyburn, a youthful sprig of doubtful character; and, not particularly meaning anything at first, "makes," as the vulgar say, "eyes" at him. Fate and metaphysical aid coming, she is herself discovered, or acknowledged, to be the daughter of an artist who has married a peer, jilts Comberford, and marries Wyburn, with results to be discovered. There is some hocus-pocus work, a touch or so of fair character drawing, and a sort of Pelleas-and-Etarre conclusion, wherein we have no great faith. But the book will serve.

Major Arthur Griffiths has "got the bones of" a remarkably good story of the exciting kind in A Prison Princess. A real Russian princess, who is born in Spain, marries an English rascal, and is forced, or trapped, by him into crime, has almost the stuff of a whole novel in the bare attributes we have stated. But when Major Griffiths further puts her on the track of a hoard of stolen jewels which have been concealed many years previously in Millbank itself by a thief of an earlier generation, and brings her into contact with the very child of Israel from whom the gems had been looted fifty years before, he may seem almost over-lavish of materials. We shall not say that the art is unworthy of the matter, for the story is readable always and at times exciting. But we are a little reminded of the lavish fashions of the captain of the Jumping Jenny, when he broke open a chest of tea and took out a capful in order to make a single cup.

It would be unkind, and is unnecessary, to spend much time on The Sin and the Woman. The Woman commits the Sin (which is nothing more interesting than what the wise call "conveying") in order to obtain money to publish at her own expense a novel, which of course, as it is a novel in a novel, makes her famous. But the Sin finds out the Woman, assisted by a remarkably objectionable man. The book must pretty certainly be Mr. Derek Vane's first attempt, and we hope his second will be unlike it.

The translation of Le Secret du Précepteur, in itself a decidedly good book, is good also. But why did the translator take it into his head to English "M." "Madame" and "Mademoiselle"? "Mr.," it is true, was used in a good age of English for "Monsieur"; but it is quite obsolete, and has a grotesque effect. "Mrs." is worse; it is totally misleading. Thus, "Madame Isabelle" carries with it in French no kind of secondary sense; but "Mrs. Isabel" would never be used in English except with an under-meaning of affection, or familiarity, or good-humoured chaff, or else by the ignorant and ill-bred persons who call a public character Mrs. Jane Smith instead of Mrs. Smith or Mrs. John Smith. These nuances are not to be neglected with impunity.

GEORGE SAINTSBURY.

GIFT BOOKS.

Scrambles amongst the Alps. By Edward Whymper. Fourth Edition. (John Murray.) Last week we noticed first among "Gift Books" a true story of the Mutiny. On this occasion, pre-eminence must be given to the new edition of the handsome volume in which Mr. Whymper describes, with abundant illustrations, the first ascent of the Matterhorn. No element of dramatic interest is wanting to this Alpine tragedy—the early visit to Switzerland as travelling artist, the fascination of the virgin peak, the years of apprenticeship in climbing, the rivalry with other aspirants, the carefully laid plans, the heroism of the guides, the easy conquest, and the awful catastrophe. Nor is it possible that the story could be better told, with a simplicity that reveals consummate art. Not often is it given to one man to have such mastery over different implements—the ice-axe, the pen, and the pencil. Added to this, is the knowledge of how a book should be produced, down to the minutest detail, which makes this volume not only a delight to look at but a pleasure to handle. The author has now carried the history of the Matterhorn to the present time, giving a record of every ascent down to 1880, and a fuller account of the accidents that have since occurred. These include the sad story of the death of his old guide, Jean-Antoine Carrel, to whom he pays a noble tribute for his services on the Andes of the Equator. He has also added several fresh illustrations, among which we may single out the portrait of J.-B. Bich as an admirable example of wood-engraving; and he has revised his copper-plate maps, which are not only the clearest but the most accurate ever published. We thus have a work stamped on every page with the sign-manual of the author—vigorous, artistic, and scientific. It is issued only in a limited edition, and we understand that all the copies have already been subscribed.

The Wreck of "The Golden Fleece". By Robert Leighton. With eight illustrations by Frank Brangwyn. (Blackie.) Mr. Robert Leighton does not leave the impression that he knows the sea quite as well as Mr. Harry Collingwood or Mr. Henry Frith; but there can be no doubt that he writes about the East Coast fishery from personal experience, even though some of the details do not seem quite appropriate to 1790, which is the date of the present story. It opens with a life-like description of the boats putting out from Lowestoft after the herrings. The fleet is caught in a North Sea gale, and the disasters that follow are attributed to spirits obtained from a Dutch cooper. The wreck, however, which gives its name to the book is that of a barque on Corton Sands. The boy-hero assists in saving two passengers, an émigré Marquis and his beautiful daughter. The Marquis establishes the manufacture of Lowestoft ware, and is then murdered. By the detective craft of the hero, the murderer is brought to justice; but the chain of adventures by no means ends with his conviction. The horrors of the hulks and of transportation are described with vivid realism; and all possible perils of the sea are piled upon one another. The best character in the book is that of the faithful and brave old fisherman, Peter Durrant, whose dialect appears to us to be excellent. The whole story is told simply and movingly, and will both interest and instruct all young readers. Of the illustrations, it is enough to say that they are by Mr. Frank Brangwyn, the best modern painter of sailors.

Real Gold: A Story of Adventure. By George Manville Fenn. (W. & R. Chambers.) As this book is by Mr. G. M. Fenn, it is well written, and the interest of it is well sustained. As it narrates the adventures of a British officer and his son travelling across the Andes to obtain (shall we say steal) seeds of the Cinchona tree for the good of the world, and the Peruvian Indians do all they can to kill them, there is plenty of excitement; but, despite the vividness of the descriptions, and the ingenuity of the incidents, it is not quite a success. The bull dog pertinacity and courage of the Englishman is a little overdone in the character of Colonel Campion, who had no right to risk the lives of his plucky companions, to say nothing of the probability of killing a lot of Indians, for the sake of recovering his lost mulepacks.

Valdmer the Viking: a Romance of the Eleventh Century by Sea and Land. By Hume Nisbet. With illustrations by the author and M. Nisbet. (Hutchinson.) The Preface informs us that "this story is the modernised version of an older record related by a Norseman, who, with his companions, sailed away from the Isle of Thanet to North America, and from there round by Greenland, the North Pole, and the Behring Straits, as they are now called, and afterwards circumnavigated the world without thinking that they had done anything particular." Of course, all considerations of probability and even possibility are set at defiance in the construction of the story, and the author has no real knowledge of the history of the period to which it relates. He quotes, by the way, some lines of "Beowulf" (with various eccentricities of spelling) as a sample of the language spoken by "Saxon and Northman" in the eleventh century. The rough vigour of style and power of invention found in Mr. Nisbet's other books are not wholly wanting here; but neither historical fiction nor fantastic romance is the line in which he is fitted to excel, and in this volume he has essayed both at once.

The Walrus-Hunters. By R. M. Ballantyne. (Nisbet.) That this is an interesting and carefully written story goes without saying, seeing that its author is Mr. Ballantyne. But he seems in it to have gone rather out of his depth, or perhaps it would be more correct to say that in his desire to make a fresh sensation he has somewhat strained after effect. His book, as a story of adventure, can best be described as a sort of haggis, composed mainly of Indians, Eskimos, and hunters. There is, of course, plenty of feeding in it, but it is a trifle too "confused." Some of the characters, however, especially Cheenbuk, the marvellous interpreter, and McSweeney, the Scotchman—although he, by the way, is a trifle too comic—are as "strong" characters as even Mr. Ballantyne has ever given his boy readers.

The Lost Treasure of Trevelyn. By E. Everett-Green. (Nelson.) This is a capital story for boys and girls; it is full of stirring adventure—the discovery of the lost treasure in the forest, the meetings of Cuthbert, the hero of the tale, with the Gypsies, and the exciting events in London in connexion with the Gunpowder Plot. The tone of the book is healthy; Cuthbert, by his honesty, energy, and perseverance, overcomes difficulties, escapes dangers, wins fortune, a good name, and a loving wife. To tell anything of the story would be to spoil the pleasure of readers; and, besides, even an outline would occupy considerable space; for the book is long, though not a bit tedious. History, mixed with romance, is always attractive, and by such means important facts and names are easily impressed upon the memories of young people.

Sable and White: The Autobiography of a Show Dog. By Dr. Gordon Stables. Illustrated by Harrison Weir. (Jarrold.) Dr. Gordon Stables has in his time played many parts: naval surgeon, gentleman gipsy, and judge at dog-shows. He also has the gift of interesting readers in his own various tastes. Here he tells, at considerable length, the story of a colly, whom, like a true Scot, he names Luath. After winning first prizes, Luath gets lost, and passes through strange hands, which gives the author the opportunity to describe the arts of the dog-stealer, the Home at Battersea, and the (hypothetical) chamber of a vivisectionist. This last scene we could well have spared. Many of the incidents recall to our mind a little book that we read in our childhood about the friendship of a dog called Captain and a cat: and though we have not seen that book for more than thirty years, we will wager that the pictures in it were likewise by Mr. Harrison Weir. It is pleasant to see that the pencil of the veteran has not yet lost its cunning. One thing, however, we must single out for unfavourable comment. Having introduced a cheap sneer at Agnostics, the author appends the following note, evidently intended to be serious (p. 119):

"Agnostic, a know-nothing or ignoramus, derived from the Greek word ἀγνοω [sic], I know not."

Gold! Gold! in Cariboo. By C. Phillips Wolley. (Blackie.) The title of this book, like a wild excited fever cry, gives a fair forecast of its contents. It purports to be a story of adventure in British Columbia early in the sixties, and nothing can be wilder or more pervaded by excitement than the various incidents that make up the story. Unfortunately, the story is not well told. The plot, such as it is, is disseminated and desultory, and the style is oftentimes jerky and abrupt, especially in the narrative and conversational portions. The author is at his best when describing the landscape environments of his adventurous heroes. Indeed, we do not know when we have read any book in which the characteristic scenery of the Fraser River is described with such graphic power—not to mention other physical features of British Columbia. Here, e.g., are a few sentences of undoubted vigour, possibly a little overstrained, but not so much so as to sacrifice truth to intensity of word painting:

"There is something about this river unlike all other rivers—something which it owes neither to its size nor its beauty. . . . From where Ned Corbett stood, high up above the right bank, he could get glimpses of the river's course for some miles. Everywhere the scene was the same, a yellow, turbid flood surging savagely along through a deep gully between precipitous mud bluffs, whose sides, stained here and there with metallic colours, vivid crimson and bright yellow, made them look as if they had been poured hot and hissing from Nature's cauldron, and that so recently that they had not yet lost the colours of their molten state" (p. 190).

The book must be read to be appreciated; but it will interest chiefly readers whose love of startling incidents absorbs every other passion and preference.

A Mannerless Monkey. By Mabel Wotton. Illustrated by Edith Ellison. (Innes.) Of course it is not pleasant to be called a "mannerless monkey" under any circumstances, but we expect that the real sting of it in Idonia's case was that it was not true. She was rampageous indeed, and thoughtless, and did all sorts of embarrassing and unexpected things; but she was a little lady after all. Her escapades are perhaps a little too sensational. She and her cousins could surely have played "Snakes" without upsetting everything on the dining-room table, and she might easily have got out of that china cupboard without breaking so much crockery. We quite sympathise with her desire to get rid of the little baby-lord, whom she thought would take away all her father's property; but it is rather difficult to believe that she could have successfully carried out her extravagant design of stowing him away in a forgotten garret until the whole country had to be searched for the missing little peer. It is a very nice story, though; and everybody, including the old grandmother and the butler, are well drawn. It is impossible, too, not to fall in love with a little girl who tries to alter the colour of her brown eyes with blue chalk in order to please her grandmother, and mixes a pot of cold cream with the milk in order to cover the misfortune of the dairymaid, by which the real cream had come to grief.

Tom and his Crows. By J. M. E. Saxby. (Nisbet.) This is, let us admit it at once, a superior gift book. Superior at all events in plan and outline, remembering that the events recounted took place some twenty-five years ago; superior also in a style which can boast in nearly equal moieties both wit and humour—the shrewd keen railery of the former and the contrasts pathetic and profound of the latter. If the style shows clear evidence of undue elaboration, a too continuous lack of unadorned simplicity, this is no more than might have been expected, the spiritual qualities of a book possessing such a character. Not so much can, perhaps, be pleaded for the plan of a book which abounds partly in improbabilities, partly in the customary stock in trade of Swiss adventures. To the outsider who catches the name of the book in a catalogue, or by letting his eyes run over the mass of books on a railway book-stall, the title may seem puzzling. It is not an ornithological monograph. "Tom" is not a naturalist who in these days of specialised studies has given particular attention to the Corvidae, or Crow family, and has collected his observations for the use of brother naturalists. The crows are rather the "featherless bipeds" which Plato inadequately defined as the race of humanity, and the great cynic Diogenes maliciously illustrated by a "plucked barn-door." In other words, "Tom," or "Nunc" as he is more familiarly designated, is a fond uncle who, owning certain nephews and nieces of a more than commonly pertinacious inquisitiveness, calls them, collectively, "crows"; but they are, notwithstanding the name and its implication, very delightful young people, not at all too inquisitive to be very charming company. We do not hesitate to say that Tom and his Crows is a book which most readers, fond of the society of young well-informed people, will heartily enjoy. "Crows" have long been regarded as almost the most sagacious of all the families of the great class of Aves, and those introduced to our notice by Mrs. Saxby are certainly not the least preternaturally clever and inquiring among their human analogues.

Second Sight. By A. Eubule Evans. (S.P.C.K.) The title of this interesting story does not mean the weird supernatural gift—the Taisch as it is called in Gaelic—of the Highland seer. The "second sight" here meant is the amended moral vision which comes from the disciplinary and improving self-tuition of a long and severe trial. Mr. Mountjoy, the young artist who undergoes this salutary probation, is a well-drawn and consistent character, probably the best, so far as its evolution is concerned, in the book. But the author has so often woven plots of fiction of various materials and textures before the reading public, as to have acquired no small measure of that facility in outlining and filling in mental or ethical processes, which may be likened to the technical skill with which an practised landscape painter fills in the lights and shades of his various pictures. In addition to this artistic excellence, the book possesses undoubted power, and nothing can be better than its tone. Compared with the other merits of the book, the illustrations are hardly up to the mark. They show evidence of that undue haste and hurry which mark our book-illustrators more and more, especially at this pushing season. After all, when Christmas is made to begin at mid-November, one can hardly expect the calm leisure of art production in the illustrations which adorn Christmas books, and which seem so often to sigh forth, as Englishmen did on the occasion of the loss of their eleven days at the last change of our era, "Give us back our vanished six weeks."

Sifted as Wheat. By Elizabeth Neal. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.) A clever story of personation, evidently founded on a well-remembered trial, leads to an innocent man being suspected of robbing a bank. His honour is triumphantly cleared by Mrs. Neal; and all ends happily by his marrying a beauty, "the whiteness of her throat and arms being set off by a jet necklace and bracelets," while "one pure white camellia lay amongst the coils of dusky hair." With no great pretensions to literary skill, Mrs. Neal has written an interesting story.

Namesakes. By Evelyn Everett Green. (Hutchinson.) This is an elaborate and well-constructed story of a secret which turns on the commission of a crime. As usual, the author's characters are well drawn, this remark being especially applicable to Guy Dangerfield, who, if anyone, may claim to be the hero of the story. There is little that calls for remark in the development of the narrative. Mrs. Green writes like the practised story-teller which she has now become. Her style leaves little to be desired, and she knows how to adorn her language with occasional but unobtrusive touches of humour and pathos. It used to be said of Anthony Trollope that he had acquired beyond every English novelist the art of describing proposals and their acceptance or rejection with the greatest possible variety and picturesqueness, but we have in Namesakes two proposals which seem to us to rival the very best of Anthony Trollope's. Two points of adverse criticism must, however, be charged against the book. The authoress allows her young ladies to use slang; and the story is too much spun out. But Mrs. Green has never written anything better than the death scene of Guy Dangerfield.

A Hit and a Miss. By the Hon. Eva Knatchbull Hugessen. (Innes.) Our misses in this world are sometimes more fortunate than our hits, and this is, we think, the case in this book. The "Miss" or "The Passé défini Girl" is a capital story full of spirit and character. Both Meg and Winnie are very nice though very different girls, and after their youthful quarrels should turn into the firmest of friends. The other story is quite as well written, and will perhaps be preferred by many; but we are getting a little tired of the child hero or heroine who commits prodigies of self-sacrifice under the promptings of an abnormally acute conscience. Of course she ought to have been sorry that she handed to her brother the bad jackdaw's eggs, with which he spoilt the dress and parasol of Miss Barnes by excellent shots from a window as Miss Barnes (a perfect stranger) passed their house in a carriage; but to think of her saving money out of her pocket money to buy another silk dress, and to set out by herself to find Miss Barnes in order to present it to her, is really a little too much. Yet the story is written so well that it is difficult not to believe that it is really true, word for word; and Ethel, after all, is a very nice little girl and not a bit of a prig.

Enid's Victory. by C. S. Lowndes (S.P.C.K.) is somewhat unreal, and its motive—to induce a child to love her grandfather and this grave relative to care for her—farfetched. The manner in which the dialogues are thickly sprinkled with "darling," "pet," and the like gives the book a very sentimental effect.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. have in the press a Life of Sir Harry Parkes, some time British minister in Japan and China, written by Mr. Stanley Lane-Poole, the biographer of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe. It will be in two volumes, illustrated with a portrait and a map.

THE long-promised Life and Correspondence of Dean Stanley will be published by Mr. John Murray next Tuesday. It bears on the title-page that it is written by Mr. R. E. Prothero, the new editor of the Quarterly, "with the co-operation and sanction of Dean Bradley."

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN will shortly publish a new volume of collected essays by Dr. Jessopp, entitled Random Ramblings in Time and Space.

THE First Supplement to Mr. Sonnenschein's bibliography of current literature, The Best Books, will be published early in 1894. It will comprise the more important literature of the years 1890-93, classified into sections, sub-sections, and paragraphs, under the ten headings into which Mr. Sonnenschein's scheme classifies knowledge—theology; mythology and folklore; philosophy; society, including law, political and social economy, commerce and education; geography; history; archaeology; science and medicine; arts and trades; literature and philology. New features in this Supplement are the fuller characterisation of each entry, which will extend to nearly every book, and the greater inclusiveness of the scheme.

MESSRS. CHAPMAN & HALL will publish immediately A Chat about Orchids, by Mr. Frederick Boyle, with coloured illustrations.

A SUPPLEMENT to How to Write the History of a Family, by Mr. W. P. W. Phillimore (which is now out of print), has been sent to press, and will appear at an early date. Among the additional chapters it contains are two on Scotch and on Irish Genealogy.

MESSRS. A. D. INNES & Co. have in the press a volume of poems by the Rev. Mosse Macdonald, which they hope to publish before Christmas.

MESSRS. WALTER SCOTT & Co. announce an edition of the works of Nathaniel Hawthorne, in twelve monthly volumes, each with a frontispiece in photogravure.

KHALIL EFFENDI SARKIS, editor and proprietor of the Arabic paper, Lisan-ul-Hal, published at Beyrout, has just arrived in this country from America, where he paid a prolonged visit to the World's Fair. He leaves almost immediately for Syria, accompanied by his nephew, Mr. Selim Sarkis, who has been acting for some months as special correspondent to the paper in London. Lisan-ul-Hal was established about seventeen years ago, and has the largest circulation of any paper in Syria. It is issued twice a week; but Mr. Sarkis intends, on his return, to publish it daily. The party also includes Soliman Effendi Bistani, editor of the first and only Arabic Encyclopaedia, who has the further credit of having introduced shorthand into the East.

THE following are the lecture arrangements at the Royal Institution before Easter: Prof. Dewar, six lectures (adapted to a juvenile auditory) on "Air: Gaseous and Liquid"; Prof. Charles Stewart, nine lectures on "Locomotion and Fixation in Plants and Animals"; Canon Ainger, three lectures on "The Life and Genius of Swift"; Mr. W. Martin Conway, three lectures on "The Past and Future of Mountain Exploration"; Prof. Max Müller, three lectures on "The Vedānta Philosophy"; Prof. W. H. Cummings, three lectures on "English Schools of Musical Composition" (with musical illustrations); Lord Rayleigh, six lectures on "Light, with special reference to the Optical Discoveries of Newton." The Friday evening meetings will begin on January 19, when a discourse will be given by Prof. Dewar on "Scientific Uses of Liquid Nitrogen and Air"; succeeding discourses will probably be given by Mr. A. P. Graves, Mr. T. J. Cobden-Sanderson, Prof. W. F. R. Weldon, Prof. Silvanus P. Thompson, Prof. John G. McKendrick, Dr. W. H. White, and Lord Rayleigh.

DURING the first three days of next week, Messrs. Sotheby will be engaged in selling the library of the late Joseph Turner, of Leeds, who was a representative modern collector. His interests included county histories, illustrated works, first editions, and large-paper copies of the men of to-day. It was his pleasure to have the books of the same author bound uniformly by Ramage; and thus half-a-dozen volumes of varying degrees of interest often form a single lot. The collection is a select one all through, but we have not noticed that it contains any rarities of the very first importance.

THE FORTHCOMING MAGAZINES.

THE New Review, on its change of publisher, is adding some new features. There will be a short story every month, and also one or two illustrated articles—not illustrated in the ordinary way, as a magazine, but only when the text is positively helped by illustration. The January number will contain two illustrated articles—by Prof. Max Müller and Mr. Walter Crane, the latter with fifteen original drawings. The number will also contain articles on the Anarchists by Major Griffiths, and on the Nihilists by "Ivanoff." Some pages are devoted to a recently discovered pocket-book of John Locke's, and Mr. Kinloch Cooke contributes a character-sketch of Lord Dunraven.

A NEW serial story, by Mr. Grant Allen, entitled "At Market Value," will be published in Chambers's Journal during 1894.

THE January number of Good Words begins a new volume. The programme for the year includes: a serial novel, by the Rev. S. Baring Gould, entitled "Kitty Alone," with illustrations by Mr. Gordon Browne; short stories by Messrs. W. Clark Russell, Bret Harte, W. E. Norris, Stanley J. Weyman, Amelia E. Barr, &c.; a series of brief biographies of "The Great Astronomers," by Sir Robert S. Ball, with portraits and numerous illustrations; "Famous Episcopal Palaces," by Precentor Venables; "Old Friends with New Faces," by Katharine S. Macquoid, with illustrations by Mr. Thomas R. Macquoid; "The Wandering Minstrels," by Mr. J. F. Rowbotham, with illustrations by Messrs. H. Railton and J. Jellicoe; "Birds' Wings," by Sir William H. Flower; "How a Sculptor Works," by Mr. E. Roscoe Mullins, illustrated from photographs; "The Apocalypse in Art"—the Revelation of St. John, as seen and illustrated by sculptors, painters, and engravers of the middle ages—by Mr. J. M. Gray, curator of the Scottish National Portrait Gallery; "Foreign Poets in Story and Picture," by Mr. William Canton; and "Travels in North Africa"—Constantine, Oran, Tunisia—by Mr. William Sharp.

THE January number of the Sunday Magazine, which begins a new volume, will contain the opening chapters of a serial novel by Annie S. Swan, entitled "A Lost Ideal," together with a portrait of the authoress; the first of a series of articles on "Early Christianity in Britain," by Archdeacon Farrar; "The Painter of Eternal Truths," by L. T. Meade, with numerous illustrations from the pictures of Mr. G. F. Watts; and "Matabeleland and its People," by the Rev. H. T. Cousins.

THE January number of the Young Man—which commences a new volume—will contain stories by Silas K. Hocking and Robert Barr; an illustrated character-sketch of Mr. Balfour, by H. W. Massingham; an interview with Mr. Rider Haggard; an article on "Health and Exercise," by Sir B. W. Richardson; "My First Sermon," by Dr. Joseph Parker; the first of a series of illustrated papers on "The Microscope, and How to use It," by Dr. Dallinger; and a poem by Dr. Conan Doyle. During the year there will be stories by Gilbert Parker, S. R. Crockett, Barry Pain, G. B. Burgin, &c.; articles on "My First Sermon," by Archdeacon Farrar, Dr. Clifford, Mr. Price Hughes, and other preachers; a series of papers on "How a Morning Newspaper is Produced," by H. W. Massingham; a description of a journey "From Land's End to John o' Groats on my Tricycle," by Archdeacon Sinclair; "Reminiscences of Victor Hugo," by the Rev. H. R. Haweis; "A Young Man's Impressions of the House of Commons," by J. Williams Benn.

A SERIAL story by Mrs. Molesworth, entitled "Sheila's Mystery," will be begun in the January number of Little Folks, which forms the first part of a new volume; and in the same number will be begun another serial by Mr. Henry Frith.

A NEW serial, "Girls of a Feather," by Mrs. Amelia Barr, chiefly devoted to a study of modern society in New York, will be commenced in the Christmas number of Old and Young.

MR. ASCOTT R. HOPE will commence a short serial school story in No. 68 of Chums, to be published on December 27.

MR. WILLIAM LE QUEUX, author of "Guilty Bonds," is writing the new serial for Answers.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

THE Emperor of Germany has sent a telegram to Prof. Max Müller, conveying his congratulations on the professor's seventieth birthday, and expressing a hope of soon receiving some more "Chips from the German Workshop" in England. The professors and teachers of German in the universities and colleges of England, Scotland, and Ireland have presented an illuminated address; and the Rector of the Imperial University at Odessa has telegraphed to the professor that he has been unanimously elected an honorary member of that university.

SIR ALFRED LYALL has been elected an honorary fellow of King's College, Cambridge. Sir Alfred was educated at Eton, whence he went to Haileybury; but, so far as we know, his only connexion with Cambridge is the degree of LL.D. conferred upon him in 1891.

MR. E. A. MINCHIN, of Keble, has been elected to the biological fellowship at Merton College, Oxford, for which there was so keen a competition. At least one of the dozen candidates could put after his name the initials F.R.S. It will be remembered that the recent research fellowship at Lincoln was also awarded to a biologist.

IT is announced that subscriptions to the total amount of £3000 have already been received towards the Jowett Memorial Fund.

PROF. EDWARD CAIRD, the new Master of Balliol, has been appointed by the Crown a governor of the Bangor University College; and he has undertaken to deliver the address at the closing ceremony of the session, next June.

WE are glad to hear that the movement in favour of instituting popular classes in Greek is progressing; and we hope that the recent decision of the joint board of the London branch of the University Extension Society—not to recognise classes for instruction in the language, apart from courses of lectures—will be reconsidered, as it would (for obvious reasons) practically wreck this interesting experiment in education.

THE issue for 1894 of Minerva, the Jahrbuch of the learned world (Strassburg: Trübner), will have for frontispiece a portrait of M. Pasteur, etched by H. Manesse; and it will also be enlarged by several pages. Last year's volume, it may be remembered, had an etched portrait of Prof. Mommsen.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

COUNTERCHANGE.

SHE who is mine, and whom I hold not now
As other than myself, so large a vow
Was on me, when the treasure of her charms
At length had yielded to my suppliant arms,
And that which seem'd a vision half divine—
She who is mine—

Had own'd itself a woman, and for me:
In her serener soul, my soul can see How Love, Truth, Purity, are only She—
She who is mine.

M.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE most important article in the current number of the Antiquary is Viscount Dillon's account of Sir Henry Lee, of Ditchley. The worthy knight's name is familiar to all of us as one of the chief characters in Sir Walter Scott's Woodstock. For the purposes of romance it was necessary to depict Sir Henry other than he was. When a great artist such as Scott tampers with biographical facts, it becomes the antiquary to hold his peace; but the instance before us should serve as a warning to lesser men. The real Sir Henry Lee belonged to a period before the Civil War. He was a young man when Henry VIII. was king, and he lived to see his four successors on the throne. Though by no means a court flatterer, he stood high in favour with Elizabeth, perhaps because his mother was a sister of Sir Thomas Wyatt. His death took place in 1611, some nine-and-forty years before the death of the grand old Royalist who figures in Woodstock. "And of the Cavaliers and Roundheads and Alice? They are more shadowy than Bevis; for," as Lord Dillon proves, "they are neither probable nor possible." Canon Wood gives some additional information regarding Saint Fremund, whose name is, it seems, still commemorated in Freeman's Holme, a field near Prescott House; and Mr. R. L. Hope continues his interesting notes on "Scottish Holy Wells."

PROF. MOMMSEN'S JUBILEE.

PROF. MOMMSEN has written the following reply to the memorial addressed to him, on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of his doctorate:

"Den Vielen in und ausser der Heimath, die zum und am 8. November meiner freundlich gedacht haben, vermag ich nicht so zu erwidern, wie ich sollte und möchte. Rechtes Danken muss geschehen Auge in Auge und Hand in Hand; mir ist es nur möglich ein kurzes Wort an alle gemeinsam in die Welt hinauszusenden.

"Es ist mir beschieden gewesen an dem grossen Umschwung, den die Beseitigung zufälliger und zum guten Theil widerwärtiger, hauptsächlich aus den Facultätsordnungen der Universitäten hervorgegangener Schranken in der Wissenschaft herbeigeführt hat, in langer und ernster Arbeit mitzuwirken. Die Epoche, wo der Geschichtsforscher von der Rechtswissenschaft nichts wissen wollte und der Rechtsgelehrte die geschichtliche Forschung nur innerhalb seines Zaunes betrieb, wo es dem Philologen als ein Allotrium erschien die Digesten aufzuschlagen und der Romanist von der alten Litteratur nichts kannte als das Corpus Iuris, wo zwischen den beiden Hälften des römischen Rechts, dem öffentlichen und dem privaten, die Fakultätslinie durchging, wo der wunderliche Zufall die Numismatik und sogar die Epigraphik zu einer Art von Sonderwissenschaften gemacht hatte und ein Münz- oder ein Inschriftencitat ausserhalb dieser Kreise eine Merkwürdigkeit war—diese Epoche gehört der Vergangenheit an und es ist vielleicht mit mein Verdienst, aber vor allen Dingen mein Glück gewesen, dass ich bei dieser Befreiung habe mithun können. Was ich, ausgegangen von ersten Studien des römischen Privatrechts, dabei meinen älteren philologischen Freunden, vor allem Jahn, Haupt, Welcker, Lachmann an innerer Anregung und äusserer Förderung verdanke, wie dann das Land Italien mit dem ewig belebenden Athem seines Bodens und in Italien die Lehre unseres Altmeisters Borghesi, die treue Arbeitsgemeinschaft mit meinen Freunden Henzen und Rossi befreiend und den Blick erweiternd auf mich gewirkt haben, das habe ich lebhaft und dankbar immer empfunden, wo ich in die Lage kam mir zu vergegenwärtigen, was ich verfehlt und was ich recht gethan, und lebhaft und dankbar vor allem an dem Tage der Quinquagenarien. Ich bin übrig geblieben, einst der jüngste jener Kreise, jetzt fast der letzte. Dieser letzte dankt den Jüngeren und Jüngsten, dass sie des alten Mannes so, wie geschehen, gedacht haben.

"Wenn wir uns alle, ohne Unterschied der braunen und der grauen Haare, dieses Fortschreitens erfreuen, so soll darum nicht verkannt werden, in wie hohem Grade jede Steigerung der Ziele das Erreichen erschwert. Wie in den allgemeinen Verhältnissen, so ist auch in der Wissenschaft vieles nicht bloss anders, sondern auch besser geworden; aber dort wie hier stehen wir auch vor früher ungekannten und ungeahnten Gefahren. Wie wir dort die Erfahrung machen, dass es leichter ist die Höhe zu erklimmen als sich auf der Höhe zu behaupten und dass der reale Erfolg die Ideale eben so sehr erfüllt wie zerstört, so stehen wir auch in der Wissenschaft vor der Uferlosigkeit der Forschung, vor dem so lockenden wie gefährlichen Hinausschwimmen in das unendliche Meer, vor der schweren Aufgabe die vollkommene Erkenntnis mit der unvollkommenen Menschenkraft so weit in Einklang zu bringen, dass auch den Vielen einige Befriedigung und einige Hoffnung des Gelingens bleibt und derjenigen Verzagtheit gesteuert wird, auf welcher der Niedergang unserer höheren Jugendbildung am letzten Ende beruht. Die Sorgen wechseln wohl, aber sie enden nicht. Es ist ja vielleicht die Verzagtheit des Alters, die den frohen und freien Ausblick in die Zukunft hindert; immer aber wird die Jugend des Spruches eingedenk zu bleiben haben, dass Mensch sein heisst Kämpfer sein. Es thut Noth, vielleicht mehr als je.

"Nicht alles hat man im Alter, was man in der Jugend sich wünscht; aber was in ungeahnter und bei dieser Gelegenheit mir voll zum Bewusstsein gelangter Fülle mir zu Theil geworden ist, das ist die Anerkennung zahlreicher und trefflicher Männer, die Treue und die Liebe derer, denen ich persönlich habe näher treten dürfen, meines Volkes sowohl wie anderer Nationen. Diesen bin ich noch insbesondere Rechenschaft schuldig über die zu diesem Tage mir für wissenschaftliche Zwecke zur Verfügung gestellte ansehnliche Summe. Das darin ausgesprochene Vertrauen giebt mir wie die Pflicht so das Recht ohne Rücksicht auf hergebrachte Weise darüber diejenige Anordnung zu treffen, die ich nach gewissenhafter Erwägung für die richtige halte.

"Für die sichere Fundirung derjenigen Arbeiten, mit denen ich mich beschäftigt habe, ist nichts dringender erforderlich als die Herstellung einer über die den Bedürfnissen der Wissenschaft nicht entsprechenden Katalogarbeiten hinausführenden Gesamtpublication der griechisch-römischen, einschliesslich der aus der römischen Reichsprägung hervorgegangenen Münzen, wozu jetzt die im Auftrage der K. Preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften unter Leitung des Hrn. Imhoof-Blumer in Ausführung begriffene Sammlung der nordgriechischen Münzen den Anfang gemacht hat. Ich werde die genannte Akademie ersuchen die mir zur Verfügung gestellte Summe zu diesem Zwecke zu übernehmen und, da jene Abtheilung finanziell sicher gestellt ist, zur Weiterführung des Gesamtplanes das Capital sowie die inzwischen auflaufenden Zinsen zu verwenden. Es ist mein Wunsch, dass baldmöglichst eine weitere Abtheilung in analoger Weise in Angriff genommen werden möge.

"Wenn alle Wissenschaft international ist, so gilt dies noch in besonderer Weise von der Numismatik. Jener Gesamtplan kann unbeschadet der Einheitlichkeit füglich für die einzelnen Abtheilungen in verschiedenen Sprachen zur Ausführung kommen, und falls die Gelegenheit sich dazu bietet, soll danach verfahren werden.

"Die bestimmungsmässige Verwendung dieses Fonds werde ich die philologisch-historische Klasse der Akademie ersuchen einer ständigen Commission von drei Mitgliedern zu übertragen und ihr dafür neben mir die HH. Imhoof-Blumer und Otto Hirschfeld in Vorschlag bringen. Bei Ausscheiden eines Mitgliedes werden die verbleibenden der Klasse einen geeigneten Ersatzmann in Vorschlag bringen. Dieser Commission wird es obliegen die von ihr sachlich und persönlich gefassten Beschlüsse der Klasse zur Bestätigung vorzulegen, so wie der Akademie jährlich für die Friedrichs-Sitzung Bericht und Abrechnung einzureichen. Wenn die fragliche Summe bestimmungsgemäss verwendet sein wird, so wird die Commission darüber Schlussbericht an die Akademie und durch diese an das vorgeordnete Ministerium erstatten, auch diesen Bericht in geeigneter Weise veröffentlichen. Es sollen in diesem Bericht die für die vollständige Ausführung des Planes sowie für die successive Ergänzungspublikation alledann noch erforderlichen Massnahmen erörtert und entsprechende Vorschläge zur Vollendung und Fortsetzung des Werkes dargelegt werden.

Th. MOMMSEN.

"Rom im November, 1893."

SLAVICA.

WE are glad to see that the useful Bohemian journal Cesky Lid ("The Bohemian People"), which is devoted to folklore, continues its career under the able editorship of Doctors Niederle and Zibrt. Among other things contained in recent numbers, are accounts of Bohemian dances with the music, gleanings of interesting dialectal words, descriptions of village national fêtes and costumes, &c. To those who know how rich the Slavonic races are in traditions and local usages, it will be sufficient to point out what a mine of wealth may be found here. The magazine is well printed, and contains excellent illustrations. A short summary is occasionally given of the chief articles in the folklore journals of the leading European nations.

Bulgaria, now thoroughly aroused from her long intellectual torpor, shows great literary activity. A new review has been started (Bulgarski Pregled) at Sophia, in which the first subject that attracts our attention is the adoption of a new orthography. We are not quite convinced of the desirability of this proceeding. The old letters originally expressing nasals, which have now lost that import, except in the case of a single dialect, disappear. But with them an historic feature of the language seems to have gone. The scope of the review is wide: questions of philology and political economy are discussed; and besides tales, there are occasional pieces of verse. In the number for October, among other articles is a poem translated from the Slovak author who wrote under the nom de guerre of Sladkovich, and Bulgarian literary style is discussed by L. Miletič. The reviews and notices of contemporary books are incisively written. By their strenuous efforts at self-education, the Bulgarians have proved their right to be mitted among the cultured nations of Europe.

A little work has appeared at Belgrade, by Prof. Ljubomir Nedich, on the modern Serbian lyrical poets (Iz Novije Srpske Lirike). The writings of Jakshich, Zmaj (Jovanovich), Jachanski, and others are here brought under review. We are afraid that little is known in England of Serbian lyrical poetry; but the Serbs have produced some good writers, who have handled their rich and musical native tongue with considerable dexterity. The amount given of the writings of the young poet, Bojislav, strikes us as very interesting; it, indeed, all the "critical studies," as Dr. Nedich styles his essays, are well worth reading. With such a beautiful country and such a harmonious and pliant language, one does not wonder why Serbia should be without her vates sacer.
W. R. M.

SELECTED FOREIGN BOOKS.

GENERAL LITERATURE.

BISSEL, B. Vaticanische Miniaturen. Freiburg-I.-B.: Herder. 20 M.
DEHNSTEDT, F. v. Ein Dichterleben in seinen Briefen 1850-1892. Hrg. v. G. Schenck. Berlin: Schenck. 3 M.
FASCH, M. Leipziger Philosophen. Portraits u. Studien aus dem wissenschaftl. Leben der Gegenwart. Leipzig: Adolf Weigel. 4 M.
GILL, O. Die italienische Einheitsidee in ihrer literarischen Entwicklung von Parini bis Manzoni. Berlin: Hüttig. 6 M.
LAURET, E. Histoire diplomatique de l'alliance franco-russe. Paris: Ollendorff. 8 fr. 50 c.
LOURENS, E. Alexandre III.: sa Vie, son Œuvre. Paris: Dentu. 10 fr.
MANDIÉRE, E. La Céramique chinoise. Paris: Firmin-Didot. 50 fr.
NACH, A. Aus Frankfurts Vergangenheit. Architekturstudien. Frankfurt-a.-M.: Keller. 25 M.
NACH, G. Gottschalk u. Plottwell, die Begründer der Deutschen Gesellschaft in Königsberg. Leipzig: Duncker & Humblot. 6 M.
IRZARIO, G. I maestri Comacini. Storia artistica (800-1800). Milano: Hoepli. 12 fr.
KLEINSCHMIDT, F. Kunstgeschichte. Neue Folge. 6 Bd. Wien: Graeser. 7 M.
MORAY DE BRUAUPAIRE, A. L'Âne des Korrigans, etc. (Légendes du Morbihan). Paris: Firmin-Didot. 10 fr.
MORVARD, Ph. Bibliographie des éditions de Simon de Colines 1520-1546. Paris: Paul. 40 fr.
TUTTMANN, F. Mit Emin Pascha ins Herz v. Afrika. Berlin: Reimer. 25 M.
VÉRIAN, Paul. Quinze jours en Hollande. Paris: Vanier. 5 fr.
VAGNER, J., Fhr. v. Die Sächsischen Schweiz. Zittau: Oliva. 25 M.
VIELAND, Ch. M., Neue Briefe, vornehmlich an Sophie v. La Roche. Hrg. v. B. Haasencamp. Stuttgart: Cotta. 6 M.
ANGERMISTER, K. System d. Realcatalogs der Universitätsbibliothek zu Heidelberg. 5 M. 50 Pf. Heidelberg: Winter. 5 M. 50 Pf.

HISTORY.

MASIN, Ch. L. La Vendée patriote. T. II. Paris: Dupont. 10 fr.
MIRAUD, P. La propriété foncière en Grèce jusqu'à la conquête romaine. Paris: Hachette. 10 fr.
JOURNAL de Marie-Thérèse de France (5 Octobre 1789-9 Septembre 1792). Paris: Firmin-Didot. 10 fr.
LAUDÉ, A. Friedrichs d. Grossen Angriffspläne im 7jährigen Kriege. 1. Thl. Der Feldzug v. 1767. Marburg: Elwert. 1 M. 80 Pf.
AUBERT, O. Die Schlachtfelder v. Metz. 1. Lfg. Berlin: Duncker. 12 M.
LOCHI, L. Les Français à Rome pendant la Convention 1794-1795. Paris: Le Soudier. 40 fr.

PHYSICAL SCIENCE, ETC.

RELMANN, G. Schneekrystalle. Beobachtungen u. Studien. Berlin: Mükenberger. 6 M.
MATHÉFAGES, M. de. Les Œuvres de Darwin. Paris: Alcan. 12 fr.
WISS, W., u. A. STÜBEL. Reisen in Süd-Amerika. III. Astronomische Ortsbestimmungen, bearb. v. B. Peter. Berlin: Asher. 22 M.

PHILOLOGY, ETC.

BUCHÉVAL, V. Histoire de l'Eloquence romaine, depuis la Mort de Cicéron jusqu'à l'avènement d'Hadrien. Paris: Hachette. 7 fr.
BOUDROUX, F. Dictionnaire de l'ancienne langue française. 75e fasc. Paris: Bouillon. 5 fr.
BRUNWALD'S Buch üb. die Grammatik. Uebers. u. erklärt v. G. Jahn. 1. Lfg. Berlin: Reuther. 4 M.
BRUNWALD, E. Strabons literarhistorische Notizen. München: Ackermann. 4 M.
LAWERK, N. Die hebräische Präposition min. Leipzig: Faber. 8 M.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE SEPTUAGINT versus THE HEBREW TEXT OF THE BIBLE.

III.

Athenaeum Club.

In comparing the respective values of the Greek and Hebrew texts of the Bible, it is natural to turn to the Book of Jeremiah, in which, as is well known, we have a marked difference in the two texts. This difference had already been remarked by Origen (Epist. ad Afric. Migne Origeni Opera I. 53). He mentions what is obvious enough: namely, the transposition of the prophecies in the two versions. Jerome in his preface to Jeremiah, following his usual fashion of treating the Hebrew text as the one to be preferred, speaks of the confused order of the prophecies in the Greek and Latin Bibles, and tells us how he had corrected this by restoring the text to its pristine condition.

Modern criticism has not altogether supported the conclusions of Jerome in this matter. There has been a long polemic on the subject, undoubtedly; and in Germany, where a priori and deductive methods of reasoning are so fashionable, there have been found some to champion the Hebrew text at all hazards. But the tendency of the latest and minutest criticism has been very much the other way, notably in the works of Bleek and Hitzig, and in the two monographs devoted especially to the comparison of the two texts, one published in Germany by Scholz, and the other in England by Workman. The latter is an admirable book, and, as it seems to me, proves its case beyond doubt by careful inductive methods, combined with a close criticism of the results of Graf and others.

The most striking of the variations is the transposition in the order of the prophecies. In the Hebrew text the prophecies against foreign nations occupy chapters xxv., 15-xiv. In the Greek text they form chapters xxxii.-li. Not only so, but the order and sequence of the several prophecies differ in the two texts.

In both these respects the latest criticism has given the weight of its authority to the conclusion that the Septuagint version ought to be followed, and not the Hebrew. The Dean of Canterbury, whose natural prejudice was perhaps the other way, says in his Preface in the "Speaker's Commentary":

"It will strike everyone that the earlier part of the Gentile prophecies in the LXX. was probably more nearly that which they held in Jehoiakim's roll; and when we turn to chapter xxv. 13, we find them not merely expressly referred to, but called 'this book which Jeremiah hath prophesied against all the nations.' But in the Hebrew text they are separated from the pronoun 'this,' which indicated their immediate presence, by more than twenty-one chapters; whereas in the Septuagint they follow as soon as the sentence is complete."

Again, in commenting on verse 13 of chapter xxv. in the Masoretic order, the same writer says:

"The LXX. arrange the words in a very different way. They place a full stop after book, and then begin again. 'What Jeremiah prophesied against the nation of Elam.'"

The narrative then goes on to chapter xlix. 35-39 of the Hebrew text, which relates to Elam; and this points to the prophecies against Elam having come first in the original roll.

"In the Hebrew the prophecy is put at the end of all the Gentile prophecies, but with a title which, if genuine, would prove that it formed no part of the roll at all."

The title contained in verse 34 of chapter xlv. of the Masoretic text is entirely omitted in the Septuagint. On these grounds Dr. Payne Smith argues that the order of the prophecies in the Septuagint is to be preferred to that in the Hebrew version. This he infers also from another fact. Speaking of the LXX., he says that it omits entirely verse 14 of chapter xxv.; and as this verse seems to refer in a very plain manner to chapter l. 9, 41, lii. 27, 28, and as these chapters were certainly not written in the fourth year of Jehoiakim but probably eleven years later, "there is a clear probability that in this place the LXX. have preserved the text as it stood in Jehoiakim's roll."

Other and forcible arguments have been adduced by Bleek, Scholz, and Workman in the same behalf. The last of these authors claims to have shown that "the position of the prophecies is not only the proper one, but also the original one, and that the arbitrary transposition was not the work of the Alexandrian translator, but was evidently made by a later editor or copyist in the Masoretic recension or text itself."

In regard to the order of the prophecies among themselves, the question has been discussed in great detail by Bleek, Scholz, and Workman; and the result of their investigation is thus stated by the English scholar: "While there is no probability that the order in the Greek has been 'arbitrarily transposed,' as Graf asserts, there is great probability that the order in the Hebrew has been purposely arranged according to a principle, partly geographical, partly chronological." Dr. Payne Smith, writing on this subject, says, "the order of the LXX. seems the more ancient."

Turning from these transpositions to other variations, I can only refer to some of the more palpable, since their number is very great, and in doing so prefer to refer to authorities of easy access.

Dr. Davidson, in his Commentary, says: "Chapter x. verses 6, 8, 10 are omitted in the LXX., and would be better wanting. The same remark applies to xvii. 1-4, which the Greek wants. Again, xvii. 19-22 are wanting in the Greek, and a few words only are found in their place. Movers appropriately remarks, against the authenticity of the Hebrew, the copious loquacity savouring of the commentator, not the prophet speaking with his contemporaries about things well known. Jeremiah would not surely have informed them what vessels Nebuchadnezzar left in the temple, nor what captives he carried away to Babylon. Nor would he have repeated in the 21st verse the same words as in the preceding one."

The Dean of Canterbury has pointed out that in verse 9 of chapter xxv. the Septuagint omits the words "and to Nebuchadnezzar," which are difficult grammatically. In verse 11 of the same chapter it omits the mention of the King of Babylon, and says "the Jews shall serve among the nations for seventy years."

"In verse 12 it again omits the King of Babylon and the land of the Chaldeans. In verse 13 it makes 'this book' refer very unmistakably to Jehoiakim's roll, and appends to it Jeremiah's prophecies 'against the nations,' putting as a title words which are quite out of place in the Hebrew text, as we cannot imagine Jeremiah himself to have said 'All that is prophesied in this book which Jeremiah hath prophesied against all the nations.' Finally, it also omits in verse 26 of the same chapter and verse 41 of chapter li. the mention of the King of Sheshach, or of Babylon, which again is difficult, for why should the prophet put here in cipher what in verses 9 and 12 he had put openly?"

Davidson says the phrase is certainly unauthentic and unsuited to the context.

"It seems probable, therefore," says Dean Payne Smith, "that the LXX. have preserved for us the earlier text, in which all direct mention of the King of Babylon is omitted, and the seventy years are given as the duration of Judah's captivity, and not of the Babylonian empire."

In chapter xxviii. verse 1, Jehoiakim in the Masoretic text ought to be Zedekiah, as it is in the Syriac versions, and as it perhaps once was in the Septuagint, from which the verse is now wanting. In the Septuagint, chapter xxvii., verses 19 and 22 are much shortened; the additional phrases of the Hebrew text are treated by Movers and Hitzig as interpolations. In verse 1 of chapter xxviii., the words, "In the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah," which made nonsense in the Hebrew text, are omitted in the Septuagint.

In chapter xxix, verses 16 to 20 are not found in the Greek.

"It is evident," says Dr. Davidson, "that they disturb the connexion in which they stand. Without them the whole reads well and continuously, the twenty-first verse belonging to the fifteenth. Hitzig argues well that the added verses are not original, and formed no part of Jeremiah's letter."

In chapter xxxiii. verses 14 to 26 are absent from the Greek.

"It is difficult," says the same author, "to see anything in their contents which could prompt either a translator or transcriber to omit them. . . . But they do not belong to the present connexion. . . . Internal evidence shows that it [the prophecy] is not Jeremiah's. Verses 14, 15, and 16 have been taken from xxxiii. 5 and 6, as Hitzig points out. We suppose, therefore, that a later hand has added the passage."

J. D. Michaelis, Jahn, and probably Movers, agree in rejecting the words, and Dr. Payne Smith remarks of them that they contain many difficulties.

In chapter xxxix. verses 4 to 13 are wanting in the Greek, "They are," says Davidson, "without doubt, spurious, and disturb the connexion. Even Ewald admits this." I might largely amplify these details, but they ought to suffice.

The general result arrived at by Prof. Davidson is stated thus:—

"The preference belongs to the Greek text, which is judged too unfavourably by Keuper, Havernick, Kell, Nagelsbach, Wichelhaus, and Neumann, who stoutly maintain the Masoretic text on almost every occasion." Again, "our induction of passages may serve to show that the Greek recension is generally preferable to the Hebrew one. Neither is always correct. But in the great majority of cases the Alexandrine is preferable, because it appears authentic."

"From copious internal evidence," says Mr. Workman, "it must with disappointment be admitted that the character of the Masoretic text of Jeremiah is deplorably unsatisfactory. . . . From ample external evidence, moreover, the condition of the Hebrew text is also exceedingly unsatisfactory. In many ways, and at different times, it has unquestionably undergone considerable change. . . . A critical comparison of the Greek and Hebrew shows clearly that the latter text has been extensively and systematically modified (id. xxxi. and xxxii.)." And, again, he says: "If the Greek translation of Jeremiah really bears the relation which it seems to bear to the original form of this book, then it should not simply be consulted in correcting and emending the present Hebrew, but when its text has been restored it should itself be made the basis of reconstruction (ed. xli. and xlii.)."

Dr. Henry Preserved Smith has published a very interesting memoir on the value of the two texts in Hebraica for July, 1887. In this he says (inter alia):

"The cases treated in this paper are, I think, fair examples of the state of the text; and, if so, they justify the conclusion that the LXX. was made from a better text than the one preserved for us by the synagogue."

That the Greek version is not free from errors is true enough—errors of translation, errors of transcription, &c. Nor is it impossible that the MSS., even those marked with oboli, &c., have failed to preserve the text from the interference of Origen and his eclectic theories. But in the main, there is reason to believe that we have it fairly pure; and if so, the position seems incontrovertible, which is stated by Kuhl in the following sentence:

"Der Uebersetzer habe einen kürzern, vortrefflichen Text vor sich gehabt, und man müsse demnach in allen schwirigen kritischen Streitfragen den letzten Entscheid von der Septuaginta holen."

If these considerations follow from an examination of the Book of Jeremiah considered apart and by itself, they are immensely strengthened when the same conclusion (as we have tried to show) is found to be true of other works in the Bible. How much longer, then, are we to have the Rule of Faith of the Protestant Churches based upon a Bible which was systematically altered and sophisticated to meet the prejudices and polemical needs of the Jews, and which is in no sense, as Delitsch hyperbolically describes it, "a work transmitted for ages before the time of Christ by Palestinian and Babylonian tradition"?

Under any circumstances, it is assuredly time that some more special efforts were made to restore to us the pure and original text of the Septuagint as nearly as it can be recovered. If I have not exhausted the interest of the subject and the patience of your readers, I propose to continue my parable in another letter.

HENRY H. HOWORTH.

THE BRONTË MYTH.

St. Andrews, Fife: Dec. 2, 1893.

Mr. Noble's article in the ACADEMY on Dr. Wright's The Brontës in Ireland awakens afresh all my suspicions about the Wicked Foundling, Welsh, and the rest of it. Who is the authority for this legend? Hugh Brontë, grandfather of the novelists. Hugh was a big, obstreperous, imaginative person, who fought with ghosts, threw potatoes at the devil, and was the chief Sennachie, or romantic story-teller, of his district. Even granting that he anticipated Mr. Gladstone's legislation on some points, is Hugh a witness whose testimony can be accepted without confirmation? I fail to see that there is, or can be, any confirmation. Hugh was taken away, as a child, from his parents' home by Welsh, whom he was very glad to follow in his innocence. Hugh never returned to his parents, he never could find out even where he had lived as an infant; how, then, did he know the early history of Welsh? I am not aware that a single trace of the Brontës, the brothers and sisters of Hugh's aunt, Mrs. Welsh, and their children, can now be found. Thus, if I am right, the whole myth reposes on the word of Hugh, on the tale he told, among other tales, in later years; and how did he come to know the tale? Was it imparted to him by his aunt, the wife of Welsh? Was it she who divulged this long legend of villainy about her own husband?

If we examine the dates, we see how little faith can be given to the details of the "melodramatic situations," till now unrecorded in documents. There was, we learn, a Brontë on the Boyne soon after 1688. As his family grew up, he brings home a foundling, say in 1710. The foundling is called Welsh. Give him thirty years to ripen, and oust the younger Brontës from their farm, and marry one of their sisters. That takes us to 1740. He is ruined, and then he comes to Hugh Brontë's father, his own brother-in-law, a prosperous man in Southern Ireland. For no rhyme or reason, this well-to-do farmer hands over his child, Hugh, to his deadly, if repentant, enemy, under a solemn vow never to communicate with, or look for, the child. Where is the motive? Hugh's father may have believed that the son would inherit the tenancy of the old farm on the Boyne, but what is Welsh's motive? And why had Welsh by this time (according to Mr. Noble) assumed the name of Brontë? And why, after enduring "several years' mental and bodily torture" from Welsh (alias Brontë), and, after running away from him, did Hugh Brontë call one of his own sons "Welsh," after the name of his mortal foe, a name which that foe had long previously changed? A less plausible fable never adorned the Family Herald. It would little surprise me if Welsh, alias Brontë, was really Brontë, and was Hugh's father, by a woman named Welsh.

It appears to me that Hugh, an imaginative teller of tales, a half insane battler with the devil, a champion who challenged ghosts to combat, may have invented the whole romance of the Wicked Foundling. That it can be correct in its details, after a hundred and eighty years, seems highly incredible. That Hugh told the story, that it reached his granddaughter, and inspired Emily Brontë's novel, is certain enough. But, as a narrative of fact, is it good enough to go to a jury? The mere circumstance that Hugh christened one of his sons "Welsh"—the rejected name of his torturer, according to the legend—raises a strong presumption that the Foundling story is one of old Hugh's yarns. He had a genius for romantic narrative, which, with the yarn, was inherited by his grand-daughters. This is very interesting, and Dr. Wright's whole book is full of picturesque merit; but concerning the truth of the yarn, we must remain in doubt, with a strong tendency to disbelief.

A. LANG.

A GREEK CHRISTIAN INVOCATION.

32, Torrington-square, W.C.

In the Edwards Collection, now in University College, there has lain for some years a small folded piece of papyrus, showing traces of writing.

On being damped and unfolded, it was found to contain a few leaves of a plant, identified by Mr. Newberry as trefoil, to have on the back remains of a design in thick brown strokes, similar to Kufic writing, and on the front a complete Greek invocation written in nine lines of clear uncial characters. Of this I am enabled, by Prof. Petrie's kind permission, to give the following transcription:—

+ ἀγγελοι ἀρχαγγελοι οἱ φυλάττοντες τοὺς καταρακτας τῶν οὐρανῶν οἱ ἀνατέλλοντες τὸ φῶς κατὰ πάσης τῆς οἰκουμένης οἱ δικασμον | ἐχθρὰ μετα κινεῖς
ἀκεφάλου εἰς ἐλθὲ κρατῆται αὐτοῦ | καὶ ἐμεν ἀπολυσε
διὰ τὴν δύναμιν τοῦ πατρὸς | καὶ τοῦ υἱοῦ καὶ τοῦ ἁγίου
πνεύματος ἀμήν | ὡς σαβαὼθ | θεοτοκε ἀφάρτε ἀμάρτε
ἀμολυτε μὴτηρ | χριστοῦ μνησθήτη οἱ σὺ ταῦτα εἶπες
σοι | ταλιν θεραπεύσον τὴν φοροῦσάν ἀμήν +

"Ye angels and archangels who guard the floods of heaven, who cause the light to rise through all the earth, since I have a quarrel with a headless dog (?) if he comes, overpower him and rescue me through the might of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. Amen. Iao Sabaoth. Thou who barest God, inviolate, spotless, virgin mother of Christ, remember that thou saidst this to thyself, again heal the woman who carries this amulet. Amen."

καταρακτες is the word used in the Septuagint in the sentence (Gen. vii. 11) translated "the windows of heaven were opened."

The reading κρατῆται (κρατεῖται) is fairly clear. What is a κύων ἀκέφαλος? Was the adversary an Ἀκέφαλος, heretic? The trefoil no doubt symbolises the Trinity.

J. E. QUIBELL.

APPOINTMENTS FOR NEXT WEEK.

- SUNDAY, Dec. 17, 4 p.m. Sunday Lecture: "The Stuff that Worlds are made of," by Prof. A. A. Rambaut.
 4 p.m. South Place Institute: "The Leather Industry," by Mr. J. H. Daborn.
 7.30 p.m. Ethical: "Abstract and Practical Ethics: a Reply to Criticism," by Mr. J. H. Muirhead.
MONDAY, Dec. 18, 5 p.m. London Institution: "Crabs," by Prof. W. F. R. Weldon.
 8 p.m. Aristotelian: Symposium, "Is Religion presupposed by Morality, or Morality by Religion?" by Messrs. R. J. Byle, C. C. J. Webb, and A. F. Shand.
TUESDAY, Dec. 19, 6 p.m. London Institution: "The Principles of Commercial Geography applied to the British Empire," XII., by Dr. H. H. Mill.
 7.45 p.m. Statistical: "The Perils and Protection of Infant Life," by Dr. Hugh R. Jones.
 8 p.m. Microscopical: "The Ultimate Structure of Pleurosigma Angulatum," by Mr. T. F. Smith; "A New Screen for Monochromatic Light," by Mr. J. W. Gifford.
 8 p.m. Civil Engineers: "Hydraulic-Power Supply in London," by Mr. E. B. Ellington.
 8 p.m. Meteorological: "The Great Storm of November 16 to 20, 1893," by Mr. Charles Harding; "Rainfall and Evaporation Observations at the Bombay Water Works," by Mr. S. T. Tinsley; "Changes in the Character of certain Months," by Mr. A. E. Watson.
WEDNESDAY, Dec. 20, 8 p.m. Geological: "The Stratigraphical, Lithological, and Palaeontological Features of the Gosau Beds of the Gosau District, in the Austrian Salzkammergut," by Mr. Herbert Kynaston; "Artesian Boring at New Lodge, near Windsor Forest, Berks," by Prof. Edward Hull; "Boring on the Booyens Estate, Witwatersrand," by Mr. D. Telford Edwards.
 8 p.m. Folk-Lore: "Old Northern Folk-Lore and Folk-Faith," by Mr. F. Y. York Powell; "Scripture Tableaux on Italian Churches, and Votive Offerings," by Mr. W. H. D. Bouse.
THURSDAY, Dec. 21, 8 p.m. Chemical: "The Oxidation Products of Corydalline," by Prof. Dobbie and Mr. A. Lauder.
 8 p.m. Linnean: "Enumeration of all Orchideae hitherto recorded from Borneo," by Mr. H. N. Ridley; "Hepaticae collected by W. R. Elliott in the Islands of St. Vincent and Dominica," by Mr. R. Spruce.
 8.30 p.m. Historical: "The Colonial Empire of the Portuguese, to the Death of Albuquerque," by Mr. C. Raymond Beazley.

SCIENCE.

The Old Syriac Element in the Text of Codex Bezae. By F. H. Chase. (Macmillans.)

THIS is a very adventurous book. We have large Old Syriac fragments of the text of the Gospels; we are awaiting the publication of the practically complete Old Syriac text discovered by Mrs. Lewis; we have not so much as a fragment of the Old Syriac text of the Acts. Under these circumstances Mr. Chase has undertaken to show that the peculiarities of the text of Codex Bezae in the Acts can best be explained on the hypothesis that a succession of scribes made fitful interpolations by retranslating an Old Syriac text full of glosses into Greek. The hypothetical Old Syriac text is constructed out of the "Vulgate" (i.e., the Peshitto) by the help of analogies drawn from a comparison between the "Vulgate" and the Old Syriac where accessible in the Gospels. Obviously, if he is right, Mr. Chase will have covered himself with glory. The Old Syriac text of the Gospels, when it is published, will prove to be the original of all or most of the peculiarities of the Bezan; in the meantime, it is almost a case of ignotum per ignotius. Mr. Chase is at a disadvantage in another way. The readers of Mr. Rendel Harris were able to follow the whole of his argument; a minority of Mr. Chase's readers, by no means all of his reviewers, possess even the working acquaintance with Syriac which is all he claims for himself; and the criticism which Prof. Marshall's attempt to explain the variations of the Synoptic Gospels, as arising in the course of translation from a common Aramaic original, has met with hitherto is rather alarming to outsiders. But it does not appear that Mr. Chase has to defend himself, like Prof. Marshall, against the charge of assuming hypothetical forms, derived from questionable roots and used in hypothetical senses.

In his preface Mr. Chase gives a list of ten passages which he thinks will convince serious readers that there is something in his theory. The first is ii. 17, "their sons and their daughters" for "your sons and your daughters." In Syriac the confusion is very easy: aitōn and ēmōn are quite unlike in Greek. In ii. 47, τὸν κόσμον is substituted for τὸν λαόν; again, a clerical error is natural in Syriac and not in Greek, though τὸν κόσμον might be explained as the tail of a doctrinal gloss that had displaced the text. In iii. 13, παρεδωκατε εἰς κρίσιν, the two last words are an obvious gloss, and make up a phrase familiar in Syriac, and found once at least where the Greek has παρὰδουναί without addition. In iii. 14, ἐβαρύνετε for ἡντήσαθε might be explained by an easy clerical error in reading or copying a Syriac text. In iv. 32, D reads καὶ οὐκ ἦν διάκρισις ἐν αὐτοῖς οὐδεμία; E καὶ οὐκ ἦν χωρισμός ἐν αὐτοῖς τις: with nothing to correspond to either in the ordinary Greek text. It is a very probable guess that two Greek copyists are giving independent renderings of a Syriac gloss. In vi. 1, the omission of the second article ἐν τῇ διακονίᾳ τῇ καθημερινῇ is easily explained by Syriac idiom; the insertion of ἐν τῇ διακονίᾳ τῶν Ἑβραίων is accounted for by considerations which appeal to readers with a working knowledge of Syriac. The insertion of ἐκ τοῦ γένους in vii. 24 has many Syriac analogies, though it is a natural gloss in Greek. In viii. 27, it is very unaccountable what in the Greek could make a copyist write τῆς γάξης αὐτοῦ (of Queen Candace's treasure); but "in unpointed Syriac the suffix of the third person, except in the case of the plural of masculine nouns, is as indeterminate as ejus, ei in Latin." So in Mark xvi. 11, we have (of St. Mary Magdalene) οὐκ ἐπίστευον αὐτῇ. In xi. 27, D reads ἦν δὲ πολλὰ ἀγαλλίασις συνεστραμμένον δὲ ἡμῶν

 ἔφη εἰς ἐξ αὐτῶν Ἀγαβος.

Mr. Chase argues that the first two lines, which correspond to nothing in the common Greek text, come from Acts viii. 8 and xx. 7 respectively, and that both come through the Syriac because the Syriac has the same word for ἀγαλλίασις, Luke i. 34, and χαρά Acts viii. 8, and the same Syriac word is used for ἡθροισμένους, Luke xiv. 33, and συνελθόντες, Acts i. 6 (which suggest the gloss συνεστράφημεν in x. 41), as is used for συντηγμένον in xx. 7. Lastly, in xix. 28, D reads συνεχύθη ὅλη τῆς πόλεως αἰσχύνῃ for ἐπλήσθη ἡ πόλις συγκύσεως. The connexion of "shame" and "confusion" and "ashamed" and "confounded" is as common in the Syriac Old Testament as in the English: "of shame" in Syriac looks very like "and-she-was-ashamed." It would be just as easy to suppose that the reading of D is a conflation of συνεχύθη and ἐπλήσθη αἰσχύνῃ. Then, the question would arise whether συνεχύθη or ἐπλήσθη τῆς συγκύσεως were the original. The former gives an excellent sense, quite worthy of the judicious annotator to whom we owe δράμοντες εἰς τὸ ἀμφοδόν. The course of things would be: Demetrius held his meeting indoors; then they broke up and ran out shouting on the pavement round the block they had met in; a mob collected to find what was up, and rushed into the theatre in the hope of further explanations.

Be this as it may, a great many of the peculiar readings of D have exactly the look of a half-corrected proof from bad copy. There is again a muddle of two expressions, either of which would be natural, e.g., in iii. 13, τοῦ ἀπολύειν αὐτὸν θέλοντος is just as probable in itself as κρίναντος ἐκείνου ἀπολύειν, the ordinary reading: τοῦ κρ. ἐκ. ἀπ. αὐτὸν θέλοντος, the reading of Codex Bezae, is of course impossible. Mr. Chase explains it on the hypothesis that αὐτὸν θέλοντος is a superfluous gloss derived apparently from a Syriac Diatessaron. In general, he appears to assume that the Syriac was glossed by a very laborious and futile process, and that Syriac copyists employed on Greek texts either knew the Syriac by heart, or, as seems more than once to be suggested, were following on a Syriac text while the master of the workshop was dictating from a Greek. Everyone knows that in Greek Testament narrative it is quite uncertain whether two verbs will be coupled by a conjunction or one of them; and if so, which will be thrown into the participle. Untrained copyists would obviously produce a plentiful crop of variants, and unskilful correctors would leave inextricable confusion. In xi. 25, 26, D reads ἐξῆλθεν ἀναζητῶν αὐτὸν καὶ ὡς συντυχὼν παρεκάλεσεν. Here we might have had ὡς συνέντευχεν or συντυχὼν, as the ordinary text has εὐρών. Mr. Chase explains καὶ ὡς as a literal translation of a Syriac gloss from ix. 38. In general, he explains all variations and confusions of this sort by the Syriac idiom, which habitually expresses tenses with a participle and a substantive verb. A scribe whose mother-tongue is Syriac may certainly be expected to bring Syriac constructions into Greek both in speaking and writing—there are plausible instances in vi. 7 and vi. 15. On the other hand, if ἐθορύβουσιν, in xi. 28, were not an exact parallel to the incontestable ἐδολύουσιν, Rom. iii. 13, it would be simpler to explain it as a confusion of ἐθορύβουν and ἐθορύβησαν, than as a confusion of ἐθορύβουν and θορυβοῦντες ἦσαν. So, again, κατοίκουσιν, in ii. 46, is simply a case of omitted augment, and = κατῴκουν; παρεδίδους εἰς, in viii. 3, is just as likely to be a clerical error from the accidental doubling of ε, which was turned into c as a Syriacism; ἀπαχθῆναι for ἀπελθεῖν, in iv. 15, may very well be an attempt at technical correctness, like ἐπιτροπεύοντος for ἡγαμονεύοντος.

The impression the book leaves is that Mr. Chase has a real case, which will have to be weighed much more fully than is possible here, but that he has overstated it and overlaboured it. G. A. SIMCOX.

CORRESPONDENCE.

DOES GREEK ATHÊNĒ = SKR. AHANĀ?

Oxford.

For many years the identity of the Indian Ahanā and the Greek Athênē has been held by a certain school of comparative philologists as an indisputable fact. In the Gifford Lectures of 1888 (p. 436) we are told that "Ahanā, as a name of the dawn, was known before Greek and Sanskrit separated," and that "phonetically the identification of Ahanā in the Veda and Athēnē in Greek is beyond the reach of criticism and cavil." Some years ago Sir George Cox, in his Preface to Aryan Mythology, is rather severe on "the Greek Lexicon of Dr. Liddell and Dr. Scott" for not having admitted the affinity of Athēnē with the Sanskrit Ahanā, which "is as well established as that of Erinyes and Saranyū, of Ouranos and Varuna."

I beg to be allowed to show that the equation Ahanā = Athēnē, although declared on such high authority to be well established, phonetically irreproachable, and beyond the reach of criticism, must be rejected as demonstrably impossible in the light of modern science.

It is quite true that a Sanskrit h may be represented in Greek by the dental tenuis aspirata θ as well as by the guttural tenuis aspirata χ. In one guttural series this change in the place of articulation occurs regularly before e-vowels. For instance, θελω = I.-E. g²hen-io, cp. Skr. han-mi; θερος (I.-E. root g²her) = Skr. hāras "glowing heat." But it is well known that this change in Greek to θ is only found where the original I.-E. sound was a media aspirata belonging to the "velar" series, sometimes symbolised by g²h. No change in the place of articulation occurs when the original I.-E. sound is a "palatal" (gh).

Now we are able to infer with perfect certainty that the h in Skr. Ahanā represents an original "palatal" (gh), because its cognate ahan "day," is found in Avesta in the form azan. A Skr. h, developed from a "velar" (g²h), is represented by j in Avesta, for instance, Skr. dr̥iham = Avesta dr̥ijam "deceit." I.-E. root dhreug²h (see Brugmann Grundriss, i. § 454). From this it follows that a Skr. Ahanā could only have been represented in Greek by an Αχ-form, and that therefore Athēnē cannot possibly be identical with Ahanā.

A. L. MAYHEW.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

PROF. JESPERSEN, of Copenhagen, the author of Studies over engelske Kasus, has in hand an English translation and adaptation of his book, which is to appear at no distant date with Messrs. Swan, Sonnenschein & Co. It will contain much new matter and English illustrations and examples; and the already lengthy Introduction, which contains an extraordinary amount of acute reasoning and observation, will be still further enlarged.

WE regret to record the death of Prof. H. G. C. von der Gabelentz, at the comparatively early age of fifty-three. He is best known for his works on modern Chinese grammar; but he had also made a study of many of the languages of Oceania. His early life was spent in the judicial service. In 1878, he was appointed professor of Chinese and Japanese at Leipzig; but on the foundation of the oriental school at Berlin, under Prof. Sachau, he was summoned thither to teach the languages of Eastern Asia.

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

SOCIETY OF HISTORICAL THEOLOGY.

THE annual meeting was held at Oxford on Thursday, November 23, when an address was delivered by the president, Prof. F. Max Müller, on "The Limitations of the Authority of the Sacred Books of the East in the Study of the History of Religion." The name of the Society showed that it desired to see theology treated not merely as a system of ready-made dogmas but as a continuous growth of human thought, to be studied in its manifold manifestations in every part of the inhabited world. Historical theology must study the historical documents of every religion; but sacred books represent almost always a secondary growth. None of the founders of the great historical religions had deemed it necessary to write a single line. In the lower ethnical religions it would be useless to ask for the founders of particular forms of belief and custom; and even in the higher national religions which had sprung out of them, which might be, like the Indian, Persian, Jewish, and Chinese religions, in possession of sacred books, we do not know their real founders or the authors of the books by which they profess to be guided. The case of Zarathustra was analysed; and it was pointed out that religious belief and custom spring up like dialects, being the work of men not in their individual but in their corporate capacity. On the other hand, while the Greek religion was a national one, Homer, Hesiod, and Pindar sprang from it, and their poems could not be reckoned as sacred books. National religions, therefore, might exist long before, and independent of, any sacred books. In the individual religions, also, Buddhism, Christianity, and Muhammadanism, we could only get at the deepest thoughts of their founders through the minds of their disciples. The origin of the Korān was traced as an example; and it was then shown that a further deduction had to be made from the authority of the sacred books, owing to the fact that the number of people who could use them was extremely small. Books in the recognised sense, as literary compositions for the public at large, did not exist before 600 B.C. Further difficulties arose when their language became obsolete or unintelligible. Nevertheless, the good elements filtered through, and had a vast indirect influence, as was the case with the Korān at the present day in Turkey, though no Turkish translation is allowed, and few can read Arabic. These limitations must never be forgotten by the student of historical theology. We could hardly realise what the effect would be, had the founder of a religion left us a complete outline of his doctrine in his own writing. Such dogmatic fixity would have prevented all healthy growth. Christian theologians had not always appreciated the privilege which they enjoyed, in possessing a sacred book whose good tidings had passed at least through one, if not through several, human channels.—Prof. Owen C. Whitehouse read a paper on "The Principle of Centralisation in Early Israel." The unity of social life in antiquity was the clan bound together by community of blood, the bond being renewed by participation in some sacra in which the god of the clan participated. As early as the time of Moses, the Israelite clans were united in the worship of a common deity, Jehovah. At the same time the separate clans had their special sacra (1 Samuel xx. 6, 28). Canaanite Camōth gradually absorbed the scattered local cults of Israelite worship, and a process of assimilation went on. Probably the God of the Semites was primarily, as Prof. Robertson Smith has shown, a god of each spot of local fertility. Thus there were many Baals. Jehovah, worshipped in different centres, would become similarly differentiated. But the Jehovah of the Hebrews was not primarily a god of local fertility. Varied indications (Hittite proper names, &c.) clearly indicate that he was primarily god of the sky or atmosphere. Assyrian parallels (hymns to Bel, Merodach, and Shamesh) would suggest that such a deity would more readily lend himself to comprehensive and ethical ideas. Jehovah became the central link of the scattered Israelite clans. But early history exhibits two tendencies—the centripetal and the centrifugal. The unifying centripetal force was intensified by the presence of a foe: the disintegrating and centrifugal by times of peace. War against Canaanites, Midianites, &c., stimulated the national consciousness of being the 'am Jahweh. The high-place of the clan to which the Shophet or Deliverer belonged was the rallying point which tended to overshadow the importance of other Camōth. This principle was illustrated by reference to the examples of Joshua, Barak (Kadesh Naftali), Gideon, and his successor. As time went on, civilisation—especially the growth of agriculture as giving a stake in the soil—made centralisation for common defence more important. The proximate cause, however, that welded Israel into closer union was the growth of the Philistine power and the life and death struggle which ensued. This length brought even Judah into the Bund. The ultimate outcome was—on the political side monarchy; on the religious, the temple of Solomon. How are we to interpret the significance of the latter? This has been too much passed by recent criticism. Yet, surely, the intimate relation between religion and social life in antiquity should lead us to find the religious correlate to the organic political unification in Israel. No ought our path to be obscured by the accident of the polytheistic tendencies of Solomon's harem (1) We observe the growth of a definite priesthood at Shiloh, Nob, and other high places, and we observe also that the priesthood was hereditary (2) The unique importance of Jerusalem made it the scene of rivalry between the Elids and the Zadokids. (3) The priestly family of Zadok became pre-eminent at Jerusalem. The power of the Jerusalemite sanctuary and its priesthood is attested by Jeroboam's attempt to strengthen the prestige of Bethel: for 1 Kings xii. 26-30 is, for the most part, historically credible (see Wellhausen). The eighth century prophets are not, and do not profess to be, proclaimers of a new system of truths. They appeal to a nobler and purer past, which was vivid in the nation's historic consciousness. Thus Hosea protests against multiplication of altars, viii. 11, 12, compare Amos v. 4, 5, ii. 76, Isaiah i. 21, 26, 29, &c. These do not necessarily refer to a legislation, but to a tradition of the past, which probably became embodied in a code of wider extent than the Book of the Covenant. This Code was probably drawn up by the Zadokid priesthood, at the close of Solomon's or beginning of Solomon's reign, and was that which was discovered in the reign of Josiah. This was obviously not identical with Deuteronomy, but, like Deut. xii.-xxvi., was based on the Book of the Covenant and Law of the Two Tables, but went beyond it in including (1) Decalogue in its simplest form (see Kittel); (2) law of unclean animals in Deut. xiv., an attempt to consolidate into a definite system the various tribal cults of Israel; (3) Restriction of sacrificial functions to the priestly tribe of Levi; (4) More stringent exclusion of the worship of other gods, (5) Regulation of worship of high places, abolition of kedeshim and kedeshoth and the Asheerah. This is a tentative sketch of the legislation which the Zadokid priesthood drew up as the organised expression of the new ideals. The disruption shattered the nascent evolution of a Torah which might have exercised a marked influence on the next three centuries: "excursus manibus radii revolutaque pensa."

ARISTOTELIAN SOCIETY.—(Monday, Dec. 4.)

SHADWORTH H. HODGSON, Esq., president, in the chair.—Mr. A. Boutwood was elected a vice-president. Miss E. E. Constance Jones read a paper on "The Import of Categorical Propositions." As far as general (or so-called "formal") import is concerned, it is not open to us to admit several alternative interpretations of categorical propositions of the form S is P. In both subject and predicate both aspects, or moments, of the term have to be taken into account—viz., the application and the signification (or characterisation); but the application-aspect is prominent in the subject, and the characterisation-aspect in the predicate. What every categorical proposition, without exception, affirms or denies is, identity of application in diversity of signification or characterisation. The affirmative copula imports identical application, and there must be diversity of characterisation, or we lapse into A is A. The negative copula imports difference (otherness) of application, and this "otherness" involves diversity of characteristics. If, instead of the unmeaning A is A as an expression of the law of identity, we accept an explicit law of identity-in-diversity, to the effect that everything has a plurality of characteristics, or everything is an identity-in-diversity, then we have a principle which justifies categorical propositions of the form S is P; is in line with the best expressions of the laws of contradiction and excluded middle; is an obvious and sufficient basis of conversion and other immediate inferences; affords a complete rationale and an absolutely general canon of mediate inference; and is naturally and interest-ly connected with a general formulation of the principle, or assumption, on which inductive inference, as such, proceeds. — The paper was followed by a discussion.

ANGLO-RUSSIAN LITERARY SOCIETY, IMPERIAL INSTITUTE.—(Tuesday, Dec. 5.)

A. CAZALOT, Esq., president, in the chair.—An article, by M. Jules Simon, in the Figaro of November 9, was read. The following is a translation of the passage in which the distinguished French author refers to the objects and utility of the Society: "An Anglo-Russian Society has been founded in London, in order to bring together the two countries by first bringing together their literary men. I was invited to join—probably a Russian; but I would also join as an Englishman, because I am accustomed to take the good side of every people, and I can never forget that Englishmen first initiated parliamentary freedom in the world." Similar societies are now being founded in Italy, Austria, Switzerland, and other countries. It was announced that Baroness Kretzschmar, the founder of the League of Peace at Geneva, had been interviewed by M. Borzenko, a member of the Society; and the result was, that the two bodies would enter into communication with each other.—A Russian poem, written by K. K. Krenlov on the death of the composer Chaikovsky, was read by the hon. secretary, and elicited general admiration.—Mr. W. J. Birkbeck then read "Some Notes upon the Monks and Monasteries of Russia." He explained that the Russian was a monastic Church, and also a great national Church, which is held in higher honour than in other countries. Public buildings, devoted to the service of the Orthodox religion, both ancient and modern, are the most prominent and richly decorated edifices in Moscow, Petersburg, and other great cities; whereas, in many other capitals of Europe, they may be often looked upon as almost vanishing. Moscow is surrounded by a circle of monasteries. Russia's chief strength lies, not in her army, nor in her fleet, nor in her fortifications, but in her Church. When the French army is destroyed, and her capital occupied by an enemy, France has to come to terms with him; and the same thing, we constantly hear, if we substitute the fleet for the army, would be true of England. Whereas, if the Russian army were defeated in the field, only the first line of defence would be destroyed: there would be the Russian winter and the Russian peasantry behind to take up the national standard. And even supposing all these should fail—and history tells us that, though some time or other they have each saved their country, there have been occasions upon which they have all three been overcome—there remains behind them the Church of Russia, which has never failed her in her need, but which, in her long and eventful history, has given her strength to hold her own, to multiply and increase, to bear the heavy yoke of the Tartars without cringing under it, and at length to cast it off: to survive and overcome the anarchy which followed the failure of the royal dynasty, to ward off and drive back the Swedes, the Poles, the Austrians, and Turks, to break the power of Napoleon and his army of twenty nations which accompanied him; in short, to become what she is at the present day. The first thing that was accomplished towards the future greatness of Russia by monks was the invention of the Slavonic Alphabet, and the translation of the Scriptures and the service-books of the Church into the Slavonic tongue by the two Greek monks, Cyril and Methodius, in 855—i.e., a century before the conversion of Russia to Christianity. The history of the multiplication of monasteries in Russia was then told. Many were visited by the lecturer turned out to owe their existence to a monastic foundation, and the consequent attraction of Russian colonists to it as a centre of enlightenment and civilisation. In Russia, the monks are often spoken of as an idle body of men; but, although, in the case of some communities, this may be true, the result of personal investigation had proved to the lecturer that these accusations are unfounded. Many monasteries are centres of industry, and contain excellent schools, workshops, and other institutions of the greatest value to the surrounding population. A model monastery is that in Valaam, an island in Lake Ladoga, through which flows the limpid river Neva on its way to St. Petersburg. The monks have built steamers, made engines, and supplied their buildings with a huge iron reservoir on a hill, into which water is pumped from the lake. As regards discipline, the lecturer and his Russian companion, formerly an ambassador, were not allowed to smoke, the sub-prior observing that "the rule must be kept by all; people come here to pray, and not to smoke." Some curious hermitages were described, and the paper concluded with quotations from unpublished letters written by Dean Stanley, who visited a monastery near Moscow together with the Emperor Alexander II.—The Rev. E. Smirnoff spoke in high terms of Mr. Birkbeck's thorough knowledge of his subject; and Mr. J. Goldsmith Procter described a monastery he had visited in Siberia, near the River Yenisei, where kindness and hospitality had been shown to him and his friends.

FINE ART.

Rembrandt: His Life, his Work, and his Time. By Emile Michel. Translated by Florence Simmonds, and edited by Frederick Wedmore. (Heinemann.)

ONE is sometimes inclined to think it is lucky for the Old Masters that they are dead. There are few, if any, of them which have escaped from scathing criticism from one section or other of modern critics. When we read the Handbook to the National Gallery, with its comments so industriously collected by Mr. Cook from the writings of Mr. Ruskin, we feel that more than half the pictures in Trafalgar Square are really beneath the notice of a rational person; when we read the writings of the "modern" critic, we find that most of the artists which Mr. Ruskin selects for special praise were not artists at all, were painters still less, that they were all permeated with the obnoxious "literary idea," and did not understand the proper use of the paint-brush or the right value of paint. On the other hand, it is encouraging to find that at no time have all the Old Masters been overthrown altogether. Our great-grandfathers admired Raphael, Michael Angelo, Correggio, and the later school of Bologna. Then the Pre-Raphaelites, the "primitives," rose into public estimation; and now it is the turn of Velasquez, and Rubens, and Franz Hals, and the Dutchmen generally. It is singular that, notwithstanding all those apparently violent fluctuations of taste, as shown in the writings of the critics, nearly all these Old Masters have still rather increased than diminished in reputation. With the exception of the later Italians of Bologna and Naples (and these are sure to find a champion before long), their works are sought for more eagerly than ever, and their value has increased and is still increasing. So great, indeed, is our interest in the Old Masters themselves, that no pains is thought too great to discover every detail of their lives and their works, even though they were not artists of the first rank. The solution of a vexed question of a birth date is regarded as ample compensation for months of labour; and to have proved that a particular painter was in a particular place in a particular year is almost a reputation in itself.

Of all the greatest masters probably none has been more abused than Rembrandt, and he has not only been abused but grossly insulted. His works have been stigmatised as low and vulgar, and his character has been loaded with calumny. Even his most unique and divine gift as an artist and as a poet, that power to so use light and shade as to touch the most profound and solemn of human emotions, has been turned against him as evidence of his unworthiness as a man and a painter. Yet, neglected as he was by his contemporaries, and despised as he has been since by many cultivated men, the force of his genius has been such that he has never been without admirers and followers, and that to-day he is almost universally acknowledged as one of those few greatest artists of all time whom we can count almost on the fingers of a hand. Even in his lifetime, when, after the glorious success of his prime, he had sunk into obscurity and great poverty, he obtained the commission for perhaps his greatest work, "The Syndics"; and connoisseurs had already begun to make collections of his etchings, which have been rising steadily in value ever since; while, if we want to have a proof of the widespread interest which is taken in him and his work at the present day, we have only to look at the beautiful book which is the subject of this review.

There is almost enough here to make this book interesting, without regard to Rembrandt's rank as an artist. In what other volumes can we find a whole human life so illustrated? Though there is no such thing as art which is entirely divorced from the character of the artist, it is seldom that a painter gives us more than a hint here and there of his personal history; but Rembrandt's œuvre is nothing else than an autobiography drawn with the etching needle and painted with the brush. Of that great quality of art, without which to some persons art itself can scarcely be said to exist—the power of idealising the human form so as to express beautiful or grand ideas in terms of physical loveliness and strength—Rembrandt possessed little or nothing. In the expression of emotion, in the dramatic effect of line, there were, on the other hand, few, if any, greater masters. But he adhered strictly to his model, finding in gesture and pose and grouping sufficient power to realise his conceptions, and in light and shade a magic wand which could transfigure the poorest type with majesty or pathos. Nor did he seek for his models: his wife, his mistress, his son, his friends, and last, not least, himself, were enough for him; and, like a small band of trained actors, they appear again and again in all the hundreds of little plays which his imagination devised. So in this delightful book, with its over three hundred faithful reproductions of his works, and the excellent narrative of M. Michel, we are able to watch his career as an artist and as a man, to live with him almost, from his youth to his death.

Of the manner in which the book has been produced, there is little to be said except in praise. The original text of M. Michel is so careful and comprehensive, so sensible and so sympathetic, that it must for long remain the most useful and popular of all books on this great subject; and Miss Simmonds's translation is competent and readable, its main fault being a too close adherence to the French—as when she describes Rembrandt's last studio as "naked and lamentable." Of Mr. Wedmore's labours as editor there is necessarily little shown, and he tells us in his somewhat meagre preface that he has "sought to efface himself"; but the English version of the book bears witness to his good judgment in the important matter of the illustrations. Those omitted from the French edition, though more in number, are in no way equal in importance or beauty to those he has added to Mr. Heinemann's beautiful edition, and we could have spared even more, to have gained (as we have) Lord Ilchester's "Portrait of Rembrandt" (1658) and the Glasgow's Corporation's "Man in Armour." COSMO MONKHOUSE.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

Tennyson and his Pre-Raphaelite Illustrations, by Mr. G. Somes Layard, is announced for immediate publication by Mr. Elliot Stock. The volume will contain, among other illustrations, a thumb-nail sketch of Tennyson reading "Maud," by Mr. Holman Hunt; and two drawings by Miss Siddal (afterwards the wife of D. G. Rossetti), which have never been published before; also, the original sketches for some of the wood engravings in the quarto illustrated edition of Tennyson's Poems.

It is proposed to hold an exhibition at Glasgow, in the galleries of the Institute of the Fine Arts, during July, August, and September of next year, to illustrate the history, progress, and life of that city. The exhibition will include: portraits and relics of local worthies; views and maps; early printed books and other historical literature; charters and MSS. relating to the city, the university, the churches, and the schools; models, &c., illustrating the growth of manufacture; and domestic articles, such as silver-plate, ornaments, dress, &c.

THE growing number of amateurs of book-plates may be glad to know that Messrs. H. Grevel & Co. have published in this country a quarto pamphlet containing twenty-five symbolic ex-Libris, designed by Mr. Clemens Kissel, of Mainz. Many of them are for libraries or booksellers; and the prevailing characteristic is that they shall all disclose the profession or pursuits of their owner. Considering that they are German, it is hardly necessary to say that the heraldic element is not omitted. They show throughout a graceful pencil, and we have been particularly pleased with some of the borders. The paper and printing are admirable.

THE STAGE.

THE Independent Theatre is certainly far better justifying its existence by its more recent policy of producing works by English writers of some admitted literary position, than by its earlier habit of presenting its supporters with translations of foreign work conspicuous, as a rule, not so much for ability as for depth of superfluous gloom. M. Zola's "Thérèse Raquin" was, of course, an exception; even as a comparatively juvenile and partially immature work of an accepted master, it deserved to be represented. The English play of modern life by Dr. Todhunter, which was offered a week ago, must be set down, like the performance of Mr. George Moore's "Strike at Arlingford," and that of Michael Field's yet more recently produced play—and, for the matter of that, though in a different fashion, like the performance of Webster's "Duchess of Malfi"—this thing must be set down, we say, as to the credit of the Independent Theatre. Of Dr. Todhunter's play, report affirms that it displayed far more literary ability, and more vigour in conception of character, than is customary on our stage, where, as has more than once been pointed out in the ACADEMY, the glamour of the footlights and the interest of actual representation are wont to bestow upon a piece, in the imagination of the spectator, a literary flavour which generally evaporates whenever the chance is afforded him of reading the piece, and so of comparing it, under fair conditions, with that which is admitted to be literary and distinguished in narrative fiction. Such comparisons generally disclose the circumstance that the first-rate contemporary dramatist is, so far as style, insight into character, and general literary quality are concerned, about on a level with the novelist of the third rank. To be accepted by the multitude he must, in many cases, employ absurd coincidences, avail himself of cheap effects, and mix a large alloy with the gold of his dialogue. Very few of the dramatists who have of late availed themselves of facilities for printing and publishing their plays have stood the test as well as one could have wished. Perhaps those who have stood it best have been those who have been (in, at all events, a portion of their work) the least ambitious—Mr. Pinero, to wit. His "Dandy Dick," avowedly a long farce and nothing more (save that, unlike the farce of old days, it is furnished with some very smart writing), is, in its own way, thoroughly agreeable fooling: one can read it with that smile of satisfaction which is rarer and more cordial than the smile of indulgence. "Dandy Dick" is the latest published of those plays by Mr. Pinero which Mr. William Heinemann has sent to us. Like the rest, it is accompanied with an introduction by Mr. Malcolm Salaman, which is instructive, frank, and pleasantly chatty. In the present case, Mr. Salaman agreeably reminds us of Mr. John Clayton's connexion with the piece. This much-regretted actor and amiable man took it into the provinces on what was destined to be his last tour. In it he was accustomed to be admirable, though, if we may ourselves pronounce upon the matter, not quite so irresistibly funny as in "The Schoolmistress." In the part of the Dean's horsey sister, one absolutely sees Mrs. John Wood as one reads the play. Never was a given character better designed for a given actress.

WE have received from Messrs. Lawrence & Bullen Theatrical Notes by Joseph Knight. This is a very modest name for a substantial volume, dealing in what is, for the most part, a very substantial way with the most notable plays and the most notable performances of a period beginning with 1874 and ending with 1879. It is reprinted from the Athenaeum, a journal to which, during well-nigh a generation, Mr. Knight has been a valued contributor. In writing upon theatrical matters he does not confine himself—so it is understood—to that paper; but it is probable that, being a weekly journal, the Athenaeum is the organ of his maturest and most considered judgments. Mr. Knight has, we are sure, done wisely in not reprinting all that he found it convenient to write during the five years with which his present volume deals; for much of the stage matter criticised must, on reviewing it many years later, have been discovered to be of evanescent interest. Important pieces and remarkable performances alone have a claim to be considered in a book which does not affect quite the amplitude of professed history, but which is yet a sufficiently comprehensive chronicle; and it is upon this principle that Mr. Knight has proceeded in making his selections. The years on which he has drawn afford him his records of many an admirable performance by the company of the Théâtre Français at the Gaiety, of that which, as we can well recollect, was the scarcely less perfect rendering of the "Danicheffs" at the St James's, with Madame Fargueil, Mlle Hélène Petit and M. Marais, and of a performance so avowedly epoch-making as that of Mr. Irving in "Hamlet." These things which we have mentioned are but samples. Many others, perhaps almost equally important, might have been cited by us in their place. The author of the volume commends himself for three chief reasons; first, fulness of resource in illustration; second, literary ease; third, and most important, tolerance and sanity of judgment. Mr. Knight, like Mr. May Thomas and Mr. Alfred Watson, is pre-eminently a critic of good sense. Avoiding, by reason of his own temperament as we surmise, the extremes of subtlety, he avoids just as certainly the pitfalls of the faddist. Accordingly, his pronouncements find general acceptance. It may be hoped that before long he will see his way to follow up the volume that is before us with further ones, which shall carry the story of his experiences down to the present time. Never eccentric, never doctrinaire, never purely, or even chiefly, theoretical, Mr. Knight's work makes smooth and satisfactory reading. But, indeed, how much excellent theatrical criticism exists at this day, or has been written of recent years in England! In America, one man may conceivably be more gushing, and another more simply smart. In France, one man is, it is allowed on all hands, more overwhelmingly and astoundingly influential, and another more studiously individual—we refer, of course, to M. Sorey and to M. Lemaître—who has indeed "le moi un peu facile"—but, whatever may be said against it, English theatrical criticism as a whole compares well with that of any other nation; and Mr. Knight is certainly one of the writers whose existence allows us to make such a statement with confidence.

MUSIC.

RECENT CONCERTS.

HANDEL'S "Jephtha" was performed by the Royal Choral Society at the Albert Hall, last Thursday week. Once every three years high Handel festival is held at the Crystal Palace; but apart from the performances of "Messiah" and "Israel" by Sir J. Barnby's choir, or an occasional performance of some other Oratorio, London, during the interim, pays but little heed to the composer. That "Jephtha," Handel's last, and in some respects greatest oratorio, should now have been given is a healthy sign, and there are other of his works lying in oblivion which are equally deserving of a hearing. Sir J. Barnby, encouraged by the success of "Jephtha," may turn again to the rich Saxon mine. But there is certainly room in London for another oratorio society, for the one at the Albert Hall, with its limited number of concerts and favourite works, the repetition of which seems almost a necessity, can, at best, do but little in the matter of revivals. Fetish worship of Handel is retrogression, and fetish worship of Wagner is narrow-mindedness; if only one listen in the proper frame of mind, each master can be enjoyed. A worthy revival of some of Handel's noble works would, we believe, meet with proper support. But to return to "Jephtha." The singing of the choir was magnificent. The rendering of the mighty choruses, "When his loud voice in thunder spoke" and "Cherub and Seraphim" were wonderfully impressive. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Henschel, Miss Janson, and Messrs. Lloyd and Norman Salmond, who all sang well. Sir J. Barnby conducted with his usual care and energy. M. Paderewski is undoubtedly the lion of the season. At last Saturday's Crystal Palace Concert he played his Polish Fantasia; and once again that characteristic and brilliant work for pianoforte and orchestra, as played by the composer and conducted by Mr. Manns, roused the audience to enthusiasm. But having recently written about this Fantasia, we will turn to the last Monday Popular Concert, at which the Polish artist appeared as composer, pianist, and accompanist. The glory achieved by the greatest pianists, though dazzling, is, at best, but of short duration; and Paderewski, like his great predecessors, Liszt and Rubinstein, seeks after the more lasting honours which await the successful composer. Six of his songs were sung by Mr. E. Lloyd. The poems of Mickiewicz tell, for the most part, of tears, sighs, kisses, of pain and death; and the composer has well reflected the romantic or melancholy moods of the poet. The first song is as quaint as it is sad—the spirit of Walther's Prelied seems to overshadow it—but it is in no sense an imitation of Wagner. No. 2, "The Piper's Song," with its wayward melody, and happy touches of realism in the accompaniment, is a delightful number. Of the other songs, "Pain have I endured" is full of tender fancy and feeling. M. Paderewski played all the accompaniments; and with the help of Mr. Lloyd, who was in excellent voice, these delicate little compositions were presented under conditions unusually favourable. The composer's thoughts are, perhaps, delicate rather than deep: the fanciful outlines, the harmonic colouring, so alluring, and the wonderful lights and shades which the pianist throws into the important though not unduly prominent accompaniments—all this prevents one analysing the music in cold blood. But whatever the actual strength of the unwrought stuff, the effect of the whole is artistic, pleasing, and not without good promise. M. Paderewski played, as solo, Weber's Sonata in A flat. In this work there is everything to tempt a great pianist: in every page breathes the soul of romance, while the technical difficulties provoke a virtuoso to put forth his best powers. There were a few affectations in the reading of the opening movement, and the tone of the melody in the Andante, at times, lacked warmth; but the rendering of the Sonata, as a whole, was magnificent, and such a performance has not been heard in London since Rubinstein's last visit. So far as clean execution is concerned, the Polish player surpasses the Russian. There is a certain natural tendency to over-refinement in Paderewski; and even in music like that of Chopin and Weber, which allows a player to give full rein to his individuality, this proves a disturbing and, frequently, weakening element. From this tendency Rubinstein is singularly free. The programme opened with Mozart's Quintet in G minor, admirably played by Lady Hallé and Messrs. Gibson, Hobday, and Whitehouse; and closed with Brahms's fine pianoforte Quartet in A.

J. S. SHEDLOCK.

MUSIC NOTES.

THE Christmas number of the Musical Times is devoted to the life and works of Handel. The illustrations include mementoes of Handel—such as his bookcase, watch, ring, &c.—numerous portraits, and facsimiles of MSS., including two pages of his holograph will.

T. & T. CLARK'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

NOW READY, post 8vo, price 10s. 6d.

DARWINIANISM: Workmen and Work.

By J. HUTCHISON STIRLING, F.R.G.S., and LL.D. Edin., Author of "As Regards Protoplasm."

PART I.—THE WORKMEN. [These are the Darwins—Grandfather, Father, and Son, each psychologically characterised at full.]

PART II.—THE WORK. [This the theory of Natural Selection minutely taken up and point by point gone into.]

"To say that these chapters abound in acute reasoning, telling examples, sharp criticisms, and brilliant flashes of wit, is only to give a very modest impression of their argumentative power.....Dr. Stirling has produced an amazingly clever book it is literally true that there is not a dull page in it."—Scotsman.

NOW READY, in 2 vols., 8vo, price 16s. net.

THE TRUTH of the CHRISTIAN RELIGION. By Professor

JULIUS KAFTAN, D.D., Berlin. Translated from the German, under the Author's Supervision, by G. FERRIES, B.D. With a Prefatory Note by Prof. FLINT, D.D.

DIVISION I. ECCLESIASTICAL DOGMA.

DIVISION II. THE PROOF of CHRISTIANITY.

"All will acknowledge the high intellectual power and rare spiritual insight and elevation by which the whole treatise is characterised.....It is eminently a work which the times require, and will be cordially welcomed by all students of theology."—Scotsman.

NOW READY, demy 8vo, price 10s. 6d.

THE EARLIEST LIFE of CHRIST ever Compiled from the FOUR GOSPELS: being "THE DIATESSARON of TATIAN" (circa. A.D. 160). Literally Translated from the Arabic Version, and containing the Four Gospels woven into One Story. With an Historical and Critical Introduction, Notes, and Appendix by Rev. J. HAMLYN HILL, B.D.

CONTENTS.—Introduction—The Diatessaron: Appendixes: Comparative Table of Contents—Analysis of the Gospels—Various Readings—Miracles in the Diatessaron—Parables—Allusions to S. John the Baptist—Movements of Jesus—Allusions to the Diatessaron in Ancient Writings—Dr. Zahn's Order—The Ephraem Fragments—List of Authors.

EDINBURGH: T. & T. CLARK, 38, GEORGE STREET:
LONDON: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & CO., LIMITED.

THE HAKLUYT SOCIETY.

Established for the purpose of Printing Rare and Unpublished Voyages and Travels. Subscription, One Guinea a Year. Two Volumes Issued Annually.

JUST ISSUED TO MEMBERS.

EARLY VOYAGES and TRAVELS in the LEVANT.—I. The Diary of Master

Thomas Dallam, 1599-1600. II. Extracts from the Diaries of Dr. John Covel, 1670-1679. With some Account of the Levant Company of Turkey Merchants. Edited by J. THEODORE BENT, Esq., F.S.A., F.R.G.S.

SHORTLY TO BE ISSUED.

THE VOYAGES of FOXE and JAMES to HUDSON'S BAY. 2 vols. Edited by MILLER CHRISTY, Esq.

Detailed Prospectus, with favourable terms of purchase of back volumes by Members and the Public generally, may be had on application to Mr. CHAS. J. CLARK, 4, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

CLEMENTS R. MARKHAM, Esq., C.B., President.
WILLIAM FOSTER, Esq., Hon. Secretary.

Now Ready.

THE OLD ENGLISH POPULAR MUSIC.

By the late WILLIAM CHAPPELL, F.S.A.

A New Edition, in Two Volumes, of the Popular Music of the Olden Time (under the above title).

A Collection of the best Song, Ballad, and Dance Tunes of England, from the earliest times to the end of the reign of George II.

With a Preface and Notes, and the earlier examples entirely revised

By H. ELLIS WOOLDRIDGE.

Demy 4to edition, bound in buckram. Two Vols., 2 gns. net.

Edition de Luxe, on large hand-made paper, bound in half vellum, limited to 100 copies, Two Vols., 4 gns. net.

CHAPPELL & Co., New Bond-street, and MACMILLAN & Co., London.

BOOKS FOR YOUNG PERSONS.

GAMES FOR ALL SEASONS: Consisting of In-door and Out-door Sports, Athletic Exercises, Fireside Amusements for Winter Evenings, Chess, Draughts, Backgammon, Riddle, Puzzles, Conundrums, Magic and Legerdemain, Fire-works, &c. Numerous Illustrations. Cloth, 2s. 6d.

PARLOUR PASTIMES: a Repertoire of Acting Charades, Fireside Games, Enigmas, Riddles, Charades, Conundrums, Arithmetical and Mechanical Puzzles, Parlor Magic, &c. Numerous Illustrations. Cloth, 2s. 6d.

Delightful Books for the Young, to render home happy.

London: JAMES BLACKWOOD & CO., Lovell's Court.

THE SOUTH DEVON HEALTH RESORT

At BISHOPS TEIGNTON is strongly recommended to all needing rest or pleasant change. It is one of the loveliest spots in the County, and has all the comfort and charm of a Gentleman's Country home. Sea and moorland air, beautiful Private Grounds, Lawn Tennis Courts, Turkish and other Baths.—For terms, testimonials, apply to C. F. CARPENTER, Bishops Teignton, near Teignmouth

A PENNY A DROP.

THE PURE OTTO OF ROSE

IN
Toilet "Vinolia" Soap and
"Vinolia" Toilet Powder,
NOW COSTS A PENNY A DROP.

New Edition, pp. 324, cloth, 1s., post free.

HOMOEOPATHIC FAMILY INSTRUCTOR.

By Drs. R. and W. ERFS. Describes fully and prescribes for general diseases.

London: JAMES ERFS & Co. (Ld.), 48, Threadneedle Street, and 170, Piccadilly.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.
TWO-AND-A-HALF PER CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS repayable on demand.

TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100.

STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.

For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums on deposit, and allows interest monthly on each completed £1.

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE
FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND
FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH.The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager

NATIONAL PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.
All the Profits are divided among the Assured.
FOR MUTUAL LIFE ASSURANCE. PROFITS ALREADY DECLARED
INVESTED FUNDS, £4,700,000. £4,600,000.
PAID IN CLAIMS, £8,800,000.
Endowment-Assurance Policies are issued combining Life Assurance at Minimum Cost with provision for Old Age.

48, GRACECHURCH STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier's List.

NEW BOOKS FOR PRESENTS.

- A ROMANCE of SKYE. By Maggie MACLEAN. With Illustrations by Lockhart Bogle. 5s.
- LIFE'S STAGES and LIFE'S PHASES: their Duties and Opportunities. By the Rev. JAMES STARK. 2 vols. elegant cloth, in box, suitable for presentation, 4s.
- PRINCE RUPERT'S NAMESAKE. By EMILY WEAVER. With Illustrations. 3s. 6d.
- THE WILFUL WILLOUGHBY. By EVELYN EVERETT-GREEN. With Illustrations. 3s. 6d.
- A GIFT of LOVE, and Loving Greetings for 365 Days. Love Texts with Quotations from choice Authors in Poetry and Prose, chosen and arranged by ROSE PORTER. Daintily bound in white cloth, gilt top, in box, 3s. 6d.
- BUNYAN CHARACTERS. By the Rev. ALEXANDER WHYTE, D.D., of St. George's Free Church, Edinburgh, 15th Thousand, 2s. 6d.
- FOR THE SAKE o' the SILLER: a Fife-shire Story of Forty Years Ago. By MAGGIE SWAN. With Illustrations. 2s. 6d.
- IDA CAMERON: an Australian Story. By MARGARET PARKER. Illustrated. 2s. 6d.
- AFTER LONG YEARS; or, Norman's Vow. By ELIA STONE. Illustrated. 2s. 6d.
- THE MUSGROVE RANCH: a Tale of Southern California. By L. M. BROWNE. 2s.
- SIFTED as WHEAT: a Story of Colonial and English Country Life. By Mrs. ELIZABETH NEAL. 2s.
- BUSH and TOWN: a Homely Story of the Pacific Coast. By CATHERINE KIRBY PEACOCK. 2s.
- SWIRLBOROUGH MANOR. By Sarah SELINA HAMER. 2s.

ANNIE S. SWAN'S

BEST BOOKS.

- THE GUINEA STAMP: a Tale of Modern Glasgow. Cloth extra, 5s.
- WHO SHALL SERVE? A Story for the Times. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.
- THE AYRES of STUDEIGH. Twenty-second Thousand. Boards, 2s.; cloth, 2s. 6d.
- MAITLAND of LAURIESTON: a Family History. Handsomely bound, 6s.
- SHEILA. Uniform with above, 6s.
- ALDERSYDE. Sixth Edition, with Six Illustrations, 3s. 6d. Cheaper Editions, 2s. and 2s. 6d.
- CARLOWRIE; or, Among Lothian Folk. Six Illustrations. 3s. 6d. Without Illustrations, 2s. 6d. Paper boards, 2s.
- DORIS OHEYNE: the Story of a Noble Life. Numerous Illustrations. 3s. 6d.
- THE GATES of EDEN: a Story of Endeavour. With Portrait of the Author by Faeel. 5s.
- BRIAR AND PALM: a Study of Circumstance and Influence. Six Illustrations. 5s.
- ST. VEDA'S: or, the Pearl of Orr's Haven. With Frontispiece. 5s.
- HAZELL AND SONS. Illustrated. 2s. 6d. Cheap Edition, cloth, 1s. 6d.; paper covers, 1s.

RELIGIOUS CLASSICS.

"Among the many 'Ideas' which are rapidly bringing Messrs. Oliphant, Anderson, and Ferrier to the front rank among publishers, none strikes me as more happy than the beautiful editions they are issuing of religious classics."—THE BRITISH WEEKLY.

- BUNYAN'S HOLY WAR. With Preparatory Note by Rev. ALEX. WHYTE, D.D., and Frontispiece by Mrs. Traquair. 2s. cloth extra.
- THE LETTERS of SAMUEL RUTHERFORD. Edited by Rev. ANDREW BONAR, D.D. New Library Edition, with Illustrations and Facsimile Letter. Large 8vo, cloth extra, 10s. 6d.
- MEMOIR and REMAINS of THE REV. ROBERT MURRAY M'CHEYNE. New Edition. By the Rev. ANDREW A. BONAR, D.D. With Additional Matter, Newly Engraved Portrait and Facsimiles of Writing. Demy 8vo, cloth extra, 5s.
- DR. JOHN KITTO'S DAILY BIBLE ILLUSTRATIONS. New Edition. Edited and revised by J. L. PORTER, D.D., LL.D. In 8 vols, crown 8vo, 28s. With Numerous Engravings. Each Vol. may be had separately, price 3s. 6d.

OLIPHANT, ANDERSON, & FERRIER,
London and Edinburgh.

KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRÜBNER & CO., LIMITED.

CHRISTMAS LIST.

The New Volume in "The International Scientific Series," entitled "The DISPERSAL of SHELLS: an Inquiry into the means of Dispersal possessed by Fresh-Water and Land Mollusca." By H. WALLIS KEW, F.Z.S., with Preface by ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, LL.D., F.R.S.; with Illustrations; is now ready at all Libraries and Booksellers. Price 5s.

FIRST EDITION NOW READY.

PROVERBS in PORCELAIN, to which is added "Au Revoir," a Dramatic Vignette. By AUSTIN DOBSON. With 25 Illustrations by Bernard Partridge. Small 4to, 5s. Athenæum.—"No one has a lighter and brighter, and firmer, but, at the same time, more delicate touch than Mr. Austin Dobson; no illustrator could more aptly follow and interpret PROVERBS IN PORCELAIN than Mr. Bernard Partridge."

WEIRD TALES from NORTHERN SEAS. From the Danish of JONAS LIE. By R. NISBET BAIN. With 12 Illustrations by Laurence Housman. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. A Selection from the stories of Jonas Lie, the celebrated Danish novelist, from "Troid," "Den Fremsynte," &c., with 12 Illustrations by the illustrator of "Jump to Glory Jane."

MAXWELL GRAY'S NEW VOLUME.

AN INNOCENT IMPOSTOR, and other Stories. By the Author of "The Silence of Dean Maitland," "In the Heart of the Storm," &c. With Frontispiece by Gordon Browne. Crown 8vo, 6s.

TENNYSON: Poet, Philosopher, Idealist. Studies of the Life, Work, and Teaching of the Poet Laureate. By J. CUMING WALTERS. With Portrait, demy 8vo, 12s.

THE BOOK of GOVERNORS. The Historia Monastica of Thomas, Bishop of Marga, A.D. 840. Edited from Syriac Manuscripts in the British Museum and other Libraries. By E. A. WALLIS BUDGE, Litt. D., F.S.A., acting Assistant-Keeper in the Department of Egyptian and Assyrian Antiquities, British Museum. Vol. I. The Syriac Text, Introduction, &c. Vol. II. The English Translation. 3 vols., demy 8vo, £2 net.

THE MATABELE WAR.

THE STORY of an AFRICAN CHIEF. Being the Life of Khama. By Mrs. WYNDHAM KNIGHT-BRUCE (wife of the Bishop of Mashonaland). With a Preface by EDNA LYALL. Fcap. 8vo, 2s.

THE ELEMENTS of HYPNOTISM. The Induction of Hypnosis, its Phenomena, its Dangers, and Value. By R. HARRY VINCENT. With 20 Illustrations showing Experiments. Crown 8vo, 5s.

THE COMPLETE POETICAL WORKS of PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY. The Text newly Collated and Revised. Edited, with a Memoir and Notes, by GEORGE EDWARD WOODBERRY. Centenary Edition. In 4 vols. crown 8vo, 24s. net. The most Complete Edition of Shelley's Poetical Works.

FOUR CENTURIES of ENGLISH LETTERS. A Selection of 350 Letters by 150 Writers, from the Period of the Paston Letters to the Present Time. By W. B. SCOONES. New and Cheaper Edition, large crown 8vo, 5s.

SECOND EDITION, REVISED.

THE QUATRAINS of OMAR KHAYYAM. Translated into English Verse by E. H. WHINFIELD. Large post 8vo, 5s. [Trübner's Oriental Series.]

LIVING ENGLISH POETS, MDCCCXIII. With Frontispiece by HERBERT RAILTON. Large crown 8vo, printed on hand-made paper, parchment or cloth, 12s.; vellum, 15s. A Companion Volume to "Living English Poets, MDCCCLXXII."

THE LIFE of Mr. GLADSTONE. Told by Himself in Speeches and Public Letters. Compiled by H. J. LEECH. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

RAJATARANGINÎ: a History of Kashmir. The entire work of Kahlana Pandita, Translated into English by J. C. DUTT. 2 vols. 8s.

SIXTH EDITION.

THE CONTRAST: Duty and Pleasure, Right and Wrong. Sewed, 6d.

GRISELDA: a Society Novel in Rhymed Verse. Elzevir 8vo, printed on Hand-made Paper, 5s.

HANNIBAL and KATHARNA: a Drama in Five Acts. By Lieut.-Col. J. C. FIFE-COOKSON. Crown 8vo, 5s.

PATERNOSTER HOUSE, CHABING CROSS ROAD.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 23, 1893.

No. 1129, New Series.

THE EDITOR cannot undertake to return, or to correspond with the writers of, rejected manuscript.

It is particularly requested that all business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., may be addressed to the PUBLISHER, and not to the EDITOR.

LITERATURE.

Lectures on the History of Philosophy. By G. W. F. Hegel. Translated from the German by E. S. Haldane. In 3 vols. Vol. I. (Kegan Paul & Co.)

In the course of his professional career Hegel frequently lectured on the history of philosophy, but never published anything on the subject. The three volumes that appear under that title in the collected edition of his works were compiled after his death by Prof. Michelet from a mass of manuscript material, comprising Hegel's own notes and those made by the students who attended his various courses of lectures. The result is a somewhat amorphous composition, containing many repetitions, much that is obscurely or elliptically expressed, and much that is of no permanent interest. Nevertheless, the work made an epoch in the history of philosophy, and probably nothing has since been published on the subject that does not bear traces of its influence. But, owing to this very fact, all that was valuable in Hegel's ideas has been absorbed into subsequent teaching, with the result that he has been far surpassed in this direction by writers more or less closely connected with his own school, such as Schwegler, Erdmann, Zeller, and Kuno Fischer. Although, however, even a Hegelian would hardly go to Hegel for accurate information about the older philosophies, it might have been expected that the master's lectures would be useful as an introduction to the system which professed to sum up in itself all previous systems by interpreting them as successive stages in the evolution of a single comprehensive conception. Unfortunately such is not the case. Hegel never is obscurer than when he uses the categories of his own logic as a clue to the speculations of his predecessors, while the latter are racked and distorted out of recognition by the treatment to which they are subjected. The uninitiated will find it pleasanter and more profitable to begin their study of the dialectic method with the Philosophy of History, the Aesthetics, or the Philosophy of Religion.

It may then be doubted whether the laborious task of translating the lectures into English was worth undertaking at all. None but persons who want to go rather deeply into the literature of the history of philosophy or into Hegel's own philosophy will care to open them, and on neither of these studies should one who is not a German scholar attempt to embark. At any rate, no one who cannot read German fluently should attempt to grapple with the present translation; as in all the abstruser parts it is unintelligible without the help of the original, while in the more popular parts it cannot be trusted to convey the author's meaning with accuracy. Hegel was not a Lessing nor a Heine, but compared with Mr. Haldane's English (?) his style is perspicuity itself. If not a profound scholar, he was, at any rate, the most cultivated man of his time; while blunders worthy of Ouida are foisted on him in these pages. Readers who have heard complaints about his obscurity will find their wildest expectations surpassed in such sentences as these (the subject is a comparison between the Daimonion of Socrates and the methods of divination employed by other Greeks):—

"Now, while with the Greeks judgment had the form of a contingency externally posited through the flight and cries of birds, in our culture we decide by an inward contingency, because I myself desire to be this contingency, and the knowledge of individuality is likewise a consciousness of this contingency. But if the Greeks, for whom the category of the contingency of consciousness was an existent, a knowledge of it as an oracle, had this individuality as a universal knowledge of which every one could ask counsel, in Socrates—in whom what was here externally established had become inward consciousness, as with us, though not yet fully, being still represented as an actual voice, and conceived of as something which he separated from his individuality—the decision of the single individual had the form of personality as a particular, and it was not a universal individuality. This his judges could not, in justice, tolerate, whether they believed it or not" (p. 434).

It would have been rather severe on the part of the judges to condemn Socrates for such an unintelligible reason. But a reference to Hegel's own words makes the analysis clear enough. At all times cases arise in which people have to choose between two alternative courses of action on purely accidental grounds. We, in our present stage of civilisation, make the choice a purely personal matter. A man says, "I do this because I like it; I choose to do this or that, and there is an end of the matter." Now, according to Hegel, that is leaving the decision to chance, just as much as the Greeks left it when they let themselves be guided by the flight of birds. Only, unlike ourselves, they projected the contingency outside themselves, and made it objective. Still, they preserved an obscure consciousness that their decisions were, after all, determined by a personal will. This will they also projected outside themselves, and conceived it under the form of a divine oracle. But the oracle was not only objective, it was also universal, for all men could consult it. Socrates made a near approach to our personal and subjective point of view by transporting the oracle into his own inner consciousness; but he did not complete the revolution, seeing that he represented the inward voice as something divine and distinct from his own individuality.

What I have most to complain of, however, is not that Mr. Haldane is too literal, but that he is not literal enough: to speak plainly, that too often he mistranslates his German. In the clear and eloquent Inaugural Address, Hegel is made to commit the "bull" of saying that "never have emptiness and shallowness overlaid" philosophy "so completely" (p. xii.). His phrase is "never have emptiness and conceit (Dünkel) so swum on the surface"—which at once calls up the appropriate image of an inflated bladder. We hear with surprise that "an opinion is in itself a universal thought, which is existent in and for itself" (p. 12)—just what the German text says that it is not. Equally surprising is it to be told that "Mind is that alone which is not implicit, which is finite and external" (p. 70); but Hegel again comes to the rescue with his genuine statement, that mind is implicitly or in itself only not that which is finite and external. Immediately after, and elsewhere, we find Endlichkeit ("finiteness") translated "finality"—a word associated not with limitation, but with purpose and perfection. The divine spirit "must be understood as that which permeates through [sic] everything, as the unity of itself and of a semblance of its 'other,' as of the subjective and particular" (p. 72). It is rather hard to be told that one must understand such a sentence. But leave our the last "of" and it becomes clear. "As the subjective and particular" stands in apposition to "other," and interprets it. Geist seems rather a stumbling-block to Mr. Haldane. He makes his author talk about "that which is received in evidence of mind" (p. 81), when what he says is "the essential truth contained in the testimony of mind" ("das im Zeugnis des Geistes enthaltene Wesen"); while, by a similar transposition, "die Natur des Begriffs das Innerliche ist," "the nature of the Notion is inwardness," becomes "the essence of the Notion is innate" (p. 210). Again and again (pp. 121, 122, 135) sinnig, which nearly answers to our word "thoughtful," is rendered "sensuous"—a meaning that it never bears.

Let us turn from these subtleties of philosophical expression to less technical and difficult subjects. Hegel mentions a certain method of interpretation as having been employed by "my friend Creuzer in his Symbolik." Mr. Haldane seems never to have heard of that famous book, for he translates, "It has become the work of my friend Creuzer in symbolism" (p. 82). Equally strange to him is the name of the historian Sanchuniathon, who becomes twice over "the Sanchuniathon" (pp. 85, 86). "The philosophy of modern times made its first independent appearance after the Thirty Years' War, with Bacon, Jacob Böhm, and Descartes" (p. 110). Does Mr. Haldane think, or does he suppose Hegel thought, that Bacon and Böhme lived, or that Descartes wrote his great works, after the Thirty Years' War? The German words are "seit der Zeit," "from the time." Hegel refers to the arguments written by Tiedemann for the Zweibrücken edition (better known to scholars as the Bipontine edition) of Plato. Not knowing what to make of this strange name, and finding a certain Brucker mentioned just before, our translator boldly reads "the Plato of Brucker" (p. 112). Speaking of Tennemann, Hegel complains that this historian reads modern ideas into ancient philosophy, "it is so easy to pervert what is old into something with which we are more conversant." This Mr. Haldane "oversets," as the Germans say, into "what is old is easily overthrown by something else more familiar to us" (p. 113)—which may or may not be true, but is not particularly to the purpose; and while Hegel contents himself with saying that by taking the opposite of Tennemann's statements we should get a more correct idea of Aristotle's philosophy, his translator puts simply "a correct idea" (ib.), thus grossly exaggerating the sarcasm. Elsewhere, when Hegel refers to his having hoped that Kreuzer would edit Heraclitus "more critically and with greater philological learning" than Schleiermacher, Mr. Haldane puts "more critically and with a knowledge of the language" (p. 281). Hegel was insolent enough; but even he would have hesitated to insinuate that the great translator of Plato did not know Greek. Passing over some minor misrenderings, we find ourselves suddenly pulled up by a mysterious promise put into Hegel's mouth that he "will treat of the conditions of life in reference to the outstanding philosophers." One has heard of outstanding debts, but what are outstanding philosophers? Perhaps they are the reverse of Esoteric Buddhists. Here, I am sorry to say, the original leaves us in the lurch, for it only promises biographical sketches of the principal philosophers. It is only fair to mention that the edition of Hegel's Lectures which I possess is not the same as that from which Mr. Haldane has made his translation. Mine is the first edition, dated 1833, his is the "second and amended edition" published in 1840. I hope some day to discover, with its help, what is the German word for "outstanding," and how far it is an amendment on merkwürdig. To proceed: in this translation I find the East called "the land of circumscription and of limitation where the spirit of subjectivity reigns" (p. 117). In my Hegel it is the West that is so characterised, and I venture to think this a better reading. On the same page occurs the following very awkward sentence: "That which we call Eastern Philosophy is more properly the religious mode of thought and the conception of the world belonging generally to the Orientals, and approximates very closely to philosophy." Is this an amendment, or is it not rather a mistranslation for "what we call Eastern philosophy is . . . a religious conception of the world which is very liable (der es sehr nahe liegt) to be taken for philosophy?" Surely not "lawlessness," as the translation has it (p. 119), goes with the absolutism of Eastern religion, but Rechtlosigkeit—the absence of individual rights as against the infinite. Again, for the unintelligible expression, "to that which is true this finite can only exist as immersed in substance" (ib.). I find a reading that gives "this finite [element] can only come to be true (zum Wahren werden) when absorbed in the [universal] substance"—words full of meaning to anyone who has the least understanding of Hegel's philosophy. Could this ardent lover of Greek literature have said that such poetry as Homer's "cannot last"? In my copy he says that it cannot arise among us, not for want of genius, for there is as great genius existing now (this was said in Goethe's time), but because we cannot interest ourselves seriously in the same subjects. He does not say, as Mr. Haldane puts it, that the amount of genius in Oriental poetry is the same as with us. "The Gymnosophists, who were excellent men, though people ventured to call them otherwise" (p. 126), is a false rendering for ". . . were pious persons, if, indeed, pious is the right name to call them by." Sehr verbreitet does not mean "very extensive" (p. 128), but "widely used." The Vedas do not say, according to Hegel, that "the soul must be distinguished from nature, and hence it will never come back" (p. 129), but "it must be separated from nature in order that it may not come back." Menschheit means "humanity," not "manhood" (p. 149). A virtuoso is not a "connoisseur," but the master of an art (p. 154). Hegel does not specify "the west of Magna Graecia" (p. 169) as "the scene of the greatest activity"—he knew the position of Croton, Sybaris, and Tarentum too well—but "Magna Graecia in the West." He does not say that a certain anecdote related by Diogenes Laertius "carries considerable weight," but that Diogenes tells it "with a very important air" (mit vieler Wichtigkeit); nor does he say that Aristotle speaks "most sympathetically" of the oldest Ionian philosophers (p. 174), but "for the most part in general terms" (meist gemeinschaftlich).

Sometimes an intelligent reference to the Greek sources would have helped Mr. Haldane to understand his German text better. For instance, Theon, as quoted by Hegel, does not explain why the Pythagoreans looked on the one as both odd and even by saying that "one posited as even, makes odd; as odd it makes even" (p. 214), but, more simply, that added to even it makes odd, added to odd, even. These same Pythagoreans did not call a circle a sphere (p. 229), nor does Hegel; sphere refers either to the central fire or to the earth, it is not clear which. Aristotle did not say that "they thought that solar corpuscles are soul" (p. 231), but "notes in a sunbeam," which is also what Hegel means by Sonnenstäubchen. Parmenides says nothing about "barriers of oak" (p. 251); Mr. Haldane was misled by Hegel's word eichelförmig, which means "acorn-shaped." Neither in Plato nor in Hegel does Socrates say to Hippocrates "we have a desire to go on" (p. 359), but "let us go [to see Protagoras]." If Mr. Haldane had consulted the Symposium he would have seen that "erhielt dass er dem Alcibiades gegeben wurde" meant "succeeded in having it given to Alcibiades," not "maintaining that it was given" (p. 390). Alike in the Greek of Sophocles and in Hegel's version Antigone talks of "confessing" her error, not of being "made to know" it (p. 441). Aristippus would not have given a very lucid answer to the question "as to how an educated man differs from an uneducated" had he said, as Mr. Haldane makes him say, "that a stone would not fit in with another"

(p. 472). Clearly the translator could not make head or tail of Hegel's phrase, "in this way that one stone would not be sitting on another." Now in Diogenes the whole thing becomes quite clear. According to him, Aristippus said that when an educated man goes to the play he does not sit like a stone on a stone—he shows an intelligent interest in the performance. This sarcasm, by the way, shows that Johnson was much nearer the truth than Macaulay in their respective estimates of the average Athenian citizen. Another Cyrenaic, Hegesias, we are told, was "not allowed to teach the Ptolemies of the time," &c. (p. 478). This, perhaps, would have been no very serious loss to the philosopher in question; but in reality, as Hegel, following Diogenes, rightly puts it, Hegesias was prohibited by the then reigning Ptolemy from continuing his pessimistic lectures—so many people committed suicide after hearing them.

Less flagrant, but equally careless and characteristic, are the following slips. On p. 238, "manly and womanly" should be "male and female;" p. 280, "if Heraclitus's turn of mind was also Oriental," should be "even though Heraclitus's turn of mind was Oriental;" on the same page, "until modern times" is absurdly put for "until a late period of antiquity;" p. 323, "Lædæmon . . . obtained the leadership, which we find it held among the Argives in the days of Troy" is a mistranslation, involving a gross historical blunder, for ". . . which, as we have seen, was held by the Argives," &c.; p. 388, instead of such senseless expressions as that "Cicero . . . who . . . had the belief that philosophy should yield itself up, and hence succeeded in attaining to no content in it, boasted of Socrates," &c., we should read "Cicero, . . . who believed that philosophy should make concessions, and therefore achieved no substantial result by its study, praised Socrates for," &c.; p. 393, for "the great men of every time," read "of that time;" p. 394, for "Pericles alone lived with the sole end of being a statesman," read "Pericles educated himself for the sole end," &c.; p. 404, for "the Socratic method of so-called deference, with its eloquence," read ". . . of condescension, with its verbosity;" p. 427, for "the happy Alcibiades," read "the frivolous Alcibiades," and (ib.) in this sentence, "by chronological considerations some have tried hard to refute the fact that Aristophanes' representations had no influence on the condemnation of Socrates," read "to establish (erweisen) the fact." Does Mr. Haldane, then, not know when "The Clouds" was acted? The list of blunders might be considerably extended, but perhaps instances enough have been given.

The present volume ends with the minor Socratic schools. I had intended to say something about Hegel's treatment of some important subjects, notably the Sophists and Socrates; but my whole available space has been otherwise employed. Mindful of Kingsley's injunction, I have done the work that was nearest—and very dull work it has been.

ALFRED W. BENN.

Literary Recollections and Sketches. By Francis Espinasse. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

MR. ESPINASSE, although a Frenchman by blood, was born in Edinburgh, and, after a long absence, returned to that city to edit the now defunct organ of the Conservative party. Yet the least satisfactory portions of a very entertaining, well written, and valuable book are those in which he alludes to his native city. Edinburgh, in fact, is of value to Mr. Espinasse mainly as providing him with a sentimental overture. In his childhood he saw Sir Walter Scott, and he might have seen Clarinda! When, after a long period of years spent chiefly in London and Manchester, Mr. Espinasse returned to Edinburgh, he met the leading men of letters still left to keep up the reputation of the old city. So he gives pleasant sketches of several of them: such as Alexander Smith, the poet; William Veitch, the Scottish Porson, whose Greek Irregular Verbs is still an authority on its subject; Andrew Wilson and Patrick Alexander, two men of very genuine though dissimilar talent, who somehow never quite did justice to their powers; John Blackwood, the canny and conservative, though by no means unambitious, publisher; and James Hannay, of whom more hereafter.

Mr. Espinasse will be read chiefly for what he has to say of the Carlyles and of "a segment of their circle," including notabilities of such widely different character as George Henry Lewes, Lord and Lady Ashburton, Venables, Thomas Ballantyne, Monckton Milnes, and Miss Caroline Jewsbury; and because he says what he has to say in a clear, direct, restrained style. Mr. Espinasse came to know Carlyle well, not only through his being, like so many young men of that period, bothered about his soul, but also because it fell to his lot to help Carlyle in the British Museum—between whose chief Panizzi and Carlyle, by the way, there subsisted an almost life-long feud. Once admitted within the Carlyle household, Mr. Espinasse became a frequent and welcome guest, no doubt because he appears to have been an attentive listener. He was evidently also a careful observer; and his judgments upon many things that have puzzled critics and, above all, censors of Carlyle, are uniformly sensible. Here, for instance, is a boisterous Iliad in a nutshell:

"It was a trying exchange: that of the perfect stillness and pure air of the Dumfriesshire solitude, for our smoky and foggy Babylon, with its noises to which he was morbidly sensitive, and its social excitements which he could not altogether avoid, unless he was to remain in Chelsea, as at Craigenputtock, a lonely hermit. 'Ill-health has cast a funeral pall over my life,' he said to me soon after I made his personal acquaintance. With better health he might have been, if not happy—one cannot well conceive Carlyle a happy man—at least not so irritable, with considerable benefit to himself and others. Much in Carlyle and in what flowed from him was, as Goethe said of Schiller, 'pathological'!"

Mr. Espinasse never takes Carlyle too seriously, except perhaps when he finds his friend expressing with aggravations his own view of persons and personages for whom he has no special liking, such as

George Henry Lewes. And when he reproduces any of the Cheyne Row characterisations, he gives the impression that he knows the necessary number of grains of salt to take them with. Besides, some of the very worst of these are here proved—so much, indeed, was suspected by all who did not lose their heads when Mr. Froude published the first and inaccurate edition of the Reminiscences—to have been but momentary impressions. Mr. Espinasse does well to demonstrate that Carlyle was not always dyspeptic, contemptuous, or unjust, but that he occasionally deviated into kindly, though incisive, common sense, as when he said, perhaps for his own consolation quite as much as for the benefit of his listener, "The heart that remained true to itself never yet found this big universe finally faithless to it." But perhaps the most interesting portion of the Carlylian section of this book is that in which Mr. Espinasse tells of the relations between the Carlyles and the Ashburtons. Lady Ashburton does not improve on closer acquaintance—she must, with what Lord Houghton correctly described as her "natural rudeness of temperament and despotism of disposition," have been as much of a trial in society as Mme. de Stiel herself; but Lord Ashburton does. He seems to have erred on the side of self-effacement, and of facile generosity, wherever Carlyle was concerned. Mr. Espinasse tells us a remarkably good story of his dealings with Thomas Ballantyne, a Scotch adventurer, who appears to have had a positive genius for starting good schemes and failing to carry them out. On one occasion Ballantyne borrowed £50 from Carlyle, to aid him with one of his numerous newspapers. He then proceeded to Lord Ashburton as the Maecenas of the circle, and informed him of Carlyle's marvellous generosity, without indicating the amount of the loan. By so doing, Ballantyne secured a fresh loan of £500, out of which he had no difficulty in paying Carlyle's £50. Another interesting member of the Carlylian circle to whom, unless I am mistaken, Mr. Espinasse introduces us for the first time, is William Maccall, who was for a period a Unitarian minister—"a profoundly devout man, though not of the orthodox type"—but who, when he was introduced by Sterling to Carlyle, was doing his best as a sort of literary adventurer, with a turn for philosophy. Of him Carlyle said, "I have a great regard for poor Maccall; there never was a man who went about with any dignity on so little money."

Among the secondary literary figures on Mr. Espinasse's canvas are James Hannay and George Henry Lewes. Hannay was a brilliant Bohemian—a Bohemian in his own eyes, that is to say—who ought, if circumstances had been favourable, and if he had worked harder, to have made a much more considerable figure in literature than he did: who ought, in fact, to have been a second Smollett. George Henry Lewes gains, though not as a man, on the further knowledge of him that we secure through this book; although Carlyle did not take kindly to him, and Mr. Espinasse follows Carlyle, as indeed he does in almost every case in which personal like or dislike is involved. Lewes was superficial: being every inch a journalist, he could hardly be otherwise. But he had unlimited capacity for work, as Carlyle allowed, and he had a sincere enthusiasm for ideas. Yet he is best known from his association with George Eliot; and of her we have certainly not as much in this volume as we should have liked. What little we have, too, is not specially definite or interesting. We have to be thankful for such very small mercies as—

"According to Lewes, during their rambles in German woods and forests she taught him Hebrew, not that he might be able to read the Old Testament in the original, but that they might talk to each other without being understood by the polyglot landlords and waiters of continental hotels."

Lewes was quite capable of playing a practical joke, and is there not a suspicion of something of that sort in a such a story?

Mr. Espinasse's book contains a large amount of interesting information about many personages outside of the Carlylian "segment" and his own journalistic set. Thus one learns a good deal that is—or, at least, appears—fresh in connexion with Disraeli and the starting of John Murray's newspaper, The Representative. Disraeli's description to Mr. Espinasse of Mr. Gladstone as "a man of splendid abilities, but hampered by his Church liaisons," is worthy of remembrance, if only as an offset to Carlyle's famous and vehement, if not vitriolic, invective against the same statesman. Although the book has none of the features of a formal autobiography, the author has much that is valuable to tell, in an unostentatious way, about the British Museum, the organisation of literature, Manchester men, and other subjects of a kind too readily dismissed as interesting only to students of sociology.

It is plain that the proofs of this volume have been rather hurriedly read. On p. 7 there is a curious, confused, and confusing account of a visit to Lord Jeffrey's house at Craigcrook, near Edinburgh. The visit is represented as having taken place a few years before Jeffrey became a judge. Yet in the drawing-room he saw a presentation copy of the French Revolution inscribed "To Lord Jeffrey from T. C." As a matter of fact, Jeffrey succeeded Lord Craigie as a Lord of Session in 1834, and Carlyle's French Revolution was published in 1837.

WILLIAM WALLACE.

TWO BOOKS FROM CORNWALL.

The Delectable Duchy. By Q. (Cassells.)

In a Cornish Township, with Old Vogue Folk. By Dolly Pentreath. (Fisher Unwin.)

A CERTAIN fascination has always belonged to the countries of the West. Nor is it hard to understand. The sentiment which has found immortal expression in the famous passage in "Faust,"

"O dass kein Flügel mich vom Boden hebt," . . . and in Wordsworth's "Stepping Westward," is common to humanity. That sentiment of exaltation and longing, combined with the sense of mystery, of something "golden and remote," created long ago the legend of the Hesperides and the Fortunate Islands of the Greeks. For us, in England, this poetry of the West is strengthened by the accident of history, which has peopled our most western counties with men of Celtic race, for whom romance is not yet past: gifted with the "divine laziness" of which "Q." tells us, and other qualities equally foreign to the practical Saxon. Here that indefinite charm, associated with the Abendland, is in a way made actual and tangible. So, for lovers of Cornwall (and who that has been in Cornwall does not love it?) these two Cornish books are specially welcome.

From "Q." we know that we may expect good things and not be disappointed. But Dolly Pentreath is, apparently, a new writer: let us take her volume first. The period chosen is the early youth of the present century. A kind of story runs through the book, but the story itself is not the main interest; it is merely a pleasant and convenient mode of introducing us to the various characters of Vogue parish, their ways of speech and manner of life. The narrator throughout is Mr. Robert Rowe, the parish clerk. He tells his tale in his own way, racy with Cornish idioms; but dialect proper we are happily spared. The choice of such a mouthpiece has its disadvantages: incongruities are almost unavoidable; and sometimes one comes across sentences that do not seem to ring aright. It is especially noticeable in the narration of the robbing of Lord Respry by the French refugee. In all this, however, there is an artlessness that has its own attraction. Some of the episodes, especially that which tells how the local wizard was consulted as to the whereabouts of Anthony Bullen's lost sheep, are delightfully told. The book is anything but pretentious; but if a first volume, it is a promising one.

The Delectable Duchy, a collection of short stories, is something altogether different in scope and method. Some of the same superstitions are treated in both books: men of "Troy" figure in both; but I will do neither writer the injustice of comparing them.

Short stories are becoming more and more in vogue, and the writers of short stories seem daily to get more clever. Perhaps their cleverness is a little too obvious, their art a little too conscious. At any rate, one has a lurking want of satisfaction after reading most short stories. In their dread of saying too much, and their terror of "a moral," these clever writers often say too little; and meaning to be suggestive, become merely ineffective. Probably the short story is a form of literature that requires an inborn and congenial aptitude. And this, if any man, "Q." seems to possess. His successes are not few and rare; in his latest volume, at any rate, nearly all of the twenty-five stories are as good as they can be. Noughts and Crosses were admirable, indeed; but some of them compelled admiration for their cleverness without making us wish to read them again. The best of these newer stories, however, not only make us wish to re-read them, they make us actually do so.

And when the book is closed they remain with us. For The Delectable Duchy is in every way an advance: "Q." has widened his range, deepened his vision, matured his style. There are no longer echoes of assimilated masters. Now and then, it is true, more especially perhaps in "Woon Gate," in "The Paupers," in "The Drawn Blind," one is reminded of Mr. Thomas Hardy; but in no way as by an imitation. The art of either is inimitable; and possibly the resemblance is really in the likeness of subject and of method—not in the view of things, nor in the actual writing. There is no need to compare The Delectable Duchy with the Wessex Tales; but the present writer must confess to often finding his preference with "Q."

If anything strikes one more than another in this collection, it is its extraordinary range. From "Daphnis," a story of the old superstition of love-charms, alive with deep, suppressed passion, we pass to the humour, touched with poetry and, in its conclusion, with a kind of tender irony, of "Cuckoo Valley Railway"; or from the delicious fun of "St. Piran" to the profound pathos of "Woon Gate" and "A Golden Wedding," or the strange suggestiveness of "A Corrected Contempt." "Love of Naomi," the longest story in the book, is not quite so convincing a success; probably because the motive, that of "Enoch Arden," is not fresh to us; and Long Oliver's share in the plot seems a weak point. And yet how excellently are brought together William Geake, the grave, conscientious man of religion, overthrown by his great passion, and Abe Bricknell, the returned first husband, his wits half gone from shipwreck and suffering, with his "silly smile"! Mr. Stevenson could not have bettered the latter's description of what happened to him in the open boat and on the island. More characteristic of the author is such a story as "Mr. Punch's Understudy," of which to reveal the motive might spoil something of its readers' pleasure. In fine, this a book to buy, to read, to remember, and to be grateful for.

LAURENCE BINYON.

TWO NEW HISTORY BOOKS.

History of England and the British Empire: A Record of Constitutional, Naval, Military, Political, and Literary Events from B.C. 55 to A.D. 1890. By Edgar Sanderson. (Frederick Warne.)

A First History of France. By Louise Creighton. (Longmans.)

MR. SANDERSON'S work, as he states in his Preface, is intended "for the use of learners in colleges and schools," and for "students who may be preparing themselves for examinations in British history." This may be taken to constitute an admission that the volume before us belongs to the species of "cram-books." It is useless to indulge in general denunciations of this species of composition. Though it may be questioned whether in an ideal state of things there would be any place for them, yet, so long as there is any demand, they will continue to be manufactured, and it would be absurd to judge them by a severe literary standard. What may be required from the writers of these manuals is clearness and accuracy. Mr. Sanderson lays claim to the latter quality, and states that his record is "based upon the best authorities." But it is generally the case that the results of the most recent research take some time to filter down into compendiums of this kind; and so it is with the earlier portions of this work.

Mr. Sanderson's account of early British ethnology might have passed muster twenty years ago, but can hardly be considered as adequate at the present day. He shows no signs of having consulted Prof. Rhys's excellent little volume on Celtic Britain, an omission which certainly is unfortunate. He seems unaware of the evidence which has led most authorities to believe in the existence of a pre-Celtic population during historical times, and does not even mention the almost certain fact that large parts of Wales and the South West were inhabited by Celts of the Goidelic branch for centuries after the Christian era. Instead of this, he gives us some highly questionable speculations, now well-nigh exploded, about the identity of the Cymry with the Cimmerians, and makes a positive statement, which there can be little doubt is erroneous: "Belgae from Gaul, a people of German blood, also settled on the south and east coasts." It is in the last degree improbable that there were any Teutonic settlers in Britain before the Roman invasion.

There are not so many errors in Mr. Sanderson's account of the Roman occupation, though he follows without hesitation the traditional view of the names and boundaries of the Roman provinces, and gives the old-fashioned map of the divisions, in apparent ignorance of the fact that many authorities who have investigated the question have grave doubts whether we really possess any authentic information on the matter. The usual view, in fact, rests largely on the Itinerary of Richard of Cirencester, which is a proved forgery. Mr. Sanderson again ventures on a rash statement when he says, "to the Roman we may distinctly trace our municipal institutions." There are still some who maintain this theory; but it is a pure hypothesis, with no evidence in its favour and much against it. The number of towns which can be proved to have been continuously inhabited from Roman times is very small, and in no case can the slightest shred of proof be brought to show a continuity of civic constitution.

With reference to Mr. Sanderson's maps, it is to be observed that absurd titles are more than once prefixed to them, making the same map do duty for a long period during which there were great changes of boundary. The most glaring instance of this is to be found in the map showing the old English kingdoms, which is headed "Britain, 500-1066 A.D.," as if there had been no alteration between these dates. This map, in fact, represents the state of things at neither the one epoch nor the other. It would have been desirable to have two or three maps showing the gradual process of English conquest; but at any rate such a blunder as is implied in the heading should be corrected. A similar mistake is made later on in a map designated "France in 1360 and till 1453," showing the arrangements made by the treaty of Bretigny, which only continued in force for nine years.

Mr. Sanderson sometimes falls into strange slips when he gets a little off his regular field. When speaking of Alfred's translation of Boethius, he calls the Gothic king, by whom the philosopher was imprisoned, "the Emperor (!) Theodoric," which shows an amazing lack of comprehension of general European history.

Mr. Sanderson is not always sound in his etymologies. He evidently belongs to the school who are too ready to find Danes or Scandinavians everywhere. In a list of Danish names of places he mentions "Denbigh, in North Wales, and Tenby, in South Wales." As regards the former town, this seems to be an original supposition of our author's; as regards the latter, the derivation has been given by some previous writers, but it is certainly erroneous. There can be no doubt that the two names are really the same, and that the word is genuine Celtic.

Mr. Sanderson's account of the old English constitution and government is correct on the whole, though he makes one or two disputable statements. He too hastily assumes the early existence of the system of surety known as "frank-pledge" in its developed form, which Bishop Stubbs has shown cannot be clearly discovered before the Conquest. It is still more inaccurate to say of the English counties that "the present number existed at the time of the Norman Conquest." Surely Mr. Sanderson must know that Lancashire as a shire is much later than Domesday, while Cumberland and Westmoreland formed no part of England in 1066.

The authorities consulted by Mr. Sanderson do not appear to have included Mr. Freeman's Reign of William Rufus. Certainly his account of this important period is very inadequate. He shows no clear comprehension of the legal innovations of Flambard, and makes no mention of the great extension of the English power in South Wales, which forms one of the most striking features of this time. It evinces, too, that the continental relations of the Norman kings have been very superficially studied, when so prominent and noble a figure as Count Hélias is vaguely spoken of as "one of the chief barons of Maine." It is astonishing to find an absurd local legend about the burial of William Rufus gravely related at the present day:

"The body was carried to Winchester for burial on the cart of a charcoal-burner named Purkess, who lived at the village of Minstead, where his descendants were still residing in the memory of the present writer."

Is Mr. Sanderson really so ignorant of the history of nomenclature as to imagine that anyone in the eleventh or twelfth century bore the name of Purkess as an hereditary surname? Such a blunder is enough to dispose of the imagined pedigree, even if so-called local tradition were not in nine cases out of ten comparatively modern invention.

Coming to the next two reigns, we have some antiquated talk about the "usurpation" of Henry I. and Stephen, which is the more surprising as our author appears to recognise the elective character of the old English kingship, and admits the lawfulness of the election of Harold, which was certainly more unprecedented than these later cases. His ideas about the fusion of Normans and English seem decidedly hazy. He writes in several places as if he adhered to the exploded notion that they continued distinct and hostile races till the thirteenth century; and he shows no sign of any acquaintance with the distinct statement of a well-informed writer of the time of Henry II., that the two nations had become so intermixed that it was impossible in general to distinguish them. When we consider the amount of intermarriage that took place from the first, it is certainly a great exaggeration to say that the Normans regarded the union of Henry I. with an English wife "much as a Southern planter, in the slavery-days of the United States would have looked on a marriage between one of his class and a coloured girl of African origin."

As we come down to later times, Mr. Sanderson's narrative becomes more accurate, but does not exhibit any special power; and we still note at times a want of familiarity with the most recent researches. He seems to have no other idea of the Salic law but that it was a rule excluding females from the crown of France; and in his account of the causes of the Hundred Years' War, he says nothing of the continual interference of the French king in Aquitaine, which furnished the strongest justification of the war on the English side.

Coming to one of the most critical and difficult periods of our history, the reign of Henry VIII., it is hardly credible that Mr. Sanderson cannot have studied the most valuable modern work on the subject, the exhaustive prefaces of the late Prof. Brewer to the State Papers, afterwards reprinted in two volumes; but yet he seems strangely oblivious of much that the professor brought to light. He appears to think that the divorce question was first heard of in 1527, and to have some belief that the king was really influenced by conscientious scruples, showing no knowledge of the darker mysteries of the transactions which have been revealed by Mr. Brewer's researches.

The history of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries is on the whole better done than the earlier portions of the work, and is free from any errors of importance, though it cannot be said to display any particular signs of originality. Exception, however, must be taken to a statement with reference to the naval war of 1812, that the American frigates "were really line of battleships cut down." This assertion has evidently been taken from partisan writers of the time, and has been conclusively refuted by Mr. Roosevelt in his impartial work on the subject.

In his concluding chapter, Mr. Sanderson gives a sketch of Indian and colonial history, which is fairly well done. He follows most recent investigators in taking a favourable view of the conduct of Warren Hastings. Whether this tendency is altogether a healthy one, may be open to question. There is no doubt that the picture of Hastings drawn by his enemies was a gross caricature, and that many of the charges against him are greatly overstated in Macaulay's brilliant essay. Still, after making all allowances for the difficulties of his position, it is certain that Hastings was guilty of acts which cannot be justified except by a very loose code of morality, and his defenders seem much too ready to adopt the principle that the end sanctifies the means.

Mrs. Creighton's work is one of much less pretension than Mr. Sanderson's; but it is decidedly superior in accuracy, and forms probably the best elementary history of France that has yet been published. Its style is clear and simple without being childish, and its facts are remarkably correct for a book of this description. It is, perhaps, undesirable to use the name of France as early as the time of Clovis; but this is a small matter when the essentially German character of the Frankish monarchy is fully recognised. It must be a slip when such a thorough Teuton as Pepin is spoken of by the modern French title of d'Héristal. It is refreshing, indeed, to come across such an excellent account of the Salic law as the following passage, from which Mr. Sanderson might have learned something:

"Philip wished to make his right to the throne clear; so the lawyers discovered for him an old law of the Salian Franks, which said that a woman could not inherit their lands. They professed that this law ought to be applied to the crown of France, with which, of course, it had nothing to do; indeed, it was not observed anywhere. Henceforth it was known as the Salic law, according to which no woman might reign in France."

We have only space left to bestow a word of commendation on Mrs. Creighton's lucid and impartial account of the French Revolution, and the modern history of the country.

R. SEYMOUR LONG.

NEW NOVELS.

Diana Tempest. By Mary Cholmondeley. In 3 vols. (Bentley.)

Miss Stuart's Legacy. By Flora Annie Steele. In 3 vols. (Macmillans.)

What Necessity Knows. By L. Dougall. In 3 vols. (Longmans.)

The Swing of the Pendulum. By F. M. Peard. In 2 vols. (Bentley.)

A Third Person. By B. M. Croker. In 2 vols. (White.)

The Shadrach and other Stories. By Frank R. Stockton. (W. H. Allen.)

Elinor Fenton. By David S. Foster. (Lippincotts.)

A Latter-Day Romance. By Mrs. Murray-Hickson. (Bliss, Sands & Foster.)

Stories from Garshin. Translated by E. L. Voynich. (Fisher Unwin.)

INTERESTING as Diana Tempest is in Miss Cholmondeley's novel, the book might with equal justice have been called "Colonel Tempest," or "John Tempest"; for she is not more prominent than the colonel, her weak and sinful father, or her cousin, the strong, manly, and distinguished John, who stands between the colonel and the Tempest money and estates. Knowing John not to be his brother's lawful heir, the colonel conspires with one Swayne, alias anything else, and makes a bet of £10,000 that the said estates will never descend to himself. Swayne's agents then set to work, and many and miraculous are John's escapes by flood and fire and field. The picture of Colonel Tempest's weak hankering after the money, of his shrinking from the horrible means he has used to get it, and of his vain efforts to cancel the bet, is an admirable piece of work. So are the sketches in society, notably of "the Thesinger marriage," of Lord Frederick Fane, that Stygian mentor of youth, and of Archie Tempest, the handsome, empty, conscienceless son of the colonel. "Di" herself is a charming picture of a young woman who knows her world and the sinfulness thereof, thinks for herself and judges men, and remains as sweetly womanly as any piece of pink-and-whiteness who of old time "beaded urn-rugs" and thought at male dictation. In fact she is a woman, whereas the pink-and-whiteness aforesaid was but a pink-and-whiteness after all. Miss Cholmondeley is evidently a close observer of men and manners. Her people move before your eyes, and talk in a life-like way which all novelists do not achieve. The whole setting of the story, indeed, is bright and natural.

A novel which gives an actual rendering of Indian life—as Miss Stuart's Legacy does—without being in the least degree an imitation of Mr. Rudyard Kipling, cannot be otherwise than refreshing. This vivid picture of the jumble of nationalities in India—English, Hindu, Mohammedan, and so on—has so much reality of form and colour, that one unhesitatingly accepts it as true. The civil and military life, the native and commercial life, are no less clearly distinctive than the characters to whom special parts are given in the story. Of these latter there is a large and varied company—there are the innocent Belle Stuart, her worthless but idolised father, the Eurasian stepmother, the heroic but human Philip Marsden, the long-headed John Raby, the impetuous Dick Smith, that oily scoundrel the Lala, Shunker Dās, the old Mohammedan with his fierce religious and family feelings, and the unhappy Kirpo, about whose several fates the reader's interest is well kept up. In the unwinding of the really excellent plot, and especially in the climax (which is no climax, but a natural consequence), the writer has followed, not the conventions of story-telling, but the developments of actual life. The heroine is not always seated on the inaccessible peaks of an uninteresting purity, nor is the hero always immaculate of temper, while even the villain, if such he be, has a pleasing capacity for domestic and other kindred virtues. Among the most vivid scenes are a native street row of religious origin, in which Belle's life is in danger, and the final scene of treachery and superstition, in which John Raby loses his life and Philip Marsden (almost) his self-respect.

It has been said that "Falsely Accused" would be a suitable title for any melodrama, and the title Miss Dougall has given to her book would suit many another novel equally well. For the heroes and heroines of fiction are mostly fate-led puppets, whose life and actuality are the joint gift of author and reader. "Necessity knows no law" is the general motto of What Necessity Knows; but there is shown no specially overbearing goddess. The characters enjoy as much freedom as the exigencies of a story permit, and their rewards are meted out to them in the end as is usual in novels. Miss Dougall's manner, though excellent in its way, is hardly the typical manner for her matter. The latter deals with strange and stirring events; the former is even and composed. The scene is laid in the province of Quebec. The people comprise the brothers Trenholme (sons of an English butcher), one of whom is in the Church, and would gladly suppress his origin, while the other persists in following his father's trade; a family of English settlers, containing the heroine; a sprinkling of Canadian society and Millerites or Adventists, who go up a mountain to meet Christ at his coming; and last, but by no means least, Eliza Cameron, the strange, powerful, undeveloped girl who reverses all your ideas of her so oddly in the last chapter. These personages and their interests are so brought together as to form a story, but the fusion is not quite complete, and hence the reader's interest is divided. Of the general merit of the book there can be no doubt. There are strong situations in it, excellent bits of description, and really clever character-drawing.

The Swing of the Pendulum is written in Miss Peard's always pleasing and eminently well-bred style. It is the work of a gentlewoman who has sympathies with human nature. A party of admirably behaved people (except in one instance, where Wareham falls decidedly below his own standard) travel through Norway, and their joys and sorrows develop amid the fine Norwegian scenery, the descriptions of which are not the least excellent part of the book. Anne Dalrymple is a beautiful, intelligent, incomprehensible heroine, of the type that is apt, in the sequel, suddenly to bestow herself upon neither the first hero nor even the second, but on a man who has no pretensions to that title at all, and is obviously only provided that she may have somebody to fall back upon in the inevitable moment of pique and misunderstanding. As you turn the last page you are entirely uncertain whether to congratulate Wareham or to condole with him. If he marries Millie, as you are led by your knowledge of novel-nature to suppose he will, condolences and congratulations will, perhaps, both be in place. There is a secondary plot—it is hardly to be called a sub-plot, for it is practically unconnected with the principal one—which deals with the loves of a very happy and healthy-minded young lady of noble birth and a guileless clergyman; and this does not end with a note of interrogation.

In spite of questionable English and punctuation too bad for words, there is a great deal of "go" in A Third Person. The story, not a very elaborate one, is told with readiness and vivacity by a writer who unmistakably believes in herself and her people. The lady of sixty, who is younger than her daughters, and rides, flirts, smokes, and cheerfully owns to a chestnut toupee, is an exceedingly distinct and entertaining personage; so is General Yaldwin, the retired hero, who lives only to collect stamps and wreak his wrath upon the head of his beautiful grand-daughter. The grand-daughter herself and the hero are of a more commonplace type, as also is Clara, the feminine villain, who squints according to her temper, tells lies according to the occasion, and dresses according to Emerson's "master-monkey at Paris." The incidents are very slight, the motives entirely conventional, but the "go" aforesaid carries you through the two volumes in a very short time.

Of Mr. Stockton's collection of stories there is not much to be said. Perhaps no book of his could be dull, but here he is by no means at his best. "The Shadrach," the story which gives its name to the volume, is suggestive of the experiences of a certain Mr. Bultitude in a book of Mr. Anstey's. Perhaps the best of the stories is "Asaph," in which the wiles and shrewdness of the person so named are well contrasted with the weakness of Thomas Rooper, the wooer of Asaph's sister. Indeed, this is the only one that contains any notable character-study. The book, as a whole, is not quite worthy of the author of Rudder Grange and The Lady or the Tiger.

Mr. Foster's Elinor Fenton is excellent reading. With a good story to tell he wisely keeps strictly to the lines of it, though the wild and beautiful forest country in which the scene is laid is described in many a passage of really fine writing. Nor does he depart from the beaten track in his characters—his hero is strong, beautiful, fearless, and absolutely good; his heroine truly feminine in the old sense, though brave and much given to roaming in wild and dangerous places. Silas Pelton, who is a kind of obscure Providence till he explains himself in the last few pages, is a fine old fellow; while Rachel Fenton, Elinor's cousin, is probably obliged to behave as she does to further the plot. But Mr. Foster should have given his readers another glimpse of her, after her hopes have been thwarted. The hidden house, with its luxurious furniture and exquisite meals, might have belonged to the "Arabian Nights," and the reader cannot to the end account for that furniture, seeing that the house was only to be approached by step ladders, slippery rocks, and dangerous passes. The fidelity of Butler is also a thing not met with in everyday life; but what would be the use of being a novelist if you could not make your own humanity?

A Latter-Day Romance is the story of a woman's mistake; but does not Mrs. Murray-Hickson herself make a mistake when she attributes that of her heroine to her agnostic and rationalistic training? There is no other sign of such an influence. The story, which is a sad one, is written with evident knowledge of human life. Jack's blindness and pathetic faith are very touching, but one cannot feel much sympathy for the heroine. Perhaps, however, this is due to the inadequate presentment of the man for whom she neglects and forgets her husband. Subordinate characters there are practically none, and the absence of them is a good point in a story of so slight a scope.

Miss Voynich's translation of Stories from Garshin is prefaced with an introduction by M. Stepniak, who says much that is interesting and remarkable about Garshin. The stories are mainly of the battlefield. They tell in a calm, simple, tragic way the horrible experiences of the Russian soldier on march and in action. Through them all breathes an unquestioning acceptance of things as they are, and silent obedience and submission under suffering, ill-usage, and insult. Over each broods the spirit of absolute unrelieved tragedy; yet one can imagine Garshin to be, in his own tongue, as M. Stepniak describes him, "this subtle, poetic, merciless, yet irresistibly sympathetic author."

GEORGE COTTERELL.

GIFT BOOKS.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. have this week completed the publication of their "library edition" of Lord Tennyson's Works, which began so long ago as 1888, by the issue of a ninth volume, entitled Demeter and other Poems. It includes the contents of three volumes, as originally published: "The Foresters," that which took its name from "Demeter," and the posthumous volume which took its name from "The Death of Oenone." Like the other volumes of this edition, it has a frontispiece—a photographic reproduction of the portrait by Mr. G. F. Watts at Trinity College, Cambridge, which is notable for the lofty dome of the head. And it also has two indexes: one of titles, and the other of first lines. The latter is particularly useful, as a few of the short pieces have no special headings. These nine well-printed and green-coloured volumes will probably long remain the standard edition of Tennyson's complete works, though we may hope someday to have a critical edition—such as Prof. Dowden's of Wordsworth—giving the dates of composition and the various changes introduced in the earlier poems. Whether those pieces ought to be included which the author himself withdrew is another matter, though the question seems already answered in the reprint of Poems by Two Brothers.

THE Clarendon Press usually issue at this season some "gift-book," made specially attractive by the use of their Oxford India paper. This Christmas it is a complete copy-right edition of the Poetical Works of Longfellow, in various forms. The most expensive of these is in six 32mo volumes, in a case; but we are ourselves inclined to prefer the single volume, crown octavo, which is of astonishing thinness for nearly 900 pages and a sufficiently strong binding. There is a table of contents, but no index of first lines.

We may mention here that the Oxford Press have also sent us two miniature editions of the Bible, likewise printed on India paper, in the type known as "brilliant." One of these, though it consists of 1216 pages, besides maps, and is bound in limp morocco, is only five-eighths of an inch thick and weighs less than three ounces. The weight of the other is augmented to three and a half ounces, by the addition of references. We can well believe that these Bibles are the smallest of their kind ever produced.

FROM Messrs. Eyre & Spottiswoode comes a sort of stout letter-case, which is found, on opening, to contain two volumes, a Prayer Book and Hymns Ancient and Modern, besides two tablets and a pencil, for use in taking sermon notes. In this case, again, India paper is used, though of a perceptibly thicker quality.

A Bitter Debt: a Tale of the Black Country. By Annie S. Swan (Mrs. Burnett-Smith). (Hutchinson.) The critical reader cannot think that Mrs. Burnett-Smith is seen at her best in A Bitter Debt; but the more indiscriminating devourer of fiction will doubtless find the story interesting, though even he will probably suspect weakness somewhere. The owner of a factory in the Black Country is enamoured of one of his employes, a lovely and of course "superior" girl, to whom, however, his attentions are not acceptable. This Mr. Allkins engages a manager who happens to be a gentleman, and he also falls in love with Pris, and presses his suit more successfully. The young man, Hardress, is arrested for a crime of which Allkins has it in his power to prove him innocent; but, cur as he is, he tells Pris that, unless she promises to marry him, the evidence shall be withheld. Of course Pris promises—they always do in a story—and this is her "bitter debt," which she conscientiously pays, while Hardress consoles himself by marrying somebody else. The use of this worn-out expedient is one weak point; but a very much weaker one is the quite incredible change which passes over Allkins, who after his marriage becomes a gentle, magnanimous, and almost chivalrous soul. Love may do much, but it does not alter the texture of a man's nature; and this absurdity spoils the book.

A Golden Age. By Ismay Thorn. (Blackie.) We knew what to expect from the author of Bab, and we have got it. This "story of four merry children" is distinguished by its charming realisation of the quaintness and oddity and merriness of children, by its romantic, almost sentimental, pathos, and by its crisp, fluent style. The affection of old Mr. Polwyth for his little godson we have called almost sentimental, because, in spite of the tenderness and delicacy with which it is described, it does not seem quite true to reality when compared with the picture of the sayings and doings of the four merry children. We were a little doubtful of the accuracy of little Pol's lingo at first starting, but before we had finished with him he had talked us into a belief in it. Ismay Thorn's youngest children are the most delightful and successful. We are much pleased with Mr. Gordon Browne's four illustrations.

The Breaking of the Clouds. By Lady Dunboyne. (Nisbet.) Most of Lady Dunboyne's books seem to us to be surcharged with pathos; indeed, we might venture, perhaps, a stage further, and say that they are decidedly melancholy reading. However, if they are tearful, they must also claim to be well planned and written, as well as thoroughly interesting and irreproachably orthodox. Her present work may be described as conceived and executed in her ladyship's favourite vein, and few who take up the book for an hour's entertainment will be satisfied until they have devoured its last page. The gist of the story, so far as its greatest source of interest is concerned, turns on the conversion of an amiable agnostic, Dr. Mansfield, to an orthodox and rather ecclesiastical Christian. The authoress shares with other writers of her sex a determined but unfortunate penchant for converting kindly and unselfish pagans from their deficiency of speculative dogmas to doctrinal Christianity. Dr. Mansfield might have been a member of the Ethical Society; and, so far as practical Christianity is concerned, there would be no great difference between his conduct and that prescribed by the Sermon on the Mount. But this Christianity of mere life and conduct does not satisfy apologists like Lady Dunboyne, who must needs make the religion of Christ embrace the whole wide area of the dogmatic evolution of the Church of the last eighteen centuries. The mode in which such conversions as those of Dr. Mansfield are accomplished rather remind one of such books as Leslie's Easy Methods with the Deists, &c., in which the only easiness is the extreme facility with which the designation is applied and the desired aim accomplished. The illustrations, we may add, are inferior. Those who glance at the frontispiece, with its representation of a girl fainting in a wholly impossible attitude, will need no further attestation of this criticism.

Bush and Town. By Catherine K. Peacock. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.) The subject of this book is sufficiently indicated by its title, which is still further explained by its secondary title, "A Homely Story of the Pacific Coast." It gives, in a fashion so very homely as to be in danger of the imputation of crudeness, the trials of a couple of young emigrants who, immediately after marriage, betake themselves to the banks of the St. Lawrence. The trials which customarily fall to the lot of young people not over well prepared for encountering them are told with a good deal of sympathetic knowledge. Of plot or scheme, the book possesses nothing. It merely records, as artlessly as a diary might, the privations they are fated to meet, and the chronicle ends as all such stories ought—in victory and prosperity. This is really all that can be said, by way either of criticism or comment, about Bush and Town. It details experiences which we suppose might be met with by the hundred, though why these obvious stories and diarist annals should be "written for those that come after" is a question not altogether easy to answer.

Twilight: a Story of Two Villages. By Anette Lyster. (S.P.C.K.) This somewhat disjointed narrative claims to be a "story"; but so far as a connected, consistent tale, harmoniously framed together, is concerned, we may complain of it in the words of Canning's Knife-Grinder: "Story, God bless you, there is none to tell, sirs." At all events, if there is, the authoress lacks the gift of story-telling. The narrative begins in the earlier years of the third decade of the present century, with the return of a Waterloo veteran to his native home in the North of England. There are, as we might expect from the practised hand of the authoress, certain graphic touches, sometimes of character, sometimes of scenery; but the story, such as it is, is especially commonplace. Not less so, for that matter, are the characters, which are needlessly and obtrusively vulgar. Indeed, we must add that the book is in places very unpleasant reading. It leaves on the mind the impression of a harsh lurid picture, in which human beings are depicted as closely resembling savages with scarce a single attribute of humanity, to say nothing of such higher stages as culture, refinement, and religion. Doubtless the aim of the author is good, but the road that leads to it might have been a trifle cleaner; and it holds true of literary journeys, as well as of religious pilgrimages, that, although the courses that terminate in certain desiderated havens and homes of rest may be needlessly miry, yet a wise and sensitive guide will mostly find it expedient to pass sicco pede over such dreary and dispiriting paths.

Stella. By Mrs. G. S. Reaney. (Bliss, Sands & Foster.) There is much that is interesting and much that is original in Mrs. Reaney's story, but she does not succeed in convincing us of Stella's reality. The girl's character does not grow naturally and gradually. When first introduced she is unnecessarily impudent to her governess, and we get no clear account of how this tendency is cured. We have, perhaps, no right to complain that Stella's impertinence is not funny; and therefore we will only say generally that the book fails in spite of its cleverness because it is unrelieved by humour, and a picture of childhood without humour must be wrong. The most striking chapter in the book is that containing the episode of Mary Elizabeth. In itself the episode is beautiful and dramatic, and Mrs. Reaney tells it admirably. The illustrations are poor.

Doing and Daring. By Eleanor Stredder. (Nelson.) There can be no doubt of the interest of Eleanor Stredder's "New Zealand story." A vivid account is given us of the sudden eruption of Mount Tarawera, and of the earthquake, the rain of mud, and the storm of steam and scalding water which accompanied the phenomenon. The characters are literally, as well as metaphorically, in hot water up to the last page of the story. The strange natural phenomena are appropriately mixed up with much graphic description of Maori character and custom. The book is interesting because it conveys the impression of retelling personal experience; but it is very confused, as if it were written by some sufferer from the eruption who remembered the occurrence in a series of bewildering and disconnected glimpses. The English lad Edwin, and the Maori lad Whero, are the heroes of the tale; and their characters stand out with some sort of distinctness from a confused background of colonists and captains and "rabbiter." But on the whole the book fails as a story, and succeeds only as a description of the terrors and miseries of the great earthquake.

Clear as the Noon Day. By Ethel Penrose. (Jarrold.) There is a great pleasure in reading a story which, by the time the second chapter is reached, we recognise as an old friend; and the pleasure is enhanced if the old friend behaves as we expect, so that we close the book with an "I told you so" of satisfaction. The old story, of course, must be told with spirit and brightness, but if this is done, the older the story the better. Bruce is the naughty boy who breaks the precious vase and keeps dark, while Paul, the good boy, nobly bears the blame without peaching. Ethel Penrose tells this old tale with unusual sprightliness and dexterity, and her book will be appreciated by all sorts and conditions of lads and lassies. The illustrations, by Edith Somerville, are unequal—always original, occasionally excellent, but sometimes excruciating.

Rex Singleton; or, The Pathway of Life. By Mrs. Lysaght. (Wells Darton, Gardner & Co.) There is a fair amount of Irish humour and pathos of the quieter sort in this book. The plot is, perhaps, a little "jumpy," and the winding up in the interests of happiness is a little hurried and not quite natural; but the contrast between the good Rex and the eminently naughty and impulsive Denis is well brought out, and Quin, the teacher, who injures and all but ruins his own prospects through tipping, but who fortunately proves capable of self-reformation, is really sketched in such a manner as to win the hearts of all readers.

Westward with Columbus. By Gordon Stables. (Blackie.) Dr. Stables has chosen a subject for his latest tale which can scarcely fail to be popular with all his young readers. It has those elements of fact and romance which appeal to everybody, and on the whole the author has taken good advantage of the occasion. Of course, Dr. Stables is not a Charles Kingsley, with whom he somewhat unadvisedly challenges comparison by his title. But he is a good, honest, manly, and straightforward writer, whose own experience of the sea may be regarded as some sort of qualification for his task. He has well brought out the noble and religious character of his hero, without indulging in superfluous sentiment. The tale flows on with no great rapidity, but with much steadiness, until the whole of a strange, eventful history is unrolled, and the reader arrives at the end of his journey not very tired, but not very sorry that it is all over.

Prisoner Among Pirates. By David Ker. (W. & R. Chambers.) Boys will find this an interesting and exciting book. The table of contents tells of pirates, of dangers and escapes, and of fearful deaths. The hero is Jack Narborough, who became one of England's greatest admirals. The author pleads guilty to "having slightly infringed historical accuracy"—Narborough is made to serve under Blake instead of under Sir Christopher Mungo—but he rightly adds that "no English reader will be likely to quarrel with the change." Cromwell and Milton are happily introduced in connexion with Blake's expedition against the Dey of Tunis. Fighting is not the whole subject-matter of the book; Jack loves a certain Dora Steel, who eventually becomes Lady Narborough.

The Boy Patriot. By Oliver Dyer. (Hutchinson.) One of the charms of this book, at least in the eyes of many boyish readers, will be the fact of its being a "real" story. It is a biography, not a work of fiction—being a life of Andrew Jackson, who rose from poverty to be President of the United States. During recent years indeed, Jackson has been overshadowed, even as a "shining example" to young America, by Lincoln and Garfield. But in some respects he was more of a "natural man" than either. There is a good deal also in his life—with its love affair and its duels—of the sort of picturesque romance which fascinates boys. Besides, in America, at all events, Jackson will not be soon forgotten, as being the soldier who conquered the British at New Orleans. Altogether, Mr. Dyer has not only had an excellent story to tell, but has told it admirably. This is a book which is sure to be popular.

Out of it. By A. F. Radcliffe. (Fisher Unwin.) It is not at all surprising that delicate little Otto felt not a little "out of it," when he first came to live with his nine vigorous young cousins in Scotland, after a childhood spent alone with his father in Jamaica. It was some time before he came to understand them and their boisterous ways; but he got on splendidly with his aunt, who was a lazy, languid person and evidently preferred Otto to her own children, because he could wear "claret velvet suits and falling lace collars" without spoiling them. Poor little "Out of It"! we are afraid he is not so interesting to us as he seems to have been to Lady Katharine. And though of course it is very sad, we are not inconsolable when he dies—we won't say how, for it would be a pity to disclose the one exciting event of this rather silly story.

Enid's Victory. By Cecilia S. Lowndes. (S.P.C.K.) Perhaps if Enid were not vouched for by the S.P.C.K. we should, without hesitation, accept her as true to life. True to life on one side she certainly is. She is a merry, brave, affectionate girl of ten, delightfully drawn, and we fall in love with her at once. She is, indeed, so lifelike and childlike that we find the religious language frequently put into her mouth almost unnatural. That the language is possible in the case of a child ten years old we readily admit, and we have no objection to a child of ten being religious. But the child's thoughts and sayings about religion will be childish, particularly if she is such a thorough child as Enid. When Enid begins to be religious she seems suddenly eight or nine years older. Mr. F. Barnard's single illustration is clever.

The Bridge of Beauty. By Mrs. Linnaeus Banks. (Sunday School Union.) This is a story of the childhood and youth of William Edwards, the builder of the Bridge of Beauty (Pont-y-Pridd). It is, as the author says, a fiction founded on fact. The father of the hero was drowned while attempting to cross the River Taff, in the autumn of 1721. The widowed mother brings up her four children, one of whom turns out to be the builder of the three bridges across the Taff. The childhood of William is not a very happy one—the proverbial ugly duckling is never appreciated; but all ends well. Even the landlord's wicked agent meets with his deserts. George Whitfield is incidentally brought in. The illustrations are unusually good; and the book can be recommended for both boys and girls.

Golden Gwendolyn. By Evelyn Everett Green. (Hutchinson.) This does not aspire to be a novel, but it is a story in which love plays a great part. The fortunes of Gwendolyn "looking like a princess" will be read with delight by every girl. The author has a happy knack of creating a winsome heroine, and those who read her books, as each Christmas comes round, have always a treat in store. The volume is most tastefully got up, and the illustrations are above the average.

Queen of the Daffodils. By Leslie Laing. (Blackie.) This is a capital story for girls. The writer thoroughly understands children, and the picture of Dr. Maynard's family is drawn to the life. The character of Lady Diana, the strange cousin who comes to share their home, is a delightful study of girlhood. The descriptions of High School life, and the bitter prejudice and jealousy which find their way even thither, are graphically given. There is an excellent moral in the story, which is not spoilt by being too obtrusive. The author takes up his cudgels against snobbism, and with good effect.

Sketches of Christian Life in England in the Olden Time. By Mrs. Rundle Charles. (Nelson.) The title sufficiently explains the object of this latest book by the author of The Schöenberg-Cotta Family. Each chapter deals with some period of the religious history of England, from the second to the fifteenth century; from Druidism to Lollardism, from Alban, the proto-martyr, to Lord Cobham. Badby, the tailor who was burnt at Smithfield in 1409, represented

"hundreds of humble, thoughtful men of plain Saxon sense underlying their devout Christian aspirations, who, like him, 'believed in the Omnipotent Trinity, but could not receive the twenty thousand gods in the consecrated hosts on all the altars in England.'"

Badby suffered because he refused to worship as God a thing "created by the priest." These short extracts are fair specimens of Mrs. Charles's theology. The stories are told with some dramatic power, especially the account of the meeting of the Druid, the Jew, and the Christian miner in the light of the bonfire under the shadow of the mysterious Logan Rock, in Cornwall.

NOTES AND NEWS.

THE Cambridge University Press has undertaken to publish a complete translation of the Pali Jātaka, or Buddha Birth-stories, under the general editorship of Prof. Cowell. The work is expected to fill seven or eight volumes; but at present only five volumes of the Pali original have appeared. Each volume of the original is to be represented by a volume of the translation. The first volume, now in the press, has been prepared by Mr. R. Chalmers, of Oriel College, Oxford. It will contain the forty stories given in Prof. Rhys Davids's discontinued translation, and also the remainder of the first volume of Prof. Fausbøll's edition of the Pali text. The second volume is translated by Mr. W. H. D. Rouse, of Christ's College; and the third by Mr. R. A. Neil, of Pembroke College, and Mr. H. T. Francis, under-librarian of the University Library.

"THE MANXMAN" is the title of Mr. Hall Caine's new story, which commences forthwith in the Queen, and also in a syndicate of newspapers in the provinces, Australia, and America. The story is a modern one; and, according to those friends of the novelist who have read what is already written, the new work will excel "The Deemster" in strength and popularity. Mr. Fred. Pegram, who was specially engaged to illustrate the story in the Queen, has spent the autumn in the Isle of Man, in order to acquaint himself with the scenes and characters depicted.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. will publish next month the charge recently delivered by Archbishop Benson to the diocese of Canterbury, at his third visitation, under the title Fishers of Men.

SIMULTANEOUSLY with the report of the Royal Commission on Labour, we understand that Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein & Co. will publish, in their Social Science Series, a work entitled The Labour Commission: an Epitome of its Evidence.

MESSRS. BARNICOTT & PEARCE, of Taunton, invite subscriptions for a work entitled Chapters in the Early History of the Church of Wells, by the Rev. C. M. Church, sub-dean and canon residentiary. The book will consist mainly of documents from the cathedral archives hitherto unpublished, throwing light upon the history of the cathedral under Bishop Robert (who founded the constitution of the chapter, began the present building, and gave the first charter of free trade to the city), Bishop Reginald de Bohun (whose episcopate has been almost passed over by previous writers), Bishop Savaric (who brought the monasteries of the diocese in subordination to the see), Bishop Jocelin, and Bishop Ralph of Shrewsbury, (in whose time the controversy between the two rival cities of Bath and Wells was finally settled). The total period covered is from 1136 to 1333. The illustrations will include several facsimiles of seals, a representation in colours of a twelfth-century crosier, and plans and drawings of the cathedral church at various stages of its history.

Lessons for those who are, and those who would be, Christian Workers, with an introduction by Mr. Hay Aitken, is announced for immediate publication by Mr. Elliot Stock.

MR. FRANKFORT MOORE's latest novel, A Gray Eye or So, has already gone through four editions in three-volume form, and a fifth edition is in the press.

A SWEDISH translation, by Emile Kullman, of Mr. Joseph Hatton's By Order of the Czar has just been published at Stockholm.

NEXT year, 1894, will be the jubilee of the first appearance in print of Maurice Jokai, whom all Hungarians acknowledge to be their greatest writer. A committee has been formed at Buda-Pest, under the patronage of the Archduke Joseph and Cardinal Vaszary, to bring out a complete edition of his works, including some of his unpublished writings, in one hundred volumes. And it is also proposed to celebrate the occasion in this country by a dinner, to be held on January 9, at the Holborn Restaurant, with Mr. Francis Stockinger, the Austro-Hungarian Consul-General, in the chair. The secretary of the English committee is Mr. Louis Felbermann, 15a, Clifford-street, New Bond-street.

AN appeal has been made on behalf of Mr. Henry Vizetelly, who is at present prostrated by a serious and painful illness. The object of the appeal is to raise a sufficient sum of money to enable him to be admitted as a paying patient at a hospital or home, where he may obtain the careful nursing that his case requires. The list of subscribers already includes many well-known names in journalism and literature; and further contributions will be gratefully received by the editor of the Graphic.

THE forthcoming (January) number of Romania will contain an article by Mr. Paget Toynbee on Brunetto Latino's obligations to Solinus in the Tresors. In the course of a detailed examination of the borrowed passages, Mr. Toynbee has been able to throw an interesting light on Brunetto's methods of compilation, and also to make several emendations in the French text of the Tresors.

A NOTEWORTHY discourse on "La Enseñanza entre los Musulmanes en España" was delivered by Don Julian Ribera at the opening of the University of Zaragoza for the course of 1893-4. It has now been printed at Zaragoza (Coso, 108), and forms a quarto volume of 99 pages, with x pages of Arabic appendices. The subject has been little treated of, and never before so thoroughly as by Señor Ribera.

THE FORTHCOMING MAGAZINES.

MR. KARL BLIND will contribute a history of "The Rise and Development of Anarchism" during the past fifty years to the January number of the Contemporary Review, giving some personal recollections of Bakunin and other leaders of the movement.

THE forthcoming number of the Asiatic Quarterly Review will contain an article by Mr. Bertram Mitford, entitled "Side-lights on the Matabili Question."

New serial stories will appear in Temple Bar, during 1894, by Mrs. Anne Edwardes, Miss Broughton, and Miss F. M. Peard.

Blackwood's Magazine, for February 1894, will contain the opening chapters of a new serial story, by Dorothea Gerard.

AMONG the contents of the January number of the Century will be: a paper on Sir James Simpson's introduction of chloroform as an anaesthetic, by his daughter, Miss Eve Blantyre Simpson; a posthumous article of James Russell Lowell on "The Function of the Poet"; an appreciation of Mr. Andrew Lang by Mr. Brander Matthews; and some personal recollections of George Sand by Mme. Th. Bentzon (Mme. Blanc).

THE January number of the English Illustrated Magazine will contain the following articles: "New Year's Day in Paris," by Emily Crawford, with illustrations by Mr. R. Caton Woodville; "The Witch's Castle," by Carmen Sylva (the Queen of Roumania); "Indian Viceroy," by Sir Edwin Arnold, illustrated from photographs; "Over the Edge of the World," by Mrs. Steel; and "The Philosopher in the Apple Orchard," by Anthony Hope.

AMONG the articles in the January number of the New Review that we have not already mentioned will be: "The Future of Humour," by Mr. H. D. Traill; "The Preaching of Christ and the Practice of His Churches," by Count Lyof Tolstoi; and "French Plays and English Money," by Mr. William Archer.

Two serial stories, "Peter's Wife," by Mrs. Hungerford, and "The Daughters of Job," by Darley Dale, will be commenced in the January number of Belgravia.

Two serial stories, "A Bad Lot," by Mrs. Lovett Cameron, and "A Girl's Folly," by Annie Thomas, will be commenced in the January number of London Society.

THE January number of the Monthly Packet will contain: an article on "Dreams," by Mr. Andrew Lang, and a short story by Miss Jane Barlow, in addition to the commencement of Mr. Weyman's novel, "My Lady Rotha," of Mr. Butler's papers on Dante, and of Mr. Cosmo Monkhouse's articles on the National Gallery.

Young England enters upon its fifteenth year under new editorship. Among the leading features for 1894 will be an historical tale, relating to the Darien Scheme of 1698, by John Bloundelle-Burton, entitled "A Gentleman Adventurer"; and a romance of the Solomon Islands, by K. M. Eady, entitled "The Secret of the Fire Mountain"; Mr. Edward Whymper will relate the story of his ascent of Cotopaxi, and of the Matterhorn; and among other contributors will be C. J. Hyne, Commander C. N. Robinson, J. Arthur Thomson, Ascott R. Hope, Robert Leighton, and Mrs. Henry Clarke.

Nature Notes, the organ of the Selborne Society, will in future be published by Mr. Elliot Stock.

THE Admiralty and Horse Guards' Gazette will henceforth be published by Mr. A. P. Marsden, at 27 Southampton-street, Covent Garden. The new editor is Major W. Yeldham, late of the Eighteenth and Tenth Hussars, who has had previous experience in journalism.

THE monthly issue of the Investors' Review, which commences on January 1, will be published at its own office, 29, Paternoster-row.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

TO A PISTOL FROM WATERLOO.*

Pistol hanging on the wall,
Can you still the sounds recall,
Sounds that meant an Empire's fall,
Long ago at Waterloo?

Was the hand that bore you there
French or English? When the air
Rang with shouts of triumph, where Was he who carried you?

Did he live to tell the tale,
How the English did prevail,
How the might of France did fail,
On that day of Waterloo?

Did his dying hand seek there,
"Only (for) a woman's hair,"
With a murmur'd word of prayer?
Hand too weak to carry you.

Or perchance upon his breast,
Closely still a portrait pressed,
Of the one whom he lov'd best:
Love than death can be more true.

Pistol hanging on the wall,
Ah, what memories you recall,
Love could triumph over all,
Even there at Waterloo.

FLORENCE PEACOCK.

* Many of these who fell at Waterloo were found to have lockets on their breasts, with hair in them, and some of these lockets contained the portraits of women.

SELECTED FOREIGN BOOKS.

GENERAL LITERATURE.

- ALEXANDRE, ARNOLD. Histoire populaire de la peinture: Ecole française. Paris: Renouard. 10 fr.
 BERTOL-GRAVILL, et BOYER, P. Le livre d'or des fêtes franco-russes. Paris: Ollendorff. 5 fr.
 HAUSBATH, A. Martin Luthers Romfahrt. Nach e. gleichzeit. Püßerbuche erläutert. Berlin: Grote. 2 M.
 JAHRE, dreissig, aus dem Leben e. Journalisten. 1. Bd. Wien: Hölde. 4 M.
 KOBELL, L. v. Unter den vier ersten Königen Bayerns. München: Beck. 10 M.
 LISZT'S F. Briefe. 3. Bd. Leipzig: Breitkopf. 4 M.
 MARTIN, F. Afrikanische Skizzen. München: Lindauer. 2 M. 50 Pf.
 MEYER, J. Metz, durch Panzerfronten verteidigt. Frauenfeld: Huber. 4 M. 80 Pf.
 MURMELIUS, J. Ausgewählte Werke, hrsg. v. A. Bömer. 3. Hft. Münster: Regensberg. 3 M.
 RAMANN, L. Franz Liszt. Als Künstler u. Mensch. 2. Bd. 2. Abth. Leipzig: Breitkopf. 9 M. 50 Pf.
 SAURE, B. Der Torso v. Belvedere. Giessen: Ricker. 4 M.
 SCHWAB, A. N. L'Art russe: peintres modernes. Moscow: Grossmann. 70 fr.
 VERZEICHNIS der Handschriften im Preussischen Staate. I. Hannover. 2. Die Handschriften in Göttingen. Berlin: Bath. 18 M. 50 Pf.

THEOLOGY, ETC.

- BIBLIOTHECA Döllingeriana. Katalog der Bibliothek des verstorbenen Professors I. J. v. Döllinger. München: Lindauer. 10 M.
 PROBST, F. Liturgie d. 4. Jahrh. u. deren Reform. Münster-i.-W.: Aschendorff. 10 M.

HISTORY, ETC.

- CODEx diplomaticus Salentinus. 12. Lfg. 1329-1493. Karlsruhe: Braun. 5 M.
 DUMAS, Jacques. Le Problème foncier en Angleterre, mis en regard du problème agraire au IV^e Siècle de Rome. Paris: Pedone-Lauriel. 6 fr.
 GUILLOIS, Antoine. Napoléon: l'homme, le politique, l'orateur. Paris: Didier. 15 fr.
 HAAKE, H. Bilder aus alten deutschen Städten. Hamburg: Griese. 30 M.
 MEYER, Ch. Quellen zur Geschichte der Stadt Baireuth. Bayreuth: Giesel. 5 M.
 MEYER, Ph. Die Hauptkunden f. die Geschichte der Aethiöler. Leipzig: Hinrichs. 10 M.
 VIELHAARD, die, bei Hamburg. Hamburg: Griese. 30 M.

PHYSICAL SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

- BECKHAUS, K. Flora v. Westfalen. Münster-i.-W.: Aschendorff. 10 M.
 FAUNA u. Flora des Golfes v. Neapel. XVIII. Entomoneusten v. J. W. Spengel. Berlin: Friedländer. 150 M.
 KLAHEW, G. Hydrographische Studien im Sundgauer Hügellande. Straßburg: Heitz. 2 M.
 KRAUS, G. Der botanische Garten der Universität Halle. 2. Hft. 8 M. Geschichte der Pflanzeneinführungen in die europäischen botanischen Gärten. 3. M. Leipzig: Engelmann.
 MARCUSE, A. Die hawaiischen Inseln. Berlin: Friedländer. 9 M.
 PAGENSTECHER, A. Beiträge zur Lepidopteren-Fauna d. malayischen Archipels. Wiesbaden: Bergmann. 5 M.
 STRINER, K. v. den. Unter den Naturvölkern Zentral-Brasilens. Berlin: Reimer. 12 M.

PHILOLOGY, ETC.

- GELBHAUS, S. Die Targumliteratur, vergl.-ichend agadisch u. kritisch-philologisch beleuchtet. 1. Hft. Frankfurt-a.-M.: Kauffmann. 2 M. 50 Pf.
 HESONIAS, Miniamben. Deutsch u. Einleit. u. Anmerkgn. v. O. Crusius. Göttingen: Dieterich. 2 M.
 WINKLER, H. Sammlung v. Keltisch-irischen Texten verschiedener Inhalte. 2. Lfg. Leipzig: Pfeiffer. 8 M.
 WINKLER, H. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der Assyriologie in Deutschland. Leipzig: Pfeiffer. 1 M. 50 Pf.

CORRESPONDENCE.

HAD POLYCARP THE GOSPEL OF PETER IN HIS HANDS?

Oxford: Dec. 1, 1893.

In reference to the suggestion which I ventured to make in the ACADEMY of October 21, that the words τὸ μαρτύριον τοῦ σταυροῦ in the Epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians may possibly be a reference to the legend of the talking cross in the Gospel of Peter, the following communication from Prof. Th. Zahn, which he kindly allows me to send to you, may interest some of your readers.

He writes as follows:

"Ihre Frage in Bezug auf Polyc. ad Phil. vii. τὸ μαρτύριον τοῦ σταυροῦ hat mich veranlasst, auf neue darüber nachzudenken, zumal ich mit Ihrer Verwendung dieser Stelle in der ACADEMY vom 21. Oktober, p. 343 sq., nicht einverstanden bin.

"(1) Der fragliche Ausdruck kann doch ohne Frage als Genetivus objecti gefasst werden. 'Das Zeugnis vom Kreuz,' cf., δ λόγος δ τοῦ σταυροῦ, 1 Cor. i. τὸ μαρτύριον . . . τῆς ἀναστάσεως (Acts iv. 33). So habe ich in meiner Ausgabe erklärt, p. 122, und nur nebenbei eine Neigung verrathen die Variante μαρτύριον zu bevorzugen, cf. die Varianten zu 1 Cor. ii. 1. Aber auch μαρτύριον in dem angegebenen Sinn finde ich unanständig. Allen jenen im weiteren Sinn doketischen Richtungen gegenüber, welche die Briefe des Johannes und des Polycarp berücksichtigen, war es am Platz, nicht nur die wahrhaftige Fleischwerdung, sondern auch das 'Zeugnis' oder 'Wort' vom Kreuz zu betonen (cf. 1 Joh. v. 6).

"(2) Formell möglich ist natürlich auch die Annahme eines Genetivus subjecti. So gut wie Wasser und Blut und die Werke Christi als zeugende Subjekte vorgestellt werden können (1 Joh. v., 7 f., Joh. x., 25), ebensogut das Kreuz. Ohne jede nähere Angabe könnte ich darunter aber nur verstehen, was das Kreuz Christi, oder die Thatsache seiner Kreuzigung an sich selbst bezeugt, wie in den angeführten Analogien von ὥρα, αἷμα, ἔργα. Kein Leser konnte errathen, dass eine einzelne Aussage gemeint sei, welche das Kreuz gethan hat. Ich will nicht Gewicht darauf legen, dass wenigstens nach dem Sprachgebrauch des N. T. dann ἡ μαρτυρία, nicht τὸ μαρτύριον stehen würde. Selbst wenn Polycarp das Petrus-evangelium gekannt hätte, hätte er nicht in dieser unverständlichen Weise auf jenes val vom Kreuz her sich berufen können. Ich halte es aber auch für ganz undenkbar, dass Polycarp zwischen die Fleischwerdung einerseits und Auferstehung und Gericht andererseits die durch jenes val angedeutete Predigt im Hades als zweites Hauptstück des kirchlichen Bekenntnisses gestellt haben sollte, zumal die von Polycarp bestrittenen Irrlehrer die Predigt im Hades gewiss nicht geleugnet haben. Auch Marcion hat dies nicht in jedem Sinn geleugnet. Es ist mir ferner sicher, dass das Petrus-evangelium um 110 noch nicht vorhanden war, und dass Polycarp nach seiner ganzen Denkweise den Verfasser eines solchen Evangeliums nur unter die μεθοδεύοντες τὰ λόγια τοῦ κυρίου hätte rechnen können, wenn er sein Buch gelesen hätte.

"(3) Möglich wäre auch, dass τὸ σταυρὸν in einem freieren Verhältniss stünde zu μαρτύριον, cf. Philipp. ii. 8, θάνατος σταυροῦ, Col. i. 20, τὸ αἷμα τοῦ σταυροῦ αὐτοῦ und wieder anders, Gal. v. 11, τὸ σκάνδαλον τοῦ σταυροῦ. Es könnte gemeint sein das in und mit der Kreuzigung abgelegte Zeugnis Scil. Christi. Christus ist der μαρτυρὸς δ πιστός, Apok. i. 5, nicht nur durch sein mündliches Bekenntnis vor Pilatus (1 Tim. vi. 13), sondern auch durch seinen Tod am Kreuz, ein μαρτυρὸς δι' αἵματος καρπὸν καὶ μαρτυρῶν. Aber für wahrscheinlicher als diese Fassung halte ich die unter (1)."

I hesitate to differ from so eminent an authority as Prof. Zahn, and I frankly admit that my suggestion seems less likely to me after reading his remarks. Indeed, when this interpretation of Polycarp's phrase first occurred to me in August last, I set it aside as quite too fanciful. Subsequently, during the third week of October, the same interpretation suggested itself independently to Mr. E. N. Bennett, of Hertford College, whereupon I began to think there must be something in it, and, therefore, did not shrink from publishing it, of course as a mere conjecture. It subsequently occurred to another friend and colleague of my own as the obvious explanation of Polycarp's words. The point is of some importance, because Polycarp was, according to Irenaeus, the favourite disciple of John the Evangelist, and is as it were an intermediary between him and the Church at large. The question also of the genuineness of the Ignatian Epistles largely hinges on this letter of Polycarp. This being so, I venture to state a few grounds which, though they necessarily do not settle the question, yet perhaps diminish the weight of some of Prof. Zahn's criticisms, and at least seem to me to warrant our saying—sub iudice lis est.

It seems then to me that Prof. Zahn goes too far when he says that Polycarp could not have put the preaching in hell as based on the answer val of the Cross between the incarnation on the one hand and the resurrection and future judgment on the other. For what do we know in general of Polycarp's dogmatic views? Nothing at all, except what is contained in these few lines of his Ep. ad Phil. vii. What we do know of his age and surroundings rather encourages us than otherwise to think that he was capable of anathematizing others for rejecting so bizarre a superstition as that of the talking cross. Witness the description given in Ignatius (ad Eph. xix.) of the star of the Epiphany, which is taken from the Protevangelium, § 21, i.e., from a spurious gospel. Lightfoot, in his commentary on this passage of Ignatius, remarks that "in the evangelical narrative the incident of the star is very simply told; but this simplicity was early overlaid by gross exaggerations," as if there could be degrees of exaggeration when we have once entered the sphere of miracles. In any case, if Ignatius believed in stories which were "gross exaggerations," why not Polycarp in this story of the talking cross?

Prof. Zahn's contention that Polycarp could not have had Peter's Gospel, and that, if he had known of it, he would have ascribed it to the μεθοδεύοντες τὰ λόγια τοῦ κυρίου, is also very probable. But it does not follow that, because he had not the document, he did not believe in a story which must have been already current long before it made its way into the Gospel of Peter, the composition of which Prof. Sanday sets between 125 and 130 A.D. The story of the talking cross may be very primitive; and the Rev. C. Taylor, in the Guardian for November 29, 1893, even goes so far as to connect therewith St. Paul's phrase (1 Cor. i. 18), δ λόγος τοῦ σταυροῦ, "the word of the cross." He writes thus: "In connexion with the word 'Yea,' spoken by the cross in p. ix., notice 1 Cor. i. 18—"the word (λόγος) of the cross."

I admit that Paul's context favours Mr. Taylor's interpretation; but I can hardly agree with him that by "the word of the cross" Paul meant the ὑπακοή δτι τὸ val of Peter's Gospel. Such a view seems to me to be too bold and innovating in its character. I would, however, suggest that this ὑπακοή, along with the voice from heaven which asked, "Hast thou preached to them that sleep?" may be one of the "three mysteries of crying" referred to by Ignatius ad Eph. xix.:

"Ritschl and Lipsius," says Lightfoot ad locum, "agree that two of the three were (1) the voice at the baptism, (2) the voice at the transfiguration. For the third . . . Ritschl supposes that Ignatius used some other gospel containing a third proclamation similar to the two others."

The Peter Gospel seems here to supply just what is wanted.

In conclusion, I would call attention to two points which do not seem to have been sufficiently dwelt upon by editors of the Gospel of Peter: (1) the coincidence, if such it be, between the Gospel of Peter and the Epistle of Peter iii. 19 and iv. 6; (2) the question whence came the belief that Jesus went down into hell and preached to the dead, and when did it arise in Christian circles? It was evidently opposed from the first by some believers, even as it was espoused by others, for it figures in some primitive forms of the Creed, but not in others. In the Testaments of the XII. Patriarchs it is very prominent.

On such a point as the last one would expect to find some remarks in such a work as that of the late Dr. Harvey Goodwin on the Creed. All he has to say, however, is this: that the clause "he went down into hell" was inserted in the Creed in order to testify to Christ's "perfect and continued humanity." With astonishing inadvertence this writer fails to notice the passages in Peter's Epistle and their relevance to the clause in question. And what must be the mental confusion of those Sunday-school children whose teachers follow a manual of "Church of England" instruction which lies before me, and from which I learn that, when Jesus said to the thief, "To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise," he really meant, "To-day shalt thou be with me in Hell!"

F. C. CONYBEARE.

"THE BRONTËS IN IRELAND."

London: Dec. 16, 1893.

I am pleased to see that Mr. Andrew Lang accepts the main contention of my book. He says:

"That Hugh told the story, that it reached his grand-daughter, and inspired Emily's novel, is certain enough. . . . He had a genius for romantic narrative, which, with the yarn, was inherited by his grand-daughters."

This is the sum and substance of what I have advanced. Hugh's story of his childhood thrilled the listeners in Ireland, and his grand-daughters reproduced the same story in Yorkshire setting, and under variant forms. The importance of this conclusion does not depend on the character of Hugh's tales, whether mythical or otherwise. So much being admitted, if further discussion is to be profitable, it is necessary to bear in mind exactly how the matter stands.

My book consists of two parts, the traditional and the historical. In the traditional I have followed the classical method which Mr. Lang will recognise. I spared no pains to find out exactly what the traditions were, and I gave them precisely as I found them. The historical part of the book begins at the point of time when Hugh Brontë passed through Dundalk, on his flight northward; and I am pretty certain of his movements and the movements of his descendants, from that time forward. The portion of the book that deals with this period I have verified in all its details.

Mr. Lang undertakes to test the traditions, and as a master in mythic lore he comes to his task with undoubted authority; but I regret to say he has not mastered his facts.

He begins by discrediting Grandfather Hugh, "the raconteur," for acts committed by Uncle Hugh, "the Giant." He asks: "Who is the authority for the legend?" And he replies: "Hugh Brontë, grandfather of the novelists." And then he adds: "Hugh was a big, obstreperous, imaginative person, who fought with ghosts, threw potatoes at the devil," &c.

There is no excuse for this confusion on the part of Mr. Lang. The matter in my book is as plain as a sign-board. On p. 157, I give the pedigree of Grandfather Hugh, and I added: "He had a son Hugh, 'the Giant';" and on p. 175, I refer to the scene "when Hugh Brontë, 'the Giant,' in wild passion sought to come into actual bodily conflict with the devil." The reader will easily recognise here that the Hugh Brontë in question is one of the stalwart brothers, but his identity is placed beyond all doubt when his distinctive nick name, "the Giant," is given.

Mr. Lang asks how Hugh came to know the tale which he narrated. "Was it imparted to him by his aunt, the wife of Welsh? Was it she who divulged this long legend of villainy about her own husband?" These interrogations anticipate a negative response. On p. 59, however, it is distinctly stated that Aunt Mary did tell Hugh "the tragic story of the Brontë family"; and it might have been added that she detested her husband quite as much as little Hugh detested him. But there is really no difficulty whatever here. Hugh could not have lived and grown up a youth in a charred and ruined house in Ireland, without finding out its history; and the gossip of Gallagher, however misleading, would be rectified by the neighbours, who bore no good will to Welsh but pitied Hugh. In Ireland the secret could not have been kept from the youth.

Mr. Lang is doubtful regarding the adoption of the child Hugh by Welsh. He asks: "Where is the motive?" He will find it on pp. 40 and 51. With Welsh, there was an anticipation of a certain sum of money and the services of a little boy; with Hugh's father, there was a prospect of the boy coming into the inheritance of the old homestead. Mr. Lang says:

"The mere circumstance that Hugh christened one of his sons Welsh, the rejected name of his torturer, according to the legend, raises a strong presumption that the founding story is one of Hugh's yarns."

Now this "strong presumption" rests on the unsafe assumption that the Brontës would act, in a given case, like other people; but the whole story goes to show that the Brontës were accustomed to run counter to other people's preconceived opinions. They exhibited at every turn the eccentricities of genius.

But suppose the story of the foundling could be disproved, which it cannot, the difficulty would not be removed. The fact would still remain that Hugh Brontë, in his stories, poured hot execration on the name "Welsh," and yet gave that name to one of his sons. This is a fact beyond all dispute. And it is also a fact that he convinced his hearers that he was telling the truth. Shrewd and educated Ulstermen, like the Rev. David McKee and the Rev. William McAllister, believed the story. Hugh Brontë's own children believed the story; and Patrick, who took it in with his mother's milk, and who had ample opportunity of questioning his father regarding details, handed the story down to his daughters, who have fixed it permanently in English literature.

Such then are the arguments by which Mr. Lang tries to discredit Hugh Brontë's stories, and we see that they rest either on his own misapprehensions, or on an unsafe assumption. No stronger man than Mr. Lang is likely to assail these traditions, and his failure goes to strengthen the probabilities in their favour.

In closing this letter I wish to thank Mr. Lang for his very excellent and candid review of my book. I have gratefully accepted two of his corrections for the second edition, just published; and I trust that he will accept my corrections in the same spirit.

WILLIAM WRIGHT.

UNACKNOWLEDGED SOURCES.

Wellington, Salop: Nov. 17, 1893.

Many years ago, I wrote an article on "The Field Sports of the Ancient Greeks and Romans," which appeared in the Quarterly Review for July, 1863. I have now in the press a work on "The Field Sports of the Ancients," not confined to the Greeks and Romans, but embracing the hunting of wild animals, fowling, fishing, &c., as pursued by the ancient inhabitants of Egypt, Assyria, Babylonia, Persia, Parthia, Greece, and Rome. This work will be illustrated from ancient monuments. Seeing somewhere a short notice of a paper on "The Sporting Literature of Ancient Greece and Rome," in the Transactions of the Royal Society of Literature (second series, vol. xvi. Part I.), I procured a copy of that part, being desirous to ascertain whether the author of the paper, Dr. William Knighton, had communicated any matter which might be of use to me in my forthcoming work. I read the article. I seemed very familiar with the subjects selected, and, indeed, with the very words descriptive of the same. I will give a few examples. In my account of the Calydonian Wild-Boar Hunt, so graphically described by Ovid (Met., viii., 328, et seq.),

I wrote:

"The placing of the nets, the unleashing of the dogs, the search for foot-tracks, the ardour which filled the hearts of the hunters, the sudden rush of the wild boar from the marshy places of the pool, the breaking and crashing of the trees of the wood by the animal's impulse, the shout or 'view hollo' of the party, as he started off, the casting of the javelins, the dispersion of the dogs, are all most charmingly described by this prince of Latin poets. Echion was the first to hurl his javelin at the beast, but he only grazed the bark of a tree; the next was Jason, and he aimed well, but his javelin, though it looked as if it would surely strike the wild boar's back, overshot the mark. Amphyctes breathed a sacred prayer to Phoebus that he would guide his weapon aright; the javelin flew true and struck the animal, but alas! the spear-head broke as it was being hurled through the air; the hog, now rendered more furious than ever, suddenly attacks his pursuers, and knocks over Eupalamon and Pelagon, who are at once taken away from the hunting-field. Poor Enaeus was more unfortunate still, for his courage forsook him, and as he turned to flight, he received a mortal wound on his thigh. . . . The twin brethren, Castor and Pollux ('nondum coelestia sidera') are conspicuous in the hunt, mounted on their snow-white steeds, and their unerring javelins would certainly have given the deathstroke to the beast had he not rushed into the thickest parts of the covert, impervious to darts and riders. Telamon, too impetuous, stumbles over the root* of a tree and falls to the ground. Atalanta, most swift-footed of mortals, is conspicuous in the chase; she bends her bow, and is the first to draw blood. Meleager, the fair maiden's lover, rejoices more than herself at her success. . . . Shouts of triumph rend the air and hearty congratulations greet the successful hunter, while the carcass of the huge wild boar lies extended upon the ground."

Dr. Knighton writes:

"The placing of the nets, the unleashing of the dogs, the search for foot-tracks, the zeal of the hunters, the sudden rush of the boar from the marshy lair, the crashing of the branches, the shouting of the party, the dispersion of the dogs, and the casting of the javelins are all dwelt upon with graphic force and vigour. Echion was the first to hurl his javelin at the beast, but he only grazed the bark of a tree. Jason made the next attempt. He aimed well, but his javelin, though it looked as if it would certainly pierce the hog's back, overshot the mark. Amphyctes breathed a short prayer to Phoebus that his spear might be guided aright, and then the weapon flew true from his hand, but, although it struck the animal, the spear-head broke short off, and only served to make the gigantic boar more fierce. With a sudden spring he savagely attacks Eupalamon and Pelagon. He knocks them over wounded, and they are borne from the field. Poor Enaeus was still more unfortunate. He fled from the field in terror, and the boar, with his tusks, ripped up his thigh. The twin brothers, Castor and Pollux, 'nondum coelestia sidera', are conspicuous in the hunt, mounted on their snow-white steeds, and their unerring darts would certainly have given the death-blow to the boar. Had he not rushed into the thickest of the cover, impervious to horses. Telamon, too eager, stumbles over the trunk of a fallen tree, and measures his length upon the ground. Atalanta, swift-footed of mortals, is the first to draw blood with her arrow; and Meleager, her lover, rejoices in her success. . . . Shouts of triumph rend the air as the enemy falls prostrate, conquered, in the pangs of death. Hearty congratulations greet the successful hunter, whilst the huge carcass lies extended on the ground."

* I desire to be accurate; Ovid has "Pronus ab arborea cecidit radice retentus."

In the Quarterly Review I wrote:

"Aelian has written a spirited and, on the whole, accurate description of the hare's manoeuvres to escape the dogs; he makes especial mention of the many 'doubles' she has recourse to when pressed, and of her attempts to gain rocky or woody places, where dogs and riders cannot follow or find. He rather amusingly observes that the hare, after having outstripped her pursuers in the chase—leaving them far behind—betakes herself to some slight eminence, and, erecting herself on her hind legs, takes a survey as from a watch-tower of the contest of speed, and ridicules her beaten adversaries."

Dr. Knighton's expression "squatted on her hind legs" is no improvement on my rendering of the Greek, which has ταυτὸν ἀναστήσας ἐπὶ τῶν κατόντων ποδῶν.

In the Quarterly Review we read:

"A rod was sometimes used in sea-fishing; the lines, the materials of which were hemp or horsehair, must have been strongly made for the capture of large fish."

The use of another kind of rod is sometimes to be recommended.

In the Quarterly Review I have said:

"Fly-fishing is generally considered to be an invention of quite modern days, but it is certain that the device of taking fish by means of an artificial fly was known to and practised by the Isaac Waltons of classical antiquity"—and then I quote Martial v., Ep. xviii., &c.

Lastly, at the end of the article in the Quarterly Review, I wrote:

"We can conceive the contempt with which Arrian would have regarded the modern system of killing, by hundreds in a day, tame pheasants reared under hens, a pursuit whose especial object seems to be to destroy more game than your neighbours . . . an occupation . . . which the genuine sportsman will consider more correctly described by words somewhat altered from certain well-known lines as, stupid, unmeaning, slaughter-like, degraded, spiritless pastime."

With regard to some of Dr. Knighton's statements, I will briefly observe that Cirras, Bonnas, and Horme were names of Arrian's greyhounds, and are not mentioned as those of

Dr. Knighton writes:

"Aelian has left us a graphic and, on the whole, a truthful description of the hare's manoeuvres to escape the dogs, of the many doubles to which she has recourse when pressed, of her attempts to gain rocky or woody places, where the dogs or huntsmen cannot easily follow. He describes her, having outstripped her pursuers, as betaking herself to a slight eminence, where, squatted on her hind legs, as a watch-tower, she inspects the field, notes particularly the vain chase, and ridicules her adversaries."

Dr. Knighton writes:

"A rod was sometimes used in sea-fishing. The lines, the materials of which were hemp or horsehair, must have been very strongly made for the capture of large fish."

Dr. Knighton writes:

"Fly-fishing is generally supposed to be an invention of modern days, but it is certain that the device of taking fish by means of an artificial fly was known and practised at least as early as the days of Martial." Then follows the quotation from Martial, &c.

Dr. Knighton writes:

"One can easily conceive the contempt with which he [the ancient Greek sportsman] would have regarded the modern system of killing tame pheasants, reared under domestic hens by the hundred—a pursuit in which the whole glory appears to consist in destroying a greater number than your neighbour—a slaughter-like, degraded, spiritless pastime."

Xenophon's hare-hounds, though Horme is given by the latter writer as a name to be recommended; that Aelian does not speak of the hunting-hawks being known by individual names—this occurs only, I think, in a treatise (Θαυμάσια Ἀκούσματα) ascribed by some writers, in part at least, to Aristotle; that Aelian does not begin his Natural History by discoursing first of elephants and then of dragons; and that the illustration from Montfaucon of lions and men with spears and shields provoking the animals to a contest refers, comparatively speaking, to a modern pastime, and was most likely utterly unknown to Xenophon, who makes no allusion to it; and yet we are told that "all this is from Xenophon's description."

W. HOUGHTON.

THE INSCRIBED WEIGHT FROM SAMARIA.

Rodah, Egypt: Dec. 6, 1893.

My departure from Cairo has prevented me from seeing until now the discussion which has arisen in the ACADEMY over the letter I wrote about Dr. Chaplain's inscribed weight from Samaria. It has followed the course I expected, and the reading public will now be able to appraise at their real value the ex cathedra assertions of those who claim a monopoly of "the critical method." Dr. Neubauer and myself, after a careful examination of the original, found that the inscription contained certain words; and the "critics" peremptorily denied our reading without taking the trouble to consult the original.

Prof. Robertson Smith is mistaken in saying that the explanation of netseg as "a standard weight" is mine, or that I "derive" it from the root yatsag. The explanation is due to Dr. Neubauer; and from the first moment he mentioned it to me, he has always "derived" it from a root natsag with which yatsag would be connected.

A. H. SAYCE.

APPOINTMENTS FOR NEXT WEEK.

WEDNESDAY, Dec. 27, 4 p.m. London Institution: "Marco Polo," by Mr. H. J. Mackinder.
THURSDAY, Dec. 28, 3 p.m. Royal Institution: "Air: Gaseous and Liquid," I., by Prof. Dewar.
FRIDAY, Dec. 29, 4 p.m. London Institution: "Columbus," by Mr. H. J. Mackinder.
SATURDAY, Dec. 30, 3 p.m. Royal Institution: "Air: Gaseous and Liquid," II., by Prof. Dewar.

SCIENCE.

Alone with the Hairy Ainu. By A. H. Savage Landor. (John Murray.)

"VERY few travellers have seen the real Ainu, or studied them accurately; while many, partly owing to their inability to differentiate one race from another, have given us highly imaginative descriptions, and even photographs, of Japanese half-castes and actual Japanese, describing them as Ainu."

This observation, made (p. 263) by the writer of the work under review, is certainly not applicable to himself, as every reader of his interesting book will acknowledge. After "3,800 miles on a pack-saddle in Yezo and a cruise to the Kurile Islands," the whole journey occupying 146 days, Mr. Landor is well qualified to speak with authority regarding the natives of those regions. He omits to mention the date of his journey; but as a "study" of this work appeared in Black and White for October 1, 1892, it would seem that he gained his experiences in the previous year. The route which he followed was this: starting from Hakodate, he made his way along the coast to Nemuro, at the eastern extremity of Yezo, whence he took a trip by sea to the Kurile Islands. Returning to Nemuro he proceeded northward and north-west, following the coast-line; and then, rounding Cape Soya, he came southward along the western shore, and finally completed the circuit of the island. At several points he journeyed inland, following the course of the large rivers, and then returning to the coast. So that, except for the northern and north-eastern interior, he has made a remarkably close investigation of Yezo and its inhabitants.

In deference to the author, the people he describes may here be referred to as "the Ainu," although the reviewer is one of those who prefer to use the Anglicised plural "Ainos," or "Ainus." It may be the mark of a Philistine to do so; but when one writes or speaks in English it seems more natural to use the English plural, and, besides, the other course leads one into difficulties. For, if we must talk of "the Ainu" and "the Matabili," why not also of, for example, "the Italiáni"? However, "the Ainu" be it, for the present, at any rate.

The frontispiece is very characteristic of the book itself. It is not usual for a "portrait of the author" to represent him in the sans culotte condition in which Mr. Landor is portrayed. But this is actually how he found himself, after months of hard travel. And equally unconventional was his mode of procedure. With "no friends, no servants, no guides, no provisions, and no tent," his baggage (consisting chiefly of "three hundred small wooden panels for oil-painting" and "a large supply of oil colours and brushes") packed up for transport on pony-back, he set out on his toilsome and solitary journey. He was admirably adapted for the work, in spite of his youth and the alleged delicacy of his constitution, which, however, carried him through hardships under which many would have succumbed. His previous travels in China, Corea, and Japan, and his knowledge of Japanese, made him quite at home among the Japanese and the half-castes of the island; while, at an early stage of the journey, he began to learn Ainu, without which he would have had difficulty in communicating with the Ainu of unmixed blood. Moreover, Mr. Landor is, before all things, an artist, and his pages are enriched with many trophies of his brush, though these are not always of equal merit. His book also contains many valuable contributions to geology, anthropology, and philology. The detailed measurements of various Ainu given in his appendix show what a careful traveller he is, and these will be referred to by anthropologists as authoritative. The glossary, though containing only 273 words, is also of value.

Mr. Landor has a healthy contempt for the "globe-trotter" who writes of the half-castes, or three-quarters Japanese, as "the Ainu," never having seen any pure specimens of the race. And he has little faith in the genuineness of many alleged "Ainu" traditions, recorded by missionaries and others. The following incident (p. 29) illustrates this:

"Thinking that it would please me, Benry [an Ainu chief] told me the story of a deluge and a big flood, in which nearly all the Ainu were drowned. The few that escaped did so by finding refuge on a high mountain.

"Where did you learn this story, Benry?" I asked sternly.

"Nishpa [sir], it is an old Ainu story, and all strangers who come to Piratori write it in their books."

"Oh! no, Benry; you know well that one stranger did not write it in his book," said I quickly, as if I knew all about it.

"Oh! yes, nishpa; that was the stranger who told me the story!"

At pp. 155-6 he gives "a good illustration of what I say in my chapter on the Ainu beliefs and superstitions," showing how he himself may become the hero of a future Ainu myth. Amid all his hardships, Mr. Landor is a philosopher, and some of his reflections are amusingly and epigrammatically expressed. Speaking of his experiences at Yammakka, he says (p. 56):

"When the evening came, I tried to go to sleep on the hard planks, as usual. There is undoubtedly more board than lodging about Ainu accommodation. . . . A few salmon were hanging right over my nose. They hung low, but they smelt high."

But he is so naïf and interesting in describing an incident of a different kind that another extract may be permitted. One afternoon, as he was sketching by the Saruma lagoon, there appeared to him "the most lovely Ainu girl I had ever come across, and not nearly so hairy as most of them."

"Let me see the tattoo on your arm," I asked her; and, to my surprise, the pretty maid took my hand in both her own, gave me one of those looks that I shall never forget, and her head fell on my shoulder. She clutched my hand tightly and pressed it to her chest, and a force stronger than myself brought her and myself to the neighbouring forest. There we wandered and wandered till it grew very dark; we sat down, we chattered, we made love to each other; then we returned. I would not have mentioned this small episode, if her ways of flirting had not been so extraordinary and funny. Loving and biting went together with her. She could not do the one without doing the other. As we sat on a stone in the semi-darkness, she began by gently biting my fingers, without hurting me, as affectionate dogs often do to their masters; she then bit my arm, then my shoulder; and when she had worked herself up into a passion, she put her arms round my neck and bit my cheeks. It was undoubtedly a curious way of making love; and when I had been bitten all over, and was pretty tired of the new sensation, we retired to our respective homes. . . . In the evening, as I was writing my diary by the light of one of the oyster-shell, primitive lamps, somebody noiselessly crept by my side. I turned my head round. It was she! She grew more and more sentimental as it grew later, and she bestowed on me caresses and bites in profusion. Kissing, apparently, was an unknown art to her. . . . I sketched her twice in pencil, and the wick—that wretched wick!—grew feeble, and, for the lack of oil, began to dwindle away. I persuaded her to return to her hut, and, with a few 'bites,' my hairy maid and I parted" (pp. 140-141).

One is reminded of Lavengro and Isopel Berners, in the dingle, and how he taught her Armenian—her mind, all the while, being occupied with other matters. And, on another page (p. 151), when this lonely traveller rides along the desolate Ainu coast, discoursing to his pony, Lavengro is again suggested, as he jogged along to Horncastle, beguiling the way with "The chi she is kauley, she soves pré laki dumo," and other melodies of Romanville.

Mr. Landor devotes a whole chapter (ix.) to "the Koro-pok-kuru, or Pit-dwellers," who are said to have preceded the Ainu in Yezo. According to some, the practice of tattooing was derived from those people.

"One legend says that when the Ainu conquered Yezo, which was then inhabited by a race of dwarfs—the 'Koro-pok-kuru'—some Koro-pok-kuru women came to the Ainu camp to beg food from them, and they did so by passing their arms through the reed walls of the Ainu huts. One day an Ainu clutched one of these arms and pulled it in, when a tattooed pattern on the tiny arm was greatly admired by the hairy conquerors, who adopted the practice from that day" (pp. 251-252).

While mentioning (p. 83) that some Ainu believe those pit-dwellers to have been their own ancestors, Mr. Landor is strongly of an opposite opinion, and infers that the pit-dwellers "must have had many points in common with the present Esquimaux . . . and all that we know identifies them more with the latter race than with the Ainu." He also infers that they were more civilised than the Ainu, "but owing to their retiring nature and weaker physique, and outnumbered by the savage hairy people, they became extinct." This coincides closely with the opinion of Prof. Schlegel, who discusses "The Country of the Little Men" (Siao-jin Kouo) in a recent number of his Problèmes Géographiques, wherein he includes them in the Tungusian family. Yet it is difficult to reconcile this conclusion with the mention in the Chan-hai-king of a small-statured, naked race of cave-dwellers, whose faces and bodies were "covered with hair like swine," unless one assumes that there were two separate dwarf races prior to the Ainu.

The result of Mr. Landor's measurements "taken on five men and five women of the pure Ainu of Frishikobets . . . carefully chosen among the best types," showed an average height of rather less than 5 ft. 2½ inches for the men, and about 4 ft. 10½ inches for the women. He remarks that those whom he found at Lake Kutcharo "appeared to be smaller than other Ainu," but he does not seem to have measured them.

Unquestionably, the most important passages in the book are those in which the author expresses his opinion that the Ainu are in an arrested state of development: "men, yet not men like ourselves—men, and not brutes, yet still having curiously brutish traits athwart their humanity" (p. 31). He makes various references to the same effect.

"The Ainu are instinctively intelligent; but I wish my readers clearly to understand that their intelligence does not go much further than that of an intelligent monkey, though, of course, the Ainu have the advantage over beasts, of being able to talk, and, therefore, to a limited extent, discuss and combine" (p. 270). "The field of their brain power is, of course, very narrow" (p. 273). "The Ainu at Abashiri are repulsive creatures, especially the men, and have more the appearance of wild beasts than human beings" (p. 138). "That the Ainu are disgustingly filthy is undoubted; that in many ways they are monkey-like is certain" (p. 229). "Altogether, he [an Ainu of the north-east coast] had the appearance of a large orang-outang more than that of a human being" (p. 146). "When actively angry, the Ainu sneer and snarl at one another, frowning ferociously, and showing all their front teeth, but specially uncovering their fangs, or dog-teeth; the arms are stretched out, but always with the fist open—if no knife or other weapon be held in the hand" (p. 233). "Where the Ainu are indeed great is at making grimaces. The Ainu resemble monkeys in many ways, but in this special accomplishment they beat monkeys hollow" (p. 239). "Although many Ainu could not voluntarily move their scalp, they often did so unaware. . . . In masticating, the ears would sometimes move involuntarily, as with dogs or monkeys" (p. 240). "Resuming these few remarks on the characteristic points of Ainu senses, my readers will probably have noticed certain facts which strongly support Darwin's theory of evolution, and the hairy arboreal ancestor with pointed ears from which the races of men are descended" (p. 280).

"The great length of the arms in the Ainu race" (p. 300), their method of climbing trees (p. 239), and the "close resemblance the hairy people bear to the prehistoric man as constructed by savants out of skulls and skeletons" (p. 242), constitute other reasons for arriving at the same conclusion. But when Mr. Landor points out (p. 162) as interesting (though he does not mean to say it forms a basis for argument) the fact "that the Ainu are mostly to be found in regions of Cainozoic or Tertiary formation," and compares this with the fact "that the typical life-form of Tertiaries is anthropoid apes," and that, consequently, "it is a remarkable coincidence that we should find ape-like men populating the same strata," he forgets that he has previously expressed the belief that the Ainu are intruders in Yezo, having displaced a people possessing a higher civilisation.

No one who has not lived among the thoroughbred Ainu of Yezo for at least as long a period as Mr. Landor, and in the same close association with them, is in a position to call in question any of his statements regarding them, as they at present exist. But it may be pointed out that he is in error in assuming (p. 59) that Mr. Batchelor indicates the Tokachi Ainu to be still "eaters of their own kind." Mr. Batchelor only states that they are said to have been cannibals; and the possible correctness of this statement is not disproved by the fact that Mr. Landor found them to be "the most peaceable, gentle, and kind Ainu" in all Yezo. And the remark (p. 264) that the Ainu have "no professional musicians and no professional dancers," is not supported by the evidence of the Japanese kakemonos. Lastly, it is quite an error to take the Americans and Australians, who are simply transplanted Europeans, as good examples of "a mixture of two or more races" (p. 269), unless the reference is to mulattoes and half-caste blackfellows, as obviously it is not.

The book is full of information regarding the manners and customs of the Ainu; and Mr. Landor's artistic faculty has enabled him to give many excellent illustrations of their various utensils, the styles of ornamentation being minutely analysed. The whole work has the supreme merit of being entirely the outcome of the author's own personal observation.

DAVID MACRITCHIE.

SCIENCE NOTES.

AT a special general meeting of the Royal Institution, held on December 15, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"That the members of the Royal Institution of Great Britain, in special general meeting assembled, hereby record their deep regret at the death of Dr. John Tyndall, who was for forty years connected with the Institution as lecturer, professor, and honorary professor of natural philosophy, and who, by his brilliant abilities and laborious researches, has nobly promoted the objects of the Institution, and conspicuously enhanced its reputation, while at the same time he extended scientific truth, and rendered many new additions to natural knowledge practically available for the service of mankind; and that the members of the Royal Institution further desire to convey to Mrs. Tyndall an expression of their sincere sympathy and condolence with her in the bereavement she has sustained in the loss of her gifted and distinguished husband."

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

CAMBRIDGE PHILOLOGICAL SOCIETY.—(Thursday, Nov. 30.)

PROF. JERR, president, in the chair.—Prof. Sidgwick read two papers: (1) On Iliad xviii. ll. 507, 8 κεῖτο δ' ἄρ' ἐν μίσθωσι δῶ χρυσὸν τέλειτα τῷ δόμεν δὲ μετὰ τοῖσι δίκην ἰδύναται εἶποι.

It has long been disputed whether τῷ . . . δὲ refers to a litigant or a judge in the trial of which the description terminates in these lines. In Leipziger Studien, vol. xii. (1890), J. H. Lipsius claims to have conclusively proved that the former interpretation is correct, chiefly on the ground that μετὰ τοῖσι cannot be taken as "equivalent to a genitive." In answer to this, it was pointed out that in a line in the speech of Thetis—Iliad i. 516—μετὰ was thus used ὅσων ἐγὼ μετὰ πᾶσιν ἀτιμωτάτῃ θεός εἰμι.

It was further argued that all the indications of language in Iliad xviii. 508, were in favour of the interpretation rejected by Lipsius: thus (a) δόμεν is more natural if the recipient of the gift is not a person who has had to provide the funds: (b) δίκην ἰδύναται is a more appropriate expression for the delivery of a judicial decision than for the pleading of a cause: (c) the superlative ἰδύναται more naturally suggests that more than two persons are compared. It was admitted that no one of these considerations would be decisive by itself; but it was contended that their cumulative force renders the interpretation to which they point the more probable. (2) On the land-tenure in Attica before Solon. It has long been disputed whether the peasants called ἐκτεμῆροι paid 1-6th of their produce to their landlords and kept 5-6ths, or paid 5-6ths and kept 1-6th. It was argued in the paper that the language of Ἀθηναίων Πολιτεία, ch. ii., was clearly in favour of the former interpretation: for (a) the phrase εἰ μὴ τὰς μισθώσεως ἀποδοῖεν shows that μισθώσεως—as Dr. Sandys says—is "rent," not "wages"; while (b) the words ἐκαλοῦντο . . . ἐκτεμῆροι κατὰ ταύτην γὰρ τὴν μισθώσιν εἰργάζοντο . . . show that the rent must have been a "sixth part"—otherwise the terms of the rent would not directly and obviously have explained the word ἐκτεμῆροι, as they are clearly supposed to do. It was further contended that a careful examination of the language of Hesychius,

s. vv. ἐκτεμῆροι and ἐλμωρος, makes it clear that Hesychius must have regarded the ambiguous phrase ἔκτῳ μέρει ἐργαζόμενοι as meaning that the workers paid—not received—a sixth part. If this be admitted, it would seem that the testimony of ancient authorities is really all on the same side: and that the view that the tenants paid 5-6ths to the landlords must be attributed to a misunderstanding of a later commentator.

ARCHAEOLOGICAL INSTITUTE.—(Wednesday, Dec. 6.)

EMANUEL GREEN, Esq., in the chair.—Mr. J. Gooden Ohisholm exhibited a black-figured amphora, which had previously belonged to the late Prof. T. L. Donaldson, representing the combat between Athena and a heavy-armed warrior, presumably Enkelados, on which a paper was read by Mr. Talfourd Ely. After discussing the origin, style, ornament, and probable date of the vase, Mr. Ely proceeded to give a sketch of the versions of the myth in question, as treated by ancient authors and artists. He pointed out that Apollodoros incorporated various traditions in his account of the Gigantomachia; and that while the vase painters (with one exception) kept to be the epic conception of anthropomorphic giants, the sculptors and gem-engravers soon began to introduce more sensational types, a tendency much developed under the influence of the Pergamene School. Mr. Ely distinguished the scheme of single combat (as in the vase under review) from those representations in which Athena forms one of a triad of deities in the Gigantomachia. Some account was then given of the other vases (for the most part black-figured), on which Athena and Enkelados may be recognised, and also of the chief sculptural representations of the subject.—Mr. J. H. Round read a paper on the "Introduction of Armorial Bearings into England," in which he opposed the accepted view that the close of the twelfth century was the date of their first appearance, and showed that an equestrian seal existed, on which the well-known Clare coat is found, not later than 1146, its evidence being confirmed by two other Clare seals of about the same date. Mr. Round also showed that the Count of Meulan's seal, with its chequy bearings, could not be later than 1150. Planché was proved to have been misled in the matter, and the reign of Stephen was suggested as the most likely time for the introduction of distinct armorial bearings.

PHILOLOGICAL.—(Friday, Dec. 8.)

PROF. A. S. NAPIER, president, in the chair.—Prof. Skeat read a paper on "Chaucer's Use of the Kentish Dialect." Corresponding to Anglo-Saxon y we find the Old-Southern u, the Midland i, the Kentish e: Anglo-Saxon pyt, Old-Southern put, Midland pit, Kentish pet. Chaucer frequently employs Kentish forms, as shown by his rymes. The words clifte, kinde, sinne, mirthe, wirchen occur in the Midland form only; but for "merry" Chaucer has three forms: Old-Southern murie, Midland mirie, Kentish merie—here the Kentish form has prevailed. Chaucer has the Midland byen, a by-form of biggen "to buy"; fulfille; kiste, pt. t. kiste; knette, pp. knyt; thinne. But he also has the Kentish forms abeggen, fulfelle, kease, keste, knette, knet, thenne. We may add brigge "a bridge," list "it pleases," stinte "to cease"; for which he also uses bregge, lest, stente. The words berien "to buy," dent "blow," melle "mill," selle "flooring," sherte "shirt," shette "to shut," sterie "to stir," occur in the Kentish form only; but some of these forms were known in other dialects. Similarly the Anglo-Saxon long y is long e in Kentish. Hence Chaucer has the Midland drye "dry," fyr "fire"; but also the Kentish dreye, feer. So, also, he has fest "first," heden "to hide," pp. hed, threste "to thrust," vese "a rush." Chaucer doubtless knew the Kentish dialect fairly well. A MS. note tells us that he was living at Greenwich when he wrote his Envoy to Scogan. He probably lived there from 1385 to 1399. This would account for his being M.P. for Kent in 1386; for his appointment in 1389 as a commissioner for repairing the Thames banks between Greenwich and Woolwich; and for his Canterbury Tales. In the Reeve's Prologue there is an allusion to Greenwich as a place where "shrews" live. Chaucer may have humorously classed himself as one of them.—Mr. I. Gollancz then explained for the first time the absurdly misnamed "First Riddle" in the Exeter Book. He translated it, stanza by stanza, and showed that it was a lyric and yet highly dramatic poem in five fittes, a life-drama in five acts. Prof. Napier, Mr. Henry Bradley—who first suggested, in the ACADEMY, that the poem was a lyric fragment—Prof. Skeat, Mr. W. H. Stevenson, and other scholars, all accepted Mr. Gollancz's proof of his interpretation as satisfactory.

METEOROLOGICAL.—(Wednesday, Dec. 20.)

DR. C. THEODORE WILLIAMS, president, in the chair.—Mr. C. Harding gave an account of "The Great Storm of November 16 to 20, 1893." This storm was the most violent of recent years; and, so far as anemometrical records are concerned, the wind attained a greater velocity than has previously been recorded in the British Islands. The velocity of the wind was 96 miles in the hour from 8.30 to 9.30 p.m. on November 16 in the Orkneys, where the hurricane burst with such suddenness that it is described as like the shot of a gun; and the wind afterwards attained the very high rate of 90 miles and upwards in the hour, for five consecutive hours. At Holyhead the storm was terrific: the anemometer recorded a wind velocity of 89 miles in the hour, and it was 80 miles or above for eleven hours; while the force of a whole gale, 65 miles an hour and upwards, was maintained for thirty-one hours, and for four and a half days the mean hourly velocity was 54 miles. Many of the gusts were at the rate of 115 miles an hour, and at Fleetwood a squall occurred with the wind at the rate of 120 miles in the hour. The storm was felt over the entire area of the United Kingdom; and the wreck returns show that disasters occurred with almost equal frequency on all coasts. Four weeks after the storm the official records gave the total loss of life on our coasts as 335, while there were 140 vessels which had been abandoned, or had foundered, stranded, or met with other severe casualty, involving either loss of life, or saving of life by some extraneous assistance. There were 600 lives saved on our coasts by aid of the Lifeboat Institution and other means. The author has tracked the storm from the neighbourhood of the Bahamas on November 7, across the Atlantic and over the British Islands to Central Europe on November 20.

FINE ART.

SOME ILLUSTRATED BOOKS.

Abbotsford: The Personal Relics and Antiquarian Treasures of Sir Walter Scott. Described by the Hon. Mary Monica Maxwell Scott, and illustrated by William Gibb. (A. & C. Black.) Nothing is more notable in the annals of literature than the enduring reputation of Sir Walter Scott, both as writer and as man. And this is none the less true because there is no craze for first editions of his works—not even for those noble quartos in which the poems originally appeared. But the great public—in England as much as in his own Scotland, in the United States as much as here—have taken him to their hearts, and are not likely to abandon their favourite. We venture to think that the most successful serial publications of the past year have been the two illustrated editions of the Waverley Novels; and now a third is promised. We are sure that the most important book of the winter season, from the biographical not less than the literary point of view, is the collection of Familiar Letters which was reviewed in the ACADEMY of last week. The volume before us takes its place with those, as an illustrated record of the interests, tastes, and even the hobbies of the founder of Abbotsford. For frontispiece, we have a view of the house, as seen from the opposite bank of the Tweed. Then come a few personal relics of Sir Walter himself—his desk and chair, his clothes, and his knickknacks. But the great majority of the things depicted and described are such historical treasures as he delighted to collect, or his friends delighted to present.

to him. Here may be seen Montrose's sword, Prince Charlie's quagha, Rob Roy's sporran, a blotting case of Napoleon spangled with the imperial bees, the door of the old Tolbooth at Edinburgh ("The Heart of Midlothian"), trophies from Waterloo, and many other objects of equal antiquarian interest. The intrinsic worth, and even the artistic value, of the collection may not be very great, books and MSS. being altogether omitted; but the whole brings before our eyes, in a manner that is almost pathetic, what Scott loved next after his own good name.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. have devoted themselves this Christmas to the production of illustrated classics. First, we have a new issue of that fine edition of Tennyson, to which the leading English artists of nearly forty years ago contributed—from Mulready, Stanfield, and Creswick, to Millais, Holman Hunt, and D. G. Rossetti. The original, though familiar to many, is now a rare book; but the engravings have been reproduced in a manner that leaves nothing to be desired. The design on the cover, we may add, is one which the publishers have already associated with their handsomest edition of the poet. Next, in continuation of the series that takes its name from Mrs. Gaskell's Cranford, Mr. Hugh Thomson has this year furnished one hundred illustrations for Our Village, by Miss Mitford, to which Mrs. Ritchie has prefixed an admirable introduction. In the same series appears a Selection of Hood's Humorous Poems, with a short but adequate preface by Canon Ainger, and illustrations by Mr. Charles E. Brock, who is at his best when most closely following Mr. Hugh Thomson; and also a volume containing Washington Irving's two little masterpieces—"Rip Van Winkle" and "The Legend of Sleepy Hollow"—which Mr. George H. Boughton has illustrated in a style that is all his own. The engraving, too, is after the American manner, though we hesitate to say that it has not been executed in this country. At any rate, it seems regrettable that it should be necessary to record the claim of copyright beneath some of the plates. Finally, Messrs. Macmillan have sent us an illustrated edition—which is confessedly of American manufacture—of Shakespeare's England, by Mr. William Winter, of which the worst that can be said is that the title is not quite appropriate, though that may be explained by the enthusiasm of the author, which leads him to look upon this island as being, above everything else, the birthplace and home of Shakspeare.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. have further published two sets of illustrations to poems of Christina Rossetti. One of these is a new edition, enlarged, of Sing-Song, illustrated by Arthur Hughes, which first appeared in 1871. This fully satisfies the promise of its sub-title, "a nursery-rhyme book," the verses being simple and for the most part joyous, though death is a recurrent theme. The mastery of haunting rhyme, and the touches of magic, attest the true poet. As for the woodcuts, they are almost too good for the nursery. Except for occasional stiffness in drawing, Mr. Arthur Hughes has never done anything better; and the engraving, by the Brothers Dalziel, deserves equal praise. We are sorry that we cannot commend the other book—illustrations to Goblin Market, by Laurence Housman. It may be that we are prejudiced by our memory of the two designs of Dante Gabriel for this poem, which perfectly embodied its two leading motives of sisterly love and elfin grotesquerie. Mr. Housman seems to us to have no sense for beauty. He misses altogether "golden head by golden head"; and he crowds his pages with contorted ugliness.

MR. AUSTIN DOBSON has also attained to the dignity of illustration. Certainly the best work that Mr. Bernard Partridge has yet done is to be found in the bold yet graceful designs he has drawn for Proverbs in Porcelain (Kegan Paul & Co.). Nevertheless, we must confess to sharing the doubts of the poet himself, whether the peculiar delicacy, and even reticence, of his Muse properly lends itself to pictorial presentment. With the notable exception of Beau Brocade, Mr. Dobson's creations have always seemed to us to belong to the land of dreams. His eighteenth century is peopled by the imaginary personages of the Spectator, rather than by concrete flesh and blood. The figures of Mr. Partridge—happy name!—strike us as somewhat too real, as if one should seek to embody Belinda and the rest.

SALE OF OLD ENGLISH PRINTS.

ONE of the most remarkable collections yet formed or dispersed of the older English prints, in mezzotint, in stipple, in "line," and in the very inferior, because more mechanical, method "in colour," was sold last week by Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson & Hodge. In any such comprehensive collection, even if it were a smaller one than that just scattered to the four winds from the auction room in Wellington-street, there must necessarily be great inequality—first, as we have already pointed out, inequality of method and merit, considering the prints technically; and, second, inequality in importance of subject-matter, since it is clear that a Sir Joshua, a Romney, or a Morland, treated by McArdell, Smith, or Ward, has dignity and legitimate charm in very different measure from an Angelica Kaufmann, or a Cipriani, treated, as these are wont to be, by Bartolozzi. Speaking broadly, the collection that was dispersed last week was least rich in the prints executed after the canvasses of the more important men. The Sir Joshuas, for example, were, as a whole, scarcely such as we are accustomed to see figure in the greatest sales; but, if their prices were not generally high, that was due, as we are led to think, not altogether to the fact that they were scarcely la fine fleur, as the French say, of the engraved work after that master—it was due partly, we opine, to the circumstance that the immediate rage for prints after Sir Joshua has subsided, and that the extravagant prices which obtained only a very few years ago are hardly likely to be obtained again. The "fad" for coloured prints has, perhaps, to some extent, taken the place of what was, at all events, the much more justified taste for prints after the first President of the Academy, though, indeed, it is not precisely the dilettanti, who thought no sum too high for a fine mezzotint after Reynolds, who are now giving somewhat crazy prices for those old coloured engravings which are "neither fish, fowl, nor good red-herring." The Bartolozzi amateur we can easily imagine going in for coloured prints representing the weaker domesticities as well as the somewhat nerveless nudities of eighteenth century preference—indeed, certain of the Bartolozzis are themselves in colour, and they may no doubt be found seductive decoration for a boudoir, or even for a drawing-room of triflers—but no qualified student of engraving is likely to gather together these now costly little bastards of art in preference to the etchings of Rembrandt, the line engravings of Dürer, the mezzotints or line engravings after Turner. The thing is obviously impossible; for to place them in the same rank with the productions of the masters is as if one were to place a volume of blameless sentimentalities by Eliza Cook, Mrs. Hemans, or "L. E. L.," between the masculine productions of Wordsworth or Browning. But let us to the list of prices in this so varied sale.

Among the Bartolozzis one extraordinary price was given, a portrait of Miss Farren, after Sir Thomas Lawrence, realising £54. Another impression of the same subject reached £34. "Griselda Spinning," after Angelica Kaufmann, fetched £7. "Venus attired by the Graces," an impression in red, fetched £25. The nobler mezzotints of Earlom rose to no such figures, his "Blacksmith's Shop," after Wright, of Derby, being ransomed for £4, and somewhat indifferent impressions, it must be confessed, of his wonderful "Flower and Fruit Pieces," after Van Huysum, being sold for £4 7s. 6d. A rare coloured print after Hoppner, "The Duchess of York," fetched £6. A proof of "Night," by Houston, after Mercier, realised £6 6s. The Morlands sold well, as usual. "The Sportsman's Return," in mezzotint, by W. Ward, brought £7 15s. (Vokins); "Children Bird-Nesting," by the same, £11 11s. (Harrod); "Children Nutting" and "Children Playing at Soldiers," together, £11 10s.; "Blindman's Buff," by W. Ward, £14 10s.; and the exquisite "Visit to the Boarding School" and "Visit to the Child at Nurse," likewise engraved by W. Ward, £27 10s. (Colnaghi). Again, the set of six prints, "The History of Letitia," engraved by J. R. Smith, realised £61 (Vokins). After Peters, "The Fortune-Teller" and "The Gamesters," the one engraved by Ward, the other by Smith, realised £15 15s. (Mason). The prints after Reynolds averaged, perhaps, only four or five pounds apiece—many very indifferent ones going for a single pound or two—but a rare impression of Dickinson's fine mezzotint of "Mrs. Sheridan as St. Cecilia" reached the very high figure of £101 (Ridge). After Romney, the charming and well-known Lady Hamilton as "The Seamstress," sold for £10 10s. (Harvey); but the quite exceptional sum of £131 was realised by the first state of Louisa Lady Stormont (J. R. Smith's engraving). We do not find any mention of this plate in Mr. Percy Horne's agreeable catalogue of the engraved subjects after Romney and Gainsborough. Is it, then, so extraordinarily rare as not to have been known to this tasteful connoisseur and collector?

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

THE usual winter exhibition of works by old masters and deceased British artists will be opened at Burlington House on Monday, January 1. The private view is fixed for the preceding Saturday.

WE have already commented on the rapid and recent development of the Art Journal under its latest director, Mr. D. C. Thomson; and quite as notable as any progress which may yet be made by this art periodical of oldest standing is, we are bound to say, the change of front about to be accomplished by the Portfolio. This, which has been for many years the favourite art review of the connoisseur who does not care to concern himself with the newly-fledged glories of whoever may be the latest Associate, will appeal now to the genuine connoisseur more strongly than ever, because, in its studies of the different arts, it will become even more thorough than heretofore. For henceforth each number of The Portfolio, with far more numerous pages, though of a conveniently smaller size, will consist of a treatise complete in itself on some art matter, dealt with by the most competent hands. Thus—to take only one example—the January number will be devoted wholly to an exposition (this time by Mr. Hamerton) of the etchings of Rembrandt. The change, we are sure, is a wise one, since it cannot but result in furnishing us, as time goes on, with a well selected little art library of competent and agreeable monographs.

THE second part of Mr. Percy E. Newberry's memoir on the Tombs of Beni Hasan (published under the auspices of the Egypt Exploration Fund and edited by Mr. F. L. Griffith), will be issued to subscribers to the Archaeological Survey of Egypt during the first week of the new year.

ON Friday of this week Mr. Ernest Hart was to read a paper before the Japan Society on "Masters, Periods, and Styles in the Lacquer Work of Japan," illustrated by a classified loan collection of specimens of lacquer. This collection will remain on view in the rooms of the society, 20, Hanover-square, during Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday of next week. We may add that the society's library will be opened for the first time for the use of members on January 16.

THE STAGE.

THE indulgent up-to-date child will, we are sure, be glad to know of a couple of entertainments to which he can take his parents this Christmas. He may feel certain that even the most exacting paterfamilias, who is most of all bent on demanding a great show, will not complain when, duly chaperoned by his offspring, he is permitted to witness the revels at Drury-lane and the Lyceum. Sir Augustus will on Boxing day, at Drury-lane, offer the treat of "Robinson Crusoe," while at the Lyceum, Mr. Oscar Barrett will present "Cinderella"; and although both these entertainments, by a certain parade of being concerned with boyish or childish subjects, affect to be directed to the young, it is now coming to be understood that this is but a politic concession to ancient habit, and that it is for middle-aged and elder play-goers of experience that these exquisite displays of colour and comedy and graceful form and action are in truth provided. The Drury-lane pantomime is the fifteenth under the present management, and the last under the present lease, and Sir Augustus—supported by his scene painters, his costumiers, his regiment of supers, not to speak of Herbert Campbell and Dan Leno, of Ada Blanche, Marie Lloyd, and Lily Harold (erewhile a shining light at the Gaiety)—Sir Augustus, supported by these, we declare, may be trusted to do his best and to do it successfully. There is equally good cause for believing that Mr. Oscar Barrett's venture at the Lyceum will be both tasteful and successful. His pantomime at the Olympic, last Christmas, was good enough to justify the highest hopes for the forthcoming production; and if his piece at the Lyceum is as well written, and as well dressed and staged, as that was, there will be sincere rejoicing on the part of every lover of entertaining and not brainless spectacle. Then, again, for those who enjoy productions less vast, and perhaps with a literary character somewhat more marked, there will be at the Comedy under the direction of Mr. Comyns Carr the new version of "Sandford and Merton," to which Mr. F. C. Burnand has addressed himself.

MUSIC.

RECENT CONCERTS.

MR. E. GERMAN'S "Norwich" Symphony in A minor (No. 2) was played at the Crystal Palace last Saturday. Many composers write one such work, just to show that they understand form and can handle an orchestra; but Mr. German evidently means to push on and upwards. The temptation, nowadays, to write a Symphony is not great: a short ballad gives far less trouble, and, if successful, leads to fame, and possibly to fortune; whereas a long orchestral work is heard once or twice and then laid aside. Long is the roll of compositions which have perished in their infancy. Musicians need not be—as a matter of fact, are not—deterred by such a poor prospect; each one, indeed, hopes that he will prove the exception to the rule. And, again, with strong minds, failure is often the incentive to greater effort, and thereby to greater success. If Mr. German's Symphony be compared with his first, it shows a marked step in advance: the lines are less angular, the workmanship is more polished. The Allegro con brio is a cleverly constructed movement, but the thematic material lacks character, strength. Thematic development is all very well, but the best will not give individuality to the subject matter—rather the reverse. Mr. German's themes do not sufficiently arrest attention, so that what should always be prominent is apt, at times, to become subordinate. The Andante is extremely graceful, but not great. The Scherzo is daintily scored; it is light and lively, but the music has a familiar sound. The Finale appears to us strained, and it is heavily scored. There was something of this, too, in the first movement; much brass is wearisome to the ear. The Symphony was well rendered under the composer's direction. Herr Schönberger gave a brilliant performance of Rubinstein's pianoforte Concerto in D minor. It may, however, be asked whether this talented pianist could not devote his talents to music of a more ennobling nature. There are some pleasing themes in the work, but it is full of empty passages written for mere technical display; Beethoven and Schumann have taught us better things.

The programme of the last Monday Popular Concert was devoted, so far as the instrumental music was concerned, to modern masters. It opened with Dvorak's Quartet in E flat, played with charm and refinement under the leadership of Lady Hallé. The work has become a favourite at these concerts, and it certainly represents the composer at his best. Mr. Leonard Borwick gave for his solo Schumann's Sonata in F sharp minor (Op. 11); there has lately been a run on this work, for it has already been performed this season by Paderewski and by Siliti. The Sonata is not by any means a perfect work, but it is one of great interest. It may well be imagined that the player, as a pupil of Mme. Schumann, would interpret the music in the proper spirit; it was particularly in the last movement that we recognised the teacher's influence. The Allegro vivace was finely rendered, although there was an occasional harshness of tone. The Aria was a trifle drawn out. The Scherzo was given in a clear, crisp manner. The long Sonata did not satisfy the public, who never are satisfied. Mr. Borwick, however, wisely declined the encore. A little determination on the part of artists generally, and the public would soon cease from troubling. The encore nuisance has often been objected to, but why should not an end be put to it? The programme ended with Brahms's third pianoforte Quartet in C minor (Op. 61), a work but little known in comparison with the first in G minor, and the second in A major. The Scherzo of the C minor is lively, but the last movement is weak; the other two movements, although sombre and severe, are full of interest. The performance, with Mr. Borwick at the pianoforte, was full of intelligence and feeling.

J. S. SHEDLOCK.

MUSIC NOTES.

EDVARD GRIEG, the composer, will contribute an article on Robert Schumann to the January Century, illustrated with portrait.

SECOND EDITION, NOW READY.

In crown 8vo, cloth gilt, price 6s.

THE ONE I KNEW the BEST of ALL.

BY

FRANCES HODGSON BURNETT,

Author of "Little Lord Fauntleroy," &c.

With 30 Illustrations by Reginald Birch.

"With its blending of simple pathos and childish humour, with the innumerable delicately sympathetic touches, with the quaint terms of expression, and the genial reflection of the fancy of a gifted child, the book will please many people more than 'Little Lord Fauntleroy.'"—Times.

"This book caps a recent set of tales of child life that came from Mrs. Burnett's pen. It is as charming and as true to nature as any, and has the additional value of being true as well as imaginative."—Scotsman.

"This is not a book for Christmas only, but for all time. It is written in Mrs. Burnett's most charming style. The book is unique, and it ought to be allowed to remain so."—Lady's Pictorial.

FREDERICK WARNE & CO.,
LONDON AND NEW YORK.

Now Ready, price 3s. 6d.

THE LITTLE SQUIRE: A STORY OF THREE.

By Mrs. HENRY DE LA PASTURE.

"From a literary standpoint we cannot speak too highly of the undoubted merits which exist in every page of this delightful narrative."—Public Opinion.

"Adrien, 'the Young Squire'—is a little gentleman every inch of him, as lovable as 'Little Lord Fauntleroy,' and a good deal more real."—Tiverton Gazette.

CASSELL & COMPANY, Limited, London; and all Booksellers.

DR. GOODCHILD'S WORKS.—In answer to various inquiries, the first edition of "SOMNIA MEDICI" is now out of print, but the three series may still be obtained, in a second edition, of Messrs. KEAN PAUL & Co., who have also a few copies still in stock of the double volume, "MY FRIENDS AT SAINT AMPELLO," containing "CHATS" and "THE SAGE." The re-issue of "A FAIRY GODFATHER" is published by Messrs. BARNES & Co., and the new volumes of "LYRICS" and "TALES IN VERSE," price 5s. each, by HORACE COX, "Queen" Office, Bream's Buildings, E.C.

Price 2s. 6d., post free.

ON FISTULA, and its RADICAL CURE
by MEDICINES. By J. COMPTON BURNETT, M.D.
London: JAMES EPPS & Co. (Ld.), 170, Piccadilly, and 48, Threadneedle Street.

THE SOUTH DEVON HEALTH RESORT

At BISHOPS TEIGNTON is strongly recommended to all needing rest or pleasant healthful change. It is one of the loveliest spots in the County, and has all the comfort and charm of a Gentleman's Country home. Sea and moorland air, beautiful Private Grounds, Lawn Tennis Courts, Turkish and other Baths.—For terms, testimonials, apply to C. F. CARPENTER, Bishops Teignton, near Teignmouth.

A PENNY A DROP.

THE PURE OTTO OF ROSE

IN

Toilet "Vinolia" Soap and

"Vinolia" Toilet Powder,

NOW COSTS A PENNY A DROP.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1893.

No. 1130, New Series.

THE EDITOR cannot undertake to return, or to correspond with the writers of, rejected manuscript.

is particularly requested that all business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., may be addressed to the PUBLISHER, and not to the EDITOR.

LITERATURE.

Short History of Ireland. From the Earliest Times to 1603. By W. Joyce, LL.D. (Longmans.)

THIS is a very instructive and valuable work. Dr. Joyce is well known as a leading member of the Commission appointed, some years ago, to investigate and report on the remains of the Ancient Laws of Ireland; and he has already contributed largely to Irish history. The volume before me is an epitome of the annals and traditions of the Irish race, from the earliest times to the Elizabethan Conquest; and it is so supplemented, I am happy to learn, by a volume which will bring down the narrative from the close of the sixteenth century to the Victorian era. I have read the book with unflagging interest; and though I dissent from some of its statements, I wish to record my emphatic sense of its merits. Dr. Joyce, indeed, does not seem at finding "the law within the law" in his careful treatment of the masses of facts which make up his subject. He has not, perhaps, the philosophic insight of Sir Henry Maine, whose admirable review of the Brehon Laws is a masterpiece of thought. He may not possess the keen political insight of Mr. Goldwin Smith in his almost perfect essay on Irish History and Irish Character. His object has been to condense within a small compass, and to present in a clear and popular shape, the most prominent features of Irish national life: to give us, in Mr. Froude's language, a book of premises rather than of conclusions, true to realities and avoiding theories. And from this point of view his success is not doubtful. The work gives proof of conscientious research, of great industry, of ripe reasoning; it is thrown into an attractive form, and, if somewhat overlaid with details, is a succinct, pleasing, and compendious narrative; and it is pervaded, I think, by a just perception of the difficult questions it has to deal with, and by a sound and comprehensive judicial spirit. It will be of real use to those who wish to study the great problem of Ireland now before us—to the average Englishman, who must learn to think of the Irish as not an inferior race; to the Irish Nationalist, who must not be blind to the failings and faults of the people he loves; to the Unionist, who should never forget that a higher ideal may include a lower; above all, to the calm-minded observer, who believes that Ireland teaches, in a special way, the lesson of a large historical charity. The book, I should think, has been brought out with care: I have detected only a single misprint "1188"

A.D. for 1168 (p. 249); but this is rather an important error.

I can only glance at what may be called the antiquities of the native Irish race set forth at some length by Dr. Joyce. As in the case of all families of the Celtic stock, their art shows grace and delicacy rather than strength. Their poetry, seen at its best in the warblings of Moore, is exquisite in form but wants substance; and it had a marked tendency to over-refinement. The same may be said of their cunning work in wood, stone, and the precious metals; and in architecture they were not original, though they skillfully imitated the Norman genius. Their Chronicles abound in rich fancy, interwoven with a large substratum of fact; but those of the Four Masters, much the best known, do not even approach the heights of history, and they are mainly a record of tribal feuds corresponding to what the authors witnessed. Their laws, however, deserve special notice; and Dr. Joyce's sketch of the Brehon Laws, if it does not reach the depths of the subject, will, nevertheless, repay careful study. It is unnecessary to say that the coarse abuse bestowed on these laws, in their first principles, by the Cokes and the Davises, is sheer ignorance. The Brehon Laws did not recognise crimes because Ireland was not a complete State; they do not refer to a gradation of regular courts, because there was no system of public Irish justice. They were in the main a collection of Aryan customs, common to the race from the Ganges to the Shannon, but purged from much that was evil by Christian influence; yet they certainly show traces of the Civil Law of Rome, owing, doubtless, to the studies of the later Brehon jurists. The Brehon Code, or rather what we possess of it, is marked with the subtlety characteristic of Irish thought; but, as some Elizabethan lawyers allowed, it contains a great deal of natural justice, and it contrasts favourably with the English Common Law in this, that it is more humane and equitable in its conceptions. The great value, however, of this archaic body of law is that it clearly reveals the primitive structure and institutions of the native Irish community. The Brehon Laws prove that the Irish race was an Aryan people of pure descent, not as advanced as some of the Aryan families of man, but one with them in ideas and customs, and even in the forms of social life and government. The organisation of the ancient Irish tribes was half patriarchal and half aristocratic, as we see it in Greece and Rome, in England and France, in Germany, Russia, and India, at different stages of the course of their respective histories. The septs and clans represented the common brotherhood, originating in a mythical ancestor, that formed the mould of early Aryan life; but there was a hierarchy of kings and greater and lesser nobles, corresponding to what was established in Europe in classical and mediæval times, though not in a state of such full development. And, just as in the case of other Aryan nations, this organisation was settled on the land and exhibited its well known and peculiar features. The idea of a tribal possession of the soil was stronger in Ireland than in most parts of the Continent; and to this may be ascribed most of the old customs, called "sluttish usages," by Anglo-Saxon judges in the plenitude of their ignorant conceit. But the process known as the feudalisation of the land was going on in Ireland, as in other countries; the Irish kings and chiefs had their separate domains, and the conception of individual landed ownership—one of the chief signs of civilised progress—was being made distinctly, if slowly, manifest. Nor is it really doubtful but that this state of things would in the case of Ireland, as with other races, have gradually evolved social order and a national government, but for the unfortunate events of Irish history.

I must pass lightly over Dr. Joyce's sketch of Ireland before the Anglo-Norman Conquest. The succession of races that peopled the island were certainly of the great Celtic family, with the exception, perhaps, of the Milesian colony, which gave Erin her lines of native kings. The names of those princes, sprung from the loins of Heremon and Heber, mythical heroes, like Romulus and Remus, Hengist and Horsa, sufficiently prove that the race had made some progress in the arts of war and peace as early at least as the Christian era. Conn of the Hundred Fights was an Irish Tullus; Feredach the Law-giver was an Irish Numa; Cormac the Great was probably the first patron of learning in a still pagan country. It would be idle to follow the protracted tale of the annals of Ireland down to the twelfth century. The Irish Celts showed the tendency of the Aryan races to form something like a regular monarchy out of the chaos of tribes ruled by inferior chiefs. The great House of O'Neill held supreme power in Ireland, nominally, for five hundred years; but its authority was never sufficiently strong to create anything like a central government, or to establish order and general laws; and the island continued to be parcelled out into petty sovereignties, the seats of half independent clans. This state of things resembled the state of England before Egbert united the seven kingdoms and the state of France under her sovereign noblesse, and continual feuds and wars were the inevitable results. Yet it would be idle to infer from this that the Irish race were of a barbarian type. You might as well infer that Germany was a land of savages because it remained divided for long ages, and was the theatre of perennial discords; and, in truth, the organisation of the ancient Irish monarchy had much in common with that of the mediæval Empire, as Sir Henry Maine has conclusively shown. It deserves special notice that Ireland resisted the formidable invasions of the Danes more successfully than Anglo-Saxon England; and Dr. Joyce's account of the reign of Brian—the Alfred of the native Irish race—and of the celebrated fight of Clontarf clearly illustrates this historical fact. Nor is it any proof of the essential weakness and foolishness of the Irish people that it yielded easily to Anglo-Norman rule; the Danes had shattered the ancient monarchy and had spread anarchy and disorder everywhere, and the Normans were the conquering race of Europe, unrivalled alike in the field and in council. The German race was not weak and foolish because its divided princes repeatedly called in Louis XIV. and Napoleon to settle their feuds, and thus placed Germany under the yoke of France.

Dr. Joyce's account of the Paganism of ancient Ireland is, perhaps, somewhat indistinct and meagre. The native Celts were, no doubt idolaters, unlike the races beyond the Rhine, if Caesar and Tacitus are correct in this; and they were under the control of the Druid priesthood. But the Irish Druids seem not to have possessed the power of their caste in Britain and Gaul, though Caesar—a Roman sceptic—perhaps exaggerates the sacerdotal influence he witnessed in those lands. Christianity had the same magical spell in Ireland as in France and Germany. Its teachings transformed the hearts of men; kings, nobles, and people were drawn by Patrick from Paganism and its evil worship; and the race adopted the Faith with enthusiastic ardour. Dr. Joyce's description of the Early Church of Ireland errs, I think, in showing too much sympathy with Rome. That church was, to Roman eyes, schismatical: it rejected large parts of the Roman doctrine; it repudiated much of the Roman discipline; and it was hardly in communion with the Holy See. It was, in fact, almost an independent church, without an organisation of the regular kind, modelled in its hierarchy on the clan system, and heretical in more than one of its tenets; and it was regarded with dislike by orthodox churchmen. As for its work, it need not cause us surprise that it did not put an end to tribal discords, or even mitigate intertribal feuds; but there is some evidence that the state of morality in Ireland was extremely bad during centuries after the advent of Patrick; and the ancient Irish church has been censured for this by writers who have drawn their inspiration from Rome. Yet Ireland was really a land of saints and of learned men during this very period; her native church sent missionaries into many lands, whose labours deserve the highest praise from history. The influence of these distinguished teachers, who made their way over every part of Europe, and even the position held by Ireland as a centre of Gospel light and knowledge, may have been exaggerated in these reports; but there can be no doubt that the rays of the Faith were diffused from the distant island of the West, from the Solway Firth to the shores of the Euxine, during the long night when the barbarian hordes were overrunning the perishing empire. France, Switzerland, Germany, Britain, and Spain bear witness to the work of these Irish apostles; it was, in fact, largely due to the efforts of Irishmen that Europe remained Christian during the Dark Ages, and humanity and civilisation owe, in this matter, a debt to Ireland that can hardly be repaid.

Dr. Joyce's sketch of the state of Ireland from the days of Strongbow to the Tudor era, is correct and clear, with a single exception. The power of the Plantagenets seemed at first established; the subtle chain of feudalism held the island in nominal dependence for a long period; and the authority of the "Lord of Ireland" was acknowledged as supreme. But centuries rolled on, and three main causes gradually weakened the effects of the first conquest, and restored, though in a degraded state, the predominance of the old Celtic community: England did not set up a central government, with a general law extending everywhere; she abandoned the island to the Anglo-Norman settlers, and the Englishry, a distinct caste; and she gave no protection to the Irish chiefs and tribes, though these repeatedly sought for it. Again, the long wars with Scotland and France, and especially the internecine War of the Roses, turned the attention of English monarchs and statesmen away from Ireland and Irish affairs, and lessened the influence of the ruling race; and the power of England rapidly declined, in Ireland, during the fifteenth century. But, perhaps, the most potent cause of the revolution was this: the cunning and attractive Celtic genius transformed the Anglo-Saxon nature when in contact with it; and, despite barbarous and unwise laws, which endeavoured to keep the two races apart, successive generations of English colonists became in whole counties, in the progress of time, "more Irish," as it was said, "than the Irish themselves." Norman nobles adopted Irish usages—grew to be rather chieftains of Irish clans than guardians of Ireland for the Crown of England; and English settlers sank by degrees into the all-absorbing mass of the Celts around them. The results were apparent long before Bosworth closed the protracted strife between York and Lancaster. English rule had disappeared in five-sixths of Ireland: it was confined to the narrow strip of the Pale; and outside this lay the Celtic land, in a state of wild independence, under its native chiefs and what were called "the degenerate English barons." Within the Pale, however, the English colonists were a dominant and aggressive caste, that had not coalesced with the aboriginal race, and that maintained continual warfare with it. And thus, taking the island as a whole, there was no central and supreme authority: there was a conquering and a half-conquered people, for the time in a state of savage freedom, and each in different stages of social progress; there were two conflicting systems of law and usage, the one English, the other Celtic; and all that was best in the old Irish tribal life had been prevented from developing itself, and had gradually been checked and blighted. This condition of things was, so to speak, expressed in the ecclesiastical organisation of Plantagenet Ireland, which Dr. Joyce has almost failed to notice. A community of religion had not bridged over the feuds and divisions of the two races; there was a Church of the Pale and a Church of the Celts, and the two Churches were in continual discord as the two peoples were in a state of strife.

The Tudor monarchy arose in England, over the wrecks of the ancient feudal baronage, and became a strong government of despotic tendencies. The Tudor kings turned towards Ireland, and tried to assert their power amidst the wild chaos of weak colonial rule and of Anglo-Norman and Celtic independence. The beginning appeared in the famous law of Poynings—the aversion of later Irish patriots—which placed the Conventions of the settlers of the Pale under the authority of the Royal English Council, and attempted to extinguish many usages, inconsistent, it was deemed, with public order. It deserves notice, however, that Henry VII., despairing for a moment of the task before him, tried the great experiment of Home Rule in Ireland. He handed the whole country over to the Geraldines of Kildare, and sought to govern settlers and Celts through them. This attempt, as might have been expected, failed; and Henry VIII. made a real effort to reduce Ireland to "peace and civility." Dr. Joyce has not at all done justice to the Irish policy of this great sovereign, the most statesmanlike of any English ruler. Henry insisted on strengthening the central government, and, as a pledge of his purpose, assumed the title of King of Ireland instead of Lord; and it would have been well if this wise resolve had been steadily followed by his successors. But Henry, in some measure a Celt himself, had a real sympathy with a Celtic people; and his general scheme for ruling Ireland was, for that age, most enlightened and able. He tried to make the old Anglo-Norman baronage, and the princes and chiefs of the Irish tribes and clans, pillars of his throne and mainstays of his power, by turning them into great peers; but, while he aimed at creating a loyal class of nobles, he carefully avoided forcing English laws on the Celtic community outside the Pale; and there is every reason to believe that he wished to keep its primitive organisation and customs intact. Nor is it true, as Dr. Joyce hints, that the Reformation he introduced into Ireland disturbed society, to any great extent; the Irish chiefs accepted the spoils of religious houses as readily as English nobles had done; and in his reign there was scarcely any strife of creed in Ireland. Two causes, however, baffled and marred the efforts of Henry's wise Irish policy: some of the Anglo-Norman nobles and many of the Irish chiefs rejected the offers made by the King, and broke out into wild rebellions; and the era of a struggle with the power of England began. The other cause was stronger and more disastrous. The Tudor deputies and soldiers at the Castle of Dublin and the heads of the colonists of the Pale marked out the rest of the island as their prey; the risings that took place against the rule of England led to confiscations on an immense scale; and the gradual advance of English power was expressed in spoliation, universal and ruthless, which made the prospect of peace and concord hopeless.

The wise Irish policy of Henry VIII. was interrupted even before his death. It was not even thought of by his successors; and the work of conquering Ireland by intermittent raids on the Celtic region beyond the Pale, accompanied with barbarous rapine, and the annihilation of the old tribal system, went on to the close of the seventeenth century. Dr. Joyce has not traced the march of these events, or placed their sequence in full relief, with the firmness and clearness to be expected from him. Ireland was, doubtless, involved in the great crusade of the Catholic Powers against Elizabeth; and the Irish Celts more than once looked to Philip of Spain for armed support. Unquestionably, too, religion had its part in embittering the feud between two hostile races: the Anglican Church was forced on the Celts, and an attempt was made to convert them to the faith of the Tudors. But these were only minor causes of discord. The Irish clans and their leading men scarcely combined with the foreign enemies of England and her power; the Anglican Church was simply the Church of the Pale, extended, nominally, beyond its borders, and given a kind of Protestant aspect; and its clergy and doctrines had scarcely any influence in the lands of the Celt beyond Leinster. The conflict was essentially one of races: at the instigation chiefly of the colonists of the Pale, intent on schemes of rapine and greed, but partly, too, for its own safety, the English Monarchy tried to subdue the island, relying mainly on the Englishry and on weak armies sent out for the purpose; and the work of subjugation was carried out by the confiscation of the territories of the Irish chiefs, and of the degenerate Anglo-Norman nobles, by re-peopling them with great swarms of settlers, and by breaking up the old forms of Celtic society and establishing English law in the invaded districts. The Irish naturally rebelled against a conquest of this kind, and broke out into fierce but ill-concerted risings. A horrible period of trouble followed; and this was the real character of the protracted struggle, which, beginning with the spoliation of the great sept of O'Moore and O'Connor, under Mary Tudor, went on to the ruin of the princely House of Desmond, and ended with the fall of the Earl of Tyrone, the most illustrious Irishman of the seventeenth century.

Ireland was completely subjugated when Elizabeth died; and frightful as the long conflict had been, wise statesmanship might even yet have planted the germs of peace in the blood-strewn soil, and have gradually fused Saxon and Celt together. Unfortunately this was not to be. The mournful tale of Ireland's subsequent history will be treated by Dr. Joyce hereafter.

WILLIAM O'CONNOR MORRIS.

His Royal Highness Duke of Clarence and Arundel: a Memoir. By James Edmund Vincent. (John Murray.)

WHEN death entered the royal home at Sandringham on the 14th of January, 1892, and carried off the young Duke of Clarence, the expression of national grief that was aroused was as sincere and spontaneous as it was universal. Sympathy with the bereaved parents and for the bride was, of course, deeply and widely felt; but in all classes there was also present a sense of personal loss, as distinct from the natural regret that would arise from the cutting short of any life of promise. The unreserve, which is a characteristic of the age in which we live, had something to do with the creation of this feeling. The Prince had not lived many years, but those years had been spent in unrestrained intercourse with his fellow-men. The details of his life as a midshipman on board the Bacchante had been told by himself and his brother in artless fashion, while both at Cambridge and in his regiment all his doings were matters of common observation, if not of public chronicle. There was no wish for concealment nor occasion for it. Every page of Mr. Vincent's memoir bears testimony to this fact. It reveals the simplicity of the Prince's character and the blamelessness of his conduct. It shows him to have been—like all his family—a man of courage (though not physically strong), singularly docile, strongly imbued with a sense of duty, and, above all, extremely affectionate. With these qualifications he might, if such had been his destiny, have proved a worthy sovereign and endeared himself to his people. But it is unfortunately true that the greatest monarchs have not been those in whom the domestic virtues were most conspicuous; and it would be mere flattery to say that Prince Edward was likely to have become in any sense a leader of men, fitted to stem the rising tide of democracy or to detect and control political intrigue. It must be enough to believe that, from the goodness of his heart and the gentleness of his disposition, he would have been personally beloved, and would not have failed through any lack of desire to succeed.

Mr. Vincent seems to have done his delicate task with good taste and judgment. He owns that, as he made progress in it, his respect and admiration for the subject of his pen was ever increasing. Still, he stops short of anything like hero-worship, and tells the simple annals of the Prince's life without very much exaggeration of their importance. We do not doubt that there are many loyal subjects who will delight to learn (from the authoritative lips of the nurse) that "the Princess of Wales was in her glory if she could find time to run up into the nursery, put on a flannel apron, wash the children, and see them asleep in their little beds"; and they will be pleased to find that mothers and children are much the same in every rank, and that princes are not born with any greater wisdom or goodness than babes of no importance, and have no special immunity from childish ailments and childish faults. The influence which Canon Dalton had upon the Prince throughout his brief life is clearly seen, and without his assistance the memoir could scarcely have been written; but what will attract most attention in it are the letters from the Prince to the college friend—most happily chosen for him—whom he addresses as "My dear Harry." In any future collection of Royal letters they should have a place, not for their wit or brilliance or literary style, but for their unaffected simplicity of language and sentiment.

Mr. Vincent tells us that his book was compiled under the express authority of the Prince of Wales, and we must therefore conclude that in his Royal Highness's opinion some good purpose would be subserved by its publication. With all loyalty, we feel ourselves unable to share this opinion; and, to speak candidly, we think that at least half the published memoirs would be unwritten if only the subjects of them could have their wishes consulted. The record of the brief life of a blameless prince can, it is true, raise no ill-feeling; but what it records is, if judged by ordinary standards, decidedly trivial.

CHARLES J. ROBINSON.

The Posthumous Works of Thomas de Quincey. Edited from the author's MSS., with Introductions and Notes. By Alexander H. Japp. Vol. II. (Heinemann.)

IN one respect this volume differs from its predecessor. Both contain a certain amount of matter interesting to lovers of literature as such, and a certain amount of other matter calculated to appeal only to that smaller circle of De Quinceyites who, while they love the universally admitted excellences of their favourite author, have a still tenderer affection for his idiosyncrasies, elsewhere unrecognised as excellent or stigmatised as the reverse—a love of personal and undisputed possession like that felt by Lamb for his incomparable Margaret, Duchess of Newcastle. In the earlier volume, matter of the former kind largely preponderated, and the merely idiosyncratic work occupied comparatively few of the pages. Here the proportions are reversed; and though there are several entire papers and portions of papers which will appeal to the "great reading public," the volume as a whole is one for the connoisseur, the De Quincey-fancier or devotee.

And this observation applies not merely to the literary manner of these papers—noticeably idiosyncratic as it often is—but also to their matter, which is largely of a supplementary character. Thus, the articles on "Mr. Finlay's History of Greece," on "The Assassination of Caesar," on "Cicero," on "Memorial Chronology," and the paper entitled "Chrysoomania; or the Gold Frenzy at its Present Stage," deal, either in the way of addition or rehandling, with themes not inadequately treated in the sixteen volumes of the collected works. And therefore, though there is doubtless much in the recovered papers that is really new and fresh, the apparent staleness of the theme is likely—at any rate, in some cases—to dull the sharpness of the edge of appetite. With the exception of the essay on Mr. Finlay's standard work—which, as Dr. Japp points out, is in every way different from the previously published article—the papers on literary subjects are of more weight and interest than their companion pieces, which are, for the most part, comparatively slight and fragmentary. The most interesting of them all is undoubtedly the paper on "Conversation and S. T. Coleridge," to which the editor, with his usual happy instinct for the fitting, has given the place of honour both in the volume and on the second title page. Prefixed to it is a brief invocation to the name of Coleridge, which was found attached to one of the sheets of the MS., and which is perhaps more characteristic than anything else in the volume of the De Quincey who really dominates our imagination—the De Quincey of the Confessions of an English Opium-Eater, and the Suspiria de Profundis.

"Oh, name of Coleridge, that hast mixed so much with the trepidations of our own agitated life, mixed with the beatings of our love, our gratitude, our trembling hope: name destined to move so much of reverential sympathy, and so much of ennobling strife in the generations yet to come, of our England at home, of our other Englands on the St. Lawrence, on the Mississippi, on the Indus and Ganges, and on the pastoral solitudes of Austral climes."

This is the De Quinceyan grand manner; and there is something dizzying in the sudden drop from its stateliness of invocation to the long-drawn ineffective garrulity, with its far-fetched fatuities of that something which De Quincey mistook for humour, of the opening pages of the paper which it introduces. It was certainly not of those opening pages that I was thinking when I spoke of this essay as the most interesting of Dr. Japp's latest gleanings. And, indeed, the ordinary reader, as distinguished from the connoisseur, will lose nothing by languidly turning over the leaves until he sees that De Quincey has finished his disquisition of conversation in general, and the conversation of Coleridge in particular, and has begun to talk of Coleridge himself. Of course, here again the theme is a familiar one, but then it is a theme of almost inexhaustible interest; and the essay is not a re-handling of previously used material, but an addition to it of real and permanent value, which may, as Dr. Japp suggests, "be accepted as De Quincey's supplementary and final deliverance upon Coleridge." Save for half a dozen immortal passages which haunt every memory, I doubt whether De Quincey has written anything more unfaltering, more sustained, more fully informed with that rapt elquence of his, in which imagination frees rhetoric from the merely rhetorical taint, than the passage, unfortunately too long for quotation, which will be found on pp. 34-6. The recovery from oblivion of this one passage would in itself suffice to justify Dr. Japp's labour of love. But, apart from its literary charm, the essay has a distinct value in the emphasis laid upon a fact, the significance of which has been largely missed by most of the writers upon Coleridge's life—the fatefully disastrous effect of the death of his father and the subsequent separation from his mother by his removal from Devonshire to London. Dr. Japp himself, in a most interesting note, proves that Coleridge himself was fully alive to the unfortunate results; but others have hardly given sufficient weight to this early misfortune as a really dominant factor in the poet's life.

I have already said that this volume is, in general interest, inferior to its predecessor; and, indeed, two or three of the papers seem altogether unworthy of preservation. De Quincey is, however, a writer of surprises—one never knows where his good things may come; and, therefore, Dr. Japp may be wise in giving us everything, so making it certain that we shall miss nothing.

JAMES ASHCROFT NOBLE.

Mediaeval Records and Sonnets. By Aubrey De Vere. (Macmillans.)

THIS book is intended to be a partial fulfilment of a high design. The Legends and Records of the Church and the Empire "tracked its theme only through the transition time ending with Charlemagne"; the poet wished "to add to that earlier series a second part illustrating the middle ages" (Pref., p. 7). But the strain of a political crisis has been found unfavourable to the completion of that design, and the poet calls these poems "fragments"—relatively, that is, to his original intention of poeticising the middle ages; for the individual poems here are complete enough.

If I were to endeavour to express the merit of these poems by one epithet, I should certainly select "high-minded." What appears to me their defect would be less easily defined: perhaps "didactic" comes nearest to it. The poems are pervaded with an ardent sense of Catholicism. And while, on the one hand, the romantic aspects of the Cid, of Joan of Arc, of St. Francis, of Columbus, are powerfully presented, so, on the other, the outside reader feels a little flooded with theological assumptions: he does not readily accept, as undeniable, that "the middle ages were cheerful ages," nor that the Crusader's banner was unsoiled, nor that the Catholic star always shone white, not red.

But, after all, the sincerity, of which these poems are full, is the main thing; and I only speak of their theological bearing because I think that, in some measure, it affects their style. The four "Legends of the Cid," with which the book begins, seem to me to suffer, as blank verse, from too much moralising. Something of Wordsworth's irresistible craving to sermonise makes the noble incidents of the story look hazy. I think we could all see the dead Cid riding into battle upon Baveca, "with awful, open eyes," better for not being reminded immediately that the chronicler was "Writing for men who inwardly believed God made the world, and rules it."

But the simple narrative of Ximena's end would atone for worse platitudes than that—

"Long nights she knelt
In prayer beside her lord, lest aught ill-done
Or left undone might bar him from God's vision,
Though restful with those saints who wait God's time
In that high paradise of Purgatory
Sung by the Tuscan, where Eunoe flows
And Lethe, and Matilda gathers flowers:
Four years fulfilled, in peace and joy she died."

Of the succeeding poems, that entitled "St. Francis and Perfect Joy," is, I think, the most fascinating. There is a touch of the divine humour of St. Francis in puzzling his faithful comrade, "Leone, little lamb of Christ" (the very address is humorous!), with more and more negations of Perfect Joy, and finally giving the simple, all-too-probable solution. It is useless to quote a fragment of this poem, for its charm resides in its completeness. The oft-told tale of Joan of Arc is told, once again, in blank verse (pp. 121-152). It is, I think, the least attractive piece of work in the book: it verges on the wearisome, though not without strong passages—e.g., the interview (p. 145) between Beaufort and Beauvais:

"Beauvais made answer low: 'Lord Cardinal,
A king's son, you, and walk the world unquestioned;
There's not one street in Rouen I could tread
If I released that maid!' The Cardinal next
With thin lip curled, 'The better for Barabbas!'"

The following poem, "The Higher Purgatory," is admirably expressed; but its ideas, as the prefatory note points out, are already familiar to those who have read "The Dream of Gerontius." The two poems, "Columbus and the Sea-Portent" and "Columbus at Seville," are excellent, especially the latter. For all his enthusiasm for the Middle Ages, the poet is not blind to the greater incidents of modern times. Here is Columbus' vision of atonement for the oppression of his well-loved Indians by the Spaniard:

"Asia is dead: Europe survives awhile:
What if ere centuries five her crown should fall?
Sad Western Land, so long without a name—
Mine be it never, I am all unworthy—
What if thy pangs presage some lordlier birth
Than Earth has witnessed yet? Thy destined Race,
When that which now laments hath passed to glory,
That Race shall be a nobler Race than Spain's,
A Race that rivets not the bond, but breaks it,
A Race the children of some land which now
Names that the Sunset World! It little knows
The sunrise of the Future is with thee
Though thunder-showers whose rain was rain of blood
Were its sad omen!"

Nor is the same power absent from "The Death of Copernicus"—a poem whose pathetic undertone is more attractive than its ingenious scientific and theological argument. But I think that the third sonnet, on Tennyson's death (p. 258), will perhaps touch more hearts than anything else in the book. Am I wrong in thinking it has already appeared in print?

"None sang of love more nobly; few as well:
Of friendship none with pathos so profound;
Of duty sternliest proved when myrtle-crowned:
Of English grove and rivulet, mead and dell:
Great Arthur's legend he alone dared tell;
Milton and Dryden feared to tread that ground:
For him alone o'er Camelot's fairy bound
The 'horns of Elf-land' blew their magic spell.
Since Shakespeare and since Wordsworth none hath sung
So well his England's greatness; none hath given
Reproof more fearless or advice more sage:
None intier taught how near to earth is heaven:
With what vast concords Nature's harp is strung;
How base false pride; faction's fanatic rage."

Mr. Aubrey De Vere has striven hard in this book to show that all Christians have loved one another: he has certainly shown us that some poets do.

E. D. A. MORSEHEAD.

Pagan Papers. By Kenneth Grahame.
(Elkin Mathews & John Lane.)

"It is indeed," said Dr. Johnson, "not easy to distinguish affectation from habit"; and the pages of Mr. Kenneth Grahame are full of quaint affectations that never offend, so naturally do they fall from his pen. It were difficult to find another book of the same size—some 160 pages in all—better stocked with pithy, even memorable, sayings. Rarely does one meet with an author whose wit is so apt, whose touches of sentiment are so genuine. Although most of these essays have appeared in a weekly paper, they smack not at all of journalism. Their literary merit is of a more permanent sort. A certain unity of thought runs through them all, causing the volume to form a perfect whole: an unusual quality in such collections. Many of Mr. Grahame's subjects have done duty for countless essayists before him; it is his delightful individuality that adds a new charm to the familiar. His paper on tobacco is good reading, though one remembers Calverly and the Arcadian mixture; the eulogy on the loafer ranks second only to Mr. Stevenson's praise of the idler. There is, too, a distinct flavour of poetry in much of Mr. Grahame's work: one could have wished "White Poppies" had been written in verse, were not the prose of it so delicate and adequate.

But, excellent as the various papers are that form the larger half of the volume, fully as they deserved to be rescued from the oblivion that shrouds last month's journals, the six sketches grouped together under the title "The Golden Age" are the gem of the collection. One is almost tempted to declare that child life has never before been so happily described. They have the same merit, a merit generally to seek, yet absolutely essential to success in this class of work, that was so noticeable a feature in A Chronicle of Small Beer. The author is simply a recorder: he writes down the facts and the child's views about the facts, but in his own person comments not at all. The great fault in most tales of childhood and school life is that the author will not allow his boys and girls to speak and think for themselves, but continually forces his own thoughts and commentaries on the reader, thereby spoiling the illusion.

It is difficult to make choice of a favourite where all are so good; but for humour perhaps "A Whitewashed Uncle" is the best. The review of the various uncles who have been tried and found wanting is irresistibly funny; and the story of how the verdict of disapproval unhesitatingly passed on "Uncle William, who had just returned from India," is suddenly upset by the present of four half-crowns, is infinitely diverting:

"I'll tell you what we'll do," said Edward, the master-mind, rising, as he always did, to the situation, "we'll christen the piebald pig after him—the one that hasn't got a name yet. And that'll show we're sorry for our mistake."

"I, I christened the pig this morning," Harold guiltily confessed; "I christened it after the curate. I'm very sorry—but he came and bowled to me last night, after you others had been sent to bed early—and somehow I feel I had to do it."

"Oh, but that doesn't count," said Edward hastily; "because we weren't all there. We'll take that christening off, and call it Uncle William. And you can save up the curate for the next litter."

It would be unfair to quote further, though the new setting of the legend of "The Sleeping Beauty" tempts strongly: indeed, the volume is so tiny a one, it is wrong to quote from it at all. But every page contains something worth quoting, as those who read these papers—for their own sakes may they be many—will quickly discover.

In outward form the book is all it should be, realising Charles Lamb's desideratum, in that it is "strong backed and neat bound."

PERCY ADDLESLAW.

NEW NOVELS.

Barabbas. By Marie Corelli. In 3 vols. (Methuen.)

A Life Awry. By Percival Pickering. In 3 vols. (Bliss, Sands & Foster.)

A Woman of Forty. By Esmè Stuart. In 3 vols. (Methuen.)

Claudea's Island. By Esmè Stuart. (Sampson Low.)

Paving the Way. By Simpson Newland. (Gay & Bird.)

Hartmann the Anarchist. By E. Douglas Fawcett. (Edward Arnold.)

Beyond the Bustle. By Jenner Tayler. (Sampson Low.)

Mauryeen the Outcast. By Insko Novo. (Digby, Long & Co.)

In a North Country Village. By M. E. Francis. (Osgood, McIlvaine & Co.)

MISS MARIE CORELLI has now been before the world for several years, and has earned a position which should enable her to bear with equanimity the occasional unkindliness and captiousness of critics. Indeed, beyond repeating the view we have always held, that her works are not likely to obtain any permanent place in literature, or any greater success than may be implied by the existence of a large demand for them on the part of the class of persons who are always eager to see and to hear some new thing, there is no reason why we should not do full justice to the picturesque fancy and fertile imagination of this author. Miss Corelli is a word-painter of more than ordinary exuberance, and she is certainly remarkable in her choice of themes. In Barabbas it has been her pleasure to describe for us the Crucifixion and Resurrection, interweaving with her narrative some romantic episodes in the shape of a love-story. Upon the discretion exhibited in stepping in where most novelists would assuredly have feared to tread, there is, fortunately, no need to express an opinion; with regard to the management of her story, it is enough to say that the author has cleverly contrived to steer clear of any such violation of good taste as might conceivably have been created by the introduction of lighter themes in a narrative so solemn. Barabbas, the condemned murderer, entertains a passion for Judith Iscariot, sister of Judas, a woman of great beauty, but of frivolous character, who has long been secretly mistress of Caiaphas, the High Priest. His discovery of her worthlessness, and the steps whereby both he and she become converted to a belief in the divine mission of Christ, form the chief portions of such part of the story as is not occupied with actual descriptions of our Lord's condemnation, death, and resurrection. It must be admitted that the writer has, with one or two exceptions, consistently adhered to the Scriptural account, only borrowing here and there from tradition and the Apocryphal Gospels. But a work so ambitious must necessarily provoke criticism at almost every turn. It is a little startling, for instance, to be told that Christ's figure suggested "such mighty muscular force as would have befitted a Hercules." Surely Renan's view is far more probable, which attributes to the Saviour a slender physique, as shown by His breaking down under the weight of the Cross, and by the fact of His death taking place before that of the two thieves. Nor can one help being a little impatient with an author who persistently has recourse to extravagant flights of fancy in recording the simplest incidents. We are told by the Evangelist that Pilate "took water and washed his hands." How is this description improved by saying that "slowly lowering his hands he dipped them in the shining bowl, rinsing them over and over again in the clear, cold element, which sparkled in its polished receptacle like an opal against fire?" Here, as elsewhere, Miss Corelli has deliberately placed herself in competition with the severe simplicity and dignity of the Bible narrative. Whether her attempt to paint the lily is successful is a question which we leave her readers to decide for themselves.

From a new firm of publishers comes A Life Awry, a romance of a decidedly sentimental order, consisting in great measure of a neat series of essays on social problems, and more particularly on the mutual relations of man and woman. These essays are placed in the mouths of speakers who deliver them in compact, cut-and-dried form, at alarmingly frequent intervals. When will English novelists learn to recognise the fact that ponderous dialogue of this sort is neither natural nor entertaining? The plot is slight enough. Hugh, nephew and heir of Sir Edward Lilcot, returning home after several years' absence, finds that his cousin Judith, the playmate of his early years, is a deformed cripple, owing to an accident in the hunting field. Thereupon he transfers his affections to Aline Graham, Judith's companion, but breaks off his engagement with her upon discovering that she has concealed from him the fact of her being his illegitimate cousin. However, the estrangement is healed; and Judith, who has been left forlorn, considerably drowns herself, in order to secure the uninterrupted happiness and prosperity of the betrothed couple. The author's name is apparently a masculine one, but the hand is the hand of a woman.

Why A Woman of Forty should be further described as a "monograph" it is difficult to understand. The book is a novel of the ordinary kind, and of rather more than ordinary merit. Magdalen Cuthbert, the "woman of forty" is a well-drawn central figure, and in many ways a striking portrait. She is well supported by Frank Milton, R.A., and his wife, Lady Mary Milton. The author writes with considerable skill, and these three volumes are well worth reading.

Another novel by the same hand and exhibiting the same general features is Claudea's Island. The point which chiefly strikes one, after perusing the two books, is the want of versatility in the construction of their plots. In A Woman of Forty the hero, Brice Leslie, after engaging himself to Griselda Foy, a young New Zealand girl, falls a victim to the enchantments of Magdalen Cuthbert, and things do not right themselves until the latter's death. In the present novel we have much the same sort of story over again. Herbert Ravenscroft, whose engagement with the Hon. Georgina Ashton has only just been broken off, becomes enamoured of a village maiden, and is only saved from a mésalliance by the reappearance of the Hon. Georgina upon the scene, followed by the death of the rustic beauty. In spite of this, however, Claudea's Island is a pretty little story. It circles mainly about a sea-coast child of nature, who combines the gift of discerning sermons in stones, messages in the whisper of the winds, and a generally romantic appreciation of nature, with plenty of practical common sense. Her admirer is a local Methodist preacher; but when the artist-poet, Herbert Ravenscroft, comes upon the scene, the current of her being flows, as might have been expected, in his direction. The details of the story are worked out with a good deal of dramatic vigour.

Paving the Way is a story of early Australian enterprise, before gold was yet discovered, and when aboriginal blacks, bush-rangers, and escaped convicts or ticket-of-leave men from Van Dieman's Land—as it was then called—interfered in various ways with the peace of settlers. Mr. Newland's narrative is rather long, and probably a number of readers will be dissatisfied both with the character of Roland Grantley, the hero, and with the final turn of events; but as the author claims for his tale a foundation in real fact, his discretion upon these points must have been limited. Apparently, much intimate knowledge of the country and its early settlers is displayed; and, in spite of the tedious length of the book, there is a good deal in it that will be found entertaining.

Whatever results may ultimately follow the discovery of a practicable aerial machine, it is certain that the inventors will possess tremendous opportunities for good or evil as long as they can keep the secret. In Hartmann the Anarchist we have a fanciful picture of the havoc which might be created if the party who propose to regenerate society by means of dynamite were the first to solve the problem. The year 1920 A.D. is the date assigned to the story; and one Stanley, a gentleman of socialistic tendencies and a candidate for parliamentary honours, is taken up into Hartmann's "aeronef," The Attila, and is an unwilling witness of the demolition of the Houses of Parliament, St. Paul's, and a vast portion of the streets and squares of London, by the discharge of bombs, blazing petroleum, and other engines of destruction. The book is abundantly illustrated.

When a reviewer is compelled to admit that he has enjoyed several hearty laughs over a book, it may be taken for granted that there are others who will find it amusing too. Not that the fun of Beyond the Bustle is apparent from the outset, or will be appreciated by everybody. It takes us some time to get intimately acquainted with Mr. Horace Poltimore, aged forty-five, and Mr. Paul More, aged twenty-seven, who agree to share a hut together for twelve months in a wild spot on the sea-coast near Cape Town, "in order to minister to the cause of art, science, and literature"; but when known they are delightfully amusing. Mr. Jenner Tayler's work thoroughly merits commendation as being entirely original in design, and filled with humour of the driest and drollest kind.

Indifferently printed, weak in expression, faulty in grammar, and atrocious in spelling is Mauryeen, a title borrowed from a leading character of the story, who, however, is as often as not called Mauryreen. Divested of a superfluity of padding and extraneous episodes, the tale is about the secret marriage of Captain Oswald Lafere, heir to a large Irish estate, with Hatty, daughter of Terence O'Neill, a resident on the estate, and his subsequent trial for her supposed murder. Terence O'Neill, though a great personal friend of Oswald Lafere, has refused to consent to Hatty's marriage with him, from what motive it is difficult to understand; nor is there any reason why Lafere, upon succeeding to the property, should not have openly acknowledged his wife, as he was in honour bound to do. To the very last page of the book Hatty Lafere is called Hatty O'Neill. There are many other extraordinary blunders.

A collection of slight stories under the general title of In a North Country Village is charmingly written. Difficile est proprie communia dicere: and there are not many writers who could be trusted to make a dozen tales out of various aspects of village life in such a way as to arouse a reader's interest, and allure him to the end of the volume. Mrs. Francis has been completely successful, however, in her effort. No doubt the secret of her charm lies in the entire sympathy she displays with the manners and lives of the humble people she is describing.

JOHN BARROW ALLEN.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Biblia Innocentium. By J. W. Mackail. (Reeves & Turner.) There must be much of interest to the critic and the general reader in "the story of God's chosen people before the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ upon earth, written anew for children by J. W. Mackail, sometime fellow of Balliol College, Oxford." The general reader is continually in search of some satisfactory selection or version of the Old Testament to give to his children, but as yet no "child's Bible" has appeared which can claim to have pleased a large public. The critic on the other hand is aware of the difficulty or, perhaps, impossibility of the task, and delights to watch the efforts made to cope with it. When the task is attempted by a notable scholar, "sometime fellow of Balliol," the result, whether a success or a failure, is unusually interesting. From one point of view we can at once pronounce Mr. Mackail's effort successful. He has an infallible ear for the essential words and phrases of the Old Testament narrative; he picks out at once the characteristic sentences of each chapter and knits them together in a style which is both simple and dignified. The refined scholarship and delicate sensibility to style for which Mr. Mackail is distinguished are obvious in every chapter of Biblia Innocentium. The book will certainly delight the scholar. But will it delight the child? On this point we have our misgivings. The book very soon tires the reader. It would be unfair to say that it reads like a summary, but it has somewhat the effect of a summary upon us when we read it. Now we suspect that the ideal Biblia Innocentium ought to expand rather than compress. We suspect too that in reading the story of Joseph a child does not appreciate the exquisite style and language of the authorised version, but merely the directness and interest of the tale. Just what Mr. Mackail most successfully retains, the child does not feel to be essential or wonderful. The more leisurely pace as well as the more varied movement of the stories according to the Authorised Version give that version an advantage over Mr. Mackail's rendering. Of course much depends upon the age of the child. What will please a girl of six will not please a boy of twelve. Mr. Mackail's book is adapted rather for the boy of twelve; and if it is not the ideal Biblia Innocentium, it is at least a gallant attempt towards its realisation. Mr. Mackail's translation of the Aeneid, and his delightful book on the Greek Anthology are such works as we look for from a "sometime fellow of Balliol College"; the Biblia Innocentium comes as a surprise, and yet when we read it we find that it is not a new departure. Its excellencies are those we are familiar with in Mr. Mackail's work; its weakness was probably inevitable.

A King's Hussar: being the Military Memoirs for Twenty-five Years of a Troop-Sergeant-Major of the 14th (King's) Hussars. Collected and condensed by Herbert Compton. (Cassells.) This is a book of good faith, which does credit to its author, and to its editor as well. It nowhere reflects the monotony of barrack-room life, nor the excitement and hardships of warfare; for our soldier only saw service in the abortive Transvaal War. But it does describe, with much vividness, the personal history of a long-service trooper: his early days as a recruit, the protracted march from Hounslow to Edinburgh, the strange experiences of keeping the peace during election riots and Fenian scares in Ireland, the comparative luxury of Indian cantonments, and the final tranquillity of a cavalry depot at home. The whole is diversified by good stories, excellently told. On the one hand, there is no attempt to disguise the soldier's weakness for boisterous larking, for drink, and—we regret to add—for pilfering, provided that it be not from a comrade. On the other hand, the sergeant-major dwells with more emphasis upon the honour of serving the Queen, and upon the opportunities for winning both credit and emolument. He himself retired with a pension of upwards of £40 (which would have been appreciably larger except for an unlucky accident), and with several hundred pounds in the savings' bank besides. Any young fellow who has a love for the life and sufficient self-control may easily rise to the same position, with a chance of yet more stirring adventures. We are sure that the author will agree that we are putting his book to the best use, when we say that we are going to present it to a recruit in the — Hussars, who is just now undergoing the initial discomforts of the riding school at Canterbury.

Our Ocean Railways. By A. Fraser-Macdonald. (Chapman & Hall.) The rise, progress, and development of river and ocean steam navigation was a story well worth writing, and Mr. Fraser-Macdonald's work is, on the whole, well done. That the first half of the book should be the more entertaining was natural enough, for there is a something of romance even in the first voyage of the Margery from Wapping Old Stairs to Gravesend that does not follow in the wake of the quickest Cunarder. There were numerous adventures on the high seas, too, in the early days that deserve commemorating. We read how "the proud monument of Yankee skill," the Savannah, was chased on her first Atlantic cruise by a King's cutter that fired "several shots," deeming her to be on fire and in need of aid, an experience, it seems, that greatly delighted her intrepid skipper, but would, probably, irritate not a little his descendants. The stories of the great lines—in the case of the P. & O. and Cunard, full of surprise and adventure—are energetically and sufficiently told. Nor has Mr. Fraser-Macdonald forgotten the prosaic and practical questions that confront both ship-owners and ship-engineers. The diagrams and explanations of the various engines, paddle wheels, screws, that have been, or now are, in use, are excellent; while the financial problems involved by changes, coal consumption, and canal dues are not ignored. The volume also contains some capital maps and charts. Unfortunately, we cannot unreservedly praise the illustrations. Some of them have considerable merit and historical value, but others, as, for example, the sketches of saloons, drawing-rooms, &c., savour of advertisement. This is a pity, because Our Ocean Railways, despite its title, is a genuine book, and deserves to be popular.

Ivanda: or, the Pilgrim's Quest. By Captain Claude Bray. (Frederick Warne.) We well remember having read and praised Randall Davenant; but we do not care for this second Eastern story by the same author. On the former occasion, he laid his scene in the middle of the eighteenth century, when the Mahratta power was at its height; and he narrated, with due regard to historic truth, the adventures that a young Wykehamist might easily have experienced at native courts. Now, he has gone to Tibet, the one region of the world still closed to European travellers, and therefore a legitimate field for romantic fiction. We are prepared to receive any news from Tibet, except just what Captain Claude Bray has brought back: that it is a refuge for the kidnappers and swindlers of England. And, surely, if these gentry were to hide themselves in a happy valley behind the Himalaya, the very last mode of life they would adopt is that of meditation in a Buddhist convent. Apart from this general objection, the subordinate episodes seem to us rather clumsily introduced. The conduct of the chief villain, Colquhoun alias Clutterbuck, is full of inconsistencies which are never explained; the part of Ivanda herself is a very weak one; and the final catastrophe of an explosion has already been made familiar to us by Prof. Murray in his Desert of Gobi. The hero is a good enough character, clearly drawn and well sustained. Captain Bray would do better next time, if he chose a simpler plot and avoided sensational incidents.

A Book of Thoughts. By Mary B. Curry. (Fisher Unwin.) Mrs. Curry is a daughter of the late Mr. John Bright. Her little book, she tells us, is "the outcome of two distinct lines of thought." Her first intention was to compile a book for daily reading, with a suggestive passage for each day. Afterwards it occurred to her that it would be a pleasure to preserve some record of the "passages of prose and poetry peculiarly associated with her father's memory." For this reason she has given her book a sub-title, "Linked with Memories of John Bright." She also informs us that some of the extracts are taken from books marked by her "father's own hand." It is much to be regretted that Mrs. Curry did not confine herself to passages either marked by her illustrious father or such as "were to him a constant source of mental and spiritual refreshment." Such a collection would be a real addition to the literature of our country, and we hope that it may yet be made before the disposal of John Bright's library. With this reservation, we can recommend the little volume before us as a Christmas gift book. Simplicity of thought and language pervades every page. As we are in ignorance as to which are John Bright's own extracts and which his daughter's, we offer no criticism on the extracts themselves. It is, however, interesting to find that, while there are fourteen quotations from the poetry of Mr. Lewis Morris, there are only two from Shakspeare and four from Tennyson. Mrs. Browning scores a tie with Mr. Lewis Morris, and James Russell Lowell beats him by one extract. The omissions are also noteworthy. There are no extracts from Bacon, Dryden, Pope, Burke, Byron, Scott, Keats, or Shelley. The great poet of Puritanism is adequately represented; but, saving two extracts from Ben Jonson and Sir Philip Sidney, there are none from the contemporaries of Shakspeare.

Well Begun. Notes for those who have to make their Way in the World. By Joseph Parker. (Nisbet.) This singular religious and commercial medley might well be termed a Manual of Middle-class Morality. It enforces truth, indeed, from the highest motives, but supports it by aphorisms of business and the philosophy of those who wish to get on in life. The "Ten Religious Commandments for Men of Business," together with "The Commercial Decalogue," are of questionable taste in their affectation of smartness. The author's short autobiography at the beginning of the book smacks of the pride that apes humility; while his language on the Duke of Westminster, because his Grace's liberality does not flow in the channels dear to Dr. Parker—"Will the Duke kindly hand over his wealth to some poor man and take in exchange the poor man's poverty?"—and the like, merits even stronger reprobation. The absence of light and sweetness among this volume of platitudes is marked. It is a bold venture thus to characterise Dr. Parker's book, seeing the awful fate which he tells befell one who with great profession of religion "attempted from time to time even to criticise the ministrations of his pastor." The most satisfactory portion of the volume consists of sixteen pages of quotations from Law's Serious Call.

Platonics: a Study. By Ethel M. Arnold. (Osgood, McIlvaine & Co.) This is a short and a simple story; but it is not exactly slight, for it is well thought out, and the characters are well drawn. It should be a warning to all young people who are inclined to take up with "Platonics," or esoteric Buddhism, or any other theory, which, however sublime in itself, leaves out of consideration the important factor of human love. Susan Dormer went on contentedly, it may be happily, on the road towards self-annihilation, until, just when she was almost believing that she was reaching the point when absorption in the World Soul was possible to her, and greatly to be desired, she found that she was in love with Ronald Gordon. She refuses him "on principle," and discovers too late that the principle is mistaken. Soon another young lady, without any inconvenient theories, supplants her in her lover's affections, which, as far as she was concerned, were quite "Platonic"; and so she is left without either lover or philosophy, and has nothing to do but die, which she does in a manner very creditable to herself, and not too soon to spoil the honeymoon of her friends.

A Romance of Skye. By Maggie Maclean. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.) This is a story of the last century touching on Flora Macdonald and Prince Charlie. It is set in the atmosphere of Ossian's Poems, which gives it an unreal air to the present generation. The book contains a good deal of local colour; and there may be persons who like to read about "the far-away wail of the coronach," or "dark, dark, yet beautiful, was the pure gold passion of his love." If so, this Romance of Skye can be heartily commended to them.

A Little Handful. By Harriet J. Scripps. (Blackie.) Willie is one of those restless, fidgetty boys who are the plague of all their relations and friends. They are bad enough in real life, but in fiction they are simply intolerable. Of course there are exceptions: some are very amusing, and some, in spite of all their "audaciousness," have endearing qualities; but Willie, so far as his history is related in this volume, has few redeeming features. But he is very young and full of life, and not ill-natured; so that possibly he may be an instance of splendid "raw material," and turn out well in the end. Let us hope he will; but we cannot say that we are much interested in his future career, nor in that of any other of the characters in this rather commonplace story.

A Storm and a Teapot. By Frances H. Wood. (S.P.C.K.) An excellent Christmas Eve story. The plot is ingenious and exciting, the characters are lifelike, and the moral is admirable and not too persistently intruded. Many books twice the length have not half the incident and variety of this little tract. The author should attempt something more elaborate.

The Squatter's Home. By Marianne Filleul. (S.P.C.K.) Although this story is terribly moral and proper, it is yet readable, from a knack the author has of telling a tale in a natural and simple style. The hero is a born Sunday-school teacher, and his conversation always presupposes a Sunday-school audience; but he is good-natured and well-intentioned, and doubtless would receive good-humouredly the tricks the normal boy would play upon him. The best thing we can say of the book is that, to our great astonishment, we have read it through.

All About a Five-Pound Note. Hope Carlyon. (S.P.C.K.) The heroine of the five-pound note actually steals it, and actually gets three months for her folly, and therefore the tale is much more sensible and improving than the more orthodox story in which the heroine is falsely suspected of stealing the note. It is admirable that the S.P.C.K. should proclaim that stealers of five-pound notes are not so bad as society supposes.

Elizabeth Stuart. By W. E. Windus. (Freshwater, I.W.: Gubbins.) A prettily bound little volume, which though a mere dramatic sketch, as the author calls it, is not wanting in ability. The subject is pathetic, being the death of Princess Elizabeth, Charles I.'s young daughter, in Carisbrooke Castle. She was found dead one morning with her cheek resting on an open Bible, the gift of her father, at the verse "Come unto me all ye that are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest." The story, though sad, does not admit of much dramatic treatment; and of plot there is next to none.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MESSRS. W. H. ALLEN & Co. will publish, in February, four volumes containing a selected list of upwards of 14,000 MS. letters from the Bengal archives, edited by Sir William Wilson Hunter. In an historical introduction, the editor shows, from contemporary documents, the exact status of the Bengal landholders, and the conditions under which landed property was held in the second half of the last century. A very full analytical index, both of subjects and official districts, concludes the book, giving a general view of the rural system in Bengal from 1782 to 1807. The work, which was begun many years ago, endeavours to place in clear chronological sequence the development of the district administration from ten years before the Permanent Settlement (1793) to fifteen years after it.

MR. GEORGE SETON, author of The Law and Practice of Heraldry in Scotland, and of various works on family history, is about to issue, in a very limited and richly illustrated edition, a History of the Family of Seton during Eight Centuries. Mr. Seton has been engaged in collecting material for this work during many years past; and, considering the important part played by various members of the house in the history of Scotland, the book cannot fail to be an interesting one. Those desiring further particulars, should apply to Mr. G. P. Johnston, 33, George-street, Edinburgh.

THE council of the Royal Geographical Society have undertaken the publication of a grand Atlas of Scotland, consisting of sixty-two plates of maps and plans, together with descriptive letterpress. The basis of the topographical section, in forty-five maps, is of course the Ordnance Survey, reduced to a uniform scale of half an inch to the mile; but, wherever the Ordnance Survey has already become out of date, local authorities have been consulted for the insertion of new roads, hamlets, inns, &c. This section has been entrusted to Mr. John Bartholomew; geology, to Sir Archibald Geikie; physiography, to Prof. J. Geikie; meteorology, to Dr. Alexander Buchan; and natural history to Mr. J. A. Harvie-Brown, who is responsible for two maps showing faunal areas and deer forests and salmon rivers. Permission has been obtained to dedicate the work to the Queen. Only a limited edition will be printed, and it is hoped that it will be ready for issue to subscribers early in June, 1894.

MESSRS. WILLIAMS & NORGATE will shortly issue a System of Lucid Shorthand by the late W. G. Spencer, which has for many years remained unpublished. In a prefatory note, his son, Mr. Herbert Spencer, expresses the "conviction, long since formed and still unshaken, that the Lucid Shorthand ought to replace ordinary writing."

George Chapman: A Narrative of a Devoted Life, is the title of a memorial biography of the late vicar of the Church of Annunciation, Brighton, which will be published by Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein & Co. immediately. The Rev. Alfred Gurney, vicar of St. Barnabas, Pimlico, contributes a preface; and the volume will also contain a portrait and other illustrations.

THE Rev. C. M. Manson will publish in a few days, through Mr. Elliot Stock, The Psalms at Work: being the English Psalter, with a few short notes about the use of the Psalms.

MESSRS. SWAN SONNENSCHN & Co. will publish next year an English adaptation, by Miss Franks, of Hanschmann's Friedrich Froebel, which supplies an account of the development of his educational ideas in his life.

A CERTAIN Dr. O. W. Owen has gone one better than Mr. Ignatius Donnelly. In a book published at Detroit, Mich., he claims to have proved—again with the help of a cipher—not only that Bacon wrote the works bearing the names of Shakspeare, Marlow, Green, Peele, and Spencer (sic), as well as The Anatomy of Melancholy, but also that he was the lawful son of Queen Elizabeth and Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, who had been secretly married in the Tower of London.

WE learn from the New York Critic that, during the nine months ending September 30, the total importation of books into the United States was valued at 3,161,411 dollars, almost equally divided between those free of duty and those dutiable; and that the value of the books exported was 1,639,622 dollars. The importance of these figures arises from a comparison with those for previous years. The imports show very little change, except a slight decrease in dutiable books; while the exports show an increase of exactly twenty per cent. There can be no doubt that the increase in exports is due to the clause in the new copyright law, requiring domestic manufacture.

As a sort of Christmas present for their friends, Messrs. Elkin Mathews & Joan Lane have had printed a dainty little quarto pamphlet, containing an anonymous prose fancy on "Limited Editions," together with a sonnet entitled "Confessio Amantis," by Mr. R. Le Gallienne.

WE may also mention that the Daily Chronicle for December 27 contained a sonnet on "Christmas Day," by Mr. William Watson, which shows all his old strength, both of thought and style. This last is certainly not issued in a limited edition.

DURING the past month, Mr. J. S. Stuart-Glennie has been delivering a course of seven lectures, on "The Conflict of Races," at the Philosophical Institution, Edinburgh. He explained the origin of civilisation as arising from the economical conflict between higher and lower races; expounded his theory of three primitive white races—Archaian, Semitic, and Aryan; and traced the source of Greek culture and legend to the sanctuary of Dodona and the Pelagic Larissa.

WE have received the Almanach de Gotha for 1894 (Gotha: Perthes), which is the first to be published under the rule of Duke Alfred. Naturally, therefore, it is illustrated with portraits of the new Duke and Duchess. The other portraits are of the King of Serbia, who looks astonishingly mature for his seventeen years; and of Charles Prince Fugger-Babenhhausen, who represents the mediaeval banking house of Augsburg. This last illustrates the second part of the work, and not the least instructive: that which gives the genealogies of those who claim to rank on an equality with the families of European sovereigns. The third part, dealing with ducal houses, has on this occasion undergone thorough revision. We also notice that corrections have been introduced in the political account of Great Britain, though something still remains to be done in this respect. But we must implore the editor to submit the entire Indian section to some expert. Not only are many native names hopelessly misspelt, but there are such blunders of fact as describing the Calcutta High Court as a court of appeal for all India, and giving to the governors of both Madras and Bombay the suffix of "Bart." On the other hand, we must not omit to mention the inclusion of Sir West Ridgway as Governor of the Isle of Man.

THE FORTHCOMING MAGAZINES.

THE following series of papers will appear in the new volume of the Expositor, beginning in January: "Agrapha: or the Sayings of Jesus not recorded in the Gospels," by the Rev. Walter Look; "The Connexion between the Third Gospel and the Epistle to the Hebrews," by Dr. Alexander, Bishop of Derry and Raphoe; "The Bible and Science," by Sir J. William Dawson; and "New Testament Teaching as to the Second Coming of Christ," by Dr. Joseph Agar Beet. The January number will also contain a reply, by Prof. W. M. Ramsay, to Mr. Chase, and a criticism of a paper on Raysbrook by M. Maurice Maeterlinck.

THE twenty-ninth volume of the Antiquary will commence with the January number. Among the articles promised are "The Armour in the Tower," by Viscount Dillon; "The Aborigines of the Canary Isles," by Captain J. W. Gambier; and "Old Stone Monuments and Barrows," by Messrs. H. H. Lines, Ernest E. Speight, and George Payne. The editor himself, the Rev. Dr. G. Charles Cox, will write on "White Horses and other Turf-cut Figures"; Mr. G. S. Gomme on "Municipal Antiquities"; and Mr. Edward Peacock has promised papers on subjects connected with the Great Civil War. The two series on Romano-British antiquities and on Provincial Museums, by various writers, will be continued.

THE January number of the Asiatic Quarterly will open with a Sanskrit Sloka, wishing its readers a Happy New Year. The poet, Trimbakal Jadavrai Desai, represents Dhatri (the creator) as surveying Naraloka (the world of men) from the height of Swarga (Indra's heaven), and showering down sprouts of the Kalpadruma (the wishing-tree that grants all desires). Among the political articles we may mention: "England and France in Indo-China," by General Sir Harry Prendergast, the conqueror of Upper Burma; a sketch of the career of the late Maharaja Dulip Singh, by Sir Lepel Griffin, together with reminiscences by Dr. G. W. Leitner and Baron Textor d. Ravis, and a photograph of him in royal Sikh costume; "The New Viceroy and our Indian Protectorate," by Sir Roper Lethbridge; and "The Last Indian Census," by Mr. John Beames. In the section headed Orientalia, there will be learned papers on "Egyptian and Babylonian Triads," by M. Felix Robiou, and on "Lamaism and its Sects," by Surgeon S. A. Waddell, who also contributes a note on hairy savages in Tibet; and an illustrated article on "Graeco-Buddhist Sculptures," by Dr. Leitner, who deserves the credit of being the first to recognise their significance.

THE Reliquary for January will contain the first of a series of articles on "Old Municipal Corporations in Ireland"; a paper by Miss Florence Peacock on "Some Lincolnshire Bell Customs"; and further instalments of "The Pre-Conquest Churches of Northumbria," by Mrs. C. C. Hodges; and of "The Cathedral Churches of Sweden," by Mr. T. M. Fallow.

EDNA LYALL'S new story—"Doreen: a Tale of Irish Rights and Wrongs"—will be begun in the Christian World of January 4, and continued week by week throughout the year.

A SERIAL story by Mr. Silas K. Hocking, entitled, "A Son of Reuben," will be begun in the Family Circle of January 2.

THE number of Great Thoughts for January 6 will contain an article on Walt Whitman, by the Rev. Dr. R. F. Horton; and also a hitherto unpublished portrait of Mr. Gladstone, printed on plate paper.

TRANSLATION.

TWO SONNETS OF ANTHERO DE QUENTAL.

I.

The Nocturnal One.

SPRINT that passeth, when the wind sleeps low
O'er ocean and the moon is waxing great,
Thou only know'st how cruel is my fate,
Coy son of night time floating to and fro.

And as a song that—sorrowful and slow—
Wafted from far, doth subtly penetrate,
Thus o'er my heart's so tumult-troubled state
Thou pourest out oblivion of woe.

To thee I trust the dream in which I'm borne
By instinct's light, that darkness' veil hath torn,
And seeks the lasting Good where phantoms wone.

Thou knowest all my nameless misery,
The fever of the Ideal now wasting me,
Thou Genius of the Night and thou alone!

II.

A Romantic Burying-Place

There where the sea breaks with a whirl and roar
Monotonous, 'tis there my heart shall find
Its place of sepulture, and where the wind
Uplifts its lamentations on the shore.

And let the summer suns their rays outpour
Upon it day by day, in lingering kind;
In winter time let blasts with fury blind
Raise up around it the dry sandy floor,

Until it is undone, and then, resolved
In finest dust, oh, let it be revolved
Amid the whirlwinds lifted by the breeze,

And be it swallowed up with all its pain,
Its weariness and strife, its loves in vane,
In those unfruitful tides and bitter seas!

EDGAR PRESTAGE.

THE AMERICAN DIALECT.

(Concluded.)

Marlesford, Wickham Market.

My former observations under this heading having received an unexpected measure of attention, favourable and unfavourable, in the United States, I now offer what further I prepared, some months ago, by way of elucidating the deterioration, more or less deliberate, which the English language is undergoing at the hands of my fellow-countrymen.

In the second sentence of my paper in No. 1090 of the ACADEMY, there is an error which I would correct. "Most of us," &c., stood in the proof-sheet. Its "of us" should simply have been struck out. The subsequent context altered, "Most of them," which I carelessly allowed to be printed, produces a tautology.

F. H.

JOHN BULL'S LINGUISTIC WAYWARDNESS.

Among the doctrines which our more advanced thinkers inculcate by distinct implication, there is one which appeals to every American citizen. The superiority, under whatever aspect, of our energetic countrymen, with their resultant prerogative to dictate uncontrollably, is to be asserted with all peremptoriness. These premises require no development.

From time to time, fame has whispered, indeed, that, in certain quarters, our title to general pre-eminence has been gainsaid. Now, however, we are in possession of evidence to that effect, on grounds more substantial than disputable rumour. The fact of the contumacy in question exact inquiry has established as beyond doubt, and has also ascertained the lengths to which the contumacy has been carried.

Enlightened as is the age in which our lot is cast, the baleful influence of conservatism is not yet wholly extinct: mistaken loyalty to effete or exploded prescription is, in benighted corners, still occasionally observable; and the claims of the democracy are still feebly challenged. For instance, the minority of English-speaking persons, not so much concerning what they should say, as concerning how they should say it, refuse to abide by the rulings of the majority. As if their obligation in the matter were not definitely and definitely determined, they are found to arrogate to themselves the right both to go on perpetuating, at will, the language of their uncultured forefathers, and to alter it spontaneously.

On these topics no one has dissented in a loftier tone, or with more cathedral complacency, than Mr. Brander Matthews, Professor of Literature in Columbia College, New York. Allusion is here intended to the opening chapter of his vivacious and incisive Americanisms and Britishisms, &c., recently published. Encomium of his reach of observation and of his judicial spirit being forborne, I come at once to his leading maxim. This he enunciates in these terms:

"A blunder made in Great Britain is to be stigmatized as a Briticism; and it is to be avoided, by those who take thought of their speech, just as though the impropriety were a Scotticism or a Hibernicism, an Americanism or an Australism. When a locution of the London apprentice is not in accord with the principles of the language, there is no prejudice [presumption] in its favour, because it happened to arise beside the Thames, rather than on the shores of the Hudson or by the banks of the St. Lawrence" (p. 13).

With a view to their merited castigation, Prof. Matthews parades "Briticisms a-plenty," as he elegantly puts it; and, though he sometimes apparently forgets himself, as in preferring station to the American depot, it is clear that, for the most part, he regards an expression mainly peculiar to Great Britain as "a Briticism," and, hence, "a blunder." Considering his zeal for what he accounts pure English, he is not to be blamed for obelizing whatever even approaches to deviation from it. Nor is he to be blamed, but, on the contrary, to be commended, for having, in the interest of two nations, deigned to sully his pen by discussing the vocabular vagaries of that unimpeachable practitioner of the Johanni-Taurinian dialect, "the London apprentice." As hardly need be said, that so expert a philological naturalist can have failed to discriminate vermin from nobler creatures is a supposition not lightly to be entertained. Thus much precluded, let us inspect some of the specimens of creeping and crawling things, all of them more or less odious, which he has dragged into light. With respect to one of such character he delivers himself as follows:

"In the United States, beets are served at table, as a vegetable, while, in Great Britain, beet-root is served. Oddly enough, the British do not say potato-root or carrot-root, when they order either [the former or the latter] of those esculents to be cooked; and, as the American usage seems the more logical [analogical], perhaps it is [the] more likely to prevail" (p. 24).

It is true that, in England, beet-root and beet are words distinguishing the garden-beet and the field-beet, eaten, respectively, by man and by divers of his four-footed friends. Still, why observe such an invidious distinction? Added to this, over-nice and finical refinements are abhorrent to our republican simplicity. "Perhaps," surmises Prof. Matthews, our American usage "is [the] more likely to prevail." But we shall do prudently not to be sanguine on that head; Englishmen being notoriously pertinacious in clinging to their old mumpsimus.

One of "perhaps the two most frequent Briticisms, and the most obvious," as we now have it once more pertinently emphasized, is "the use of different to, where the American, more appropriately and logically [analogically], says different from." Shakspeare, very probably, was accustomed, during a good part of his life, to hear, along with different from, different to; and yet he eschewed it, just as he eschewed the verb experience, which was pretty firmly radicated in our language before he was born. And what if it has been employed, here and there, by hundreds of English writers since, when yielding to their sense of euphony, such as it was? In spite of Horace's differt sermoni and differre colori, and Quintilian, and the younger Pliny—which and whom, to Macaulayize, "every schoolboy knows" and knows about—here, again, we are instructed, a stand is to be taken on that infallible criterion, the "logical" [analogical], not to mention the appropriate. Away, then, absolutely, with different to, even if, in the name of "logic," we have to discard averse to and dissimilar to! Nay, can any one interdict an American "logician" from contending for dislike from, disproportionate from, and an exception from a rule? Whatever may be the notes in our own eyes, why are we not to note the beams in the eyes of Englishmen?

An admirable thing is scientific caution; and Prof. Matthews exemplifies it repeatedly. For instance, "I am informed and believe," he tells us, "that an Englishman says lift, where we say elevator." So, too: "I understand that an Englishman stops at a hotel, at which an American would stay." With reference to stop, for stay, Dr. Webster's Editors, in 1880, gave it as a colloquialism proper to the United States, where it certainly is common; and, if a suggestion may deferentially be hazarded, is it not a little hard that Englishmen should be arraigned for chatting in a loose way just as we do ourselves? But, to go back to lift, for elevator, availing myself incidentally of the expansive style of backwoods oratory, egregious, I would protest, is the taste of those who, towards the enrichment, aggrandizement, ennoblement of our all but ecumenical language, would patrocinate a vocable consisting of a solitary starveling syllable, rather than one of three or four. To borrow the felicitous neologism adoptively sanctioned by Prof. Matthews, let us, above all, be "orotund," as befits a people well-nigh unprecedentedly pre-pollent and approximately unparallelable for its amplitudinousness territorially. Who among us, forsooth, would refuse to cast his vote against the abject British gum, a mere humming pretext for a word, and not to be named the same twelvemonth with our mellifluous mucilage, "linked sweetness long drawn out"?

Again:

"I am told that an Englishman calls for a tin of condensed milk, when an American would ask for a can; and that an Englishman even ventures to taste tinned meat, which we Americans would [should] suspect to be tainted by the metal, although we have no prejudice against [aversion to] canned meats" (p. 19).

Once more:

"I have been led to believe that an Englishwoman of fashion," on occasion, "will expect to meet no end of smart people, meaning, thereby, not clever folks, but swells" (p. 19).

If Englishmen choose to talk about a tin, instead of imitating us and saying a can, the more is the pity, to speak charitably. And then consider "no end" of people! "No end of his goods" is, as we all know, a barbarism which an ancient dramatist indulged in; and countless of his fellow-subjects have offended in like manner. But what is that to us? And why, uncountranced by us, should the English attach to smart, as they have long been attaching, the sense of "obtrusively stylish or dashing"? However, the reader's patience must not be taxed to exhaustion.

Under favour, I would now "hesitate" a comment or two, on the chance of their proving serviceable, in the event of a reappearance of the instructive essay from which a few of the more noticeable criticisms have been extracted.

Several questions are prompted by what follows:

"An American with a sense of the poetic cannot but prefer, to the imported word autumn, the native and more logical [analogical] word fall, which the British have strangely suffered to drop into disuse" (p. 20).

But how many Americans are aware that fall is for full of the leaf, by ellipsis? And, with those to whose consciousness its elliptical character is not present, how does it gratify "a sense of the poetic"? And on what ground is it, as compared with autumn, or apart from comparison therewith, felt by them to be analogical? What Englishman, moreover, whether town-bred or rural, is unfamiliar with the phrase "to take physic spring and fall"? Hereabouts, at least, every one speaks of the rise of the leaf and the fall of the leaf, to denote seasons. Autumn occurs in Chaucer, whereas fall of the leaf has not, I believe, been traced beyond the reign of Henry the Eighth, though, doubtless, it is considerably older. Fall of the year came up, not improbably, but little more than a hundred years ago. Fall, for autumn, it may be added, is remarked on, at some length, in the issue of Notes and Queries for May 16, 1891.

Hail, bestiole malodorous, B flat, by bard as yet unsung! "The British," avers Prof. Matthews, "are trying to cramp our mother-tongue by limiting bug to a single offensive species." Instead of the word bug, as used in England at this day, we find, it may be in advance of the invasion of the pest so called, the French punaise, which, at least from 1604 onward, was long current, having side by side its synonym chinche, from the Spanish, introduced somewhat early in the seventeenth century. That, except in certain compounds, the insectile bug ever meant, among Englishmen, besides what it now means, anything but "beetle" or "caterpillar," would be difficult to prove; and that "bed-bug" is what it meant originally has not been disproved. According to the lexicographer Bailey, under the date of 1730, it is, restrictedly, "an insect that infests bedsteads," &c., and its sense has never been extended by popular English usage.

"Trying to cramp our mother-tongue," those lawless free-handlers of speech, "the British," we are also apprised, are "giving to bloody an ulterior significance [signification], as of semi-profanity." If chronology had not barred the way, who knows that Prof. Matthews might not have charged Zipporah with "profanity" for styling Moses "a bloody husband?" What "profanity," even demi-semi-, or more minutely fractional, attaches to bloody awaits elucidation. Touching the age of the vulgarism animadverted on, as far back as Dryden's time, if not still further back, "bloody drunk" was, according to authentic history, the occasional condition of the beatified forefathers of some of us; and American sailors, equally with others, talk of "bloody rascals." For the rest, "the British" is a comprehensive designation; and, if the ladies and gentlemen among them patronize the slang of tarpaulins, the circumstance has escaped me. And here, apprehensive of being tedious, and shrinking from being thought presumptuous, I conclude my annotations.

A noteworthy impression which is assumed to have gained a footing is intrepidly combated by Prof. Matthews. "The cockney," he insists, "has no monopoly of good English, if even he has his full portion." Very sensibly, likewise, he scouts the "belief," which we learn that he has discovered to obtain somewhere or other, "that the Londoner is the sole guardian and trustee of the English language." Alleging that "this is a belief for which there is no foundation whatever," he lays it down, no less irrefutably than dogmatically, that "it is not the London apprentice who [that] is to set the standard." The persons thus indicated collectively, much as their unbounded pretentiousness and self-conceit may haunt and irritate, are also bidden to observe, with all distinctness, that independent republicans are determined to set their magisterial dictation at utter naught. Let them mark and weigh this announcement: "No American writer worth his salt would think of withdrawing a word, or of apologising for a phrase, because it was not current within sound of Bow Bells" (p. 5). And let them, with their inability to appreciate the spirit of all-round freemen, carp, if futilely so disposed, at such things as the following, selected from the essays of which the initial section has been cursorily noticed:

"The long voyage around the Cape, or through the canal" (p. 2).

"We Americans should be sorry to think that there are to-day, in England, any of those who, in 1863, sympathized with the Dean of Canterbury, and who are not now heartily ashamed of their attitude then" (p. 4).

"It is too much to expect, perhaps, that the British critic shall look at this Yankee independence from our point of view" (p. 7). Also at pp. 31, 122.

"Even the gentle Thackeray—if the excursus may be forgiven—is not wholly free from this failing" (p. 8).

"Of Criticisms there are as many, and [those] as worthy of collection and collocation, as were the most of the Americanisms the all-embracing Bartlett gathered into his dictionary" (p. 14). "The most of their writing serves," &c. (p. 40). "The most of those who write," &c. (p. 40). "The author who has done the most to make us known to the nations of Europe" (p. 89).

"This is an optical delusion, just as the jet of water in the centre of a fountain appears closer to the other side than to ours" (p. 20).

"'Cunning,' . . . in the mouths of his fair countrywomen, . . . is sadly wrenched from its true significance" (p. 20).

"Nowhere will it ever be spoken other than by a few men here and there, gifted by nature, or trained by art" (p. 28).

"The grammarian, the purist, the pernicketty stickler for trifles, is the deadly foe of good English, rich in idioms and racy of the soil" (p. 29).

"Every man . . . must sympathize with Professor Lounsbury's lack of admiration for," etc. (p. 29).

"An unprejudiced critic . . . would probably discover an equality of blemish on either side of the ocean" (p. 30).

"These modifications ['traveler' for 'traveller,' 'theater' for 'theatre,' &c.] from the Johnsonian canon" (p. 36).

"A student of optics is not qualified to express an opinion in aesthetics" (p. 41).

"The logical form 'program' is not common even in America" (p. 43). Also at pp. 42, 57.

"Possibly it is idle to look for any logic in anything which has to do with modern English orthography on either side of the ocean" (p. 45). Also at p. 53.

"Dr. Johnson was as illogical in his keeping in and leaving out of the 'u' in words like 'honor' and 'governor' as he was in many other things" (p. 48).

"The illogic of the great lexicographer is shown in his omission of the 'u' from 'exterior' and 'posterior,' and his retention of it in the kindred words 'interiour' and 'anteriour'" (p. 48).

"The irresistible tendency of mankind to cut across lots" (p. 52).

"Sometimes it seems as though our orthography is altogether vile" (p. 58).

"Thomas Abthorpe Cooper was criticized, in London, as an American; but he had been born in Great Britain" (p. 80).

"Only the best of books of foreign authors" (p. 86).

"Cooper's Indian has been disputed, and he has been laughed at; but he still lives" (p. 98).

"Counting of noses is not the best way to settle a dispute about literature" (p. 112).

"So wrote Longfellow a many years ago" (p. 114). Also at p. 135. "A many of them" (p. 144).

"No American pirate imperils his salvation to reprint them" (p. 124).

"Those . . . are derelict to the first duty of the critic" (p. 125).

"Dr. Johnson's own style, elaborate, if not artificial, and orotund, if not polysyllabic" (p. 135).

"An assertion which Matthew Arnold failed to understand, but did not fail to denounce" (p. 140).

"There are 'good things' a-plenty in this new volume" (p. 141).

"Our continued existence is not worth whit" (p. 142).

"But the writers from whom she quotes are not always of that compliment" (p. 146).

"Colonialism is scarcely an adequate explanation for this devotion to," &c. (p. 148).

"Only three of the thirteen little tales are supposed to happen in this great city" (p. 187).

"And Zadoc Pine himself is one of the most direct and manly characters who has stepped from real life into literature. He has gumption and he has grit" (p. 189).

These quotations are, in behalf of Prof. Matthews, confidently submitted for consideration. In the course of his researches, the Professor has unearthed the fact that "there are to be seen, in the English newspapers, now and again, petty attacks on the style and vocabulary of American authors of distinction, which it is, perhaps, charitable to credit to London apprentices." Of the "style and vocabulary" at which these "apprentices," or similar wiseacres, are pleased to bite their thumbs, some samples have now been collected, by way of illustration. These sciolists require to be informed that not quite everybody is at one with them in ignoring, for instance, shall for will, would for should, around for round, delusion for illusion, derelict for unfaithful, excursus for passing remark, fail for hesitate, illogic for inconsistency, illogical for inconsistent, logic for consistency, logical for analogical, modification from for violation of, other than for except, and significance for signification. The celebrated Dr. Noah Webster, discoursing in 1790, exhorted his countrymen to "seize the present moment, and establish a national language as well as a national government." Of his exhortation, though it produced little immediate effect, our patriotic contemporaries are, in the fulness of time, at last beginning to be sufficiently mindful. And, if we advert to that desirable consummation, an international language, why, in this age of triumphant democracy, are not the many to dominate, in all things, irrespectively of the choice of the few, and, while legislating for themselves, simultaneously legislate for others?

To turn to American literature for a moment, I cannot but, with due submission, regret to see that Prof. Matthews, in surveying it, has left one of its most meritorious pioneers wholly uncommemorated. Cooper he calls "the first of American novelists"; of his Spy he says that it "is really the first of American novels, and it remains one of the best"; and, the year 1820 premised, he tells us that "Irving's Knickerbocker was the only [American] book in print which to-day is read or readable." Back in the thirties, when Radcliffianism had not yet begun to pall on me, few books were more my delight than the almost classical novels of Charles Brockden Brown. And to what excursive student of fiction are they unknown? Brown, by birth a Philadelphian, was gathered to his fathers in 1810, that is to say, several years before Cooper published a page. That, as is implied above, Edgar Huntley, to name but one of Brown's works, is no longer either "read or readable" is a judgment which surely calls to be amended. So heedlessly has Prof. Matthews expressed himself, too, that he would seem never to have heard of, with others, Jonathan Edwards and Benjamin Franklin.

From the very heading of this section of what I have said on the American dialect, no one can have mistaken its design. That its elements of exaggeration and burlesque are more than inconsiderable will hardly be objected, however, by intelligent and unprejudiced observers who are familiar with the kind of spurious patriotism now rife in a certain class of American literature. The advocate who is personated has, in the main, not a few counterparts in the United States. If he sometimes glosses expressions in what he quotes, it is to be understood that he would simply clarify them for British readers, or, for the nonce, defer to their taste; it is not that, bitten with Anglomania, he looks on them disapprovingly. Neither in his predilection for American innovations, on the ground that scarcely anybody about him deems them reprehensible, nor in his attempts to justify them by pretty nearly any pleas that may first offer themselves, is he particularly exceptional. As to his fancy for aiming to copy the English of England himself, it must be set to the account of a peculiarity which is far from being common. A sprinkling of "orotundity," indulgence in an occasional explosion of many-syllabled "spread-eagleism," and the use of oddities of locution, he would, at the same time, almost claim as his birthright. His verbiage is somewhat national.

Prof. Matthews must be perfectly well aware that the strictures, virtually assumed by him to be ill-founded throughout, which he is inclined to father on his mythical "London apprentices," are precisely of the same sort as those of the best-qualified English critics, when they touch on Americanisms; the truth being, however, that those critics, from dislike of unprofitable iteration, if not because they accept the apparently inevitable, now-a-days pay the more ordinary Americanisms comparatively little heed. The essayist's reason for resenting those strictures is, for all his affectedly arrogant attitude, unmistakable. Just as might have been anticipated, he says: "As I recall the list of those whom I have heard use the English language with mingled ease and elegance, I find fewer Englishmen than either Scotchmen or Americans." Nearly all Americans Scotticize largely; and hence he makes as though he believed that one should look to Scotchmen or to Americans for English at its best. But, instead of this preference, why not candidly admit that standard English, a thing practically confined to England, is of difficult acquirement for an American, and, therefore, is generally rated by him as of little account? Let a home-staying American pursue the study of English literature as diligently as he may, still, except at the cost of untiring watchfulness, his phraseology will be infected by the colloquial contaminations and solecisms of his constant or casual associates; and such watchfulness, unless he chances to be one in a hundred thousand, he elects to decline. Many as there are among our compatriots who herein concur with him, there are, nevertheless, a few apart from them who strive, and not unsuccessfully, to write English which will, on the whole, provoke no censure from the reasonable on either side of the Atlantic. Of this cast of English is Dr Channing's and Edward Everett's, avowedly an object of disdain to the cucurient or cock-a-doodle-doo school, of whose views the author of Americanisms and Briticisms is a typical and influential representative. Yet Prof. Matthews may rest assured that no more in America than elsewhere will bluster and bounce eventually carry the day against common sense and culture. Not unfrequently may he be reminded, too, that equipment, either as a verbal critic or as a critical verbalist, is not a gift of intuition. If he would "gladly teche," he should, as a condition precedent, "gladly lerne." Alike his theory and his practice, as a rhetorician, are, at present, such as only New York "apprentices" and their allies can possibly accredit.

March 1, 1893.

SELECTED FOREIGN BOOKS.

GENERAL LITERATURE.

- BATTANDIER, Albert. Le Cardinal Jean-Baptiste Pitre, évêque de Porto. Paris: Sauvatre. 15 fr.
BENTON, Th. Jacqueline. Paris: Boussod. 60 fr.
DELAPEYRIERE, Eugène. La France économique et l'armée. Paris: Charles-Lavauzelle. 12 fr.
GRABBELEINS, die attischen. Hfsg. v. A. C. nse. 5. Lfg. Berlin: Spemann. 60 M.
KAEMMERER, L. Max Liebermann. Leipzig: Seemann. 5 M.
LITZMANN, B. Friedrich Ludwig Schröder. Ein Beitrag zur deutschen Literatur- u. Theatergeschichte. 2. Th. Hamburg: Voss. 8 M.
MEYER V. WALDECK, F. Unter dem römischen Scepter. Aus den Erinnerungen d. deutschen Publicisten. Heidelberg: Winter. 6 M.
OLDENBURG, W. Kerbschnittmuster aus d. nordischen Museum zu Stockholm. Stockholm: Ohlms. 16 M.
SENTUPÉRY, Léon. L'Europe politique: Gouvernement, Parlement, Presse. Paris: Lecène. 10 fr.
TESKE, C. Das mecklenburgische Wappen v. Lucas Cranach d. Ä., die Bücherzeichen d. Herzogs Ulrich zu Mecklenburg u. Anderes. Berlin: Stargardt. 6 M.
TRICOCHÉ, G. Un Congrès au Queen's Royal South-Surrey Regiment: Lettres d'un engagé volontaire. Paris: Charles-Lavauzelle. 3 fr.
WATERS, Alph. Les Artistes célèbres. Bernard van Orley. Paris: Lib. de l'Art. 4 fr.

THEOLOGY.

- BACHMANN, J. Der Prophet Jesaja nach der aethiopischen Bibeldrucksatz. 1. Thl. Der aethiop. Text. Berlin: Felber. 20 M.
HAEN, G. L. Das Evangelium des Lucas. 2. Bd. 1. Hälfte. Breslau: Morgenstern. 6 M.
THOMAS, L. Le jour du Seigneur: étude de dogmatique chrétienne et d'histoire. Paris: Fischbacher. 8 fr.

HISTORY, ETC.

- ALBERT, Jeanne d'. Mémoires et poésies de. p. le Baron Alphonse de Ruble. Paris: Paul. 7 fr. 50 c.
BRUNER, C. Die Spuren der römischen Aezte auf dem Boden der Schweiz. Zürich: Müller. 4 M.
CORRESPONDENZ, politische, Friedrich's d. Grossen. 20. Bd. Berlin: Duncker. 15 M.
SOMMERLAD, Th. Die Rheinwille im Mittelalter. Halle: Kiemmerer. 8 M. 60 Pf.
URKUNDEN, aegyptische, aus den k. Museen zu Berlin. Griechische Urkunden. 9. Hft. Berlin: Weidmann. 2 M. 40 Pf.

PHYSICAL SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

- FINCH, O. Ethnologische Erfahrungen u. Belegstücke aus der Süde. Wien: Hüder. 50 M.
MOLNARBROCK, P. Anwendung der Quaternionen auf die Geometrie. Leiden: Brill. 7 M.
WILLKOMM, M. Prodrum florae hispanicae. Supplementum. Stuttgart: Schweizerbart. 20 M.

PHILOLOGY, ETC.

- DESCHAMPS, Eustache, Œuvres complètes de. p. G. Raynaud. T. VIII. Paris: Firmin-Didot. 12 fr.
DURET, V. Grammaire savoyarde, p. E. Koschwitz. Berlin: Grönan. 2 M. 80 Pf.
MIRACLES de Notre-Dame par personnages. T. VIII. Glossaire et Tables, par F. Bonnaudot. Paris: Firmin-Didot. 15 fr.
WEDER, A. Ueb. die Königswelche, den Rājashya. Berlin: Reimer. 10 M.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"THE BRONTËS IN IRELAND."

St. Andrews: Dec. 23, 1893.

May I thank Dr. Wright for his corrections and explanations? When I wrote my letter, I had only Mr. Noble's review in the ACADEMY before me, and memories of severe mental struggles with this Brontë history.

I would again insist on the extreme slowness of the motives, on both sides, which urged to the swearing of the "family oath" (p. 33). Welsh wants "the services of a little boy," and he hopes, that, after the wild arrangement is concluded, his wife may extract an allowance of £50 per annum from her brother. But that has to be done by letter, when the parties (p. 48) are at a distance of fifty-six hours' journey from each other. Welsh was neither an Irishman nor a Brontë. Will Dr. Wright not allow that his motive is sketchy? Again, the father of the unlucky child, Hugh II., is "a prosperous man settled in Ireland." Welsh is "a poor and ruined man" (p. 32). Yet the prosperous father expects his ruined, if repentant, enemy, Welsh, to provide Hugh with "the education of a gentleman"—so Welsh said (p. 51)—and to leave him "the inheritance of the old homestead"—that is, of the tenancy of the old homestead—"a charred and ruined house." Now, granting, for the sake of argument, that Welsh deceived Hugh's father, and posed as prosperous, did he not take vast trouble to secure "the services of a little boy"? If his object was the allowance of £50 a year, could the astute Welsh leave that detail out of the "family oath," and chance it recklessly? "Conditions of adoption were agreed on" (p. 33), but not this condition. But compare p. 51, where Welsh says that the allowance was part of the original bargain, with p. 40, where Hugh learns that Welsh "expected his wife to prevail on" her brother to pay the money. What motive, in any case, was there for the oath, binding Hugh's father never to communicate with the boy in any way, and binding Welsh never to let Hugh know where his father lived? These conditions are necessary to the plot of the yarn, but of what advantage were they to Welsh and to Hugh's father? I am not certain when Welsh took to calling himself Brontë; and no explanation is given for Hugh's calling a Brontë "Welsh," as Christian name, except the eccentricity of the Brontë genius. If Hugh really "spoke with a distinctly Scotch accent" (p. 49, note), he could hardly have picked that up at home, if his home was in the south of Ireland. But if "his journey, after all, may have been from the north," from what part of the north is it "a journey of four whole nights of an average of from thirteen to fifteen hours each" to the Boyne?

Setting aside my confusion of the two Hughes, and granting that the widow Welsh, or Mrs. Welsh before she was a widow, may have been Hugh's source for the earlier facts, the story still seems far from convincing. However, the main point is that Hugh told the story.

When Dr. Wright's book reaches a third edition, may one suggest that a genealogical table, with approximate dates, a map of Ireland, and a preliminary skeleton of the whole plot, will be of much service to his readers?

A. LANG.

JOB XIX. 17.

British Museum: D. c. 2, 1893.

It may be asserted, without much fear of contradiction, that the second part of this verse has never yet been satisfactorily explained. The difficulty lies in the fact that the word לְחַיֵּי, which is translated by "though I entreated" in the A.V., and by "and my supplication" in the R.V., can by all analogy of Hebrew usage only mean "and I was compassionate," or, "and my compassion," the former meaning belonging to the perfect, and the latter may be assigned to the infinitive or verbal noun. The alternative reading given in the margin of the R.V. rests on a certain unaesthetic sense which the root contained in לְחַיֵּי may bear in the Arabic; and it will, I think, be granted that that suggestion could only have been dictated by a sheer effort of despair.

This being so, one cannot but admit the possibility that the passage in question has undergone some corruption, and that its true meaning will only be discovered when the original text has been found. With this end in view, I venture to propose the following emendation: If, instead of לבני בטני לחנור, we read לבני בטני לבני, the difficulty vanishes, and the sentence assumes a clear and natural sense. Taking the Vulgate as a basis of translation, the meaning of the whole verse would then be as follows: "Halitum meum exhorruerunt uxor mea, pellices meae et filii uteri mei." This reading receives a considerable amount of confirmation from the fact that the LXX. actually had a word of the meaning "pellex" in their text, though not occupying the same position in the verse, for they render: καὶ ἰκέλευον τὴν γυναῖκα μου, προσκαλοῦμένην δὲ κολεῶν υἱοὺς παλλακίδων μου.

The objections that may be raised against this emendation are (1) the fact that the usual Hebrew word for "pellex" is פלגש, the term לבני only occurring twice in the Aramaic portion of the Book of Daniel, and (2) that the transposition of the first letters of לבני and לבני respectively appears rather difficult to explain. But the first objection can be effectively met with the well-known fact that the Book of Job abounds in strange words; and it need not, therefore, surprise us to find a Hebraised plural form of לבני, or לבני, in the verse under consideration. And the transposition of the two letters can, I think, be easily accounted for, if one supposes the phrase to have been written down from dictation, and not copied in the ordinary way. The eye could not easily make the supposed mistake, but to the ear the two phrases would sound sufficiently like one another to produce the misunderstanding which is implied in the proposed emendation.

The bearing which this emendation might have on the larger problem connected with the Book of Job I will not now discuss; but if the proposed reading should find favour in the eyes of Biblical students, it will probably help to throw light on the composition of some portions of the difficult book to which it belongs.

G. MARGOLIOUTH.

P.S.—For instances of non-repetition of the dativi and other prepositions see Gesenius' Hebr. Gram. (edit. E. Kautzsch, Leipzig, 1878), pp. 328-9.

DID DANTE WRITE "RE GIOVANE" OR "RE GIOVANNI" (INF. XXVIII. 135)?

Stanhoe Grange, Norfolk: Dec. 16, 1893.

In connexion with this much debated question, it is worthy of remark that in one of the Cento Novelle Antiche (which belong to the end of the thirteenth or the beginning of the fourteenth century), the name of the "Young King" is actually given as John. In this tale (No. cxlviii. in Biagi's critical ed.) the Prince is called, first of all, "il Giovane Re d'Inghilterra," then "il nobile Re Giovanni d'Inghilterra," and then again, twice, "il Giovane Re."

There is not the least doubt as to the identity of the individual of whom Dante is speaking. It is admitted that the reference can be to no other than Prince Henry, second son of Henry II. of England (the eldest son, William, died in infancy), who, having been crowned during his father's lifetime, was commonly known as the "Young King"—a title by which he is almost invariably described in contemporary Latin documents, as well as in early French, Italian, and Provençal literature. That Dante knew he was called the "Young King" it is hardly reasonable to doubt; for he is repeatedly referred to by this title, both in the poems of Bertran de Born and in the old Provençal biography of the latter, with which, in one form or other, Dante was unquestionably familiar. The point is: was Dante aware that the "Young King's" name was Henry, or did he, like the author of the tale referred to above, think he was called John, and write Giovanni accordingly?

Considering that the weight of MS. evidence is overwhelmingly in favour of that reading as against giovane (see Moore, Tert. Crit., p. 344), it seems at least possible that this may have been the case.

PAGET TOYNBEE.

THE INSCRIBED WEIGHT FROM SAMARIA.

Christ's College, Cambridge: Dec. 23, 1893.

In the last number of the ACADEMY Prof. Sayce writes:

"Prof. Robertson Smith is mistaken in saying that the explanation of netsag as 'a standard weight' is mine, or that I 'derive' it from the root yatsag."

What I wrote in the ACADEMY (p. 445 of the current volume) was:

"He [Prof. Sayce] thinks it possible that the word means 'a standard weight,' and is derived from the root נצ [yatsag]."

I referred to P. E. F. Qu. St., 1893, p. 32, where Prof. Sayce says:

"We must either assume that there were two weights called netsag—which is very improbable—or else suppose that the word simply means 'a standard weight.' If Dr. Neubauer is right in connecting it with the root נצ [yatsag], this latter signification would be very natural."

To these quotations I have only to add that Prof. Sayce's new word cannot be connected with yatsag and yet derived from natsag; for if there is a root yatsag there is no root natsag, and conversely.

W. ROBERTSON SMITH.

FATHER JUVENAL: AN UNRECORDED TIBETAN LEXICOGRAPHER.

London: Dec. 23, 1893.

In the ACADEMY of November 25, there was a note under the above heading, referring to Twining's Travels in India a Hundred Years Ago. In the note, attention was called to Twining's record of meeting, at Agra, a Roman Catholic missionary, who had collected the materials for a Tibetan dictionary; and it was asked whether these materials are still in existence.

On page v. of the Preface to Jäschke's Tibetan Dictionary (London, 1882), reference appears to be made to the same missionary, whose name, however, was not known to Jäschke, nor the place where he lived. But he mentions the following facts about his work. "The papers which he left behind him, unsorted and unsifted, came into the hands of Major Latter, and were passed on by him to Mr. Schröter," by whom the dictionary was published and whose name it bears.

W. M. CONWAY.

APPOINTMENTS FOR NEXT WEEK.

SUNDAY, Dec. 31, 4 p.m. Sunday Lecture: "Some Scientific Applications of Photography," by Prof. R. Meldola.
4 p.m. South Place Institute: "Conditions of Labour and the Formation of Character," by Mr. H. Vivian.
MONDAY, Jan. 1, 4 p.m. London Institution: "Magellan," by Mr. H. J. MacIndier.
8 p.m. Victoria Institute: "Endurance of Cosmical Conditions," by Prof. Lobley.
TUESDAY, Jan. 2, 8 p.m. Royal Institution: "Air: Gaseous and Liquid," III., by Prof. Dewar.
WEDNESDAY, Jan. 3, 7 p.m. Society of Arts: "Plants: their Foes and Defences," I., by Mr. Walter Gardner.
THURSDAY, Jan. 4, 8 p.m. Royal Institution: "Air: Gaseous and Liquid," IV., by Prof. Dewar.
6 p.m. London Institution: "Poisons and Criminal Treatment," by Mr. W. Tallick.
FRIDAY, Jan. 5, 7.30 p.m. Civil Engineers' Student's Meeting: "Refrigerating Machines," by Mr. A. R. Gule.
8 p.m. Geologists' Association: "The Genesis of the Chalk," by Dr. W. Fraser Hume.
SATURDAY, Jan. 6, 8 p.m. Royal Institution: "Air: Gaseous and Liquid," V., by Prof. Dewar.
4 p.m. Royal Medical Society: "Mountains," I., by Mr. Douglas W. Freshfield.

SCIENCE.

With the Woodlanders and By the Tide. By "A Son of the Marahes." (Blackwoods.)

YEAR by year the wild creatures of copse and hedgerow are more lovingly studied, and year after year there seems no limit to the books written upon them. That people gladly welcome these books is a strong proof of the love of nature which began with Cowper, was fostered by the Lake poets, and blossomed into its fullest development, in modern days, by the influence of Ruskin and Kingsley. The good effects of this almost passionate devotion to nature, birds, and beasts, are visible on many sides. Bird Acts and Selborne Societies, the crowds that flock to the Natural History Museum at South Kensington, the deep interest taken in all provincial collections of birds or butterflies, the separate Faunas and Floras of different counties which have been industriously compiled of late years—these are but outward examples of a widely-diffused love of nature. "My Lords" will be pleased to hear of a parish school in which, five years ago, the boys and girls were profoundly ignorant of the commonest birds and beasts which abounded around them in the country; but now these children could pass a stiff examination, not merely in native creatures, but in most of the typical forms of beasts in other lands as well. Even feminine vanity, it may be hoped, will now yield that deference to Mr. Hudson's excellent letter on the cruelty of massacring birds for woman's head-gear, which all the denunciations of Prof. Newton in past years could not effect. Mrs. Brightwen, who has so earnestly inculcated kindness and forbearance towards animals, might well devote her energies to dissuading her sisters from adorning themselves with birds' plumes. Were the use of pole-traps also abolished, the country would soon be the richer for a larger display of bird-life. So long as game is protected, winged vermin must be destroyed; but the employment of pole-traps kills indiscriminately the most valued and harmless, as well as the most rapacious of birds.

In this growing love for birds, and beasts, and nature generally, the "Son of the Marahes" has had a large share. His method is apparently as aimless and inconsecutive as an afternoon ramble in the woods of his beloved Surrey; and yet it is by no means devoid of art, just as half unconsciously the man who takes such a walk finds that it always leads to some culminating point, to a far riverside prospect or an elevation which commands a wide champaign country. It is not the style of Jefferies, who describes nature with the utmost minuteness, limning every leaf and blade of grass with almost Praeraphaelite fidelity. Nor, again, does it resemble the effective pictures of the genial author of Rambles of a Dominie. It is far from possessing the well-weighed scholarly instincts of all that fell from the pen of Gilbert White, to whom belongs of right the merit of originating pleasant observations on animated nature. And yet it owns a singularly placid charm. A large number of happily treated subjects succeed each other, and imperceptibly emerge one from the other, while sketches of native astuteness, anecdotes of poachers and the like, bestow upon the work of the "Son of the Marshes" those human sympathies which are imperatively required among the vast yet monotonous forces of nature. His insight is surprising, and bears witness to many years of observation. The most loving care has evidently been expended in comparing the recent past of nature's aspects round the Mole and on the Surrey hills with the more straightened records of the present, when enclosures and notice-boards exclude lovers of nature from many pleasant districts, and the animals and birds, to say nothing of the fishes, have been seriously diminished, partly by the spread of population, partly by excessive game preserving, and often, as it seems, by the very legal provisions intended to protect them. Thus there is an element of sadness running through these recollections of the "Woodlanders," a faint perfume of the past which is not unpleasant to the reader, as the soft airs and tender distances of a mellow autumnal landscape endear the close of the year.

Of the ten chapters which form this book, that on "Old Hedgerows" is among the most pleasing. The necessity for economical farming is rapidly sweeping these boundaries away in all parts of the country, while draining and cutting down timber have driven away many denizens of forest and stream. There is a delightful study of young fern owls and some very interesting particulars respecting that unfortunately now extinct British bird, the great bustard. Traditions of it survived till quite lately in North Lincolnshire, and every one remembers the bustard which Bennet Langton sent to Johnson; but the "Son of the Marshes" gives a "rigidly authentic" account of nine of these fine birds being shot at one discharge by a battery of duck-guns in Norfolk. He remembers, also, the night heron being shot long before 1872, when it is generally supposed to have been first recorded. His sections on the raven are both interesting and well written. Indeed, the "Son of the Marshes" is an ardent advocate for birds of all kinds, and thinks that a list of the unrecorded birds that have visited Great Britain would far exceed the number of those recorded. Rare birds are frequently plucked and eaten, he opines, without questioning. Readers of his former books will remember that he is devoted to shore shooting, especially at night. There is a good chapter here on this form of sport. It should sharpen the appetite of the shooter, for the author says: "as to curlews, any healthy person, man or woman, could eat three at a meal comfortably."

Space forbids mention of anecdotes on fishing and shooting and poaching, but the lover of the country will find plenty of them in these pages. They are edited, as usual, by J. A. Owen; but a few solecisms have escaped his notice, such as "There is a great deal in everything; but it is apt to be made unpleasant for some when such little games are frustrated at times." The "Son of the Marshes," however, never professed to write literary English. His strength lies in his remarkable powers of observation and his incisive descriptions; and all who are fond of the native woodlands and their wild creatures will once more accord him a warm welcome.

M. G. WATKINS.

THE CLASSICAL REVIEW.

THE December number of the Classical Review (David Nutt)—the last that will be edited by Mr. J. B. Mayor—again contains a number of good things.

Prof. Lewis Campbell, writing about his life-long friend, the late Master of Balliol, deals mainly with the character and extent of his scholarship in Greek. Jowett's explanation given of the strange blunders to which he was liable would apply also to the numerous inaccuracies in the first edition of J. R. Green's Short History: "It is not that I do not know these elementary things; but the effort of making the English harmonious is so great, that one's mind is insensibly drawn away from the details of the Greek." At the end of this notice is printed a rendering by Jowett into Greek elegiacs of "She dwelt among the untrodden ways."

Mr. F. G. Kenyon has yet another find to announce from the Egyptian treasures of the British Museum. This time it is a rescript of Mark Antony, which has been copied on the back of a medical papyrus, confirming the privileges of a gymnastic corporation at Ephesus. Fortunately, it happens to be in almost perfect preservation. Not less interesting is the opening paper, by Prof. Percy Gardner, in which he examines one of the utterances of the Pythian priestess, τὸ νόμισμα παραχράπον, which is traditionally translated "adulterate the currency." He suggests another interpretation: "counter-strike the coin"—i.e., "look beyond popular opinion, and remould, not truth, but current views." This he supports: (1) by the literal meaning of the Greek compound and other analogous words; (2) by the practice of ancient moneyers, who frequently either placed their own countermarks on coins to attest their genuineness, or re-struck them with fresh dies; and (3) by showing that his explanation is more consistent with the story that connects this Delphic oracle with Diogenes.

Dr. E. A. Abbott repeats a most ingenious theory (which he has already suggested in the Spectator) of two passages in the Gospel of Luke, both of which he explains as cases of substitution through misunderstanding the primitive version. (1) The miraculous healing of the ear of the high priest's servant, recorded only by Luke, is explained away as being a misinterpretation of the rebuke to Peter, "restore thy sword to its place," from which came the notion that the ear was restored. (2) The eclipse of the sun at the end of the crucifixion (again recorded only by Luke) is explained as a misinterpretation of the cry "Elias has failed him," leading to the statement that the sun failed.

Mr. C. S. Adamson prints an elaborate collation of the text of the Protagoras, given in the Bodleian MS. of Plato (Clarkianus 39), with the object of showing that the collation of Prof. Schanz is altogether untrustworthy. Mr. J. Grafton Milne corroborates the view of Weltzhofer—that a distinct tradition of the text of Pliny's Natural History was preserved in England through the Middle Ages—by an examination of two MSS. (in the Bodleian and the library of New College, Oxford), both of which were written by English scribes circa 1200. He states that the readings of these two MSS. are in almost every case identical with those of Robert of Cricklade's excerpts, and also with Bede's citations.

Of the reviews we can mention only three. Mr. A. C. Headlam surveys briefly the whole mass of literature that has already appeared concerning the Gospel and the Apocalypse of Peter. From the title given to his article, "The Akhmim Fragments," we presume that he is also going to deal hereafter with the Book of Enoch. He begins by quoting the opinion of Mr. Kenyon, on palaeographical grounds, that the MS. may be of the sixth century, which is a much earlier date than has hitherto been assigned to it. He then treats of the state of the text, and the various emendations that have been suggested. As to the date of the Gospel, he is inclined to put it as early as 130 A.D., especially as this would best explain the incorporation of some of its readings in the Western text of the Canonical Gospels. He thinks that the author was certainly a Docetist, who had before him all of our Four Gospels; and he also thinks that it was known to Justin. As to the Apocalypse, he believes that it may have been written in the beginning of the second century, and agrees that from it have come the leading features of later Christian mythology; but, at present, we do not in the least know whence those ideas are themselves derived. Prof. R. Seymour Conway, of Cardiff, reviews three books on Italic Phonology, by Buck, von Planta, and Bronisch, who are all pupils of Prof. Brugmann at Leipzig. Prof. W. M. Ramsay reviews the new volume of Perrot and Chipiez, dealing with prehistoric Greece; and dwells particularly upon their acceptance of the general results established by the excavations of Schliemann and Dörpfeld at Hisarlik.

Finally, we quote the following first lines of a rendering of Tennyson's "Northern Farmer: New Style," by Mr. Herbert Richards:

οἶον ἀπ' ἰσῶς ἀκούσας, Γρύλλε, τῆς μητρὸς λόγον μαρθάνω· σὺ μὲν γὰρ αὐτῇ πάντ' ἔλεξας, ἡ δ' ἐμοί.
χρημάτων γυνῆκ' ἀρ' οὐνεκ' οὐ σὺ γ' ἐξεσθαι δοκεῖς, ἀλλ' ἐρῶν ἐρώσαν, δυνάπτε, τὴν τοῦ γέροντος, τὴν ἐφ' ἱερὰ δὴ θέουσιν, τὴν μόνην ὕψους καλῆν;

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE PREVALENCE OF -S IN ENGLISH PLURALITY.

Oxford: Dec. 18, 1893.

Prof. Napier must certainly have in reserve some better reasons for his opinion, that the prevalence of -s plurality in English was quite uninfluenced by French example, or he would never have expressed it in such confident terms. I am quite unable to see how either of the two reasons which he has produced can bear the weight he has laid upon it.

The appearance of this feature in the Chronicle about two generations after the Conquest seems to me to tell not for but against his position. To say that Peterborough Abbey was exempt from French influence is gratuitous, and I do not know by what argument it could be justified; and under these conditions to make the assumption is to beg the whole question. I must therefore put aside (at least for the present) Prof. Napier's first reason.

The second is founded on the Ormulum; and here again the argument hinges on the assumption that the poet was beyond the range of French influence. But in this instance a reason is assigned for so thinking. The paucity of French words in this extensive poem is supposed to justify the opinion that the poet knew nothing of French. But there is another hypothesis, equally reasonable, by which we can imagine the paucity of French words to be accounted for. As Orm was a rigid systematist in orthography, so he was a purist in diction; and if he makes profession of the one and is silent about the other motive, this is no presumption against its existence. For it is not hard to divine what might be the cause of his reticence, if he lived among or near the French people, and in frequent intercourse with them, which I think he probably did. I take it he was fully acquainted with the French literature of his day, and that the form of his poem is hardly to be explained without this supposition. For it is our earliest example of a long English poem written in French metre; and in it he, speaking of the subject of his poetry, employs the English word rime and the French word verse interchangeably.

I must then cling to my "ancient and baseless superstition" a little longer; at least, until those who claim to hold a better opinion can fortify it with better arguments.

J. EARLE.

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

CLIFTON SHAKESPEARE SOCIETY.—(Saturday, Nov. 25.)

MISS LOUISA MARY DAVIES, president, in the chair.—Mr. Leo H. Grindon, in a paper on "The Figurative Language of Marlowe's 'Edward II.,'" drew attention to the differences between the rhetorician's figurative language, in which the metaphors are consciously, if not designedly, employed, and the ordinary colloquial speech of every-day life, in which they are used without suspicion of their actual nature. In "Edward II." the amount of rhetorical figurative language is scanty in the extreme. There are no rich and elegant appeals to our profounder consciousness of the harmonies between nature and the soul—harmonies beyond those we have been made familiar with in the by-gones. Such of the old-fashioned as do occur are, no doubt, pretty. The figurative epithet most frequently occurring in "Edward II." is "sweet." Marlowe had excellent authority for it. The poets of the Old Testament, Homer, Pindar, Theocritus, Euripides, Moschus—all anticipate him; and there is no lovelier instance of its use than that by Shakespeare in "The Merchant of Venice." So it is with the metaphorical use by Marlowe of "gold" and "golden." In his bestowal of the name upon a faithful and loving kiss, he simply adds to the number of sevenfold familiar phrases in which it is figuratively employed. The rhetorical figures which involve mention of the wolf, the tiger, the lion, the electrical eel or torpedo, and the porcupine, are of the old conventional kind, the natural history derived from Pliny. Familiar too are the mythological and classical allusions. If the matter of the figurative language were gone into minutely, it would involve the etymological and other history of a hundred such words as lovely, favour, sovereign, promise, grief, cherish, company, infamy, aspire, enchant, standard, complaint, fare, protect, each of which has an interesting little biography.—Mr. S. L. Gwynn read a paper on Marlowe's "Hero and Leander." If Milton's phrase about poetry—that it should be simple, sensuous and passionate—be taken as conclusive, very few poems would more perfectly fulfil the ideal than Marlowe's "Hero and Leander." To say that it is free from verbal ingenuities and conceits would be to say that it is not Elizabethan; but in comparison with "Venus and Adonis," or "A Lover's Complaint," it is simplicity undisguised. It is sensuous, not merely in the modern sense, but as Milton meant the word; that is, it pictures everything to the senses and deals with concrete imaginings, not abstract conceits, such as make up Chapman's continuation of the poem. It is the idyllic counterpart to the drama of Romeo and Juliet in the garden. Marlowe did not care about the story proper. What he wants is simply to describe the familiar episode of love, but love unhampered by conventions and heightened by every circumstance of beauty and freshness. Just as a sculptor sets himself to depict the beauty of woman, and out of the marble comes the naked Venus of Melos; so Marlowe took the first old legend that gave a beautiful setting to the eternal romance of sex, and drew the scene in Hero's chamber with no more thought of morality or immorality than the artist has when he scans the nude model. Marlowe does not want to tell a dramatic story. He wants to draw the beauty of manly comeliness in Leander, and the ardour of his inexperience; the beauty of Hero's maidenhood and its tremulous surrender. When he has done this he stops; and in comes Chapman moralising, with here and there a fine phrase, but on the whole unreadable and perfectly incongruous. There is no comparison between this idyll of Marlowe's and Shakespeare's studies in narrative verse. Fluency and simplicity are essential to such work, and Shakespeare is neither fluent nor simple. His poems are wrought beyond all praise, but they are too highly wrought for pleasure. The task Chapman undertook was impossible. No man can really finish another man's work, for no two men will conceive a story similarly; but he was singularly unfit, because he was incapable of Marlowe's point of view. Other men—Fletcher, for instance—might have failed less completely. The style has been taken up again in this century: Mr. Morris, in The Earthly Paradise, has worked with success on Marlowe's lines; and before him Keats had brought to a similar task powers not wholly inferior to Marlowe's own. Keats would have been, as has been suggested, the ideal man to have finished the work, because he also was capable of fixing his mind merely upon the beauty of a story without giving it a bearing upon conduct—a rare gift. The question is radical for art, and is one that does not arise in drama because there conduct is everything. Drama cannot be simple and sensuous merely. But in all descriptive writing and in certain kinds of narrative the opportunity of being so is constantly occurring, and few poems can be quoted with more confidence than this one for perfect purity of treatment where the subject presents every possibility of going wrong. This virtue of clean-mindedness, so characteristic of the Greeks at their best, is the antithesis of puritanism, and, indeed, tends to appear a slightly pagan excellence. "Faustus" is a greater work than "Hero and Leander," but it is not more perfect.

RUSKIN SOCIETY.—(Friday, Dec. 3.)

GEORGE ALLEN, Esq., vice-president, in the chair.—Mr. William Walker read a paper on "The Many-sidedness of John Ruskin." After referring to the evidences of precocity in the young Ruskin, Mr. Walker said that to a great extent he had happier surroundings than fall to the lot of the generality of mortals: a wealthy father with artistic instincts, a keen eye for the beauties of the lovely scenery through which, on business purposes bent, he leisurely travelled in the beautiful season of the year. I have seen, said Mr. Walker, some of the journals, kept by the young Ruskin during his periods of travel, describing the scenes, frequently in verse. These records are marvellous for the closeness of their descriptions and for the general interest shown in the varied nature before him. In London's Magazine of Natural History for 1834 appeared an article in the shape of a query as to the "cause of the colour of the water of the Rhine." Following this and in the same year appeared, with illustrations, "Facts and Considerations on the Strata of Mont Blanc; and on some Instances of Twisted Strata observable in Switzerland," by J. R. A series of articles, styled "The Poetry of Architecture," by Kata Phusin, was commenced in the fifth volume of London's Architectural Magazine (1837-1839). As to these articles, very recently published in book-form, Mr. Ruskin stated, when looking over the pages of the old magazine, that he was himself "entirely satisfied with them as being good work well done." Ruskin is perhaps better known as an art-critic, a designation somewhat hateful to himself. His descriptions of some pictures are unequalled for felicity of expression and insight into motive and character, not only of the work criticised, but of the artist who designed and carried the work to completion. Mr. Walker then made reference to Mr. Ruskin's political economy of art, and to various communications to the Pall Mall Gazette, generally on political economy. In Proserpina, Deucalion, and Love's Meinie, we are introduced to botany, geology and mineralogy, and ornithology. Drawing, except for the Elements (1857) and Elements of Perspective (1859), is exemplified in The Laus of Fesole, of which only one volume appeared in 1879. We must, however, gratefully acknowledge that, whatever subject Ruskin has undertaken to educate and instruct us in from his inexhaustible store of knowledge, that subject has been illustrated by such eloquent wealth of language that a most valuable addition has been made in this nineteenth century to the already accumulated store of English literature.

ASIATIC.—(Tuesday, Dec. 12.)

LORD REAY, president, in the chair.—A paper was read by Surgeon-Major L. A. Waddell, on "The Indian Buddhist Cult of Avalokita and His Consort Tārā, the Saviouress, illustrated from the Remains in Magadha." Mr. Waddell, who has had exceptional facilities for exploring, has found that the cradle-land of Buddhism teems with Mahāyāna and Tantrik Buddhist remains, and that forms hitherto believed to have been developed outside India in the "Northern" Buddhism of Tibet and China are really Indian in their origin. But as most of the forms were hitherto undescribed, Mr. Waddell has had recourse to the Lāmas, as the jealous custodians of Indian Mahāyāna and Tantrik Buddhist lore. By their aid, and with the Tibetan descriptive lists of the Indian Buddhist pantheon, he has succeeded in identifying all of the fantastic images found by him in Magadha and other parts of India: thus bringing Mahāyāna and Tantrik Buddhism more intimately home to the Buddhist Holy Land than had hitherto been suspected as possible. Mr. Waddell's present paper is an instalment of his researches in this new field, which promises much light on the development of Indian Buddhism, especially during the dark period of Indian history subsequent to Hsien Tsiang's visit. The paper illustrates, by some of these extant remains, one of the most popular internal movements of Indian Mahāyāna Buddhism, namely, the cult of Avalokita and his Consort Tārā. Images of these two divinities in a variety of forms have been found by Mr. Waddell at nearly every old site in Gangetic India visited by him. The paper was illustrated with photographs of Magadha sculptures, showing ten forms of Avalokita and eight of Tārā; and many of the sculptures are of high artistic merit. Detailed descriptions were appended of twenty-six forms of Avalokita and thirty forms of Tārā from Tibetan and Chinese paintings. Images, most of which will probably be found in India also if searched for. Avalokita's image, according to Mr. Waddell, is modelled upon that of the god Brahma, and his cult invests certain of his forms with the functions of a creator, and latterly has tended towards pantheism. Several fresh points of analogy were also brought out, in contrasting the worship of Tārā, the Saviouress, with the worship of the Virgin in the Roman Church. The ritual was illustrated by descriptions of the worship and translations of the chief litanies and hymns. Much of the existing confusion in Indian Buddhist history was maintained to be due to the vague use of the term Mahāyāna as a synonym for "Northern" Buddhism, thus leading to forgetfulness of the fact that the Mahāyāna, not only in its origin but even in its fully developed form, is as truly an indigenous Indian form of Buddhism as the Hinayāna.

FINE ART.

An Ordinary of Arms contained in the Public Register of All Arms and Bearings in Scotland. By James Balfour Paul, Lyon King of Arms. (Edinburgh: Green.)

ALL who are interested in the more serious aspects of heraldry, as a valuable aid to historical and genealogical research, must have rejoiced at the good results which have followed the reconstruction of the Lyon Office of Scotland in 1867. By an Act of that year, the higher appointments in the Scottish College of Arms, which had become purely honorary, their duties being invariably performed by deputy, were placed on a thoroughly practical and effectively operative basis. The hereditary post of Lyon King was abolished; in future, officials holding that position were to be appointed directly by the Crown, and to be required personally to perform the functions of their office; and the same changes were applied to the position of Lyon Clerk. Above all, the system of the officials of the Lyon Office exacting stated fees from the public, for their own behalf, was put an end to; and, instead of this mode of remuneration, a system of fixed salaries was wisely adopted. As might have been expected, the change has been, in every respect, a salutary one: a change such as those who wish well to the English and Irish Colleges of Arms, and to the science of heraldry generally, must desire should be speedily extended to these offices also.

But something more than the wisest and best-devised enactments is necessary to insure well-being; and at the time of the changes in its constitution indicated above, the Lyon Office was fortunate in possessing two officials distinguished by exceptionally wide and accurate knowledge of their subject, and by exceptional enthusiasm in its pursuit. It is to the erudition, the unwearied diligence, and the unfailing courtesy of the late Dr. George Burnett, Lyon Depute, afterwards Lyon King, and of the late Mr. R. R. Stodart, Lyon Clerk Depute, that the Lyon Office mainly owes its present position of public usefulness, and the high estimation which it enjoys.

The appearance of this useful and carefully compiled Ordinary of Scottish Arms is one among many signs that the good work, begun by Dr. Burnett and Mr. Stodart, is being ably and vigorously continued by their successors. Indeed, it is not too much to say that the publication of this volume marks an epoch in heraldic literature; for—while heralds have before now used the rolls and registers under their charge for historical and genealogical purposes—this is practically the first effort that has been made by a member of a College of Arms to render the records under his official care accessible to the student. It is true that in 1846 Mr. Skey, the St. Patrick Pursuivant, published The Heraldic Calendar: a List of the Nobility and Gentry whose Arms are registered and Pedigrees recorded in the Heralds' Office of Ireland. But this work was, in the barest sense of the word, a mere "list" of names, the verbal blazons of only a very few of the registered families being given; so that the little volume resembled rather a finger-post intended to direct one to the Irish College of Arms, than a book of reference that would afford substantial help in independent research.

The Lyon King's "Ordinary," however, fully blazons all the shields contained in the register of the Lyon Office: that is to say, all the arms which have been legally borne in Scotland since, at least, the year 1672. The arrangement adopted is a modification, to suit the less elaborate character of the volume, of the system of Papworth's Ordinary of Arms, by means of which an unknown coat may be identified by a reference to the first-mentioned charge of its blazon, these charges appearing in alphabetical order; and the present volume has the further advantage of an alphabetical index of families—wanting in Papworth, whose book was founded upon Burke's Encyclopædia of Heraldry, and was meant to be used in conjunction with that work, where the blazons follow the names of the families, which appear alphabetically.

One slight departure from the Papworth method has been made in this Ordinary of Scottish Arms: not, I think, to its advantage. I mean the arrangement of the arms, under their various headings, in the order of their dates, and of the early undated coats in the alphabetical order of the names of the families bearing them. Thus, under the heading "Chevron Between," we find that "Arg., a chevron vert between two spur-revels in chief and a fleur-de-lys in base gu." for Robert Curle, Glasgow, comes before "Arg., a chevron az. between two cocks in chief sa. and an oak tree eradicated ppr. in base" for James Aitken, Glasgow, in accordance with priority of date in the grant; and "Arg., or chevron wavy sa. between three torteaux" for Alexander Blair, France, appears before "Arg., a chevron gu. between three mullets az." for Brodie of that Ilk, in accordance with the alphabetical arrangement. Now, there is no particular advantage in indicating, by priority of position, which arms, including a chevron, were earliest granted: the date is sufficiently shown by the year appended to each entry, or by the absence of the year which, "as a general rule," indicates that the arms were granted before 1677. The Papworth arrangement is adopted simply as the readiest method of identifying an unknown coat. In it both date and alphabetical priority of family name should be ignored; if the object be to find the arms borne by a given family, the alphabetical index of names should be consulted. When we consider that some twenty-one columns are here occupied with the heading, "Chevron Between," it can hardly be doubted that the process of identification would have been simplified if, under the sub-heading of the tincture or metal of the field, all the chevrons had been arranged under their tinctures or metals, given alphabetically, a specially assigned place being reserved for such chevron coats as form merely parts of quartered shields.

While referring to Papworth's method of arrangement, I may mention, in passing, that it is now being applied to foreign heraldry. For Count Théodore de Renesse is at present issuing, in parts, published by the Société Belge de Librairie of Brussels, a work arranged upon a similar plan and embracing all the 105,000 coats in Rietstap's valuable Armorial Général; and his work cannot fail to be of the utmost service to the student of the subject.

In the introduction to his "Ordinary," Mr. Paul gives an interesting account of the official records of the Lyon Office of Scotland. The earliest of these is the venerable folio, now in the Advocates' Library, prepared about 1542 under the superintendence of Sir David Lindsay, the poet, Lyon King from 1530 to 1555. This volume passed into the hands of Sir James Balfour, one of Lindsay's successors in office; and in 1630 it "was approve be the Lordis of his Majesties most honorable Privie Counsaile at Halierudehous," and thus became the earliest official register of Scottish arms. Various armorial collections were compiled by Sir Robert Forman, Lyon from 1555 to 1567, and other heralds. And, in 1592, an Act was passed giving power to the Lyon and his brother heralds to visit the whole arms of noblemen, barons, and gentlemen in Scotland, to distinguish them with congruent differences, to marticulate them in their books and registers, and "to put inhibitioun to all the commoun sort of people, nocht worthie be the law of armes to beir ony signes armoriallis"; the penalty of each contravention of the Act being escheat to the Sovereign of all goods and gear on which arms, unlawfully assumed, appeared, payment of a hundred pounde (Scots) to the Lyon and his heralds, and, failing payment, incarceration in the nearest prison during the pleasure of the Lyon. In 1639, the Committee on Articles appointed the Lyon to do diligence for cognoscing and marticulating all arms, and to represent the same to the Privy Council, that they might take some course to prevent arms being assumed irregularly. In 1662, another Act bearing on the functions of the Lyon, and directing him to renew and examine all noblemen and gentlemen's arms and insert them in his registers, was passed; but this was repealed in the following year.

If the registers mentioned in the Act of 1662 were ever compiled, they have not survived. Some have conjectured that they were lost in the voyage to, or from, London, of the Scottish national records carried off to the South by Cromwell; others that they perished in a fire which, according to Arnot, consumed the Lyon Office about 1670. But, in 1672, an Act was again passed, ratifying generally the provisions of that of 1592, and requiring all persons using arms to submit an account of them to the Lyon Clerk, with certificates "anent the verity of their having and using those Armes," that they might be marticulated by the Lyon in his books and registers. The Public Register of all Arms and Bearings in Scotland, was then instituted, "to be respected as the true and unrepealable rule of all armes and bearings in Scotland"; and ever since it has been preserved and duly used for entries and extracts.

It is greatly to be regretted that in Scotland, as elsewhere, the laws bearing upon the false assumption of arms have fallen into disuse, and that the penalties ordained by statute have failed to be enforced. The publication, however, of the present "unrepealable rule of all arms and bearings in Scotland" is undoubtedly a step in the right direction, as showing clearly who are—and, by omission, who are not—legally entitled to be styled "Armiger." And it is to be hoped that the Lyon's brethren in England and Ireland will not fail to follow the good example which he has set them, but will, before long, produce a similar "Golden Book" of the countries under their heraldic jurisdiction.

J. M. GRAY.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A VOTIVE ALTAR OF AAHMES I.

London: Dec. 19, 1893.

There has just been added to the Egyptian collection of the British Museum a very fine sepulchral altar, inscribed with the names and titles of Aahmes I. It is made of red granite, and has upon it the usual representation of funeral offering in relief.

The transcript of the inscription is—

"Nutar nefer neb tauti Neb pehti Ra se Ra Aahmes, Uasur heq tèt meri ta anxy-t'et."

"The good God, Lord of the two lands Neb pehti Ra, son of the sun Aahmes, Osiris ruler of eternity the beloved, the giver of life for ever."

Aahmes was the first king of the XVIIIth Dynasty, and is famous as the champion of liberty during the Hyksos or Shepherd occupation; for it was he who besieged them in their stronghold Avaris, and commenced the series of campaigns which finally ended in their complete expulsion from Egyptian soil.

H. W. MENGEDONT.

THE "IDOLINO" IN THE ETRUSCAN MUSEUM AT FLORENCE.

Florence: Dec 19, 1893.

Friends have often told me that they could not find the "Idolino" in the Etruscan Museum. I never knew the reason until this morning, when I happened to look for it myself, and I found the somewhat remote room containing it closed. On inquiry I was told that the "Idolino" was locked up because of insufficiency in the service. But pairs of guards were chatting in the various halls, and in a room I happened to pass several were sitting wrapped in entertaining conversation.

Surely the tourist who pays his franc as much right to see the masterpiece of a collection as he has to demand of an entertainment every item in the programme. To the student it is annoying to waste a quarter of an hour asserting his rights to see the "Idolino"; and when he has succeeded in having the room containing it opened, it is a nuisance to be disturbed by the impatience of a guard eager for the moment when he can close it again.

This is an abuse which may be unknown to the director. It is so, I hope that this letter may draw his attention to the fact. It is inconceivable that a director should deliberately keep locked up the masterpiece of the collection.
Y. Y.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

THE president and council of the Royal Society of Painter-Etchers have decided to hold their next exhibition from March 12 to April 7. A selection of the engraved work of Marc Antonio will be a feature of this exhibition. It has been further decided that the election of associates shall be held on Friday, January 5, 1894, at 5 p.m.

WE hear that Mr. John Fulleylove, who returned this autumn from a considerable sojourn in Paris, will hold an exhibition at the gallery of the Fine Art Society, during a part of February and March, of the work in water-colour which is the outcome of that sojourn. Following, as it will, at a not very long interval, upon the Fine Arts Society's exhibition of the works of Mr. Albert Goodwin—in which, as in the work of Mr. Fulleylove, the treatment of architecture counts for so much—students who are endowed with a tolerable memory will have the opportunity to make a very interesting comparison between the so different visions and so different methods of these two most distinguished draughtsmen of often very kindred subjects.

THE private view of the exhibition of pictures by Mr. Harry Quilter, at the Dudley Gallery, has been postponed to January 13, owing to the illness of the artist. The collection is, we understand, of a miscellaneous character, and numbers 120 oil paintings, of which about one half illustrate Cornish scenery. Two large subject pictures, which, owing to the above cause, have not yet been completed, will be included.

As a result of Mr. Deputy Snowden's offer of a picture to be placed in one of the panels of the Royal Exchange, the Gresham Committee have instructed Mr. R. W. Macbeth to paint a picture illustrative of the opening of the Exchange by the Queen. Sir Frederic Leighton's contribution will be a painting representing the Phœnicians trading with Ancient Britons on the coast of Cornwall.

MESSRS. DEPREZ & GUTEKUNST, of Green-street, Leicester-square, are, it seems, in possession of a collection of pencil drawings by Méryon, some of which happened to be used by him, years after their execution, as affording material for certain of his later etchings, and others of which—more especially those wrought at Bourges—were made with direct reference to the plates etched by him from subjects afforded by that city. Three prints from the hand of the master of modern etching deal, it may be remembered, with Bourges. One is the elaborate yet imaginative presentment of the Rue des Toiles, which, as Méryon has rendered it, is filled full of the spirit of romance. Another is the less exhaustively wrought plate sometimes known as "La Maison du Musicien." The third is the slighter, though by no means insignificant, little copper, known simply as "A Doorway at Bourges." This, which, while good in its own way, is on the whole the least desirable, chances to be the rarest of the three. The Méryon drawings are of very various importance, some of them being highly finished designs, and some the fragmentary but interesting preparations for those etchings in which the peculiar genius of Méryon allowed him to preserve a unity of effect along with an unwonted multiplicity of detail. It has been already noticed that the private collector of these much extolled and greatly sought for prints is scarcely the person likely to be most appreciative of the pencil-work which was the initial stage of Méryon's labour; and surely the pencil-work, much of which throws such a light on the processes of the artist, would be most appropriately lodged in some public collection. The present group of drawings, which belonged in times past to M. de Salicis—Méryon's friend, who held forth at his funeral—would constitute an admirable and unique gift, even to one of the great provincial galleries, whose directors, heretofore perhaps somewhat preoccupied with securing the possession of popular paintings, have now begun to take note of the existence of "black and white."

MUSIC.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

WE have received from Messrs. Augener: Reinecke's Folk-Songs and Dances, Telling Fairy Tales, Masquerade, and Musical Illustrations. All form part of the "Musical Kindergarten" series (Op. 206). National music is as interesting as it is important, and the selection is an excellent one. The "Fairy Tales" are told with the help of capital musical illustrations, the "Masquerade" contains dainty little pieces, while in the third collection the tales are related entirely by means of tones. Many years of experience have made Reinecke unrivalled as a composer for the young. Each collection is arranged both as pianoforte solo and a pianoforte duet.

Among modern composers of light, elegant pianoforte music Anton Strelezki holds a distinguished place. His "Serenade Espagnole," "Venezia," "Menuet à l'antique," and "Valse-ette" are well-written, attractive pieces; they are not very difficult, but need good playing. His "Zwei Klavierstücke" are more ambitious; they are interesting in melody, harmony, and rhythm. In the first the influence of Schumann is unmistakable. Three pieces entitled "Fueille de Tréfle," by S. Noskowski, well deserve any trouble they may cause the player. F. Kirchner's "Irrlichter-Tanz" is a clever little piece. Of pianoforte duets we would specially commend Max Reger's "Walzer-Capricen." They display originality, and are full of piquant rhythm and harmony; they are thoroughly well written for the instrument, but, certainly, not easy to play.

Of vocal music we would mention Max Reger's "Lieder" (Op. 4) and the three Choruses (Op. 6). The composer has really something to say, but says it, at times, in too intricate a manner. The song, "Im April," is fresh as spring itself; and though the music is as clever as it is pleasing, there is no sense of effort. In other pieces Max Reger appears to force his inspiration: the rhythms are confusing, or the harmonies overcrowded; nevertheless, in all there is much to admire. The Choruses are also extremely interesting. The middle number, "Zur Nacht," is the one most to our liking; the soft "Angel of Slumber" phrase comes as a welcome contrast after sombre harmonies and rugged rhythms. Reinecke's twelve "Lieder" for two soprano voices (Op. 217) are smooth and graceful—not only pleasant to the ear, but grateful to the performers. All the above-mentioned songs have both German and English words.

Dr. C. V. Stanford's "May's Love," to words by Elizabeth Barrett Browning, is a charming little song, in which simplicity and smartness go hand in hand. Kjerulf's "Her Voice" and "Longing" are as refined as they are graceful: the words are in Norse and in English. "A Lake and a Fairy Boat" and "The Serenade," by Emil Kreuz, are both clever and expressive songs. "All on a Fair May Morning," by Hamish MacCunn, has a theme which for naïveté recalls Schubert; the accompaniment is effective: the "Foxglove" section forms a pleasant contrast to the reiterated triplets.
J. S. SHEDLOCK.

A PENNY A DROP.

THE PURE OTTO OF ROSE

IN
Toilet "Vinolia" Soap and
"Vinolia" Toilet Powder,
NOW COSTS A PENNY A DROP.

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

E P P S ' S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

C O C O A

BOILING WATER OR MILK

THE ACADEMY:

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

VOL. XLV. will commence January 6th, 1894.

Terms of annual subscription, 15s. 2d.; foreign, 17s. 4d.

Edited by J. S. COTTON.

Among the Contributors to THE ACADEMY are:

Acton, Lord
Aitken, G. A.
Alexander, S.
Allen, Grant
Allen, J. B.
Arnold, Arthur
Axon, W. E. A.
Bain, R. Nisbet
Ball, Rev. C. J.
Balzani, Count Ugo
Barnett, P. A.
Bayne, Rev. Ronald Beazeley, M.
Beeching, Rev. H. C.
Bell, H. T. Mackenzie
Benn, A. W.
Bennett, A. W.
Bezold, Prof. C.
Blind, Karl Boase, Rev. C. W.
Bonar, J.
Bradley, Henry
Bradley, J. W.
Brown, Dr. Robert
Brown, H. F.
Brown, R., Jun.
Browne, E. G.
Browne, J. W.
Browne, Canon
Bryce, J.
Buchanan, Robert
Bühler, Prof. G.
Bywater, Prof.
Caine, Hall
Campbell, Prof. Lewis
Canton, W.
Capes, Rev. W. W.
Chambers, E. K.
Cheetham, Archdeacon
Cheyne, Prof. T. K.
Church, Prof. A. H.
Clouston, W. A.
Collins, J. C.
Conway, W. Martin
Cotterell, G.
Cotton, H. J. S.
Courtney, W. P.
Crawford, O.
Darmesteter, Madame
Davidson, John
Dawkins, C. E.
De Vere, Aubrey
Dickins, F. V.
Doble, C. E.
Dobson, Austin
Dodgson, Campbell
Dore, J. R.

Douglas, Prof. R. K.
Dowden, Prof. E.
Doyle, J. A.
Driver, Prof. S. R.
Drummond, Rev. R. B.
Dryden, Sir Henry
Duff, E. Gordon
Dunlop, R.
Earle, Prof. J.
Ebers, Prof. G.
Edgeworth, Prof. F. Y.
Edinburgh, The Bishop of Ellis, Prof. Robinson
Elton, C. I.
Elton, Oliver
Ely, Prof. Talfourd
Evans, Arthur
Field, Michael
Firth, C. H.
Fita, Padre F.
Fitch, J. G.
Fortnum, C. Drury E.
Fowler, Rev. T.
Fowler, Rev. J. T.
Frazer, J. G.
Freshfield, Douglas W.
Friedländer, Dr. M.
Furnivall, Dr. F. J.
Gaidoz, H.
Gairdner, J.
Galton, Arthur
Gardiner, S. R.
Gardiner, Mrs. S. R.
Gardner, Prof. Percy
Garrod, H. B.
Gonner, Prof. E. C. K.
Grant Duff, Sir Mount-stuart E.
Grant, Col. F.
Gray, J. M.
Greenhill, Dr. W. A.
Grey, William E.
Groome, F. H.
Hager, Dr. H.
Hamerton, P. G.
Hamilton, J. A.
Hardy, W. J.
Haverfield, F.
Hawkins, F.
Herford, Prof. C. H.
Hessels, J. H.
Hewlett, H. G.
Hewlett, Maurice
Hickey, Miss E. H.
Hicks, Canon
Hill, S. McCalmont
Hodgetts, E. A. Brayley

Hodgkin, Dr. T.
Hodgson, Shadworth H.
Houghton, Rev. W.
Howorth, Sir H. H.
Hughes, Reginald
Hunter, Sir W. W.
Hutchinson, T.
Ingram, J. H.
Ingram, Prof. J. K.
Jacobs, Joseph
Jevons, F. B.
Johnson, Lionel
Johnson, R. Brimley
Jolly, Prof. J.
Jones, Rev. W. H.
Keane, Prof. A. H.
Keene, H. G.
Kingsford, C. L.
Kirkup, T.
Lang, Andrew
Lankester, Prof. E. Ray
Leach, A. F.
Lee, Miss Jane
Lee, S. L.
Lee, Vernon
Le Gallienne, R.
Legge, Prof. J.
Lewin, Walter
Lewis, Prof. W. J.
Lindsay, W. M.
Little, J. Stanley
Lodge, Prof. O.
Lyll, C. J.
Lyster, T. W.
Macdonell, Prof. A. A.
Macdonell, G. P.
Mackay, J. S.
Mahaffy, Prof. J. P.
Mann, J. S.
Margolouth, Prof. D. S.
Markham, Clements R.
Markheim, W.
Martin, C. Trice
Marzials, F. T.
Mayhew, Rev. A. L.
Merk, Rev. C.
Merry, G. R.
Minchin, J. G. C.
Minchin, James Innes
Monkhouse, Cosmo
Moore, Rev. Dr. E.
Morfill, W. R.
Morris, Rev. Dr. R.
Morris, Judge O'Connor
Morshead, E. D. A.
Muir, Dr. Thomas
Müller, Prof. F. Max

Murray, A. S.
Murray, George
Murray, Dr. J. A. H.
Myers, Ernest
Napier, Prof. A. S.
Nettleship, J. T.
Neubauer, Dr. A.
Newton, Sir C. T.
Nicholson, Cecil
Nicholson, Dr. E.
Nicholson, E. B.
Noble, J. A.
Noel, Hon. Roden
O'Grady, Standish H.
Oman, C. W. C.
Patterson, Arthur J.
Paul, C. Kegan
Peacock, E.
Pearson, Prof. Karl
Pelham, Prof. H. F.
Peterson, Prof.
Phillips, Claude
Pinker, J. B.
Pollard, A. W.
Poole, Prof. R. S.
Postgate, Prof. J. P.
Powell, F. York
Raine, Canon
Ramsay, Prof. W. M.
Rashdall, Rev. H.
Reid, J. S.
Rhys, Ernest
Rhys, Prof. John
Rhys-Davids, Prof. T. W.
Richards, F. T.
Richards, H. P.
Richter, Dr. J.-P.
Robertson, Prof. Edmund
Robertson, Rev. Eric
Robinson, Rev. C. J.
Roby, H. J.
Rolleston, T. W.
Rudler, F. W.
Rye, Walter
Ryland, F.
Saintsbury, G.
Salmon, Prof. G.
Salmoné, Prof. H. A.
Sanday, Prof. W.
Sandys, Dr. J. E.
Sargent, Rev. H.
Sayce, Prof. A. H.
Sayle, C.
Seeley, Prof. J. R.
Sharp, William
Shedlock, J. S.
Simcox, G. A.

Simcox, Miss Edith
Simpson, W.
Skeat, Prof. W. W.
Smith, G. Barnett
Smith, Miss L. Toulmin
Sommer, H. Oskar
Sonnenschein, Prof. E. A.
Stein, Prof. A.
Stephens, H. Morse
Stephens, Prof. G.
Stevenson, W. H.
Stewart, J. A.
Stokes, Whitley
Strachey, G.
Strong, S. Arthur
Sully, Prof. James
Sweet, H.
Symons, Arthur
Taylor, Canon Isaac
Temple, Capt. R. C.
Temple, G. T.
Terrien de Lacouperie,
Prof.
Thompson, E. Maunde
Toynbee, Paget
Tozer, Rev. H. F.
Tucker, R.
Twiss, Sir Travers
Tyler, Thomas
Tylor, E. B.
Vambéry, Prof. A.
Venable, Precentor
Villari, Linda
Vinson, Prof. Julien
Wallace, Prof. W.
Wallace, W.
Warren, Rev. F. E.
Waters, E. Chester
Watkins, Rev. M. G.
Watson, Foster
Watson, William
Watts, Theodore
Wayte, Rev. W. W.
Weale, W. H. James
Webster, Rev. Wentworth
Wedmore, Frederick
West, Dr. E. W.
Westlake, Prof. John
Wharton, E. R.
Wharton, H. T.
Wheeler, Stephen
Wickham, W.
Wicksteed, Rev. P. H.
Wilkins, Prof. A. S.
Wilson, C. E.
Wilson, H. F.
Wollaston, A. N.

PUBLISHED AT THE OFFICE, 27, CHANCERY LANE, W.C.

To be had at all Railway Stations, and of all News-vendors in Town and Country.

CONTENTS OF THE MAGAZINES.

Now ready, price 1s. 4d.

THE MAGAZINE OF ART

For JANUARY, containing—

CHANT D'AMOUR. By E. Burne-Jones. Photo-gravure by Dujardin.

"HEAD of a GIRL." By Sir Frederic Leighton, Bart., P.R.A.

PUVIS de CHAVANNES. By Prince Bojidar Karageorgievitch. With a Portrait of Puviss de Chavannes, and 6 Illustrations of his Works.

THE LATE CHARLES RELL BIRCH, A.R.A. With a Portrait of C. B. Birch, A.R.A., by Seymour Lucas, A.R.A., and 5 Illustrations of his Works.

OME NOTES on the ILLUMINATED BOOKS of the MIDDLE AGES. By WILLIAM MORRIS. With 5 Illustrations.

"CHRIST BLESSING LITTLE CHILDREN." School of Rembrandt. With a Note.

CURRENT ART: Institute of Painters in Oil Colours. By M. PHIPPS JACKSON. With 5 Illustrations.

The Royal Society of British Artists. By Peter Macnab. With 3 Illustrations.

THE RUSTON COLLECTION: the Modern Pictures. By CLAUDE PHILLIPS. With 3 Illustrations.

ITALIAN CHIMNEY-TOPS. By H. E. Tidmarsh. With 10 Illustrations by the Author.

Our ILLUSTRATED NOTE-BOOK. With 8 Illustrations.

THE CHRONICLE of ART: Art in December.

CASSELL & COMPANY, Limited, Ludgate Hill, London.

Now ready, price 7d.

CASSELL'S MAGAZINE

For JANUARY, containing—

PROFESSIONS for OUR BOYS. Training for the Army. A Talk with Captain James, R.E. By RAYMOND BLATHWAYT. Illustrated from Photographs.

MODERN MANCHESTER. Illustrated by Hedley FITTON.

GARDENING in JANUARY. By a Practical Gardener. Illustrated from Photographs.

"AS OTHERS SEE US." Illustrated by W. Rainey, R.I.

"BOTH SIDES of the SHIELD": Are Lady Helps a Success? "Yes," by EDITH E. CUTHELL. "No," by MARY R. LIVERMORE.

PICTURESQUE IPSWICH. By the Author of "Between Two Waters." Illustrated.

SOUTACHE EMBROIDERY. By Josepha Crane. Illustrated from Specimens.

LOVERS' PHILOSOPHY. Words by George Withers. Music by W. J. FOXELL, M.A., B.Mus.

CONCERNING CHAPS and CHILBLAINS. By a Family Doctor.

A GOSSIP from BOOKLAND.

WHAT to WEAR in JANUARY. Chat-Chat on Dress. Illustrated from Original Models and Designs.

THE GATHERER.

NEW PRIZE COMPETITIONS.

COMPLETE STORIES.

THE PHANTOM FORGET-ME-NOTS. By E. Chapman. Illustrated by Sydney Paget.

THE DOCTOR'S SECRET. By Albert E. Hooper. Illustrated.

THE QUEER PASSENGER'S STORY. By A. E. Bonser. Illustrated by J. Finnemore.

SERIAL STORIES.

THE SLEEVE of CARE. By C. E. C. Weigall, Author of "The Temptation of Dulce Carruthers," &c. Illustrated by Wal Paget.

MARGARET'S WAY. By Annie E. Wickham, Author of "Two Women," &c. With Illustrations by Percy Tarrant.

CASSELL & COMPANY, Limited, Ludgate Hill, London.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE,

No. 939.—JANUARY, 1894.—2s. 6d.

CONTENTS:—RECOLLECTIONS OF THE COMMUNE OF PARIS.—THE LETTERS OF SIR WALTER SCOTT.—THE STORY OF MARGRÉDEL: being a Fireside History of a Fifeshire Family, chaps. vi.-ix.—GHOSTS UP TO DATE, by Andrew Lang.—WHEN THE NIGHT FALLS, by "A Son of the Marshes."—EARLS COURT, Conclusion.—NOTE-BOOKS OF SIR HENRY NORTHGOTE, by the Earl of Idlesleigh.—PAULA'S CAPRICE: A FRAGMENT OF A LIFE, by Dorothea Gerard.—IN "MAGA'S" LIBRARY.—EAST AND WEST AFRICA IN PARLIAMENT, by Captain F. D. Lugard, D.S.O.—A COUNTRY WALK IN CANADA, by Arnold Haultain.—POLITICAL STOCK-JOBBER.—PRINCE ALEXANDER OF BULGARIA, by Sir Theodore Martin, K.C.B.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

THE FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW.

JANUARY.

THE IRELAND of TO-MORROW. By X.

MR. FRANCIS THOMPSON, a NEW POET. By COVENTRY PATMORE.

FOOTBALL. By CRESTON.

THE EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN. By Miss BULLEY.

THE TRUE DISCOVERY OF AMERICA. By CAPT. GAMBIER, R.N.

CHEMICAL ACTION OF MARINE ORGANISMS. By Prof. JUDD, F.R.S.

THE ORIGIN OF MANKIND. By Prof. BUCHNER.

THE FRENCH in INDIA. By LEWIS B. BOWRING.

THE LEPROSY COMMISSION. By Dr. THIN.

PRINCE ALEXANDER OF BATTENBERG. By J. D. BOURCHIER.

THE TRIPLE ALLIANCE in DANGER. By E. B. LANIN.

IRISH RAILWAYS. By X.

CHAPMAN & HALL, Ltd.

Now ready, price Sixpence.

LONGMAN'S MAGAZINE.

JANUARY, 1894.

THE MATCHMAKER. By L. B. WALFORD. Chaps. 9-12.

THE ATHLETIC LIFE. By Sir BENJAMIN WARD RICHARDS, M.D., F.R.S.

AN ETON "VALE." By WALTER HERBES POLLOCK.

MRS. NASEBY'S DENIAL. By E. F. BENSON.

THE "DONNA" in 1893. I. By the Author of "Charles Lewis."

II. By the Editor.

NIVERNAIS in ENGLAND. By AUSTIN DONSON.

CECCA'S LOVER. By GRANT ALLEN.

AT the SIGN of the SHIP. By ANDREW LANG.

LONDON: LONGMANS, GREEN & Co.; NEW YORK: 15, East 16th Street.

In an entirely new form, price Half-a-crown Monthly.

THE PORTFOLIO.

Edited by P. G. HAMERTON.

The Portfolio will be in future published in a smaller and more handy form, and will consist of about 80 pages. It will contain Four Plates and many minor Illustrations. Each Number will be a Monograph on some Artistic Subject.

THE SUBJECT FOR JANUARY IS

THE ETCHINGS OF REMBRANDT.

By P. G. HAMERTON.

With Four Etchings and Thirty-four other Illustrations.

OTHER SUBJECTS FOR THE YEAR 1894 ARE

DANTE GABRIEL ROSSETTI. By Professor WEDGWOOD. A. H. CHURCH.

W. Q. ORCHARDSON. By FREDERICK WALKER. By WALTER ARMSTRONG. CLAUDE PHILLIPS.

MALTA. By Rev. W. K. R. BASTIEN LEPAGE. By Julia BEDFORD. CARTWRIGHT.

SEELEY & CO., LTD., ESSEX STREET, STRAND.

MAY'S PARLIAMENTARY PRACTICE.

Just published, Tenth Edition, royal 8vo, cloth, 45s.; strongly bound half-calf, 50s.

A TREATISE ON THE LAW, PRIVILEGES, PROCEEDINGS, AND USAGE OF PARLIAMENT.

By Sir THOMAS ERSKINE MAY, K.C.B., D.C.L., Clerk of the House of Commons, and Benchet of the Middle Temple.

Tenth Edition. Books I. and II. Edited by Sir REGINALD F. D. PALGRAVE, K.C.B., Clerk of the House of Commons; Book III. Edited by ALFRED BONHAM-CARTER, Esq., of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law, a Member of the Court of Referees of Private Bills (House of Commons).

LONDON: WM. CLOWES & SONS, LIMITED, LAW PUBLISHERS, 27, FLEET STREET, E.C.

NATIONAL All the Profits are divided among the Assured.
FOR MUTUAL PROVIDENT PROFITS ALREADY DECLARED
LIFE ASSURANCE. £4,600,000.
INVESTED FUNDS, £4,700,000.
PAID IN CLAIMS, £8,800,000.
INSTITUTION.
Endowment-Assurance Policies are combining Life Assurance at Minimum Cost with provision for Old Age.

48, GRACECHURCH STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Princeton University Library

32101 054817141

